incumbent minister has full immunity from criminal jurisdiction through the duration of his position; thus, any acts that he performs, whether in an official or private capacity, cannot be distinguished, because he has immunity from prosecution for either type of acts, as that would prevent him from exercising his role as minister.[677] Additionally, the Court found that there is a distinction between the jurisdictional rules of national courts and those of international immunities and that temporal immunity existed in international law.[678] The Court stressed though, that temporal immunity does not equate to impunity with respect to crimes committed. The Court concluded that the mere issuance of the warrant violated Belgium's obligation toward the DRC, because it violated Yerodia's immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability that he enjoyed under international law.[679]

8.3. State Immunity: A Bar to Civil Remedies for Jus Cogens International Crimes

The question of state immunities arises in the international context when individuals sue states for civil remedies for violations of international norms. The issue arose recently when various civil parties sought damages from Germany in Italian courts for violations arising out of WWII, and the matter was subsequently brought before the ICJ on the grounds that the suits violated Germany's immunity in the courts of another state. The following analysis of the case is taken from the second edition of Introduction to International Criminal Law.[680]

> The doctrine of state immunity was upheld by the ICJ in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening) with respect to individual remedies sought by Italian POW who were the victims of slave labor in Nazi Germany, and Greek victims of a massacre in Distomo, Greece.[681] The case arose out of several successful tort actions by Italian and Greek victims of Nazi atrocities before domestic Italian courts.[682] The underlying acts were not in dispute, as Germany accepted responsibility for the atrocities, in particular the use of slave labor. However, Germany challenged the Italian rulings before the ICJ, arguing that sovereign immunity shielded it from civil actions before the courts of other states.
>
> After the conclusion of the war, in 1947, Italy signed a peace treaty with the victorious allies which included a provision that "Italy waives on its own behalf and on behalf of Italian nationals all claims against Germany and German nationals outstanding on May 8, 1945."[683] Subsequent bilateral agreements were reached between the two countries in which Italy indemnified Germany for all suits arising out of the Second World War in exchange for a lump sum payment to the Italian government.[684] In 1953, Germany adopted the Bundesentschädigungsgesetz, a national

677 Id. at 38.

678 Id. at 38. See also Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259, at 84. Such immunity is not available under Article 27 of the ICC Statute; however, the ICC Statute is formed by a treaty, and states can thereby alter customary international law.

679 Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 39.

680 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341.

681 Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening), 2012 I.C.J. 1 (Feb. 3, 2012).

682 The Greek claims arose out of a separate incident in Greece that was successfully litigated before that country's courts. However, the Minister of Justice refused to enforce the damages awarded and the Greek plaintiffs brought the matter before Italian courts, seeking enforcement of the judgment there, resulting in the transfer of German property in Italy to the Greek plaintiffs.

683 Treaty of Peace with Italy. Signed at Paris, on February 10, 1947, art. 77(4), Feb. 10, 1947, 49 UNTS 3.

684 Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening), 2012 I.C.J. 1, ¶24 (Feb. 3, 2012).

law establishing a compensation system for victims of crimes committed by the Nazi regime.[685] An additional law was adopted in 2000 to provide compensation specifically for the victims of slave labor.[686]

The 1953 and 2000 German laws applied to civilian victims only; neither provided a remedy for POWs who had been used as slave labor, and POWs were explicitly excluded from the reparations scheme under a separate 2000 law,[687] which was upheld by the German Constitutional Court despite its disparate effect.[688] Furthermore, compensation for Italian POWs was not included in the 1947 Peace Treaty and was excluded from the subsequent agreements which terminated all Italian claims against Germany. The Italian POWs who had been forced into slave labor were not, however, considered "civilians" for the purposes of compensation despite the fact that they had been deprived of POW protections arising under IHL by the Nazis. Despite this Germany argued, and the ICJ accepted, that the Italian soldiers never lost their POW status and could therefore lawfully be put to some form of work even though the Nazi government had denied them the full protections that this status required.[689] Thus, Italian POWs became a category of victims without a remedy under German Law.

Unable to file a claim in German courts due to the 2000 law excluding POWs from restitution claims, the Italian plaintiffs brought a domestic action in Italy.[690] Germany brought the matter before the ICJ on the grounds of state immunity, arguing that state and judicial practice, as well as practical concerns militated against the right of national courts to hear international tort claims against a foreign state. In response, Italy argued that the victims had been excluded from all compensation schemes and had no other recourse to remedy their denial of justice for a jus cogens violation of international law. In effect, Italy argued that by necessity and by reason of the fact that the claimants (whether Italian or Greek) were present in Italy, Italian courts could exercise their national jurisdiction over these claims.

The ICJ ruled in favor of Germany,[691] holding that the doctrine of state immunity prevailed over other considerations, even barring compensation for jus cogens crimes such as slave labor.[692] Under the Court's ruling the Italian POWs were also deprived of a remedy under international law since state immunity barred any civil action against Germany in the courts of another state. The ICJ's judgment reinforced the principle that state immunity is a state right deriving from the co-equal nature of state sovereignty,[693] and as such a firm and well-entrenched doctrine of customary international law.[694] The ICJ held that no exception existed to state immunity, and thus in an elegant way it said too bad for the victims. In doing so, the Court disregarded the obligation of Germany to provide for a remedy under the United Nations Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law,[695] which it did 685 Bundesentschädigungsgesetz (BGBl. I S. 1387) (Ger.).

686 Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening), 2012 I.C.J. 1, ¶26 (Feb. 3, 2012).

687 2000 Federal Law (14/3206) (Ger.), art. 11.

688 Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening), 2012 I.C.J. 1, ¶26 (Feb. 3, 2012).

689 Id. at ¶¶ 26 and 29.

690 Id. at ¶¶ 28–29.

691 Id. at ¶¶ 101–103.

692 Id. at ¶¶ 92–101.

693 Id. at ¶ 56 (Feb. 3, 2012).

694 Id. at ¶¶ 57–60, 65, 69, 89–91.

695 G.A. Res. 60/147, U.N. Doc. A/RES/60/147 (March 21, 2006).

not even address or cite in its decision.[696] This omission raises questions about the position of the ICJ on the progressive development of international law in connection with ICL, IHL and IHRL.

9. Expansionist Approach to Extradition Jurisdiction in the United States

The proposed Federal Criminal Code of 1977, in the first version presented in the Senate[697] and the second version presented in Senate Bill 1437, § 204, as well as other sections, such as 1734 and 1751, clearly expanded the concept of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction from what it had traditionally been in the United States.[698] At least in a federal criminal code it would all be in the same place, but no such code has been adopted. Presently, there are numerous federal statutes with many variations on the theme of jurisdiction, which make this area even more confused and confusing than other aspects of federal law. For unknown reasons no federal criminal code has been enacted in the United States, thus leaving the diverse criminal statutes in the first twenty-one titles and other criminal provisions attached to other laws not even compiled in a single section, let alone harmonized.

What is of greater concern, however, in the area of extradition is overlapping and concurrent[699] jurisdiction, which makes it difficult for courts to distinguish between crimes arising out of what may be substantially the same conduct, but which are deemed criminally punishable in more than one state. One such example is the case of Sindona v. Grant,[700] where the acts committed by the relator in Italy and the United States, for which he was prosecuted in the United States and for which he was requested by Italy, were substantially the same. The problems of business criminality will render it more difficult for the extradition magistrate to make the appropriate distinctions.

Federal legislation has expanded extraterritorial jurisdiction. In the more traditional criminal areas it includes: the general conspiracy statute of 18 U.S.C. § 371; RICO, 18 U.S.C. § 1961; CCE (continuing criminal enterprises) 21 U.S.C. § 848; money laundering, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956, 1957; and cybercrime, PROTECT Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2702,[701] Cyber-Security Enhancement Act of the Homeland Security Act of 2002, 18 U.S.C. § 225,[702] Computer Crimes & Intellectual Property Section of the PATRIOT Act, 18 U.S.C. § 202–220, §814, §1030(c), (e).[703]

The expansion of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction can be witnessed in recent years, most notably in the area of business criminality. That can be seen readily in the extension of 696 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Recognition of Victims' Rights, in 6 Human Rights L. Rev. 203 (2006).

697 The Criminal Code Reform Acts of 1977, 95th Cong., 1st. Sess., May 2, 1977.

698 See Feinberg, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and Proposed Federal Criminal Code, 72 J. Crim. L. 385 (1981); David L. Hacking, The Increasing Extraterritorial Impact of U.S. Laws: A Cause for Concern amongst Friends of America, 1 N.W. J. Int'l L. & Bus. 1 (1979).

699 See Feller, Concurrent Criminal Jurisdiction, supra note 1; C. Shachor-Landau, Extra-Territorial Penal Jurisdiction and Extradition, 29 Int'l & Comp. L. Q. 274 (1980).

700 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980).

701 Prosecutorial Remedies and Tools against the Exploitation of Children Today, Pub. L. No. 108-21, 117 Stat. 650 (2003).

702 H.R. 5710 (2002); Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135.

703 USA PATRIOT ACT, 18 U.S.C. §2331, Pub. Law No. 107-56 (2001) (amended 2006), (amended and extended in 2011). For a detailed historical analysis of the more controversial provisions of the USA PATRIOT Act, see the USA PATRIOT Sunset Extension Act of 2011, S. Rep. 112–113 (Apr. 5, 2011).

Securities and Exchange Regulations;[704] the Sarbanes-Oxley Act;[705] the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act;[706] the Export Administration Act (as amended in 1979 with particular reference to the anti-boycott provisions contained therein);[707] and the expansion of antitrust legislation[708] and tax.[709]

More significantly international terrorism also prompted legislation that has extraterritorial aspects. This includes: the Homeland Security Act of 2002,[710] USA PATRIOT ACT,[711] Exec. Order No. 13,224,[712] U.S. Anti-Terrorism & Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA),[713] Airport and Transportation Security Act of 2001, S. 1447 (Nov. 19, 2001); Authorization for the Use

---

704 See Glenn C. Guritzky, Note, Securities—Transnational Application of the Anti-Fraud Provisions of the Federal Securities Laws Expanded—SEC v. Kasser, 548 F.2d 109 (3d Cir.), cert. denied., 431 U.S. 938 (1977), 8 Seton Hall L. Rev. 795 (1978); Joseph A. Marovitch, Note, Continental Grain (Australia) Pty. Ltd. v. Pacific Oilseeds, Inc.: An Unjustifiable Expansion of Subject Matter Jurisdiction in a Transnational Securities Fraud Case, 2 N.W. J. Int'l L. & Bus. 264 (1980); Jay Richardson, Note, A Policy Approach to Subject Matter Jurisdiction in Transnational Securities Fraud Cases, 17 Willamette L. Rev. 263 (1980); George M. Taylor, III, Note, Extraterritorial Application of the Federal Securities Code: An Examination of the Role of International Law in American Courts, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 711 (1978). See also Donald H.J. Hermann, Extraterritorial Criminal Jurisdiction in Securities Laws Regulation, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 79.

705 Sarbanes–Oxley Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-204, 116 Stat. 745 (2002). For a detailed discussion of the regulations under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, see Robert J. Jossen, Dealing with the Lawyer's Responsibilities under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002: Ethical Dilemmas and Practical Considerations, ALI-ABA Course Study Materials (2008).

706 See Robert J. Gareis & Paul McCarthy, Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and Related Statutes, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 193; Mary F. Lyle, Note, The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977: Problems of Extraterritorial Application, 12 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 689 (1979). See also S.B. 1722, 95 Cong., 1st Sess., Sept. 7, 1979.

707 See David Babinski, Note, Trade—The Export Administration Act of 1979, 4 Suffolk Transnat'l L. J. 361 (1980); Reed R. Kathrein, Criminal Enforcement of the Export Administration Act, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 141. For recent extraterritorial applications of U.S. export control laws, see Bruce Zagaris, The Expanding Extraterritorial Application of United States Export Law: Regulation of Foreign Translations and Criminal Prosecution of Foreign Nationals, in the April 4, 1994 publication by the District of Columbia Bar Association.

708 See United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U.S. 268 (1927) (wherein a federal court enjoined the defendant American corporations from conducting various activities in Yucatan designed to control the exportation of sisal to the United States from Mexico and to monopolize the market both inside and outside the United States, in violation of provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act). See also Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U.S. 280 (1952) (holding a federal court in Texas had jurisdiction over a suit by an American watch company to enjoin a U.S. citizen from using the company's trademark, registered under U.S. law, in Mexico on watches made in Mexico); Joseph P. Giffin, Perspectives on the Extraterritorial Application of U.S. Anti-Trust and Other Laws (1979); Theodore L. Banks, International Activities and Crime Considerations under United States Antitrust Laws, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 51; Catherine V. Mannick, Note, Antitrust: British Restrictions on Enforcement of Foreign Judgments, 21 Harv. Int'l L. J. 727 (1980); Pierre Vogelenzang, Note, Foreign Sovereign Compulsion in American Anti-Trust Law, 33 Stan. L. Rev. 131 (1980).

709 See David Passius, Tax Crime and Extraterritorial Discovery, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 105.

710 Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135.

711 18 U.S.C. § 2331, Pub. Law No. 107-56 (2001) (amended 2006) (amended and extended in 2011). For a detailed historical analysis of the more controversial provisions of the USA PATRIOT Act, see the USA PATRIOT Sunset Extension Act of 2011, S. Rep. 112–113 (Apr. 5, 2011).

712 3 C.F.R. 13,224 (Sept. 23, 2001).

713 8 U.S.C. § 1189 (2000).

of Military Force (Congressional Joint Resolution, September 14, 2001); Legal Aspects of the Use of Military Force; and Congressional Research Service, September 13, 2001. Further, provisions of the U.S. Code that deal with international terrorism include the following subjects: Air Commerce and Safety,[714] Aircraft & Motor Vehicle Crimes,[715] Biological Weapons,[716] Chemical Weapons,[717] Civil Disorders,[718] Defense Against Weapons of Mass Destruction,[719] Disaster Relief,[720] Foreign Intelligence Surveillance,[721] International Emergency Economic Powers,[722] National Emergencies,[723] Quarantine and Inspection,[724] Rewards for Information Concerning Terrorist Acts and Espionage,[725] Sabotage,[726] Stored Wire & Electronic Communications & Transactional Records Access,[727] Terrorism,[728] War and National Defense,[729] War Powers Resolution,[730] and Wire & Electronic Communications Interception & Interception of Oral Communications.[731] The Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986[732] prohibits violent terrorist acts against U.S. nationals abroad.[733] The subjects covered include:[734] foreign intelligence surveillance;[735] killing and assaulting federal officials;[736] killing and assaulting family members;[737] terrorist violence against U.S. nationals;[738] consumer

714 49 U.S.C. §§ 44901–44910 (2000).

715 18 U.S.C. §§ 32–37 (2000).

716 18 U.S.C. §§ 175–178 (2000).

717 18 U.S.C. §§ 229–229F (2000).

718 18 U.S.C. §231–233 (2000).

719 50 U.S.C. §§ 2302–2371 (2000).

720 42 U.S.C. §§ 5122–5208 (2000).

721 50 U.S.C. §§ 1801–1862 (2000).

722 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701–1707 (2000).

723 50 U.S.C. §§ 1601–1651(2000).

724 42 U.S.C. §§ 264–272 (2000) (amended, in part, by the Public Health Security and Bioterrorism Prevention Act of 2002, 107 P.L. 188; 116 Stat. 594 in 2002).

725 18 U.S.C. §§ 3071–3077 (2000).

726 18 U.S.C. §§ 2151–2156 (2000).

727 18 U.S.C. §§2701–2712 (2000) (as amended, in part, in 2001 by the USA PATRIOT Act, 107 P.L. 56, as further amended, in part, in 2006 by the USA PATRIOT Improvement and Reauthorization Act of 2005).

728 18 U.S.C. §2331–2339D (2000) (as amended, in part, in 2006 by the USA PATRIOT Improvement and Reauthorization Act of 2005) (as further amended 2009).

729 50 U.S.C. (2000).

730 50 U.S.C. §§ 1541–1548 (2000).

731 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510–2522 (2000).

732 Pub. L. No. 99-399, 100 Stat. 896, § 1201 (1986), and amended Pub.L. 102-572, Title X, §1003(a)(1), Oct. 29, 1992, 106 Stat. 4521; renumbered § 2332 and amended Pub.L. 102-572, Title X, § 1003(a)(2), Oct. 29,1992, 106 Stat. 4521; Pub.L. 103-322, Title VI, § 60022, Sept. 13, 1994, 108 Stat. 1980; Pub.L. 104-132, Title VII, § 705(a)(6), Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1295.

733 See generally George, Federal Anti-terrorist Legislation, supra note 1, at 31–34 (noting that the legislation was the first clear adoption of the passive personality by Congress); George, Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide, supra note 1, at 15.

734 See George, Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, supra note 1.

735 50 U.S.C. §§ 1801–1811 (2000).

736 18 U.S.C. §§ 351, 1111, 1112, 1113, 1114, 1751(a)(c)(e)(f)(k) (2000); 3 U.S.C. §§ 105 (a)(2)(A), 106(a)(1)(A) (2000 & Supp. 2004); 28 U.S.C. § 451 (2000).

737 18 U.S.C. § 879 (2000).

738 18 U.S.C.A. § 2331 (2000) (as amended in 2000).

product tampering;[739] violence against foreign officials;[740] aircraft hijacking;[741] kidnapping of federal officials;[742] protection of U.S. property abroad;[743] protection of foreign diplomatic premises within the United States;[744] destruction of, trespass on, or occupation of other public premises;[745] illegal trafficking in nuclear materials;[746] destruction of energy facilities;[747] smuggling of firearms and their unlawful possession in the United States;[748] and unlawful use of the mails for explosives.[749] Of significant interest is the expansion of U.S. jurisdiction in the area of international crimes, particularly because the United States has been somewhat reluctant to recognize the theory of universality.[750] The United States has recently enacted or proposed legislation to grant jurisdiction over offenses violating human rights laws.[751] Nevertheless, without referring to the theory of universality—except in the proposed Senate Bill 1437, where reference is made to the crimes of hijacking under the Tokyo,[752] Hague,[753] and Montreal[754] Conventions; the protection of diplomats;[755] and grave breaches of the four Geneva Conventions of 1949[756]—it was never quite clear why the United States has been reluctant to recognize the theory of universality, or at least to recognize the possibility that its courts may exercise jurisdiction over international crimes. Such recognition was stated rather clearly in Ex parte Quirin[757] in 1948, in which Chief Justice Stone stated, "From the very beginning of its history, this Court has recognized and applied the law of war as including that part of the law of nations which prescribes, for the conduct of war, the status, rights and duties of enemy

739 18 U.S.C.A. § 1365 (2000) (as amended in 2002).

740 18 U.S.C.A. § 1116(b)(3) (2000).

741 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 31, 32 (2000).

742 18 U.S.C.A. § 1201(a)(5)(2000) (as amended in 2003).

743 18 U.S.C. § 1363 (2000) (as amended in 2001).

744 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, arts. 22(2), 30(1), 30(2), Apr. 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227, T.I.A.S. No. 7502, U.N.T.S. 95 (entered into force with respect to the United States Dec. 13, 1972).

745 18 U.S.C. §§ 793(a)–(g) (2000); 18 U.S.C. §§ 2152–2155 (2000); 18 U.S.C. §§ 1361–1363 (2000); 18 U.S.C. § 970 (2000).

746 42 U.S.C. §§ 2077, 2095, 2122, 2131, 2201 (i) or (o), 2272, 2273, 2274, 2275, 2276, 2277, 2278a, 2278b (2000); 42 U.S.C. §§ 2283(a)(b), 2284 (2000).

747 18 U.S.C. § 1365 (2000).

748 18 U.S.C. §§ 545, 546 (2000).

749 18 U.S.C. § 1715 (2000).

750 But see Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985) (holding Israel could assert universal jurisdiction as grounds for extradition of a U.S. citizen charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986). See In re Extradition of Rafael Eduardo Pineda Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 1998); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997).

751 Human Rights Enforcement Act of 2009, Public Law 111-122, 123 Stat. 3480 (Dec. 22, 2009) (providing jurisdiction over genocide and for the creation of a criminal division in the Department of Justice to enforce human rights law); Child Soldiers Accountability Act of 2008 Pub. L. No. 110-340, 122 Stat. 3735 (2008) (amending INA §§ 212(a)(3), 237(a)(4), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3), 1227(a)(4)).

752 Tokyo Convention, supra note 226.

753 Hague Convention, supra note 214.

754 Montreal Convention, supra note 215.

755 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents, Dec. 14, 1973, G.A. Res. A/3166 (XXVII), T.I.A.S. No. 8532.

756 See supra note 453.

757 Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1948). See Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U.S. 509 (1878) (concerning jurisdiction over war crimes).

nations as well as of enemy individuals."[758] The United States further accepted this principle in the cases of Hirota v. MacArthur,[759] In re Yamashita,[760] and Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky.[761] In Calley v. Callaway,[762] the court did not refer to the violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice as international crimes. Interestingly, however, U.S. legislation permits jurisdiction for a tort claim resulting from a violation of international human rights (torture).[763]

In United States v. Hollinshead,[764] the Ninth Circuit, relying on 18 U.S.C. § 2314 concerning interstate transportation of stolen property, applied that law in a situation concerning pre-Columbian art that was illegally exported from Guatemala. The act also constituted a violation of the UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property.[765] The court discussed whether Guatemalan or U.S. law should apply, as if it were a matter of choice of law, and although the court ultimately applied U.S. law, it was interesting that the court took cognizance of the possibility of applying the law of Guatemala. The issue with respect to extradition is not as much which law to apply,[766] but whether the United States will take cognizance of a criminal act committed outside of its territory and pass judgment upon it.[767]

The United States has long held the position that it feels no compunction in exercising its extraterritorial jurisdiction for matters that may, in its legislative judgment, be deemed as affecting the interests of the United States.[768] The problem, however, arises with respect to an extradition request made to the United States. Clearly, if the United States recognizes theories of extraterritorial jurisdiction, it would be difficult to deny the same to a requesting state. The critical issue will arise whenever there is concurrent jurisdiction or a clear conflict in the jurisdictional theories of the requesting and requested states. The position of the United States is 758 Quirin, 317 U.S. at 27.

---

759 Hirota v. MacArthur, 338 U.S. 197 (1948).

760 Ex parte Quirin, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

761 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986). See In re Extradition of Rafael Eduardo Pineda Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 1998); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997).

762 Calley v. Callaway, 382 F. Supp. 650 (M.D. Ga. 1974), rev'd, 519 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 911 (1976). See also Gary Komarow, Individual Responsibility under International Law: The Nuremberg Principles in Domestic Legal Systems, 29 Int'l & Comp. L. Q. 21 (1980).

763 See United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 331 F.3d 604 (9th Cir. 2003), 542 U.S. 692 (2004), vacated & remanded en banc, 374 F.3d 1384; Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004); Filartiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980); Jeffrey M. Blum & Ralph G. Steinhardt, Federal Jurisdiction over International Human Rights Claims: The Alien Tort Claims Act after Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 22 Harv. Int'l L. J. 53 (1981). But see Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, 113 S. Ct. 2549, 2567 (1993) ("Acts of Congress normally do not have an extraterritorial application unless such an intent is clearly manifest").

764 United States v. Hollinshead, 495 F.2d 1154 (9th Cir. 1974).

765 Nov. 14, 1970, 16th General UNESCO Conference, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 289 (1971).

766 Robert A. Leflar, Conflict of Laws: Choice of Law in Criminal Cases, 25 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 44 (1974).

767 See Strassheim v. Daily, 221 U.S. 280 (1911); United States v. Fernandez, 496 F.2d 1294 (5th Cir. 1974).

768 See, e.g., Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593 (1927); Strassheim, 221 U.S. 280; United States v. Zabaneh, 837 F.2d 1249 (5th Cir. 1988) (holding non-objection of foreign states to extradition of relator precluded his objection to the extradition); United States v. Ladmer, 429 F. Supp. 1231 (E.D.N.Y. 1977); United States ex rel. Eatessami v. Marasco, 275 F. Supp. 492 (S.D.N.Y. 1967). But see United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that kidnapping of a foreign national by U.S. government agents may violate international law protecting state sovereignty). United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 112 S. Ct. 2188 (1992) (holding that the extradition with Mexico did not specifically exclude kidnapping—a questionable conclusion). See Ch. V.

essentially embodied in Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker,[769] which is that the language of the treaty will control. In that respect, contemporary treaties merely state that extradition will be granted whenever the requesting state will have jurisdiction.[770] That type of language causes a U.S. court to defer to the jurisdictional theory of the requesting state, irrespective of the theory itself and of whether the United States recognizes the theory. Such was the case in In re Assarsson,[771] where Sweden relied on its active personality or nationality theory of jurisdiction in seeking the relator for a crime committed in Denmark.

Contemporary expansion in extraterritorial jurisdiction in recent "antiterrorist" legislation in the United States[772] as well as the expanded interpretation given to the notion of criminal conspiracy, has raised questions with respect to the recognition of these theories in other legal systems, particularly those that are not common law–based. It could be argued that such theories raise a question as to the existence of reciprocity.[773] Furthermore, foreign courts, in interpreting treaties with the United States, may not necessarily give recognition to an extradition request based on a crime charged or committed under a U.S. law that relies on one of the expanded theories of jurisdiction. The problems in this context are twofold. The first problem concerns the interpretation of the relevant treaty[774] and whether the term "jurisdiction" or "territory" will mean the same thing[775] and will be interpreted in light of the jurisprudence existing at the time of the treaty or at the time of the request for extradition. The second problem would be whether the foreign court will look at the jurisprudence of the United States or at its own jurisprudence to determine the meaning and scope of the terms "jurisdiction" or "territory," which terms are found and used interchangeably in all treaties.[776]

---

769 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936).

770 See, e.g., Convention on Extradition, Oct. 24, 1961, U.S.–Swed., art. III, 14 U.S.T. 1845, T.I.A.S. No. 5496.

771 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 938 (1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999). But see Emami v. United States, Dist. Ct. N.D. Cal., 834 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1987). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir., Dec. 10, 1997); In re Extradition of Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

772 In United States v. Yunis, 681 F. Supp. 896 (D. D.C. 1988), the defendant was charged under these Acts, which embody the obligation of the United States under the 1969 Hague and 1971 Montreal Conventions on Hijacking and Sabotaging of aircraft. The defendant was seized in international waters outside Cyprus and abducted, and brought to the United States against his will. Yunis was also charged under the Hostage Taking Act 18 U.S.C. § 1203 (1984), which also authorizes extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. This legislation gives effect to the 1979 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages. The Circuit Court in United States v. Yunis, 942 F.2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991), held that the district court had proper in personam jurisdiction and subject-matter jurisdiction. Yunis was convicted of conspiracy, 18 U.S.C. § 371 (1984); hostage taking, 18 U.S.C. § 1203 (1984); and hijacking, 49 U.S.C. App. § 1472 (1974). The court's reasoning was unclear as to the jurisdictional basis it relied upon.

773 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.5 and Ch. V.]

774 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.3.

775 See supra Sec. 1.

776 This position was argued but rejected in the extradition (requested by the United States of Switzerland) of Roberto Suarez, Jr., which was decided by the Swiss Federal Court for the Canton of Ticino on August 3, 1982, in which extradition was granted to the United States on the basis of an alleged conspiracy committed in Colombia, where all the acts took place, but whose intended effect was to be in the United States.

The trend in the expansion of the United States' extraterritorial jurisdiction conflicts with those of European legal systems, which have traditionally opposed jurisdictional expansions. The modern European trend is, however, toward eliminating territorial boundaries.[777]

At the international level, there is also a trend to enhance the duty to prosecute or extradite and to give greater recognition to the principle of universality for certain international crimes. Obviously, as more international criminal law conventions provide for a duty to prosecute or extradite, problems will arise with respect to states that will not carry out their obligations in this respect. By expanding criminal jurisdiction, certain states, such as the United States, will be in a position to preempt these problems by asserting jurisdiction on an alternative basis. This, of course, does not solve the issue of securing in personam jurisdiction over the relator and may induce states to resort to unlawful seizures of the persons sought. The United States has, since the 1960s, embarked on a course of ever-expanding extraterritorial jurisdiction in almost all areas of the law.[778] However, since the 1980s it has been restricting the extraterritorial application of constitutional guarantees to U.S. citizens abroad and constitutional limitations on U.S. agents acting abroad.[779]

This dual track of expanded criminal jurisdictions and limitations on constitutional rights and restrictions are seen in the United States as a proper response to certain forms of criminality, particularly drug trafficking and terrorism. The result is a reduction in the standards of integrity of the U.S. criminal justice system.

Such a policy also leads to potential conflicts with other states.[780] In the absence of an international court with jurisdiction to handle all such matters, or other means to resolve jurisdictional conflicts, states will have no alternative but to compete with one another, and that may even lead to situations that threaten the peace and security of humankind. One such example is the conflicts among the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya over the extradition of two persons charged with the sabotage of Pan Am Flight 103 out of London, which blew up over Lockerbie, Scotland, killing 259 persons.[781] The United States

---

777 See Ch. I. For text of the Schengen Agreement, see H. Meijers et al., Schengen (1991). For the trend to establish a Europe-wide criminal jurisdiction area, see Régis de Gouttes, Vers un Espace Judiciaire Pénal Pan Européen?, in Recueil Dalloz Sirey (1991); Régis de Gouttes, Variations sur L'espace Judiciaire Pénal Européen, in Recuil Dalloz Sirey (1990).

778 As described by Professor Blakesley:

> United States courts have recently expanded the traditional bases of jurisdiction over extraterritorial crimes. The major impetus behind that expansion is the burgeoning problem of extraterritorial conspiracies to import narcotics into the United States. The courts have sought to discourage prophylactically narcotics importation by asserting jurisdiction over even thwarted conspiracies. Although that judicial approach might have great practical merit, it also creates a conceptual crisis: thwarted extraterritorial narcotics conspiracies come close to fitting within several of the traditional bases of extraterritorial jurisdiction, but they actually fit none. As a result, the courts have tugged and stretched the traditional bases of jurisdiction in order to obtain jurisdiction over the anomalous case of the thwarted extraterritorial narcotics conspiracy. In so doing, however, the courts have muddled the language of international law and created the risk that extradition in such cases will be denied.

Blakesley, Conceptual Framework for Extradition, supra note 1, at 685–686.

> Various bodies of law limit a state's authority to apply domestic law to events occurring in a foreign state. They include public international law; jurisdictional limitations in domestic law; and the law of the foreign state itself, which may preclude enforcement of the judgment rendered by the state assuming jurisdiction, or more importantly for the purposes of this article, may serve as a basis for denying extradition.

Id. at 686–687 (citations omitted).

779 See Ch. V (regarding the discussion of unlawful seizures and abductions).

780 See David M. Kennedy et al., The Extradition of Mohammed Hamadei, 31 Harv. Int'l L. J. 5 (1990).

781 See In re Pan Am. Corp., 950 F.2d 839 (2d Cir. 1991).

and the United Kingdom sought the extradition of the two persons indicted in the United States and Scotland. But Libya contended that it had the right, even the duty, to first prosecute them in Libya, in accordance with the 1971 Montreal Convention.[782] The United States and the United Kingdom sought and obtained an unprecedented Security Council Resolution 748,[783] which ordered Libya to surrender these individuals or risk sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter. Prescinding from the unprecedented nature of the resolution's contents, Libya brought an action against the United States and the United Kingdom before the ICJ. The ICJ decided that the Security Council had the power to decide on its own competence under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.[784]

10. Recommendations for a Policy-Oriented Inquiry into the Problems of Jurisdiction and Jurisdictional Priorities in Extradition and World Public Order

When a state requests another state to surrender a fugitive to its jurisdictional control, it asserts that: (1) it has jurisdiction over the subject matter of the conduct allegedly performed by the actor; (2) it is a competent forum to prosecute the offender; and (3) when the actor is surrendered, he/she will be properly submitted to its judicial authorities for the exercise of their competent jurisdictional authority.[785]

These representations by the requesting state presuppose that the requested state: (1) is competent to exercise in personam jurisdiction over the relator; (2) has legislative authority to regulate the type of conduct allegedly committed by the relator, and such conduct is deemed in violation of that state's laws; and (3) is the competent forum to prosecute the offender. Concerning proper legislative authority, the requesting state may rely on any one of the theories discussed

782 See supra note 215. For an earlier position, see Christopher Schreuerer, Concurrent Jurisdiction of National and International Tribunals, 13 Houston L. Rev. 508 (1976).

783 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 293, at 169–190.

784 A decision on the merits of the case brought by Libya against the United Kingdom and the United States is still pending before the International Court of Justice. Provisional measures were denied on April 14, 1992. In denying provisional measures, the court issued two sets of opinions: one in the proceedings against the United Kingdom, the other in the proceedings against the United States. See Case Concerning Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Provisional Measures, Order of April 14, 1991, [1992] I.C.J. Reports 3; Case Concerning Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Provisional Measures, Order of April 14, 1992, [1992] I.C.J. Reports 114. The two sets of opinions are substantially identical. Other relevant documents in the case are reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 717–758 (1992). Commenting on the case generally, see Fiona Beveridge, The Lockerbie Affair, 41 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 907 (1992); Vera Gowland Debbas, The Relationship between the International Court of Justice and the Security Council in Light of the Lockerbie Case, 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 643 (1994); Thomas M. Franck, Editorial Comment, The "Powers of Appreciation": Who Is the Ultimate Guardian of UN Legality?, 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 519 (1992); Bernhard Graefrath, Leave to the Court What Belongs to the Court: The Libyan Case, 4 European J. Int'l L. 184 (1993); Christopher C. Joyner & Wayne P. Rothbaum, Libya and the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie: What Lessons for International Extradition Law?, 14 Mich. J. Int'l L. 222 (1993); Robert F. Kennedy, Note, Libya v. United States: The International Court of Justice and the Power of Judicial Review, 33 Va. J. Int'l L. 899 (1993); Vaughn Lowe, Lockerbie—Changing the Rules during the Game, Cambridge L.J. 408 (1992); Gerald P. McGinley, The I.C.J.'s Decision in the Lockerbie Cases, 22 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 577 (1992); W. Michael Reisman, The Constitutional Crisis in the United Nations, 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 83 (1993); Alfred P. Rubin, Libya, Lockerbie and the Law, 4 Diplomacy & Statecraft 1 (1993); cf. Alfred P. Rubin, Viewpoints: UN Sanctions on Libya, 54 Int'l Practitioner's Notebook 18 (Aug. 1992); Christian Tomuschat, The Lockerbie Case before the International Court of Justice, 48 Int'l Comm'n Jurists Rev. 38 (1992).

785 See Ch. V (concerning unlawful seizures and irregular rendition).

above, and its national jurisdiction will be recognized, unless it conflicts with an international law norm, in which case the latter prevails. In the event that the laws of the requesting state conflict with the laws or public policy of the requested state, the question becomes whether the laws or policy of either state conflict with international law. If neither state's laws conflict with international law, but only conflict with each other, the requested state will prevail. In any event, an offender should not benefit from a conflict of laws to evade criminal responsibility. Thus, conflict-of-laws questions must be resolved on the basis of the policy of aut dedere aut judicare.[786]

As to the requirement regarding the competent forum for prosecution, international criminal law recognizes three theories that can be relied upon. They are forum domicilius,[787] forum delicti commissis,[788] and forum deprehensious.[789] The determination of a proper prosecution forum is a policy-oriented inquiry within the framework of conflict-of-laws resolution.

The first formal contact between the requesting and requested state is receipt of the extradition request by the requested state, which first considers whether the requesting state: (1) has jurisdiction over the subject matter; (2) is the proper prosecution forum; and (3) would have in personam jurisdiction once the relator is delivered. If a similar request is made by a second state claiming jurisdiction over the same subject matter arising either out of the same conduct allegedly performed by that relator, which the first requesting state equally claims, or by reason of another conduct allegedly committed by the same relator against the second requesting state, then the requested state has to decide the priority among these competing requests. Furthermore, the requested state may also have an interest in prosecuting the relator, either by reason of the same conduct alleged in one or both requests, or by reason of other alleged criminal conduct. In this case, it must weigh its interests and those of the requesting state or states.

In the case where there is only one extradition request and the requested state has no concurrent interest or claim to the same relator, six policy-oriented questions are proposed:

1. Does the requesting state properly assert jurisdiction over the subject matter and the relator?

2. Does such jurisdiction exist in law and in fact?

3. Is such a jurisdictional claim contemplated by the treaty or the practice of reciprocity or comity upon which the request is made?

4. Does the jurisdictional claim arise under (a) international law; (b) international law as applied by the requesting state; or (c) the national law of the requested state?

5. Does the jurisdictional basis claimed conflict with the public policy of the requested state or is it so repugnant to its system as to deny it recognition?

6. Is the jurisdictional claim asserted by the requesting state violative on its face of the very basis on which it allegedly rests, whether it be international law, municipal law, or the application of international law in the municipal law of either the requesting or requested state?

If there is more than one extradition request for the same relator, the requested state must first satisfy itself concerning the set of policy-oriented questions stated above. Thereafter, the state of refuge must rank such requests. Four policy considerations for ranking are suggested:

1. The first received will be the first granted.

2. The more serious offense receives priority.

---

786 This maxim means that a state must either prosecute or extradite. See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 293.

787 This term refers to the forum wherein the defendant is domiciled.

788 This term refers to the forum wherein the crime was committed.

789 This term refers to the forum wherein the defendant was arrested.

3. The most significant state interest affected by the alleged crime receives priority.

4. Rank depends upon subject matter jurisdiction. That is, a sub-ranking based on jurisdictional theory could be applied as follows: (a) the territorial theory has precedence over all others, (b) second in rank is the combination of two or more theories asserted by one requesting state (such as universality and passive personality or passive and active personality); then should follow in order (c) the universality theory, (d) the protective theory, (e) the nationality theory, and (f) the passive personality theory.

There are no clear guidelines in extradition law and practice as to the applicable international law rule in concurrent jurisdiction claims. The outcome is uncertainty of prosecution[790] and potential conflict between the interested states.

International law recognizes the equal sovereignty of all nation-states in the world community and does not grant any of them a hierarchical authority over the other. Nonetheless, the requested state must make a policy decision as to the applicability and propriety of the requesting state's three jurisdictional requirements. Furthermore, in the event of multiple requests, the requested state is in a position to give priority to the request of one authoritative decision-maker over the other, and thus it exercises a hierarchical authority over coequal participants in the world community system. The requested state is, therefore, in a vertical relationship vis-à-vis the requesting state and pursues that role with respect to conflict-of-laws issues arising out of the application of multiple theories of jurisdiction.[791] The significance of this decision-making function is manifest whenever the requested and requesting states have different interpretations and policies as to the theories of jurisdiction in question and their application.

International criminal law has come to recognize, in varying degrees and with different applications, several theories of jurisdiction. In extradition practice, jurisdictional issues are determined by the requested state. That fact may not be as disconcerting in practice as it appears in theory, because there is an anticipation that requested states will apply their domestic theories and policies. This realization ignores the broader theories with respect to the international nature of the process. Such implications require that national theories of jurisdiction and their application should be subordinated to international law rules. Thus, no participant in the world constitutive process will be in a hierarchical position with respect to another coequal participant.[792]

The recognition of the coequal sovereignty of all states precludes harmony among the conflicting national laws of different states, and conflicts of interpretation are difficult to resolve. Because, however, there is no such harmony in national approaches to jurisdiction, there is no alternative to the establishment of a hierarchical norm in theories of jurisdiction to avoid conflict between coequal authoritative decision-making processes. Such a hierarchical norm would be applied by each state, and it would not, therefore, detract from the sovereignty of any other state. Among the several problems raised by this subject is, of course, the inability of states, in the presently constituted world social order, to develop this type of alternative policy solution. The consequences arising from these problems are reflected in clashes between these horizontally related decision-making processes. The potential effect of such clashes is the creation of conflict situations leading to threats and disruptions of minimum world order.

These problems of conflict of criminal jurisdiction are largely due to the narrow and jealously guarded concept of sovereignty. The battles over where to prosecute an accused criminal overshadow the real substance of the issue: prosecuting or punishing offenders. The alternative to the present situation is to seek the proper applicable substantive law rather than to dispute which forum should prosecute an accused criminal.

790 See David A. Clanton, Comment, Extradition: Concurrent Jurisdiction and the Uncertainty of Prosecution in the Requested Nation, 14 Wayne L. Rev. 1181 (1968).

791 Richard A. Falk, International Jurisdiction: Horizontal and Vertical Conceptions of Legal Order, 32 Temp. L.Q. 295 (1959).

792 Nicholas deBelleville Katzenbach, Conflicts on an Unruly Horse: Reciprocal Claims and Tolerances in Interstate and International Law, 65 Yale L.J. 1087 (1956).

The multiplicity of jurisdictional theories results not only in conflict-of-laws problems, but also creates two other sets of problems: (1) an impediment to just and effective criminal law enforcement, whether nationally or internationally; and (2) the subjection of accused offenders to the risk of multiple prosecutions and other violations of their human rights. Indeed, under the passive personality doctrine or the nationality doctrine, more than one state can prosecute and punish a person for the same offense and subject that person to multiple jeopardy.

The interest in preserving world public order does not conflict with concern for preserving national public order, nor will either one of these interests be impaired by preserving basic human rights. None of these, however, can be served without curtailing national sovereignty concepts in matters of extradition.[793]

11. Overlapping Jurisdictional Claims and Extradition Priorities

There are two issues that present themselves in connection with extradition priority. The first is when more than one state seeks the extradition of the same person from a requested state. The multiple requests from different requesting states can be for the same set of facts, and this situation arises whenever a particular crime falls with the jurisdiction of more than one state. The second arises when the two requests are made for separate facts that are unrelated. In addition, a separate issue arises when a request is made by a state and the requested state also claims jurisdiction with respect to the same set of facts, which constitute a crime in the requested state as well as in the requesting state. With respect to the latter, it is common for the requested state having jurisdiction over crimes arising out of a certain set of facts that are also claimed to constitute a crime or crimes in another jurisdiction, namely that of the requesting state, to claim priority in prosecution based either on territoriality, nationality, passive personality, or protected interest, as these theories of jurisdiction are discussed in this chapter.

In these situations the requested state conventionally exercises jurisdictional priority, having custody of the accused. But that does not exclude the possibility of extraditing such a person to a requesting state for purposes of prosecuting the same person for a crime or crimes claimed by the requesting state. Usually this means that the requested state, which seeks to exercise its jurisdictional priority, would prosecute the person and then extradite him/her conditionally upon that person being tried in the requesting state subject to returning that person after the end of the trial for that person to execute his/her sentence in the requesting state exercising its jurisdictional priority. Such a person will then execute his/her sentence in the original requested state, and then upon completion of the execution of the sentence be transferred to the original requesting state for the execution of the second sentence. This situation arose in connection with the former head of state of Panama, Manuel Noriega, who was first prosecuted and sentenced in the United States and then upon completion of his sentence was extradited to France.[794] After execution of his sentence in France, he was sought for extradition by Panama, and the French court of appeals extradited him to Panama after a conditional release was granted.[795]

As to situations involving competing jurisdictional claims between a requesting state and the requested state, as stated above, national jurisdiction will usually be deemed a priority over the 793 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, World Public Order and Extradition: A Conceptual Evaluation, in Aktuelle Probleme des Internationalen Strafrechts (D. Oehler & P.G. Potz eds., 1970); M. Cherif Bassiouni & Christopher L. Blakesley, The Need for an International Criminal Court in the New International World Order, 25 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 151 (1992).

---

794 United States v. Noriega, 694 F. Supp. 2d 1268 (S.D. Fla. 2007).

795 Cour d'appel [CA] Paris, 5ème ch., Sept. 21, 2011, ____ JCP____, (n. 2011/06023).

request by a requesting state, particularly if the facts upon which the person has been requested are the same in both the requested and requesting states without further justification. In United States v. Cotroni, the Canadian Supreme Court held that two Canadian citizens could be extradited to the United States to face heroin trafficking charges.[796] The court held that although the requested state may have an interest in prosecuting an individual, "It is often better that a crime be prosecuted where its harmful impact is felt and where the witnesses and the persons most interested in bringing the criminal to justice reside."[797] In that case, the court held that, on the balance of interests, extradition was warranted. However, in Ferguson v. Attorney General of Trinidad & Tobago, the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago ruled that that country had priority over the United States, the requesting state, as the crime was committed in Trinidad and Tobago and the effects were greatest there. Although the United States could have prosecuted the individuals for laundering the money in the United States, the balance test borrowed from Cotroni militated against extradition.[798]

796 [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1469.

797 Id.

798 Ferguson v. Atty. General of Trinidad and Tobago, H.C.A. No. 4144 (High Court of Justice, Nov. 7, 2011).

Chapter VII

Substantive Requirements: Dual Criminality, Extraditable Offenses, Specialty, and Non-Inquiry

Contents

1. Reciprocity: The Underpinning of Substantive Requirements

The practice of extradition, as discussed in Chapter I, developed before treaties superseded custom as its most important source. As the practice evolved over the centuries it settled on a number of similar substantive requirements, exclusions, exceptions, defenses, and procedures.[1] These similarities were later reflected in treaties, national legislation, jurisprudence, and doctrine. The cumulative effect of these different sources make up what is regarded as the customary international law of extradition.

The two most important features of modern extradition are its legal nature and its observance of the Rule of Law. Although the obligation to extradite in the absence of a treaty was supported by Jean Bodin,[2] Hugo Grotius,[3] and other publicists discussed in Chapter I, and is expressed in the maxim aut dedere aut judicare,[4] the duty to extradite in the absence of a treaty is still not sufficiently recognized as being part of customary international law (CIL). The practice of states reflects the position that no clear international legal obligation or duty to surrender a fugitive from justice exists in the absence of a treaty or reciprocity, except with respect to international crimes.[5]

Extradition is essentially a process of inter-governmental legal assistance for the prosecution and punishment of persons accused of a crime or convicted of a crime in another state. It is also the process by which a person is surrendered by a state to an international criminal tribunal. It should be noted that with respect to international criminal tribunals the process is referred to as "surrender."[6]

The increased concerns for human rights protection expressed through international conventions, national constitutions, and national laws, as well as in multilateral and bilateral

1 See Ch. VIII.

2 Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la République (Paris 1577).

3 Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, Libri Tres (Paris 1625) ("ut non stricte populus aut rex ad dedendum teneatur, sed ut diximus, ad dedendum aut puniendum . . . est enim disjunctiva obligatio.").

4 M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Prosecute or Extradite (1995).

5 See Ch. I.

6 See Ch. I, Sec. 7.

extradition treaties, have modified the contractual concept of extradition that prevailed in the nineteenth century.[7] Nevertheless, the substantive requirements of extradition discussed in this chapter derive essentially from the traditional conceptual basis for the practice, namely that extradition is a contractual relationship between governments that recognizes the observance of individual rights required by international law. These rights inure to the benefit of the relator, who can claim their application in the national legal systems of the requested and requesting states. Standing to claim a legal right arising under international law, or by virtue of a treaty, is subject to national law, however. Abridgement of such rights gives rise to legal remedies under international law.[8]

The basic requirements applicable to extradition are alternatively referred to as "principles" or "rules" without regard to the legal implications that such a choice of words may have in a given national legal system. These requirements are usually embodied in bilateral extradition treaties, but they are also found in multilateral treaties and in national legislation. More important, they are a part of CIL.[9]

The relationship between treaties and national legislation depends on national constitutional and other national legal provisions applicable to extradition in accordance with the hierarchy of sources of law in a given legal system. The U.S. Constitution provides for the supremacy of treaties, which rank with the Constitution as the supreme law of the land.[10]

The substantive requirements for extradition are: dual criminality, extraditable offenses, specialty, and non-inquiry. These substantive requirements do not share the same characteristics, but are predicated on reciprocity in the sense of equivalent mutual treatment deriving from the mutuality of legal obligations. As a result, these substantive requirements are, in many respects, interrelated. Thus, dual criminality and extraditable offenses, which require that the underlying act be recognized as a crime in both states, reflect the premise of reciprocity upon which these substantive requirements are based. The same applies to specialty, which requires the requesting state to observe the limitations provided by the requested state in connection with the charges and penalties for which the relator can be prosecuted or the type of punishment he/she can receive. The "rule of non-inquiry,"[11] as it is frequently referred to in U.S. jurisprudence, is also based on the premise of reciprocity, in that states shall not sit in judgment of each other's legal systems.[12]

Reciprocity does not require complete parallelism between the obligations of states, but rather the balanced equivalence of reciprocal obligations. Thus, whether a treaty mentions certain jurisdictional theories or not, a requesting state may rely on a jurisdictional theory that is not recognized by the requested state, and vice versa. For example, states recognize or differently rely on extraterritorial jurisdiction principles, namely active personality, passive personality, protected interest, and universality.[13] The requested state may rely on reciprocity to deny the

---

7 See Ch. I.

8 See infra Sec. 6 (Specialty).

9 For the question of the applicability of customary international law to U.S. courts, see Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law and Human Rights Treaties Are Law of the United States, 20 Mich. J. Int'l L. 301 (1999); contra Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 816 (1997).

10 U.S. Const. art. VI, § 1, cl. 2. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957); Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 117 (1987) [hereinafter Restatement (Third)]. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Reflections on the Ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by the United States Senate, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 1169 (1993).

11 See infra Sec. 8.

12 It should be noted (as discussed below in Sec. 4) that this rule is not an absolute bar to a U.S. court's inquiry into certain practices that constitute a violation of international law or a violation of U.S. law and public policy.

13 See Ch. VI.

request on the notion that because it could not prosecute on such a jurisdictional theory, it cannot grant extradition for prosecution on the said theory. To avoid such problems, newer U.S. extradition treaties make specific mention of the fact that the requested state shall grant extradition when the offense in question is within the jurisdiction of the requesting state. This avoids making jurisdiction a substantive requirement for extradition, as is the case with dual criminality.

Another issue of reciprocity is what triggers the request, namely an arrest warrant, a charging instrument (such as an indictment or its counterpart), or a conviction. A treaty, however, may use the term "charge," which could either mean an arrest warrant or a formal charging instrument. Whether the term "charge" is one or the other is essentially a question of treaty interpretation, as is the question of whether it could be considered as falling in the area of dual criminality depending upon the determination of the first question. In that context, however, the issue of reciprocity also arises, as has been argued by this writer and co-counsels in In re Assarsson.[14] Nonetheless, in Assarsson the court did not interpret the treaty provisions as requiring an absolute symmetry. Thus, it was possible for Sweden to rely on the nationality principle of jurisdiction, which the United States could not have invoked in its extradition request to Sweden because it is not applicable in U.S. law.[15]

A requested state may consider that a certain aspect of the requesting state's criminal process is so alien to its system so as to lack any basis of reciprocity. That could also include any particular procedure that is so patently contrary to the fundamental principles of the requested state's legal system as to cause it to refuse the use of its legal processes in furtherance of the goal of the requesting state.[16] In such a case, the requirement of reciprocity could be relied upon, and it would even be advisable to do so in order to avoid a judicial opinion containing language offensive to the requesting state. For example, a court considering a denial of extradition to a requesting state where a conviction was obtained by means of torture, or where it appears on the face of the record of the conviction that the relator had no opportunity to defend him-/herself, the court could simply conclude that the procedure in question lacked any basis of reciprocity within the U.S. legal system, rather than refusing to concede extradition by reason that the procedure in the requesting state is fundamentally violative of minimum due process standards generally accepted by civilized nations, a ruling that would be offensive to the requesting state and embarrassing to the U.S. government in its diplomatic relations with that state. The Court of Appeals of Limoges, France, took this position for different reasons in the Bozano case,[17] wherein Italy had requested the extradition of Bozano for the crime of murder. The relator had been acquitted in Italy by the trial court due to insufficient evidence, but subsequently was retried on appeal in absentia for the same crime and found guilty. The Chambre des Mises

---

14 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 938 (1980). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999).

15 See, however, with respect to terrorism, 18 U.S.C. § 1202(a), §§ 2331–2339 (2000), as amended by the 2001 USA PATRIOT ACT, Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 376 (2001) (amending the definition of domestic terrorism and adding the "Harboring and Concealing of Terrorists"). See also B.J. George, Jr., Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 25 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988); M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents (1972–2001) (2001).

16 See Ch. I.

17 Judgment of May 15, 1979, Cour d'Appel de Limoges, No. 37 (Fr.); 9 Eur. H.R. Rep. 297 (1987). See also opinion of Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris, Ordonnance de Réfer, Jan. 14, 1980 (Fr.). Bozano was subsequently illegally seized in France and delivered to Switzerland, which extradited him to Italy. But the European Court of Human Rights condemned this practice and held for Bozano against France. See Ch. V, Secs. 1 (discussing the Bozano case).

en Accusation held that this procedure did not exist in France, and that the lack of reciprocity was a valid reason for denying extradition.[18]

Treaties that do not specifically exclude or include reciprocal extradition of nationals usually couch such provisions in optional terms. Thus, each state is given discretion in extraditing its respective nationals. In this context, a state that has agreed to such a discretionary right may also have a specific constitutional prohibition against extradition of its nationals, such as in the case of Mexico. Though the 1979 extradition treaty between Mexico and the United States contains a discretionary provision,[19] this in reality means that only the United States will extradite its nationals. This is the case because, even though the discretionary provision is reciprocal, it is known a priori, meaning that it can only be exercised by one of the parties. The argument was presented by this writer before the Fifth Circuit in Escobedo v. United States[20] to the effect that such a provision in the 1899 treaty between the United States and Mexico violated the principle of reciprocity because Mexico never extradited any of its citizens to the United States, while the United States extradited its citizens to Mexico. The same provision is contained in the 1979 extradition treaty between these countries. The court, however, rejected the argument, holding that it could not go behind the treaty, and that the use of discretion was a matter to be left to the executive branch.

In 1990 the United States added § 3196:

> If the applicable treaty or convention does not obligate the United States to extradite its citizens to a foreign country, the Secretary of State may, nevertheless, order the surrender to that country of a United States citizen whose extradition had been requested by that country if the other requirements of that treaty or convention are met.[21]

The language is quite clear that the United States does not have to extradite its nationals to a foreign country unless a treaty requires it to do so. However, § 3196 gives discretion to the secretary of state to surrender a U.S. citizen even if a treaty does not require it.[22]

Mutuality of obligation has two approaches in the context of treaties. The first is that the same treaty binds the same two countries, irrespective of whether the treaty is bilateral or multilateral. This is the approach of identical mutuality, where the obligation to extradite arises out of the same legal source and, therefore, all states concerned have symmetrical obligations arising out of the same treaty. The second is where two countries in a bilateral relationship are bound, but not by the same legal instrument or on the same legal basis. This approach of non-identical mutuality occurs when there are obligations arising from different legal sources, each binding on one of the two states, but having different sources. For example, if one country agrees to extradite on the basis of its national legislation, while another agrees to do so on the basis of reciprocity, in substance, these two countries are respectively bound to extradite but on the

---

18 Id.

19 U.S.–Mex. Extradition Treaty (1979), 31 U.S.T. 5059, Protocol (not yet ratified), Sen. Doc. No. 106-46.

20 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980), cert. denied sub nom., Castillo v. Forsht, 450 U.S. 922 (1981), reh'g denied, 451 U.S. 934 (1981). Even though Mexico does not extradite its nationals to the United States, the reverse is not true. The United States could insist on reciprocity and not extradite its nationals, even though after so many years of practice it might be difficult to reverse the course. See Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099, 1101–1102 (4th Cir. 1977).

21 18 U.S.C. § 3196 (2000).

22 The constitutionality of such a power was raised in the context of the doctrine of separation of powers, but it was found that apportioning different responsibilities to separate branches of government does not conflict with the Constitution. Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 380, 109 S. Ct. 647, 659 (1989), Lobue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995), vacated and remanded by 82 F. 3d. 1081 (1996).

basis of separate legal sources of obligation. Another example is where two states are bound to extradite, but on the basis of different treaties.[23]

2. Dual Criminality[24]

Dual criminality (also referred to as double criminality and double incrimination) refers to the characterization of the relator's conduct as criminal under the laws of both the requesting and requested states. It is a reciprocal characterization of criminality that is considered a substantive requirement for granting extradition. But it should not be confused with reciprocity as one of the legal bases for the practice of extradition, namely: bilateral or multilateral treaties, reciprocity, comity, or national legislation.[25] Dual criminality embodies a reciprocal characterization of those offenses deemed extraditable. Treaties list or otherwise designate extraditable offenses and also require dual criminality. Both of these requirements characteristically contain an implicit element of mutuality.[26]

Dual criminality and extraditable offenses are closely linked. The first is conceptual. It means that the crime charged in the requesting state is also a crime in the requested state. The second, extraditable offenses, means those offenses that are deemed subject to extradition. In treaty practice, extraditable offenses are listed in the treaty or designated in some way, usually by a formula. Whenever the practice is not based on a treaty, extraditable offenses will be those that the respective states agree to and for which they are willing to reciprocate. Thus, if a formula is established for dual criminality, extraditable offenses are those that are contained in the criminal laws of both legal systems.

As early as 1880, the Institute for International Law, meeting at Oxford, declared in its Resolutions, "La condition de reciprocité, en cette matière, peut-être commandé par la politique; elle n'est pas exigée par la justice" ("The condition of reciprocity in this matter can be based on a political consideration; it is not required by justice").[27] Earlier publicists such as Billot, Grotius, and Vattel expressed a similar view.[28]

Some states require dual criminality independently of what they deem extraditable offenses, while others deem the dual criminality formula sufficient without needing to add a list of extraditable offenses. It would be desirable if states practiced extradition on the basis of dual criminality predicated on a formula and driven by the facts, in other words, that the facts are sufficient to warrant a criminal charge of the same nature in both states.

---

23 This is the case at present between the United States and the United Kingdom, where the United Kingdom is bound by the 2003 extradition treaty, which it ratified and incorporated into its national legislation, but which the United States only ratified in 2006. See Ch. I, Sec. 5.

24 This discussion has been referenced in a case before the Federal Court of Australia. See Dutton v. O'Shane, 2003 132 F.C.R. 352. See also United States v. De La Pava, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1912 (N.D. Ill. 1993); In re Extradition of Guillen, 1991 U.S. Dist. Lexis 21839 (N.D. Ill. 1991).

25 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.

26 The proposition that extradition as practiced on the basis of reciprocity also requires dual criminality was upheld by several decisions in those countries that engage in nontreaty reciprocally based practice. See In re Nikoloff, 7 Ann. Dig. 351, 352 (Upper Ct. Dresden 1933) (F.R.G.) (stating "Extradition would be granted upon the principle of reciprocity and upon that of identity of extradition and prosecution, which by the way is a universally recognized principle of international law."). See also Re Bachofner, 28 I.L.R. 322 (Sup. Ct. Just. 1959) (Colom.); In re Zahabian, 32 I.L.R. 290 (Fed. Tribunal 1963) (Switz.); Re Kozil, 40 I.L.R. 211 (CFed. 1964) (Arg.) (denying an extradition request on the basis of reciprocity on the grounds that the two states involved (Brazil and Argentina) had not specifically agreed to engage in this practice, as required by Argentine law).

27 1 Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International (1874–1883) 733 (1928).

28 See Bodin, supra note 2; Grotius, supra note 3. See also authors cited in 4 Maurice Travers, Le Droit Pénal International 389 (1921).

Dual criminality is intended to ensure to each of the respective states that it (and the relator) can rely on corresponding treatment, and that no state shall use its processes to surrender a person for conduct that it does not characterize as criminal. The requirement of dual criminality does, of course, benefit the relator insofar as he/she can avoid the processes of justice of the state in which the conduct was allegedly committed, if (depending upon the interpretative formula) the same conduct is not also deemed criminal in the requested state.

There are three approaches to determine whether the offense charged, even though criminal in both states, falls within the meaning of dual criminality:

1. whether the act is chargeable in both states as a criminal offense regardless of its prosecutability;

2. whether the act is chargeable and also prosecutable in both states; and

3. whether the act is chargeable and prosecutable, and could also result in a conviction in both states.

Cases show some divergence in the interpretation of this requirement, as discussed below, but most states adhere to the first approach. Furthermore, as is discussed in Chapter VIII, several defenses arise that reveal that occasionally a request will be denied on grounds that prosecution is barred by a statute of limitations or a conviction cannot be returned because of legally exonerating conditions.[29] This indicates also that the requirement of dual criminality may be contingent upon other factors. The choice of any of the above theories by which to define dual criminality, and the validity of any one of the defenses that can be raised, are invariably a reflection of the ratione materiae of extradition, as discussed in Chapter I.

The Tenth International Congress of Penal Law of the Association Internationale de Droit Pénal held in Rome in 1969 recommended that the requested state set aside the requirement of dual criminality in concreto, unless special circumstances exist in the requesting state, such as the question of public order. In such cases, the requested state would examine in abstracto whether the conduct of the relator constitutes an offense under its law, or if it deems that type of conduct punishable.[30] According to these recommendations, however, extradition can be denied if it is manifest that the request is in the nature of a subterfuge for achieving non-penological purposes. In this case, the requested state will not be bound to adhere to the proposed formulation.[31]

---

29 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.7.

30 Congrès International de Droit Pénal, Les Problèmes Actuels de l'Extradition, 41 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 12 (1970) [hereinafter Congrès]; Hans Schultz, Rapport General 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 785, 792 (1968). See Extradition of S. Case, 45 I.L.R. 376, 377 (BGH 1965) (F.R.G.) (holding that the crime of fraudulent acquisition of export grants or tax rebates under Austrian law constituted ordinary fraud in West Germany and was therefore extraditable); In re Seidnitzer, 49 I.L.R. 507, 508–509 (Cass. 1962) (Italy) (granting extradition request of Austria on the grounds that the alleged offense constituted, in abstracto, a crime under the laws of both states); Athanassiadis v. Government of Greece and Others, 51 I.L.R. 248 (H.L. 1967) (Eng.) (holding that the crime of fraud under Greek law constituted the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses under British law). See also United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888, 893–894 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (holding that the U.S. crime of mail fraud, which does not necessarily require the individual to successfully steal anything, and the United Kingdom crime of theft, which requires a successful taking of something from someone, was sufficiently congruent and therefore extraditable). See also United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal., Apr. 24, 1998); Spatola v. United States, 741 F. Supp. 362 (E.D.N.Y. 1990), aff'd, 925 F.2d 615 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that the U.S. law of conspiracy to commit an offense constituted the crimes of association under Italian law regardless of whether the crime under Italian law is far broader than the conspiracy law of the United States). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000).

31 See Congrès, supra note 30; Schultz, supra note 30.

Extradition is still regarded primarily as an instrument of interstate cooperation designed to inure to the benefit of the interested states. This assertion remains true even though the criminality of the relator must be demonstrated in accordance with certain rules and procedures. Because states are coequal sovereigns, emphasis on this characteristic has pervaded the practice of extradition and consequently imposed certain exigencies (i.e., substantive requirements). This form of reciprocity is referred to by some authors as a rule of CIL.[32]

The requirement of dual criminality is found in treaties and is stated either specifically or implicitly. It is also found in the national laws and judicial practice of most states and is therefore deemed part of CIL. Even though the United States will only grant extradition pursuant to the existence of a treaty, as is required in 18 U.S.C.§§ 3180, 3181, and 3184, it can request extradition without a treaty.[33] In both situations, however, CIL is relevant to interpreting the legal basis and conditions of extradition. In this context, it is noteworthy that states may consider the requirement of dual criminality satisfied if the facts giving rise to the crime in the requesting state also give rise to a crime in the requested state. But a question remains whether the laws of the requested state criminalized the conduct in question at the time the criminal conduct occurred in the requesting state. Some states, such as the United States, hold that such symmetry in timing is not necessary. Thus, what they rely upon is that the conduct is criminal in both legal systems at the time of the request.[34] This position is tantamount to allowing extradition for conduct that at the time of its occurrence was not criminal in the requested state, but was criminal at the time the request was ultimately made. For example, Switzerland criminalized money laundering in Article 305 of its Code Pénal on August 1, 1990, but the United States can obtain extradition for money laundering under its relevant statute for conduct occurring before August 1, 1990, because that is the way Switzerland interprets its dual criminality requirement. Presumably, the United States would also act accordingly if it were a requested state in a case involving acts deemed criminal under its laws, but committed in the requesting state prior to the entry into effect of the relevant statute in the laws of the United States or any state of the Union. In one case, however, a federal district court in California adopted the relator's claim that the relevant time for determining whether dual criminality was satisfied was the time of the alleged commission of the offense rather than the time of the indictment.[35]

---

32 Satya D. Bedi, Extradition in International Law and Practice 69–84 (1966); Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law 132–149 (1971). See, e.g., Joseph v. Hoover, 254 F. Supp. 2d 595 (D. Virgin Islands 2003). Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1988); cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1106, reh'g denied, 492 U.S. 927 (1989). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981); Cucuzzella v. Keliikoa, 638 F.2d 105 (9th Cir. 1981); Heilbronn v. Kendall, 775 F. Supp. 1020 (W.D. Mich. 1991); Cheng Na-Yuet v. Hueston, 690 F. Supp. 1008 (S.D. Fla. 1988), appeal after remand, 734 F. Supp. 988 (1990), aff'd, 932 F.2d 977 (11th Cir. 1991). Compare Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 847–851 (1st Cir. 1980) with Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 905–909 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973). See also Melia v. United States, 667 F.2d 300, 304 (2d Cir. 1981), in which the relator was charged with "procuring" a murder. Although the term "procuring" was not listed in the treaty, the court held "nevertheless, that the Treaty does cover the offense." The assumption was made that procuring "fell within the meaning of being a 'party' to a crime." This broad interpretation expands the meaning of extraditable offenses. See also United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 18, 1997).

33 See Ch. II.

34 In considering the dual criminality issue, some courts inquire into whether the laws of both states are "substantially analogous." See Bruce Zagaris, Court of Appeal Affirms and Overturns Extradition Request to Korea on Bribery Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 269–270 (July 2008).

35 See Linda Friedman Ramirez, District Court Finds Violation of Dual Criminality in Case of Extradition from India, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 435–436 (Nov. 2008).

The doctrine of dual criminality is the object of several definitional approaches, as discussed above, and depending upon the choice, will be more or less identified with extraditable offenses. Similarly, because of the various approaches to defining extraditable offenses, the likelihood for confusion between these two requirements exists. Because of the nexus between dual criminality and extraditable offenses, they are discussed contextually in Section 3.

In the United States, a relator may be surrendered for a crime under federal criminal law or under the criminal laws of the state wherein the relator is found. This approach was expanded on in Factor v. Laubenheimer[36] by relying on what could be said to be tantamount to generally recognized crimes in most states. This approach has been followed by the circuits to date, among them, the First Circuit in Brauch v. Raiche,[37] in which the court upheld the magistrate's application of the law of the asylum state, stating:

> Although it is clear that Factor held criminality in the asylum state was not a necessary precondition to extraditability, it is not clear whether the Court also meant that a finding of criminality under that state's law was always sufficient to justify extradition. Part of the rationale offered by the Court for its decision in Factor was a desire to avoid construing that treaty so that "the right to extradition from the United States may vary with the state or territory where the fugitive is found." The Court was concerned that the treaty be construed so as to secure the intended equality and reciprocity between the parties. In light of the importance the Court placed on preserving reciprocity, we do not believe the Court's disapproval of extraditability varying with state law would extend to the situation in which one state's law might confer extraditability, while that of the preponderance of the states would not. A prerequisite under the Treaty for an extradition request by Great Britain is that the offense be one for which Britain would be willing to extradite. Thus, even if the asylum state from which Britain requests extradition is the only state criminalizing the conduct in question, the policy of reciprocity would be served since that state could presumably obtain extradition for the same acts from Britain.[38]

In Clarey v. Gregg,[39] the Ninth Circuit revisited the question of dual criminality, holding:

> Dual criminality requires that an accused be extradited only if the alleged criminal conduct is considered criminal under the laws of both the surrendering and requesting nations. United States v. Saccoccia, 18 F.3d 795, 800 n.6 (9th Cir. 1994). The doctrine is incorporated into the Extradition Treaty Between the United States and Mexico at Article II, §§ 1, 3.
>
> Both the magistrate judge and district court found that the requirement of dual criminality is met in this case because Clarey's acts, which constitute simple homicide in Mexico, would constitute felony murder in the United States. Felony murder is "murder . . . committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, any arson, rape, burglary, or robbery." 18 U.S.C. § 1111.
>
> Clarey argues that dual criminality has not been established because the statute under which he has been charged in Mexico criminalizes a much broader range of conduct than does the United States felony murder statute. Mexico charged Clarey with simple homicide, which Article 201 of the Guanajuato Penal Code defines as occurring "when one takes another person's life." [E.R.305] Clarey argues that the United States and Mexican statutes are not "substantially

---

36 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Joseph v. Hoover, 254 F. Supp. 2d 595 (D. Virgin Islands 2003). The alleged conduct must be unlawful under federal criminal law, the criminal law of the state where the relator is found, or as stated in Factor, the law of the preponderance of states. See Peters v. Agnor, 888 F.2d 713 (10th Cir. 1989); DeSilva v. DiLeonardi, 181 F.3d 865 (7th Cir. 1999).

37 Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980).

38 Id. at 848–849 (citations omitted).

39 Clarey v. Gregg, 138 F. 3d. 764 (9th Cir. 1998). See also United States v. Sai-Wah, 270 F Supp. 2d 748 (W.D.N.Y. 2003) (not finding dual criminality and denying certification of extraditability).

analogous," see Theron v. United States Marshal, 832 F.2d 492, 496 (9th Cir. 1987), because the United States statute requires that the homicide be perpetrated during the commission of a violent felony, while Mexican law requires only that a homicide occur.

Clarey's challenge overstates the degree to which the applicable criminal laws of the two countries must be "substantially analogous." Although some analogy is required, see United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368, 1372 (9th Cir. 1993) (Pakistani law of conspiracy not sufficiently analogous to United States' separate crime of using a telephone to facilitate a drug offense), differences between statutes aimed at the same category of conduct do not defeat dual criminality. That is apparent from an examination of Theron, upon which Clarey relies. Theron held that a South African statute, which criminalized the failure of an adjudicated insolvent to disclose his insolvency when obtaining credit, was sufficiently analogous to 18 U.S.C. § 1014, which criminalized false statements to a bank. The opinion stated:

> Admittedly, South Africa's law is broader than section 1014, but both laws can be used to punish the failure to disclose a loan applicant's liabilities to a bank when obtaining credit. Theron's argument ignores that for purposes of dual criminality, it is immaterial that South Africa's law is broader than the analogous law in this country.

Theron, 832 F.2d at 497. Here, too, Mexico's homicide statute and the United States statute can both be used to punish the acts with which Clarey is charged—causing the death of Bishop by beating him during a robbery. The two laws are analogous because they both punish acts of the same general character—the taking of another's life; no more is required. See Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1404-05 & n.2 (9th Cir. 1988). The primary focus of dual criminality has always been on the conduct charged; the elements of the analogous offenses need not be identical. When "the laws of both the requesting and the requested party appear to be directed to the same basic evil," Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 908 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884, 94 S. Ct. 204, 38 L. Ed. 2d 133 (1973), the statutes are substantially analogous, and

---

40 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 23 S. Ct. 781 (1903); Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 42 S. Ct. 469 (1922). United States' courts have conducted surveys of the law of all fifty states where there was no clear federal law or law within the state where the court was located on point regarding the criminal conduct at issue. See In re Extradition of Exoo, 522 F. Supp. 2d 766, 770, 776, 778–785 (S.D. W.Va. 2007) (conducting a fifty-state survey regarding the dual criminality of assisted suicide in U.S.–Ireland extradition). See also Linda Friedman Ramirez & Nicole Mariani, U.S. Magistrate Denies Extradition to Ireland for Role in Assisted Suicide, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 88–89 (Mar. 2008); In re Extradition of Sanchez Rea, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 11366, at *6 (E.D. Cal. 2008), stating:

> In determining whether a similar criminal proscription exists under American law, the Court looks first to federal law; if no similar offense is found, the Court then looks to the law of the State in which the extradite is found; if no similar offense is found, the Court then looks to the law of the preponderance of the States.

Various U.S. federal courts have applied the "substantially analogous" standard. See Manta v. Chertoff, 518 F.3d 1134, 1141–1143 (9th Cir. 2008) (discussing intent to defraud and dual criminality, and stating "Dual criminality exists if the 'essential character' of the acts criminalized by the laws of each country are the same and the laws are 'substantially analogous.' "); United States v. Hoholko, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19880, at *4–*7 (D. Mont. 2010) (discussing extortion and conspiracy, stating "the laws of the countries need only be 'substantially analogous,' such that dual criminality exists if the 'essential character' of the criminal acts are the same."); In re Extradition of Brandao, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 122677, at *9, *11–*13, *16 (S.D. Ohio 2009) defining "substantially analogous" as " 'punish[ing] conduct falling within the broad scope' of the same 'generally recognized crime . . . ' " and holding that the United States failed to establish dual criminality regarding a criminal enterprise); In re: Extradition of Lam, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 43075, at *13–*14 (E.D. Cal. 2009) ("dual criminality is deemed to be satisfied when the two contries' laws are substantially analogous."); In re Extradition of Exoo, 522 F.Supp. 2d 766, 770, 776 (S.D. W.Va. 2007) ("in considering whether there is dual criminality . . . the Court must determine whether, '[t]he two statutes are substantially analogous . . . . Absolute identity is not required.' ").

41 United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289, 1302 (3d Cir. 1991).

> can form the basis of dual criminality. Peters v. Egnor, 888 F.2d 713, 719 (10th Cir. 1989); see also In re Russell, 789 F.2d 801, 803 (9th Cir. 1986) (upholding extradition for conspiracy even though overt act was not required in requesting nation because request alleged several overt acts); cf. Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 312, 66 L. Ed. 956, 42 S. Ct. 469 (1922) (The law does not require that the . . . scope of [criminal] liability be coextensive, or in other respects, the same in the two countries. It is enough if the particular act charged is criminal in both jurisdictions.)

Dual criminality does not require that absolute identity is present between the crime charged and the counterpart U.S. crime, be it a federal or a state crime, so long as the crimes are "substantially analogous."[40] Nor does it require that the punishment be identical.[41]

United States practice, as well as that of most European states, has been more liberal toward dual criminality. It is now well-established that the determination of whether dual criminality has been satisfied is not driven by the crime charged, but rather by the underlying facts and whether they constitute a crime in both legal systems, irrespective of how they are labeled.[42] For instance, in Molnar, the district court held that dual criminality is fact-driven:

> This language essentially codifies the doctrine of dual, or double criminality. Under the doctrine of dual criminality, an accused can be extradited only if the alleged criminal conduct is considered criminal under the laws of both the surrendering and requesting nations. DeSilva, 125 F.3d at 1113; Murphy v. U.S., 199 F.3d 599, 602 (2nd cir.1999); Clarey v. Gregg, 138 F.3d 764, 765 (9th Cir.1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 853, 119 S.Ct. 131, 142 L.Ed.2d 106 (1998). Alleged conduct is considered criminal in this country if it would be unlawful under federal statutes, the law of the state where the accused is found, or the law of the preponderance of states. DeSilva, 125 F.3d at 1114. "The law does not require that the name by which the crime is described in the two countries shall be the same; nor that the scope of the liability shall be coextensive, or, in other respects, the same in the two countries. It is enough if the particular act charged is criminal in both jurisdictions." Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 312, 42 S.Ct. 469, 470–471, 66 L.Ed. 956 (1922).[43]

Interestingly, however, the U.S. government in extradition proceedings is frequently inconsistent when applying the concept that the underlying facts should be dispositive and not the label given an offense. This is evidenced with respect to ne bis in idem[44] and specialty issues.[45]

---

42 See United States v. Thomas, 322 Fed. Appx. 177, 180–181 (3d Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion) (discussing continuing criminal enterprise and U.S.–U.K. extradition); Hurtado-Hurtado v. U.S. Attorney General, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 125460, at *6–*9 (S.D. Fla. 2009); Choe v. Torres, 525 F.3d 733, 737 (9th Cir. 2008) (discussing bribery under the U.S.–S. Korea extradition treaty); United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 673–675 (E.D. Tex. 2008); In re Extradition of Necolaiciuc, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 25911, at *39–*45 (M.D. Fla. 2011) (discussing embezzlement and abuse of office in U.S.–Romania extradition); In re Extradition of Paberalius, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 57907, at *22–40 (discussing traffic violations and disturbing the peace in U.S.–Lithuania extradition); McCabe v. United States, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 39910, at *11–*14 (N.D. Cal. 2011) (discussing sexual assault on minors in U.S.–Ireland extradition); Markey v. U.S. Marshall Serv., 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 38082, at *6–*9 (N.D. Ind. 2010) (discussing sexual assault on minors in U.S.–Ireland extradition); In re Extradition of Markey, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 14390, at *4–*8 (N.D. Ind. 2010) (discussing sexual assault on minors in U.S.–Ireland extradition); In re Extradition of Ritzo, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 37543, at *7–*15 (discussing sexual assault on minors and other sexual crimes involving minors in U.S. –Canada extradition); In re Extradition of Pelletier, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44979 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 12, 2010) (discussing drug trafficking in U.S.–Portugal extradition); In re Extradition of Exoo, 522 F.Supp. 2d 766, 770, 776, 778–785 (S.D. W.Va. 2007) (discussing assisted suicide in U.S.–Ireland extradition); Batchelder v. Gonzalez, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 96736 (N.D. Fla. 2007) (discussing invitation to sexual touching in U.S.–Canada extradition).

43 In re Extradition of Molnar, 202 F.Supp. 2d 782, 785–786 (N.D. Ill. 2002).

44 See Ch. VIII, 4.3.

45 See Sec. 6.

In connection with both of these issues, the government at times argues against a facts-driven approach, while it argues in favor of such an approach for dual criminality.

The position in the United States is that dual criminality is a substantive requirement of extradition, which can be summarized as follows:

1. It does not require that the crime charged be the same exact crime contained in federal or state law; it is sufficient that it be the same type of crime. Thus, theft, larceny, embezzlement, and fraud are the same type of crimes and it is not important that the crime charged have the same label, or have the same legal elements as those contained in the crime contained in the criminal law of the requested state.

2. What matters is whether the facts giving rise to the criminal charges would also give rise to a similar criminal charge in the requested state. Whether the same facts give rise to the same crime is not at issue, but whether the same facts give rise to a criminal charge under the criminal law of the requested state.

3. The same facts can give rise to multiple criminal charges in one or both systems, but that is not a dual criminality issue; rather it may be an issue of ne bis in idem (or double jeopardy in the United States).[46]

Over the last three decades, federal and state criminal laws have significantly increased in number, adding not only new forms of criminality, but placing new labels on preexisting crimes to enhance penalties. Furthermore, many infractions of federal laws have become criminalized.[47] This literally exponential growth of U.S. criminal legislation has not been accompanied by a rational policy to deal with related crimes with respect to charging and sentencing purposes. As a result, a single criminal transaction, with a single purpose and a single victim, can give rise to multiple criminal charges, and result in multiple convictions and multiple sentences running consecutively. Thus, when the United States seeks the extradition of a person for a complex crime such as one under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), which requires predicate offenses, the government can, after the person has been surrendered, issue a superseding indictment adding new charges deemed part of the alleged criminal transaction and subsumed within the meaning of the crime originally charged in the initial extradition request. Although this raises issues pertaining to specialty,[48] it also raises issues of dual criminality. The United States can charge a person with RICO whose predicate crimes are violations of the International Revenue Service's Cash Transaction Requirement (CTR). The latter may be deemed non-extraditable in the requested state, yet extradition may be granted for RICO because the requested state does not know that without the predicate crime (which is not extraditable because it lacks dual criminality), RICO cannot stand. To get around that difficulty, the United States will agree not to prosecute for the CTR violations but only for RICO, and then introduce evidence of CTR violations at the trial, not for purposes of a conviction, but for evidentiary purposes only. Thus, the government can avoid, in form though not in substance, violating the principle of specialty.[49]

In order to overcome some of the dual criminality implications of these complex crimes, modern extradition treaties include special provisions to address jurisdictional elements, attempt/conspiracy offenses, and even tax and customs offenses.[50] However, some U.S. extradition

46 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

47 See, e.g.,International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure (Ved P. Nanda & M. Cherif Basisouni eds., 1987).

48 See infra Sec. 6.

49 Id.

50 See Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties at 9–10 and accompanying footnotes, Congressional Research Service report for requests involving complex crimes have been denied by the requested state on dual criminality grounds.[51]

3. Extraditable Offenses

3.1. The Meaning of Extraditable Offenses

Irrespective of the legal basis for extradition, the alleged offense for which extradition is requested must be either enumerated among the extraditable offenses in a treaty or found according to the formula for ascertaining extraditability in the applicable treaty or in the national legislation. In the absence of a treaty, if extradition is based on reciprocity, the offense must be mutually recognized as extraditable by both states. Where extradition is based on comity, it will depend exclusively on the applicable national law.

Extradition treaties either list the offenses for which extradition shall be granted or designate a formula by which to determine extraditable offenses. In addition to defining or designating extraditable offenses, the criminality of the relator's alleged conduct must satisfy the requirement of dual criminality[52] (i.e., the offense charged must constitute a crime in the two legal systems).[53] The extent to which a given type of conduct shall be considered criminal in the two respective legal systems varies, depending on the legal systems involved. The interpretation and application of the requirement as to what constitutes an extraditable offense will also vary according to the legal system in question.

The substantive requirements of extradition are that a person accused of or found guilty of an offense in the requesting state be surrendered to that state, provided the following criteria are met:

1. If a treaty exists, the offense must be listed or designated;
2. If no treaty exists, the respective states will reciprocate for the same type of offense;
3. If no treaty or reciprocity exists, but the request is based on comity, the requested state will rely on its customary practice; and
4. The offense charged must also constitute an offense in the requested state, that is, dual criminality, either in the objective sense, in concreto, or in the subjective sense, in abstracto.

The practice of listing offenses in a treaty to which participants are bound is a manifestation of a reciprocal obligation.[54] Similarly, when dual criminality is required by a treaty or by custom, Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at: http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

---

51 See Bruce Zagaris, Thailand Denies U.S. Request to Extradite Russian Alleged Arms Smuggler, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 406–407 (Oct. 2009) (U.S. charge of conspiracy to furnish weapons to the Colombian Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia); Bruce Zagaris, U.K. National Wins Partial Victory in Resisting U.S. Extradition Request, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 175–176 (May 2008) (U.S. charge of conspiracy to price-fix denied on dual criminality grounds for absence of a requirement of dishonesty, which was required for purposes of U.K. extradition).

52 See supra Sec. 2.

53 Bedi, supra note 332, at 69–84; Shearer, supra note 32, at 132–149.

54 Extradition was denied where a person was requested by the Czech Republic for a crime that did not involve fraud or breach of trust, which is what the treaty provides for as an extraditable offense. The extradition judge in the case found that on its face the Czech penal code did not include fraud or breach of any fiduciary responsibility by the perpetrator. Therefore, the provision of the Czech criminal code relied on in the extradition request did not correspond to the extraditable offense listed in the treaty. Moreover, the applicable provision of the Czech criminal code failed to satisfy dual criminality in that it fails to show any statute in the United States that criminalizes the act of harming a creditor without the existence of an element of fraud or deceit. The court also rejected the government's argument that under it is applicable to the practice regardless of whether the legal basis of the practice is a treaty or reciprocity. Such a requirement, in effect, imposes a mutuality of obligations on the parties.

A corollary to the requirements of extraditable offense and dual criminality is the doctrine of specialty.[55] That doctrine is premised on the assumption that whenever a state uses its formal processes to surrender a person to another state for a specific charge, the requesting state shall carry out its intended purpose of prosecuting or punishing the offender only for the offense for which the requested state conceded extradition.[56]

3.2. Extraditable Offenses and Their Relationship to Dual Criminality

The term "extraditable offenses" applies to treaty practice whereby offenses are listed or designated by a formula in the applicable treaty. If the practice of the respective states is based on reciprocity, then extraditable offenses are those that constitute an offense in both systems. Extradition granted on comity is an exceptional method resorted to in special instances whenever the respective states do not rely on a treaty or reciprocity. In these cases, the requesting state does not rely on any definition or method of designating extraditable offenses, and the requested state can grant or deny the request irrespective of the offense charged or its designation. However, the requested state may, depending upon its national legislation, request that dual criminality be satisfied. In most cases involving extradition on the basis of comity, the conduct of the relator constituted an offense in the requested state. It appears, therefore, that CIL requires the condition of dual criminality as to all bases of extradition.

Extraditable offenses are interpreted in one of two ways: (1) requiring that the offense charged be identical to an offense in the treaty list; or (2) not requiring that the offense charged be identical to the offense listed in the treaty, but requiring that the acts underlying the criminal charge sustain a charge similar in nature under the laws of the requested state.[57]

The second of these interpretative approaches focuses on the question of whether the acts performed in the requesting state, and constituting an offense under its laws, could also constitute an offense under the laws of the requested state and made extraditable under the treaty, regardless of the actual offense charged by the requested state. In effect, this approach produces the same result as when the subjective interpretation of the requirement of dual criminality is applied. Under this approach to interpreting extraditable offenses, the requested state examines the category and type of offense charged to determine the counterpart under its own laws. From a practical point of view, acts that are part of the common crimes variety are likely to constitute an offense in all legal systems. Hence, if this type of conduct is charged by the requesting state and the identical charge does not exist in the requested state, the likelihood is great that the same category or type of offense exists in the requested state. Therefore, this type of broad interpretation of extraditable offenses corresponds to a subjective interpretation of dual criminality.

Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933) (not requiring dual criminality), the treaty applicable to the Czech Republic requires dual criminality. See In Re Extradition of Platko, 213 F. Supp. 2d 1229 (S.D. Cal. 2002); In re Extradition of Pena Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17777. For cases involving financial crimes, see inter alia United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Havoco of America Ltd. v. Hill, 255 F.3d 1321 (11th Cir. 2001).

55 See infra Sec. 6.

56 See infra Sec. 7.

57 See generally, In re Extradition of Ye Gon, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 12559, at *24–*39 (D.D.C. Feb. 9, 2011); In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 97893, at *22–*23 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 3, 2008); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419, 1479 (11th Cir. 1997); United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397, 399 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).

When extradition is practiced between states that do not require the listing of extraditable offenses, but designate them in another manner, the requested state will have to determine whether the offense and its counterpart fall within the treaty formula and also satisfy the dual criminality requirement. As the common crimes variety are invariably listed or designated in treaties, the two requirements of extraditable offense and dual criminality, whenever broadly interpreted, are satisfied by a single test (i.e., whether the conduct is criminal in the jurisprudence of both states, even though not defined identically).[58] The same outcome is produced even if a given state is not to apply dual criminality, but adheres to strict compliance with the treaty list, or if that state interprets the extraditable offense listed in the treaty as referring to acts that would have constituted the offense charged had they been committed in the requested state. Under this interpretation of extraditable offenses, the requirement of dual criminality is also satisfied. This indicates the close relationship of the two conditions when they are interpreted and applied in their broadest sense, or under the subjective approach of dual criminality in abstracto.

As an indication of the interrelationship and even possible confusion between these two elements, Marjorie Whiteman states the following:

> A common requirement for extradition is that the acts which form the basis for the extradition request constitute a crime under the law of both the requesting and the requested States. This requirement exists whether the request is made under a treaty or apart from a treaty and whether a list of offenses or a minimum-penalty provision is involved. In the case of a treaty or a law providing for extradition for offenses punishable by at least a certain minimum penalty, specific provision is usually made that the offense must be a crime in both States. Where a list of offenses is involved in the treaty or the law, a specific provision on the point is less common. However, even in the absence of a specific provision, the requirement is generally imposed. The question whether the requirement has been met generally arises with regard to the law of the requested State and where the requirement is covered by a specific provision in the law or treaty it is often cast only in terms of the law of the requested State, since, if a State requests extradition, it must base its request on an alleged violation of its law. It might be supposed that if two States agree, in a treaty, to a list of offenses for which extradition shall take place, they would include only those acts which are crimes in both States. However, questions nevertheless may arise. Certain acts may, under the law of the requesting State, constitute a listed treaty offense while, under the law of the requested State, the same acts may constitute no crime or, more frequently, one not listed in the treaty.[59]

3.3. Methods of Determining Extraditable Offenses

Designation of extraditable offenses in treaties may be achieved by one of two methods, enumerative or eliminative.[60]

The enumerative method for naming and defining offences has a limiting effect, confining the application of the treaty to stated offenses. United States legislation authorizes extradition whenever there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the United States and any foreign government, against persons charged with having committed, within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government, any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention. The bilateral extradition treaties and conventions to which the United States is a party will usually contain a list of offenses for which extradition shall be granted. The Montevideo

---

58 See Hurtado-Hurtado v. U.S. Attorney General,2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 125460, at *6–*9 (S.D. Fla. 2009); In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 9573, at *8–*12 (S.D. Cal. 2008).

59 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 773–774 (1963), [hereinafter Whiteman Digest].

60 A New Zealand court discussed this point. See Government of the United States of America v. Cullinane, (2002) NZCA 330.

Convention of 1933, which was concluded among American states, provides for extradition of persons charged with "a crime . . . [which] is punishable under the laws of the demanding and surrendering States with a minimum penalty of imprisonment for one year."[61] However, this agreement is not operative if there is a bilateral treaty in force between the parties concerned (Article 21).

An example of a bilateral treaty with an extensive use of the enumerative method is the 1974 treaty between the United States and Denmark, which lists the following as extraditable offenses:

> 1. murder; voluntary manslaughter; assault with intent to commit murder. 2. Aggravated injury or assault; injuring with intent to cause grievous bodily harm. 3. Unlawful throwing or application of any corrosive or injurious substances upon the person of another. withschemes intended to deceive or defraud, or by any other fraudulent means. 4. Rape; indecent assault; sodomy accompanied by use of force or threat; sexual intercourse and other unlawful sexual relations with or upon children under the age specified by the laws of both the requesting and the requested States. 5. Unlawful abortion. 6. Procuration; inciting or assisting a person under 21 years of age or at the time ignorant of the purpose in order that such person shall carry on sexual immorality as a profession abroad or shall be used for such immoral purpose; promoting of sexual immorality by acting as an intermediary repeatedly or for the purpose of gain; profiting from the activities of any person carrying on sexual immorality as a profession. 7. Kidnaping; child stealing; abduction; false imprisonment. 8. Robbery; assault with intent to rob. 9. Burglary. 10. Larceny. 11. Embezzlement. 12. Obtaining property, money or valuable securities: by false pretenses or by threat or force, by defrauding any governmental body, the public or any person by deceit, falsehood, use of the mails or other means of communication in connection. 13. Bribery, including soliciting, offering and accepting. 14. Extortion. 15. Receiving or transporting any money, valuable securities or other property knowing the same to have been unlawfully obtained. 16. Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, executor, administrator or by a director or officer of any company. 17. An offense against the laws relating to counterfeiting or forgery. 18. False statements made before a court or to a government agency or official, including under United States law perjury and subornation of perjury. 19. Arson. 20. An offense against any law relating to the protection of the life or health of persons from: a shortage of drinking water; poisoned, contaminated, unsafe or unwholesome drinking water, substance or products. 21. Any act done with intent to endanger the safety of any person traveling upon a railway, or in any aircraft or vessel or bus or other means of transportation, or any act which impairs the safe operation of such means of transportation. 22. Piracy; mutiny or revolt on board an aircraft against the authority of the commander of such aircraft; any seizure or exercise of control, by force or violence or threat of force or violence, of an aircraft. 23. An offense against the laws relating to damage to property. 24. a. Offenses against the laws relating to importation, exportation or transit of goods, articles, or merchandise. b. Offenses relating to willful evasion of taxes and duties. c. Offenses against the laws relating to international transfers of funds. 25. An offense relating to the: a. spreading of false intelligence likely to affect the price of commodities, valuable securities or any other similar interests; or b. making of incorrect or misleading statements concerning the economic conditions of such commercial undertakings as joint-stock companies, corporations, cooperativesocieties or similar undertakings through channels of public communications, in reports, in statements of accounts or in declarations to the general meeting or any proper official of a company, in notifications to, or registration with, any commission, agency or officer having supervisory or regulatory authority over corporations, joint-stock companies, other forms of commercial undertakings or in any invitation to the establishment of those commercial undertakings or to the subscription of shares. 28. Unlawful abuse of official authority which results in grievous bodily injury or deprivation of the life, liberty or property of any > person, [or] attempts to commit, conspiracy to commit, or participation in, any of the offenses mentioned in this Article.[62]

61 Convention on Extradition, signed at Montevideo, Dec. 26, 1933, art. 1(b), T.S. No. 882, 165 L.N.T.S. 45.

The eliminative method, which is indicative rather than limitative, specifies as extraditable those offenses that under the laws of both states are punishable by an agreed degree of severity, usually a minimum penalty. This method is more convenient in that it avoids unnecessary detail in the treaty and obviates problems arising out of the omission of certain crimes. It also eliminates problems with the characterization of offenses that arise out of definitional differences between the laws of the requested and requesting states. However, there are difficulties in determining what actually constitutes the prescribed penalty, namely the actual sentence, the possible sentence, or the range of the sentence.[63] It is also problematic with respect to indeterminate sentences. The use of this method has been found to be impractical by countries such as the United States, where minimum sentences are not a uniform feature of federal laws and the laws of the various states. Illustrating this difficulty, Whiteman reported with respect to the issue arising between Colombia and the United States:

> [T]he Colombian Foreign Office . . . [proposes] that instead of including in the convention a list of the extraditable crimes it be provided that crimes should be regarded as extraditable when they are punishable by the penal laws of both countries with a minimum penalty of deprivation of liberty for six months. [The United States responded that] . . . all of the bilateral extradition agreements of the United States contain lists of extraditable crimes and the Department [did] not desire to make any exception to this practice.
>
> The foregoing view of the matter in question is largely based upon the fact that in general recent Federal penal enactments in the United States do not prescribe a minimum sentence which may be imposed but provide merely for imprisonment for "not more" than a certain term. It is believed that similar provisions are contained in recent enactments throughout various states of the Union. Moreover, the states have penal codes which differ in many respects the one from the other and this would constitute a further obstacle to an agreement along the lines suggested by the Colombian Government.[64]

The main defects of the enumerative method arise from the fact that the list can omit certain offenses, and their subsequent inclusion by supplementary treaty may prove too cumbersome.[65]

---

62 U.S.–Denmark Extradition treaty, Art. 3, entered into force July 21, 1974, 25 U.S.T. 1293.

63 This situation arose in United States v. Clark, 664 F.2d 1174 (11th Cir. 1981). The relator was sought in Canada for a crime of which he had been convicted and sentenced to a term of less than one year, although the offense was punishable by terms longer than one year. The relator argued that because the Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Canada required that an offense be "punishable" by a term of more than one year, his offense did not fall under the Treaty. The court disagreed, stating, "[l]eniency in sentencing does not raise a bar to extradition." See also Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir. 1981) in which the court held that even though the British subject was sixteen at the time he allegedly participated in a robbery in Hong Kong and could be considered eligible as a "youthful offender" allowing leniency in sentencing, he could have been charged with, convicted of, and sentenced for a felony under New York law, and thus could be extraditable under the treaty. See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

64 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 59, at 772–773 (quoting Secretary of State (Hull) to the American Ambassador at Bogota (Braden), instruction No. 37, June 9, 1939, MS. Department of State, file 221.11/7).

65 But see United States v. Stegeman, 43 I.L.R. 234 (Sup. Ct. B.C. 1966) (Can.), where the Court held that bankruptcy offenses, which were not listed in the United States–Canada extradition treaty, were nevertheless encompassed thereunder because of a treaty provision that subsequent extradition arrangements could list specific offenses, which would be incorporated into the treaty. The bankruptcy offenses were so cited and therefore became part of the treaty as extraditable offenses. See also Markham v. Pitchess, 605 F.2d 436 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 904 (1980) (stating that drug-related offenses were included in the Treaty of Extradition of 1971 with Canada); cf. United States v. Layton, 855 F.2d 1388

As this method excludes an ad hoc determination of extraditable offenses, it is inflexible. These defects have prompted the development in some treaties of resorting to the eliminative method and thus defining extraditable offenses by their punishment. This method has flaws in that it is impractical for use by legal systems that have a notable disparity in penalties. Furthermore, it is not always clear whether this method applies to minimum, maximum, or possible penalties. The use of such a method may also tend to eliminate the need to comply with the requirement of dual criminality, which has some meritorious applications, particularly insofar as it concerns minor offenses in the requested state but which are aggravated in the requesting state because of a more punitive or retributive approach.

The eliminative method, by its very nature, reflects and appeals to a retributive theory of punishment by, inter alia, ignoring enlightened theories of rehabilitation and resocialization, particularly in cases where the deviant behavior is considered an illness rather than a crime. This would be the case, for example, with respect to drug addiction violations. Among many other examples are cases involving what some states deem to be mental health problems and, in particular, juvenile delinquency violations. In addition, problems of alcoholism and drug addiction are perceived so differently that what would be a crime in some states would be considered a disease in another. The penal philosophies of states range in diversity from one extreme to another, and the only commonality on which the eliminative approach could rest is the basic punitive orientation, whenever manifested in the respective laws of the states in question.

Even though modern concepts of criminology and penology discredit a straight penalty approach to characterize offenders, the contemporary trend in extradition treaties is to designate extraditable offenses by such a method.[66]

Another significant problem raised by this method is the element of knowledge of the law attributed by legal presumption to an offender, whether that person is a native or an alien. Ignorance of the law is no defense, but the presumption of knowledge of the law in an age of fast and easy travel among states with a wide divergence of penal laws strains the presumption to its utmost. It must be noted, however, that although ignorance of the law is no defense, one

---

(9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1046 (1989) (considering that the statutes at issue in each case were "enacted to serve important interests of government," the court applied the statute to extraterritorial conduct).

66 Shearer, supra note 32, at 134–135. Shearer states that out of 163 treaties published in the League of Nations Treaty Series, 80 have no lists, but follow the eliminative method. Among the 50 treaties published between Volumes 1 and 550 of the United Nations Treaty Series, 33 have adopted the same method. The European Extradition Convention of 1957, Europ. T.S. No. 24, also adopted this formula in Article 2. See also Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 4(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (which provides that "An offense shall be an extraditable offense if it is punishable under the laws of the requesting and requested States by deprivation of liberty for a maximum period of more than one year or by a more severe penalty," thereby removing an earlier list of offenses); Argentine Extradition Treaty, art.2(1), entered into force Jun. 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866;Paraguyan Extradition Treaty, art. II(1), entered into force Mar. 9, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-4, TIAS 12995; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. II(1), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; French Extradition Treaty, art.2(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-13; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art.2(1), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art.2(1), entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. II(1), entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023; Extradition Treaty with Belize, art. 2(1), entered into force Mar. 27, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-38; Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 2, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197 (with respect to enumerated offenses); Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 2(1), entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 2(1), entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 2(1), entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17. See also Garcia & Doyle, supra note 50. See also United States v. Balsys, 119 F.3d 122, n. 10, (2d Cir. 1997).

of the premises on which this presumption is based is the existence of notice of the proscribed conduct affording all persons the opportunity to refrain from engaging in it.[67] Dual criminality provides an implicit element of notice by analogy, in that the individual is held to the same proscribed conduct known to the individual in his or her own legal system. However, allowing extradition whenever the charge contains a penalty equal to that of the other state, regardless of the corresponding nature of the offense in both laws, subjects individuals to criminal jeopardy without adequate notice.

3.4. Rationale for Defining Extraditable Offenses

Two reasons are traditionally advanced for the proposition that extraditable offenses should be defined: (1) to avoid using a cumbersome and costly procedure such as extradition for minor offenses; and (2) to avoid having the requested state decline surrender on public policy grounds (because the conduct is not criminalized in that state), thus causing embarrassment to the respective states. Both arguments, though valid, are nonetheless open to challenge, if for no other reason than because they are predicated essentially on the interest of only the requested state. If, for example, the requesting state believes it has a sufficient interest in prosecuting a relator, to what extent should the requested state be concerned with whether it is for a serious or a minor offense, and whether the identical offense is deemed criminal in the requested state? This is a policy question that should not be left to the determination of individual states, because its conflict-creating potential is sufficient to make it a question of international concern. In any event, whenever the offense charged by the requesting state is deemed contrary to the public policy of the requested state, it is likely due to the fact that the offense is of a political character or is charged in order to effectuate a political rather than a criminological end. In this case, however, the state of refuge can deny the request on grounds of the "political offense exception."[68]

The requirement of dual criminality makes the listing of offenses in a treaty a technicality, which only renders the procedure more cumbersome. As a substantive matter, dual criminality provides more protection to the individual and gives the requested state more flexibility than the rigid approach of listing offenses in a treaty. The latter approach allows for technical flaws in the process and requires constant revision of treaties without adding anything more substantive to the requirement than that the offense constitute a crime in both legal systems.

To avoid the difficulties stated above, a proposed technique of designating extraditable offenses in treaties is as follows: to list nonextraditable offenses and to designate extraditable offenses by type, category, and dispositional method. This technique eliminates by implication certain offenses that should not by their nature or significance be the subject of extradition. The justification is, to some extent, akin to the earlier rationale advanced to support the practice of listing offenses. The difference between the earlier traditional justification and the one advanced here is that the list of extraditable offenses should contain those offenses that are excepted from the practice, rather than list those that would support it. Furthermore, extraditable offenses should not be labeled or referred to by name, but classified in a manner indicating type, category, and disposition. This method would avoid most of the shortcomings discussed above and would incorporate the benefits deriving from the application of the requirement of dual criminality without the need to duplicate the same substantive requirement.

Another argument in support of a modified method of designating extraditable offenses arises in those cases in which the relator is not a national of the requesting state, but a national of the requested state that permits extradition of its nationals. In such cases, it could be assumed that listing or defining extraditable offenses is a protection for such persons insofar as offenses listed or defined constitute the same crime in the person's own state. Therefore, that person will not be subjected to the application of a foreign law (that of the requesting state of which he/she is not a national) without adequate notice and knowledge. Essentially, it is an argument that extends the doctrine nullen crimen sine lege,[69] even though the requirement of dual criminality is theoretically sufficient to satisfy this requirement of the principle of legality. Apart from these arguments applicable to extraditable offenses in treaties, the requirements of dual criminality provide the substantive basis needed to ensure that the process will not be arbitrary.

67 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law 449 (1978).

68 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

3.5. Contemporary Approaches to Extraditable Offenses

Earlier U.S. treaties contained a list of extraditable offenses in the text or in an appendix. In addition, these treaties state that the offense must be punishable under the laws of both contracting parties. Treaties concluded during the last three decades contain a formula for dual criminality coupled with the requirement that the offense be punishable by at least one year of imprisonment. This avoids the old archaic form of listing offenses that gave rise to so much unnecessary litigation. Nevertheless, each treaty must be examined to determine the approach followed.

A representative formula approach is found in Article 2 of the 1978 Treaty between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany:[70]

> Article 2
>
> Extraditable Offenses
>
> (1) Extraditable offenses under this Treaty are:
>
> (a) Offenses described in the Appendix to this Treaty which are punishable under the laws of both Contracting Parties;
>
> (b) Offenses, whether listed in the Appendix to this Treaty or not, provided they are punishable under the Federal laws of the United States and the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany. In this connection it shall not matter whether or not the laws of the Contracting Parties place the offense within the same category of offenses or denominate an offense by the same terminology.
>
> (2) Extradition shall be granted in respect of an extraditable offense:
>
> (a) For prosecution, if the offense is punishable under the laws of both Contracting Parties by deprivation of liberty for a maximum period exceeding one year; or
>
> (b) For the enforcement of a penalty or a detention order, if the duration of the penalty or detention order still to be served, or when, in the aggregate, several such penalties or detention orders still to be served, amount to at least six months.
>
> (3) Subject to the conditions set out in paragraphs (1) and (2), extradition shall also be granted:
>
> (a) For attempts to commit conspiracy, to commit, or participate in, an extraditable offense;
>
> (b) For any extraditable offense when, only for the purpose of granting jurisdiction to the United States Government, transportation, transmission of persons or property, the use of the mails or other means of communication or use of other means of carrying out interstate or foreign commerce is also an element of the specific offense.
>
> (4) When extradition has been granted in respect of an extraditable offense, it shall also be granted in respect of any other extraditable offense only by reason of the operation of paragraph (2).[71]

---

69 Bassiouni, supra note 67, at 25–37, 50–58.

70 Treaty of Extradition, June 20, 1978, U.S.–F.R.G., 32 U.S.T. 1485, Supplementary Treaty of 1986, KAV 705.

71 Id.

On October 21, 1986, a Supplementary Extradition Treaty with the Federal Republic of Germany was signed.[72] The Supplementary Treaty, Article 1, amends Article 2 of the 1978 Treaty as follows:

> Article 1
>
> (a) Article 2, paragraph (1) of the Extradition Treaty is amended to read as follows:
>
> (1) Extraditable offenses under the Treaty are offenses which are punishable under the laws of both Contracting Parties. In determining what is an extraditable offense it shall not matter whether or not the laws of the Contracting Parties place the offense within the same category of offense or denominate an offense by the same terminology, or whether dual criminality follows from Federal, State or Laender laws. In particular, dual criminality may include offenses based upon participation in an association whose aims and activities include the commission of extraditable offenses, such as a criminal society under the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany or an association involved in racketeering or criminal enterprise under the laws of the United States.[73]

This new formulation is intended to eliminate some of the problems connected with new complex crimes such as continuing criminal enterprise (CCE) and RICO.[74] Other treaties have special provisions to deal with problems associated with jurisdictional elements of extraditable offenses, and certain treaties include provisions dealing with tax and customs offenses.[75]

---

72 Supplementary Extradition Treaty with the Federal Republic of Germany, Oct. 21, 1986, Treaty Doc. 100-6, 100th Congress, 1st Sess. 1987.

73 Id.

74 RICO, 18 U.S.C. § 1961 (2000 and Supp. 2004); CCE (continuing criminal enterprises) 21 U.S.C. § 848 (2000 and Supp. 2004). For an example of the application of the extraditable offense inquiry into conspiracy relative to allegations of terrorist activity, see Bruce Zagaris, Trinidad Magistrate Orders Extradition of Three Suspects to U.S. in JFK Airport Terrorism Plot, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 375–376 (Oct. 2007). For examples of treaties making extraditable an attempt or conspiracy to commit an extraditable offense, though not necessarily addressing RICO or CCE as such, see Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 4(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (superceding certain types of extradition agreements between the United States and EU member states so that, in extradition requests made between those countries, extraditable offenses shall be understood to include "an attempt or conspiracy to commit, or participation in the commission of, an extraditable offense"); Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 2(2), entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17 ("An offense shall also be an extraditable offense if it consists of an attempt or a conspiracy to commit, aiding or abetting, counselling, causing or procuring the commission of, or being an accessory before or after the fact to, an [extraditable] offense…"); Extradition Treaty with Trinidad and Tobago, art. 2(2), entered into force Nov. 29, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-21; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(2), entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3 ("An offense shall also be an extraditable offense if it consists of an attempt or a conspiracy to commit, or participation in the commission of, an [extraditable] offense…"); Extradition Treaty with Luxembourg, art. 2(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-10, TIAS 12804; Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 2(2), entered into force April 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23 ("An offense shall also be an extraditable offense if it consists of an attempt or a conspiracy to commit, participation in the commission of, aiding or abetting, counseling or procuring the commission of, or being an accessory before or after the fact."). See also Garcia & Doyle, supra note 50.

75 For provisions regarding jurisdictional elements, see Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 4(2), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (superceding certain types of extradition agreements between the United States and EU member states so that, in extradition requests made between those countries, an offense shall be considered extraditable "regardless of whether the offence is one for which United States federal law requires the showing of such matters as interstate transportation, or use of the mails or of other facilities affecting interstate or foreign commerce, such matters being merely for the purpose of establishing jurisdiction in a United States federal court");

4. Jurisprudential Applications of Dual Criminality and Extraditable Offenses

Extradition from the United States will not be granted unless the relator is alleged to have committed one of the offenses enumerated or described in the applicable extradition treaty. Treaties do not usually define extraditable offenses but either name them or establish a formula for identifying them, as described above. Therefore, the extradition magistrate or judge must apply some body of substantive criminal law to determine whether the act committed constitutes an extraditable offense. That body of law is the jurisprudence of the state where the relator was arrested. It will be compared, however, with the meaning of the crime under the laws of the requesting state.

In Collins v. Loisel,[76] Justice Louis Brandeis stated:

> Collins contends that the affidavit of the British Consul General does not charge an extraditable offense. The argument is that the affidavit charges cheating merely; that cheating is not among the offenses enumerated in the extradition treaties; that cheating is a different offense from obtaining property under false pretenses which is expressly named in the Treaty of December 13, 1900, 32 Stat. 1864; that to convict of cheating it is sufficient to prove a promise of future performance which the promisor does not intend to perform, while to convict of obtaining property by false pretense it is essential that there be a false representation of a state of things past or present. See State v. Colly, 39 La. Ann. 841 (1887). It is true that an offense is extraditable only if the acts charged are criminal by the laws of both countries. It is also true that the charge made in the Court of India rests upon Section 420 of its Penal Code, which declares: "Whoever cheats and thereby dishonestly induces the person deceived to deliver any property to any person . . . shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall be liable to fine," whereas Section 813 of the Revised Statutes of Louisiana declares: "Whoever, by any false pretense, shall obtain, or aid and assist another in obtaining, from any person, money or any property, with intent to defraud him or the same, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment at hard labor or otherwise, not exceeding twelve months." But the Protocol Amending U.S.–Israel Extradition Treaty, art. 1, entered into force Jan. 10, 2007, S. TREATY DOC.109-3 (replacing art. II of earlier treaty); Lithuanian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(3), entered into force Mar. 31, 2003, S. TREATY DOC. 107-4; Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4)(c), entered into force Jan. 1, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Extradition Treaty with Belize, art. 2(3)(b), entered into force Mar. 27, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-38; Korean Extradition Treaty, art. 2(3)(c), entered into force Dec. 20, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 106-2, TIAS 12962. For provisions regarding tax and customs, see South African Extradition Treaty, art. 2(6), entered into force June 25, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-24 ("Where extradition of a person is sought for an offense against a law relating to taxation, customs duties, exchange control, or other revenue matters, extradition may not be refused on the ground that the law of the Requested State does not impose the same kind of tax or duty or does not contain a tax, customs duty, or exchange regulation of the same kinds as the law of the Requesting State"); Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 4(3)(c), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (applying in place of provisions contained in any earlier extradition treaty between the United States and an EU member state that allowed for extradition only for a specified list of offenses); Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4)(B), entered into force Jan. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Korean Extradition Treaty, art. 2(6), entered into force Dec. 20, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 106-2, TIAS 12962; Polish Extradition Treaty, art. 3, entered into force Sept. 17, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-14. But see Extradition Treaty with Luxembourg, art. 5(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-10, TIAS 12804 ("The executive authority of the Requested State shall have discretion to deny extradition when the offense for which extradition is requested is a fiscal offense [i.e., purely a tax, customs, or currency offense]."). See also Garcia & Doyle, supra note 50, at 11.

---

76 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D.Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D.Cal. 1998).

> affidavit of the British Consul General recites that Collins stands charged in the Chief Presidency Magistrate's Court with having feloniously obtained the pearl button by false pretenses; and the certificate of the Secretary to the Government of India, which accompanies the papers on which Collins' surrender is sought, describes the offense with which he is there charged as "the crime of obtaining valuable property by false pretenses." The law does not require that the name by which the crime is described in the two countries shall be the same; nor that the scope of the liability shall be coextensive, or, in other respects, the same in the two countries. It is enough if the particular act charged is criminal in both jurisdictions. This was held with reference to different crimes involving false statements in Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 58; Kelly v. Griffin, 241 U.S. 6, 14; Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 465; and Greene v. United States, 154 Fed. 401. Compare ex parte Piot, 15 Cox C. C. 208. The offense charged was, therefore, clearly extraditable.[77]

The Brandeis opinion conformed with that of Chief Justice Melville Fuller in Wright v. Henkel,[78] wherein he stated, "it is enough if the particular variety was criminal in both jurisdictions."[79]

In Glucksman v. Henkel,[80] Justice Oliver Wendel Holmes, relying on Chief Justice Fuller's position, went even further. With respect to the relationship between the complaint and the evidence represented, he stated:

> Neither Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, nor Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205, indicates that because the law of New York in this case may determine whether the prisoner is charged with an extraditable crime, it is to determine the effects of such a variance between evidence and complaint. That is a matter to be decided on general principles, irrespective of the law of the state.[81]

The majority position expressed by Justices Holmes and Brandeis remained firm in U.S. jurisprudence until it was expanded in a controversial manner in Factor v. Laubenheimer.[82] In that case, the United Kingdom requested extradition from the United States of John Jacob Factor for the crime of knowingly receiving fraudulently obtained money. The Supreme Court upheld the decision of the extradition magistrate in favor of extradition, despite the fact that the criminal law of Illinois, where Factor was found and where the extradition hearing was held, did not specifically cover this offense. The Court found the conduct with which Factor was charged to be a crime in the United Kingdom and within the provisions of the Treaty of 1889 between the two countries, and that it was a crime under the law of many states, although not Illinois (which, however, criminalized similar conduct).

The Factor case reaffirmed the position of the United States to engage in extradition relations only by treaty and limited the practice to a strict interpretation of the applicable treaty (the treaty in question, namely the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842 and its supplementary agreements of 1889, 1900, and 1905). Each supplementary agreement, inter alia, added to the list of 77 Colins, 259 U.S. at 311–312 (citations omitted). For a recent case following this analysis, see In re Extradition of Szepietowski, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 4658, at *20–*24 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2009).

---

78 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903). See Scott v. State of Israel, 48 I.L.R. 188, 189 (Sup. Ct. as Ct. Crim. App. 1970) (Isr.) (holding, citing Wright v. Henkel, that the relator was extraditable to the United States for an offense under the laws of a particular state rather than a federal offense). See also Theron v. U.S. Marshal, 832 F.2d 492, 496 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1059 (1988); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980); Heilbronn v. Kendall, 775 F. Supp. 1020, 1024 (W.D. Mich. 1991) (stating that the court must look to proscription by similar criminal provisions of federal law or, if none, the law of the place where the petitioner is found or, if none, the law of the preponderance of the states).

79 Wright, 190 U.S. at 60–61.

80 Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1911).

81 Glucksman, 221 U.S. at 513–514 (emphasis added).

82 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). For a critical view of this decision, see Manley O. Hudson, The Factor Case and Double Criminality in Extradition, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 274 (1934). For a supporting view, see Edwin M. Borchard, The Factor Extradition Case, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 742 (1934).

extraditable offenses. The offense charged in this case was not a crime in Illinois where the accused was sought, and traditional application of dual criminality would have precluded his extradition. The Court reached its conclusion by finding the requirement of dual criminality, which was stated in the treaty as applicable to some of the offenses, was not applicable to the offense for which the relator was sought because the offense was listed in one of the supplementary agreements that failed to mention that requirement explicitly. The Court in interpreting the treaty found, under the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, that dual criminality as stated in the original treaty had been excluded from the supplementary part that was applicable to the case at bar. The Court rejected the argument that dual criminality was a requirement of CIL, because U.S. extradition practice was based solely on the existence of a treaty. For all practical purposes, had the Court recognized the applicability of the dual criminality requirement in reliance on many precedents, including Collins v. Loisel,[83] which it distinguished, it could have been satisfied. The requirement would have been interpreted as subjectively meaning that the acts charged constituted an extraditable offense if charged in the requested state, even though it is not the same charge proffered by the requesting state. The Court concluded that when the particular offense charged is not among those specifically required to be criminal in both states, the acts complained of need not constitute the same crime in the state where the accused is found. It was sufficient, the Court found, that the offense was specified in the treaty and considered a crime by the jurisprudence of both states.

The Supreme Court, in effect, set aside the argument that there was a general treaty requirement of dual criminality by declaring:

> The obligation to do what some nations have done voluntarily, in the interest of justice and friendly international relationships…should be construed more liberally than a criminal statute or the technical requirements of criminal procedure.…It has been the policy of our own government, as of others, in entering into extradition treaties, to name as treaty offenses only those generally recognized as criminal by the laws in force within its own territory. But that policy when carried into effect by treaty designation of offenses with respect to which extradition is to be granted, affords no adequate basis for declining to construe the treaty in accordance with its language, or for saying that its obligation, in the absence of some express requirement, is conditioned on the criminality of the offenses charged according to the laws of the particular place of asylum.[84]

The Factor decision was precedent to the question of treaty interpretation, and only in dicta addressed the substance of the application and interpretation of the dual criminality requirement.

---

83 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

84 Factor, 290 U.S. at 298–300. See McElvy v. Civiletti, 523 F. Supp. 42 (S.D. Fla. 1981), in which the defendants argued that the requirement of dual criminality, meaning that the offense for which extradition was sought be a serious crime punishable under the laws of both countries, was not satisfied because the offense with which they were charged did not constitute a felony under the law of the United States. Dismissing the defendant's complaint, the court stated that extradition challenges must be approached with a view toward finding the offenses within the treaty. In this case, dual criminality was satisfied because the offenses alleged were substantially analogous to each other. See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); In re Abarca, 40 I.L.R. 208, 209 (Cass. 1964) (Belg.), in which the court rejected the relator's contention that the concept of "attempted" crime was different under Belgian and Swiss law. The failure by the Swiss court to specify whether the alleged offense constituted an "attempted crime" or an "unsuccessful crime" was found by the court to be irrelevant, as both concepts were embraced within Belgian law. See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 544, 569 (N.D. Ohio 1985), aff'd sub nom., Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986) (holding that the common law rule of Justices Butler, Brandeis, and Roberts, who dissented from the majority, pointed out that even if the Court applied a broad interpretation of the requirement of dual criminality, the outcome still would have been the same. This illustrates the observation made earlier that a broad subjective interpretation of dual criminality leads to the same result as its non-applicability when it is coupled with a broad interpretation of what constitutes the requirement of extraditable offenses.

The position of the United States has remained consistent in all the major decisions of the twentieth century, namely: Wright v. Henkel,[85] Pettit v. Walshe,[86] Glucksman v. Henkel,[87] Kelly v. Griffin,[88] Collins v. Loisel,[89] and even to some extent Factor v. Laubenheimer (subject to the reservations stated in the discussion of this case).[90] Moreover, in 1952, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in United States ex rel. Rauch v. Stockinger[91] denied the application for a writ of habeas corpus brought by Sol and Harold Rauch, whose extradition from the United States was requested by Canada for the crimes of theft and fraud. The extradition agreement between "dual criminality" was inapplicable because the U.S.–Israel extradition treaty governed. Citing Factor, the court stated that U.S. extradition, which was governed by treaty, did not necessarily bar prosecution for an offense not prosecutable as a crime in the United States.).

---

85 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903). See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

86 Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205 (1904).

87 Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1911). See also Bedi, supra note 32, at 69–84; Shearer, supra note 32, at 132–149. See also In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1017 (1990); In re Extradition of Russell, 789 F.2d 801 (9th Cir. 1986); Melia v. United States, 667 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1981); United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981); Cucuzzella v. Keliikoa, 638 F.2d 105 (9th Cir. 1981); United States ex rel. DiStefano v. Moore, 46 F.2d 310 (2d Cir. 1930), cert. denied, 283 U.S. 830 (1930); Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). Compare Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 847–851 (1st Cir. 1980) with Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 905–909 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973).

88 Kelly v. Griffin, 241 U.S. 6 (1916). See also Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1106 (1989), reh'g denied, 492 U.S. 927 (1989). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

89 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y., July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Ahmad v. Wigen, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y., Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997); United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888 (D.C. Cir. 1989). See also United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal. 1998); Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354, 1356 (9th Cir. 1986); Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 106 S. Ct. 1198, 89 L. Ed. 2d 312 (1986); In re Extradition of Rafael Eduardo Pineda Lara, 1998 WL 67656 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 1998); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); In re Sindona, 584 F. Supp. 1437, 1447 (E.D.N.Y. 1984).

90 See supra note 82 and accompanying text. For other liberal interpretations of what constitutes an extraditable offense citing Factor v. Laubenheimer, see Villareal v. Hammond, 74 F.2d 503 (5th Cir. 1934); Collier v. Vaccaro, 51 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1931). The opposite view is represented in Hatfield v. Guay, 87 F.2d 358 (1st Cir. 1937), cert. denied, 300 U.S. 678 (1937), reh'g denied, 301 U.S. 713 (1937), which seemed to apply an objective criteria of interpretation to dual criminality, even though it restricted itself to the interpretation of extraditable offenses and did so narrowly. As to acts which preceded a treaty, it was held that the treaty list was applicable. See United States ex rel. Oppenheim v. Hecht, 16 F.2d 955 (2d Cir. 1927), cert. denied, 273 U.S. 769 (1927).

91 United States ex rel. Rauch v. Stockinger, 269 F.2d 681 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 913 (1959), reh'g denied, 361 U.S. 973 (1960). See Spatola v. United States, 925 F.2d 615 (2d Cir. 1990); In the United States and Canada included larceny as an extraditable offense. The question arose as to whether the offense charged was the same one stated in the treaty constituting an extraditable offense. The court stated:

> After an examination of the applicable portions of the Criminal Code of Canada dealing with theft and fraud we are convinced that the facts set out in the depositions provided a reasonable ground for the Commissioner to believe that relators committed acts criminal under the laws of Canada. It likewise seems clear to us that the contents of the depositions provided a reasonable ground for him to believe that relators committed acts which would be criminal under the laws of New York. New York Penal Law, McKinney's Consol. Laws, c. 40, Sections 1290, 1294, and 1295. It is immaterial that the acts in question constitute the crime of theft and fraud in Canada and the crime of larceny in New York State. It is enough if the particular acts charged are criminal in both jurisdictions. Collins v. Loisel, 1922, 259 U.S. 309, 42 S. Ct. 469, 66 L. Ed. 956.[92]

Thus the court did not limit its inquiry to the label of the charge, but inquired into the criminal conduct and the type of crime to which it gave rise.

In Gallina v. Fraser[93] the district court and circuit court clarified the inquiry of courts into the alleged criminal conduct, its relationship to the offense charged, and its corresponding offense in the law of the requested state. Considering the application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by Vincenzo Gallina, who was being held for extradition to Italy for the crime of robbery, the district court stated in 1959 that:

> There is ample evidence in the record that the acts participated in by the relator were within that definition. It is true that the Italian record employs terms which translate into English as "continuous," "reiterated," and "aggravated" in connection with the offense of robbery, but an examination of the record establishes that these words describe circumstances surrounding a robbery or series of robberies, which circumstances, under Italian law, indicate the nature and type and extent of the penalty to be inflicted, rather than the nature of the crime itself. It is also clear that the reference in the Italian record to a charge of "attempted" robbery against relator indicates nothing more than that it was to be considered just another circumstance of the crime of aggravated robbery, of which relator was ultimately convicted. The offense of aggravated robbery as encompassed in the Italian Penal Code, translated sections of which are in the record, is extraditable under the treaty.[94] re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972).

---

92 Stockinger, 269 F.2d at 685–687 (emphasis added).

93 Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960), reh'g denied, 364 U.S. 906 (1960). See also Messina v. United States, 728 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1984). In Prushinowski v. Samples, 734 F.2d 1016 (4th Cir. 1984), the court examined the alleged criminal conduct and its relationship to the offense charged by the requesting rather than the requested state. The relator was sought by Great Britain for violations of the British Theft Act of 1968, which were extraditable offenses, but contended that the offenses with which he was charged were actually violations of the English Finance Act of 1972, which were not extraditable offenses. The court held that the relator was extraditable because probable cause had been established that he had violated the British Theft Act of 1968, and that a British court was the appropriate tribunal to determine which statute was most appropriate.

94 Gallina, 177 F. Supp. at 866–867. See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 99 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 200, (9th Cir. 1990). But see Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, aff'd 910 F.2d. 1063 (2d Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 1997).

By comparison, another decision took a more restrictive view. In 1957, Mexico requested the extradition of Abe Wise from the United States for fraud arising from the writing of a check by Wise "by reason of the settlement relative to a profit sharing association contract which was not honored because of insufficient funds."[95] As fraud was not one of the crimes enumerated in the Extradition Treaty of 1899 between the United States and Mexico,[96] the extradition complaint referred to section 19 of Article II of the Treaty, which provided for extradition for the offense of "obtaining by threats of injury, or by false devices, money, valuable or other personal property. . . ." The extradition magistrate held that a proper case for extradition had not been made out, stating:

> I find no crime denominated as fraud listed in the Treaty or Supplemental Conventions. That term seems to have crept into the complaint by reason of the use of the term in some of the documents and records of the Mexican Government accompanying the complaint. The offense sought to be charged here, and which the complaint should charge, if extradition is to be had, is that of obtaining money, valuable or other personal property by false devices. Mexico seems to have such a law, and Texas has such a law—swindling, punishable by imprisonment as for theft. But the complaint does not charge Wise with obtaining money, valuables or other personal property by false devices; it charges commission of the crime of fraud more particularly referred to in Section [subd.] 19 of the Treaty. But it does not charge what Wise obtained—whether money, or what valuable or what personal property.. .
>
> An examination of these exhibits discloses they do not by any stretch of the imagination charge Wise with obtaining money, valuables or other personal property by threats of injury or by false devices, the offense for which extradition is authorized by subd. 19 of Article II of the treaty. On the contrary, taking as admitted all of the fact allegations and conclusions set out in the Mexican proceedings, the record shows that Wise committed, and is charged with committing, in Mexico, the crime of "drawing a check without funds," in settlement of a profit sharing contract between himself and an association of collective farmers.
>
> This is an offense for which the treaty does not authorize extradition. While the laws of Mexico, and now the laws of Texas, provide punishment for the giving of a hot check, in the amount involved here ($23,241.38), with intent to defraud, even in payment of a pre-existing debt, that crime is not a treaty offense. It is not charged that Wise obtained money, valuables, or other personal property by the false device of giving a hot check. It is charged that he made a settlement of matters with the association by giving the worthless check. . . . If Wise had obtained vegetables or cantaloupes by the false device of a worthless check, the offense would be extraditable; but "settlement" of a debt or controversy by worthless check does not come within the treaty. . . .[97]

---

95 In re Wise, 168 F. Supp. 366 (S.D. Tex. 1957). The Canadian position was the same in In re Dornberger, 8 Ann. Dig. 381 (Sup. Ct. 1935) (Mex.). But see Koskotas v. Roche, 740 F. Supp. 904 (D. Mass.), aff'd, 931 F.2d 169 (1990) (holding that the focus should be on whether the crime charged and the treaty offense share the same essential elements. The extradition court must inquire whether the extraditing country is obliged to prove each essential element of the offense covered by treaty in order to prove the charged offense).

96 Treaty for the Extradition of Criminals, Feb. 22, 1899, U.S.–Mex., 31 Stat. 1818.

97 168 F. Supp. at 368–369, 370–371, 372. See Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914, 918–919 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 971 (1981). In that case, the district court had denied extradition of the relator to Hong Kong, because the Treaty on Extradition between the United States and the United Kingdom required the offense be a "felony." The relator, who was sixteen at the time the crimes were allegedly committed, could be prosecuted in the United States only as a juvenile delinquent, so the "felony" requirement was not met. The Second Circuit reversed, holding that the district court had erred in considering only federal law to determine whether the offense constituted a felony. Instead, the Second Circuit held that federal law determines a felony only when a violation of a federal statute is alleged, and as the offense in question was a felony under the laws of the state of New York, not federal law, then New York law determined whether the offense was a "felony." The court concluded that because the offense was a felony under New York law, it was a felony within the meaning of the treaty. See also In re Extradition of Tang Yee-Chun, 674 F. Supp. 1058 (S.D.N.Y. 1987); Freedman v. United States,

This last paragraph of the court's opinion reveals how narrowly it construed the treaty provision and how restrictively it was applied.

In a case having political ramifications, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in 1962 in Jimenez v. Aristeguieta adhered to the same position.[98] The relator, Carlos Perez Jimenez, the president of the Republic of Venezuela, who had been deposed in a coup d'état, sought asylum in the United States. Among the crimes charged against him were causing improvements to be made on his private property and work to be done in connection with his private ventures at public expense, as well as receiving, through intermediaries, "kickbacks" and commissions in connection with the negotiation and award of contracts for the purchase, with public funds, of guns, airplanes, and other articles or property supplied or to be supplied to the government of Venezuela. Jimenez's extradition was requested on the basis, inter alia, of paragraph 14 of Article II of the Extradition Treaty of 1922 between the United States and Venezuela, which listed as an extraditable offense:

> Embezzlement or criminal malversation committed within the jurisdiction of one of the parties by public officers or depositaries, where the amount embezzled exceeds 200 dollars in the United States of America or B. 1.000 in the United States of Venezuela.[99]

As to this aspect of the case, the extradition magistrate found sufficient evidence that President Jimenez committed the acts charged and that these acts were within the meaning of paragraph 14 of Article II of the Treaty. On appeal from denial of a habeas corpus petition challenging the finding of the extradition magistrate, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit concluded that:

> Criminal malversation includes a broad category of corrupt official practices. Webster's New International Dictionary defines the word "malversation" thus: "Evil conduct; fraudulent practices; misbehaviour, corruption, or extortion in office." p. 1490 (2d ed. 1957). The Oxford English Dictionary lists two current meanings: :corrupt behaviour in an office, commission, employment, or position of trust," and "corrupt administration of something"—and gives a number of instances of the use of the word in such broad senses, beginning in 1549 and continuing through the nineteenth century.
>
> Black's Law Dictionary sets out the accepted definition: "In French law, this word is applied to all grave and punishable faults committed in the exercise of a charge or commission, (office), such as corruption, exaction, concussion, larceny." p. 1112 (4th ed. 1951).
>
> There is evidence showing that appellant, as chief executive of Venezuela, used his position of power and authority to divert funds and services belonging to Venezuela to his own use and benefit. The offenses as to which probable cause has been certified constituted "embezzlement or criminal malversation." [100]

This position was followed in In re Extradition of Rabelbauer,[101] where the Austrian government also sought the extradition of the relator on the basis of the treaty offense of malversation. That crime, in the 1900s, referred to the equivalent crime of embezzlement by a public official and abuse of trust and confidence through which the accused deprived someone else of something of value. A strict interpretation of malversation could exclude such property crimes as theft, burglary, or robbery as they do not involve the abuse of trust and confidence of the victim. The 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977) (finding the relator not extraditable for the offense of "commercial bribery," which was not a crime under the laws of Georgia or the United States. However, the relator was extradited to Canada on the charge of fraud.).

---

98 Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914, reh'g denied, 374 U.S. 858 (1963).

99 Extradition Treaty with Venezuela, Jan. 19, 1922, U.S.–Venez., Art. II (14), 43 Stat. 1698.

100 Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547, 562–563 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914 (1963).

101 In re Extradition of Rabelbauer, 638 F. Supp. 1085 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

relator argued that as the accompanying Austrian text of Article II, paragraph 14 contained the word "unterschlagung," the meaning of the English text was limited. "Unterschlagung," Rabelbauer argued, meant only embezzlement or misappropriation of funds, and could not be official corruption. The government argued that "unterschlagung" was intended to encompass the same broad range of misdeeds as malversation. The court concluded it would take a broad view of the meaning of the term, not in the context of the time the treaty was entered, but in contemporary terms. The court stated:

> A liberal construction of paragraph 14 brings official misconduct and corruption within the crime of criminal malversation. The fact that malversation's Austrian counterpart unterschlagung may have acquired a narrower meaning since 1930 is irrelevant. There is little doubt that the word has undergone some evolution in Austria because even [Rabelbauer's Austrian criminal attorney] testified that it only entered the Austrian Penal Code in 1975. The broad meaning originally attached to the word is evidenced by the fact that unterschlagung is also contained in the Treaty as the translation in Article II, paragraph 20 for "breach of trust." As the Austrian Federal Ministry of Justice has indicated, the word had a meaning in 1930 broad enough to be the equivalent of malversation and was used for that purpose. The intention of the contracting parties would be served by no other construction.[102]

That, in the opinion of this writer, who was counsel in the case, was an erroneous interpretation as treaties are to be interpreted in accordance with the plain meaning of the words and their import at the time of the conclusion of the treaty. Courts are not the appropriate mechanism for updating older treaties to comport with contemporary requirements.

In a parallel construction, Canadian courts have adopted the same position vis-à-vis the United States. In 1963, the United States, on behalf of the State of New York, sought the extradition from Canada of James Pendergast, who had been indicted in New York for larceny. It was charged that Pendergast had issued several large checks against insufficient funds. After Pendergast had been found extraditable, he applied for discharge by way of habeas corpus. In dismissing the application, the High Court of Justice of Ontario considered the offense, in terms of Canadian law, as follows:

> Pendergast was indicted in the State of New York in respect to two charges on what is called grand larceny in the first degree. It is apparent that this charge is the equivalent of what is known in Canada as obtaining money by false pretenses.[103]

While the other courts showed more reticence to expand the notion of kindred offenses, the Canadian Court found it easier to pursue a course of interpretation of dual criminality in abstracto. The reciprocal experience of Canada and the United States as neighboring states has done much to ensure the satisfactory reliance on this interpretative approach to dual criminality. The relations between the United States and Mexico have demonstrated the same consistency, which is characteristic of neighboring states concerned with the mutual preservation of their internal order and cooperation in the suppression of criminality.

Some cases reveal, however, that overreliance on the spirit of cooperation between neighboring states may cause a requesting state not to comply fully with all treaty and statutory requirements. The requesting state must show that the offense charged also constitutes a crime in its own jurisdiction; otherwise extradition cannot be granted. This situation arose before the Superior Court of Quebec in United States v. Link and Green,[104] in which the United States had asked for the extradition of Link and Green from Canada on the basis of indictments returned by the State of Michigan. The indictments charged the relators with obtaining money by false pretenses and forgery, inducing persons residing in Michigan to buy shares in certain

---

102 Id. at 1088.

103 Ex parte Pendergast, 6 Crim. L.Q. 393, 394 (Can. 1963).

104 21 I.L.R. 234 (Super. Ct. Que. 1954) (Can.).

companies. The accused conducted their scheme from Montreal by means of postal and telephone services, and at no time were they in Michigan or elsewhere in the United States. After carefully considering the facts and the evidence presented, the Superior Court of Quebec stated:

> For an extradition application to be granted to surrender a fugitive for trial in a foreign jurisdiction, the conduct charged as an offense must be punishable criminally both by the laws of that foreign jurisdiction and of Canada, and must also come within the provisions of the relevant Extradition Treaty or Convention.... [However] [i]t now becomes necessary to state that the applicant did not attempt to make any proof that forgery, false pretenses, defrauding the public or appropriating money or property for the benefit of the accused were offenses under the law of the State of Michigan, although they are criminal offenses under the Canadian Criminal Code.[105]

The unusual feature of this case was not the question of whether the offense charged constituted an extraditable offense or whether it constituted an offense in the requested state, but whether it was an offense under the laws of the requesting state.

A similar decision was reached in In re Lamar[106] by the Supreme Court of Alberta, when the Court, rejecting the application for extradition, stated:

> The evidence does not disclose that the use of the mails constituted any part of the unlawful obtaining, as the money so unlawfully obtained was taken before the confirmation of purchase letter was written or mailed. Therefore no prima facie case has been made out to make the above proven law applicable. The imputed crime has not shown to be a crime within the law of the United States of America.[107]

These cases, however, do not bear directly on the type of interpretation the Canadian courts have given dual criminality in practice with the United States. The interpretation remained a subjective, in abstracto, interpretation.[108]

This practice dates back to 1860 to the notorious case of In re Anderson.[109] The relator, John Anderson, was a black slave who was sought for extradition from upper Canada to Missouri to answer a charge of murder under the laws of that state. The alleged crime had been committed when the victim, a planter named Diggs, attempted to prevent the fugitive from escaping. Under the laws of the requesting state, the victim was not only authorized, but under legal duty to attempt to prevent the escape of slaves. In Canada, the institution of slavery was not recognized and, of course, no law required citizens to apprehend escaping slaves. Had the incident occurred in Canada, the relator would not have been culpable for killing the victim in order to retain his liberty. The case was nevertheless decided in favor of surrender by the Court of the Queen's Bench of Upper Canada, on the grounds that the victim had been acting with legal authority. Furthermore, under the law of Canada, if a person kills another who is attempting to apprehend him/her under legal authority, such a person commits murder.[110]

---

105 Id. at 234–235.

106 9 Ann. Dig. 405 (Sup. Ct. Alta. 1940) (Can.).

107 Id. at 406.

108 See, e.g., Gary Botting, Extradition between Canada and the United States (2005); Gerard V. LaForest, Extradition to and from Canada (2d ed. 1977).

109 Ann. Reg. (1861), 520, Parliamentary Papers (1860), discussed in Edward Clarke, A Treatise upon the Law of Extradition 103 (London, Stevens and Haynes 1867).

110 An opposing view was taken by Great Britain in an opinion of the law officer of Her Majesty's government in an application made to the president administering the government of the Virgin Islands by the lieutenant governor of the Danish Island of Saint Thomas for the arrest and restitution of two slaves charged with burglary and felony who had fled to Tortola. The law officer said: "[W]e are of the opinion that according to the Law of Nations and the Laws of this Country, the Danish Government is not entitled to demand these Refugees; and it makes no difference in our view of the case that they are Slaves

A contrasting position was taken in the case of United States v. Eisler, in which Eisler was sought for extradition from the United Kingdom on charges of perjury. The English court stated:

> It seems to me the facts are abundantly clear. Eisler filled in a form as required by the law and he made therein certain statements. He was arraigned and indicted on various matters, including making a false statement. He was tried before the District Court of Columbia in due course and he was sentenced, and he is therefore a convicted person. The point is, is he a fugitive criminal?—a person whose return to his country may be required by the United States. What is an indictable [extraditable] crime? Those matters are regulated by a Treaty between this country and the United States of America, and are set out in the Order in Council of 6th July, 1945, amongst other places. Those persons who have been accused or convicted of certain crimes or offences shall be returned, if found within the territory of either party, and in Article 3 (14) the crime of perjury is set out. It is therefore necessary to see whether by the law both of the United States and this country this man was found guilty of a crime which means perjury. Perjury is a somewhat technical matter. It is thought by certain people that if you merely tell a lie on oath, you have committed perjury. You have committed an offence which is something akin to perjury, but not necessarily perjury. The definition of perjury is contained in Section 1 of the Perjury Act. "If any person lawfully sworn as a witness or as an interpreter in a judicial proceeding wilfully makes a statement material in the proceeding, which he knows to be false or does not believe to be true, he shall be guilty of perjury . . . ." Then by Section 2, "The expression `judicial proceeding' includes a proceeding before any court, tribunal, or person having by law power to hear, receive and examine evidence on oath." And Section 3—relied on by Sir Valentine Holmes—"Where a statement made for the purpose of a judicial proceeding is not made before the tribunal itself, but is made on oath before a person authorized by law to administer an oath to the person who makes the statement, and to record or authenticate the statement, it shall, for purposes of this section, be treated as having been made in a judicial proceeding." That was the occasion on which Eisler made his false statement. It seems to me there were then contemplated no judicial proceedings whatever. It was purely an administrative action performed by the officer in question. He was taking and recording statements of Mr. Eisler. Mr. Eisler for making the statements in the form which were false, was convicted by the District Court of Columbia on the third indictment, and that sets out that in the said application the defendant made statements as set out in A, B, and C of count (1) which were false in respect of that count. The point is, is what he was convicted of in America, both in America and here, an extraditable crime. In my opinion, it is abundantly clear that in no circumstances whatever could that offence of which Mr. Eisler was convicted in America be brought under the technical head of perjury in this country.
>
> In those circumstances, the United States requisitioning power[s] have failed to show that Mr. Eisler has been guilty of an extraditable crime, and this application fails.[111]

Commenting on this decision, the Department of State noted that the offense Eisler had been convicted of in the United States was apparently also an offense in the United Kingdom, as it appeared in the British Perjury Act of 1911 under a section entitled "Kindred offenses," one of which was false swearing under oath made otherwise than in a judicial proceeding. The Department stated:

> The Department of State and the Department of Justice were aware at the time that the request for the extradition of Eisler was made that it would be necessary to establish the fact that the crime for which the fugitive had been convicted was a crime covered by the treaty according to British law. The applicable provision in Article 9 of the treaty is typical of the provision by the Law of Denmark or that in the event of their being acquitted of the Felony they would continue to be held in Slavery in that Country." See Sir Arnold McNair, Extradition and Extraterritorial Asylum, 1951 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 172, 180.

---

111 See United States v. Eisler, 75 F. Supp. 640 (D.D.C. 1948), aff'd, 176 F.2d 21 (D.C. Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 337 U.S. 958 (1949); 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 59, at 797–798.

> contained in each of our treaties. It was thought, however, that the British court would follow the practice of the courts of the United States in interpreting extradition treaties liberally and that it would hold that the crime came within the term "perjury" as used in the treaty in as much as the British Perjury Act of 1911 defines in Section 2 the crime as a kindred offense.
>
> It is believed that the term "perjury" was used in the treaty generically rather than technically, as the definition of the crime both by the United States and British statute was fixed many years before the treaty was negotiated and it is hardly to be assumed that the two Governments intended to apply different meanings to it. It does not appear from the transcript of the hearings that this view was argued before the court or that it passed upon it but rather that the court limited its decision to the one point, namely, that the offense was not perjury within the meaning of Section 1 of the British Perjury Act.[112]

The British position has remained consistent since 1865. In Ex parte Windsor,[113] the court discharged the relator, who was wanted for forgery by the United States, because the acts alleged by the requesting state did not constitute the crime of forgery under UK law. The same rationale was followed in King v. Dix[114] in 1902, in which extradition was denied because the charge of larceny alleged by the United States did not conform to the required elements of that crime under UK law. A second charge of embezzlement was found to be extraditable, because it corresponded to the crime of larceny by fraud under UK law and was covered by the treaty.

Finally, in R. v. Governor of H.M. Prison, Brixton, Ex parte Gardner, an extradition request from New Zealand to the United Kingdom was denied for the alleged offense of obtaining money with intent to defraud by means of false pretenses.[115] The court noted the relator had falsely represented that he would supply a distributor with cosmetics for a sum of money and made such representations as to a future event, which although criminal under the law of New Zealand, were not encompassed in UK law. Accordingly, the offenses charged did not constitute crimes under the law of England and Wales.[116]

France, in its extradition relations with the United States, adheres to a more rigid position than does the United Kingdom. In the Blackmer case,[117] France refused extradition to the United States because the offense charged did not constitute a prosecutable offense in concreto under French law. The Paris court found that the statute of limitations for similar offenses had lapsed under French law, and thereby extinguished the prosecutability of the offender. Thus, the acts 112 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 59, at 798–799 (quoting the American Embassy, London, to the Department of State, dispatch No. 980, June 9, 1949, encl. 1, MS. Department of State, file 241.11 Eisler, Gerhart/6-949; Assistant to the Legal Adviser (Vallance) to Gilbert F. Kennedy, Counselor at Law, London, letter, July 22, 1949, id. at 7–1349). For a discussion of the case, see Philip E. Jacob, International Extradition: Implications of the Eisler Case, 59 Yale L. J. 622 (1950).

---

113 12 L.T.R. 307 (Q.B. 1865) (Eng.).

114 18 T.L.R. 231 (K.B. 1902) (Eng.).

115 41 I.L.R. 397 (Q.B. Div'l Ct. 1967) (Eng.). See also Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition (1995); V. Hartley Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure 47, 111, 167 (1980). The first English extradition book was Charles Egan, The Law of Extradition Comprising the Treaties Now in Force between England and France and England and America (1846). For subsequent writings, see Henry C. Biron & Kenneth E. Chalmers, The Law and Practice of Extradition (1903); Frederick Waymouth Gibbs, Extradition Treaties (1868); Sir George Cornewall Lewis, On Foreign Jurisdiction and the Extradition of Criminals (London 1859); Aloysius de Mello, A Manual of the Law of Extradition and Fugitive Offenders Applicable to the Eastern Dependencies of the British Empire (2d ed. 1933); Sir Francis Taylor Piggott, Extradition (1910).

116 41 I.L.R. supra note 115, at 399, 404.

117 Case of Blackmer, Court of Appeals of Paris, Chambre des Mises en Accusation (1928). See also Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421 (1932).

charged could not constitute an offense under French law. Therefore, the French position focuses on the prosecutability of the offense, or l'incrimination, as does that of the United States, but the difference lies in considering the statute of limitations a substantive defense to be raised at trial.

In a 2008 case, the relators argued that the dual criminality requirement was not satisfied because the U.S. statute of limitations on fraud had lapsed.[118] The court reasoned that under the analogous statute, different from the one the relators relied on, the applicable statute of limitations had not run.[119]

Another case involving the United States as a requesting state was In re Insull.[120] In that matter, a Greek Court of Appeals in 1933 found that an extraditable offense was to be found in concreto, and dual criminality required that all the elements of prosecution in the requested state be satisfied. The court asserted its right to examine the substance of the charge and to determine the existence of the mental element of the offense charged. In effect, the court examined whether the relator could have been found guilty under Greek law, which was tantamount to a finding of potential conviction rather than mere prosecutability. The United States was critical of that approach and rejected it.

The question of the type and quantum of evidence required in an extradition request is often confused with the issue of extraditability, which requires substantively that the offense be extraditable and that the offense charged satisfy dual criminality, meaning prosecutability rather than punishability.[121] It is noteworthy that, under common law, the examining magistrate or judge considers the existence of probable cause as a reasonable belief that the offense charged has been committed. In civil law systems, the examining magistrate or judge does not inquire into the probable cause or the evidence and takes the charging document or the arrest warrant (both of which are issued by a judge) at face value as constituting probable cause.

As discussed above, the U.S. Supreme Court in Collins v. Loisel[122] in 1922 stated: "The law does not require that the name by which the crime is described in the two countries shall be the same; nor that the scope of the liability shall be coextensive, or, in other respects, the same in two countries."[123] It is, therefore, enough if the particular action charged is criminal in the two legal systems. This position embodies the notion of in abstracto dual criminality and is, therefore, contrary to the in concreto approach followed in some countries.[124] The in abstracto

---

118 The relators argued that the applicable statute of limitations was five years under 18 U.S.C. § 3282 because the charged offense in Pakistan was analogous to wire or mail fraud. In re Extradition of Tawakkal, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 65059, at *20–*21 (E.D. Va. Aug. 22, 2008).

119 The court reasoned that the applicable statute was the bank fraud statute, which carried a ten-year statute of limitations that had not run. As such, the court did not consider arguments regarding fugitive disentitlement tolling the statute of limitations under 18 U.S.C. § 3290. Id. at *33–*35.

120 7 Ann. Dig. 344 (Ct. App. Athens 1933) (Greece).

121 The distinction between these approaches will be discussed in Ch. VIII with respect to substantive defenses to extradition; the requirement of proof is discussed in Ch. IX.

122 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Gouveia v. Vokes, 800 F. Supp. 241, 246 (E.D. Pa. 1992).

123 Collins, 259 U.S. at 312. See also Ex parte Bryant, 167 U.S. 104 (1897).

124 Congrès, supra note 30, at 792–795; Jean Claude Lombois, Droit Pénal International 495–496 (2d ed. 1979). The essence of the rule or principle of dual criminality is reciprocity, but that does not mean that the procedures in both states must be alike. For a position that is not followed in other legal systems, particularly France, see United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 14, 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). For example, in In re Extradition of approach requires merely that the act charged constitute a crime in the jurisprudence lato sensu of the two countries. This position was clearly stated in Collins[125] and further developed in Factor v. Laubenheimer.[126] The thrust of U.S. decisions has always been in this direction, which rejects the in concreto approach of demanding that all requirements of guilt and punishment exist in the two countries. The in abstracto approach has also been the one consistently followed by the UK courts,[127] as evidenced by a 1979 case involving an extradition request from the United States for members of the Church of Scientology, wherein the Queen's Bench stated: "[D]ouble criminality in our law of extradition is satisfied if it is shown: (1) that the crime for which extradition is demanded would be recognized as substantially similar in both countries; (2) that there is a prima facie case that the conduct of the accused amounted to the commission of the crime according to English law."[128] Going even beyond the traditional approach, a U.S. court in In re Edmondson[129] noted that "minor variances in technical definition of crime are not fatal."[130]

The development of a liberal in abstracto approach coupled with a tradition of listing extraditable offenses in a treaty, which would appear to be a rigid requirement, makes for a more flexible application. It is probably in response to the rigidity of the practice of listing extraditable offenses in treaties that U.S. courts react in a more liberal fashion in interpreting and applying the meaning of those offenses under U.S. law. This is certainly not a better solution to the problems created by the traditional U.S. practice of listing extraditable offenses in a treaty, rather than merely stating a general form defining the in abstracto doctrine of dual criminality, with the added proviso that the offenses be punishable by more than one year of imprisonment, so as to limit the otherwise cumbersome and lengthy practice to crimes of some seriousness. The rather liberal interpretation given the principle of dual criminality in more recent cases[131] has resulted,

---

Bozano before the Chambre des Mises en Accusation of Limoges, the court held that Bozano's conviction in absentia on appeal after acquittal at trial violated the principle of reciprocity. See supra note 17 and accompanying text. See also S.Z. Feller, The Scope of Reciprocity in Extradition, 10 Isr. L. Rev. 427 (1975). See Ch. V, Sec. 4.

125 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998).

126 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1911). See also United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510 (11th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Reed v. United States, 506 U.S. 924, 113 S. Ct. 347, 121 L. Ed. 2d 262 (1992); United States ex rel. Rauch v. Stockinger, 269 F.2d 681 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 913 (1959), reh'g denied, 361 U.S. 973 (1960).

127 In re Budlong and Kember, [1980] 1 All E.R. 701, reprinted in United Kingdom Case Note, Extradition-Double Criminality-Definition of Political Offense-Specialty, 74 Am. J. Int'l L. 447 (1980).

128 Id. at 448.

129 In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972).

130 Id. at 25.

131 Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1405 (9th Cir. 1988) (stating that Hong Kong crimes of false accounting and publishing a false statement are substantially analogous to the federal crime of making a false entry in a bank statement), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1106 (1989), reh'g denied, 492 U.S. 927 (1989). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct. of N. Dist. of California, 834 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1987) (stating that the substantive conduct of the German crime of fraud and the American crime of mail fraud were functionally identical). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir.), Dec. 10, 1997; In re Extradition of Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D.

for example, in Jhirad v. Ferrandina,[132] where the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York found that a breach of confidence under Indian criminal law is equivalent to embezzlement. Similarly, the court found in the Sindona case[133] that the Italian crime of concorso in peculato is equivalent to embezzlement. Clearly the latter, which under Italian criminal law is the participation in embezzlement by a public official of public funds, is far from the traditional meaning of embezzlement under the common law of crimes, or for that matter, under its meaning within the definition of "theft" of the Model Penal Code now followed in most states.[134]

These developments occurred because courts, rather than looking at the doctrine of dual criminality per se, considered first the question of treaty interpretation. Thus courts, starting from that perspective, and only thereafter finding an existing or corresponding crime in the United States, undertook a broader interpretation of dual criminality. In time, a liberal trend developed in applying the doctrine. The United States traditionally interprets extradition treaty provisions in a liberal manner.[135] Consequently, the liberality of the interpretation of the treaty provision and the doctrine of dual criminality has resulted in a less technical approach. This trend favors extradition and strays from the traditional principle favor reo. More recent decisions have even interpreted extraditable offenses within a treaty as having a retroactive effect.[136] Thus, in the case of a new treaty (for example between the United States and Italy, which entered into a treaty in 1975 to replace the treaty of 1856), a person sought under the later treaty for a crime committed under the earlier treaty was deemed extraditable.[137] This means that courts consider the doctrine of dual criminality to be more for the benefit of the requesting state than for the protection of the relator.

Cal. 19998); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); Fiocconi v. Attorney General, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff'd on other grounds, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 981 (1964); Spatola v. United States, 741 F. Supp. 362 (E.D.N.Y. 1990), aff'd, 925 F.2d 615, 618 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that the U.S. law of conspiracy to commit an offense constituted the crime of association under Italian law); In re Extradition of Tang Yee-Chun, 674 F. Supp. 1058 (S.D.N.Y. 1987); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977).

132 Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 1155 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), rev'd, 486 F.2d 442 2d Cir. (1973), on remand, 377 F. Supp. 34 (S.D.N.Y. 1974), on remand, 401 F. Supp. 1215 (S.D.N.Y. 1975), aff'd, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976), reh'g denied, 429 U.S. 988 (1976).

133 In re Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), aff'd sub nom., Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

134 See Model Penal Code (Official Text 1962); Bassiouni, supra note 67, at 303–333.

135 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.3.

136 See Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1977). See also United States ex rel. Oppenheim v. Hecht, 16 F.2d 955 (2d Cir. 1927), cert. denied, 273 U.S. 769 (1927); Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960), reh'g denied, 364 U.S. 906 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, (9th Cir. 1990). But see Gouveia v. Vokes, 800 F. Supp. 241 (E.D. Pa. 1992) (holding that a statutory amendment to an extradition treaty authorizing the federal government to extradite a U.S. citizen, if appropriate, was not applicable to a naturalized American citizen whose conduct had been adjudged criminal in Portugal prior to the amendment).

137 For a more recent case, see United States v. Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 265 (E.D.N.Y. 1973), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973).

The traditional position of the United States has always been that the U.S. crime corresponding to an extraditable offense listed in the treaty is made in accordance with the law of the state where the arrest occurs (irrespective of where the arrest warrant was issued). Confusion arises, however, as to whether state or federal law or both apply.[138] This also means that elements of the crime and proof thereof are determined in accordance with the same law. In the 1904 Pettit v. Walshe[139] decision, the U.S. Supreme Court found that state law applies, though in Wright v. Henkel[140] federal law was not excluded. Subsequently, several federal appellate court decisions deviated from the Pettit position. In Greci v. Birknes,[141] the court questioned Pettit in that its rationale at the time was that most extraditable offenses were defined by state law, but this was no longer the case and federal law may have been more relevant.

Proof of the elements of the crime, as well as all evidentiary questions relating thereto, is determined by federal law.[142] To date, courts still adhere to the position that state law controls as to the crime, but sometimes apply federal standards to "probable cause" and federal law with respect to "evidentiary questions" pertaining to its proof.[143] This, in effect, injects a strong dose of federal criminal law in what was traditionally conceived of as an area of state substantive law.

The case of Pettit v. Walshe[144] generated confusion, which has continued since the ruling in 1904, with respect to shifting between the application of state law and federal law. Regrettably, there is no legislative history to clarify when state standards apply. Thus, questions such as the nature of the crime charged for purposes of dual criminality or probable cause and proof

---

138 For a more recent case, see O'Brien v. Rozman, 554 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1977).

139 Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205 (1904).

140 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903). See United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974) (indicating that state law must be looked to at all times; however, if interstate or foreign commerce is involved, reference may be made to foreign law, particularly in an area where state law may be precluded or preempted by a valid exercise of congressional power). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). Cf. Scott v. State of Israel, 48 I.L.R. 188, 189 (Sup. Ct. as Ct. Crim. App. 1970) (Isr.) (citing Wright v. Henkel and holding that the relator was extraditable to the United States for an offense under the laws of a particular state rather than for a federal offense). There is still some uncertainty about whether state law or federal law applies. This is due to two trends. The first is the government's desire to use whatever law is more convenient. The second is the growth of federal criminal law. As a general rule it can be said that state law applies, and in its absence, federal law. See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F.Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

141 Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976). See also Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir. 1981) (holding that both state and federal law are relevant absent evidence to the contrary), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 971 (1981). In Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), In re Locatelli, 468 F. Supp. 568 (S.D.N.Y. 1979), and Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 1155, 1161 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), rev'd on other grounds, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1974) the court held that federal bankruptcy law applied instead of state law, while Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973) held the opposite. See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). Compare Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977) with Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903) (holding that state common law and statutory law could apply).

142 See Ch. IX (discussing probable cause and evidentiary questions).

143 For recent cases, see Theron v. U.S. Marshal, 832 F.2d 492 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1059 (1987); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980) (stating that the acts upon which the English charges were based were proscribed by similar criminal provisions of federal law, New Hampshire law, or the law of the preponderance of the states); United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726 (9th Cir. 1975); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); Heilbronn v. Kendall, 775 F. Supp. 1020 (W.D. Mich. 1991).

144 Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205 (1904).

thereof will, depending on the case and the issue, alternate between reliance on federal law and state law.

It is noteworthy that almost every U.S. decision refers to dual criminality as a "principle," but none has ever defined the meaning of "principle." Presumably, it means a substantive condition of such significance that it is a firm, even irreversible, requirement in U.S. practice. The full impact of that term and its significance would arise if, by treaty or by some other means, the United States would do away with it. This could occur if, for example, U.S. legislation authorized extradition on the basis of comity or by executive agreement, which may not embody the requirement of dual criminality. Courts would then have to decide if it is truly a principle, and thus consider it as an implicit condition for extradition, or if the decisions heretofore rendered meant it only to be a requirement conditioned upon its explicit embodiment in a treaty.

Although the principle seems to have been adhered to consistently in the jurisprudence of the United States, as it has been embodied in each of the treaties the United States has entered into (under a provision listing extraditable offenses), an exception may be found with respect to revocation of parole.[145] The district court in McGann v. United States Board of Parole,[146] citing In re Extradition of Edmondson and Fisher,[147] held that "although escape was not an extraditable offense under the treaty, extradition was proper where the underlying offense, the crime pursuant to which the escapee was serving time, was extraditable under the treaty."[148]

All of the cases discussed in this section, as well as those cited in the footnotes,[149] indicate that extraditable offenses refer to those offenses that are listed or designated in the relevant extradition treaty, subject to different applications, and in the absence of a treaty to those offenses that are based on reciprocal recognition. All cases indicate that the requirement of dual criminality applies (whether by treaty or not), and is subject to one of the two methods of interpretation discussed earlier (i.e.,in concreto or in abstracto). The weight of jurisprudential authority, however, reveals that in the United States the subjective method, in abstracto, prevails. Certainly, this is the trend in its treaty practice.

In Brauch v. Raiche,[150] the decision of the First Circuit in 1980 portended an even broader application of the rule. It is noteworthy that the United States in Fiocconi v. Attorney

---

145 McGann v. U.S. Bd, of Parole, 356 F. Supp. 1060 (M.D. Pa. 1973), aff'd, 488 F.2d 39 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 958 (1974), reh'g denied, 417 U.S. 927 (1974).

146 Id.

147 In re Extradition of Edmondson & Fisher, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972).

148 In re Extradition of Edmondson & Fisher, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972) (It is cited in the McGann case at page 1062.).

149 See supra Secs. 3 and 4. See also Re Peron et al., 40 I.L.R. 210 (Sup. Ct. 1965) (Arg.) (concerning an extradition request by Argentina, which was denied by Spain because the request was not made in accordance with strict observance of treaty terms); United States v. Novick, 32 I.L.R. 275 (Super. Ct. Que. 1960) (Can.); Re Gerber, 24 I.L.R. 493 (BGH 1957) (F.R.G.).

150 Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980). In United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 814 F.2d 1329 (9th Cir. 1987), amended by, 827 F.2d 424 (1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1042 (1987), involving an extradition from Switzerland of a Belgian citizen, the Court found that mail and wire fraud can be subsumed within the meaning of "obtaining money under false pretenses." Whether such an offense is established and satisfies the requirement of dual criminality is a matter for the requested state to determine. The court also considered dual criminality as that which is criminally coextensive in the two respective legal systems, and relied on Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998). In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1017 (1990); In re Extradition of Russell, 789 F.2d 801 (9th Cir. 1986); and Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 161 F.3d 11 (9th Cir. 1998); Crudo

General[151] requested and received extradition of the relator from Italy for an offense not listed in the treaty on the basis of comity. The United States, however, will not provide reciprocity in the absence of a treaty-listed offense included in the meaning of dual criminality.[152]

5. Dual Criminality and Complex Crimes

During the last twenty years, the United States has enacted criminal legislation that does not have a counterpart in any foreign legal system, such as RICO[153] and CCE.[154] Because these statutes have no foreign counterpart, when the United States is the requesting state the issue arises as to whether dual criminality exists. A consequence of this problem may spill over into the principle of specialty,[155] where extradition may have been granted on the basis of the requested state's understanding of the charge, which may in fact differ from the actual offense for which the relator is prosecuted or convicted in the United States. The traditional rule of looking at the underlying facts and the general nature of the charge as the basis of dual criminality may not prove helpful in cases involving RICO, CCE, or Securities and Exchange Commission[156] violations. A foreign court may therefore have the option of granting extradition for an offense known to its system and that it would deem to be included within the meaning of such offenses as RICO or CCE. In that case, the United States could only prosecute the relator for the particular offense for which the extradition request was made and granted, which will be determined on the basis of the extradition order if it contains such specificity. Otherwise, a U.S. court would have to compare the extradition request and the extradition order to determine the exact nature of the charges for which the relator was extradited and for which he/she can be prosecuted.

Another option for the requested state seeking to determine dual criminality for complex crimes is to identify the multiple elements of the offense, and determine whether some elements correspond to the same or a similar offense under the laws of that state, even though the complex offense does not exist in the requested state's legal system. The issue that remains, however, is whether the extradition would be granted exclusively for the lesser included offense or for the complex offense.

RICO and CCE are, for all practical purposes, the aggregation of more traditional crimes and are intended to increase the penalties, as well as to facilitate prosecution and conviction. Other crimes arising out of administrative regulations, such as CTR,[157] are frequently a predicate for RICO and may complement CCE, as well as deal with the problem of money laundering. However, most countries do not have similar crimes. The problem thus arises as to whether v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); Clarey v. Gregg, 183 F.3d 764 (9th Cir. 1998).

---

151 Fiocconi v. Attorney General, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972). See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998); Spatola v. United States, 741 F. Supp. 362 (E.D.N.Y 1990), aff'd, 925 F.2d 615 (2d Cir. 1991); Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); Bozilov v. Seifert, 983 F.2d 140 (9th Cir. 1993), amending, 967 F.2d 353 (9th Cir. 1992); United States v. Levy, 25 F.3d 146 (2d Cir. 1994); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 WL 1036074 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000).

152 United States v. Orsini, 424 F. Supp. 229 (D.C.N.Y. 1976), aff'd, 559 F.2d 1206 (2d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 997 (1977). See 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 59, at 443–446.

153 Racketeer-Influenced and Corrupt Organizations, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961–1968 (2000).

154 Continuing Criminal Enterprise, 21 U.S.C. § 848(b) (2000).

155 See infra Sec. 6.

156 Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. §§ 78 et seq. (2000).

157 Reports on Domestic Coins and Currency Transaction, 31 U.S.C. § 5313 et seq. (2000). See particularly §§ 5324(1), 5324(2) (filing false CTR's), and 5324(3) (structuring transactions to evade reporting requirements). For money laundering, see 18 U.S.C. §§ 1952, 1956, 1957 (2000).

these complex crimes and other administrative-like crimes designed to complement other complex crimes can be deemed extraditable offenses in other countries if these specific offenses do not exist in the requested state. Where extradition had been granted for these offenses, the approach has essentially been to consider the components of such crimes as RICO and CCE as the equivalent of those offenses contained in the criminal laws of the requested states. In other words, if the entire loaf has no counterpart, the slicing of the loaf produces pieces that may have a counterpart. But in some cases, the problem also arises when the entire loaf, such as in RICO, involves predicate acts that are not extraditable. For example, some countries such as Austria, Switzerland, and Hungary do not have the equivalent crime of failure to report transportation of cash in excess of $10,000, which the United States requires by CTRs. Thus, a request by the United States based on a RICO charge whose predicate act is money laundering operations, but where the money laundering facts can only be established by CTR violations, presents a serious problem. These countries would not extradite for CTR violations, but would extradite for money laundering and eventually for RICO when the predicate acts include money laundering. But if money laundering can only be established through CTR, for which there is no dual criminality, then extradition may be denied. Alternatively, the extradition order can be granted subject to the preclusion of prosecution for CTR violations. In these cases, the prosecution may attempt to circumvent this hurdle by seeking to introduce evidence of CTR violations while excluding the charge from going to the jury, thus admitting through the back door evidence of a crime that is specifically prohibited from admission through the front door. Thus far, this issue has not been fully resolved in the United States.[158]

Some of these issues arose in Sudar v. United States,[159] in which Canada granted the extradition of the relator on RICO charges. Sudar was charged with racketeering and conspiracy to racketeer involving interstate and foreign commerce based on predicate acts of murder, threats of murder, arson, and extortion. He argued dual criminality was lacking because the crimes of racketeering and conspiracy to racketeer are unknown in Canadian law.

The Ontario Supreme Court, affirming the judgment of the county court, held that the relator was extraditable. The court found the indictment in the United States charged an enterprise and a pattern of racketeering, the pattern being based on the predicate acts of murder, threats of murder, arson, and extortion. The court erroneously found that the U.S. Supreme Court equated "enterprise" with "conspiracy," though it did not identify the Supreme Court case in which this conclusion is reached.[160] In addition, the Court did not accept the argument that the substance of the charges against Sudar was the federal offense of racketeering, rather than the state offenses of murder, threats of murder, arson, and extortion. The court stated:

> [T]he only real substantive components of the indictment against Sudar for the purposes of extradition are the conspiracy (very loosely defined in United States law) and the activities of murder, threats to murder, etc. There is no doubt as to the criminality of these activities and of any conspiracy in relation thereto. They are recognized as such the world over.[161]

---

158 On evidentiary questions as being outside the scope of the rule of specialty, see United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510 (11th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Reed v. United States, 506 U.S. 924 (1992); United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1032 (1990); United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1012 (1989); United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987).

159 25 S.C.R.3d 183 (Can. 1981). For a criticism of the court's reasoning and conclusions in this case, see Steven A. Bernholz et al., International Extradition in Drug Cases, 10 Int'l L. & Comm'l Reg. 353, 361–364 (1985). See also Jonathan O. Hafen, Comment, International Extradition: Issues Arising under the Dual Criminality Requirement, 1992 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 191 (1992); Sharon A. Williams, The Double Criminality Rule and Extradition: A Comparative Analysis, 15 Nova L. Rev. 581 (1991).

160 25 S.C.R.3d at 186.

161 Id. at 187.

Thus, because conspiracy and the crimes of murder, threats of murder, arson and extortion are crimes under Canadian law, and because the extradition treaty required a liberal interpretation, the court held that the requirement of dual criminality had been met.[162]

The question raised by this decision is whether the extradition of Sudar was granted for the offenses of racketeering and conspiracy to racketeer, as indicated in the U.S. indictment and extradition request, or whether it was granted based on the crimes of conspiracy, murder, threats of murder, arson, and extortion, as the court's decision seems to indicate. If the answer is the latter, then prosecution of the relator under RICO would violate the principle of specialty.[163]

A similar issue arose in Riley and Butler v. Commonwealth,[164] in which the relators appealed a decision finding them extraditable for the offense of Continuing Criminal Enterprise under 21 U.S.C. § 848. The court noted that CCE contains five elements:

> 1. That the defendant violated certain provisions of the law, including those which make it an offense to knowingly, intentionally or unlawfully to possess marijuana or hashish with intent to distribute it, or knowingly, intentionally and unlawfully to cause marijuana or hashish to be imported into the United States;
>
> 2. That such violation was part of a continuing series of violations by the defendant of the federal narcotics laws of the United States;
>
> 3. That such series of violations was undertaken by the defendant in concert with five or more persons;
>
> 4. That the defendant occupied the position of organizer or any other position of management with respect to such five or more persons in the said undertaking; and
>
> 5. That the defendant obtained substantial income or resources from the continuing series of violations.[165]

The court first considered whether CCE was an extraditable offense under the Treaty on Extradition between Australia and the United States of 1976. In doing so, it concluded that the offense consists of two or more acts. In the case before it, one act of the relators was knowingly, intentionally, and unlawfully possessing marijuana or hashish with the intention to distribute it. The other was knowingly, intentionally, and unlawfully causing marijuana or hashish to be imported into the United States. The Extradition (Foreign States) Act of 1966 of Australia defined an extraditable offense in Section 4(1A) as:

> An offense against the law of, or a part of, a foreign state is an extradition crime for the purposes of this Act if, and only if, the act or omission constituting the offense or the equivalent act or omission, or, where the offense is constituted by two or more acts or omissions, any of those acts or omissions or any equivalent act or omission, would, if it took place in, or within the jurisdiction of, the part of Australia where the person accused or convicted of the offense is found, constitute an offense against the law in force in that part of Australia that—
>
> (a) is described in Schedule 1.[166]
>
> Schedule 1 contains a list of thirty-five offenses, including offenses relating to narcotics and dangerous drugs. The court found that importation of narcotics and possession of such substances

162 Id.

163 See infra Sec. 6.

164 260 A.L.R. 106 (1985) (Austl.); superseded by the Extradition Act of 1988 (amended by Act. No. 66 in 2002).

165 Id.

166 Id. at 107.

with intent to distribute were criminal acts in New South Wales, the state in which the relators were found. The court determined that the relevant inquiry was whether:

> [T]here had been produced before [the magistrate] such evidence as would in his opinion, according to the law in force in New South Wales, justify the trial of an accused person if the acts or omissions constituting the crime of continuing criminal enterprise had taken place in or within the jurisdiction of New South Wales and . . . that those acts or omissions would constitute a crime according to the law of New South Wales, whether or not in truth they would constitute a crime in New South Wales.[167]

The court concluded that CCE was an extraditable offense, even though the same offense did not exist under Australian law.[168]

The relators argued that interpreting the treaty in such a manner as to find CCE an extraditable offense violated the principle of dual criminality. The section at issue stated:

> Extradition shall also be granted for any other offenses that are made extraditable under the extradition laws of Australia and which are felonies under the laws of the United States of America.[169]

The argument raised by the relators was that the offense of continuing criminal enterprise was not an offense "made extraditable under the extradition laws of Australia." The court disagreed, stating:

> [B]ecause at least one act which formed an element of the offense of continuing criminal enterprise, or an equivalent act, would have constituted an offense against a law . . . if it had occurred in New South Wales, the offense itself is an extradition crime.[170]

The court interpreted both Section 4(1A) of the Extradition (Foreign States) Act 1966 and the relevant paragraph of the treaty (quoted above) to exclude the principle of dual criminality. The court concluded that the right and duty of extradition was created by the treaty, and not the principles of international law, and that therefore the lack of dual criminality was not a bar to extradition.[171]

In a 2009 narcotics CCE extradition case before the Third Circuit, the relator challenged his extradition, in part, by arguing that the offense of CCE did not exist in the United Kingdom.[172] In United States v. Thomas, the relator was extradited from the United Kingdom and subsequently tried and convicted for operating a CCE related to drug trafficking and money laundering in the United States.[173] After finding that the relator had standing to challenge his extradition on dual criminality and specialty grounds, the court analyzed the United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty and the Extradition Act of 2003.[174] The court presented the relevant extradition documents as follows:

> Under the rule of dual criminality, an extraditable offense must be punishable under the criminal laws of both the surrendering and the requesting state. See United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754, 766 (1st Cir. 1995). This principle is embodied in the U.S.–U.K [sic] Extradition Treaty as follows:

---

167 Id.

168 Id. at 108.

169 Id.

170 Id. at 109.

171 Id.

172 United States v. Thomas, 322 Fed. Appx. 177, 179 (3d Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion).

173 Id. at 178–179.

174 Id. at 180–181.

> Extradition shall be granted for an act or omission the facts of which disclose an offense within any of the descriptions listed in the Schedule annexed to this Treaty, which is an integral part of the Treaty, or any other offense, if: (a) the offense is punishable under the laws of both Parties by imprisonment or other form of detention for more than one year or by the death penalty; (b) the offense is extraditable under . . . the law of the United Kingdom . . . ; and (c) the offense constitutes a felony under the law of the United States of America.

U.S.–U.K. Extradition Treaty, art. III(1) (emphasis added).

The Schedule includes "[a]n offense against the law relating to narcotic drugs" including marijuana. Id. Further, in the United Kingdom conduct constitutes an "extradition offense" if > (a) the conduct occurs in [the United States]; (b) the conduct would constitute an offence under the law of the relevant part of the United Kingdom punishable with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 12 months or a greater punishment if it occurred in that part of the United Kingdom; (c) the conduct is so punishable under the law of the [the [sic] United States] (however it is described in that law).

Extradition Act, 2003, c. 41, § 137 (U.K.) (emphasis added).[175]

The court reasoned that this language only required that the conduct be subject to serious criminal sanctions in both countries, without any further requirement as to how or why the particular conduct is sanctioned.[176] The court further reasoned that the CCE charge involved illicit funds derived from the direction of a large marijuana distributing organization over five years, which was an offense in the United Kingdom punishable with imprisonment for more than twelve months, making any inquiry into other U.S. offenses irrelevant.[177] Thus, the court held that the relator's prosecution for operating a CCE did not violate dual criminality.[178]

A similar issue arose in the United Kingdom in Government of Denmark v. Nielsen.[179] In Nielsen, the relator was charged in Denmark with fraudulently abusing his position as a controlling shareholder of a company of which he was also a director, for which offense Denmark sought his extradition from the United Kingdom. The magistrate who initially heard the case discharged the relator because, after hearing expert evidence regarding the Danish law in question, found the Danish offense to be narrower than the English offenses specified in the Secretary of State's order to proceed. The Divisional Court quashed the discharge, and the relator appealed to the House of Lords.

In a lengthy opinion, Lord Diplock considered the language of the relevant extradition treaty to be determinative:

> Whether in an accusation case the police magistrate has any jurisdiction to make findings as to the substantive criminal law of the foreign state by which the requisition for surrender of a fugitive criminal is made will depend on the terms of the arrangement made in the extradition treaty with that state. Some treaties may contain provisions that limit surrender to persons accused of conduct that constitutes a crime of a particular kind (for example, one that attracts specified minimum penalties) in both England and the foreign state. Accusation cases arising under extradition treaties that contain this kind of limitation I shall call "exceptional accusation cases." In an

175 Id.

176 Id. at 181.

177 Id.

178 Id.

179 [1984] 2 All E.R. 81 (Eng.).

> exceptional accusation case it will be necessary for the police magistrate to hear expert evidence of the substantive criminal law of that foreign state and make his own findings of fact about it.[180]

The magistrate's error had been to consider evidence of the substantive law of Denmark in determining whether the principle of dual criminality had been satisfied. Lord Diplock concluded that the magistrate's inquiry should be much narrower:

> At the hearing . . . the magistrate must first be satisfied that a foreign warrant . . . has been issued for the accused person's arrest and is duly authenticated . . . . Except where there is a claim that the arrest was for a political offence or the case is an exceptional accusation case, the magistrate is not concerned with what provision of foreign criminal law (if any) is stated in the warrant to be the offence which the person was suspected of having committed and in respect of which his arrest was ordered by the foreign state.
>
> The magistrate must then hear such evidence . . . as may be produced on behalf of the requisitioning foreign government, and by the accused if he wishes to do so; and at the conclusion of the evidence the magistrate must decide whether such evidence would, according to the law of England, justify the committal for trial of the accused for an offence . . . In making this decision it is English law alone that is relevant. The requirement that he shall make it does not give him any jurisdiction to inquire into or receive evidence of the substantive criminal law of the foreign state in which the conduct was in fact committed.[181]

In U.S. Government v. McCaffery,[182] in which the United States sought the extradition of the relator for federal offenses consisting of wire fraud and interstate transportation of stolen securities, the House of Lords overturned the discharge of the relator, holding that the decision in Nielsen was determinative in this case.

In complex litigation involving economic crimes, the United States may rely on a variety of statutes that regulate economic matters, which may not be deemed extraditable under some treaties. This occurred in the Marc Rich extradition case,[183] in which the United States sought the extradition of Marc Rich from Switzerland for violations of regulations concerning oil and gas pricing as well as mail and wire fraud. Switzerland denied extradition. Although mail fraud could have the characteristics of common law fraud, whose counterpart exists in almost every legal system in the world, the use of the mails in connection with a scheme designed to violate economic regulations may not necessarily be viewed as equivalent to the common crime of fraud, which in many legal systems is directed against private interests, or involves the taking of something belonging to a public entity. Such economic crimes as were involved here would, however, constitute criminal fraud in most legal systems of the world. As a result, as the treaty between the United States and Switzerland does not include violations of economic regulations, and Switzerland in general does not extradite for such offenses (or for currency, tax, or customs violations, except in very narrow circumstances), the principle charge against Marc Rich was deemed non-extraditable, and the use of the mail was deemed derivative of the economic regulation, rather than a criminal fraud in its common meaning under Swiss criminal law.

Complex crimes also raise significant questions with respect to the principle of specialty, which is discussed below.

As stated above in Section 2, there exists an intricate relationship between dual criminality, extraditable offenses, and specialty—particularly with respect to complex economic (financial)

---

180 Id. at 89.

181 Id. at 91.

182 [1984] 2 All E.R. 570 (Eng.).

183 The unpublished administrative decision in this case is on file at the Federal Ministry of Justice and Police, Berne, Switzerland. This writer served as counsel in the Swiss extradition proceedings.

crimes. One reason is that the United States has made criminal many manifestations of what would logically be the same crime, and created new criminal labels for the same criminal transaction in order to enhance penalties. Thus, a fraudulent scheme can give rise to multiple crimes other than the underlying fraud. This could include mail fraud, tax violations of many types, and others. What does the foreign requested state look at? The overall criminal transaction, or each separate charge? In what way does the foreign requested state look at the ultimate penalty that artificially aggravates the penalty of the original criminal fraud by adding these different crimes that are really components of the fraud? Most foreign requested states are not familiar with these intricate aspects of U.S. criminal prosecutions, and more particularly the sentencing implications of such multiple charges, even when they are excluded from the indictment for purposes of a conviction but retained for other purposes.

6. The Principle of Specialty (also referred to as the Rule of Specialty)

6.1. Nature of the Principle

This principle, which is also alternatively referred to as a rule or doctrine, stands for the proposition that the requesting state, after securing the surrender of a person, can only prosecute and punish that person for the offense or offenses for which he/she was surrendered by the requested state, and must conform its penalties to any limitations established by the surrendering state.[184] If the requesting state wishes to depart from these limitations, it must obtain the consent of the surrendering state before proceeding on other charges, and before imposing or carrying out a sentence that varies from any limitations set by the surrendering state.[185] In all cases, the requesting state must abide by the assurances it has given to the surrendering state as part of the extradition. Otherwise, the requesting state must return the individual to the surrendering state.[186]

The origin of the term "specialty" is in the French word specialité, which means particularity, but the general usage of specialité throughout Europe and other countries of the world gave rise to its transposition in the United States to the term "specialty" or "speciality." The French term is clear and unambiguous; in fact, it partakes of both the English words "particularity" and "specialty" to connote specificity. Specialty is frequently referred to as a principle because it is so broadly recognized in international law and practice that it has become a rule of CIL. As such, it is binding upon the United States. The United States, however, also recognizes and applies this principle, through its national legislation, treaty practice, and jurisprudence. Indeed, most extradition treaties contain a provision on specialty. Title 18 U.S.C. § 3186 states:

> The Secretary of State may order the person committed under Sections 3184 [Fugitives from foreign country to United States] and 3185 [Fugitives from country under control of United 184 For cases citing this summation of the rule of specialty, see Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298, 1305–1306 (11th Cir. 2000); United States v. Gallo-Chamorro, 48 F.3d 502, 507 (11th Cir. 1995); United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463, 1465 (11th Cir. 1988); R. v. Truong, 2002 V.S.C.A. 27. For a case referencing this as the primary recent treatise in the area, see United States v. De La Pava, 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 1912 (N.D. Ill. 1993).

185 For a case discussing this point, see Benitez v. Garcia, 419 F. Supp. 2d 1234 (D. Cal. 2004).

186 The question of where a relator is allowed to leave at will is not well-established. As a general rule, he/she is entitled to return to the state from which he/she was originally extradited or to his/her country of origin. But the question arises as to whether he/she is entitled to choose to go to any other country, or whether the prosecuting state can force him/her to depart to a country which is not of his/her choice. Frequently, a state will use its immigration laws to achieve such a result, which is inimical to the relator's interest. See Ch. IV (Disguised Extradition).

> States into the United States] of this title to be delivered to any authorized agent of such foreign government, to be tried for the offense of which charged.
>
> Such agent may hold such person in custody, and take him to the territory of such foreign government, pursuant to such treaty.
>
> A person so accused who escapes may be retaken in the same manner as any person accused of any offense.[187]

Some examples of treaty language follow.

The United States-Italy Extradition Treaty states:

> 1. A person extradited under this Treaty may not be detained, tried or punished in the Requesting Party except for:
>
> (a) the offense for which extradition has been granted or when the same facts for which extradition was granted constitute a differently denominated offense which is extraditable;
>
> (b) an offense committed after the surrender of the person; or
>
> (c) an offense for which the Executive Authority of the United States or the competent authorities of Italy consent to the person's detention, trial or punishment. For the purpose of this subparagraph, the Requested Party may require the submission of the documents called for in Article X.
>
> 2. A person extradited under this Treaty may not be extradited to a third State unless the surrendering Party consents.
>
> 3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article shall not prevent the detention, trial or punishment of an extradited person in accordance with the laws of the Requesting Party, or the extradition of that person to a third State, if:
>
> (a) that person leaves the territory of the Requesting Party after extradition and voluntarily returns to it; or
>
> (b) that person does not leave the territory of the Requesting Party within 30 days of the day on which that person is free to leave.[188]

The United States–Germany Extradition Treaty states:

> (1) A person who has been extradited under this Treaty shall not be proceeded against, sentenced or detained with a view to carrying out a sentence or detention order for any offense committed prior to his surrender other than that for which he was extradited, nor shall he be for any other reason restricted in his personal freedom, except in the following cases:
>
> (a) When the State which extradited him consents thereto. A request for consent shall be submitted, accompanied by the documents mentioned in Article 14 and a record established by a judge or competent officer of the statement made by the extradited person in respect of the request for consent. If under the law of the Requesting State the issuance of a warrant of arrest for the offense for which extradition is sought is not possible, the request may instead be accompanied by a statement issued by a judge or competent officer establishing that the person sought is strongly suspected of having committed the offense.
>
> (b) When such person, having had the opportunity to leave the territory of the State to which he has been surrendered, has not done so within 45 days of his final discharge or has returned to that territory after leaving it. A discharge under parole or probation without an order restricting the freedom of movement of the extradited person shall be deemed equivalent to a final discharge.

---

187 18 U.S.C. § 3186 (2000).

188 U.S.–Italy Oct. 13, 1983, art. XVI; T.I.A.S. No. 10837 (entered into force Sept. 24, 1984).

(2) The State to which the person has been extradited may, however, take any legal measures necessary under its law, in order to proceed in absentia, to interrupt any lapse of time or to record a statement under paragraph (1)(a).

(3) If the offense for which the person sought was extradited is legally altered in the course of proceedings, he shall be prosecuted or sentenced provided the offense under its new legal description is:

(a) Based on the same set of facts contained in the extradition request and its supporting documents; and,

(b) Punishable by the same maximum penalty as, or a lesser maximum penalty then, the offense for which he was extradited.[189]

The United States–Mexico Extradition Treaty states:

1. A person extradited under the present Treaty shall not be detained, tried or punished in the territory of the requesting Party for an offense other than that for which extradition had been granted nor be extradited by that Party to a third State unless:

(a) he has left the territory of the requesting Party after his extradition and has voluntarily returned to it;

(b) he has not left the territory of the requesting Party within 60 days after being free to do so; or

(c) the requested Party has given its consent to his detention, trial, punishment or extradition to a third State for an offense other than that for which the extradition was granted.

2. If, in the course of the procedure, the classification or the offense is changed for which the person requested was extradited, he shall be tried and sentenced on the condition that the offense, in its new legal form:

(a) is based on the same group of facts established in the documents presented in its support; and

(b) is punishable with the same maximum sentence as the crime for which he was extradited or with a lesser sentence.[190]

Another representative treaty is the United States–Jamaica Extradition Treaty, which states in Article XIV:

(1) A person extradited under this Treaty may only be detained, tried or punished in the Requesting State for the offence for which extradition is granted, or (a) for a lesser offence proved by the facts before the court of committal . . . (b) for an offence committed after the extradition; or (c) for an offence in respect to which the executive authority of the Requested State . . . consents to the person's detention, trial or punishment . . . or (d) if the person (i) having left the territory of the Requesting State after his extradition, voluntarily returns to it; or (ii) being free to leave the territory of the Requesting State after his extradition, does not so leave within forty-five (45) days . . . . (2) A person extradited under this Treaty may not be extradited to a third State unless (a) the Requested State consents; or (b) the circumstances are such that he could have been dealt with in the Requesting State pursuant to sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph (1).[191]

---

189 June 20, 1978, U.S.–F.R.G., art. 22; 32 U.S.T. 1485 (entered into force Aug. 29, 1980), Supplementary Treaty, KAV 705 (Mar. 11, 1993).

190 May 4, 1978, U.S.–Mex., art. 17, 31 U.S.T. 5059 (entered into force Jan. 25, 1980), Protocol (entered into force May 21, 2001) TIAS 12897, Sen. Doc. No. 105-46. For a case discussing the requirements under Article 17, see In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 9573, at *28–*30 (S.D. Cal. 2008).

191 U.S.–Jamaican Extradition treaty, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. Treaty Doc. 98-18, KAV 1026. See also Extradition Treaty with Belize, art. 14, entered into force Mar. 27, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-38; Polish Extradition Treaty, art. 19, entered into force Sept. 17, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-14;

The rationale for the principle of specialty rests on the following factors, which bear on the requesting and requested states:

1. the requested state could have refused extradition if it had known that the relator would be prosecuted or punished for an offense other than the one for which extradition was granted;

2. the requesting state would not have had in personam jurisdiction over the relator if not for the requested state's surrender of that person;[192]

3. the requesting state would be abusing the formal processes of the requested state in securing the surrender of the person for reasons other than those disclosed in the extradition request;

4. the requested state used its processes in reliance upon the representations made by the requesting state, and accordingly is entitled to the observance of these representations; and

5. the relator is entitled to be tried for the crime or crimes for which he was extradited, and thus to be free from prosecutorial abuse once he is within the jurisdictional control of a requested state.

The principle of specialty is designed to ensure against a requesting state's breach of trust to a requested state and to avoid prosecutorial abuse against the relator after the requested state obtained in personam jurisdiction over the relator.[193] It is a principle essentially designed to insure the integrity of the requesting and requested state processes. Thus, the surrendering state can waive specialty or allow prosecution for offenses other than those for which the relator was extradited, subject to any limitation that the surrendering state may include in the waiver (e.g., a limitation on the charge or sentence).[194] In addition, whether by treaty, national legislation, or international custom, specialty is a right that also inures to the benefit of the relator. For this reason, the relator can waive the right and consent to his/her prosecution for crimes other than those for which he/she was extradited. Consequently, the relator is entitled to raise the issue irrespective of whether the requested state protests the violation of the principle to the Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 13, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 17, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 14, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. XII, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 14, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 16, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 16, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XVI, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023.

---

192 For a case citing to this factor, see United States v. Anderson, 472 F.3d 662, 668 (9th Cir. 2006).

193 In Kuhn v. Staatsanwaltschaft des Kantons Zurich, 34 I.L.R. 132, 133 (Fed. Tribunal 1961) (Switz.), it was held that:

> The principle is designed to safeguard the rights of the extraditing State. This requires the restriction of the rights of the requesting State to the extent to which they would be restricted if extradition had not taken place.

See also Re Albrand, 51 I.L.R. 269 (Cass. 1969) (Fr.) (holding that the specialty principle does not apply to an offense committed after extradition); cf. Re Trillard, 48 I.L.R. 187 (Trib. gr. inst. de Nevers 1967) (Fr.) (holding that the specialty principle applied only insofar as restricting the case before the court of the requesting state to the facts on which the decision of the requested state was made, and did not preclude the judicial authorities of the requesting state from giving these facts the legal characterization called for under the law of the requesting state); Dutch-German Extradition Case, 44 I.L.R. 174 (BGH 1965) (F.R.G.).

194 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3 (ne bis in idem).

requesting state.[195] It is, however, essentially the requested state's right, and it can therefore waive it even if the relator does not agree.

The seminal case on the principle of specialty is United States v. Rauscher, where the U.S. Supreme Court held that a defendant has standing to challenge treaty violations.[196] Notwithstanding Rauscher,[197] some circuits (as discussed below in Section 6.4), have expressed different understandings of the principle with respect to the relator's standing to raise the issue without some form of protest by the surrendering state.

In Rauscher, the Supreme Court held that a defendant in the United States who was extradited from a foreign country could only be tried for the offense for which he had been extradited. The Supreme Court stated that the extradited defendant "shall be tried only for the offence with which he is charged in the extradition proceedings and for which he was delivered up, and that if not tried for that, or after trial and acquittal, he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country…"[198] Rauscher expressly rejected the proposition that a defendant within the jurisdiction of the United States, "no matter by what contrivance of fraud or by what pretence of establishing a charge provided for by the extradition treaty he may have been brought within the jurisdiction, he is, when here, liable to be tried for any offence against the laws as though arrested here originally."[199]

The Supreme Court unequivocally stated the positive aspect of the principle that a person can only be tried for the offense for which he was delivered and after the completion of the sentence, if convicted, "he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country."[200] The Court also went on to posit what cannot be done, namely that such a person brought to the United States pursuant to an extradition treaty cannot be deemed within the jurisdiction of the United States

---

195 See infra Sec. 7.4.

196 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (18986). For circuit decisions, see inter alia, United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567, 1571–1576 (11th Cir. 1995), United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510, 1520 (11th Cir. 1992), cert. denied subnom., Reed v. United States, 113 S. Ct. 347 (1992); United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463, 1466 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1027 (1989); United States v. Kaufman, 858 F.2d 994, 1006–1009 (5th Cir. 1988), reh'g den'd, 874 F.2d 242 (1989); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 787 (9th Cir. 1986); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980); Gallanis v. Pollanck, 568 F.2d 234, 238 (2d Cir. 1977); United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Chen, 161 F.3d 11 (9th Cir. 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); United States v. Cuevos, 847 F.2d 1417, 1426 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1122 (1989); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986). The Supreme Court reaffirmed its position in a rarely cited case, Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 310 (1907). The relator, who was extradited from Canada, objected to being prosecuted for charges other than those for which he was extradited. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant's position. No protest was required. See also United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); United States v. Bakhtiar, 964 F. Supp. 112 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). All other relevant cases are cited below in this section.

197 Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 407.

198 Id. at 424 (emphasis added).

199 Id. at 422 (emphasis added). See Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 851 (1st Cir. 1980) ("provides that a fugitive may not be tried by the requesting county for any offenses other than those for which extradition was granted"). See also United States v. Sorren, 605 F.2d 1211 (1st Cir. 1979). The Second Circuit in United States v. Levy held that specialty "is a jurisdictional limitation restricting a court's power to enter judgment against the defendant." 947 F.2d 1032, 1034 (2d Cir. 1991). The court in this case went on to say what is the flip side of most specialty arguments: that "the doctrine of specialty does not guarantee a right not to be tried, but rather a right to be protected from a court's authority." Id. at 1034 (emphasis added).

200 Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 424.

without any limitations with respect to the basis upon which he was surrendered.[201] This position has been consistently upheld.[202]

The position of the United States since Rauscher is best expressed in Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States.[203] The Second Circuit saw the strict observance of the principle of specialty as part of the foreign relations rules of the United States, which embody CIL.[204] The principle of specialty is not left to the whim of states, but is subject to customary rules of international law, which also embody the international protection of certain human rights.[205] But unlike Rauscher, Fiocconi did not recognize the relator's standing to raise the issue of specialty if it had been waived by the surrendering state.[206]

Not all circuits have followed Rauscher and Fiocconi, however. There is some division among U.S. federal circuits regarding whether the principle of specialty can be considered a rule of CIL. The current split in authority among circuit courts when applying the principle of specialty makes it difficult to conclude outright that the principle of specialty is a part of CIL. Cases before the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits attempt to bind the principle of specialty to the existence of an extradition treaty, as discussed below. But these holdings do not foreclose arguments for treating the principle of specialty as CIL. Rather, the Ninth Circuit's decision to give deference to the expectations of the extraditing country in the absence of an explicit assurance, and the Eleventh Circuit's decision to impose a bright-line rule and thus become an outlier in rule-of-specialty jurisprudence, illustrate that the debate over whether to treat the principle of specialty as CIL continues.

The Second Circuit, in Fiocconi v. Attorney General,[207] and the Fifth Circuit, in United States v. Kaufman,[208] both treated the principle of specialty as a part of international law. Conversely, two court cases in 2007 and 2009 emphasized the connection between the principle of specialty and treaties. In Benitez v. Garcia, the Ninth Circuit stressed that it "was wary . . . of 201 Id. at 427, except with respect to unlawful seizures after Alvarez-Machain. See also Ch. V.

202 Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511 (1916); Collins v. O'Neil, 214 U.S. 113 (1909); Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 309 (1907); United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); United States v. Bakhtiar, 964 F. Supp. 112 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); Cosgrove v. Whinney, 174 U.S. 64 (1899). See also Cook v. United States, 288 U.S. 102 (1933); United States v. Verdugo-Urquidz, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991), vacated, 505 U.S.1201 (1992); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); United States v. Kaufman, 858 F.2d 994 (5th Cir. 1988); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973); Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972). See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998). Both Shapiro and Fiocconi were cases involving extradition on the basis of a treaty, but for prosecutions of an offense not contained in the treaty, and for which prosecution was conceded by the requested state on the basis of comity.

203 Fiocconi v. Attorney. General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972). See also United States ex. rel. Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165, 168 (3d Cir. 1997).

204 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 479. See also Kenneth E. Levitt, International Extradition, The Principle of Specialty and Effective Treaty Enforcement, 76 Minn. Law Rev. 1017 (1992); Jonathon George, Toward a More Principled Approach to the Principle of Specialty, 12 Cornell Int'l Law J. 309 (1979).

205 See United States v. Fowlie, 24 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 1994); United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1993); but see Welsh & Thrasher v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept., 2006 E.W.H.C. 156 (Admin) Feb. 21, 2006 (U.K.) The Queen's Bench held that (1) the application of specialty in the United States was affected by the known view of the sending state, (2) there were no UK authorities suggesting that specialty was breached when the U.S. courts permitted extradition to be proved by evidence relating to offenses on which extradition had been refused, and (3) the effect of the specialty section of the 2003 Extradition Act (UK) was to prohibit extradition when the conditions were not met.

206 See infra Sec. 7.5. See also United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d 424, 428 (9th Cir. 1987); United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 814 F.2d 1329, 1334 (9th Cir. 1987).

207 462 F.2d 475, 479–480 (2d Cir. 1972).

208 858 F.2d 994, 1007 (5th Cir. 1988).

enforcing extradition conditions that are neither expressly agreed to by both countries nor contemplated by the relevant extradition treaty," and instead looked to treaties and assurances to apply the principle of specialty.[209] But the Benitez court did reverse the denial of the defendant's habeas corpus petition, giving deference to a condition in the extradition decree that the defendant not receive a life sentence. Additionally, the Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Valencia-Trujillo held that "the rule of specialty is treaty-based."[210] The Eleventh Circuit focused on Rauscher's emphasis on the importance of treaties as laws of the land and noted that the principle of specialty is but a provision of the treaty.[211]

To qualify as CIL, the principle of specialty "must be shown to result from (1) 'a general and consistent practice of states' that is (2) 'followed by them from a sense of legal obligation.' "[212] The Benitez and Valencia-Trujillo decisions highlight the split among circuit courts and the debate over whether the principle of specialty is considered a part of CIL in accordance with U.S. jurisprudence. An analysis of these two cases illustrates that the courts' reasoning in the cases does not foreclose the argument that the principle of specialty has its roots independent of a treaty or an assurance.

As noted above, the Ninth Circuit court in Benitez expressed reluctance to enforce extradition conditions not expressly agreed to or contemplated by contracting parties to an extradition agreement. In Benitez, the Venezuelan extradition decree specified that the defendant not be sentenced to life in prison or incarcerated for more than thirty years, but the defendant was sentenced to fifteen years to life.[213] Moreover, in accordance with the extradition decree, the U.S. State Department sent a letter to the district attorney's office recommending that a life sentence not be imposed.[214] Additionally, the United States–Venezuela extradition treaty provides that assurances may be made that punishments will not involve the death penalty or imprisonment for life. Venezuela, however, did not obtain an assurance from the United States that a life sentence would not be imposed.[215] The Ninth Circuit did not enforce the thirty-year incarceration limit requested in the decree because United States and Venezuela did not agree to this limitation, but the court did enforce the life imprisonment restriction specified in the decree. In finding that the defendant's sentence violated the extradition order, the court looked at the extradition treaty, the extradition decree, the expectations of Venezuela, and the role of the executive branch.[216]

With regards to the limitation on life imprisonment, the Benitez court treated both the treaty and decree as established federal law, and emphasized the request in the extradition decree that the defendant not receive a life sentence.[217] The Ninth Circuit stressed, largely on the basis of the holding in Rauscher, that courts should give deference to the expectations of the extraditing country. As the court noted, "the purpose of the treaty, and the respect due our longstanding extradition relationship with Venezuela call for such an interpretation."[218]

---

209 476 F.3d 676, 682 (9th Cir. 2007).

210 573 F.3d 1171, 1179–1180 (11th Cir. 2009).

211 Id.

212 Recent Case, Eleventh Circuit Holds That "Rule of Specialty" Applies Only When Provided by Treaty: United States v. Valencia-Trujillo, 123 Harv. L. Rev. 572, 578 (2009) [hereinafter Recent Case].

213 Benitez v. Garcia, 476 F.3d 676, 679 (9th Cir. 2007) (opinion withdrawn by the court).

214 Id.

215 Id. at 679, 682.

216 See Barbara Merry Boudreaux, Benitez v. Garcia: An Extradition Arrangement Lost in Translation, 15 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 661, 673 (2007).

217 Benitez, 476 F.3d at 682.

218 Id.

Therefore, the issue is whether the Ninth Circuit's deference to Venezuela's expectations, as expressed in the extradition decree, reflects an implicit acknowledgment of a legal obligation such that the case's holding can be read as applying a form of CIL. Despite the lack of assurances about limitations on the life sentence, the Ninth Circuit stretched its reasoning to accommodate Venezuela's expectations by giving equal footing to the extradition treaty and the extraction decree—even though the status of decrees as federal law is unknown.[219] In its original opinion, prior to being revised, the circuit court noted that it did not need to consider whether to extend the principle of specialty because there was a treaty and the defendant was charged with a crime for which Venezuela agreed to extradite him.[220] Thus, the court likely felt safe in giving strong deference to the extradition decree because of the existence of the treaty. But the court's reasoning raises questions about whether the court acted out of a deeper sense of "obligation" in order to enforce Venezuela's expectations.

The holding of the Eleventh Circuit in Valencia-Trujillo that a defendant who is not extradited pursuant to a treaty lacks standing to assert a rule-of-specialty claim was applauded by scholars who argue that the principle of specialty is not a part of CIL.[221] Arguments posited for not treating the principle of specialty as CIL focus on the limited application of Rauscher to cases where there is an extradition treaty and the lack of legal duty or right to extradition.[222] The Valencia-Trujillo court also looked to the U.S. Supreme Court case Medellin v. Texas, in finding that treaties generally do not create private rights of actions.[223]

The Valencia-Trujillo court enunciated several bright-line rules, namely that "[b]ecause extradition agreements are not treaties, they do not become part of the law of this country," and that "[t]he rule of specialty applies only to extraditions pursuant to treaty."[224] But it is these bright-line rules that set the Valencia-Trujillo case apart from other extradition cases. Notably, "[i]n holding that the rule of specialty only applies to extraditions pursuant to a treaty, the Eleventh Circuit was the first circuit court to create such a bright-line rule."[225] Interestingly, in an earlier case, the Eleventh Circuit held that the principle of specialty is based on international comity and applied the principle despite the absence of a valid treaty with the extraditing country.[226]

There are concerns arising out of the Valencia-Trujillo court's decision to limit standing absent reference to an extradition treaty in an extradition order. Courts may interfere with the authority of the executive branch in conducting foreign relations. The holding potentially allows courts "to disregard the intentions of the respective executive bodies and themselves choose which rights extradited individuals can assert."[227]

Thus, despite its efforts to create a bright-line rule and not treat the principle of specialty as CIL, the restrictive position taken by the Valencia-Trujillo court may not be well received by other circuits, which have typically applied a case-by-case approach.[228] Therefore, the holding may actually promote the argument that the principle of specialty has a greater place in 219 See Boudreaux, supra note 216, at 673–674.

---

220 Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971, 976 (9th Cir. 2006).

221 United States v. Valencia-Trujillo, 573 F.3d 1171, 1181 (11th Cir. 2009). See Recent Case, supra note 212, at 577–578; Mark A. Summers, Rereading Rauscher: Is It Time for the United States to Abandon the Rule of Specialty? 48 Duq. L. Rev. 1, 25 (2010).

222 See Recent Case, supra note 212, at 578–579; Summers, supra note 221, at 27–28.

223 Valencia-Trujillo, 573 F.3d at 1181, citing Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008)

224 Id. at 1179–1180.

225 Amie Cafarelli, Case Comment: Extradition Law, 33 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 377, 387 (2010).

226 See Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298, 1302, 1305 (11th Cir. 2000).

227 Cafarelli, supra note 225, at 387.

228 Id. at 383.

international law, and cannot be so easily dismissed by courts to the detriment of other government branches.

Although the holdings of Benitez and Valencia-Trujillo stress a connection between the principle of specialty and the existence of an extradition treaty, these decisions are unlikely to be the final word on whether the principle of specialty is a part of CIL. The reasoning of the Benitez court is far from a straightforward application of the principle of specialty as merely a provision of a treaty. Rather, the Benitez court primarily focused on the extraditing country's expectations, and thus it can be argued that the court was acting out of a sense of legal obligation to enforce the extradition decree. Likewise, the Valencia-Trujillo court crafted a bright-line rule that attempted to discard the idea of the principle of specialty as CIL. But conflicting circuit court holdings, as well as the Eleventh Circuit's prior acknowledgment that the principle of specialty stems from international comity, could result in the case being treated as an outlier. However, because of conflicting court decisions, it is unclear whether the principle of specialty is part of CIL, and the discussion is not yet finished despite the holdings of Benitez and Valencia-Trujillo.[229]

In short, the principle of specialty is a form of preclusion of prosecution for any offense other than the one for which the relator was extradited, without the express approval of the surrendering state or a waiver by the relator. Prosecution is also subject to limitations established by the requested state and which are binding on the requesting state. Thus, the extradition order can contain limitations, for example, as to sentence or other questions of law. In these cases, the requesting state is limited not only by the treaty, but also by the limitation contained in the extradition order. In that case the law of the surrendering state will apply concerning the interpretation of any such limitation.

Although there are no cases in the United States on the issue of standing[230] that distinguish between objections raised on the basis of a treaty and objections raised on the basis of limiting language in the extradition order, it would seem that limiting language in an extradition order can be raised by the relator at any stage of prosecution in the requested state irrespective of the need for any action by the surrendering state. Issues involving the principle of specialty, because they are questions of law, are reviewable de novo by the court of appeals.[231]

6.2. The Substantive Contents of the Principle of Specialty

In general, the requesting state can prosecute the surrendered individual for all lesser offenses included in the offense charged that are based on the same facts for which she was extradited, provided, however, that the lesser-included offense satisfies the requirement of "dual criminality"[232] and that the surrendering state did not reserve against it in the extradition order. In the latter case, there would be a clear limitation set under the terms of the extradition order, and the principle of specialty controls subsequent prosecution. A question not yet resolved in U.S. jurisprudence then arises: can a relator be prosecuted in the requesting state when the facts upon which extradition was granted were also the basis of prosecution in the surrendering state, but for only some of the charges for which the requesting state sought to prosecute the relator? The answer is contingent upon the following factors: if the prosecuting (requesting) state has a limitation on ne bis in idem (equivalent to, though broader than, "double jeopardy" in the United States) then the prosecuting state cannot prosecute the relator for substantially the same crime based on the same facts. If the prosecuting state does not have such a limitation, but the surrendering state does, then it depends on whether the extradition order specifically states, as part of the specialty limitation, that the relator cannot be prosecuted for a crime

229 For a state supreme court decision discussing specialty and CIL, see Washington v. Shaw Pang, 940 P.2d 1293, 1330 (Wash. 1997).

230 See infra Sec. 7.4.

231 See Ch. XI (Habeas Appeals).

232 See Ch. VII.

which he was already prosecuted for in the surrendering state; and if the extradition order is silent on the question, the relator can then raise the issue before the competent authorities of the surrendering state and request a ruling to be communicated by that state to the prosecuting state. The relator, as a defendant in the prosecuting state, can also raise the issue before the courts of that state as part of a specialty objection.

A prosecuting state can seek, by means of a supplemental extradition request, either a waiver of specialty or a variance. Any unauthorized prosecution at variance with the limitations mentioned above will be deemed a violation of the principle of specialty.[233] But if the prosecution is for a different offense, and provided that it does not violate the principle of specialty, the prosecution can introduce evidence that would be otherwise barred from use in a prosecution prohibited by specialty.[234]

If the relator commits another offense while in the custody of the requesting state pending prosecution on the charges for which extradition was granted, then the limitations imposed by the principle of specialty will not apply to the prosecution of the new crime.

An example of a holding that specialty requires a similarity between the charges contained in the indictment and the facts presented to the extradition magistrate is United States v. Sensi.[235] In Sensi, the U.S. government presented the United Kingdom with a request for the extradition of Sensi along with a twenty-six count indictment charging him with mail fraud, possession or receipt of stolen securities, first-degree theft, and transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of stolen securities and money. After a hearing, the magistrate in London granted extradition, concluding that eighteen charges of theft were made out by the evidence under UK law.[236] Sensi was subsequently tried in the United States and found guilty of twenty-one counts of the indictment and acquitted of five counts (possession or receipt of stolen securities transported in interstate and foreign commerce).

Sensi argued that his prosecution, as based on the indictment, violated the principle of specialty because he was not extradited on the charges contained in the indictment. He contended that his extradition was based on the eighteen counts of theft set out by the British magistrate, and not on the twenty-six counts in the indictment. After finding that the charge was an extraditable offense under the Extradition Treaty,[237] the circuit court looked to whether the

---

233 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

234 See United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987) (holding that the doctrine of specialty does not alter existing rules of evidence or procedure); United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976); McGann v. U.S. Board of Parole, 488 F.2d 39 (3d Cir. 1973) (holding that the doctrine does not apply to the method of trial or admissibility of evidence in the requesting state), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 958 (1974), reh'g denied, 417 U.S. 927 (1974); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962). Furthermore, formal differences between the request for extradition and the actual charges, or variances in an indictment, do not violate the specialty principle, which applies to the substantive nature of the crime and the facts supporting it for which extradition was granted. E.g., United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510 (11th Cir. 1992) (holding that Colombia's failure to refer specifically to the CCE charge in its review of the extradition request did not violate the specialty principle as Colombia specifically included the charge by a divergent name in its order), cert. denied sub nom., Reed v. United States, 506 U.S. 924 (1992); United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326 (10th Cir. 1990) (considering the totality of circumstances and concluding the variance did not violate the specialty principle), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1049 (1991); United States v. Rossi, 545 F.2d 814 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 430 U.S. 907 (1977).

235 United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888 (D.C. Cir. 1989). This case was, however, distinguished in United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368, 1373–1374 (9th Cir. 1993). See also Ahmed v. Morton, 1996 WL 118543 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 1996); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 24, 1998).

236 Sensi, 879 F.2d at 892. See also Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416.

237 Sensi, 879 F.2d at 895.

prosecution was based on the same facts as those set forth in the extradition request.[238] The court rejected Sensi's argument and interpretation of the Supreme Court's holding in United States v. Rauscher[239] that the prosecution for offenses other than the ones for which he was extradited is prohibited, even if the same evidence underlies both offenses. The court stated:

> Rauscher. . . did not hold [an] indictment invalid simply because it charged a crime denominated differently from the crime charged before the British magistrate. Rather, Rauscher held that the indictment was invalid because it charged the defendant with a crime not enumerated in the Treaty.[240]

The court in Rauscher felt that if it upheld the defendant's trial for a charge of infliction of cruel and unusual punishment, a crime not enumerated in the Treaty when he was originally extradited on a charge of murder, then in essence:

> [T]he Treaty could always be evaded by making a demand on account of the higher offense defined in the Treaty, and then only seeking a trial and conviction for the minor offense not found in the Treaty.[241]

The court held that in this instance that the principle of specialty was satisfied because Sensi was charged with crimes equivalent to those defined in the treaty. Moreover, as the court found the evidence sufficient to support each count in the indictment, the principle of specialty was not violated.

In United States v. Abello-Silva,[242] the defendant unsuccessfully tried to gain support from Sensi for the proposition that the principle of specialty applied to additional facts rather than additional offenses. The defendant, Abello, was extradited to the United States under a superseding indictment charging him with: (1) conspiracy to import controlled substances, and (2) conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute.[243] After Abello was extradited to the United States, a second superseding indictment was obtained against him. The second superseding indictment charged Abello with the identical two offenses of the first superseding indictment and added more facts detailing Abello's illegal activities. Unlike the first, the second superseding indictment was directed only at Abello and focused particularly on his role in the conspiracy. Abello argued that the second superseding indictment violated the principle of specialty by containing broader allegations of facts than the indictment on which his extradition was based.

In assessing Abello's claims, the Tenth Circuit determined that it must first look to precedent to understand and apply the principle of specialty unless otherwise directed by treaty or statute.[244] Moreover, the cases cited by Abello and the bulk of authority applied the principle in terms of additional offenses and not additional facts. Accordingly, the court first found that additional evidence regarding the charge contained in the extradition request was not barred under specialty and held that specialty "recognizes the possibility, for strategic reasons, that evidence introduced at trial was withheld from the extradition request."[245] The court then looked to Sensi and held that the reference to facts in that case stemmed from the extradition treaty between the United States and the surrendering state, the United Kingdom.

---

238 Id.

239 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

240 Sensi, 879 F.2d at 896. See also Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416.

241 Id.

242 United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 835 (1992), reh'g denied, 506 U.S. 1087 (1993). See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000).

243 Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d at 1172.

244 Id. at 1173–1174.

245 Id.

The Sensi test did not apply because: (1) Abello never alleged that his charges were not extraditable offenses, (2) similar treaty language did not appear in the relevant order in this instance, and (3) Abello never argued that insufficient facts supported his extradition. Moreover, the court held that the crux of the specialty question was whether the requested state has objected or would object to the prosecution. As the second indictment presented an even stronger case for the same offense, which satisfied the Colombian government's extradition requirements in the first indictment, the specialty principle was not violated, as Colombia would not object to this. The court reaffirmed that specialty requires that the defendant be tried only for those offenses that appear in the extradition request. As both counts of the second superseding indictment charged Abello with the same offenses mentioned in the extradition request, no violation of the principle of specialty occurred.

In Peters v. Egnor,[246] the court held that specialty was satisfied for the same reasons dual criminality was satisfied. In this case, the question of whether specialty was satisfied requires an examination of the congruity between the statutes of the requested and requesting states. The court held that the congruence between the Theft Act of the United Kingdom and the U.S. federal securities law was sufficient. As with dual criminality, identical statutes are not required, but the provisions must be analogous in substance. Statutes are substantially analogous when they punish conduct falling within the broad scope of the same generally recognized crime, that is, conduct directed at the same basic evil.[247]

The Ninth Circuit in United States v. Khan[248] took an enlightened view of the nature of the principle of dual criminality, holding that:

> Under the doctrine of "dual criminality," ' "an accused person can be extradited only if the conduct complained of is considered criminal by the jurisprudence or under the laws of both the requesting and requested nations.' " Id. (quoting Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 791–92 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882, 107 S.Ct. 271, 93 L.Ed.2d 247 (1986)). The doctrine of dual criminality is incorporated in the operative extradition treaty between the United States and Pakistan: "Extradition is also to be granted for participation in any of the aforesaid crimes or offences, provided that such participation be punishable by the laws of both High Contracting Parties." Extradition Treaty, December 22, 1931, art. 3, 47 Stat. 2122, 2124.
>
> Khan contends that the act alleged in Count VIII of the indictment is not punishable as a crime under the laws of Pakistan. Count VIII charges Khan with violation of 21 U.S.C. § 843(b), i.e., the use of a telephone to facilitate the commission of a drug felony. [Citation omitted.] Count VIII also charges Khan with violating 18 U.S.C. § 2, aiding and abetting the commission of an offense against the United States.
>
> Kahn contends that using a telephone during the commission of a drug offense is not, by itself, a criminal act in Pakistan. Khan concedes that under Pakistani law drug trafficking conspiracies are criminal acts. [Citation omitted.] Khan also concedes that the lawful use of a telephone can be considered an "overt act" committed in furtherance of a criminal conspiracy (as in Count II), but contends that such use standing alone cannot be charged as a separate crime.
>
> The government argues that as long as the underlying conduct is criminal, dual criminality is satisfied. The government contends that because the telephone use is part of the overall criminal conduct of the conspiracy, it constitutes a punishable crime in Pakistan. But it appears that it would be punishable in Pakistan as part of the crime of conspiracy, which is charged in Count II.

---

246 Peters v. Egnor, 888 F.2d 713 (10th Cir. 1989).

247 For another U.S.–UK extradition case similarly involving specialty and dual criminality concerns, see United States v. Thomas, 322 Fed. Appx. 177, 179 (3d Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion).

248 United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1993). See also United States v. Cosby, 53 Fed. Appx. 448 (9th Cir. 2002); Ahmed v. Morton, 1996 WL 118543 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 1996); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

> It is true that dual criminality does not require that Pakistan have a provision that is the exact duplication of 21 U.S.C. § 843. See Emami v. United States Dist. Court for N. Dist. of Cal., 834 F.2d 1444, 1450 (9th Cir. 1987); Theron v. United States Marshall, 832 F.2d 492, 496–97 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1059, 108 S.Ct. 2830, 100 L.Ed.2d 930 (1988). But we have not been presented with a Pakistani crime that is even analogous to 21 U.S.C. § 843. We have reviewed other cases that address this issue. Many cases have held that dual criminality is satisfied even though the names of the crimes and the required elements were different in the two countries. But in each of these cases the laws of the two countries were sufficiently analogous to satisfy dual criminality. See, e.g., Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 312, 42 S.Ct. 469. 470, 66 L.Ed. 956 (1921) (dual criminality satisfied because Indian offense of "cheating" was analogous to Louisiana offense of "false pretenses"); Kelly v. Griffin, 241 U.S. 6, 14, 36 S.Ct. 487, 489, 60 L.Ed. 861 (1915) (dual criminality satisfied though Canadian perjury law did not require that statements be material, while Illinois law required materiality as an element of the offense); Bozilov v. Seifert, 983 F.2d 140, 143 (9th Cir. 1993) (dual criminality satisfied because defendant could have been charged with conspiracy in the United States if the two countries' positions had been reversed); Emami, 834 F.2d at 1450 (dual criminality satisfied because fraud under German Penal Code 263 comparable to U.S. crime of mail fraud under 18 U.S.C. § 1341); Theron, 832 F.2d at 497 (dual criminality satisfied because South African law, though broader, was analogous to U.S. bank fraud); In re Russell, 789 F.2d 801, 804 (9th Cir. 1986) (dual criminality satisfied even though Australian conspiracy law did not require "overt act"); United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888, 893 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (dual criminality satisfied where, under U.K. law, to commit mail fraud one must succeed in stealing something whereas, under U.S. law, that is not a requirement).
>
> We are not aware of any Pakistani law that is analogous to 21 U.S.C. § 843. Consequently, we are not convinced that Khan could be charged and punished in Pakistan for the conduct underlying Count VIII, separate and apart from the crime of conspiracy. Therefore, the doctrine of dual criminality has not been satisfied with respect to Count VIII."[249]

The Khan case highlights the interrelationship between dual criminality and specialty.

The relator may waive the application of the principle of specialty by consenting to be prosecuted for the offense at variance with the offense charged in the extradition request.[250] In United States v. DiTommaso,[251] the court declined to decide whether the defendant had standing to raise the issue in the case where the defendant had voluntarily waived his extradition rights. The court held that the principle of specialty was limited to those cases where the extradition treaty was formally invoked, which was not the case in DiTommaso. Because the defendant waived his extradition rights, he was not extradited pursuant to a treaty but rather deported, and therefore the principle did not extend to him. The question arises here as to whether specialty applies to alternative methods of surrender such as deportation and unlawful seizures in other states.[252] With respect to waiver of extradition in the context of an extradition procedure, the principle applies on the basis of the original extradition request.

---

249 Khan, 993 F.2d at 1372–1373 (citations omitted). See also Ahmed; Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112.

250 See United States v. Vreeken, 803 F.2d 1085, 1089 (10th Cir. 1986) (holding that the defendant's failure to raise the rule of specialty in a timely manner precluded him from raising it at all as a bar to prosecution for violations of U.S. income tax law, when extradition from Canada had been based on charges of wire fraud), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1067 (1987). See also United States v. Davis, 954 F.2d 182 (4th Cir. 1992) (holding that the defendant waived his right to appeal on specialty grounds by his failure to object to the government's reference to illegal accounting practices in the initial indictment, which were not included in the extradition order).

251 United States v. DiTommaso, 817 F.2d 201, 212 (2d Cir. 1987).

252 Id.

The Ninth Circuit in United States v. Anderson[253] reasoned that the principle of specialty and the principle of dual criminality could apply to a situation involving an extradition intertwined with denaturalization proceedings. Shortly after the relator petitioned for naturalization in Costa Rica, the United States filed a formal request with Costa Rican authorities for his extradition.[254] Shortly after this extradition request was filed, Costa Rica granted the relator's naturalization petition, followed three weeks later by an annulment of the grant of citizenship.[255] Costa Rica extradited Anderson to the United States while his challenges to Costa Rica's annulment of his citizenship and decision to extradite him were pending in Costa Rican courts.[256] The relator was subsequently convicted in the United States of various fraud counts tied to an income tax avoidance scheme he was involved in.[257] Although the relator was extradited before his naturalization appeals were completed, the court found his removal proper given that Costa Rica, under the express terms of the extradition treaty, was required to suspend its decision on the relator's request for naturalization until after it surrendered him.[258]

Where a relator is charged with a crime for which he was not the principal offender, he may be tried as an accomplice without violation of the principle of specialty provided the applicable laws allow for accomplices to be tried as principals.[259]

6.3. Jurisprudential Applications

The principle of specialty is a substantive rule that relates to the very basis of the extradition process, as it is derived from the applicable treaty and 18 U.S.C. § 3186, which states:

> [The] Secretary of State may order the person committed . . . to be delivered to any authorized agent of such foreign government, to be tried for the offense of which charged . . .[260]

The principle of specialty was confirmed by the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Rauscher,[261] which held:

> [A] person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty, can only be tried for one of the offences described in that treaty, and for the offence with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition . . .[262]

In reaching its decision, the Court used the principles of the common law and international law to interpret the United States–United Kingdom Treaty, which did not contain a reference to a right not to be prosecuted for a crime for which extradition was not granted. The court held that "the fair purpose of the treaty is, that the person shall be delivered up to be tried for

---

253 472 F.3d 662 (9th Cir. 2006).

254 Id. at 665.

255 Id.

256 Id.

257 Id. at 665–666.

258 Id. at 666–667. The extradition treaty between the United States and Costa Rica provided at article 8, section 2:

> The Requested State shall undertake all available legal measures to suspend proceedings for the naturalization of the person sought until a decision is made on the request for extradition and, if that request is granted, until that person is surrendered.

259 United States v. Samuels, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 9616, at *17–*21 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2009).

260 See 18 U.S.C. § 3186 (1994) (emphasis added). This section of the statute applies to the United States as a requested state when it is surrendering a felon to a foreign state. The applicable treaty controls when the United States is the requesting state to whom the person has been surrendered.

261 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

262 Id. at 430.

[the extradited] offense, and for no other."[263] In reaching this conclusion, the Rauscher Court reviewed the terms and history of the treaty, the practice of nations in regard to extradition treaties, the case law from the states, and the writings of commentators, noting that:

> according to the doctrine of publicists and writers on international law, the country receiving the offender against its laws from another country had no right to proceed against him for any other offence than that for which he had been delivered up.[264]

This is so because from a policy perspective:

> [i]t is unreasonable that the country of the asylum should be expected to deliver up such person to be dealt with by the demanding government without any limitation, implied or otherwise, upon its prosecution of the party.[265]

The Supreme Court continues to abide by these principles, as noted in 1992 by Justice John Paul Stevens when he interpreted Rauscher as "impl[ying] a covenant not to prosecute for an offense different from that for which extradition had been granted…"[266] Accordingly, the Court held the principle of specialty to be "conclusive upon the judiciary of the right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country into this [country] under such proceedings."[267] United States courts have consistently recognized this principle.[268]

One option in cases where the court rules against a relator-defendant's claim is to permit an interlocutory appeal.[269] Specialty issues do not, however, only arise as questions of law, but also as questions of fact, and as mixed questions of law and fact.

The Supreme Court held in Van Cauwenberghe v. Biard[270] that a civil motion to dismiss based on the principle of specialty was not an immediately appealable interlocutory order.[271] The 263 Id. at 423 (emphasis added).

---

264 Id. at 419.

265 Id.

266 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 679–680 (1992) (Stevens, J., dissenting).

267 Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 424.

268 See Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 659–660 (noting that the issue in Rauscher was whether the United States–Great Britain Treaty "prohibited the prosecution of defendant Rauscher for a crime other than the crime for which he had been extradited"). See also United States v. Diwan, 864 F.2d 715, 720 (11th Cir. 1983) (stating that under the specialty doctrine, petitioning country may prosecute only those offenses for which accused was originally extradited), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 921 (1989); United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1426 (9th Cir. 1988) (same), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1012 (1989); United States v. Vreeken, 803 F.2d 1085, 1088 (10th Cir. 1986) (holding that specialty doctrine "bars trial" on nonextradited offenses), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1067 (1987); United States v. Jetter, 722 F.2d 371, 373 (8th Cir. 1983) (stating that under specialty doctrine, accused can be tried only for extradited offenses).

269 The trial court may allow an interlocutory appeal under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, but is not bound to do so. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), courts of appeals have jurisdiction to hear appeals of interlocutory orders made by district judges. See 9 Moore's Federal Practice, ¶ 110.21[1]. A district judge has authority, when making an order that would not normally be appealable, to state in writing his belief that an interlocutory appeal is warranted. 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (2000). The judge may make such an order at his discretion, if he is of the opinion that on some controlling question of law, a "substantial ground for difference of opinion" exists and that the order will "materially advance the outcome of the litigation." Id. The district court must, however, state its desire to stay proceedings pending the appeal, or else proceedings will continue. Id. In theory, appeals of interlocutory orders may expedite the final outcome of the litigation and may prevent unneeded litigation in the long run. In the context of extradition proceedings, it may prevent violations of treaty obligations as well as prevent trials of persons subsequently found to be immune.

270 Van Cauwenberghe v. Biard, 486 U.S. 517 (1988).

271 Id. at 523–524. The interlocutory appeal could, however, be denied if the issue can be preserved for review in the ordinary cause of an appellate review. See United States v. Sacoccia, 18 F.3d 79 (9th

Court held that even assuming arguendo that the principle of specialty confers immunity from service of process in civil matters, denial of a motion to dismiss based on immunity from process was not immediately appealable.[272]

In Van Cauwenberghe an extradited person who faced civil prosecution claimed that the principle of specialty afforded him the right while awaiting trial on the extradited charges to immediately appeal the issue of whether he was immune from the civil suit. In dismissing the petitioner's interlocutory appeal, the Court differentiated between criminal and civil prosecutions, and intimated that had the appeal challenged the U.S. government's criminal prosecution under the specialty doctrine, interlocutory appeals would have been allowed. Specifically, the Court held that "[u]nlike a criminal prosecution, in which the coercive power of the state is immediately brought to bear, the state's involvement in the conduct of a private civil suit is minimal."[273] The Supreme Court further distinguished civil from criminal prosecutions by noting that there was no "explicit agreement" in the controlling United States–Swiss Treaty, "to protect the extradited person from the burdens of civil suit," and that "[t]here is no possibility [in a civil suit] that the defendant will be subject to pretrial detention[,] . . . be required to post bail . . . [or] even [be] compelled to present at trial."[274] The Court concluded that forcing a prisoner to stand trial in a civil matter did not "significantly restrict [his/her] liberty."[275]

Interlocutory appeals are permitted unless the trial judge enters an order based on a finding that the appeal is frivolous; otherwise the appeal can proceed and the trial court is divested of jurisdiction.[276] In general, appeals in criminal cases require a district court to enter a final judgment on the merits prior to an appeal.[277]

Cir. 1994). See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 200 (1st Cir. 1998).

272 Van Cauwenberghe, 486 U.S. at 529–530.

273 Id. at 525.

274 Id. at 525–526.

275 Id. at 526. The Court based its judgment on its holding in Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 468 (1978), requiring, inter alia, that an order be "effectively unreviewable" as an appeal of a final judgment. See also Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 237 (1944) (denying motion to dismiss based on jurisdictional grounds in civil action not immediately appealable). Similarly, the Van Cauwenberghe court relied on Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949), in which the Court held that a district court order is appealable prior to trial if it (1) leaves no matter open or unfinished; (2) is collateral to the merits, insofar as it raises issues of law and fact having no bearing on the guilt or innocence of the defendant; and (3) risks denying an important right that would be irretrievably lost if appeal were postponed. The Supreme Court has consistently held that in similar actions, the right not to be tried fully meets the Cohen requirement of an important right that is irretrievably lost if appeal is postponed, and it has uniformly affirmed the right to be tried. See Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530 (1985) (denying qualified immunity); Helstoski v. Meanor, 442 U.S. 500 (1979) (regarding the assertion of immunity based on the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution); Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977) (stating that double jeopardy involves right not to be tried, so that interlocutory appeal was warranted). See also United States v. Abbamonte, 759 F.2d 1065, 1071 (2d Cir. 1985). The Court's decision in Van Cauwenberghe is distinguishable from other cases in that the question of immunity from service of process was reviewable on appeal, which made it inappropriate as an immediately appealable interlocutory order. If an interlocutory appeal is not granted, the relator-defendant is left with no choice but to make a record and preserve the issue for appeal after the district court enters a final judgment.

276 See Midland Asphalt Corp. v. United States, 489 U.S. 794, 799 (1988).

277 See Chuman v. Wright, 960 F.2d 104, 105 (9th Cir. 1992); United States v. LaMere, 951 F.2d 1106, 1108–1109 (9th Cir. 1991); United States v. Leppo, 634 F.2d 101, 104 (3d Cir. 1980); United States v. Dunbar, 611 F.2d 985, 988 (5th Cir. 1980) (en banc).

In Midland Asphalt Corp. v. United States, the Supreme Court outlined three exceptions to the general rule preventing immediate appeal of motions in criminal appeals.[278] The Court considered satisfied the relevant test for all interlocutory appeals developed in Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay[279] only if further delay would "destroy" the legal and practical value of the asserted right were it not vindicated before trial.[280] Accordingly, interlocutory appeals in criminal cases based on the principle of specialty must overcome the presumption against such an appeal, except for issues involving bail or double jeopardy.[281] This is particularly significant when the issue arising under the principle of specialty drives the prosecution's strategy of splitting a given criminal transaction or series thereof into more than one trial, and sometimes in more than a single district (where they would ordinarily be consolidated). The Fifth Amendment precludes such prosecutorial strategies.[282] Although courts allow few opportunities for interlocutory appeals in the criminal context, double jeopardy provides the most likely grounds for an interlocutory appeal based on claims arising out of the principle of specialty. Considering all the implications of going forward with a trial where the principle of specialty may be violated, it would seem that a better approach would be to allow interlocutory appeals on this issue if for no other reasons than judicial economy and fairness.[283]

Extradition issues merit interlocutory review. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the Supreme Court in Flanagan v. United States,[284] explained that extradition cases share an important feature: they involve "more than the right not to be convicted," they involve "a right not to be tried."[285] In these cases the defendant challenges "the very authority of the Government [to] hale him into court to face trial on the charge against him."[286] Decisions that interpret and apply the principle of specialty are questions of law (and fact); they can therefore be decided de novo by the circuit court.[287]

In Benitez v. Garcia, the Ninth Circuit reviewed and reaffirmed its position on the principle of specialty, which reflects the position adopted in the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations. The district court held:

---

278 Midland, 489 U.S. 794. The exceptions are: (1) motions to reduce bail, (2) motions to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds, and (3) motions to dismiss under the Speech and Debate Clause.

279 Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 468 (1978).

280 Midland, 489 U.S. at 799.

281 Id. See also Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977); Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932). See also United States v. Rashed, 83 F. Supp. 2d 96 (D.D.C 1999); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

282 See United States v. Felix, 503 U.S. 378 (1992) (disallowing splitting a conspiracy and its substantive offenses when committed after the conspiracy). See also Ciucci v. Illinois, 356 U.S. 571 (1958).

283 Only the Second Circuit has held that appeals raising claims under the rule of specialty are not subject to interlocutory review. See United States v. Levy, 947 F.2d 1032, 1034 (2d Cir. 1991). Reasoning that "the doctrine of specialty does not guarantee a right not to be tried, but rather a right to be protected from a court's authority," the Second Circuit concluded that the rights at issue "may be fully vindicated on appeal from a final judgment…." Id. This holding of the Second Circuit in Levy contravenes the Supreme Court's holdings in Rauscher and Van Cauwenberghe. Although the Levy court is correct that the restraints on a U.S. court's right to try an extradited defendant are expressed as limits on jurisdiction, other courts have consistently articulated the doctrine in terms of "a right not to be tried" that unquestionably merits interlocutory appellate review.

284 Flanagan v. United States, 465 U.S. 259 (1984).

285 Id. at 265–266.

286 Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651, 659 (1977).

287 See United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341, 1344 (9th Cir. 1991), vacated, 505 U.S. 1201 (1992). See also United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d

> The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law, section 477, in Comment (b) to the Doctrine of Specialty (emphasis added) supports the view that the doctrine is not limited to the characterization of crimes. That section describes, among other purposes: "The doctrine of speciality is designed to prevent prosecution for an offense for which the person would not have been extradited or to prevent punishment in excess of what the requested state had reason to believe was contemplated." Comment (f) further provides, in pertinent part: "if the requested state surrenders a person on condition that the death sentence not be imposed, the condition is binding on the requesting state." Although no United States Supreme Court decision directly on point has been identified, lower federal courts have addressed defendants' challenges to sentences in excess of the extraditing country's expressed expectations regarding maximum punishment. See, e.g., United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141 (2nd Cir. 1989); United States v. Campbell, 300 F.3d 202 (2nd Cir. 2002), cert. den., 538 U.S. 1049, 123 S. Ct. 2114, 155 L. Ed. 2d 1090 (2003), rehearing den., 539 U.S. 971, 123 S. Ct. 2668, 156 L. Ed. 2d 678 (2003).
>
> The Casamento court reached the merits of a defendant's argument "that his forty-five year prison sentence violate[d] the terms of his extradition order from Spain" because in that extradition Order, as in Benitez's, the extraditing country "prohibited the court from sentencing him to more than thirty years in prison." Casamento, 887 F.2d at 1185. That court rejected the claim not by ignoring the terms of the extradition order, but rather by reconciling the sentence with the extradition order.
>
> However, the extradition order requires only that "the maximum period of imprisonment may not in any event exceed 30 years." Instead of selecting a thirty-year sentence, which might have resulted in mandatory release after good time credits in twenty to twenty-three years, the district judge sentenced [the defendant] to prison for forty-five years but ordered that he be released after thirty years. Therefore, the sentence does not violate the extradition order. Casamento, 887 F.2d at 1185.
>
> Similarly, a defendant was extradited from Costa Rica to the United States pursuant to an extradition treaty and a judicial extradition decree containing a condition placing an outer limit on any eventual prison term. n7 Campbell, 300 F.3d at 205. After conviction but before sentencing, the United States government sought and received clarification from the Costa Rican government concerning the latter's position on the permissible form of sentence. Id. at 206–207. That clarification provided, in pertinent part: "the verdict in the United States against an extradited person can refer to the total years that the accused can be indicted for. Nevertheless, the sentence must state, in a clear and manifest way, that the maximum time the accused must serve is 50 years. This would be the real serving time." Id. at 207 (emphasis added).[288]

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit court held:

> We must look, first and foremost, to what the surrendering state expected and believed the extradited defendant would face. In Browne, the Supreme Court decided that "[w]hether the crime came within the provision of the treaty was a matter for the decision of the [surrendering] authorities." Browne, 205 U.S. at 316, 27 S.Ct. 539. Our foremost concern is to "ensur[e] that the obligations of the requested nation are satisfied." United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435 (9th Cir.1994). See, e.g., United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1428 (9th Cir.1988) (stating that "the appropriate test is whether the extraditing country" would object); Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law § 477 Comment b ("The standard for adjudicati[on]…in the United States is whether the requested state has objected or would object to prosecution.").
>
> As part of this assessment of "what the surrendering country wishes," Najohn, 785 F.2d at 1422, courts look to the extradition decree issued by the surrendering country, as well as documents

---

776, 791 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Extradition of Chen, 161 F.3d 11 (9th Cir. 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990).

288 Benitez v. Garcia, No. 02-0489 J (LAB), 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27061, at *14 (S.D. Cal. 2003).

> related to that decree. In Rauscher, the Supreme Court explicitly looked at the "processes by which [extradition] is to be carried into effect." Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 420, 7 S.Ct. 234. Id. at 421, 7 S.Ct. 234 (ensuring that the "proceedings under which the party is arrested in a country" are given due respect). See, e.g., Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1436 (looking to the surrendering country's "extradition order"); United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1425 (9th Cir.1988) (same); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986) (same). Indeed, we have decided that implementing the Supreme Court's decision in Johnson requires that "deference [is] to be accorded a surrendering country's decision on extraditability." United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d 424, 429 (9th Cir.1987). See also United States v. Campbell, 300 F.3d 202, 209 (2d Cir.2002) ("Whether or not express terms in a treaty make the extraditing country's decision final as to whether an offense is extraditable, deference to that country's decision seems essential to the maintenance of cordial international relations."); Casey v. Dep't of State, 980 F.2d 1472, 1477 (D.C.Cir.1992) ("[A]t a minimum, Johnson means that an American court must give great deference to the determination of the foreign court in an extradition proceeding."); United States v. Jurado-Rodriguez, 907 F.Supp. 568, 574 (E.D.N.Y.1995) (deciding that the United States must "must abide by the terms and limitations [the surrendering country] has explicitly included in its extradition decree").[289]

In United States v. De Asa Sanchez, District Court Judge Jack Weinstein held that federal courts should honor limitations in sentencing that are requested by the extraditing state:

> It is the court's preliminary view—subject to briefing and argument—that when a person is extradited with the limitation imposed by the extraditing state that a conviction will not result in a death sentence, federal courts will honor the limitations. See, e.g., American Law Institute, Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, Comment f. (1987) ("If the requested state surrenders a person on condition that the death sentence not be imposed, the condition is binding on the requesting state."). Cf. Louis Henkin, Richard Crawford Pugh, Oscar Schochter & Hans Smit, International Law 1114 (1993) ("According to the principle of specialty, the requisitioning state may not, without the permission of the asylum state, try or punish the fugitive for any crimes committed before the extradition except the crimes for which he was extradited."); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, Ch. VIII, § 5, Grounds Relating to the Penalty: The Death Penalty and Cruel and Unusual Punishment at 735–744 (4th ed.2002) (problems of enforceability of conditional extraditions; discussion of leading international cases); 3 The Dept. of Justice Manual at 9–15, 500 (2d ed. loose leaf current) (post extradition considerations); 4 The Dept. of Justice Manual at 1 ff. (2d ed. loose leaf current) (survey of death penalty cases in the federal courts).[290]

6.4. Variance in Prosecution and the Principle of Specialty

In cases of extradition from the United States to another state, the crimes for which a relator may be tried by a requesting state are determined by the extradition warrant signed by the secretary of state or his/her designee. If there is a variance between the U.S. extradition warrant and the finding of the U.S. extradition magistrate or judge, the warrant will control in the requesting state until such time as it may be amended to conform to the decision of the extradition judge. The United States may waive variances by express authorization from the secretary of state, but only to the extent that the new crimes are based on the same facts that were presented at the relator's extradition hearing, the new crimes satisfy dual criminality, and probable cause can be found. The relator is entitled to challenge this determination in court. This is usually raised in the context of ongoing criminal proceedings.

---

289 Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971, 976–977 (9th Cir. 2006).

290 United States v. De Asa Sanchez, 323 F. Supp. 2d 403 (2004).

With respect to the interpretation and application of the principle of specialty in the United States, it is a confused and unsettled part of extradition law. The reasons are in part because it poses several difficult legal questions that the circuits have approached in different ways. They are:

1. in the last twenty years the United States has enacted complex criminal statutes that for the most part have no counterpart in other legal systems;[291]

2. prosecutorial practice in United States frequently resorts to the use of superseding indictments whose substantive charges and factual recitations may vary from the original indictment on which extradition was secured;

3. federal prosecutors in the ninety-four federal districts may be unfamiliar with this area of the law and more so with respect to the set of issues involved in specialty (even though it should be noted the Office of International Affairs [OIA] of the United States Department of Justice provides valuable assistance and advice to the United States Attorneys' offices throughout the country);

4. some federal prosecutors tend to occasionally stretch the rules of permissibility with regard to their representations to the OIA, which are communicated to the requested state, and also stretch the limits of proper conduct in making representations to U.S. courts before which these issues are raised;

5. as a consequence of all these factors, there is inconsistency and uncertainty among the circuits as to what constitutes a variance and how to deal with it, and the distinction between preclusion of prosecution under specialty and the use of evidence for proving other legal propositions than guilt of the precluded crime; and

6. the conflicting positions of the circuits as to who can raise the issue of specialty, when, and how.[292]

The Ninth Circuit, in United States v. Khan, established an important requirement of unambiguousness, whereby if the surrendering state is not unambiguous about the charges for which extradition has been granted, then the U.S. courts would be required to determine whether it was the intention of the surrendering state to allow extradition for a particular offense, and in so doing, to determine whether that offense exists in the surrendering state. By implication, the Ninth Circuit suggested that U.S. courts, in cases of ambiguity, put themselves in the place of the surrendering state's courts to determine first the existence of dual criminality and second, based on the first determination, what the limits of specialty are. The court held:

> As a matter of international comity, "[t]he doctrine of 'specialty' prohibits the requesting nation from prosecuting the extradited individual for any offense other than that for which the surrendering state agreed to extradite." Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d at 428 (quoting Quinn, 783 F.2d at 783). See United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 419–421, 7 S.Ct. 234, 240–241, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886).
>
> Khan contends that Pakistan agreed to extradite him on the basis of Count II, but not on Count VIII of the superceding indictment. Khan contends that the Pakistani extradition documents do not specifically refer to the allegations of Count VIII and therefore his conviction on Count VIII should be dismissed.
>
> The parties have provided two Pakistani documents, an Enquiry Report from a Deputy Commissioner Enquiry Officer dated February 14, 1990 ("commissioner's report") and a judgment from the Lahore High Court at Lahore dated March 4, 1990 (this document is incomplete). The commissioner's report refers three times to 21 U.S.C. § 963 (the violation alleged in Count II) and makes no reference to 21 U.S.C. § 843 or 18 U.S.C. § 2 (the violations alleged in Count VIII). The Lahore judgment refers once to 21 U.S.C. § 963 and makes no reference to 21 U.S.C. § 843 or 18 U.S.C. § 2.

291 See supra Sec. 5.2.

292 See infra Sec. 6.6.

The Pakistani commissioner's report lists the documents received from the United States in connection with the extradition request. These documents included copies of the Stewart affidavit, which described the charges in Counts II and VIII, and the superceding indictment. The list in the report specifically noted that "the indictment relating to [Khan] is with regard to count No. II and VIII." In addition, the commissioner's report reviews the factual background of the extradition request including the various telephone calls between Khan and his codefendants throughout the course of the conspiracy. The commissioner stated that he had carefully examined the evidence presented by the prosecution.

The magistrate judge determined that the Pakistani commissioner had considered all the evidence presented by the United States, including the Stewart affidavit and Count VIII in the superceding indictment. Relying on United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888, 896 (D.C Cir. 1989), the magistrate judge found the reference to the evidentiary materials sufficient to satisfy the doctrine of specialty. The district court found that it was "quite clear that the United States Government requested extradition on Count VIII, and that the Magistrate in Pakistan considered extradition on Count VIII and granted it."

The opinion in United States v. Sensi is not dispositive. In Sensi, 879 F.2d at 896, the D.C. Circuit focused on the evidence submitted with the United States' request for extradition and found it sufficient to support each count of the indictment. The British magistrate (England was the surrendering country) had not delineated the United States counts for which the defendant was extraditable, but had concluded that the defendant was extraditable. The magistrate found that 18 charges of theft were made out by the evidence under United Kingdom law. Id. at 892. The British magistrate had received a copy of the United States indictment. Id. at 896.

In Sensi, however, the operative extradition treaty contained the following language: "'A person extradited shall not be [prosecuted]...for any offense other than an extraditable offense established by the facts in respect of which his extradition has been granted.'" Id. at 895 (quoting 28 U.S.T. 233). The operative treaty in this case contains the following language: "A person surrendered can in no case be [prosecuted]...for any other crime or offence, or on account of any other matters, than those for which the extradition shall have taken place." Extradition Treaty, December 22, 1931, art. 7, 47 Stat. 2124. We are not convinced that the doctrine or specialty is satisfied under all treaties as long as the prosecution is based on the same facts as those set forth in the request for extradition.

Language from our opinions in Van Cauwenberghe and Quinn, "for any offense other than that for which the surrendering state agreed to extradite," suggests the need for an affirmative statement by the surrendering country of the counts upon which extradition is based. In United States v. Merit, 962 F.2d 917, 923 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 85, 113 S.Ct. 244, 121 L.Ed.2d 178 (1992), the South African Supreme Court affirmatively found the defendant extraditable on Count 1 and Count 14 of the indictment. The South African Supreme Court's ruling was initially ambiguous regarding the other 12 counts for which the defendant was indicted. The United States requested clarification and the South African Department of Justice confirmed that the defendant was extraditable on Counts 1 and 14. Id. at 920. We found that the United States had adhered to the specialty requirement of the treaty because the defendant was tried and convicted of only those two counts. Id. at 923.

The extradition materials do not indicate that Pakistan unambiguously agreed to extradite Khan on both Counts II and VIII. The magistrate judge found it persuasive that "the commissioner's report does not suggest that Khan ought not to be extradited on the charge contained in Count VIII." But we will not infer an agreement to extradite from Pakistan's silence concerning Count VIII. [Citation omitted.]

> The government notes that the Pakistani commissioner directed that Khan could be "surrendered over to the authorities in the U.S.A. for trial under the relevant American Law." It is possible that the Pakistani commissioner was referring to the relevant American law of 21 U.S.C. § 963 (in Count II). It is also possible that Pakistan did not find the charges in Count VIII worthy of extradition. See generally United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 420–21, 7 S.Ct. 234, 241, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886) (defendant extradited on murder charges could not be prosecuted for lesser offense of cruel and unusual punishment, which was not listed in the extradition treaty).
>
> Because Pakistan did not unambiguously agree to extradite Khan on the basis of Count VIII, the doctrine of specialty has not been satisfied. Khan's conviction on Count VIII should be reversed and dismissed.[293]

Another factor that adds to the present state of confusion is that U.S. judicial decisions frequently combine several issues arising under specialty without clearly distinguishing them for purposes of the ruling. Some cases also confuse issues of dual criminality and evidence in the context of specialty, while also discussing standing without clearly separating these different legal questions. The discussion of relevant cases that follows in this section reveals the extent to which these issues can are interrelated.

As stated above, in order to prosecute a relator in the United States for an offense at variance with the offense for which the extradition request was granted, the United States must obtain the consent of the requested state while the relator is still in U.S. custody for the offense for which extradition was granted.[294] But the United States does not proceed that way. Instead, it proceeds with prosecution based on other charges arising out of superseding indictments, and then argues that these charges satisfy specialty and dual criminality. It is this unfortunate hasty practice that brings about so many problems. The better practice would be for the prosecutor to convey his/her intentions to the Department of Justice's OIA, and let that office seek a supplemental extradition request or ask the surrendering state for clarification and authorization to proceed. That additional procedural demarche would clearly improve judicial economy and prevent unnecessary delays.

In United States v. Diwan,[295] the court held that the relator could be prosecuted on a conspiracy count notwithstanding her original extradition for only theft-related offenses, as the record of the case showed that the United Kingdom consented to the prosecution for the other lesser or related offenses. The Magistrates' Court in London had dismissed the conspiracy charge after conducting an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the offenses charged were triable

---

293 United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1993) (citations omitted).

294 Treaty of Extradition between the United States and Italy, Oct. 13, 1983, U.S.–Italy, art. XVI(1)(a), T.I.A.S. No. 10837 (entered into force Sept. 24, 1984), states:

> 1. A person extradited under this Treaty may not be detained, tried or punished in the Requesting Party except for:
>
> (a) the offense for which extradition has been granted or when the same facts for which extradition was granted constitute a differently denominated offense which is extraditable . . . .

See United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009 (1986), in which the court found the requested state (Switzerland) had waived application of the principle of specialty, and Najohn, who had been extradited to Pennsylvania on charges of interstate transportation of stolen property, receipt of stolen property, and conspiracy, might also be tried in California on similar charges. See also United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3rd Cir. 1991) (holding that defendant could not assert rights under extradition treaty in light of express waiver of Commonwealth of Dominica); United States v. Diwan, 864 F.2d 715 (11th Cir. 1989) (holding that the principle of specialty could not be successfully raised as the requested nation expressly consented to the relator's non–theft-related offenses, notwithstanding the extradition on the theft-related offenses), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 921 (1989).

295 Diwan, 864 F.2d 715.

offenses in the United Kingdom. The magistrate rejected the United States' argument that the conspiracy alleged in the indictment would justify committal in the United Kingdom if the offenses charged had been committed there. The extradition was, however, granted after the magistrate determined that the offense of mail fraud is analogous to the crime of theft.

The relator challenged prosecution on the conspiracy charges by arguing that the offenses for which she was extradited did not include conspiracy, as the UK magistrate had only detained her for the theft-related offenses. The court found this argument to be without merit because diplomatic correspondence between the two states indicated that the United Kingdom did not regard the prosecution of Diwan on the conspiracy count a breach of the extradition treaty. A letter from the UK's Secretary of State for the Home Office, who had the ultimate authority to determine whether extradition would be allowed, responded to a request for confirmation that the United Kingdom did not object to the prosecution of the defendant on all counts in the indictment by stating:

> I can therefore confirm your understanding of that decision and of the surrender warrant subsequently signed by the Secretary of State. Accordingly . . . I am able to confirm that the United Kingdom has no objection to the indictment of Ms. Diwan as proposed.[296]

The court held that the diplomatic correspondence between the two states unequivocally showed that the United Kingdom consented to the prosecution of Diwan on the conspiracy count. Therefore, the government could proceed with the prosecution of the relator on all counts in the original indictment.

A 2009 case elucidating this practice was United States v. Iribe,[297] where the relator challenged his prosecution under a second superseding indictment. The Mexican Supreme Court granted the relator's extradition for conspiracy to maim a person in a foreign country, but not for conspiracy to kill and kidnap a person in a foreign country insofar as those crimes carried the potential for a life sentence.[298] Nonetheless, a U.S. federal grand jury returned a second superseding indictment including conspiracy to kidnap and attempted kidnapping.[299] The government of Mexico delivered a diplomatic note in which it specified that:

> The Foreign Ministry does not object to the reclassification of the crime pursuant to Article 17.2, paragraphs a) and b) of the Extradition treaty between the United Mexican States and the United States of America.[300]

The court read this diplomatic note and the Mexican Supreme Court decision to show that Mexico had explicitly agreed to prosecution on the new charges, which did not carry a life sentence.[301]

Specialty also means that if the relator is acquitted of the extradition offense, he/she must be allowed to leave the country without hindrance, and he/she cannot be charged or even served with additional criminal charges while in the country.[302] The relator must be given a reasonable amount of time to leave voluntarily, and cannot be denied the right to return to his/her

---

296 Id. at 721.

297 United States v. Iribe, 564 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2009).

298 Id. at 1158.

299 Id.

300 Id.

301 Id. at 1159–1160.

302 S. Exec. Rep. No. 33, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1984) states:

> Paragraph 3 provides that if the person leaves the requesting country after surrender and voluntarily returns to it, or if he/she does not leave that country within 30 days of being free to do so, the requesting country is free to prosecute or punish him/her for any other offense or to extradite him/her to a third country.

country of nationality, the state from which he/she was extradited if that state gives him/her permission, or any other state of his/her choice that gives him/her permission. The individual cannot be forced to go to a state that he/she does not wish to go to, nor can the United States use immigration laws to deport him/her or force "involuntary departure" upon him/her to send him/her to a country that may be seeking him/her for further prosecution.[303] The same rules apply to situations where the relator was tried and convicted for the extradition offense and has served the required sentence and been released. In these cases, he/she must be given the opportunity to leave the requesting state before he/she can be detained or tried for another offense, except for any offense he/she may have committed while in the United States after his/her surrender. In either case, when the relator has served the required sentence or been acquitted of the extradition offense, the requested state loses jurisdiction over the relator. Thus, if the requesting state seeks to obtain consent after acquittal or after completion of the sentence to prosecute the relator for an unrelated offense, such consent would be invalid as the requested state can no longer exercise any authority over the relator. Even in cases in which a timely request for the consent of the requested state is made, the requesting state should determine whether consent has been granted by the appropriate authority of the requested state. Thus, if the proper authority in the originally requested state is a judicial one, the authorization cannot be granted by an administrative authority. For example, the appropriate authority in France is the chambre de mises en accusation of the Court of Appeals, and in Italy it is the counterpart chamber of the Court of Appeals of the judicial district where the relator was found. Only that judicial authority can grant a supplemental extradition request. But in one case, involving Italy, the United States requested and obtained a purported supplemental authorization from an official in the ministry of justice to prosecute the relator in formal extradition proceedings for another crime after the relator was acquitted of the original charges. But because the official, a judge in the ministry, was not the appropriate legal authority, the purported authorization was deemed invalid and the relator was allowed to leave the country.[304]

A question arises, however, as to whether the requesting state may, subsequent to the prosecution of an accused surrendered for a particular crime, re-extradite such a person to another state that may request his/her extradition, without seeking permission from the state that originally extradited him/her.[305] In other words, if State A requests the extradition of an individual from State B for crime X and extradition is granted, can State A re-extradite such a person to State C, which requests his/her extradition from State A for crime Y, without first securing the permission of State B? The answer depends on whether State B has a continuing interest in the accused. Such an interest could be that he/she is a citizen of State B or that State B granted the request of State A even though it could have prosecuted that individual for a crime in State B, or that State B waived its opportunity to retain jurisdiction over him/her for a criminal investigation or as a witness in another trial. Presumably once the individual is extradited, State B loses jurisdiction over him/her and its only surviving interest is to ensure that its processes have been used in a manner that complies with the principle of specialty. However, as extradition depends on a treaty and the requested state may grant it on the basis of certain policy considerations in those interests described above, its interest in such a person may survive with respect to re-extradition. However, such a survival of interest theory should depend on the condition that State A knew or had reasonable grounds to know that State C would ask it for the re-extradition of the relator at the time it made its request to State B. Otherwise the process of re-extradition would always be subject to the approval of the originally requested state, which would render the process of re-extradition too cumbersome. A better approach would be to regulate such practices by treaty, which is not the case under existing U.S. extradition treaties.

303 For a discussion of those forms of disguised extradition, see Ch. IV.

304 As this outcome was administratively obtained, there is no reported decision.

305 See United States ex rel. Donnelly v. Mulligan, 76 F.2d 511 (2d Cir. 1935). See also Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972) (granting re-extradition to New York in light of absence of protest from Italy. Extradition was granted on basis of comity to the district court of Massachusetts to face charges of conspiracy to import heroin; however, after arriving in the United States, a district court in New York handed the defendants a second indictment charging other narcotics offenses). See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998).

Another problem arises with respect to cases involving extradition by comity, in whole or in part. In 1972, the Second Circuit in Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States[306] affirmed the specialty principle even in cases of surrender by comity, by holding that the principle "reflects a fundamental concern of governments that persons who are surrendered should not be subject to indiscriminate prosecution by the receiving government."[307] But the Second Circuit held that the application of the principle, when surrender is by comity, is primarily designed to inure to the benefit of the requested state. Thus, in such cases (in the Second Circuit) the surrendered person lacks standing to raise the issue unless the surrendering state protests, or when the prosecution breaks faith with the purposes of the surrender by comity. In that case, appellants, both French nationals, were originally indicted in the District Court of Massachusetts for conspiring to import heroin in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 171. Warrants at that time could not be executed, but the appellants were later found in Italy. The appellants were extradited from Italy to the United States on charges of importing heroin into the United States. Acknowledging that there was no provision for narcotic offenses in the 1868 Extradition Convention with Italy, 15 Stat. 269 and subsequent amendments, the Italian government granted extradition as an act of comity, independent of the treaty.

After the appellants were returned to the United States and released on $250,000 bail in the District of Massachusetts, they were subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury in the Southern District of New York. When they appeared, they were arrested under an indictment issued that day charging them with receiving, concealing, selling, and facilitating the transportation, concealment, and sale of thirty-seven kilograms of heroin in New York. Bail was set at $100,000, which neither could post. Appellants filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that their detention was on charges other than those for which they were extradited. The Southern District of New York, meanwhile, returned a superseding indictment charging appellants with conspiracy to violate the narcotics laws and two other substantive offenses. The petition for their release was denied, and they were tried on these charges and found guilty.

When the Second Circuit revisited the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Rauscher,[308] it stated:

---

306 Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972). See also Berenguer v. Vance, 473 F. Supp. 1195, 1197 (D.D.C. 1979), wherein the court cited Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973), and United States ex rel. Donnelly v. Mulligan, 76 F.2d 511 (2d Cir. 1935), for the statement that "the rule of specialty is not a right of the accused but is rather a privilege of the asylum state by which its interests are protected." In Mulligan, the court concluded that "[e]xtradition treaties are for the benefit of the contracting parties and are a means of providing for their social security and protection against criminal acts, and it is for this reason that rights of asylum and immunity belong to the state of refuge and not to the criminal." Id. at 513. See also United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3d Cir. 1991) (stating that as a sovereign nation, the asylum nation has certain powers over the fugitives within its territory). Thus, a state that expels a person who is then seized by another state cannot subsequently claim the applicability of the principle of specialty. But if the person was expelled under false representations made by the prosecuting state, which pursued this practice instead of seeking extradition, the expelling state can request the return of the expelled individual on the basis of false representation and purposeful evasion of extradition by the prosecuting state. In a sense, this return request is akin to the remedy that the principle of specialty would give rise to.

307 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 481.

308 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 409 (1886). See supra notes 196–202 and accompanying text.

> Rauscher's conviction of an offense for which he was not and could not have been extradited did not violate the treaty, which was silent as to the rights of a person extradited thereunder; it violated a rule of what we would now call United States foreign relations law devised by the courts to implement the treaty.[309]

Judge Henry Friendly saw no reason in principle to apply specialty when extradition has been granted by an act of comity by the surrendering nation, unless the prosecuting state acted in a way that would be deemed a breach of an implicit or explicit understanding between the United States and the surrendering state.

The court found that the remedy enunciated in Rauscher[310] must be applied in the context for which it was designed, in that the principle of specialty imposes limitations upon the requesting state not to prosecute the relator for any offense other than that for which he was surrendered in the context of extradition. The object of this rule is to prevent the requesting state from violating its international obligations vis-à-vis the surrendering state. By analogy, therefore, it was essential in Fiocconi[311] to determine whether the surrendering state would regard the prosecution at issue as a breach of its relations with the United States. In the absence of any affirmative protest from Italy, the court did not believe that the government would regard as a breach of faith by the United States the prosecution of appellants for subsequent offenses of the same character as the crime for which they were extradited.

Although the United States had not made a preliminary showing in Italy with respect to the New York indictment, as it did concerning the one in Massachusetts, the court noted:

> [W]e presume the United States is willing to submit such proof if Italy desires it, and with appellants now having been found guilty, there can scarcely be doubt that sufficient proof to warrant extradition exists.[312]

Fiocconi was later followed by the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Kaufman.[313] In that case, two relators, the Franks brothers, were originally brought to the United States after an arrest in Mexico by DEA agents and Mexican federal judicial police to face charges in Louisiana under a January 1986 indictment for participating in a drug conspiracy. After a trial conviction of one brother and dismissal of charges against the other, both brothers were transferred to Texas to face charges pursuant to a July 1986 indictment for various other drug offenses.

As in Fiocconi, the relators argued their detention and trial on the second Texas indictment were in violation of the CIL principle of specialty. The Franks brothers argued that because they had been extradited to the United States for the Louisiana charge, the district court in Texas lacked personal jurisdiction to detain or prosecute them, as Mexico had not granted extradition on the basis of these offenses. The court rejected this contention and followed Fiocconi for the basic principle that specialty preserves the requesting state from a breach of faith by the requested state whether or not the surrendering state acted pursuant to a treaty. The remedy required a determination of whether Mexico would regard the prosecution for the Texas indictment a breach of the United States' international obligations toward Mexico.

The court held that, given the nature of the charges alleged in Louisiana, the indictment was identical in character to the nature of the charges alleged in the Texas indictment. Given that 309 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 479. See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998). For a critical appraisal, see Note, International Extradition, the Principle of Specialty, and Effective Treaty Enforcement, 76 Minn. L. Rev. 1017 (1992).

---

310 Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 409.

311 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 480.

312 Id. at 481.

313 United States v. Kaufman, 858 F.2d 994 (5th Cir. 1988); reh'g denied, 874 F.2d 242 (5th Cir. 1989), aff'd sub nom., Franks v. Harwell, 869 F.2d 1485 (5th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 895 (1989).

Mexico made no protest against the prosecution of the Franks brothers in Texas, the court concluded that no basis existed to conclude that Mexico was or had reason to be offended by the Texas prosecution, and therefore no breach of the treaty's provisions existed.

This view of specialty fails to take into account the relator as a participant in the extradition process and his/her right to uphold such a doctrine when a requested state acts at variance with an extradition order, regardless of whether the surrendering state deems such actions a breach of trust, or a breach of international relations. But it is important to note that if the relator is given the right (i.e., standing) to raise the question, and the Court's legal standard is whether the variance constituted a breach of faith with the surrendering state or of a rule of CIL, then the rights of the relator are properly guaranteed.[314] Thus, Fiocconi stands for the proposition that comity can supplement existing treaty practice, but by implication, comity does carry with it the same limitations as does treaty-based extradition.

United States v. Najohn[315] is a further example of a case in which specialty did not bar the prosecution of the defendant for an additional offense not contained in the original indictment, but to which the surrendering state agreed. Indeed it is well-established that a surrendering state can waive specialty without the relator's consent or knowledge unless the law of the surrendering state requires it. In Najohn the defendant was convicted in Pennsylvania on the charges for which he was extradited, namely interstate transportation of stolen property in violation of 18 U.S.C § 2314. While serving his sentence, the Northern District of California indicted Najohn for the same charge as well as for the receipt of stolen property and conspiracy.[316] The defendant moved to dismiss the indictment, arguing that the California charges were barred by the extradition treaty between the United States and Switzerland, as well as by specific language in the Swiss court's extradition order.

The principle of specialty, as contained in the extradition treaty between the United States and Switzerland, however, contained a specific provision relating to specialty, which defeated the defendant's argument, namely that "[T]he extradited party may be tried for a crime other than that for which he was surrendered if the asylum country consents."[317] Two letters regarding the original charge from the Magistrate of the District Court of Zurich and from the Swiss Embassy to the United States asking and agreeing that the principle of specialty be suspended were deemed to have authorized the waiver of the rule. In response to the defendant's argument that this was not sufficient proof of consent, the court stated: "Najohn suggests no reason why the requirement for Swiss consent to prosecution for these crimes should be more rigorous now that he is already in United States custody."[318] The defendant's motion was thus denied.

The legislative requirement that the United States grant extradition only by virtue of a treaty provides a guarantee to the relator that the provisions of the treaty will be applied. This position was developed in United States v. Rauscher.[319] The rule in the United States is that the 314 This position, which has been advanced by publicists and is found in the practice of many states, is also embodied in such multilateral treaties as the European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, 597 U.N.T.S 338. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition in the American Practice and World Public Order, 36 Tenn. L. Rev. 1, 15 (1968). Because a relator raises a claim of the violation of specialty, this claim must fairly construe the scope of the extradition request as understood by the requested state. If the full context of the extradition proceedings between the requested and requesting states show that the conduct at issue was understood to be within the scope of the requesting state's extradition request, the relator's specialty argument will fail. See United States v. Bout, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 84826, at *13–*17 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).

315 United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986).

316 18 U.S.C. § 2315 (2000) and 18 U.S.C. § 371 (2000), respectively.

317 Najohn, 785 F.2d at 1422 (emphasis added).

318 Id. at 1423.

319 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

principle of specialty is a part of CIL as recognized and applied in the United States.[320] In United States v. Paroutian,[321] the court held that "[T]he test whether trial is for a 'separate offense' should not be some technical refinement of local law, but whether the extraditing country would consider the offense actually tried 'separate.' "[322] As further stated in Fiocconi v. Attorney General:[323] "The 'principle of specialty' reflects a fundamental concern of governments that persons who are surrendered should not be subjected to indiscriminate prosecution by the receiving government . . . "[324]

Evidentiary issues are also raised as a part of specialty in connection with dual criminality and double jeopardy. In United States v. Saccoccia[325] an interlocutory appeal before the Ninth Circuit was dismissed because the issues could be raised on appeal. Because the case had originated in Rhode Island, the appeal was before the First Circuit, which summarily rejected these claims, confusing the requirements of dual criminality and specialty. The First Circuit held that:

> Although the principles of dual criminality and specialty are closely allied, they are not coterminous. We elaborate below.
>
> 1. Dual Criminality. The principle of dual criminality dictates that, as a general rule, an extraditable offense must be a serious crime (rather than a mere peccadillo) punishable under the criminal laws of both the surrendering and the requesting state. See Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 847 (1st Cir. 1980). The current extradition treaty between the United States and Switzerland embodies this concept. See Treaty of Extradition, May 14, 1900, U.S.–Switz., Art. II, 31 Stat. 1928, 1929–30 (Treaty).
>
> The principle of dual criminality does not demand that the laws of the surrendering and requesting states be carbon copies of one another. Thus, dual criminality will not be defeated by differences in the instrumentalities or in the stated purposes of the two nations' laws. See Peters v. Egnor, 888 F.2d 713, 719 (10th Cir. 1989). By the same token, the counterpart crimes need not have identical elements. See Matter of Extradition of Russell, 789 F.2d 801, 803 (9th Cir. 1986). Instead, dual criminality is deemed to be satisfied when the two countries' laws are substantially analogous. See Peters, 888 F.2d at 719; Brauch, 618 F.2d at 851. Moreover, in mulling dual criminality concerns, courts are duty bound to defer to a surrendering sovereign's reasonable determination that the offense in question is extraditable. See Casey v. Department of State, 299 U.S. App. D.C. 29, 980 F.2d 1472, 1477 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (observing that an American court must give great difference to a foreign court's determination in extradition proceedings); United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d 424, 429 (9th Cir. 1987) (similar) cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1042, 98 L. Ed. 2d 859, 108 S. Ct. 773 (1988).

---

320 Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 3(h) (1988).

321 United States v. Paroutia, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962).

322 Id. at 490–491. See, e.g., United States v. Kaufman, 858 F.2d 994, 1008 (5th Cir. 1988) (concluding that Italy, the extraditing nation, would have regarded the superseding indictment, including the later narcotics charges in New York, as simply a technical jurisdictional question within the United States system, and not as a filing of new charges); United States v. Evans, 667 F. Supp. 974, 979 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

323 Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972). See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998).

324 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 481. See Leighnor v. Turner, 884 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1989); United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987); United States v. Jetter, 722 F.2d 371 (8th Cir. 1983); United States v. Rossi, 545 F.2d 814 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 430 U.S. 907 (1977); United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976); United States v. Sturtz, 648 F. Supp. 817 (S.D.N.Y. 1986); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977); Feller, supra note 124.

325 United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995). See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 200 (1st Cir. 1998).

Mechanically, then, the inquiry into dual criminality requires courts to compare the law of the surrendering state that purports to criminalize the charged conduct with the law of the requesting state that purports to accomplish the same result. If the same conduct is subject to criminal sanctions in both jurisdictions, no more is exigible. See United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326, 328 (10th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1049, 112 L. Ed. 2d 778, 111 S. Ct. 759 (1991); see also Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 312, 66 L. Ed. 956, 42 S. Ct. 469 (1992) ("It is enough [to satisfy the requirement of dual criminality] if the particular act charged is criminal in both jurisdictions.").

2. Specialty. The principle of specialty—a corollary to the principle of dual criminality, see United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463, 1465 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1027, 103 L. Ed. 2d 217, 109 S. Ct. 1158 (1989)—generally requires that an extradited defendant be tried for the crimes on which extradition has been granted, and none other. See Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d at 428; Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 783 (9th Cir.) cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882, 93 L. Ed. 2d 247, 107 S. Ct. 271 (1986). The extradition treaty in force between the United States and Switzerland embodies this concept, providing that an individual may not be "prosecuted or punished for any offense committed before the demand for extradition, other than that for which the extradition is granted . . . ." Treaty, Art. IX.

Enforcement of the principle of specialty is founded primarily on international comity. See United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146, 151 (8th Cir. 1987). The requesting state must "live up to whatever promises it made in order to obtain extradition" because preservation of the institution of extradition requires the continuing cooperation of the surrendering state. United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009, 93 L. Ed. 2d 707, 107 S. Ct. 652 (1986). Since the doctrine is grounded in international comity rather than in some right of the defendant, the principle of specialty may be waived by the asylum state. See id.

Specialty, like dual criminality, is not a hidebound dogma, but must be applied in a practical, commonsense fashion. Thus, obeisance to the principle of specialty does not require that a defendant be prosecuted only under the precise indictment that prompted his extradition, see United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435-36 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 130 L. Ed. 2d 883, 115 S. Ct. 938 (1995), or that the prosecution always be limited to specific offenses enumerated in the surrendering state's extradition order, see Levy, 905 F.2d at 329 (concluding that a Hong Kong court intended to extradite defendant to face a continuing criminal enterprise charge despite the court's failure specifically to mention that charge in the deportation order). In the same vein, the principle of specialty does not impose any limitation on the particulars of the charges lodged by the requesting nation, nor does it demand departure from the forum's existing rules of practice (such as rules of pleading, evidence, or procedure). See United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402, 1414 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1032 (1990); Thirion, 813 F.2d at 153; Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 583 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016, 89 L. Ed. 2d 312, 106 S. Ct. 1198 (1986).

In the last analysis, then, the inquiry into specialty boils down to whether, under the totality of the circumstances, the court in the requesting state reasonably believes that prosecuting the defendant on particular charges contradicts the surrendering state's manifested intentions, or, phrased another way, whether the surrendering state would deem the conduct for which the requesting state actually prosecutes the defendant as interconnected with (as opposed to independent from) the acts for which he was extradited. See Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1439; United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1427–28 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1012, 103 L. Ed. 2d 185, 109 S. Ct. 1122 (1989); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486, 490–91 (2d Cir. 1962).

A district court's interpretation of the principles of dual criminality and specialty traditionally involves a question of law and is, therefore, subject to plenary review in the court of appeals. See Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1434; United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368, 1372 F.2d 1168, 1173 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 107 (1992). Marching beneath this banner, appellant urges that his conviction must be set aside for three related reasons. (There is some dispute whether alleged violations of the principle of specialty can be raised by a criminal defendant. See, e.g., Demjanjuk, 776 F.2d at 583–84 (questioning whether the person being extradited > "has standing to assert the principle of specialty"); Kaiser v. Rutherford, 827 F. Supp. 832, 835 (D.D.C. 1993) (asserting that "the rule of specialty is not a right of the accused but is a privilege of the asylum state and therefore [the defendant] has no standing to raise this issue") (internal quotation marks omitted). We need not probe the matter of standing for three reasons.

>
> First, while we take no view of the issue, we realize that there are two sides to the story, and the side that favors individual standing has much to commend it. See, e.g., United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 422-24, 30 L. Ed. 425, 7 S. Ct. 234 (1886) (referring to specialty as a "right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country" via extradition proceedings); Thirion, 813 F.2d at 151 & n. 5 (to like effect); see also United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 659–60, 119 L. Ed. 2d 441, 112 S. Ct. 2188 (1992) (suggesting the continuing vitality of the Rauscher decision).
>
> Second, the government has advised us that, for policy reasons, it does not challenge appellant's standing in this instance. Third, appellant's asseverations are more easily dismissed on the merits. See Norton v. Mathews, 427 U.S. 524, 532, 49 L. Ed. 2d 672, 96 S. Ct. 2771 (1976) (explaining that jurisdictional questions may be bypassed when a ruling on the merits will achieve the same result). None has merit."[326]

In these cases, the defendants, Stephen and Donna Saccoccia, were extradited from Switzerland on money laundering and RICO charges, but the requested state refused to grant extradition on CTR violations. In the Rhode Island prosecution, the government introduced evidence of CTR violations to prove the necessary predicates for RICO. The question therefore was whether evidence that cannot be used to prove guilt can be used to prove a predicate crime without which conviction of the more serious crime cannot be obtained. The defense argued against it, in part in reliance upon United States v. Najohn.[327] The prosecution relied on United States v. Thirion,[328] United States v. Kember,[329] United States v. Archhold-Newball,[330] United States v. Flores,[331] and more particularly United States v. Alvarez-Moreno.[332] Thirion held that "the doctrine of specialty does not purport to regulate the scope of proof admissible in the judicial forum of the requisitioning state."[333]

It is indeed entirely valid that specialty does not control the admissibility of evidence needed to prove a crime for which extradition was granted. To hold otherwise would unjustifiably burden extradition requests with details of evidence intended to be introduced at trial. But there is nonetheless a distinction to be drawn between evidence needed to prove a crime for which extradition was granted and evidence of criminality for a crime that has been specifically excluded from the extradition granted by the requested state.[334] This is particularly significant

---

326 Saccoccia, 58 F.3d at 766–776. For the First Circuit's opinion, see United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995). See also United States v. Hurley, 63 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995).

327 United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986).

328 United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 46 (8th Cir. 1987).

329 United States v. Kember, 685 F.2d 451 (D.C. Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 832 (1982).

330 United States v. Archhold-Newball, 554 F.2d 665 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1000 (1977).

331 United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976).

332 United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1032 (1990).

333 Id. at 1413–1414. For other cases allowing introduction of evidence of crimes or matters unrelated to the crimes for which extradition was granted, see United States v. Bowe, 221 F.3d 1183 (11th Cir. 2000); United States v. Monsalve, 841 F.2d 1120 (3d. Cir. 1999); United States v. LeBaron, 15 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998); United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th Cir. 1995); United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435 (9th Cir. 1994); United States v. Arcbold-Newhall, 554, 2d. 6651, 685 (5th Cir. 1977); United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976).

334 This is a fine distinction to make, which has been made in various cases involving evidence that may be presented for conspiracy charges. See Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89 (2008).

with respect to RICO prosecutions, which are predicated on other crimes whose exclusion from prosecution by specialty should also be excluded from being used as evidence to prove a predicate offense, because the predicate offense cannot be charged as a crime. But without proof of guilt the legal elements of the ultimate crime cannot be proven. This situation is due to the nature and peculiarity of RICO, which relies on predicate offenses to create a new crime that is, ultimately, only a legislative fiction designed to enhance the penalties for persons who engage in multiple crimes of a certain type.

Applying specialty to evidentiary matters, the district court in United States v. Kember[335] found no requirement that evidence admitted at the trial of a relator extradited from the United Kingdom to the United States be limited to the evidence presented at the relator's extradition hearing. The Kember court noted that the scope of proof admissible into evidence in the requesting state was broadly interpreted in United States v. Flores,[336] which did not bar admissibility of evidence of prior offenses even though prosecution for such offenses was barred by the principle of specialty or other preclusions to prosecution.

The complexity of statutes such as RICO, money laundering, CTR requirements, and CCE in drug-related crimes frequently causes the government to issue superseding indictments after the surrender of a relator. In those cases, the United States can make a supplemental request to the requested state in order to obtain permission to prosecute on the new, additional, or altered charges. More commonly, these superseding indictments add newly discovered facts or refine the charges on the basis of which extradition was requested. These situations present mixed questions of law and fact. Where only questions of fact and supporting evidence arise, they usually are found not to be in violation of specialty. If the superseding indictment alters the charges to lesser ones, though still in reliance on the same substantial or essential facts, specialty is also not deemed to be violated. But, if the charges or facts are substantially different, then there is a violation of specialty. Because of the mixed question of law and fact, and also because treaty provisions differ, court decisions vary. United States v. Andonian[337] reviews some of these problems:

> We review de novo the district court's determination that the prosecution on the superseding indictment did not violate the doctrine of specialty. United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368, 1372 (9th Cir. 1993).
>
> "The doctrine of 'specialty' prohibits the requesting nation from prosecuting the extradited individual for any offense other than that for which the surrendering state agreed to extradite."

---

335 United States v. Kember, 685 F.2d 451 (D.C. Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 832 (1982).

336 United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976). In United States v. DiTommasso, 817 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1987), the court narrowed the "specialty doctrine" where a person waived extradition and agreed to be "deported" to the United States and a second superseding indictment enlarged the conspiracy charges under which he was originally arrested in Bermuda. The court in effect treated the waiver of extradition under the United Kingdom's Fugitive Offenders Act of 1870 (applicable in Bermuda) as falling outside the narrower scope of "specialty," as required by the Treaty and U.S. precedents. The court thus also avoided the issue of whether the defendant could raise objections that the requested state could have raised. See United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that the doctrine of specialty was not violated by the introduction of uncharged offenses admitted to prove the scope of the charged conspiracies, intent, and nature of the offenses charged where the defendant was tried only for the precise offense contained in the extradition order), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009 (1986); United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1032 (1990); United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435, (9th Cir. 1994); United States v. LeBaron, 15 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998); United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th Cir. 1995); United States v. Arcbold-Newhall, 554 2d. 6651, 685 (5th Cir. 1977); United States v. Bowe, 221 F.3d 1183 (11th Cir. 2000); United States v. Monsalve, 841 F.2d 1120 (3d. Cir. Mar. 5, 1999); United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976). See also Sara C. Schoenwetter, Comment, United States v. Flores, 3 Brook. J. Int'l. L. 293 (1977).

337 Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432. See also United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal. 1998).

United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 827 F.2d 424, 428 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1042, 108 S.Ct. 773, 98 L.Ed.2d 859 (1988).[338] The doctrine is based on principles of international comity: to protect its own citizens in prosecutions abroad, the United States guarantees that it will honor limitations placed on prosecutions in the United States. United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1426 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1012, 109 S.Ct. 1122, 103 L.Ed.2d 185 (1989). Our concern is with ensuring that the obligations of the requesting nation are satisfied. United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009, 107 S.Ct. 652, 93 L.Ed.2d 707 (1986). "Because of this, the protection exists only to the extent that the surrendering country wishes." Id. An extradited person may raise whatever objections the extraditing country is entitled to raise. Cuevas, 847 F.2d at 1426; Najohn, 785 F.2d at 1422.

We look to the language of the applicable treaty to determine the protection an extradited person is afforded under the doctrine of specialty. The treaty with Uruguay, pursuant to which Vivas was extradited, provides:

> A person extradited under the present Treaty shall not be detained, tried or punished in the territory of the requesting Party for an offense other than that for which extradition has been granted . . . unless . . . the requested Party has manifested its consent to his detention, trial or punishment for an offense other than that for which extradition was granted . . . .

Treaty on Extradition and Cooperation in Penal Matters, April 6, 1973, U.S.–Uru., art. 13, T.I.A.S. No. 10850 at 17–18 [hereinafter "Treaty"]. An extradited person, in any case, "may be tried for a crime other than that for which he was surrendered, if the asylum country consents." Najohn, 785 F.2d at 1422 (quoting Berenguer v. Vance, 473 F.Supp. 1195, 1197 (D.D.C.1979) (emphasis in original)).

. . .

We agree with the government that the appropriate test for this case is "whether the extraditing country would consider the acts for which the defendant was prosecuted as independent from those for which he was extradited." Cuevas, 847 F.2d at 1428 (citing United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486, 491 (2d Cir. 1962)).[339]

. . .

Vivas argues that the doctrine of specialty was further violated because he was not tried on the same facts as those presented to the government of Uruguay. Specifically, he asserts that the United States convinced Uruguay with insufficient and false evidence that Vivas was involved in drug trafficking and that the United States then tried him on different evidence.

The doctrine of specialty has been interpreted as requiring that "the prosecution be based on the same facts as those set forth in the request for extradition." United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888, 895-96 (D.C.Cir.1989) (quotation omitted). The defendant in Sensi argued that he could not be tried on a 26-count indictment naming offenses that had not been listed before the magistrate of the surrendering country. The court found that the language of the treaty required that the charges against the defendant be established "by the facts in respect of which his extradition [was] granted." Id. at 896 (quoting the relevant treaty).

. . .

Second, we note that the doctrine of specialty "has never been construed to permit foreign intrusion into the evidentiary or procedural rules of the requisitioning state, as distinguished from limiting the jurisdiction of domestic courts to try or punish the fugitive for any crimes committed before the extradition, except the crimes for which he was extradited." United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146, 153 (8th Cir. 1987) (quotations omitted). The doctrine of specialty is satisfied if the extraditing country honors the limitations placed on the prosecution by the > surrendering state. See Cuevas, 847 F.2d at 1426. The government is not required, under the auspices of specialty, to try a defendant on the same evidence that was presented to the surrendering state, so long as it satisfies the requirement that trial is for the same offenses arising out of the same allegations of fact.[340]

338 Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1434–1435. See also Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416.

339 Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1434–1435. See also Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416.

In United States v. Thirion,[341] mentioned above, the Eighth Circuit held that this principle is not violated when the prosecution provides evidence at trial establishing a defendant's membership in a conspiracy even when the requested state claims that conspiracy is neither provided for under its laws nor included on the list of extraditable offenses. In this case, the United States requested extradition from Monaco for the return of Thirion to face charges relating to an advance fee loan scheme. Monaco agreed to Thirion's extradition for every offense except for conspiracy, as this crime is not provided for under the laws of Monaco, and is not included in the list of offenses giving rise to extradition under Article II of the bilateral Treaty.[342] At trial, inclusion of the conspiracy count was sustained over the defendant's objections. However, the court instructed the jury not to return a verdict on this count. Consequently, on appeal the issue was whether the principle of specialty prohibits the government from establishing Thirion's membership in the conspiracy as an evidentiary fact to prove guilt in other substantive offenses. In stating that the principle does not prohibit the introduction and use of evidence of a crime for which extradition was denied, the court held that the principle is not construed to permit alteration of existing rules of evidence or procedure "as distinguished from limiting the jurisdiction of domestic courts to try or punish the fugitive for any crimes committed before the extradition, except the crimes for which he was extradited."[343] The Eleventh Circuit has relied on Thirion as an analog with regard to a defendant's challenge to a Pinkerton instruction with respect to a charge where the relator was extradited as a principal, and ruled "that the doctrine of specialty did not prohibit the government from seeking to establish a defendant's membership in a conspiracy as an 'evidentiary fact to prove guilt' in connection with the offenses for which he had been extradited."[344]

In another case, the court held that the surrendering government's silence regarding prosecution of the defendant on all the charges in the extradition request did not provide a basis to conclude that prosecution of the relator on all such charges in the extradition request was not indiscriminate. The court in Khan[345] would not infer from Pakistan's silence concerning a particular count an agreement to extradite the relator on all counts in the extradition request where the extradition documents did not specifically refer to allegations of that count. The court held that the operative language of the treaty between the United States and Pakistan did not create a presumption that the principle of specialty would be satisfied in all cases where the prosecution is based on the same facts as those set forth in the request for extradition. The relevant provision of the treaty stated:

> A person surrendered can in no case be [prosecuted] . . . for any other crime or offence, or on account of any other matters, than those for which the extradition shall have taken place.[346]

The court concluded that this language suggests the need for an affirmative statement by the surrendering country on the counts upon which the extradition is based. Because Pakistan did not unambiguously agree to extradite Khan on the basis of the particular count in question,

---

340 Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1438. See also Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416.

341 United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987).

342 Id. at 150 n.4.

343 Id. at 153. See also United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939, 944 (2d Cir. 1976).

344 See Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89, 97–98 (2008) (discussing Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 48 F.3d 502, 503 (11th Cir. 1995)).

345 United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1993).

346 Extradition Treaty, Mar. 9, 1942, U.S.–Pak., Art. 7, 47 Stat. 2124.

the principle of specialty had not been satisfied, and the court reversed Khan's conviction on this count.[347]

An earlier Second Circuit case, Shapiro v. Ferrandina,[348] excluded prosecution in the requesting state for crimes committed before the request for extradition had been granted by the requesting state, if such crimes were not part of the extradition order. Nothing, however, precludes a requesting state from amending its request and including new offenses, provided they are within the meaning of the treaty and are offenses for which extradition can be granted. Similarly, nothing precludes a requesting state, which has received custody of an accused, from presenting a new request to the originally requested state for prosecuting the accused for another crime, and it would be the decision of the requested state to grant or deny it. In the United States such a procedure might require a new hearing, unless the new request is for a crime related to the one for which the original request was granted. This is particularly true with respect to any included offense.[349]

In Berenguer v. Vance,[350] where the United States was the extraditing state, the court consented to an expansion of an extradition order without a hearing before the final disposition of the accused's original case in Italy. Berenguer was extradited to Italy on a murder and aggravated battery charge, was acquitted, and subsequently arrested and detained following the U.S. government's consent to an expansion of the extradition order to include illegal possession of a military firearm. The court, in holding that a second hearing following extradition was not required, noted that "the rule of specialty is not a right of the accused but is rather a privilege of the asylum state by which its interests are protected."[351] Thus, the court stated that:

> Although the charges on which petitioner was extradited differ from that under which he stands accused, the Court cannot say that he has been deprived of his due process rights. As long as petitioner, who is a French national, was within the jurisdiction of the United States, this judicial system acted to protect the full panoply of his rights as vigorously as it would the rights of any citizen. Once his extradition was accomplished, however, he became subject to the judicial process of the receiving nation and could no longer claim a right to a judicial hearing on due process grounds. . . . This is not to say that a defendant could never successfully argue that he has a right to a hearing before expansion of an extradition order. If, for instance, a judicial officer refused to find probable cause on a specific charge and the requesting country thereafter sought to obtain the asylum country's consent to try the defendant on that same charge after accomplishing his extradition for a different offense, a court's determination might be very different. Such a situation would raise the possibility of a deliberate effort to evade the safeguards established to protect the defendant's rights.[352]

---

347 Kahn, 993 F.2d at 1374. See also Ahmed v. Morton, 1996 WL 118543 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 1996); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

348 Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973).

349 See Bassiouni, supra note 67, at 505–507.

350 Berenguer v. Vance, 473 F. Supp. 1195 (D.D.C. 1979). In United States v. Van Cauwenberghe, 814 F.2d 1329, 1334 (9th Cir.), op. superceded, 827 F.2d 424 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1042 (1988), the court characterized the "doctrine of specialty" as an act of "international comity," which the requested state can waive. Implicit in such a characterization is that in the case of prosecutorial variance by the requesting state, only the requested state can object and not the relator-defendant. It is the view of this writer that the rule of specialty is a rule of international law the breach of which gives rise to a relator's right to object to prosecutorial variance, and to be upheld by the court, if proven right, even without the intervention or objection of the requested state (see infra Sec. 7.4).

351 Berenguer, 473 F. Supp. at 1197 (citing Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973)). See also United States ex rel. Donnelly v. Mulligan, 76 F.2d 511 (2d Cir. 1935).

352 Berenguer, 473 F. Supp. at 1198 (citations omitted).

Additionally, the court noted that the doctrine of separation of powers compelled its decision, noting that:

> Judge Friendly's observation in Shapiro v. Ferrandina, in commenting upon the American practice of refusing to try an extradited party for a crime other than one enumerated in a relevant treaty, seems particularly appropriate here:
>
> This self-imposed restraint, however, need not necessarily imply that in the converse situation, when courts of this country are examining an extradition request from a foreign nation, we should seek to impose limits on the scope of subsequent prosecution of a person who is to be extradited for at least one crime in any event. Since such a ruling can only be advisory in character, and in certain circumstances might cause embarrassments to the executive branch in the conduct of foreign affairs, arguably it should be left to the Secretary of State to determine whether to seek to impose any limitations since he alone will have the duty of making a response if the requesting state chooses not to follow our limitations.[353]

In any such event, the record of the original extradition hearing should contain evidence of probable cause that such a crime had been committed, as is required by legislation or by treaty.

The requirement of a new hearing to determine probable cause for an included or related offense depends on the applicable treaty or the legislation. No hearing is required in states that do not have a similar statutory requirement, such as the United States' § 3184, or that do not consider the principle of specialty as the prerogative of the requested state.[354]

6.5. Use of Evidence for Crimes for Which Extradition Was Not Granted and for Purposes of Sentencing Enhancement[355]

The Eleventh Circuit held in United States v. Garcia that a sentence enhancement was outside the purview of the principle of specialty and that specialty does not control evidentiary rules in U.S. courts.[356] The rule is not violated by the admission of evidence of crimes that an individual was not extradited for if it is relevant to the crime charged. The Court held:

> Thus, evidence of money-laundering (for which extradition was specifically refused) was nevertheless admissible as evidence within the trial court's discretion for the purpose of proving a drug conspiracy (the crime for which extradition was granted). United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402, 1413–14 (11 Cir.1989). Similarly, even in the face of a refusal by a foreign government to extradite for aiding and abetting a drug conspiracy under 18 U.S.C. § 2, the doctrine of specialty was held not to preclude the instruction of the jury on the theory of vicarious liability approved in Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 66 S. Ct. 1180, 90 L. Ed. 1489 (1946), United States v. Gallo-Chamorro, 48 F.3d 502 (11th Cir. 1995).[357]

---

353 Id. (emphasis added).

354 See 2 Daniel P. O'Connell, International Law 805–806 (1965).

355 See generally, Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89, 101–104 (2008).

356 United States v. Garcia, 208 F.3d 1258 (11th Cir. 2000). This case is peculiar in that the sentence enhancement was based on the relator's voluntary guilty plea, which the relator later argued was involuntary. He filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus; the federal district remanded to the magistrate for a hearing on voluntariness. The court found the guilty plea to be voluntary, and that the petitioner had full knowledge of what he was pleading guilty to, and was not misled or erroneously advised on the plea. The Supreme Court vacated the Eleventh Circuit judgment and remanded the case for further consideration in light of Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000); on remand at 251 F.3d 160 (11th Cir. 2001), cert. denied 534 U.S. 823 (2001), reh'g denied 534 U.S. 1102 (2002), motion to vacate denied by 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42119 (N.D. Fla. 2006).

357 Id. at 1261.

The Garcia court continued:

> The doctrine of specialty, as interpreted in our law, does not call for the extradition crime to be handled in a vacuum, in any of its phases. Thus, for example, an indictment in existence at the time of extradition can be lawfully superseded after extradition by an indictment charging larger quantities of drugs. United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th Cir. 1995). See also United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir.1991); United States v. Rossi, 545 F.2d 814 (2d Cir.1976); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir.1962).
>
> With respect to the doctrine of specialty and U.S. law governing sentencing, the doctrine of specialty does not restrict the scope of proof of other crimes that may be considered in the sentencing process. The distinction is thus drawn between proof of other crimes as a matter germane to the determination of punishment for the extradited crime and proof of other crimes in order to exact punishment for those other crimes. Only the latter course is forbidden by the doctrine of specialty.
>
> Appellant also challenges the District Court's enhancement of his sentence for obstruction of justice. The factual findings involved in such an enhancement are reviewed by this court for clear error. The application of the law to those factual findings is reviewed de novo, United States v. Arguedas 86 F.3d 1054, 1059 (11th Cir. 1996). The sentencing court made this finding by stating that "it is clear to this Court beyond a reasonable doubt this defendant did obstruct and attempt to obstruct justice by all of the activities following the murder . . . ." The Court found the position of the probation office on the question of obstruction to be the correct one. That position advocated enhancement for 3 reasons: first the burying of the guns, second, the instruction to the secretary and third, the flight to Canada.[358]

The Eleventh Circuit affirmed its position in Gallo-Chamorro v. United States.[359] Here, the court seemed to have taken too literally the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations, which referred to "specialty" as "comity."[360] In 2010 the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the rule set forth in United States v. Bowe that "the doctrine of specialty limits only the charges on which an extradited defendant can be tried; it does not affect the scope of proof admissible at trial for the charges for which extradition was granted, and it does not alter the forum country's evidentiary rules."[361] In United States v. Knowles, the relator argued that the principle of specialty barred the introduction of evidence related to a previous drug conspiracy case involving him (for which extradition had not been granted) to support the separate drug conspiracy case for which he was extradited.[362] The court rejected this argument, noting the holding in a prior Eleventh Circuit case that "the rule of specialty is not violated when evidence is properly admitted under the inextricably intertwined doctrine to reflect the scope of the conspiracies, to prove intent, and to aid the jury in determining the nature of the offenses charged."[363] The relator also challenged the forfeiture verdict against him as the forfeiture count was not contained in the warrant of surrender, and it was violative of the diplomatic note requiring the U.S. government to submit a formal application if it wished to waive the specialty rule.[364] The court rejected this argument

---

358 Id.

359 Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 29555 (11th Cir. Nov. 21, 2000). See also United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463 (11th Cir. 1988) (relying on United States v. Najhon, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986), United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1988)); United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991).

360 United States v. Sensi, 879 F.2d 888 (D.C. Cir. 1989). See also, however, United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991); United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1462 (11th Cir. 1988); United States v. Najhon, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986); United States v. Jetter, 722 F.2d 371 (8th Cir. 1983).

361 United States v. Knowles, 390 Fed. Appx. 915, 931 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion).

362 Id. at 917, 931.

363 Id. at 931 (citing United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510, 1520 (11th Cir. 1992)).

364 Id. at 935.

as well, reasoning that criminal forfeiture was an aspect of punishment that followed a substantive conviction, and did not constitute a substantive charge in itself.[365] Thus, the doctrine of specialty, governing substantive criminal charges, was not offended when the relator was subjected to criminal forfeiture charges in this case.[366]

In Saccoccia v. United States, the First Circuit held that introducing evidence of cash transactions requirements violations as a predicate for a RICO charge when the CTR charges were not held extraditable by Switzerland was a violation of the principle of specialty.[367] The problem in that case was that the introduction of CTR violations was not simply an evidentiary question, but was fundamental to establishing responsibility, as a predicate offense for the RICO charge. In this case, the government was able to accomplish through a back-door technique what it could not have accomplished had it made a clear and unambiguous representation to the Swiss government from which it requested extradition. The representation should have been that it needed to prove the CTR violation as a predicate for proving the RICO charge. Switzerland elected not to protest and the First Circuit concluded that proof of CTR violations was evidentiary in nature and was not used to prove the commission of CTR as a crime, but as premises for another crime for which extradition was granted.[368]

In United States v. Garrido-Santana, the relator was extradited from the Dominican Republic after jumping bail after his indictment in the United States. The relator argued that the government agreed to prosecute him only for a narcotics offense for which he was extradited. The relator assumed that the implicit promise that he would not be punished for his failure to appear at his pre-extradition trial for this offense. Thus, the relator combined the principle of specialty with a double-jeopardy argument. The court held that:

> In United States v. Lazarevich, 147 F.3d 1061, 1063 (9th Cir.1998), the Ninth Circuit held that the district court's consideration of a non-extraditable offense of child abduction in increasing the defendant's sentence for passport fraud—the offense for which defendant was extradited—did not constitute "punishment" so as to violate the extradition treaty's incorporated rule of specialty permitting punishment only for the extradited offense. As that court reiterated, extradition treaties are made "within an historical and precedential context . . . that includes the long-standing practice of United States['] courts of considering relevant, uncharged evidence at sentencing." Id. at 1064 (holding that, given the long history of considering relevant evidence, like other criminal behavior, in sentencing—consideration that the Sentencing Guidelines now mandates—as well as Supreme Court precedent, such as Witte, the extradition treaty contemplated consideration of relevant offenses).
>
> Here, we assume arguendo that the extradition treaty contains an implicit promise not to punish defendant for his failure to appear at his arraignment, rather than merely an express promise not to prosecute defendant for any offense other than that for which he was extradited. However, we find that, following the reasoning of both Witte and Lazarevich, the § 3C1.1 enhancement to defendant's sentence on the narcotics offense based upon defendant's failure to appear at his arraignment did not constitute "punishment" for that conduct so as to violate any implicit proscription against such punishment in the extradition treaty. (emphasis added).[10] The district court sentenced defendant on the narcotics charge to 97 months of imprisonment—well within that offense's statutory maximum of 480 months of imprisonment. See 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)(1)(B).
>
> ---
>
> [10] We note that defendant, in challenging his sentence, may lack standing to rely upon the extradition treaty's incorporated rule of specialty. This circuit has not expressly decided

365 Id.

366 Id.

367 U.S. v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995).

368 Id.

> whether an extradited individual has standing to seek the enforcement of that rule. See Demjanjuk, 776 F.2d at 583–84 (observing that a serious question existed as to whether the defendant had standing to assert the rule of specialty because "[t]he right to insist on application of…[that principle] belongs to the requested state, not to the individual whose extradition is requested" yet addressing the merits of such a claim). Other circuit courts either have declined to decide this issue or have considered the issue yet disagree as to its proper resolution. See United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754, 767 n. 6 (1st Cir.1995) (observing the inner-circuit split but taking no position on the issue); United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621, 627 (5th Cir.1998) (clarifying that the Fifth Circuit has yet to decide whether an extradited individual has standing to raise the rule of specialty); United States ex rel. Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165, 168 (3rd Cir.1997) ("Because treaties are agreements between nations, individuals ordinarily may not challenge treaty interpretations in the absence of an express provision within the treaty or an action brought by a signatory nation."); United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326, 329 n. 1 (10th Cir.1990) (holding that an extradited defendant has standing to assert a rule of specialty claim); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir.1986) (holding that an extradited individual "may raise whatever objections [based upon the rule of specialty that] the rendering country might have"); United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567, 1572 (11th Cir.1995) (same); Leighnor v. Turner, 884 F.2d 385, 388 (8th Cir.1989) (holding that it is bound to follow a prior opinion that held the same). However, because we find that defendant's sentence did not violate the extradition treaty's incorporated rule of specialty, we need not decide whether defendant has standing to assert such a claim. U.S. v. Garrido-Santana, 360 F.3d 565, 578 -579 (6th Cir. 2004).

In United States v. Robinson,[369] the Eighth Circuit held that the district court properly considered evidence of prior convictions in sentencing enhancement proceedings, as extradition did not affect the validity of those prior convictions. Following a jury trial involving drug and firearms charges, the relator was sentenced in absentia on all charges after he fled to Brazil after the trial but prior to sentencing.[370] The relator was captured in Brazil and extradited on the drug charges, but not the firearms charges.[371] After unsuccessfully appealing his convictions, the court remanded for resentencing, and the district court judge imposed a 292-month sentence for the drug related charges, but no sentence on the firearms convictions.[372] The extradition treaty provided that:

> A person extradited by virtue of the present Treaty may not be tried or punished by the requesting State for any crime or offense committed prior to the request for his extradition, other than that which gave rise to the request, nor may he be re-extradited by the requesting State to a third country which claims him, unless the surrendering state so agrees or unless the person extradited, having been set at liberty within the requesting State, remains voluntarily in the requesting State for more than 30 days from the date on which he was released. Upon such release, he shall be informed of the consequences to which his stay in the territory of the requesting State would subject him.[373]

As the relator was not tried or punished on the firearms charges, there was no violation of the extradition treaty.[374]

This was not applied in Benitez v. Garcia, where the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court as the surrendering state, Venezuela, had established a limit on the sentence to be imposed,

---

369 503 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2007),

370 Id. at 525.

371 Id.

372 Id

373 Id. at 527

374 Id. Similarly, where a prisoner raises a specialty argument relative to transfer to a harsher prison, such a claim fails as transfer has been found analogous to parole and sentencing proceedings rather than criminal prosecution. See Palma-Salazar v. Davis, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 135503 (D. Colo. 2010).

and at trial the sentence was enhanced by four years.[375] The court relied on the language of the treaty as well as its interpretation under United States v. Rauscher[376] and Johnson v. Brown.[377] The court held that:

> In this case, in addition to the Treaty itself, we agree with the state court that the only other sources of clearly established federal law we can locate are Rauscher and Browne. Rauscher and Browne both stand for the same principle: An extradited defendant can "only be tried for one of the offenses described in that [extradition] treaty." Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 430, 7 S.Ct. 234. See also Browne, 205 U.S. at 316, 27 S.Ct. 539 (stating that it is impermissible to try a defendant other than "for the crime for which he has been extradited"). Over time, this rule from Rauscher and Browne has come to be known as the doctrine of specialty. See, e.g., Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 783 (9th Cir.1986) ("The doctrine of 'specialty' prohibits the requesting nation from prosecuting the extradited individual for any offense other than that for which the surrendering state agreed to extradite.").
>
> The doctrine of specialty on its own terms, however, offers Benitez no relief, because it merely limits the crimes with which Benitez can be charged, not the punishments the state can impose. Because the Venezuelan treaty is sufficient to afford Benitez relief, we need not reach whether extending the doctrine of specialty is required here.
>
> We hold that we can enforce limitations on punishments following the extradition of a defendant, but we may do so only if the contracting treaty nations agreed to such a limitation in the particular case. See Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 422, 7 S.Ct. 234 ("This proposition of the absence of express restriction in the treaty of the right to try him for other offenses than that for which he was extradited, is met by the manifest scope and object of the treaty itself") (emphasis added); Browne, 205 U.S. at 318, 27 S.Ct. 539 ("The manifest scope and object of the treaty itself . . . limit[s] the . . . crime for which extradition had been demanded and granted.") (emphasis added). We must therefore examine the extradition agreement in this case, and ask the question: Did the treaty and extradition activities of the parties in this case provide for a clear limitation on the punishment Benitez could face? If the answer is yes, we must enforce whatever punishment limitation we find.[378]

The Ninth Circuit, in United States v. Fischer, affirmed the principle, concluding that "The doctrine of specialty does not apply to the consideration of other criminal behavior in sentencing."[379]

The First Circuit in Saccoccia allowed evidence of CTR violations for which Switzerland denied extradition as a predicate of offense for RICO.[380] Thus, it allowed a result that violates the spirit and purpose of specialty. However, because Switzerland did not object, the result remained.[381]

---

375 Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2006), reversing 419 F. Supp. 2d 1234 (S.D. Cal. 2004). See also United States v. Lazarevich, 147 F.3d 106 (9th Cir. 1998) (holding that enhancement of sentence based on non-extradited offense did not violate U.S.–Netherlands extradition treaty).

376 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 430 (1886).

377 Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 309, 316 (1907).

378 Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971, 975–976 (9th Cir. 2006). In 2007, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found that Benitez's extradition was conditioned on the sentence that could be entered against him and what sentence he could serve, making his appeal ripe when he received a sentence of fifteen years to life. This decision emphasized that the extraditing country's expectations regarding limitation on punishment must be respected in accord with the extradition treaty. See Benitez v. Garcia, 495 F.3d 640, 643–644 (9th Cir. 2007).

379 United States v. Fischer, 322 Fed. Appx. 521, 522 (9th Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion), cert. denied, Fischer v. United States, 130 S. Ct. 1158 (2010). See also United States v. Muller, 305 Fed. Appx. 457, 459 (9th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion).

380 United States v. Saccoccia, 18 F.3d 795 (1st Cir. 1994).

381 See also United States v. Moss, 344 F. Supp. 2d 1142, 1147–1148 (W.D. Tenn. 2004) (relying on Saccoccia, 18 F.3d 795, even though it is not in the First Circuit).

The Eighth Circuit in United States v. Lomeli[382] followed the reasoning in many of the cases cited above to emphasize that "the doctrine is generally understood to prohibit indiscriminate prosecution of extradited individuals rather than to prohibit the receiving state's consideration of pre-extradition offenses while prosecuting the individual for crimes for which extradition was granted."[383] The court also noted Supreme Court precedent reasoning that admitting evidence of related criminal conduct for the purposes of sentence enhancement for a separate crime, within proper statutory limits, did not constitute punishment.[384] The court held that there was no violation of the extradition treaty because the relator's criminal history, for the purposes of sentencing enhancement, did not constitute punishment for non-extradited conduct.[385]

For all practical purposes, it seems the consistent recent practice in the United States has been to simply accept enhanced sentencing and upward departure of sentencing as not violative of the principle of specialty. In all of the cases where this situation occurred and is referred to above, there has not been to this writer's knowledge any formal protest by the surrendering state, thus, in effect, leaving both the government and the courts free to enhance sentencing even when the sentence enhancement is for a crime for which the original requested state refused to grant extradition.[386] It seems that the only resort left is for the surrendering state to file a formal protest with the U.S. government. But this is not likely to be the case in the normal course of affairs, as it would place a burden on the foreign relations of the surrendering state and the United States. An alternative that may develop is for surrendering states to include more specific statements in their extradition orders, in the hope that U.S. courts may interpret them as being more binding and thus insure compliance with the principle of specialty.

6.5.1. Sentences beyond Limitations Imposed by Extradition Orders

The United States faces a recurring problem with ceilings on penalties set by surrendering states, which U.S. courts occasionally violate.[387] This is also a problem in cases involving life imprisonment.[388] This is a result of federal courts interpreting the Federal Sentencing Guidelines that were previously mandatory but are now advisory.[389] The problem is also due to the fact that federal courts interpret sentences as actual time served as opposed to the length of the sentence.[390]

---

382 596 F.3d 496 (8th Cir. 2010).

383 Id. at 501.

384 Id. at 502.

385 Id. at 503.

386 United States v. Lavaravich, 147 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 1998) (relator extradited from Netherlands for false statements on the passport application of his two children, whom he abducted from the United States to the Netherlands). Upon his return and conviction, the judge sentenced him for the base offense of child abduction even though the Netherlands had refused to extradite him for that crime. The Ninth Circuit supported that position in reliance on the Supreme Court's rulings on sentencing, in particular Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389 (1995); United States v. Watts, 519 U.S. 148 (1997). The Fourth and Eighth Circuits took the same positions in cases prior to Witte and Watts, namely Leighorn v. Turner, 884 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1989) and United States v. Davis, 954 F.2d 182 (4th Cir. 1992).

387 See generally, Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89, 104–109 (2008).

388 United States v. Armenta, 373 Fed. Appx. 685, 687–688 (9th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion) (relator's argument rejected that sentence of life imprisonment without release was in excess of U.S. affidavit of extradition to Mexico disclosing he was subject to a maximum term of life imprisonment).

389 Id. (where a 660-year sentence was meted our for money laundering). See also United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005) (rendering the Federal Sentencing Guidelines advisory).

390 See Gordon v. Warden, No. 02-427-M, 2003 U.S Dist. LEXIS 5190 (D.N.H. 2003) (following a fact-driven approach to the rule of specialty in sentencing).

This causes difficulties with the relator's ability to raise the issue under the principle of specialty, particularly in circuits that require the foreign state to protest.[391]

In United States v. Badalamenti, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District in New York revisited the forty-five year sentence imposed upon Badalamenti, whose extradition from Spain was conditional upon a maximum period of imprisonment not to exceed thirty years. The U.S. government indicated its understanding of this limitation on the Spanish extradition order.[392] However, it later changed its view on how it should be interpreted and District Court Judge Leval developed a strange interpretation by holding that Badalamenti could qualify for release after twenty to twenty-three years with good time credit and that this satisfied the requirements as opposed to the overall sentence.[393] In what is clearly a stretching of interpretation and common sense, Judge Leval came to the conclusion that the forty-five–year sentence did not violate the thirty-year limitation. The Second Circuit affirmed, and finally in 2003,[394] the district court held that:

> . . . Spain has never protested the sentence. Indeed, Badalamenti's petition to the Spanish courts for relief was dismissed.
>
> Finally, the language in the dismissal order relied on by Badalamenti simply does not call into question the correctness of the application of American law by Judge Leval in 1987 and by the Second Circuit in 1989.[395]

The implication of the first paragraph quoted above is that, had Spain protested the outcome, the court may have ruled differently. If this is the correct interpretation, it is truly unfortunate to think that U.S. courts can violate limitations imposed by other countries' extradition orders so long as the extraditing state does not protest.[396] Judicial inquiry should not be based on what clearly appears to be a violation of the extradition order, under the principle of specialty, and condition that inquiry upon a foreign government's protest, which can easily be conditioned by U.S. governmental pressures.

In United States v. Campbell, the Second Circuit considered the problem of sentencing enhancement based on the Federal Sentencing Guidelines.[397] It is not uncommon for the United States to represent to foreign governments that it will abide by limitations on the total duration of a sentence and then depart from these representations in the course of sentencing hearings, arguing that the original representations were predicated on the maximum sentence as contained in the statute.[398]

---

391 Most of the time foreign states elect not to protest in order to avoid conflict with the United States, and the result is that the rule of specialty is occasionally violated without consequences.

392 See United States v. Casamento, 887 F. 2d 1141, 1185 (2d. Cir. 1989), cert denied 493 U.S. 1081 (1990). See also United States v. Baez, 349 F. 3d 90 (2d. Cir. 2003) (involving an extradition case from Columbia where that state had also imposed a limitation on the sentence).

393 United States v. Badalamenti, 641 F. Supp. 194 (S.D.N.Y. 1985).

394 United States v. Badalamenti, No. 84 CR. 236(DC), 2003 WL 22990069 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

395 Id. at *2.

396 United States v. Cuevas, 402 F. Supp. 2d 504 (S.D.N.Y. 2005), affirming sentence, 112 Fed. Appx. 806 (2004) (holding extradition agreement did not prohibit the court from sentencing in excess of thirty years and extraditing state must raise protest). See also United States v. Campbell, 300 F.3d 202 (2d. Cir. 2002) (U.S. Department of State providing assurances through diplomatic note); United States v. Baez, 349 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2003) (assurances given in the form of two diplomatic notes); Vallenti v. United States, 111 F.3d 290 (2d. Cir. 1997) (holding that if that issue required an evidentiary hearing, it should be remanded to the district court).

397 Campbell, 300 F.3d 202 (holding that the relator could be sentenced in the range of the Guidelines, but was to be released according to the limitation in the extradition treaty).

398 Id.

In United States v. Cuevas, the Second Circuit considered whether the principle of specialty required the United States to apply the Dominican Republic's law maximum penalty provided in the extradition decree.[399] In this case, because the extradition treaty did not contain any limitation on sentencing and the United States never made a positive assurance to the Dominican Republic that the relator would not be sentenced to more than thirty years' imprisonment (indeed, the Dominican Republic never sought such an assurance), a sentence in excess of thirty years but within U.S. sentencing guidelines was deemed appropriate.[400]

6.6. Standing to Raise the Specialty Issue

As the requested state is intended to benefit from specialty and has the right to claim its enforcement, the question arises as to the right of the relator to insist on that requirement as the beneficiary of this right. The issue of whether an individual has standing to protest a violation of the principle of specialty in his/her own right is whether the right belongs solely to the surrendering state or whether it is the individual's as well. Another question is whether the individual can raise the issue in his/her own right, or whether it is conditional upon a protest from the surrendering state. In practice, when the issue arises, the relator will have already been surrendered, and thus is subject to the authoritative processes of the prosecuting state.[401] The relator's recourse at that point is limited to the remedies afforded by that state. The issue can, therefore, be raised by the surrendering state through a protest communicated to the prosecuting state by diplomatic channels or by other means, or by the relator being given the right to raise the issue irrespective of whether the surrendering state protests or not.[402] Notwithstanding the precedents established by the Supreme Court, the circuits are divided on these two formulas on standing. Some require a protest or some other form of objection by the surrendering state before the individual can raise the issue, while others recognize the relator's right to do so on his/her own without any action by the surrendering state. The latter position is strongly supported by the policy argument that it would be unwise and unnecessary to have foreign governments object or protest action by U.S. prosecutors, thus leading to 399 United States v. Cuevas, 496 F.3d 256 (2d Cir. 2007). See also Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89, 104–106 (2008).

---

400 Cuevas, 496 F.3d at 262–264.

401 Collins v. O'Neil, 214 U.S. 113 (1909); Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 309 (1907); Cosgrove v. Winney, 174 U.S. 64 (1899); Casey v. Department of State, 980 F.2d 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1992); United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3rd Cir. 1991); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962); Greene v. United States, 154 F. 401 (5th Cir. 1909), cert. denied, 207 U.S. 596 (1907). See also United States v. Medina, 985 F.Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); United States v. Bakhtiar, 964 F. Supp. 112 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511, 514 (1916) ("It is not to be presumed that the demanding government will suffer [the relator] to be tried or punished for any offense other than that for which he is surrendered…").

402 See United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463 (11th Cir. 1988); United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987) (holding that the rule of specialty could be raised by a defendant if he is sought to be tried for an offense other than the one for which he was delivered); Taylor v. Jackson, 470 F. Supp. 1290 (S.D.N.Y. 1979); cf. United States v. Merit, 962 F.2d 917 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 885 (1992), reh'g denied, 506 U.S. 1072 (1993); United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3d. Cir. 1991) (holding that relator could not assert individual rights under the Treaty in light of the express waiver by the extraditing nation); United States v. Jetter, 722 F.2d 371, 373 (8th Cir. 1983). The court in Thirion, as well as in Jetter, affirmed the rule that the extraditing state may waive the rule of specialty. See United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009 (1986). The court in Thirion also reaffirmed the rule in United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976), that an accused co-conspirator may be held responsible under the common law rules of responsibility for the conduct of another without violating the rule of specialty. Cf. United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402 (11th Cir.) (holding that evidence of prior arrest to reflect scope of conspiracies, to prove friction between these governments. Indeed, it is best to leave the issue to the U.S. judiciary, which is quite capable of dealing with it without the need for a foreign government to point it out. The U.S. Department of Justice has followed this policy since 1995, and seldom objects to individual standing without a formal protest by the surrendering state.

In considering the nature of the principle of specialty, it is important to draw a distinction between substantive and procedural issues. As stated above, specialty is intended to protect the substantive rights of the relator as well as the rights of the requested state. Although the circuits disagree as to whether the relator, as a defendant before U.S. courts, has standing to raise the issue of noncompliance with the principle of specialty without the need for a the requested state to intervene or protest, this right arises only with respect to substantive issues and not procedural ones, which remain the exclusive rights of the requested state.[403]

The principle of specialty finds its basis in treaties, and thus is part of conventional international law as well. As a result of its inclusion in conventional international law and its consistent application in the domestic laws of different states, it has also become a customary rule of international law. In addition, national legislation includes the rule as does the jurisprudence of states engaging in extradition. Consequently, there are at least three sources for the principle of specialty: conventional international law, CIL, and national legislation or national jurisprudence.

The contents of the principle are slightly different depending upon which of these sources of law applies. Although treaties seem to be rather similar in the core elements of the rule, they usually do not go into such detail so as to address issues of standing and variances whether it be in respect to the charge or to the sentence. Consequently, CIL also lacks that specificity. As to national legislation/jurisprudence, there is greater uniformity in Europe, where the Council of Europe and the European Union have significantly enhanced harmony in the laws and practices of member states. Conversely, in the United States there is divergence in the circuits, as discussed below, probably due to two reasons. First, whenever circuits identify the source of the legal right there seems to be some confusion, particularly when they do not distinguish between overlapping sources. In other words, custom overlaps with treaties and should help interpret treaties, while at the same time custom is also an independent source. The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations, which reflects the jurisprudence and practice of the United States, relies in part on custom, jurisprudence, governmental positions, treaties, and interpretations of all of the above. These three layers of legal sources, which substantially overlap and which rely on each other, need to be sorted out so that there is clarity in a judicial decision as to the following: the legal source of the right, the scope and content of the right, and the application of the right in connection with a given set of facts.

To illustrate the above, if the legal right is predicated on a treaty, the next question is whether the treaty intended to provide a third party beneficiary right to the relator or not. This becomes a question of treaty interpretation, in which CIL, as well as the national legal practice of the two contracting states, is relevant. If the conclusion is that the treaty right is only designed for the benefit of the contracting states and is not intended to provide a third party beneficiary right to the individual, then the surrendering state can waive the right and the relator has no recourse, unless of course the national legislation/jurisprudence allows a defendant in a domestic criminal proceeding the right to raise such an issue. If not, and if the right is deemed intent, and to aid the jury in determining the nature of the offense charged did not violate the doctrine of specialty), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1032 (1990). See generally Jonathan George, Note, Toward a More Principled Approach to the Principle of Specialty, 12 Cornell Int'l L. J. 309 (1979).

---

403 United States v. Antonakeas, 255 F.3d 714 (9th Cir. 2001). See also Najohn, 785 F.2d at 1422; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886); United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F. 3d 882 (9th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 991 (2000) ("whether or not treaty violations can provide the basis for particular claims or defenses depends upon the particular treaty and claim involved" 206 F.2d at 885).

exclusively limited to the contracting states, then the prosecuting state that has obtained jurisdiction over an extradited person can prosecute him/her for whatever crime it wants, and mete out whatever punishment its law may provide without limitation. Under this theory, if the surrendering state objects, then the prosecuting state must conform to its treaty obligations, but that still does not give the relator in the national proceeding the right to raise the issue under the treaty unless national legislation/jurisprudence would allow him/her to do so. Another hypothesis is where the source of the right is a treaty, and the treaty is interpreted in accordance with CIL, which recognizes that the right is both for the benefit of the contracting states and of the individual who is the subject of the extradition. In that case the individual would have standing to raise an objection in national criminal proceedings, irrespective of whether the surrendering state protests and also irrespective of whether the surrendering state waives the right, as it is not exclusively the contracting state's right, but one which is also the relator's right.

Finally, it should be noted that the acceptance of the third party beneficiary theory does not mean that the prosecuting state and the surrendering state are without any powers to vary the charge and prosecution of the surrendered person. The substantive nature of the right is fact-driven and not law-driven in the technical sense of the word. In other words, if a set of facts on which extradition has been granted justifies prosecution for theft and the extradition has been granted on that basis, nothing prevents the prosecuting state from changing the charge to embezzlement if this charge is predicated on the same or substantially the same facts as those for which the relator has been extradited based on the charge of theft. Consequently, it is not the technical legal charge that controls, but the factual basis giving rise to the charge, which can be amended or changed depending upon the prosecution's or the court's judgment of which such facts warrant a criminal charge. In such situations, the relator cannot object even under the second hypothesis because there is no substantive change as to the right in question.

Under the "Contract Theory" the two contracting states can simply alter their understanding of that legal right on a case-by-case basis on the theory of waiver. The logical consequence of such an understanding is that such a right is no longer a justiciable issue because it is essentially based on the political relations of the two states, who are best suited to deal with it through their respective foreign ministries.

Obviously if such a theory were valid it would have been explicitly stated in the treaty. But it is difficult to imagine many states agreeing to put in a specialty provision that the two governments can decide to waive at will on a case-by-case basis. Thus, logically any court decision that assumes that this was the parties' intent is mistaken. In fact, it is precisely the absence of any such specificity that should warn the courts that this is not what the nature of the right is about.

What is surprising is that most, if not all, cases dealing with specialty cite Rauscher.[404] Yet it seems that the meaning of Rauscher has eluded its readers. Chief Justice Marshall seemed quite unequivocal considering both the time and the fact that this is a CIL right, and is not only for the benefit of the contracting states, but for that of the individual. Its enforceability has to do with the integrity of the judicial process. Why such a clear pronouncement has been lost over the years on a number of modern judicial interpreters is difficult to explain.[405]

Another hypothesis is where the treaty right is interpreted in accordance with national law and jurisprudence, in which case it will largely depend on whether the national law/jurisprudence has espoused the first or the second of the hypothesis stated above. In the United States, the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations reflects the country's practice and thus necessarily evidences the schism between the two first hypotheses, which is reflected in the jurisprudence of the different circuits. There is no doubt that the acceptance of the second hypothesis, namely that we are dealing with a right that the contracting states have stipulated to, not only for their own benefit, but for that of a third party beneficiary (i.e. the relator) reflects a position that is consonant with international human rights law. The latter grants individuals certain rights in national legal proceedings, particularly in criminal proceedings, by virtue of multilateral treaties, wherein the individual is the subject of certain rights and has standing to invoke these rights in national criminal and other legal proceedings. Conversely, the first hypothesis is one that existed in the earlier days of modern extradition, particularly in the 1800s, when extradition was deemed to be an accommodation between states based on a contract theory reflected in treaty. Government and prosecutorial attempts to revert to that position are essentially predicated on the same assumption, and on the proposition that the narrow interpretation of the right on the basis of the first hypothesis, the contract theory hypothesis, enhances law enforcement and prosecution endeavors in their combat against crime. Yet there is no empirical data whatsoever to justify that proposition. Adherence to the right may at worst, from a law enforcement/prosecutorial perspective, mean that a surrendered person will not be prosecuted for additional or different crimes, and will not be sentenced in a way that varies from the sentence limitation imposed by the surrendering state.

404 Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 at 422.

405 For a discussion of specialty as a rule of customary international law, see infra Sec. 6.1.

Thus, for example, some circuits will hold that the relator does not have the standing to raise the issue of specialty in his/her own right, but without indicating whether it is because that circuit has identified the source of the right being a treaty, or CIL. Admittedly, most of the cases derive from treaties. Consequently, one could assume that circuits have not addressed the issue of the source of the legal right, because it is so obviously derived from a bilateral treaty between the United States and a surrendering state. However, in interpreting the treaty the circuits have seldom taken into account CIL as a way of interpreting the relevant treaty position on specialty. Thus, on the whole the jurisprudence of the circuits concerning the various issues of specialty tend to spiral down to narrower considerations as opposed to spiraling up to the nature and purpose of the rule. The second reason is that the Supreme Court has not addressed the issue of specialty in over 120 years since United States. v. Rauscher, notwithstanding the fact that there is significant conflict among the circuits, something which would normally induce the Supreme Court to take certiorari.

The importance of extradition pursuant to treaties is underscored by the 2009 Eleventh Circuit decision of United States v. Valencia-Trujillo.[406] In this case, the relator was extradited pursuant to an extradition agreement as opposed to being extradited pursuant to the United States–Colombia extradition treaty.[407] When the relator attempted to raise the principle of specialty, the court held he lacked standing to do so because "the rule of specialty applies only to extraditions pursuant to a treaty," and as the court reasoned that the relator's right to raise the principle of specialty was derivative of the surrendering state's right to raise the principle of specialty, the court concluded that "because Colombia's extradition of Valencia-Trujillo to the United States was not based on an extradition treaty between the two countries Valencia-Trujillo lacks standing to assert the rule of specialty."[408]

6.6.1. Waiver of Specialty by the Relator

If a person waives objections to his/her extradition, whether it is from or to the United States, the waiver implicitly includes the waiver of the principle of specialty, unless the order of extraditability based on the waiver specifically includes a specialty limitation, either as to charge and/or to penalty. In other words, in the context of waiving extradition from the United States, the relator may specifically condition his/her waiver (somewhat analogous to a negotiated plea)

406 573 F.3d 1171 (11th Cir. 2009).

407 Id. at 1178.

408 Id. at 1178, 1181.

to include a specialty clause that limits prosecution in the requesting state to the charges on which the extradition requests were made. Thus, the waiver of extradition preserves the principle of specialty.[409]

The relator may also waive the ability to raise a specialty claim by failing to raise it in a timely manner under U.S. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 12.[410] The Eleventh Circuit reasoned as follows regarding the relator's procedural waiver or forfeiture of his/her specialty claim:

> Because the rules of specialty and dual criminality bar prosecution of an extradited relator for some offenses but not others, the doctrines initially may appear to limit the court's subject matter jurisdiction . . . . The extradition process, however, is the means by which a requesting country obtains personal jurisdiction over the relator . . . . Consequently, a claim of a violation of the rules of specialty and dual criminality raises the question of whether the extradition process conferred personal jurisdiction over the defendant . . . . Thus, a claim that the extradition violates the rules of specialty and dual criminality is a challenge to the court's personal jurisdiction over the defendant and must be raised in a pretrial motion pursuant to Rule 12.
>
> The district court set October 14, 2005 as the final deadline for submission of pretrial motions. Marquez did not assert the rules of specialty or dual criminality as a bar to his prosecution until he filed a motion to arrest judgment on March 3, 2008. Thus, Marquez waived his right to assert the protection of the rules of specialty and dual criminality.[411]

Although a court may grant relief for a procedural waiver or forfeiture of a specialty argument, the relator "must present a legitimate explanation for his failure to raise the issue in a timely manner."[412]

6.6.2. Waiver of Specialty by the Surrendering State

Whether a surrendering state can waive specialty, either explicitly or implicitly, without the consent of the surrendered person, depends on how the specialty provision in the treaty is interpreted. Historically, the principle has been for the benefit of the surrendering state. Consequently, that state has the right to waive it.[413] However, the historic practice was to obtain an explicit waiver from the surrendering state, as opposed to merely an implicit one, which the prosecuting state would allegedly derive from the surrendering state's failure to file a protest. The reason favoring an explicit waiver is that it avoids any unnecessary friction or tensions between the two governments, and also avoids having the prosecuting state trying to get away with its breach of specialty in the hope that the surrendering state will not protest, in order to avoid political tensions between the two governments.

So far, there have been no cases either in the United States or elsewhere holding that specialty is the exclusive right of the surrendered person, thus foreclosing a surrendering state's opportunity for waiving specialty. Similarly, if one concludes that specialty is a right available to both the surrendering state and the surrendered person, then neither one of them could invoke a waiver unilaterally without the consent of the other. This too is a position that finds no support in the law and practice of any country known to this writer.

The only contentious issue in some of the circuits in the United States is whether or not the surrendered person has standing to argue specialty in the absence of a protest by the surrendering 409 But see Rogers v. U.S. Parole Commission, 113 Fed. Appx. 290 (9th Cir. 2004) (for a waiver that did not preserve specialty in extradition to the United States).

---

410 United States v. Marquez, 594 F.3d 855, 859 (11th Cir. 2010).

411 Id. at 859.

412 United Sates v. Anderson, 472 F.3d 662, 670 (9th Cir. 2006).

413 See United States v. Saccocia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995); United States v. Stokes, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 45366 (N.D. Ill. 2010) (Thailand waived the treaty's rule of specialty provision by the means specified state.[414] It is the position of this writer that the mere silence by a surrendering state does not constitute a waiver of specialty, and unless and until such time as a surrendering state waives specialty, that right inures to the benefit of the surrendered person who has, as some of the circuits have held, the right to raise that issue without the need for any action by the surrendering state.[415]

A case that bears mention is United States v. Riviere[416] in which an apparently general waiver by the requested state was interpreted by the United States to allow the prosecution of the relator for the same crime for which he was already convicted of in that state, notwithstanding the specific prohibition contained in the extradition treaty against double jeopardy. The relator argued the applicability of the treaty, and the Third Circuit held that he had no standing to do so because of the general waiver that was presumed to have been granted by the requested state. From the language of the court's opinion, including what appears in dicta, the Third Circuit places itself among the circuits that are ambivalent about granting the relator standing to raise the specialty issue. The Third Circuit, however, places itself in the category of those that do not allow a relator to raise the specialty issue if there is an indication that the requested state waives the requirement that specialty be observed.

6.6.3. Guilty Pleas and Waiver of Specialty

A guilty plea in U.S. criminal proceedings implicitly includes a waiver of specialty.[417] However, because specialty is such an important right, the court accepting the guilty plea should ascertain whether the relator understood its implication with respect to the waiver of the doctrine of specialty. The test of "knowingly and intentionally" should be applied. If there is a question that arises subsequently, an evidentiary hearing should be held to determine the relator's knowledge of the waiver and his/her intention to waive specialty as well as whether he/she received the advice of counsel. If, for example, the relator did not receive the proper advice from counsel, this may be deemed ineffective assistance of counsel.[418]

6.6.4. Circuits Allowing the Individual to Object without the Need for the Requested State's Protest

The circuits that provide the individual with a right to claim the benefit of the specialty principle are the Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits, with some ambiguity within the Third Circuit.[419] Government protests vary in form and may be done either by a diplomatic note or a letter.[420] in the treaty, leaving the relator with no standing to raise a specialty argument); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986).

---

414 See infra Secs. 6.6.4 and 6.6.5.

415 United States v. Saccocia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995). See also Tse v. United States, 290 F.3d 462 (1st Cir. 2002).

416 United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3rd Cir. 1991).

417 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.6. See generally In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999), citing Santibello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971) (holding plea bargains are generally binding upon the government); United States v. Streebing, 987 F.2d 368, 372 (6th Cir. 1993); Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340, 350 (4th Cir. 1983).

418 The objective standard of reasonableness is established in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1994). For a case discussing ineffective assistance of counsel in the extradition context, see United States v. Painter, 243 Fed. Appx. 818 (5th Cir. 2007) (unpublished decision); United States v. Lopez-Pena, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46645 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).

419 See Kenneth E. Levitt, International Extradition, The Principle of Specialty, and Effective Treaty Enforcement, 76 Minn. L. Rev. 1017, 1030 (1992).

420 Government protests vary in form and may be done either by a diplomatic note or a letter. No set form exists for a protest, nor has the United States required such. A protest may come from the embassy of

The Eighth Circuit, in United States v. Thirion,[421] authorized such a position. In Thirion, the individual argued that his conspiracy count should have been dismissed under the terms of the extradition treaty, as Monaco had agreed to the extradition for all charges against him except the conspiracy count. The court rejected as without merit the government's argument that an extradited individual lacks standing to challenge a violation of an extradition treaty. The panel in Thirion held that an extradited individual "may raise whatever objections to his prosecution that [the surrendering country] might have."[422] The court further held (with jury instructions not to return a verdict on the conspiracy count of the indictment) that the government was not prohibited from establishing Thirion's membership in the conspiracy as an evidentiary fact to prove guilt in other substantive crimes. As Thirion was tried only for those crimes for which he was extradited, neither Thirion nor Monaco could be heard to complain.

The Ninth Circuit, in United States v. Khan,[423] also granted the extraditee standing to challenge his prosecution under the principle of specialty without an affirmative protest from the extraditing country. The extraditee argued that because the extradition documents did not specifically refer to the charge of using a telephone to facilitate the commission of a drug felony under 21 U.S.C. § 843, the conviction against him on this count should be dismissed. By presuming, without evidence to the contrary, that Pakistan would object to the extradition on this charge because the offense was not a crime in Pakistan, the court held Pakistan's ambiguous agreement to extradite the relator on this count did not satisfy the doctrine of specialty and reversed the conviction.

In United States v. Herbage,[424] the Eleventh Circuit assumed, without deciding, that the extradited relator had standing to allege a violation of the specialty principle irrespective of the fact that no evidence was presented that the requested nation, the United Kingdom, had protested the relator's charge of mail fraud. The court acknowledged the debate over whether an individual should be allowed to vindicate this right. The court cited United States v. Najohn,[425] stating "[T]he protection [of the specialty] principle exists only to the extent the surrendering country wishes.... However, the person extradited may raise whatever objections the rendering country might have." The court in Herbage found that the Ninth Circuit's position in Najohn was supported by the Supreme Court opinion in United States v. Rauscher,[426] which recognized a the requested nation to the secretary of state or the Department of Justice. Although it is customary for foreign ministries to communicate with the Department of State (in most other countries the ministry of foreign affairs), the United States has made agreements with some countries whereby communication is done directly between the foreign ministry and the Office of International Affairs (OIA) of the Department of Justice. It is also possible for the ministry of justice of other governments to deal directly with the OIA by special agreement. More recently, questions arose as to whether certain communications from the OIA's counterparts in other ministries of justice can qualify as protests if this or similar words are not specifically used. The better approach is to deem any form of objection by the appropriate authorities of the surrendering states as sufficient to raise the issue, or to give the relator-defendant standing to do so.

---

421 United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146 (8th Cir. 1987). See also Leighnor v. Turner, 844 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1989); United States v. Robinson, No. 3:00-cr-129, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27135 (E.D. Tenn 2006) (relying on Thirion).

422 Thirion, 813 F.2d at 151.

423 United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1993). See also United States v. Foulie, 24 F.3d 1059, 1064 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 933, 116 S.Ct. 341 (1995); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F.Supp.2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); but see United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009 (1986); but see United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435 (9th Cir. 1994) ("An extradited person may raise whatever objections the extraditing country is entitled to raise.").

424 United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1027 (1989); United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th. Cir.), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 933, 116 S. Ct. 341 (1995).

425 Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420.

426 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 422 (1886).

violation of the principle as involving both the party extradited and the surrendering country.[427] The Eleventh Circuit has denied the relator the right to raise a specialty challenge when the relator is a fugitive under the fugitive disentitlement doctrine.[428]

The Tenth Circuit followed this position in United States v. Levy,[429] where the relator challenged his prosecution for a CCE charge. The relator stated he was never extradited on the CCE charge because the order surrendering him to U.S. authorities neither mentioned CCE by name nor recited all of the elements of the crime. In rejecting the government's contention that a relator does not have a right to raise the issue of specialty, the court cited Rauscher for the proposition that the rule is a "right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country to the [United States]" and "any person prosecuted in any court within the United States has the right to claim the protection" of the specialty provision in a treaty.[430]

In United States v. Riviere,[431] the Third Circuit held that a relator has standing to protest a violation of the principle of specialty, but that when the surrendering state waives its right to enforce the principle, the relator no longer has a right inuring to his/her benefit under the extradition process. In this case, the surrendering state expressly waived its rights under the treaty. When the Dominican government signed the extradition warrant for the removal of Riviere to the United States for "the offence of unlawfully exporting narcotics," it included a waiver of "any and all Rights of Objection and Protest of the Commonwealth of Dominica," which stated that Dominica did not and would not object to Riviere's prosecution for "any and all criminal offenses committed either prior to or subsequent to his Extradition."[432] Later, Riviere was further charged with various firearms offenses. Riviere then contended that his extradition violated the principle of specialty provided in the treaty because he was charged with crimes for which he was not surrendered.

In considering whether Riviere could assert rights under the treaty, the Third Circuit reviewed the Supreme Court opinion in Rauscher,[433] much of which suggests that the rights of a person extradited pursuant to a treaty are conferred upon the individual rather than the government. Unlike Riviere, however, the situation in Rauscher involved a surrendering state, the United Kingdom, which did not consent to the relator's prosecution on charges other than those for which he was extradited. The Third Circuit in Riviere found support in other circuits' opinions that addressed a similar situation. These cases held that an individual cannot avoid prosecution by asserting individual rights under the treaty where the surrendering state expressly or impliedly waived its rights under an extradition treaty. In particular, this circuit relied on decisions in three cases, Fiocconi v. United States,[434] United States v. Najohn,[435] and United States v. Diwan,[436] which collectively held that the principle of specialty was designed for the benefit of the asylum nation and that the extradited individual had standing only to raise those objections that the surrendering state might consider a breach of the treaty.[437] The Third Circuit in 427 Herbage, 850 F.2d at 1466 n.7.

---

428 Weiss v. Yates, 375 Fed. Appx. 915, 916 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion).

429 United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326 (10th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1049 (1991). For a more recent case recognizing this principle set forth in Levy, see United States v. Feng, 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 37903 (D. Kan. 2009).

430 Id. at 328 n.1.

431 United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3d Cir. 1991).

432 Id. at 1292.

433 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

434 Fiocconi v. United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972). See also United States v. LeBaron, 156 F.3d 621 (5th Cir. 1998).

435 United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009 (1986).

436 United States v. Diwan, 864 F.2d 715 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 921 (1989).

437 United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289, 1298–1300 (3d Cir. 1991).

United States ex rel. Saroop v. Garcia[438] stated in dicta that if the relator had invoked the principle of specialty, she would not have had standing to do so.[439] However, the court noted that rather than raise the issue of specialty, the relator challenged the validity of the treaty, which she had standing to do.[440]

The Eleventh Circuit decision in United States v. Puentes deserves particular attention, as it summarizes the principle so aptly.[441] In Puentes the court held:

> The government correctly points out that this circuit has not squarely addressed the issue of whether a defendant has standing to assert a violation of an extradition treaty. When faced with appellants' challenges to extradition, this court has assumed, without deciding, that the appellants had standing to bring the claim. See, e.g., United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463, 1466 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1027, 109 S. Ct. 1158, 103 L.Ed. 2d 217 (1989); United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510, 1520 n.7 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, Reed v. United States, 506 U.S. 924, 113 S. Ct. 347, 121 L.Ed. 2d 262 (1992).
>
> Under the doctrine of specialty, a nation that receives a criminal defendant pursuant to an extradition treaty may try the defendant only for those offenses for which the other nation granted extradition. Herbage, 850 F.2d at 1465; M. Bassiouni International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, vol. 1, ch. 7, p. 359–60 (2d rev. ed. 1987). The question of whether a criminal defendant has standing to assert a violation of the doctrine of specialty has split the federal circuit courts of appeals. (Compare United States v. Kaufman, 874 F. 2d 242, 243 (5th Cir. 1989) (per curiam) (denial of petition for rehearing and suggestion for rehearing en banc) (stating that only the offended nation that is a party to a treaty may complain of a breach of the treaty) and Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 583–84 (6th Cir. 1985) (expressing doubt that the individual has standing on the grounds that "[t]he right to insist on application of the principle of specialty belongs to the requested state, not to the individual whose extradition is requested") (citation omitted), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016, 106 S. Ct. 1198, 89 L.Ed. 2d 312 (1986) with United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326, 328 n. 1 (10th Cir. 1990) (extradited individual has standing to claim a violation of the rule of specialty), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1049, 111 S.Ct. 759, 112 L.Ed. 778 (1991) and United States v. Thirion, 813 F. 2d 146, 151 n. 5 (8th Cir. 1987) (allowing the extradited individual to bring any objections the rendering country might have raised) and United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir.) (same) cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009, 107 S. Ct. 652, 93 L.Ed. 2d 707 (1986).) This case squarely presents us with the question, and we therefore decide it. We hold that a criminal defendant has standing to allege a violation of the principle of specialty. We limit, however, the defendant's challenges under the principle of specialty to only those objections that the rendering country might have brought.
>
> Extradition is "the surrender by one nation to another of an individual accused or convicted of an offense outside of its own territory, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the other, which, being competent to try and to punish him, demands the surrender." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289, 22 S. Ct. 484, 492, 46 L.Ed. 534 (1902). As a matter of international law, however, nations are under no legal obligation to surrender a fugitive from justice in the absence of a treaty. Bassiouni, at 319; Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 287, 54 S.Ct. 191, 193, 78 L.Ed. 315 (1933). An extradition treaty is, therefore, a cooperative agreement between two governments for the prosecution and punishment of criminal offenders. See Bassiouni at 319. Extradition treaties typically specify certain offenses for which extradition will be granted as between the two respective nations. Upon receipt of an extradition request, the surrendering nation may examine the substance of each of the charges specified in the request, and may 438 109 F.3d 165 (3d Cir. 1997).

439 Id. at 168.

440 Id.

441 United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th Cir. 1995). See United States v. Gallo-Chamorro, 48 F.3d 502 (11th Cir. 1995).

choose to grant extradition for only the extraditable offenses listed in the treaty. The doctrine of specialty, therefore, provides the surrendering nation with a means of ensuring compliance with this aspect of the extradition treaty, and "reflects a fundamental concern of governments that persons who are surrendered should not be subject to indiscriminate prosecution by the receiving government . . . ." Fiocconi v. Attorney General of United States, 462 F.2d 475, 481 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059, 93 S.Ct. 552, 34 L.Ed. 2d 511 (1972). Consequently, the principle is an implicit limitation on the requesting nation's ability to prosecute the defendant. (The surrendering nation may be particularly concerned that the individual be tried for only common crimes as opposed to political crimes. By confining the terms of the individual's extradition to certain specified offenses, the principle of specialty furthers this goal of the surrendering nation. See Note, International Extradition, The Principle of Specialty, and Effective Treaty Enforcement, 76 Minn. L. Rev. 1017, 1025 (1992).)

The Supreme Court first recognized the doctrine of specialty in United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S.Ct. 234, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886). Great Britain surrendered William Rauscher, the second mate on an American ship, to the United States on a charge of murder. The United States, however, tried and convicted him of a charge of infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. The extradition treaty listed murder as an extraditable offense, but did not contain the crime for which the court convicted Rauscher. Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 411, 7 S.Ct. at 236. Great Britain, moreover, had not specifically objected to Rauscher's trial on the cruel and unusual punishment charge. The Court, however, inferred that Great Britain would object to Rauscher's prosecution on the charge of infliction of cruel and unusual punishment based on that country's previous refusal to surrender a fugitive within its borders in the absence of a pledge from the United States that it would not try him for any other offense than that for which it had demanded him. Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 415, 7 S.Ct. at 238. The Court held that because Rauscher had been brought within the jurisdiction of the court under an extradition treaty, he could only be tried for one of the offenses described in the treaty and for the offense with which he had been charged in the extradition proceeding. Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 430, 7 S.Ct. 246.

In Rauscher, the Court drew a distinction between this country's treatment of a treaty and other countries in which a treaty is essentially a contract between two nations. Under our Constitution, the Court explained, a treaty is the law of the land and the equivalent of an act of the legislature. Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 418, 7 S.Ct. at 239–40. The Court's opinion suggests that the rights described in the treaty are conferred on both the extradited individual and the respective governments. The Court stated:

> [A] treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country . . . . The Constitution of the United States places such provisions as these in the same category as other laws of Congress, by its declaration that "The Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." A treaty, then, is a law of the land, as an Act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute.

Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 418–19, 7 S.Ct. at 240 (quoting Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U.S. 536, 540, 565, 5 S.Ct. 255, 256, 269-70, 28 L.Ed. 770 (1884)) (emphasis added). Moreover, the Court asserted that it was "impossible to conceive" of an exercise of jurisdiction which could ignore the principle of specialty and not implicate a "fraud upon the rights of the party extradited and of bad faith to the country which permitted his extradition." Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 422, 7 S.Ct. at 242 (emphasis added). Finally, the Court concluded that the rule of specialty is "conclusive upon the judiciary of the right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country into this [country] under such proceedings." Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 424, 7 S.Ct. at 243.

We find support for our holding in Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 7 S.Ct. 225, 30 L.Ed. 421 (1886), a companion case to Rauscher. Law enforcement officers kidnapped Ker in Peru and forcibly brought him to the United States to face a state court charge of larceny. He argued that his kidnapping violated the provisions of the United States–Peru extradition treaty. The Court rejected Ker's claim on the grounds that the extradition treaty was inapplicable because Ker had been abducted rather than extradited. 119 U.S. at 442, 7 S.Ct. at 228–29. The Court distinguished Rauscher on the grounds that Rauscher "came to this country clothed with a protection which the nature of such [extradition] proceedings and a true construction of the treaty gave him." Ker, 119 U.S. at 443, 7 S.Ct. at 229. When read together, Ker and Rauscher establish that when personal jurisdiction over a criminal defendant is obtained through extradition proceedings, the defendant may invoke the provisions of the relevant extradition treaty in order to challenge the court's exercise of personal jurisdiction.

All of the circuit courts of appeals have not embraced the holding we announce today. Other courts have held that an extradited individual lacks standing to assert the doctrine of specialty in the absence of an express objection on the part of the requested nation. Invariably, the courts that adhere to this rule consider the principle of specialty to be a matter of international law that inures solely to the benefit of the requested nation, protects its dignity and interests, and confers no rights on the accused. Cf. Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 906 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884, 94 S.Ct. 204, 38 L.Ed. 2d 133 (1973). These courts have taken the international law rule of construction that only nations may enforce treaty obligations, and inferred that an individual cannot, therefore, assert any rights under a treaty in our national courts. This analysis is flawed, we submit, because it ignores both the history of the concept of extradition and Rauscher.

As we stated earlier, extradition is not a part of customary international law. Therefore, in order to broaden the reach of their criminal justice systems, two nations may enter into a cooperative agreement for the exchange of criminal suspects: an extradition contract. See De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 271, 10 S.Ct. 295, 298, 33 L.Ed. 642 (1890) (characterizing treaties as contracts between nations). The doctrine of specialty is but one of the provisions of this contract. Of course, the rights conferred under the contract ultimately belong to the contracting parties, the signatory nations. This does not mean, however, that provisions of the contract may not confer certain rights under the contract on a non-party who is the object of the contract. See generally Rauscher. We believe that Rauscher clearly confers such a right on the extradited defendant. The extradited individual's rights, however, need not be cast in stone; rather, the individual may enjoy these protections only at the sufferance of the requested nation. The individual's rights are derivative of the rights of the requested nation. We believe that Rauscher demonstrates that even in the absence of a protest from the requested state, an individual extradited pursuant to a treaty has standing to challenge the court's personal jurisdiction under the rule of specialty. The courts which have adopted the contrary holding, in effect, consider the requested state's objection to be a condition precedent to the individual's ability to raise the claim. We believe the Supreme Court's recent opinion in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992) seriously undermines any vitality that approach may have once possessed.

A grand jury indicted Humberto Alvarez-Machain, a citizen and resident of Mexico, for participating in the kidnap and murder of United States Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) special agent Enrique Camarena-Salazar. Following unsuccessful informal negotiations between the United States and Mexico to obtain Alvarez-Machain's presence in this country, DEA successfully contracted with certain individuals for Alvarez-Machain's forcible kidnap and delivery to the United States. Alvarez-Machain contested the district court's personal jurisdiction over him on the grounds that his abduction violated the extradition treaty between the United States and Mexico. The district court granted his request and ordered his return to Mexico. The court of appeals affirmed the district court. The Supreme Court reversed.

> The actual holding of the case is that Alvarez-Machain could not contest the court's jurisdiction over him under the extradition treaty because he was not extradited pursuant to treaty proceedings. See Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 7 S.Ct. 225, 30 L.Ed. 421 (1886). The Court's analysis, however, rejects the premise underlying the cases that require the requested nation to object as a condition precedent to the individual's ability to claim the benefits of the rule of specialty.
>
> In Alvarez-Machain, the Court rejected the Court of Appeal's reasoning that found that the extradition treaty prohibited forcible abduction, but that the abducted individual could only raise the issue if the offended government had formally protested. (Alvarez-Machain was an appeal from the decision of a panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991). Interestingly, the appellate court used that Circuit's rule recognizing an extradited individual's standing to contest jurisdiction under the rule of specialty as a basis for finding that an abducted defendant could also contest the exercise of personal jurisdiction. Unlike the Ninth Circuit's specialty cases, however, the panel imposed the additional requirement that the offended government object to the abduction in order for the individual to have standing to raise the claim. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d at 1356-57.) In rejecting the notion of conditionally self-executing treaty provisions, the Court explained that "if the [e]xtradition [t]reaty has the force of law . . . it would appear that a court must enforce it on behalf of an individual regardless of the offensiveness of the practice of one nation to the other nation." Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at—, 112 S.Ct. at 2195–96, 119 L.Ed.2d at 454 (emphasis added). Importantly, the Court cited Rauscher in support of this proposition:
>
> In Rauscher, the Court noted that Great Britain had taken the position in other cases that the Webster-Ashburton Treaty included the doctrine of specialty, but no importance was attached to whether or not Great Britain had protested the prosecution of Rauscher for the crime of cruel and unusual punishment as opposed to murder.
>
> Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 667, 112 S.Ct. at 2195, 119 L.Ed.2d at 454 (emphasis added). Alvarez-Machain demonstrates the infirmity in the reasoning of those cases which require an affirmative protest by the requested nation in order for the extradited individual to contest personal jurisdiction under the rule of specialty.
>
> We, therefore, hold that an individual extradited pursuant to an extradition treaty has standing under the doctrine of specialty to raise any objections which the requested nation might have asserted. The extradited individual, however, enjoys this right at the sufferance of the requested nation. As a sovereign, the requested nation may waive its right to object to a treaty violation and thereby deny the defendant standing to object to such an action. See United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289, 1300–01 (3d Cir. 1991); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1009, 107 S.Ct. 652. 93 L.Ed.2d 707 (1986). (The requested state's waiver of a treaty provision may occur either contemporaneously with the extradition or after the defendant has been surrendered to the requesting state.)[442]

The U.S. Supreme Court, in United States v. Alvarez-Machain,[443] considered whether a relator obtains standing to assert rights under an extradition treaty when the individual is forcibly abducted to the United States from a nation with which it has an extradition treaty. In deciding that the relator did not have such a right, the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Ninth Circuit and subsequently vacated another Ninth Circuit judgment in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez,[444] which was remanded for further consideration in light of the Machain decision. But the Supreme Court recognized the relator's standing to raise the issue.

---

442 Puentes, 50 F.3d at 1571–1575.

443 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).

444 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991), vacated, 505 U.S. 1201 (1992). See United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997).

In United States v. Alvarez-Machain,[445] the Ninth Circuit upheld the district court's order that the government-sponsored forcible abduction of a Mexican national, without the consent or acquiescence of the Mexican government, violated the 1980 Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico, and that the specific formal diplomatic protests of the Mexican government to the U.S. government provided standing for the relator to assert rights under the Treaty in U.S. courts.[446] The court further affirmed the lower court's order requiring the release of Alvarez-Machain and ordering his repatriation to Mexico. The court held that prevailing practice dictated that claims for a violation of an extradition treaty may be made by an individual only if the sovereign involved raised a protest. Therefore, a claim that the method of securing Alvarez-Machain's presence violated the procedures of the Extradition Treaty may have been raised only if Mexico raised the protest.[447] The court held that this issue was distinct from the issue of whether the individual had standing to raise a violation of the principle of specialty because some courts "have held that either the state or individual may raise [this issue]."[448] However, as the relator was not asserting that he was being prosecuted for a crime other than that to which Mexico agreed during the extradition proceedings, and no extradition proceedings actually took place, no basis existed for deciding if a violation of the specialty principle occurred. The court concluded by stating that specialty is for the surrendering state and not the individual to initially protest and thereby raise a claim that the method of securing a person's presence violates an extradition treaty.[449] Because the government of Mexico had protested the abduction, the relator acquired the right to enforce the Treaty in a U.S. court.

In United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez,[450] the Ninth Circuit held that an individual has a right under the extradition treaty to raise an objection to his prosecution if one of the signatory nations may claim a violation of the Treaty and formally does so. The court also stated:

> It follows a fortiori from the specialty principle, that if an individual has been kidnapped by a treaty signatory—i.e., if he has not been extradited for any offense at all—he may not be detained, tried or punished for any offense without the consent of the nation from which he was abducted.[451]

For a discussion of standing to object to abduction, see Chapter V.

6.6.5. Circuits That Require Some State Action from the Requested State before Conferring Standing to the Relator

The circuits that require a protest or objection by the requested state are the Second, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Circuits.

Although the rule inherently provides an added degree of protection for the relator, a case frequently cited for the proposition that the specialty principle is not a right of the accused, but rather a privilege of the surrendering state[452] is the Second Circuit case Shapiro

---

445 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 946 F.2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. granted, 505 U.S. 1024 (1992), rev'd, 504 U.S. 655 (1992), on remand, 971 F.2d 310 (1992). See also United States v. Lazore, 90 F. Supp. 2d 202 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). For a discussion of the issue of unlawful seizure, see Ch. V.

446 United States v. Caro-Quintero, 745 F. Supp. 599 (C.D. Cal. 1990).

447 Id. at 607.

448 Id.

449 Id. at 608.

450 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991), vacated, 505 U.S. 1201 (1992). In this case, however, Mexico did protest. See also United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997).

451 Id. at 1351. In Alvarez-Machain, the Supreme Court did not deal with this question because Mexico had indeed protested. 504 U.S. 655 (1992) (citing Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 444 (1886)). See also United States v. Lazore, 90 F. Supp. 2d 202 (N.D.N.Y. 2000).

452 See Berenguer v. Vance, 473 F. Supp 1195, 1197 (D.D.C. 1979); Kaiser v. Rutherford, 827 F. Supp. 832, 835 (D.C. Cir. 1993); Casey v. Dep't of State, 980 F.2d 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1992). See also Levitt, supra

v. Ferrandina.[453] In Shapiro, Chief Justice Friendly stated: "the principle of specialty has been viewed as a privilege of the asylum state, designed to protect its dignity and interest, rather than a right accruing to the accused."[454]

In United States v. Lara, the Second Circuit found the relator's extradition from Colombia was conditional upon his prosecution only with acts committed after December 17, 1997, which is the effective date of Columbia's extradition law permitting extradition of its nationals.[455] In rejecting Lara's claim, the Second Circuit noted:

> Lara identifies four violations of the doctrine of specialty: (1) evidence of his criminal activity prior to December 17, 1997 was deemed admissible at his trial (which was never held because of Lara's guilty plea); (2) evidence of his criminal activity prior to December 17, 1997 was used in calculating his sentence; (3) evidence relating to his participation in a separate, uncharged conspiracy was used in his sentencing; and (4) Lara could only be sentenced to the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for his crimes under Colombian law.
>
> First, it is settled that the doctrine does not alter the procedural and evidentiary rules that apply in United States courts. United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939, 945 (2d Cir.1976). Second, Judge Berman expressly declined at sentencing to consider any evidence of Lara's criminal activity prior to December 17, 1997, a point conceded by Lara at oral argument. Third, as Judge Berman observed, the indictment drew no distinction between Lara's participation in multiple criminal organizations, as Lara now suggests. Finally, although this Court has recognized that an extraditing country may set a maximum term of imprisonment as a condition of extradition, see United States v. Campbell, 300 F.3d 202, 211 (2d Cir.2002), cert. denied, 538 U.S. 1049, 123 S.Ct. 2114, 155 L.Ed.2d 1090 (2003), there is no such limitation here, and there is no authority for extending the doctrine of specialty in the manner Lara urges.[456]

In Martonak v. United States, the court stated:

> Before Martonak's claim can be addressed, the court must first address the question of whether Martonak has standing to raise it. There appears to be divided authority on that point, see United States v. Nosov, 153 F.Supp.2d 477, 480 (S.D.N.Y.2001) (collecting cases), with some courts holding that only the asylum state may raise issues of specialty, inasmuch as the rationale for the rule of specialty rests on protecting the interest of that state in preserving the limits of its agreement to extradite a particular defendant, and others holding that the extradited defendant may raise whatever objections the asylum state might have had. See id.[457]

In Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky,[458] the Sixth Circuit found support from Shapiro when noting its attempt to address every issue raised by the relator, including the "serious question whether note 204, at 1030 n.56; David Runtz, The Principle of Specialty: A Bifurcated Analysis of the Rights of the Accused, 29 Colum J. Transnat'l L. 407, 412 (1991).

---

453 Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 906 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973). See also Antwi v. United States, 349 F. Supp. 2d 663 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Fiocconi v. Attorney General, 462 F.2d 475 (2d. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059, 935 S. Ct. 552 (1972); United States v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896, 902 (2d Cir. 1981); United States v. Nosov, 153 F. Supp. 2d 477, 480 (S.D.N.Y. 2001); United States v. Masefield, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1570 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

454 Shapiro, 478 F.2d at 906.

455 United States v. Lara, 67 Fed. Appx. 72 (2d Cir. 2003).

456 Id. at 73–74.

457 United States. v. Martonak, 187 F. Supp.2d 117, 121 (S.D.N.Y. 2002).

458 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 583–584 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986). For a reconsideration of that decision, see Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 383 (6th Cir. 1993). See also Alfred deZayas, Demjanjuk: Examining His Human Rights, Human Rights 28–29 (A.B.A., Sec. of Individual Rights and Responsibilities) (Winter 1994).

Demjanjuk has standing to assert the principle of specialty. The right to insist on the application of the principle of specialty belongs to the requested state, not to the individual whose extradition is requested."[459]

In United States v. Quinceno De La Pava,[460] a district court case in the Northern District of Illinois, the relators asserted their prosecution for a 215-kilogram cocaine transaction violated the principle of specialty because the United States had only sought their extradition for a 34-kilogram transaction.

The court relied on the Seventh Circuit case, Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman,[461] to determine that the right to insist on the application of the principle of specialty belongs only to a party to the extradition treaty, and not to the relator. Matta-Ballesteros held that individuals have no standing to challenge violations of international treaties in the absence of a protest by the sovereigns involved. In particular, the panel in Matta-Ballesteros held that without an official protest from the requested nation, the court could not determine that the surrendering state had objected to the relator's arrest, and therefore his claims of violation of international law did not entitle him to relief.[462]

In the Fifth Circuit case of United States v. Kaufman,[463] the relators contested their detention and trial on the grounds that it violated the international law principle of specialty in a case where Mexico, the surrendering state, made no protest to the prosecution of the two individuals. The court found that it was unnecessary to determine whether the relators were brought to the United States pursuant to a formal extradition in order to determine that the principle of specialty had been violated. The court reviewed its prior decisions to determine whether the relators could protest a violation of specialty in their own right and found no Fifth Circuit cases directly on point. The cases United States v. Zabaneh[464] and Fiocconi v. Attorney General of United States (even though the extradition was based on comity and not on a treaty),[465] however, cleared the way for the court to deny standing to the relators to claim the principle's protection. In Zabaneh, the Fifth Circuit considered the question of whether an individual has standing to raise extradition treaty violations generally, but not specifically whether an individual has standing to raise violations of the principle of specialty. Zabaneh held that where no party to a treaty protests a treaty violation, an individual lacks standing to raise the treaty as a basis for challenging the court's jurisdiction.[466] The Second Circuit court in Fiocconi held that the principle of specialty is a rule of domestic law conferring a judicial remedy on an extraditee only if the surrendering government would object, as the underlying substantive wrong, which grows out of international law, confers only the latter.[467] The court followed the rule in Fiocconi, considering the substantial similarity between it and the instant case,[468] and it rejected the relator's claim to the right of specialty.

---

459 Demjanjuk, 776 F.2d at 583.

460 United States v. Quinceno De La Pava, 1993 WL 50943 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 23, 1993) (citing Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255, 259 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 878 (1990)).

461 Matta-Ballesteros, 896 F.2d 255; affirmed in United States v. Burke, 425 F.3d 400 (7th Cir. 2005).

462 Matta-Ballesteros, 896 F.2d at 260.

463 United States v. Kaufman, 858 F.2d 994, 1006–1009 (5th Cir. 1988), reh'g denied, 874 F.2d 242 (1989).

464 United States v. Zabaneh, 837 F.2d 1249 (5th Cir. 1988).

465 Fiocconi v. Attorney General of United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059 (1972).

466 Kaufman, 858 F.2d at 1007 n.3 (citations omitted).

467 Fiocconi, 462 F.2d at 479–480 n.8.

468 Kaufman, 858 F.2d at 1008–1009.

6.6.6. Circuits in Which the Issue of Standing Is Not Clearly Decided

Thus far, the District of Columbia, the First, and Fourth Circuits remain ambiguous as to whether an individual has standing to raise the issue of specialty. In Casey v. Department of State,[469] the D.C. Circuit Court maintained that the question of whether the extraditee has standing to raise the specialty principle remains open, by stating: "As a contract between the United States and Costa Rica, the 1922 Treaty arguably protects the interests and rights of only the signatory nations, rather than those of the fugitive."[470] The Fourth Circuit case United States v. Davis,[471] directly acknowledged this, stating:

> We note preliminarily that the Circuits are split regarding whether an individual defendant has standing to raise the issue of a violation of the principle of specialty.... This court has not yet addressed the issue and, on the facts of this case, we decline to do so. Instead, we find that by failing to object to the district court... Davis has waived his right to appeal on this issue.[472]

The First Circuit in Brauch v. Raiche[473] gives a relator standing to raise the issue of dual criminality, but remains ambiguous as to specialty. The 1995 decision of United States v. Sacoccia allowed the raising of the issue of specialty, but rejected it as to dual criminality, using language indicating some confusion as to the standards applicable to the rule of dual criminality and the tenets of the principle of specialty.[474] Almost as if it were prescient of that confusion, the Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Gallo-Chamorro[475] stated:

> The doctrine of dual or double criminality is distinct from the doctrine of specialty.
>
> Double criminality refers to the characterization of the relator's criminal conduct insofar as it constitutes an offense under the laws of the respective states... "Double criminality" is in effect a reciprocity requirement which is intended to ensure each of the respective states that they (and the relator) can rely on corresponding treatment, and that no state shall use its processes to surrender a person for conduct which it does not characterize as criminal.[476]

6.6.7. Eventual Supreme Court Review

It is assumed that the Supreme Court will, in the not-so-distant future, grant certiorari to a case involving specialty, if for no other reason than it cannot leave unresolved for too long the conflict among the circuits and because of its decision in Medellin v. Dretke on treaty interpretation.[477] The connection between the majority opinion in this case and the issues often raised at the district and appellate level are quite similar. In Medellin v. Dretke the Supreme Court stated:

> While treaties are compacts between nations, a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits

469 Casey v. Dep't of State, 980 F.2d 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1992).

470 Id. at 1476.

471 United States v. Davis, 954 F.2d 182 (4th Cir. 1992).

472 Id. at 186–187.

473 Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980); United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754, 767 (1st Cir. 1995) ("while we take no view of the [standing] issue... the side that favors individual standing has much to commend it."), cert. denied, 517 U.S. 1105, 116 S. Ct. 1322 (1996).

474 United States v. Sacoccia, 58 F.3d 754, 769–776 (1st Cir. 1995); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 200 (1st Cir. 1998). See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000).

475 United States v. Gallo-Chamorro, 48 F.3d 502 (11th Cir. 1995).

476 Id. at 507.

477 Medellin v. Dretke, 544 U.S. 660 (2005).

> of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country.[478]

If the Supreme Court recognizes that treaties not only create obligations for the benefit of the contracting states but also rights and privileges for the benefit of individuals, as third party beneficiaries, then the division between the circuits as to a person's standing to raise the issue of specialty without having to rely on a protest by the originally requested state, is a logical conclusion.

Moreover, the Supreme Court could also address the principle's scope particularly with respect to the issues of enhancement of penalties in the appropriate case that raises the issue of specialty.[479] Last, but not least, the Supreme Court, given the appropriate case, might consider another related issue of treaty interpretation, but which in this case also goes to prosecutorial conduct, namely that of carrying out the obligations arising under specialty in good faith.[480]

6.7. Extension of the Specialty Principle: Limitations on Re-Extradition[481]

One extension of specialty applies to re-extradition to a third state. In this situation, the state that originally sought the surrender of an individual secures the person and then considers further extraditing him/her to a third state that subsequently requests extradition from the first requesting state, which is now in custody of the individual. If this occurs, the re-extraditing state must first secure the consent of the original requested state before granting the extradition request of the third state.[482] This extension of the principle manifests the continued interest of the original requested state in compliance with the purposes and grounds for which its processes had been set in motion and for which it granted extradition.[483]

The limitation on re-extradition by means of extending the principle of specialty is particularly relevant in cases where the death penalty can be applied in the state to which the relator is to be re-extradited. Assurances from that state must be obtained unless the original extraditing state agrees to the re-extradition without such assurances.[484]

The issue of extension of the principle of specialty was raised in connection with extradition from the United States to Hong Kong pursuant to the treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom.[485] Sovereignty over Hong Kong, however, reverted to the People's Republic

---

478 Id. at 680, quoting Edye v. Robinson ("Head Money Cases"), 112 U.S. 580 (1884).

479 See infra Sec. 6.4.

480 This relates to the Department of Justice providing assurances to foreign governments, which are not maintained. See United States v. Gonzalez, 275 F. Supp. 2d 483 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (denying motion to dismiss charges where United States gave assurances in a diplomatic note but couched them in terms from which it could back out); for a discussion of Kirkwood, see infra Sec. 7.3. See also Gonzalez v. Justices of the Mun. Ct. of Boston, 420 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2005).

481 See Ch. XII.

482 In re Arietto, 7 Ann. Dig. 334 (Cass. 1933) (Italy).

483 See United States ex rel. Donnelly v. Mulligan, 76 F.2d 511 (2d Cir. 1935). See also Note, International Law—Re-extradition of Extradited Prisoner—Withdrawal of Asylum for Limited Purpose, 35 Colum. L. Rev. 295 (1935).

484 See generally Speedy Rice & Renee Luke, U.S. Courts, The Death Penalty, and the Doctrine of Specialty: Enforcement in the Heart of Darkness, 42 Santa Clara L. Rev. 1061 (2002).

485 Dated June 8, 1972, 28 U.S.T. 227 was made applicable to Hong Kong by an exchange of diplomatic notes on October 21, 1876. See 28 U.S.T. at 238–241. See also Supplementary Treaty Between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, June 25, 1985, T.I.A.S. No. 12050.

of China on July 1, 1997.[486] Surrender by the United States to Hong Kong does not guarantee that the PRC now deems itself bound by the United States–United Kingdom extradition treaty and its specialty obligations. The question therefore arises as to whether the United States can effectuate such a surrender without seeking assurances from the People's Republic of China that it shall be bound by the U.S. extradition order.[487]

As the PRC is not a party to the United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty extradition treaty, it does not have to abide by it. But under the People's Republic of China–United Kingdom agreement concerning the reversion of Hong Kong to Chinese control, the PRC has certain treaty obligations toward the United Kingdom—and that would include the UK's obligations to the United States with respect to extradited persons. But that is only a hypothesis, and it does not fully guarantee the United States and the relator for whose benefit that such assurances should be obtained. This question, however, is still open in the United States.[488]

Of particular importance is whether it is the judiciary that has to make sure that specialty is extended to another state and that assurances are obtained, or whether it is the executive branch that has that prerogative.[489] In the opinion of this writer, the judiciary should await receipt of assurances from the requesting state through the executive branch.

The requested state, through the principle of specialty, exercises a long-arm residual jurisdiction over the relator, who had been subject to its exclusive jurisdiction that it had exercised for a special purpose and that it is entitled to see is not abused or misused.

In United States v. Feng,[490] the U.S. government conceded that the extradition of one of the relators from Canada to Kansas to face prosecution on a charge violated the principle of specialty.[491] However, the U.S. government transferred the relator to the appropriate federal district in New Mexico where the case had been resolved, and the relator was returned to Canada

---

486 Joint Declaration of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the Government of the People's Republic of China on the Question of Hong Kong, December 19, 1984.

487 Oen Yin-Cho v. Robinson, 858 F.2d. 1400 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied 490 U.S. 1106 (1989), partially addressed this question. Cheng Ha-Yuet v. Hueston, 734 F. Supp. 988 (S.D. Fla.), aff'd. 932 F.2d 977 (11th Cir. 1991) held that an extradition to Hong Kong before reversion was not an extradition to China because of the upcoming reversion. The same conclusion was reached by Oen, id. at 1403–1404. Both cases, however, do not address the issue of assurances that specialty will be respected by China.

488 It has been raised and derived by the extradition magistrate in In re Extradition of Lui Kin-Hong a/k/a Jerry Lui (D. Mass. No. 95-M 1072-2RK), to date an unpublished magistrate opinion of August 29, 1996. For the same case involving the other issues, see In re Extradition of Lui Kin-Hong, 913 F. Supp. 50 (D. Mass. 1996), and 926 F. Supp. 1180 (D. Mass. 1996), order rev'd per curiam, 83 F.3d 523 (1st Cir. 1996), on remand, 939 F. Supp. 934 (D. Mass 1996), habeas corpus granted by 957 F. Supp. 1280 (D. Mass. 1997), reversed by 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997).

489 Several cases hold that such matters are better left to be handled by the secretary of state, who can obtain assurances and establish conditions to the surrender. See Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 589 (6th Cir. 1985); Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 834 F.2d 1444, 1454 (9th Cir. 1987); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 176 (2nd Cir. 1980). This solution is, however, subject to political considerations, both foreign and domestic. Because of the doctrine of separation of powers, a judicial officer cannot demand or receive assurances from foreign states. This is clearly part of the executive's constitutional prerogatives. United States v. Mazzi, 888 F.2d 204, 206 (1st Cir. 1989) (per curiam), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1017 (1990); Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169, 173–174 (1st. Cir. 1991). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

490 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37903 (D. Kan. 2009).

491 Id. at *15.

after serving his sentence.[492] After arriving in Canada, the relator was subsequently indicted in the United States for one count of failure to appear in the District of Kansas, which formed the basis of a new extradition request from the United States to Canada.[493] The relator was subject to an Immigrations and Customs Enforcement hold.[494] The relator argued that the prior violation of the principle of specialty required the dismissal of the charges, while the U.S. government argued that dismissal was inappropriate under the treaty as the relator was subject to prosecution if he left the United States and voluntarily returned or if he had not left the United States within thirty days after being free to do so.[495] The court found that any violation of specialty had been cured by the relator's transfer to the appropriate federal district court, and declined to dismiss the indictment at issue pending Canada's decision on the pending extradition request.[496] The court also reasoned that the United States was not prosecuting an indictment against the relator, but was merely pursing an indictment at the time, and "an indictment alone does not violate the principle of specialty; rather it is the prosecution of that indictment."[497]

6.8. Other Issues of Pertaining to Standing

A relator has no standing to object in the United States if the requested state waived the principle of specialty.[498] A relator has standing to object to retrial and other grounds arising under U.S. law, just as any other relator would. This includes all the defenses, exceptions, exemptions, and exclusions arising under the applicable treaty, and under the U.S. Constitution, state constitutions (where the case is before a state court), U.S. federal law, state laws, and case law (see Chapter VIII).

6.9. The United States as the Requested State and the Principle of Specialty

When surrendered by the United States, the surrender is accompanied by a certificate issued by the secretary of state and includes the judicial order upon which the individual is being extradited. It is on the basis of that final order that the prosecution in the foreign requesting state is conducted. Any variation requires the foreign requesting state to receive permission from the United States to proceed on the basis of the variance. The U.S. government, acting through the secretary of state, cannot grant a variance from a final judicial order without first seeking to have the court that issued the extradition order review it and decide whether the waiver is to be granted. In such a case, the court will ascertain whether the variance falls within its findings of probable cause pursuant to the applicable treaty and to § 3184. If the variance falls within the meaning of the earlier finding of probable cause by the court, it will be granted. If not, the court must hold a new extradition hearing. In any event, additional judicial hearings on variances are such as to give notice to the interested party and an opportunity to be heard through counsel. There are no cases whereby an extradited individual was allowed to return to the U.S. to argue in person against a request for a variance.

---

492 Id. at *15, *19–*20.

493 Id. at *17.

494 Id. at *20.

495 Id. at *16, *18–*19.

496 Id. at *20.

497 Id.

498 United States v. Stokes, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45366 (N.D. Ill. 2010); United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 2000 (1st Cir. 1998); Berthaumieu v. Gibson, 1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 34867; United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal. 1998).

6.10. The Position of the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States on Specialty

The American Law Institute's position on the doctrine of specialty is as follows:

> § 477. Doctrine of Specialty.
>
> Under most international agreements, state law, and state practices:
>
> (1) A person who has been extradited to another state will not, unless the requested state consents,
>
> (a) be tried by the requesting state for an offense other than one for which he was extradited; or
>
> (b) be given punishment more severe than was provided by law in the requesting state for the offense charged at the time of the request for extradition.
>
> (2) A person who has been extradited to another state for trial and has been acquitted of the charges for which he was extradited must be given a reasonable opportunity to depart from that state.
>
> Comment:
>
> (a) Variance between request for extradition and prosecution. Courts in some states construe the doctrine of specialty strictly, so that any variance between the charge on which the extradition was based and the charge on which the prosecution is founded must lead to dismissal of the prosecution. In other states, including the United States, Reporters' Note 1, if the prosecution is based on the same facts as those set forth in the request for extradition, the prosecution may go forward.
>
> The doctrine of specialty applies only to offenses committed prior to the person's extradition and does not preclude prosecution for an offense committed in the requesting state after the person had been returned there. See also Comment e.
>
> (b) Doctrine of specialty as right of accused and of requested state. The object of the doctrine of specialty is to prevent punishment of a person who might not have been extradited if the plans of the extraditing state had been fully disclosed. Both the person extradited and the extraditing state are beneficiaries of the doctrine. Even if the prosecution meets the criteria set forth in Comment a, i.e., the charges are based on the same set of facts as set forth in the request for extradition, the prosecution may not go forward if the crime charged is not one included in the treaty and in the request for extradition, unless the extraditing state consents expressly or by implication. While the case law in the United States and elsewhere is not consistent on the point, it appears that the person extradited has standing to raise the issue by motion during or in advance of his trial. The standard for adjudicating such a motion in the United States is whether the state from which the accused was extradited has objected or would object to prosecution on a given charge. However, the fact that the person extradited consents to prosecution on different charges is not determinative since the obligation embodied in the doctrine of specialty runs to the requested state.
>
> (c) Evidence not submitted with extradition request. So long as the evidence submitted with the request for extradition meets the standard of proof needed to extradite, § 476(1)(a) and Comment b, there is no obligation on the requesting state to set forth all its evidence in the request for extradition, or indeed to wait until the investigation is complete before making the request. Thus, there is no right to object to introduction of evidence in a trial that was not made part of the request for extradition, as long as it is directed to the charge contained in the request for extradition. Evidence of offenses prior to the offense on which the extradition was based may be introduced for purposes of multiple offender sentencing, demonstrating propensity to commit crime, and similar ancillary purposes, if otherwise admissible according to the law where the prosecution is brought.
>
> (d) Re-extradition. Under many treaties a person extradited from one state to another may not be extradited or otherwise surrendered to a third state for prosecution for an act committed prior to his extradition, without the consent of the original extraditing state. See, e.g., Convention on Extradition between the United States and Sweden, 1963, Art. IX, 14 U.S.T. 1845, T.I.A.S. No. 5496, 494 U.N.T.S. 141.

(e) Effect of remaining in requesting state. Most modern extradition treaties provide a specified period, such as 45 days, after disposition of the charge, in which the person extradited is free to leave the state, i.e., after an acquittal, dismissal of prosecution, or service of sentence. If the person extradited remains in the requesting state beyond the period specified, he may be tried also for offenses alleged to have been committed prior to extradition and not contained in the extradition request.

(f) Death penalty. Generally, a sentence of death may not be imposed on a person extradited from another state unless the request for extradition expressly indicated that the accused might be subject to such a sentence and the requested state surrenders a person on condition that the sentence of death not be imposed, this condition is binding on the requesting state. See, e.g., Article VIII of the treaty between the United States and Sweden, Comment d.[499]

6.11. The Principle of Specialty and Assurances in Light of Governmental Interests[500]

The principle of specialty and diplomatic assurances are two of the most important mechanisms by which requested states ensure that an individual's rights are protected after extradition to the requesting state. As described above, the principle of specialty requires that the requesting state only prosecute the extradited individual for the exact crimes indicated in the extradition order. A diplomatic assurance is a statement in the form of a letter or diplomatic note by the requesting state to the requested state that the extradited individual will not be subjected to a particular charge, punishment, or treatment. This may include such matters as to the place and conditions of detention of the surrendered person, access to his/her counsel, and visitation by the consular representative of the surrendering state. Assurances may be, but are not usually, incorporated into the extradition order, but they are operative through the principle of specialty. In this way, the principle of specialty and assurances operate to protect individuals and enforce their rights under the laws of the requested state. When assurances are only in the form of a diplomatic note, and are not included in the extradition order, it is more difficult to enforce them before U.S. courts because the U.S. government may tend to consider the exchange of diplomatic notes or the issuance of unilateral assurances as being in the nature of diplomatic relations between the two states, and thus not justiciable. U.S. courts have been unsure as to how to deal with such situations.

Diplomatic assurances are conventionally made by the U.S. secretary of state or the foreign minister in another state to their respective counterparts in the requested state. As a matter of practice these notes are issued by the ambassador representing the state making the given representation. The problem with diplomatic assurances is that governments often approach them opportunistically and cynically by making vague assurances in order to ensure the extradition of the individual without regard to the actual enforceability of the assurance before the courts. Most often this occurs because the individual or governmental entity giving the assurance does not provide the requested state with a complete understanding of the extent of the assurance, or the legal context of the assurance in the requesting state, both of which are necessary in order to allow the requested state to make a complete and accurate assessment of the request in light of their own constitution, laws, and treaty obligations toward the requested individual. In other words, governments are often willing to make assurances that they cannot necessarily guarantee or enforce due to constitutional and structural limitations in order to secure the surrender of the sought individual. In the United States this is especially so because of the significant extent to which powers are reserved to states, as well as to local judicial districts within states, and that the federal government cannot make a binding commitment on behalf of these state and local institutions. It has been the case on a number of occasions that the U.S. government has given assurances without informing the requested state of the ultimate authority of the state attorney general or local prosecutor to determine what charges or punishments to pursue, and on one occasion concerning the statutory limitation on its ability to influence the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.[501] This has led to significant problems for a number of foreign states that do not fully grasp the complex nature of American federalism and the limited capacity of the secretary of state to make a binding commitment for local jurisdictions and officials.

499 Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1988) § 477.

500 See also Ch. II, Sec. 6.3 and Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

The lack of consistency on this issue raises questions over the enforceability of assurances, as part of the comity of nations that is part of customary international law and that is binding upon the United States.[502] In the end, the lack of transparency and consistency poses a threat to the relations between states and the extradition regime itself, which is built upon reciprocity.[503] This practice also raises the question of the need for states to receive assurances directly from the individual or institution with actual control over prosecutions. Short of receiving word from the entity with actual authority, assurances are not binding and should not be accepted by the requested state.

The death penalty is one of the most contentious aspects of extradition law, as there is a growing division between countries that have abolished the practice and those that retain it, as well as a greater willingness of abolitionist states to refuse extradition to retentionist states on humanitarian grounds, thereby rejecting the general prohibition against doing so found in the rule of non-inquiry.[504] One of the ways in which this is done is through the provision of assurances in the form of a letter or diplomatic note[505] that an individual will not receive a specific punishment if convicted, which in effect turns the extradition agreement, and the possible punishment, into one that is limited by the principle of specialty.

This is most often the case when an individual is charged for a capital crime and is sought for extradition from a state that does not have the death penalty and whose constitution, laws, or international treaty obligations prohibit it from extraditing individuals to retentionist countries for capital offenses.[506] In such instances the requesting state will have to provide diplomatic

---

501 See United States of America v. David R. Mendoza,Drug Trafficker Pleads Guilty to BC Bud Importation Conspiracy, Department of Justice, June 19, 2009, available at http://www.justice.gov/usao/waw/press/2009/jun/mendoza.html.

502 U.S. Const. art. VI. Article 6 of the Constitution provides:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

503 See Ch. I, Sec. 2.1.

504 See infra Sec. 8.

505 See infra Sec. 7.

506 Amnesty International estimates that as of April 2013, 140 countries are either abolitionist for the death penalty for all crimes, abolitionist for ordinary crimes, or abolitionitist in practice, while 58 retain the death penalty. Of these only 21 states actually executed individuals in 2012, and in practice the use of the death penalty is centered on five states, namely China, Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and the United States. In 2012, 43 executions were carried out in the United States. Belarus is the only country in Europe or Central Asia to have carried out an execution in 2012. See Amnesty International, Death Sentences and Executions 2012 (2012). In particular, according to Amnesty International:

- Ninety-seven (97) have abolished the death penalty for all crimes, namely: Albania, Andorra, Angola, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bhutan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Burundi, Cambodia, Canada, Cape Verde, Colombia, Cook Islands, Costa Rica, Cote assurances to the requested state to the effect that the requested individual will not be subjected to the death penalty. The same approach, namely obtaining assurances from the requested state, is followed with respect to torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.[507]

6.11.1. The Death Penalty[508]

The use of assurances against the use of the death penalty most commonly arises within the context of extraditions from European states to the United States. The death penalty in Europe has been continually scaled back, beginning with Protocol 6[509] to the European Convention for the

---

D'Ivoire, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Estonia, Finland, France, Gabon, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Holy See, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Mexico, Micronesia, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niue, Norway, Palau, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, San Marino, Sao Tome And Principe, Senegal, Serbia (including Kosovo), Seychelles, Slovakia, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Timor-Leste, Togo, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Tuvalu, Ukraine, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu, and Venezuela.

- Eight (8) have abolished the death penalty for ordinary crimes, namely Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, El Salvador, Fiji, Israel, Kazakstan, and Peru.
- Thirty-five (35) are abolitionist in practice (i.e. "Countries which retain the death penalty for ordinary crimes such as murder but can be considered abolitionist in practice in that they have not executed anyone during the past 10 years and are believed to have a policy or established practice of not carrying out executions."), namely Algeria, Benin, Brunei, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Congo (Republic of), Eritrea, Ghana, Grenada, Kenya, Laos, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mongolia, Morocco, Myanmar, Nauru, Niger, Papua New Guinea, Russian Federation, Sierra Leone, South Korea, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Swaziland, Tajikistan, Tanzania, Tonga, Tunisia, and Zambia.
- Fifty-eight (58) have retained the death penalty, namely: Afghanistan, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Botswana, Chad, China, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Cuba, Dominica, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libya, Malaysia, Nigeria, North Korea, Oman, Pakistan, Palestinian Authority, Qatar, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syria, Taiwan, Thailand, Trinidad And Tobago, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United States Of America, Viet Nam, Yemen, and Zimbabwe.

In 2012, the number of documented executions per country were at least: Afghanistan: 14; Bangladesh: 1; Belarus: 3; China: unknown; Gambia: 9; India: 1; Iran: 314; Iraq: 129; Japan: 7; North Korea: 6; Pakistan: 1; Gaza (Hamas): 6; Saudia Arabia: 79; Somalia: 6; Sudan: 19; South Sudan: 5; Taiwan: 6; United Arab Emirates: 1; United States: 43; and, Yemen: 28. There are no accurate figures for China, but it appears that several thousand were executed there.

507 See The United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. Res. 46, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., 93 plen. mtg., at 395, U.N. Doc. A/64, at 63 (1984).

508 See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

509 Protocol No. 6 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the abolition of the death penalty, June 28, 1983, E.T.S. 114. There are forty-six state-parties to Protocol 6, namely: Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United

Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR),[510] which abolished the practice in peacetime in 1982, and Protocol 13, which abolished the punishment at all times, whether in times of peace or war, in 2002.[511]

After the adoption of Protocol 6 in 1982 the question arose over the extradition of individuals from Europe to countries where the death penalty was still in force, and whether extradition in such circumstances would violate those states' treaty obligations under the ECHR. In order to secure the extradition of individuals from Europe, the U.S. government began giving assurances to requested states in the 1980s to the effect that the requested individual would not be subject to the death penalty. The first cases regarding extradition and assurances in death penalty cases came before the European Court of Human Rights in the petitions of Kirkwood and Soering, and both are landmarks on the issue.

The first of these cases arose in 1984 concerning Ernest Major Kirkwood, a U.S. citizen residing in the United Kingdom who was wanted by the state of California on a charge of double-homicide, a crime that was potentially subject to the death penalty. On the basis of the indictment the U.S. government sought Kirkwood's extradition from the United Kingdom.[512] In order to secure Kirkwood's extradition, the U.S. government made representations to the UK government that Kirkwood would not be subjected to the death penalty if extradited.[513] This representation was necessary for the United Kingdom to extradite him, as it had abolished the death penalty.[514] Kirkwood, however, filed a petition with the European Commission of Human Rights,[515] arguing Kingdom. Russia has signed but not ratified the Protocol. Amnesty International considers Russia to be abolitionist in practice.

---

510 European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, opened for signature Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221 [hereinafter European Convention]. The text of the Convention had been amended according to the provisions of Protocol No. 3 (ETS No. 45) (entry into force Sept. 21, 1970), Protocol No. 5 (ETS No. 55) (entry into force on December 20, 1971), Protocol No. 8 (ETS No. 118) (entry into force Jan. 1. 1990), Protocol No. 2 (ETS No. 44) (Sept. 21, 1970), Protocol No. 11 (ETS No. 155) (entry into force Nov. 1, 1998). For the European Convention's provisions on cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment, see European Convention, supra at art. 3.

511 Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances, May 3, 2002, E.T.S. 187. There are forty-three state-parties to Protocol 13, namely: Albania, Andorra, Austria, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Armenia and Poland have signed but not ratified the Protocol, but Amnesty International considers both to be abolitionist in practice.

512 The request was made under the 1972 United States–United Kingdom Extradition treaty, 28 U.S.T. 227. Article 4 of the Convention states: "If the offence for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the relevant law of the requesting Party, but the relevant law of the requested Party does not provide for the death penalty in a similar case, extradition may be refused unless the requesting Party gives assurances satisfactory to the requested Party that the death penalty will not be carried out."

513 The request was made under the 1972 UK–U.S. Extradition Treaty, 28 U.S.T. 227. Article 4 of the Convention states: "If the offence for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the relevant law of the requesting Party, but the relevant law of the requested Party does not provide for the death penalty in a similar case, extradition may be refused unless the requesting Party gives assurances satisfactory to the requested Party that the death penalty will not be carried out."

514 See Regina v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. ex parte Kirkwood, [1984] EWHC (QB) 913, (1984) 1 W.L.R. 913 (Eng.).

515 Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by Article 3 would be grossly violated by that the delays in carrying out the death penalty and the resulting "death row syndrome" would constitute cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment in violation of Article 3 of the ECHR. The Commission recognized the merits of Kirkwood's claim, but as the U.S. government presented assurances in writing to the UK government that the death penalty was not going to be sought by the State of California, his extradition was eventually granted.[516]

Although it was true that an understanding had been reached between UK and U.S. officials concerning the non-application of the death penalty should Kirkwood be extradited, and the U.S. government gave the United Kingdom a diplomatic assurance to this effect, neither the U.S. Department of State nor the Department of Justice had secured similar assurances from California's legal authorities, including the attorney general and the district attorney of San Francisco. Accordingly the assurance was not binding upon the local officials and was without effect because there was no constitutional basis allowing the federal government to tell the attorney general of California or the district attorney of San Francisco how to prosecute the case or what punishment to pursue.

A problem arose when the district attorney sought the death penalty against Kirkwood.[517] This was clear from the outset, however, to the secretary of state and anyone who followed the Kirkwood case in California. Under California law there is a bifurcated, dual track model for prosecutions that required the prosecutor to indicate prior to the commencement of the trial whether he/she was pursuing the death penalty in the case. Upon certifying to the court that the death penalty would be pursued special procedures are triggered, in particular special jury instructions at the start of the case, all of which is made public. In the course of the proceedings in People of the State of California v. Kirkwood, the United Kingdom realized that the assurances offered by the United States prior to Kirkwood's extradition could not effectively be relied upon to shield him from the death penalty. The U.S. government responded that it interpreted its assurance as being a "best efforts clause," and therefore that it had not violated its obligations or acted inconsistently with its constitutional authority when making the assurance. Eventually an evidentiary hearing was held at which the UK foreign office legal adviser and this writer testified as expert witnesses to explain that the assurance that had been given by the U.S. government was binding.[518] Eventually, the San Francisco district attorney dropped the death penalty charge, thereby removing from the jury the discretion of choosing the death penalty. In doing so the intent of the assurance was satisfied even though the district attorney's determination not to pursue the death penalty was not based on a legal obligation but on discretion and presumably back channel pressure.

The unfolding of the case and the apparent ineffectiveness of the U.S. government's assurance shocked European legal circles, and when a few years later a similar extradition request for murder was presented by the United States to the United Kingdom in the Soering case, the Kirkwood precedent loomed large. In Soering, the U.S. government again offered assurances, but Soering pled his case his case before British courts.[519] Soering argued that the British requesting nation). See also William A. Schabas, Indirect Abolition: Capital Punishment's Role in Extradition Law and Practice, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 581, 596–598 (2003).

---

516 See Regina v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. ex parte Kirkwood, [1984] EWHC (QB) 913, (1984) 1 W.L.R. 913 (Eng.).

517 People v. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court, No. 115353 (1987).

518 Kirkwood was tried for first-degree murder on two counts. After his first trial resulted in a hung jury, he pled guilty on the eve of his second trial and received a sentence of seventeen years to life. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court, No. 115353; Michael P. Shea, Expanding Judicial Scrutiny of Human Rights in Extradition Cases after Soering, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 85, 109 (Winter 1992), citing UPI, July 24, 1987, available in LEXIS, Nexis Library Wires File.

519 The European Commission of Human Rights accepts petitions from individuals who have exhausted all domestic remedies. Thereafter, actions can be filed with the European Court of Human Rights if the Commission makes a positive decision on the original petition. Such action before the Court,

Foreign Secretary had violated Article IV of the United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty by failing to obtain an ironclad promise from Virginia prosecutors not to seek the death penalty against him. Article IV of the treaty allows the requested state to refuse to surrender capital felons unless the requesting state gives assurances that the death penalty will not be carried out.[520] Soering argued that the Virginia prosecutor's assurances that the death penalty would not be carried out were far short of the requirements the treaty provision imposed on the foreign secretary. The divisional court disagreed,[521] and Soering applied to the European Commission on Human Rights, where he contended that his extradition would expose him to the "death row syndrome"—a severe form of emotional distress that is caused by the prolonged uncertainty during the lengthy appeals process in capital cases, combined with the severe conditions of confinement on death row—that he alleged constituted "inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment," thereby violating Article 3 of the ECHR. The Commission rejected Soering's Article 3 claim by a vote of six to five. In the majority's view, the "death row phenomenon" did not constitute inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[522] The Commission did, however, refer the case to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR). The Court, in Soering v. United Kingdom,[523] ruled that if the United Kingdom extradited Soering to the United States without sufficient assurances against the imposition of the death penalty, it would violate the ECHR.[524] The ECtHR further determined that the assurances by the United States notwithstanding, the "death row syndrome" that was the result of death penalty proceedings in the United States violated Protocol 6 to the ECHR.[525] It should be noted, however, that the Court did not hold that the imposition of the death penalty violated Article 3 per se. It explicitly refused to go that far, as it noted that Article 2 of the ECHR permits states to impose however, can be filed only by a member state to the European Convention. The same process applies to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and Inter-American Court on Human Rights. European Convention, supra note 510, arts. 24–25 at 236.

---

520 Extradition Treaty, June 8, 1972, U.S.–UK, 28 U.S.T. 227. Article IV provides:

> If the offense for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the relevant law of the requesting Party, but the relevant law of the requested Party does not provide for the death penalty in a similar case, extradition may be refused unless the requesting Party gives assurances satisfactory to the requested Party that the death penalty will not be carried out.

Id. at 230.

521 In re Soering, 1988 Crim. L. Rev. 307. See also Stephan Breitenmoser & Gunter E. Wilms, Human Rights v. Extradition: The Soering Case, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (1990); David L. Gappa, European Court of Human Rights-Extradition—Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Soering Case, 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Ser. A) (1989), 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 463 (1990); James M. Lenihan, Soering's Case: Waiting for Godot—Cruel and Unusual Punishment?, 4 Pace Y.B. Int'l L. 157 (1992); Shea, supra note 518.

522 Soering Commission Report, reprinted in 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) 1, 67–68 (1989), and in 28 I.L.M. 1063 (1989); Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989).

523 Soering v. United Kingdom, Judgment of the European Court of Human Rights, July 7, 1989, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, Vol. 16.

524 The European Court is the higher body. Note that since 1998, the Commission has been abolished by Protocol 11 of the ECHR, and all matters go directly to the Court. A chamber decides first on admissibility and after that, the case is presented for adjudication. Protocol No. 11 to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (November 1998) (replacing the existing, part-time Court and Commission by a single, full-time Court).

525 See Christine Van Den Wijngaert,Rethinking the Law of International Criminal Cooperation: The Restrictive Function of International Human Rights through Individual-Oriented Bars, in 33 Principles and Procedures for a New Transnational Criminal Law 496 (Albin Eser & Otto Lagodny eds., 1991). See also, e.g., William A. Schabas, The Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (1993).

capital punishment.[526] Instead, the Court limited itself to finding that the manner in which the death penalty was imposed in Virginia constituted inhuman or degrading punishment.

With regard to the death penalty and assurances, the ECtHR explained that:

> 69. Relations between the United Kingdom and the United States of America on matters concerning extradition are conducted by and with the Federal and not the State authorities. However, in respect of offences against State laws the Federal authorities have no legally binding power to provide, in an appropriate extradition case, an assurance that the death penalty will not be imposed or carried out. In such cases the power rests with the State. If a State does decide to give a promise in relation to the death penalty, the United States Government has the power to give an assurance to the extraditing Government that the State's promise will be honoured.
>
> According to evidence from the Virginia authorities, Virginia's capital sentencing procedure and notably the provision on post-sentencing reports (see paragraph 47 above) would allow the sentencing judge to consider the representation to be made on behalf of the United Kingdom Government pursuant to the assurance given by the Attorney for Bedford County (see paragraph 20 above). In addition, it would be open to the Governor to take into account the wishes of the United Kingdom Government in any application for clemency (see paragraph 60 above).

The Court ultimately determined that > the assurance received from the United States must at the very least significantly reduce the risk of a capital sentence either being imposed or carried out (see paragraphs 20, 37 and 69 above).[527]

The Soering decision was ultimately influenced by the lack of reliability of the U.S. government's assurances. Soering was ultimately extradited to the United States, but only after the United Kingdom secured much more stringent assurances than it had previously. There are several reasons for these different results in the Kirkwood and Soering cases, despite their similarities. First, the ECtHR was not bound to follow Commission precedent or its own case law, although it generally gave substantial weight to both.[528] Also, the ECtHR found that Soering's youth and alleged mental disorder would make his stay on death row particularly traumatic.[529] One can assume that the Commission remembered the Kirkwood case, as they ruled on the complaint as they had in Kirkwood, namely that "death penalty syndrome" in the United States constituted cruel treatment in violation of the ECHR.[530] With regard to the rationale of the Court, one is tempted to ask whether the Soering ruling would have been the same had the United States promptly and expeditiously carried out executions in death penalty cases? This writer's assumption is that the prevailing position in the member states of the Council of Europe is against the death penalty. This is evidenced by Protocols 6 and 13 to the ECHR,[531] and the ruling of the court in Soering.

---

526 Article 2(1) of the European Convention states: "No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally, save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law." European Convention, supra note 510, at 224.

527 Soering v. United Kingdom, at ¶ 93.

528 John G. Merrills, The Development of International Law by the European Court of Human Rights 1 (1988).

529 Soering Commission Report, supra note 522, at 43.

530 See European Convention, supra note 510, art. 3 at 224.

531 Concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty, opened for signature, Apr. 28, 1983, E.T.S 114, reprinted in 22 I.L.M. 538. See Model Treaty on Extradition, arts. 3, 4, Dec. 14, 1990, 30 I.L.M. 1407, reprinted in Bert Swart, Refusal of Extradition and the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition, 1992 Netherlands Y. B. Int'l L. 75, 197. Article 4(d) reflects the traditional reluctance of states whose laws do not provide for the death penalty to extradite offenders to other states where a death sentence is likely to be imposed. Id.

In the prominent case of Ira Einhorn, the question of death penalty assurances came up as well, and the ECtHR's decision in that case serves as a good template for the minimum requirements for assurances in death penalty cases. In Einhorn v. France,[532] the French government authorized Einhorn's extradition to the United States after receiving assurances from the U.S. government on behalf of the prosecuting district attorney in Philadelphia that there would be a retrial of the case at Einhorn's request (he had been convicted in absentia), and that he would not be subject to the death penalty. The ECtHR noted that > it is clear from the affidavits sworn by the District Attorney, Ms Abraham, on 23 June 1997 and 10 June 1998 (see paragraph 12 above) that the prosecution will not seek the death penalty in respect of the applicant and that the trial court will be unable to impose the death penalty of its own motion. Ms Abraham states that the affidavit sworn by her in her capacity as District Attorney is binding on her, on all her successors in that post and on any other prosecutors who might deal with the case; that statement is confirmed by the diplomatic notes from the United States embassy. Secondly, the diplomatic note of 2 July 1998 from the United States embassy expressly states that "if the Government of France extradites Ira Einhorn to the United States to stand trial for murder in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the death penalty will not be sought, imposed or executed against Ira Einhorn for this offense."

>
> Consequently, the Court notes that the circumstances of the case and the assurances obtained by the Government are such as to remove the danger of the applicant's being sentenced to death in Pennsylvania. Since, in addition, the decree of 24 July 2000 granting the applicant's extradition expressly provides that "the death penalty may not be sought, imposed or carried out in respect of Ira Samuel Einhorn," the Court considers that the applicant is not exposed to a serious risk of treatment or punishment prohibited under Article 3 of the Convention on account of his extradition to the United States.

A number of subsequent cases before the ECtHR have further detailed the nature of assurances and the obligations of ECHR member states in extradition cases. In Baysakov and Others v. Ukraine, the applicants argued that their extradition to Kazakhstan from the Ukraine would violate their rights under Article 2 (the right to life) of the ECHR, and that Kazakhstan's legal guarantees were insufficient to protect them from the possibility of execution. The Court rejected the applicants' arguments due to the fact that Kazakhstan had abolished the death penalty, and accordingly was "not persuaded that the first applicant risks the death penalty in case of his possible extradition to Kazakhstan. The mere possibility of such a risk because of the alleged ambiguity of the relevant domestic legislation cannot in itself involve a violation of Article 2 of the Convention."[533] Although in Baysakov the question was not about assurances per se, the provision of legal protections such as the abolition of the death penalty are analogous to, and indeed more stringent, than assurances. More important, the ECtHR expressed the possibility that these legal provisions, and by extension assurances, could be insufficient when there is more than a "mere possibility" of a violation of Article 2 of the ECHR.

In a 2005 case, Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, the ECtHR dealt with a complaint over the extradition of thirteen men from Georgia to Russia without guaranteeing assurances against their torture or execution beforehand.[534] With respect to the death penalty, the Court determined that in order to establish a potential violation the applicants would have to establish that > when the Georgian authorities took their decision [to extradite], there were serious and well-founded reasons for believing that extradition would expose the applicants to a real risk of

532 Case of Einhorn v. France, Final Decision on Admissability, App. no. 71555/01 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Oct. 16, 2001).

533 Id. at ¶ 82 (emphasis added)

534 Case of Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, App. no. 36378/02 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Oct. 23, 2008).

> extra-judicial execution, contrary to Article 2 of the Convention. Accordingly, there has been no violation of that provision.[535]

In Bader and Kanbor v. Sweden, the ECtHR determined that where the applicant had been sentenced to death in absentia, his extradition to Syria would constitute a violation of the European Convention due to the "real risk of being executed and subjected to treatment contrary to Articles 2 and 3 if deported to his home country."[536]

On the basis of the case law of the ECtHR, which is not binding as there is no stare decisis, it appears that short of a showing that the assurance in question is manifestly unable to guarantee the rights of the relator, extradition will be approved. It is clear, however, that the ECtHR has calibrated its inquiry and become more critical of assurances in death penalty cases. Although it initially accepted blanket assurances from the U.S. government in the Kirkwood case, it required a more substantial showing in Einhorn from the relevant prosecutor, further noting that she had committed not only herself but her office in perpetuity to not seek the death penalty against Einhorn. Clearly the ECtHR is not only demanding more exact and exacting assurances in death penalty cases, but it is also opening the possibility that assurances are insufficient where they cannot be reasonably relied upon, as is the case with the extraditions to Russia and Kazakhstan. It is not inconceivable that given this trend that all assurances will be found insufficient one day, although it is a slow process and the nature of the case and other factors still influence the acceptability of assurances and require a sometimes complex case-by-case analysis.

Domestic courts have also taken up this issue, notably in the Italian case Venezia v. Ministero de Grazia e Giustizia.[537] In Venezia the Italian Constitutional Court held that death penalty assurances by the requesting state could not satisfy the protections afforded individuals by the Italian Constitution. The Constitutional Court grounded its judgment on the fact that due to the separation of powers, the executive branch of the requesting state cannot give a definitive assurance over the finding of the judicial branch, and that it similarly cannot be assured that the executive will have the ability to grant clemency or pardon to the individual should he/she be sentenced to death.

The rulings of the ECtHR and domestic practice has influenced treaty practice as well. An example of this is Article 12 of the United States–Germany Extradition Treaty, which contains a specific provision on the Death Penalty and Assurances. The treaty provides:

> When the offense for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the laws of the Requesting State and the laws of the Requested State do not permit such punishment for that offense, extradition may be refused unless the Requesting State furnishes such assurances as the Requested State considers sufficient that the death penalty shall not be imposed, or, if imposed, shall not be executed.

German domestic law provides a similar requirement. Article 8 of the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters similarly provides that "If the crime is punishable by death

---

535 Id. at ¶¶ 371–372 (emphasis added).

536 Case of Bader and Kanbor v. Sweden, App. no. 13284/04 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Feb. 8, 2006).

537 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). Venezia was subsequently tried in Italy for the crime for which he was requested in the United States and convicted thereof. Recently, a similar case involving a request by the United States of the state of Connecticut followed the same approach. See Giulaino Vassali, Pena Di Morte E Richiesta Di Estradizione Quando Il Ministero Scavalca la Consulta (Death Penalty and Extradition Request When the Ministry Tries to Bypass the Constitutional Court), 22 Diritto E Giustizia 76 (June 2006). See also Schabas, Indirect Abolition, supra note 515.

under the law of the requesting state, extradition shall only be granted if the requesting state provides assurances that the death penalty will not be imposed or carried out."[538]

6.11.2. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment[539]

As discussed in Chapter VIII, the United States and a number of other states are parties to the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), which contains a specific prohibition in Article 3 that prohibits the extradition of "a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture."[540] The discussion bellow investigates whether assurances will be sufficient to overcome the Article 3 limitation on extradition.

The reliability of assurances has also come before the ECtHR in cases pertaining to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, or punishment of individuals rendered to other countries. Although the Court has not rejected outright the assurances given by some states, including the United States, concerning the death penalty, there is a subtext of suspicion toward them, as is apparent in a number of rulings on assurances regarding torture. In Baysakov and Others v. Ukraine, also discussed above in the context of the death penalty, the Court considered a challenge to the extradition of a number of individuals from Ukraine to Kazakhstan, where the relators argued that they would be subjected to torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The Court considered the assurances in light of Kazakhstan's practice, and denied extradition on two grounds, first over its concern that the government organ giving the assurance lacked the competence to do so, and second that given the significant evidence of torture in Kazakhstan "it would be difficult to see whether such assurances would have been respected."[541] As indicated above, the ECtHR refused to find that their extradition would constitute a violation to Article 2 of the ECHR, but did in the context of a case where the possibility of torture, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment was a real possibility.

The ECtHR arrived at a similar finding in Soldatenko v. Ukraine, noting that the numerous credible reports of torture in Turkmenistan rendered "the assurances given in the present case . . . [insufficient] to guarantee against the serious risk of ill-treatment in case of extradition."[542] In Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, discussed above, the European Court determined that in order to prove a violation of the duty to collect assurances, the applicants would have to make a "beyond any reasonable doubt" showing that > at the time when the Georgian authorities took the decision [to extradite the individuals], there were real or well-founded grounds to believe that extradition would expose the applicants to a real and personal risk of inhuman or degrading treatment, within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention. There has accordingly been no violation of that provision by Georgia.[543]

The nature of assurances was succinctly outlined in the partly dissenting opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello, and Hedigan in Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey.[544] In that case, the

---

538 Gesetz über die internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen [Law on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters], Oct. 18, 2010, BGBl. I S. 1408 (Ger.) ("Ist die Tat nach dem Recht des ersuchenden Staates mit der Todesstrafe bedroht, so ist die Auslieferung nur zulässig, wenn der ersuchende Staat zusichert, daß die Todesstrafe nicht verhängt oder nicht vollstreckt werden wird.").

539 See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 5.

540 CAT, supra note 507.

541 Case of Baysakov and Others v. Ukraine, App. no. 54131/08, ¶ 51 (Eur. Ct. H.R., May 18, 2010).

542 Case of Soldatenko v. Ukraine, App. no. 2440/07, ¶ 74 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Oct. 23, 2008).

543 Id. at ¶ 353 (emphasis added).

544 Case of Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, App. no. 46827/99 and 46951/99 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Feb. 4, 2005) (partly dissenting opion of Judges Bratza, Bonello, and Hedigan) (emphasis added).

applicants had been extradited to Uzbekistan, but the court failed to find a violation of the European Convention as they were not actually tortured or ill-treated. The partly dissenting judges argued:

> 9. In concluding that the required level of risk had not been sufficiently shown, the majority of the Court place reliance on three particular features of the case—the assurances given by the Uzbek Government; the statement by the Public Prosecutor of the Republic, which accompanied those assurances, to the effect that Uzbekistan was a Party to the United Nations Convention against Torture and accepted and reaffirmed its obligation to comply with the requirements of that Convention; and the medical reports from the doctors of the Uzbek prison in which the two applicants were being held.
>
> 10. We do not consider any of these factors to be compelling or to be sufficient, either individually or collectively, to allay the serious concerns about the treatment which was liable to await the applicants on their return. As to the assurances, we find it striking that the only assurance which was received prior to the applicants' surrender (namely, that of 9 March 1999) was not even communicated to the Court until 19 April 1999, well after the application of Rule 39 and after the extradition had been effected in disregard of the Court's interim measures. Moreover, an assurance, even one given in good faith, that an individual will not be subjected to ill-treatment is not of itself a sufficient safeguard where doubts exist as to its effective implementation (see, for example, the Chahal v. the United Kingdom judgment, cited above, § 105). The weight to be attached to assurances emanating from a receiving State must in every case depend on the situation prevailing in that State at the material time. The evidence as to the treatment of political dissidents in Uzbekistan at the time of the applicants' surrender is such, in our view, as to give rise to serious doubts as to the effectiveness of the assurances in providing the applicants with an adequate guarantee of safety.[545]

In the United Kingdom the issue of the quality of assurances also came up in Russia v. Zakaev,[546] where Russia sought the extradition of the former Chechen government official Akhmed Zakaev, who had gone into exile there, for various terrorism-related offenses.[547] Ultimately, the extradition judge refused to grant extradition, noting:

> The Defence case is that if Mr Zakaev is returned he will subject to torture whilst in detention. The Deputy Minister responsible for Russian prisons gave evidence to me about the very considerable improvements that have taken place within Russian prisons in the past few years. They are commendable improvements made in difficult circumstances. He gave me an assurance that Mr Zakaev would come to no harm whilst he was detained in a Russian Ministry of Justice institution. I am sure that he gave that assurance in good faith. I do, however, consider it highly unlikely that the Minister would be able to enforce such an undertaking, given the nature and extent of the Russian prison estate. I consider that such a guarantee would be almost impossible in any country with a significant prison population. I was also concerned as to the type of institution to which the defendant would be sent. Although the Minister indicated that he would be detained in a Ministry of Justice institution, another witness eventually confirmed that the decision could be taken by the Prosecutor who could choose to place Mr Zakaev in an institution run by the FSB.
>
> Against that undertaking, I have to weigh the other evidence I have received and in particular the public statement made by the Council of Europe Anti-Torture Committee which assesses "that there is a continued resort to torture and other forms of ill treatment by members of the Law Enforcement Agencies and Federal forces operating in the Chechen Republic." It is apparent from the United Nations Committee on torture that there is a deep concern over the Russian

545 Id. at ¶¶ 9–10.

546 Russia v. Akhmed Zakaev, [2003] Bow Street Magistrates' Court (unreported decision) (Eng.), available at: http://www.tjetjenien.org/Bowstreetmag.htm.

547 Id.

> treatment of Chechens and they have identified numerous and consistent allegations of widespread torture of detainees.
>
> . . .
>
> When those factors are added together the inevitable conclusion is that it would now be unjust and oppressive to return Mr Zakaev to stand his trial in Russia.
>
> . . .
>
> With some reluctance I have to come to the inevitable conclusion that if the Authorities are prepared to resort to torturing witnesses there is a substantial risk that Mr Zakaev would himself be subject to torture. I am satisfied that such punishment and detention would be by reason of his nationality and political opinions.[548]

With respect to the United States, the problem of assurances concerning treatment or punishment arises in both the contexts of the United States being a requested and requesting state. As a requesting state, the United States will frequently face issues concerning the condition of prisons and the treatment of detainees, particularly those in pretrial detention.[549] These issues arise mostly with respect to prolonged solitary confinement and prison overcrowding, as well as internal prison security. As the requesting state, the United States is reluctant to provide assurances other than in the most general terms. Whenever it does so the diplomatic assurances do not include a commitment from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons if the crime for which the person is sought is a federal one, or from the competent state authority for its prison system. As a result, the diplomatic assurances may not be enforceable in the United States because the Department of State did not secure the commitment of the competent administrative authority under the relevant law. In other words, the U.S. Bureau of Prisons as well as the state penitentiary authorities have the right to exercise their discretion by law, which cannot be overridden by the executive with respect to states. Within the federal structure it means that one federal agency cannot override another. These problems arise when the Department of State does not make these matters clear to its counterpart in the requested state, and problems with enforceability arise once the relator is surrendered to the custody of the United States, whether federal or state.

When the United States is the requested state, similar problems arise when the government seeks to gain assurances from the requesting state, whether about the possibility of torture, the treatment of the detainee, and the rights of the detainee in that foreign prison system, and also with respect to penalties that may be considered "cruel or unusual." The United States, for example, would require assurances from the requesting state that would seek to impose a death penalty by stoning, the imposition of a penalty of amputating a hand for theft, or flogging, as these penalties exist in countries that apply the sharīʿā.[550] In these cases the shoe is on the other foot, as it is the U.S. government that is seeking assurances from a requested state. In the few cases in which such a question as arisen the diplomatic practice of the United States, particularly with regard to U.S. citizens, has been to be very vigilant of the need to protect the human rights of the person sought for surrender. One cannot help but note that the same vigilance is not applied when assurances are sought from the United States, as discussed above.[551]

---

548 Id.

549 See infra sec. 7.

550 See generally M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sharīʿā and Islamic Criminal Law in Time of Peace and War (forthcoming 2013).

551 See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

6.11.3. Conclusion

As described above, the legal, political, and practical issues arising with respect to the death penalty on the one hand, and for torture, cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment on the other, are different, though they share many similarities. This is due to the difference that exists between the death penalty, which is still considered a lawful penal sanction, and torture, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment, which is absolutely prohibited under both the CAT[552] and customary international law. Because of this legal difference, issues arise with respect to enforceability of the principle of specialty and diplomatic assurances because of their informality. Such assurances are not always incorporated in the formal extradition order, and where they are the courts of the requesting state may find such diplomatic assurances to be ambiguous, particularly when the issuing state seeks to use any ambiguity in the assurances as a way of avoiding its enforcement as understood by the requested state. This is why abolitionist states have started to reject the extradition of individuals sought by retentionist states, notwithstanding any assurances that the requesting state may have given, such as in the Venezia case in Italy.[553] As to torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment, it is clear that the ECtHR, for example, is having growing concerns about the enforceability of assurances. But this is more obvious in the bilateral relations between a number of European countries and requesting states who are reputed to engage in torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment than it is at present for death penalty assurances. It may well be the case that the ECtHR will reject all assurances by retentionist states as posing an unreasonable risk to the individual.

7. Diplomatic Assurances

7.1. Introduction: The Meaning of Assurances

The term "assurance" refers to a situation in which a requesting state makes a formal representation to a requested state through a competent state organ with respect to a certain issue that is of concern to the requested state. In other words, the assurance allows the requesting state to assuage a concern of the requested state in connection with the surrender of a person. In this context, the state seeking the assurances must be satisfied that the state organ issuing the assurances is the competent legal/administrative organ in the issuing country, and that the person signing the letter on behalf of that state organ has the proper authority to do so.[554]

These concerns usually implicate substantive or procedural human rights issues in the law or practice of the requesting state. These concerns may stem from the requested state's international legal obligations (arising under conventional or customary international law), its constitution, or its national laws. States resort to assurances in this context because they are the best way to directly address issues that may impede cooperation between the requesting and requested states. Thus, resorting to assurances has become the technique by which states enhance their prospects of cooperation and thereby increase their potential for combating crime and advancing the process of criminal justice. Without assurances, there would be many incidents in which extradition and mutual legal assistance would be denied simply because the concerns of the requested state have not been addressed.

552 CAT, supra note 507.

553 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). See Giulaino Vassali, Pena Di Morte E Richiesta Di Estradizione Quando Il Ministero Scavalca la Consulta (Death Penalty and Extradition Request When the Ministry Tries to Bypass the Constitutional Court), 22 Diritto E Giustizia 76 (June 2006). See also Schabas, Indirect Abolition, supra note 515.

554 For an overview of the use of assurances in the context of state compliance with international obligations where there are concerns regarding torture in the receiving state, see Ashley S. Deeks, Avoiding Transfers to Torture, Council on Foreign Relations Council Special Report No. 35, 4–9 (June 2008).

As assurances are given by government representatives, there may be cases where the government official is under instruction by his/her superiors to make statements that the government does not intend to honor, and sometimes the government official or his/her superior may be acting without sufficient authority from senior decision-makers. The representations they may make to their counterparts therefore raise questions as to the source of the representation in question. This may arise during the granting of extradition by a requested state, but it can also occur in the requesting state during criminal proceedings. In a 2009 case involving Columbia, Valencia-Trujillo was extradited to the United States without an extradition treaty existing between the two countries but on the basis of specific representations made by the U.S. government to the Columbian government.[555] This included a limit on the maximum sentence. Valencia-Trujillo was extradited to the United States, tried, and convicted. At the sentencing hearing, the court asked the Assistant U.S. Attorney about the assurances given by the U.S. government to Columbia concerning the maximum sentence, and whether he was bound by them. The Assistant U.S. Attorney responded in a manner that can only be considered as a bad faith representation to the effect that "you [the judge] are not bound to these assurances, but we are." This is one of the numerous issues arising in connection with assurances that has discredited the U.S. government abroad and rendered its assurances less than trustworthy or reliable.

7.2. Legal Nature and Enforcement of Assurances

Assurances may be offered either sua sponte or at the request of the state seeking the assurance, and both methods are practiced by states. If the requested state offers an assurance as a binding obligation it may be enforced by diplomatic and other legal means, including an action before the International Court of Justice (ICJ) subject to meeting the jurisdictional requirements. In the extradition practice of the United Kingdom,[556] Switzerland,[557] and the United States, concerns raised by the court adjudicating a case in question are conveyed to the Ministry of Justice (or its equivalent) who then either addresses the counterpart in the requesting state, or through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (or its equivalent)—the diplomatic channel. More often than not, the process is carried out through the Ministry of Justice (or its equivalent), but the method ultimately depends on the given state's preference. Upon receipt of the answers to the questions raised or concerns expressed, it is presented by the prosecutor or public legal representative to the court. In reviewing the assurance, the court is in a better position to evaluate to determine whether the concerns raised by the relator are sufficient to bar extradition.

The practice of giving assurances enhances cooperation between states and thereby contributes to achieving the goals of extradition. Examples of assurances sought and obtained by states include the non-applicability of certain penalties deemed cruel, inhuman, or degrading; limits on sentences; guarantees of a fair trial, such as right to counsel; and conditions on 555 United States v. Valencia-Trujillo, 573 F.3d 1171 (11th Cir. 2009).

556 See Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance (2005); Clive Nicholls, Clare Montgomery & Julian Knowles, The Law of Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance (2d ed. 2007). The United Kingdom has upheld the extradition of a British national after receiving assurances from the U.S. Department of Justice that the relator's health condition and United Kingdom recommendations and findings will be considered in any sentencing proceeding. This was necessary to comply with the United Kingdom's obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights. See Bruce Zagaris, English High Court Upholds Hacker's Extradition to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 403–405 (Oct. 2009).

557 See Lionel Frei, Drei Jahre Rechtshilfevertrag Mit Den USA, Scweizerische Zeitschrift für Strafrecht (1981); Robert Zimmerman, La Coopération Judiciaire Internationale en Matière Pénale (3d ed. 2009).

imprisonment and treatment of detainees, including places of detention.[558] An example of an assurance is the one sought by Colombia as a prelude to extraditing paramilitary leaders to the United States on drug charges, in order to ensure the relators are not subject to a life sentence.[559]

It should be noted that there are different executive and/or judicial organs in different countries that are involved in extradition processes. This institutional and bureaucratic diversity creates difficulties with respect to the interpretation and enforcement of assurances. However, there are different executive and judicial organs that carry out the aforementioned extradition processes between states, and this institutional and bureaucratic diversity poses certain obstacles to the application of assurances in a given extradition matter. The difference in practices among states may result in a hindrance of communication due to the rigidity of institutional functions and internal bureaucracy. For example, if the state giving assurances applies a high level of positivistic formalism to the interpretation, the problem-solving function of assurances may be subordinated to the state's formalism.

The United States has adopted a case-by-case approach regarding extradition requests from China, with whom there is no bilateral extradition treaty, wherein it has relied, in part, on diplomatic assurances from China regarding the treatment of individuals sought by the Chinese government for criminal activity affecting China.[560] In the case of China, although its record of reliability of diplomatic assurances is poor, the U.S. policy of negotiating with China on a case-by-case basis has the advantage of providing the United States with flexibility to refuse extradition based on current human rights conditions in China at the time of the request or on the content of Chinese diplomatic assurances.[561] This flexibility is markedly and purposefully absent in the context of extradition pursuant to bilateral treaties, whose nature is to provide a uniformly applicable structure to extradition requests between contracting states. Furthermore, through such negotiation, Western states may be able to drive the Chinese to reform certain objectionable practices in order to enter into extradition treaties, which would facilitate and expedite the return of Chinese nationals abroad as compared to the time-consuming process of individualized diplomatic negotiations.[562]

Two questions that arise regarding enforceability of the assurance are: first, whether the assurance was given by a competent state organ through an individual with appropriate authority

---

558 See also Deeks, supra note 554. The use of assurances also serve as a means of comporting with the recent concern over victims' rights, reflected in national and some international rights such as the concept of partie civile in the French system, parte civile in the Italian system, and the 2006 U.N. General Assembly's Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, G.A. Res. 147 U.N. Doc. A/RES/60/147 (Mar. 21, 2006). For a state to assume prosecution is obviously more onerous than to obtain assurances that would make extradition possible. Thus, the practice of assurances is a way of achieving the goals of victims' rights to the accountability of perpetrators. In addition, the use of assurances also aids in fulfillment of a state's obligations under the principle of aut dedere aut judicare.

559 See Bruce Zagaris, Colombia Extradites Paramilitary Leader to the U.S. on Drug Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 267–269 (July 2008).

560 The Chinese government has pursued a rigorous policy of prosecuting Chinese nationals accused of corruption, particularly with regard to financial crimes. Although different states have taken different approaches to Chinese requests for the return of these individuals, due in large part to the poor record of Chinese compliance with human rights principles, the United States has used a case-by-case approach under which it has either extradited or deported the requested individuals. See Matthew Bloom, Note: A Comparative Analysis of the United States's Response to Extradition Requests from China, 33 Yale J. Int'l L. 177, 199–202, 205–207.

561 Id. at 206–207.

562 Id. at 207–208.

to issue assurances; and second, whether those assurances are sufficiently clear, unambiguous, and specific to give rise to claims by the requesting state in case it believes the requested state breached its assurances. Examples of this second issue will be discussed below. In addition to formal legal enforcement, a state that breaches its assurances risks strained diplomatic relations and a blow to the state's international credibility in negotiations.

In one UK decision regarding the sufficiency of assurances provided by the United States in connection with a request for the extradition of alleged "terrorists," the court expressed the following understanding of the nature and enforceability of "assurances" from the United States:

> . . . as I understand it there is no issue of domestic American law. The United States government does not rely on any rule of domestic law giving binding or enforceable effect to the assurances set out in the Notes. The real question is whether in all the circumstances, against the background of relevant international law and practice, this court should accept the Notes as being in fact effective to refute, for the purposes of the 2003 Act, the claims of potential violation of Convention rights and associated bars to extradition.[563]

7.3. Assurances Distinguished from the Principle of Specialty and U.S. Practice

There is a distinction in the jurisprudence of the U.S. federal courts concerning the principle of specialty, and the practice of the executive branch with respect to diplomatic assurances. The former are enforceable in U.S. federal courts, but subject to conditions of standing that differ among the several federal circuit courts of appeals, and the latter, which are offered to foreign governments in connection with extradition, are not enforceable in U.S. federal courts.

The jurisprudence of U.S. federal courts have acknowledges the applicability of the principle of specialty since 1886, as expressed in United States v. Rauscher, wherein Chief Justice Miller posited the principle as follows: the extradited relator "shall be tried only for the offence with which he is charged in the extradition proceedings and for which he was delivered up, and that if not tried for that, or after trial and acquittal, he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country."[564] Since then, U.S. federal courts have enforced the principle of specialty, but differently.

There has never been a question in any of the federal circuit courts of appeals as to the applicability of the principle. However, the circuits have differed with respect to the right of an extradited person to raise the question of violation of the principle of specialty.[565] In those federal

563 Ahmad & Aswat v. United States, [2006] EWHC 2927 (admin).

564 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 424 (1886).

565 One reason for the difference of opinion is that the intended beneficiary of the "Principle of Specialty" is the requested state. Although the individual relator could be considered a third party beneficiary under an extradition treaty, whether a U.S. court adopts this perspective depends on the U.S. court's method of interpreting the underlying bilateral extradition treaty, if such a treaty is in effect between the receiving and surrendering states. Thus, how a federal circuit court of appeal resolves the question regarding an individual relator's standing to raise the "principle of specialty" depends on whether the particular court views the right as belonging solely to the surrendering state or also to the individual relator. The Second, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Circuit Courts of Appeal require a protest or some other form of objection by the surrendering state before the individual can raise the issue. The Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, and Third (albeit with some ambiguity) Circuit Courts of Appeal allow the individual relator to raise the "principle of specialty" on his or her own without the need for any protest by the surrendering state. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (5th ed., 2007), at 581–585, 595–600. Recently the Ninth Circuit in Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2006) declared that it could only enforce limitations on penalties if the states had agreed to it by treaty or by a written "assurance." Id. at 975–976 (stating "We hold that we can enforce limitations on punishments following the extradition of a defendant, but we may do so only if the contracting treaty nations agreed to such a limitation in the particular case. . . . We must therefore examine the extradition circuit courts of appeal where a relator does not have the right to raise a violation of specialty before the district court without a protest by the surrendering state, the relator similarly does not have the right to raise violations of conditions of the extradition order or any assurances given. Should there be such a violation the government of the surrendering state would have to formally file a protest over the failure to implement or execute any of the conditions contained in the extradition order issued by the judicial authority in the surrendering state. This means that the rights of the relator to uphold the principle of specialty in U.S. courts would be entirely dependent on the political will of the executive branch of the surrendering government. Absent a formal protest by the surrendering government in the event the U.S. Attorney, the U.S. government, or U.S. court fails to implement or execute any condition included in the extradition decree or order from the surrendering government's court, the relator may have no recourse in U.S. courts.

Conditions contained in an extradition order issued by the competent judicial authority of the surrendering state and that fall within the meaning of the principle of specialty are distinguishable from assurances given by a representative of the U.S. government to any authority in the surrendering state. In other words, the relator cannot enforce the contents of any assurances given by the U.S. government in certain federal circuit courts of appeals, whether they relate to the return of the surrendered person to the surrendering country for purposes of execution of the sentence, the imposition of a limitation on the maximum penalty, the guarantee of certain conditions of incarceration, or the application of substantive and procedural guarantees contained in various human rights conventions. Thus if the executive branch of the surrendering state does not wish to protest the violation of an assurance given by the U.S. government in connection with the extradition, the relator could not invoke the assurance, nor could he/she have it enforced by U.S. courts. The reason for this practice is the constitutional separation of powers,[566] which distinguishes between the powers of the executive branch in dealing with foreign affairs, and the limited role of the federal judiciary in dealing with cases and controversies arising out of justiciable issues.

Assurances given by the U.S. government are usually interpreted in a limited and restrictive manner. This is probably closer in approach to a strict interpretation of contractual language in a contract as understood in the U.S. legal system.[567] If the language embodied in an assurance agreement in this case, and ask the question: Did the treaty and extradition activities of the parties in this case provide for a clear limitation on the punishment Benitez could face? If the answer is yes, we must enforce whatever punishment limitation we find." [citations omitted]). The court in this case focused on the treaty and assurances, thus raising the implication that it is not relying on customary international law. Whether the court intended to signal that in the future it would only consider specialty when it arises out of a treaty or a specific assurance offered by the U.S. government and ignore customary international law is yet to be determined.

---

566 U.S. Const. Art. I, II, III; The U.S. Supreme Court has described the separation-of-powers principle as follows: "The Constitution enumerates and separates the powers of the three branches of Government in Articles I, II, and III, and it is this 'very structure' of the Constitution that exemplifies the concept of separation of powers. INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 946, 77 L. Ed. 2d 317, 103 S. Ct. 2764 (1983). While the boundaries between the three branches are not "hermetically" sealed,' see id. at 951, the Constitution prohibits one branch from encroaching on the central prerogatives of another." Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 341 (2000), accord. Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 130 S. Ct. 3138, 3165 (2010). See Lo Duca v. United States, 1996 U.S. App. Lexis 28746, at *22–*30 (2d Cir. 1996) (discussing the constitutional separation of powers in the context of a relator's challenge to extradition proceedings held pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §3184), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1007 (1996). See Bassiouni, supra note 565, at 152–153.

567 See Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Certainty §33 (1981) ("(1) Even though a manifestation of intention is intended to be understood as an offer, it cannot be accepted so as to form a contract unless the terms of the contract are reasonably certain. (2) The terms of a contract are reasonably certain if they provide a basis for determining the existence of a breach and for giving an appropriate remedy.

is not specific, or does not specifically address a given condition in the surrendering state's extradition order, it will not be deemed binding by the U.S. government.[568] Moreover, the U.S. government does not consider such "assurances" as a bilateral treaty obligation. Instead, it considers "assurances" as a diplomatic understanding.[569] Although this may seem strange to those unfamiliar with the practices of the U.S. government, it is not uncommon for qualified

---

(3) The fact that one or more terms of a proposed bargain are left open or uncertain may show that a manifestation of intention is not intended to be understood as an offer or as an acceptance").

568 Where the United States represented to Austria that Count 93 against the relator would not be enforced but be vacated, the Eleventh Circuit rejected the relator's argument that this statement misled Austria to believe that the relator would additionally be re-sentenced and permitted a full appeal. Rather, all that was required was that Count 93 be vacated, the sentence be recalculated without that count, and the relator be given an opportunity for a full appeal of the conviction and sentence. Weiss v. Yates, 375 Fed. Appx. 915, 916–917 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion), cert. denied 2011 U.S. LEXIS 3062 (U.S. 2011). In a different context, namely the use of "assurances" obtained by the United States in connection with "extraordinary rendition" to certain foreign governments known to engage in torture, this is indicative of how reliable and credible the United States views such "assurances." See Jillian Button, Spirited Away (Into a Legal Black Hole?): The Challenge of Invoking State Responsibility for Extraordinary Rendition, 19 Fla. J. Int'l L. 531, 549 (2007). Button states:

> The United States is not alone in claiming that obtaining a diplomatic assurance from the country of return that the transferee will not be harmed prevents a rendition or extradition from breaching international law. In a string of cases discussed in Human Rights Watch briefs "Empty Promises:" Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard Against Torture and Still at Risk: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard Against Torture, Canada, Germany, Austria, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and others attempt to defend transfers on the basis of diplomatic assurances.
>
> The Human Rights Watch reports argue emphatically that because of the clandestine nature of torture, and because neither the sending nor receiving governments have an interest in exposing a human rights abuse arising from a rendition, diplomatic assurances cannot be relied on to prevent torture. By its very nature, a diplomatic assurance is not a legal safeguard: it is an unreliable, unaccountable, unenforceable diplomatic measure. But from a state responsibility perspective, can a diplomatic assurance have legal effect by vitiating the transferor's actual knowledge of the risks of torture? (emphasis added)

See also Human Rights Watch, Empty Promises: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture, 16 Hum. Rts. Watch (Apr. 2004), available at www.hrw.org/reports/2004/un0404/diplomatic0404.pdf; Human Rights Watch, Still at Risk: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture, 17 Hum. Rts. Watch (Apr. 2005), available at http://www.hrw.org/reports/2005/04/14/still-risk.

The United States has never protested to these governments the fact that they gave "assurances" not to torture probably because it knew that to be the case. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010) at 141–182 (discussing "extraordinary rendition" and CIA "Black Sites").

569 Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States, Extradition between States: The Basic Rule § 475 (1987) ("A state party to an extradition treaty is obligated to comply with the request of another state party to that treaty to arrest and deliver a person duly shown to be sought by that state (a) for trial on a charge of having committed a crime covered by the treaty within the jurisdiction of the requesting state, or (b) for punishment after conviction of such a crime and flight from that state, provided that none of the grounds for refusal to extradite set forth in § 476 is applicable"); Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States, Doctrine of Specialty §477 (1987) ("Under most international agreements, state laws, and state practice: (1) A person who has been extradited to another state will not, unless the requested state consents, (a) be tried by the requesting state for an offense other than one for which he was extradited; or (b) be given punishment more severe than was provided by the applicable law of the requesting state at the time of the request for extradition. (2) A person who has been extradited to another state for trial and has been acquitted of the charges for which he was extradited must be given a reasonable opportunity to depart from that state").

representations to be made to different governments in connection with extradition matters, which are ultimately not carried out.

The different treatment of the principle of specialty and assurances is illustrated in Romero v. Ryan.[570] In that case the government of Mexico agreed to extradite the relator to the United States pursuant to a formal U.S. extradition request, after receiving assurances that the relator would not be subject to life imprisonment, and if convicted, that Arizona would not "seek or recommend a penalty of 25 years to life imprisonment at the sentencing phase," but rather that it "would recommend imposition of a sentence of 50 to 60 years' imprisonment."[571] Accordingly, Mexico agreed to the relator's extradition on first-degree murder charges, which were later reduced to second-degree murder on the state's post-trial motion without objection by the defense.[572] The relator argued that the reduction in charge violated the "doctrine of specialty" as the extradition agreement did not allow for extradition on second-degree murder charges. He also argued that the first-degree murder charge would violate the United States–Mexico extradition treaty as it could result in life imprisonment.[573] In rendering a decision on the interconnection of the relator's specialty claim and assurances claim, the court did not distinguish the two. The court analyzed the issue as follows:

> Petitioner contends that the trial court violated the extradition treaty between the United States of America and Mexico by convicting him of first degree murder because, Petitioner argues, the governing treaty did not allow for a Mexican national's extradition for prosecution on an offense which could result in life imprisonment. Petitioner also contends that reducing the conviction from first-degree murder to second-degree murder violates the specialty doctrine, i.e., the doctrine that one can only be tried for the offense specified in the extradition agreement.
>
> Petitioner raised these issues in a pre-trial motion. The motion was denied by the state trial judge after briefing and oral argument regarding the diplomatic note, the relevant treaty, the current status of the interpretation and extension of the treaty, the circumstance of Petitioner's case, including the exchange of notes between Mexican and United States officials regarding Petitioner's extradition agreement, and Arizona law.
>
> The Arizona Court of Appeals denied the extradition-based claims on the merits when presented in petitioner's direct appeal. The Court of Appeals determined:
>
> > The doctrine of specialty provides that a state that has obtained extradition of a person is prohibited from prosecuting that person "for any offense other than that for which the surrendering state agreed to extradite." United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1434–35 (9th Cir. 1994) (internal citations omitted).
> >
> > An extradited person may be tried for offenses other than those for which the person was surrendered if the extraditing country consents. The proceedings did not violate the doctrine of specialty. Romero was extradited for first-degree murder, all in compliance with the extradition agreement and the doctrine of specialty. The subsequent reduction to the lesser-included offense of second-degree murder in order to comply with the sentencing provisions of the agreement does not mandate reversal of Romero's conviction.
> >
> > ***
> >
> > Extradition treaties are construed liberally to effect their purpose of surrendering fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses. United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549, 554 (8th Cir. 1984). Under these circumstances, the reduction of Romero's conviction to a lesser-included offense constituted a reclassification contemplated by the treaty. Romero does not contest 570 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 87444 (D. Ariz. 2009).

571 Id. at *4–*5.

572 Id. at *5–*9.

573 Id. at *13–*14, *21.

> that the charge of second-degree murder, as a lesser included offense of first-degree murder, was based on the same factual allegations as those established in the request for extradition based on first-degree murder, or that the punishment for second degree murder provided for a sentence of less than life imprisonment. Therefore, the treaty itself permitted a conviction for second-degree murder.
>
> In "United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S. Ct. 234, 30 L. Ed. 425 (1886), and Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 309, 27 S. Ct. 539, 51 L. Ed. 816 (1907), the Supreme Court set forth principles for interpreting extradition treaties and analyzed the effect of limitations on what offenses may be punished by the extraditing country." Rodriguez Benitez v. Garcia, 495 F.3d 640, 643 (9th Cir. 2007). The Arizona Court of Appeals' decision denying Petitioner's claim was not an objectively unreasonable application of the holdings in these cases.
>
> Rauscher established the doctrine of specialty, which provides that an extradited defendant may not be prosecuted for any offense other than that for which the surrendering country agreed to extradite.[].
>
> . . .
>
> In Browne, a defendant who was convicted in the United States of conspiracy to defraud the government fled the country and was extradited from Canada under a treaty which did not cover conspiracy. [] Because of the treaty's limitations, Canadian authorities surrendered the defendant for another offense but not for the conspiracy charge. [] The Supreme Court, looking to the agreed-upon terms of extradition and to the relevant treaty language, refused to uphold a reinstated conviction on the conspiracy charge.
>
> Rodriguez Benitez, 495 F.3d at 643–44 (internal citations and quotations omitted).
>
> Similar to the circumstance of the petitioner in Rodriguez Benitez, the terms of the agreement regarding the Petitioner's extradition indicated Mexico's concern about the sentence which could be imposed on Petitioner and not the degree of murder on which Petitioner could be tried. The Arizona trial court's reduction of the crime of conviction, which was supported by the evidence adduced at trial and which reduction was not contemporaneously opposed by Petitioner, did not deprive Petitioner of a substantive constitutional right. Cf. United States v. Campbell, 300 F.3d 202, 211 (2d Cir. 2002) (recognizing a difference between extradition terms limiting what sentence could be entered by the receiving state's courts and what sentence the receiving state could force the prisoner to serve).
>
> The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded in Rodriguez Benitez that, because Supreme Court precedent, i.e., Rauscher and Browne, addressed limitations on charged offenses and the case before them involved limitations on the petitioner's sentence, it could not be said that the state court's opinion was contrary to clearly established federal law because to decide otherwise would have required an extension of the specialty doctrine. See 495 F.3d at 644. "Only if the refusal to extend Rauscher's and Browne's holdings was objectively unreasonable must Benitez be granted a writ." Id. "Refusing to extend Supreme Court holdings governing limitations on charged offenses to unilaterally imposed sentencing conditions was not objectively unreasonable, and therefore AEDPA requires us to leave the decision of the California court undisturbed." Id. Similarly, the Arizona court's decision regarding Petitioner's claims based on the specialty doctrine and the reduction of Petitioner's conviction was not objectively unreasonable and Petitioner is not entitled to habeas relief on this claim.[574]

A British court has discussed the relationship between assurances and the principle of specialty in U.S. extradition practice as follows:

> . . . the United States is also a State with which the United Kingdom has entered into five substantial treaties on extradition over a period of more than 150 years. Over this continued and uninterrupted history of extradition relations there is no instance of any assurance given by the United States, as the requesting State in an extradition case, having been dishonoured. In Bermingham & ors [2006] EWHC 200, [2006] 3 AER.239 and Welsh and Thrasher [2006] EWHC 156, [2006] 3 AER.204, decided in this court, Ouseley J and I were much concerned with a similar issue—or perhaps a particular application of the same issue—being called on in effect to decide whether the United States authorities could be relied on to abide by the specialty rule in relation to the prospective extradition of the appellants in those cases. Undertakings had been given on the point. In Thrasher Ouseley J said (paragraph 35):

574 Id. at *21–*26.

> "First, if there had been a routine disregard of the specialty rule, I would have expected that over the decades of extradition to the US from the UK, and in particular from those countries with which the US enjoys a land frontier, the UK Courts and the Courts of other sending states would have refused extradition in decisions which would be available to us. The 1972 and 2003 Treaties would not have been agreed in the terms on which they were agreed."

In Bermingham I said (paragraph 142):

> "In the present case I consider that the undertaking confirms the position which the United States courts would anyway adopt. They will be satisfied, not least by the terms of this court's judgment, that the defendants' extradition is ordered on the precise basis that the accusation they will face at trial will be limited to, and travel no wider than, the case which is essentially formulated in paragraphs 10 and 23 of the Texas indictment and reflected in the charge drafted for the proceedings at Bow Street. And the American courts will be loyal to this expectation: not merely because in general they respect the specialty rule, but because by their own express jurisprudence . . . it is "essential to determine . . . whether the surrendering state would regard the prosecution as a breach" . . . This test is meticulously applied. It means, in short, that the American courts will give effect to the views of the Secretary of State and of this court (as to which there will be no room for doubt) of the requirements of s.95 of the 2003 Act."

I see no reason to doubt that the American authorities would likewise give effect to the views of this court as to the critical importance of the integrity of the Diplomatic Notes. Indeed the case may perhaps be said to be a fortiori: the Notes have the special status of having been issued out of the Embassy. The American authorities will appreciate, not least from the terms of the judgments in this case, that their request for the appellants' extradition to the United States has been acceded to expressly on the faith of the Notes, read and interpreted as this court reads and interprets them. Acts of the US executive such as have attracted the kind of criticisms described and levelled by Mr Stafford Smith and Mr Loflin, being, however, acts touching only the internal affairs of the United States, cannot in my judgment begin to constitute a premise from which this court should conclude that the Diplomatic Notes will not be fully honoured.

. . .

Before leaving this part of the case I should specifically address the contention that the appellants, if returned, might face the death penalty. None of the charges levelled against either appellant is punishable by the death penalty. As I have said the Diplomatic Note in Mr Ahmad's case contains a specific assurance that the death penalty will not be imposed and such an assurance is expressly contemplated as part of the mechanics of extradition arrangements between the United States and the United Kingdom: see Article IV of the 1972 Treaty. Accordingly, were the United States authorities to bring about a state of affairs (whether by way of a superseding indictment—as Mr Aswat contended—or trial by military commission, or by "extraordinary rendition" with which I will deal separately) in which either appellant was sentenced to death, that would violate the specialty rule or the assurances or both. The United States' adherence to the specialty rule has been firmly vouchsafed by decisions of the Supreme Court beginning with United States v Rauscher 119 US 407 decided in 1886. The general position is discussed in detail in Ouseley J's judgment in Welsh and Thrasher to which I have already referred. I will just cite this extract:

> "84. The US Courts do not infer consent merely because there is silence. They do not turn a blind eye to what are obvious problems in the sending state's known attitude, whether from past extradition requests or from the particular case or Treaty involved. Rather . . . they adopt a realistic assessment of the sending state's attitude, in recognition of the specialty doctrine as a principle of international comity and out of respect for a foreign state's sovereignty. But the Courts do not treat it as a technical hurdle devised for the benefit of properly convicted criminals, enabling them to take points which truly belong to the sending state and which the Courts properly infer that the sending state does not take.
>
> 85. There is nothing in the cases which would justify the conclusion that the US Government or Courts would not respect the express limits in the UK–US Treaty or in the 2003 Act or in any judgment of this Court . . . "
>
> Adherence to the specialty rule is required by the domestic law of the United States, which incorporates, as I have said, Article XII of the 1972 Treaty. In this jurisdiction it is right, of course, that it is the Secretary of State's duty under s.95 of the 2003 Act to safeguard the specialty rule, rather than that of the court. I have not set out s.95 given that the appeals against the Secretary of State's decisions have been withdrawn, as I have explained. But the fact that we may, for reasons given in Welsh and Thrasher and in Bermingham, be confident of the United States' general loyalty to the specialty rule tends to contradict Mr Fitzgerald's argument that the district judge should have found bars to extradition (such as potential exposure to the death penalty) where the claimed bar involves an assumption that the specialty rule will be violated.
>
> On this part of the case I conclude for all the reasons I have given that the district judge was right to place confidence in the Diplomatic Notes.[575]

Following are a number of cases that exemplify how the United States deals with assurances.[576]

In People v. Kirkwood the U.S. government gave the United Kingdom an assurance that it would recommend that Ernest Major Kirkwood would not be tried in California in accordance with a procedure that could lead to the imposition of a death sentence. The United Kingdom had abolished the death penalty and could not extradite a person to a country where the death penalty was still in force. In that case the U.S. government did not specifically represent that the federal government does not have the power to dictate to a state government, namely California, the procedures and penalties that can be imposed on a given prosecutor. The U.S. government took the position that it was incumbent on the UK government to know that the U.S. federal government could not make any binding representations with respect to matters that are within the jurisdiction of the different states. The United Kingdom, however, considered the U.S. government's positoon to be a breach of good faith, and opposed the death penalty proceedings in the California.[577] Upon Kirkwood's surrender, the California district attorney proceeded in accordance with California procedural law to channel the prosecution as if the death penalty was going to be requested at the end of the case. Kirkwood, who was represented by the San Francisco Public Defender's Office, called Sir Ian Sinclair, the Legal Advisor to the United Kingdom Foreign Office, and on this writer, to testify in court on the binding nature of the assurances made by the U.S. Department of Justice. The U.S. Department of Justice argued that its assurances were in the nature of good faith efforts, as it could not lawfully force the state of California to do anything given the nature of the U.S. federal system. This was not conveyed to the United Kingdom at the time and the United Kingdom took 575 Ahmad & Aswat v. United States, [2006] EWHC 2927 (admin).

---

576 For a discussion of judicial review of diplomatic "assurances" against torture in the context of removal proceedings, see Aaron S.J. Zelinsky, Comment: Khouzam v. Chertoff: Torture, Removal, and the Rule of Non-inquiry, 28 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 233, 239–243 (2009). The Third Circuit has held that judicial review of diplomatic assurances regarding torture is not barred by the political question docrine. Khouam v. Chertoff, 549 F.3d 245, 249–253 (3d Cir. 2008).

577 See People v. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court No. 115353 (1987) (unpublished).

these "assurances" as a firm commitment.[578] The matter was resolved pragmatically between the presiding judge, the district attorney, and the public defender. The death penalty was not sought, and the case proceeded.[579]

In another case, Curtis v. United States, the U.S. government gave Spain assurances over Curtis's potential sentencing.[580] In this case, Spain agreed to extradite the relator "if the U.S. Government agreed to the terms of a Diplomatic Note specifying that Curtis would not be sentenced to an indeterminate sentence of life without the possibility of parole."[581] Curtis was eventually tried in two separate cases and received consecutive life sentences in one of the cases.[582] The relator appealed against the sentences and the Eleventh Circuit upheld his right to challenge his sentence as a third-party beneficiary of a diplomatic note between Spain and the United 578 For an unambiguous "assurance" on the non-applicability of the death penalty but an ambiguous "assurance" as to the non-applicability of life imprisonment in an extradition case between the United States and Venezuela, see Benitez v. Garcia, 449 F.3d 971, 977–978 (9th Cir. 2006), opinion withdrawn by Benitez v. Garcia, 2007 U.S. App. Lexis 1340 (9th Cir. 2007). The following is taken from the 2006 Benitez opinion at pages 977–978:

---

> The Venezuelan Ministry of Foreign Affairs wrote to the Embassy of the United States to explain the extradition decree, stating that "[s]aid extradition is conditioned to the understanding that the aforementioned citizen will not be sentenced to death or life in prison or incarceration for more than thirty (30) years." (emphasis added). Because we must examine and defer to the surrendering country's wishes, particularly as they are expressed in its extradition decree, these statements are telling.
>
> If this particularly probative evidence of Venezuela's pre-extradition behavior were not sufficient to prove that Venezuela understood this extradition to encompass a limitation on the punishment Benitez could face, the sequence of events following Benitez's extradition confirm Venezuela's understanding of the punishments Benitez would not face. See Zicherman v. Korean Air Lines Co., 516 U.S. 217, 226, 116 S. Ct. 629, 133 L. Ed. 2d 596 (1996) ("[Courts] traditionally consider[] as aids to . . . interpretation . . . the postratification understanding of the contracting parties."). After Benitez was extradited but before his trial, the Venezuelan Embassy sent the Department of State a diplomatic note indicating that it was "concerned that [life imprisonment] may violate the provisions of the Extradition Treaty . . . as well as the conditions established in the sentence of the Supreme Court of Venezuela which approved the extradition request."
>
> It is also settled that "[r]espect is ordinarily due the reasonable views of the Executive Branch concerning the meaning of an international treaty." El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155, 168, 119 S. Ct. 662, 142 L. Ed. 2d 576 (1999) (citing Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184-85, 102 S. Ct. 2374, 72 L. Ed. 2d 765 (1982)). Rather than disagreeing with Venezuela, the United States Department of State faxed a letter to the District Attorney that "it would be in the best interests of our extradition relationship for Mr. Rodriguez Benitez not to serve a life sentence." While this letter also indicated the request was not legally binding, it does cast doubt on the notion that there is a clear executive position in favor of permitting life imprisonment to which we must defer in deciding this case.

See also Barbara Merry Boudreaux, Benitez v. Garcia: An Extradition Arrangement Lost in Translation, 15 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 661 (2007).

579 For a commentary on this case, see Shea, supra note 518. The case of Kirkwood had already been the subject of a petition by him against the United Kingdom before the European Commission of Human Rights; see Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984), App. No. 10479/83. Perhaps as a result of this case and that of Soering, which also involved the United Kingdom and the United States, the United Kingdom is presently more cautious in seeking "assurances" from the United States.

Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 Ect. H.R. Ser. A, Vol. 16 (July 7, 1989). See also Stephan Breitenmoser & Gunter E. Wilms, Human Rights v. Extradition, The Soering Case, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (1990); Soering Commission Report, 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) 1, 67–68 (1989).

580 Curtis v. United States, 376 Fed. Appx. 902 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion).

581 Id. at 903.

582 Id.

States. On appeal Curtis made a contract-based argument regarding his status as a third-party beneficiary and claims of fraudulent inducement by the United States to Spain to secure extradition where the United States never intended to limit the sentences imposed.[583] Although the Eleventh Circuit did not rule on the merits, it held that dismissal was premature and remanded to the district court for further proceedings.[584]

Procedurally, the language of an assurance will be strictly interpreted and must be unambiguous to create a binding obligation on the United States.[585] In United States v. Salinas Doria,[586] a Diplomatic Note was given by the United States to Mexico, in which the U.S. government affirmed that:

> The maximum penalty for each of the crimes for which extradition is sought is not more than 40 years incarceration. Therefore, I would like to convey to Your Excellency that the United States Government assures the Government of Mexico that, if the fugitive is extradited to . . . the United States of America, neither a sentence of death nor life imprisonment will be sought or imposed in this case.[587]

The relator argued that the language in the diplomatic note constituted an assurance that he would not be subject to more than forty years' imprisonment.[588] The court concluded that the "extradition documents at issue cannot be construed as an assurance to Mexico that Salinas's sentence would be limited to 40 years."[589] The court emphasized the rule requiring substantive assurances must be unambiguous to create a binding obligation by stating that "a foreign sovereign's 'unilateral belief' regarding the applicable maximum sentence 'is insufficient to bind the United States,' " and that in the case before it,

> If Mexico required such an assurance it could have sought clarification of the ambiguity in [a subsequent diplomatic note], particularly in light of the unambiguous statement in Note No. 501 that [the subsequent diplomatic note] expressly purported to paraphrase. But there is no reason to believe that the precise length of the maximum term of years faced by Salinas was important to Mexico, or that Mexico ever sought any assurance from the United States on that subject.[590]

The court concluded that the language of the diplomatic note only "guaranteed" that the United States would not sentence the relator to the death penalty or life imprisonment.[591]

In another case, a relator challenged the sentence imposed by the court on the grounds that it was the result, in part, of a misrepresentation of the diplomatic assurances given by the United States to the requested state. In United States v. Pileggi,[592] Costa Rican authorities agreed to extradite the relator to the United States after the exchange of diplomatic notes regarding limitations on punishment.[593] The diplomatic note provided that:

---

583 Id.

584 Id. at 905.

585 See also Benitez v. Garcia, 476 F.3d 676, 682 (9th Cir. 2007) (withdrawn by the court) ("We are wary, however, of enforcing extradition conditions that are neither expressly agreed to by both countries nor contemplated by the relevant extradition treaty").

586 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86170 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

587 Id. at *2–*3.

588 Id. at *28.

589 Id. at *29.

590 Id. at *31–*32.

591 Id. at *33–*34.

592 361 Fed. Appx. 475 (4th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion).

593 Id. at 476.

> "Costa Rica requested assurances that, upon extradition to the United States . . . Giuseppe Pileggi . . . will not be subjected to the death penalty or life imprisonment." (J.A. 16.) In response, the United States assured "the Government of Costa Rica that if extradited . . . Giuseppe Pileggi . . . will not receive a penalty of death or one that requires that [he] spend the rest of [his] natural [life] in prison." (J.A. 17.)[594]

The government, when asked by the court prior to sentencing if the assurance was binding on the court or executive branch, stated "I think technically what it says is that the United States, the executive branch will not seek a sentence in excess of fifty years."[595] The court found that it was bound to sentence the relator to a term of months, and sentenced the relator, who was fifty years' old at the time, to fifty years in prison followed by three years of supervised release.[596] The relator challenged his sentence, in part, based on the district court's reliance on the government's misrepresentation concerning diplomatic assurances.[597] The court, although noting that the misstatement was inadvertent, reasoned that the misstatement put false information before the district court and was left uncorrected.[598] As the only mention of a fifty- year sentence came from the government's misrepresentation, the court reasoned that the district court relied on the government's erroneous representation to sentence the relator.[599] The court held that this sentencing constituted plain error, vacated the relator's sentence, and remanded for resentencing, stating:[600]

> Given the Government's misrepresentation, we have zero confidence that had the district court known the true content of the assurances provided to Costa Rica, it would have sentenced Pileggi to 600 months in prison. The only reference during sentencing to the assurances provided to Costa Rica was erroneous, and the sentence arrived at by the court mirrored the Government's misstatement. In addition, no information independent from the misstatement was before the court that suggested a sentence of fifty years in prison.[601]

Not every conversation between a foreign official and a U.S. prosecutor constitutes an enforceable assurance. In Simpson v. Caruso,[602] the relator challenged the duration of his sentence and sought money damages based on alleged assurances given to British officials during a telephone conversation.[603] The relator claimed that the following telephone conversation occurred between a Michigan prosecuting attorney and a British consular official regarding the duration of a sentence if extradited:

> [British Consulate]: What happens in practice in Michigan in cases where a prisoner is convicted of first degree murder, does he stay inside for life or does he have license or release or parole ever take place?
>
> [Michigan Prosecuting Attorney]: No. There is no parole or release. The only way that he can be released from confinement is by commutation of sentence by the elected governor of the State of Michigan.

---

594 Id.

595 Id.

596 Id. at 477.

597 Id. at 477–478.

598 Id. at 478.

599 Id.

600 Id. at 478–479.

601 Id. at 478.

602 355 Fed. Appx. 927 (6th Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion).

603 Id. at 929.

> [British Consulate]: If release is possible, could any indication be given as to how long Simpson might be expected to serve?
>
> [Michigan Prosecuting Attorney]: I find this somewhat difficult to answer. I do know that there are many commutation[s] of sentences. I did confer with Mr. Brown at the Department of Corrections and he advised me that the average term in confinement of first degree murder prisoners is 23 years.[604]

The relator argued that this conversation meant that, if extradited, he would serve only twenty-three years if convicted for first-degree murder.[605] However, the court rejected this argument, stating:

> Simpson misconstrues this conversation as an assurance to British authorities that his life sentence would be limited to twenty-three years. In fact, Delhey specifically states that only the governor of Michigan may reduce Simpson's sentence. Therefore, accepting all facts in the complaint as true, Simpson can prove no set of facts in support of this claim which would entitle him to relief. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's dismissal of Simpson's second claim on other grounds supported by the record.[606]

In a case before the Court of Appeals of Scotland the specificity of the assurances given by the U.S. Department of Justice in connection with the place of detention of the person whose extradition was granted but not surrendered, pending receipt of these assurances, was at issue. In that case the specific request of Scotland was that Brian Howes would not be confined to Maricopa County prison in Arizona, as the conditions there amount to a violation of Article 3 of the ECHR.[607] The U.S. Department of Justice, however, avoided making a specific assurance. After several qualified offers of assurances presented by the U.S. Department of Justice, the Court of Appeals of Scotland refused to accept them as they were so qualified as to indicate a high possibility that the assurances would not be observed and could not be enforced.

In United States of America v. Mendoza, the issue arose over U.S. government assurances given to the government of Spain that Mendoza would be transferred back to Spain if he were found guilty of the charges for which he was extradited. The Note Verbal provided by the United States stated that it would "not object" to Mendoza's transfer to Spain for the execution of his sentence, should he be found guilty. The government of Spain considered the Note Verbal to be an assurance that corresponded to the judicial order issued for the surrender of Mendoza to U.S. authorities. On that basis, the government of Spain surrendered Mendoza to the United

---

604 Id. at 928.

605 Id. at 931.

606 Id.

607 Council of Europe, European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, E.T.S. 5, available at http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/3ae6b3b04.html (last visited Sept. 5, 2011). Three recent cases decided by the European Court of Human Rights are relevant. They are: Case of Kabulov v. Ukraine (Application no. 41015/04), Judgment entered Nov. 19, 2009; Case of Soldatenko v. Ukraine (Application no. 244/07), Judgment October 23, 2008; and Case of Bayasakov and Others v. Ukraine (Application no. 54131/08), Judgment February 18, 2010. Soldatenko was an extradition to Turkmenistan. It was referred to in Bayasakov, which was also an extradition case. Kabulov, however, did not mention Soldatenko. In Kabulov, § 113, it was implied that sufficiently detailed assurances could make extradition to Kazakhstan possible, while Bayasakov ¶ 51 holds that "given the lack of an effective system of torture prevention, it would be difficult to see whether such assurances would have been respected." These cases illustrate the following: (1) the uncertainty concerning the source and type of evidence that is to be relied upon by the court making a determination on the merits of extradition; (2) the discretion given to the court in making such a determination based on the evidence it may deem appropriate; and (3) the placing the burden on the court as to the reliability of the "assurances" given and the legal authority of its source in the requesting state.

States pursuant to an Acta de Entrega signed by a representative of the United States embassy in Madrid. After being convicted Mendoza sought to have the condition enforced and be returned to Spain for the execution of his sentence. The U.S. government, however, took the position that it only promised "not to object" to his transfer to Spain as opposed to having committed itself to the certainty of his return. The U.S. Department of Justice maintained that the final decision of whether to transfer Mendoza to Spain for the execution of his sentence was exclusively in the hands of the Bureau of Prisons, as if it were a separate legal entity that was not bound by the assurance. The U.S. government thus concluded that it did not breach its assurance insofar as it did "not object" to Mendoza's request to the Bureau of Prisons that he be transferred to Spain. Mendoza has yet to be transferred to Spain.

In a South African case, the South African Consitutional Court held that an assurance must be obtained that the death penalty will not be imposed whenever an individual is removed to another country to face charges for which the death penalty is a possible sentence regardless of whether the person is removed by deportation or extradition.[608] The court surveyed Canadian and European practices regarding obtaining assurances from the United States, and reasoned as follows:

> Deportation or extradition and the death penalty
>
> [38] The lawfulness of the conduct of the South African immigration officers in handing over Mohamed to the FBI for them to take him to the United States was challenged on a further, even more fundamental and entirely different basis. The argument is derived from the obligation imposed on the South African state by the Constitution to protect the fundamental rights contained in the Bill of Rights.[25] The rights in issue here are the right to human dignity, the right to life and the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way.[26] According to the argument the Constitution not only enjoins the South African government to promote and protect these rights but precludes it from imposing cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment. The Constitution also forbids it knowingly to participate, directly or indirectly, in any way in imposing or facilitating the imposition of such punishment. In particular, so the argument runs, this strikes at the imposition of a sentence of death. Therefore, even if it were permissible to deport Mohamed to a destination to which he had consented and even if he had given his informed consent to such removal, the government would have been under a duty to secure an undertaking from the United States authorities that a sentence of death would not be imposed on him, before permitting his removal to that country.
>
> [39] The cornerstone of this argument is the finding of this Court in S v Makwanyane and Another[27] that capital punishment is inconsistent with the values and provisions of the interim Constitution. When, subsequent to this decision, the Constitutional Assembly came to deal with a Bill of Rights for the "final" Constitution, capital punishment was raised as an issue and the question whether there should be an exception to the right to life permitting such punishment was debated.[28] No such exception was, however, made; nor is there anything in the 1996 Constitution to suggest that the decision in Makwanyane has ceased to be applicable. On the contrary, the values and provisions of the interim Constitution relied upon by this Court in holding that the death sentence was unconstitutional are repeated in the 1996 Constitution. The importance of human dignity to which great weight was given in Makwanyane is emphasised in the 1996 Constitution by including it not only as a right, but also as one of the values on which the state is founded.[29]
>
> [40] In the various judgments given in Makwanyane the history of capital punishment, its application in South Africa under apartheid, the attitude of other countries to such punishment, and the international trend against capital punishment in recent times were dealt with at length. This Court, after a full and detailed consideration of the relevant provisions of the interim Constitution and the arguments for and against capital punishment, concluded unanimously that the death sentence was inconsistent with the values and provisions of the interim Constitution. There is no need to cover that ground again. It should be added, however, that the international community shares this Court's view of the death sentence, even in the context of international tribunals with jurisdiction over the most egregious offences, including genocide.[30] Counsel for the government correctly accepted that capital punishment is also inconsistent with the values and provisions of the 1996 Constitution and that the issues in this appeal must be dealt with on the basis of the decision in Makwanyane.

608 Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) at 24–42 (S. Afr.).

[41] As had been the case in the High Court, much of the argument in this appeal was directed to the question whether the removal of Mohamed to the United States was a deportation or a disguised extradition. The distinction was said to be this. If he was deported that would have been a lawful act on the part of the South African government. The fact that Mohamed was to be "deported" to the United States where he would immediately be put on trial for an offence that carried the death penalty was not relevant. There is nothing in our Constitution that precluded the government from deporting an undesirable alien, or that required it to secure an assurance from the United States government that the death sentence would not be imposed on Mohamed if he were to be convicted. If, however, what happened was in substance an extradition, it would have been unlawful because the correct procedures were not followed. Moreover, if the removal had been effected by way of extradition, it might have been necessary to secure an assurance from the United States government as a condition of the extradition that the death sentence would not be imposed.[31]

[42] Deportation and extradition serve different purposes. Deportation is directed to the removal from a state of an alien who has no permission to be there. Extradition is the handing over by one state to another state of a person convicted or accused there of a crime, with the purpose of enabling the receiving state to deal with such person in accordance with the provisions of its law. The purposes may, however, coincide where an illegal alien is "deported" to another country which wants to put him on trial for having committed a criminal offence the prosecution of which falls within the jurisdiction of its courts.

[43] Deportation is usually a unilateral act while extradition is consensual. Different procedures are prescribed for deportation and extradition, and those differences may be material in specific cases, particularly where the legality of the expulsion is challenged. In the circumstances of the present case, however, the distinction is not relevant. The procedure followed in removing Mohamed to the United States of America was unlawful whether it is characterised as a deportation or an extradition. Moreover, an obligation on the South African government to secure an assurance that the death penalty will not be imposed on a person whom it causes to be removed from South Africa to another country cannot depend on whether the removal is by extradition or deportation. That obligation depends on the facts of the particular case and the provisions of the Constitution, not on the provisions of the empowering legislation or extradition treaty under which the "deportation" or "extradition" is carried out.

[44] Mohamed entered South Africa under an assumed name using a false passport. He applied for asylum giving false information in support of his application and was issued with a temporary visa to enable him to remain in South Africa while his application was being considered. Those facts justified the South African government in deporting him. That, however, is only part of the story, for the crucial events are those that happened after Mohamed had secured his temporary visa. Having been identified by the FBI as a suspect for whom an international arrest warrant had been issued in connection with the bombing of the United States embassy in Tanzania, he was apprehended by the South African immigration authorities in a joint operation undertaken in cooperation with the FBI. Within two days of his arrest and contrary to the provisions of the Act he was handed over to the FBI by the South African authorities for the purpose of being taken to the United States to be put on trial there for the bombing of the embassy. On his arrival in the United States he was immediately charged with various offences relating to that bombing and was informed by the court that the death sentence could be imposed on him if he were convicted. That this was likely to happen must have been apparent to the South African authorities as well as to the FBI when the arrangements were made for Mohamed to be removed from South Africa to the United States.

[45] Another suspect, Mr Mahmoud Mahmud Salim, alleged to be a party to the conspiracy to bomb the embassies, was extradited from Germany to the United States. Germany has abolished capital punishment and is also party to the European Convention on Human Rights. The German government sought and secured an assurance from the United States government as a condition of the extradition that if he is convicted, Salim will not be sentenced to death. This is consistent with the practice followed by countries that have abolished the death penalty.

[46] Recently, in Minister of Justice v Burns,[32] the Supreme Court of Canada had occasion to reconsider its attitude to the extradition of fugitives to a country where they would face the death penalty. It had previously been held by a majority of that Court in Kindler v Canada (Minister of Justice)[33] and *Reference re Ng Extradition (Canada)*34 that there was no obligation on Canada before extraditing a suspect to a country that has the death penalty to seek an assurance from the receiving state that the death penalty will not be imposed. In a unanimous judgment the Court held in Burns[35] that in the light of developments since the decisions in Kindler and Ng, there is now an obligation on the Canadian government, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, to seek such an assurance. The Court deliberately refrained from anticipating what those circumstances might be.[36]

[47] The decision in Burns turned on section 7 of the Canadian Charter which provides that:

> "[e]veryone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the provisions of fundamental justice."

The two suspects whose extradition was sought faced charges of murdering the father, mother and sister of one of them, in what are described in the judgment as "brutal and shocking cold-blooded murders." After weighing the factors for and against extradition without assurances, the Court concluded that in the circumstances of that case, extradition without assurances that the death penalty would not be imposed violated the principles of fundamental justice, and was not justifiable under section 1 of the Charter.[37]

[48] Our Constitution provides that "everyone has the right to life."[38] There are no exceptions to this right. However, like all other rights in the Bill of Rights, it is subject to limitation in terms of section 36 of the Constitution. The requirements prescribed by section 36 are that the limitation must be reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors including those mentioned in the section.[39] These considerations were taken into account by this Court in Makwanyane in holding that capital punishment was not justifiable under the interim Constitution. In the light of these provisions of our Constitution we can revert to the argument mentioned above[40] that a "deportation" or "extradition" of Mohamed without first securing an assurance that he would not be sentenced to death or, if so sentenced, would not be executed would be unconstitutional.

[49] In Makwanyane Chaskalson P said that by committing ourselves to a society founded on the recognition of human rights we are required to give particular value to the rights to life and dignity, and that "this must be demonstrated by the State in everything that it does."[41] In handing Mohamed over to the United States without securing an assurance that he would not be sentenced to death, the immigration authorities failed to give any value to Mohamed's right to life, his right to have his human dignity respected and protected and his right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment.

[50] Counsel for the government contended that although this requirement might be applicable to extraditions, it is not applicable to deportations. In support of this contention he relied on a series of Canadian cases the last of which is Halm v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration)(T.D.)[42] and on the judgment of the Court of Appeal of the United Kingdom and Wales in Soblen.[43] These cases dealt with the validity of deportation proceedings in circumstances where the deported person was likely to face a criminal charge in the country to which he or she was to be deported. In all the cases a challenge to the procedure adopted based on a contention that there should have been a resort to extradition and not deportation was rejected.

[51] The decisions in these cases are referred to in the judgment of the High Court. They are, however, not directly relevant to the question that has to be decided in the present case, which depends upon the values and provisions of our Constitution. Soblen's case was decided before the implementation in Britain of the European Convention on Human Rights. At that time there were no constitutional or treaty constraints which curtailed the powers of the executive. The only question was whether the removal of the applicant complied with the requirements for deportations under English law. The Court held that it did. That decision is of little assistance in deciding what our Constitution required our government to do in the present case.

[52] The Canadian cases were all decided before the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Burns. Canadian law did not then consider the removal of a person to another country where he or she would face a death sentence to be contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. In Kindler, La Forest J suggested that there is no reason why the same considerations should not apply to deportations and extraditions in determining what is required to meet the standards of the fundamental principles of justice.[44] The deportation cases may therefore have to be reconsidered by the Canadian courts in the light of the decision in Burns if in the future deportation rather than extradition is used as the means of removing a fugitive to a country where he or she faces the death penalty.

[53] But whatever the position may be under Canadian law where deprivation of the right to life, liberty and human dignity is dependent upon the fundamental principles of justice, our Constitution sets different standards for protecting the right to life, to human dignity and the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. Under our Constitution these rights are not qualified by other principles of justice. There are no such exceptions to the protection of these rights. Where the removal of a person to another country is effected by the state in circumstances that threaten the life or human dignity of such person, sections 10 and 11 of the Bill of Rights are implicated.[45] There can be no doubt that the removal of Mohamed to the United States of America posed such a threat. This is perhaps best demonstrated by reference to the case of Salim who was extradited from Germany to the United States subject to an assurance that the death penalty would not be imposed on him. This assurance has been implemented by the United States and Salim is to be tried in proceedings in which the death sentence will not be sought.

[54] If the South African authorities had sought an assurance from the United States against the death sentence being imposed on Mohamed before handing him over to the FBI, there is no reason to believe that such an assurance would not have been given. Had that been the case, Mohamed would have been dealt with in the same way as his alleged co-conspirator Salim. The fact that Mohamed is now facing the possibility of a death sentence is the direct result of the failure by the South African authorities to secure such an undertaking. The causal connection is clear between the handing over of Mohamed to the FBI for removal to the United States for trial without securing an assurance against the imposition of the death sentence and the threat of such a sentence now being imposed on Mohamed.

[55] It is not only sections 10 and 11 of the Constitution that are implicated in the present case. According to section 12 (1)(d) and (e) of our Constitution, everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right not to be tortured in any way and not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. For the reasons given in Makwanyane, South African law considers a sentence of death to be cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.

[56] Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights provides that "no one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment." In Soering v United Kingdom[46] the European Court of Human Rights held that:

> "[i]t would hardly be compatible with the underlying values of the Convention . . . were a Contracting State knowingly to surrender a fugitive to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture, however heinous the crime allegedly committed. Extradition in such circumstances, while not explicitly referred to in the brief and general wording of Article 3, would plainly be contrary to the spirit and intendment of the Article, and in the Court's view this inherent obligation not to extradite also extends to cases in which the fugitive would be faced in the receiving State by a real risk of exposure to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment proscribed by that Article."[47]

[57] Soering's case was concerned with extradition, but similar sentiments were expressed by the same Court in Hilal v United Kingdom,[48] a case dealing with the deportation of a Tanzanian citizen from the United Kingdom to Tanzania, which was held to breach Article 3 of the Convention because the deportee would face a serious risk of being subjected to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment in Tanzania. The Court there said:

> "The Court recalls at the outset that Contracting States have the right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the Convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. However, in exercising their right to expel such aliens, Contracting States must have regard to Article 3 of the Convention which enshrines one of the fundamental values of democratic societies. The expulsion of an alien may give rise to an issue under this provision where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person in question, if expelled, would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3 in the receiving country. In such circumstances, Article 3 implies an obligation not to expel the individual to that country (e.g. the Ahmed v Austria . . . and Chahal v the United Kingdom judgment[s])."[49] (Citations omitted.)

[58] An equally instructive case is Chahal v United Kingdom[50] where the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights held that deportation of an individual to his state of origin where he would face inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment would be contrary to the provisions of Article 3 of the Convention. The Court said it was:

> "well aware of the immense difficulties faced by States in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in these circumstances, the Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct . . . The prohibition provided by Article 3 against ill-treatment is equally absolute in expulsion cases. Thus, whenever substantial grounds have been shown for believing that an individual would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3 if removed to another State, the responsibility of the Contracting State to safeguard him or her against such treatment is engaged in the event of expulsion. In these circumstances, the activities of the individual in question, however undesirable or dangerous, cannot be a material consideration."[51] (Footnote omitted.)

[59] These cases are consistent with the weight that our Constitution gives to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights[52] and the positive obligation that it imposes on the state to "protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights."[53] For the South African government to cooperate with a foreign government to secure the removal of a fugitive from South Africa to a country of which the fugitive is not a national and with which he has no connection other than that he is to be put on trial for his life there, is contrary to the underlying values of our Constitution. It is inconsistent with the government's obligation to protect the right to life of everyone in South Africa, and it ignores the commitment implicit in the Constitution that South Africa will not be party to the imposition of cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment.

[60] The fact that the government claims to have deported and not to have extradited Mohamed is of no relevance. European courts draw no distinction between deportation and extradition in the application of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Nor does the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of which South Africa is a signatory and which it ratified on 10 December 1998. Article 3(1) of this Convention provides:

> "No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture."[54]

It makes no distinction between expulsion, return or extradition of a person to another state to face an unacceptable form of punishment. All are prohibited, and the right of a state to deport an illegal alien is subject to that prohibition. That is the standard that our Constitution demands from our government in circumstances such as those that existed in the present case.

[61] The removal of Mohamed to the United States could not have been effected without the cooperation of the South African immigration authorities. They cooperated well knowing that he would be put on trial in the United States to face capital charges. That he should be arrested and put on trial was clearly a significant and possibly the predominant motive that determined the course that was followed. Otherwise, why instruct the officials at the border to prevent him from leaving South Africa? And why cooperate in the process of sending him to the United States, a country with which he had no connection? They must also have known that there was a real risk that he would be convicted, and that unless an assurance to the contrary were obtained, he would be sentenced to death. In doing so they infringed Mohamed's rights under the Constitution and acted contrary to their obligations to uphold and promote the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights.

---

25 Section 7(2) of the Constitution provides as follows:

> "The state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights."
>
> In terms of s 8(1) of the Constitution the Bill of Rights "binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state."

26 Above n 8.

27 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC).

28 The question whether, in the light of the decision in Makwanyane, an exception should be made to the right to life to allow for the death sentence to be passed in serious cases, was thoroughly debated in the course of the deliberations of the Constitutional Assembly, e.g. during the second reading debate on 7 May 1996. Among other matters, the question of a qualification to the right to life to allow for the death sentence was expressly raised and debated. Ultimately a decision was taken that this should not be done. Although unanimity could not be reached on this particular question, the Constitution was adopted by an overwhelming majority of the members of the Constitutional Assembly.

29 Section 1(a) of the Constitution provides as follows:

> "The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:
>
> > (a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms."

30 In 1993 the Security Council unanimously adopted the statute for the International Criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (Resolution 827 (1993)). In paragraph 1 of the resolution it approved the report of the Secretary-General of 3 May 1993 in which he recommended in paragraph 112 that "[t]he International Tribunal should not be empowered to impose the death penalty." That is reflected in Article 24 which provides that "[t]he penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment." See Morris and Scharf An Insider's Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia Vol 1 (Transnational Publishers Inc, New York, 1995) at 274 and especially fn 713. Even in the face of the terrible genocide in Rwanda where over 500 000 people were murdered, the Security Council was not prepared to compromise on the inclusion of the death penalty. The statute was adopted by the Security Council with one dissent (Rwanda) and one abstention (China). In terms of Article 23 the penalty which may be imposed by a trial chamber is limited to imprisonment. In its explanation of vote on Resolution 955, New Zealand stated:

> "For over three decades the United Nations has been trying progressively to eliminate the death penalty. It would be entirely unacceptable—and a dreadful step backwards—to introduce it here."

Morris and Scharf The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda Vol 1 (Transnational Publishers Inc, New York, 1998) at 71–2. During the Rome Diplomatic Conference which drafted and adopted the Statute for the International Criminal Court there was much long debate on capital punishment. In the end it was agreed to exclude it as a competent sentence. In all 139 states signed the ICC Statute and 31, including South Africa, have ratified or acceded to the treaty.

31 Cf Mackeson v Minister of Information, Immigration and Tourism and Another 1980 (1) SA 747 (ZR) at 753-7.

32 United States v Burns, 2001 SCC 7, as yet unreported.

33 (1991) 6 CRR (2d) 193.

34 (1991) 6 CRR (2d) 252.

35 At paras 131–2.

36 At para 65.

37 Section 1 provides that "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

38 Section 11.

39 Factors that have to be taken into account in terms of the section are:

(a) the nature of the right;

(b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;

(c) the nature and extent of the limitation;

(d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and

(e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose.

40 Above para 38.

41 Above n 27 at para 144.

42 [1996] 1 F.C 547.

43 Above n 18.

44 Above n 34 at 203.

45 Albeit subject to possible limitation under s 36.

46 (1989) 11 EHRR 439.

47 Id at para 88.

48 Application no. 45276/99, 6 March 2001.

49 Id at para 59.

50 (1996) 23 EHRR 413.

51 Id at para 79–80.

52 Section 39(2).

53 Section 7(2).

54 "torture" is defined in Article 1(1) as including "any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as . . . punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed . . . ," while providing that "torture" does not include "pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions."

The South African Constitutional Court went on to reason that the individual's consent to his removal would only be enforceable against the individual if it were given with the knowledge that the South African government was obligated to obtain assurances, thus giving the individual a "right to demand this protection against exposure to the death penalty."[609] After this decision was reached, Mohamed presented it to the U.S. federal district court where he was being tried. The U.S. court refused to direct the U.S. government to not seek the death penalty against Mohamed, but allowed Mohamed to introduce the South African decision as a mitigating factor at sentencing.[610] Mohamed was sentenced to life imprisonment.[611]

7.4. Conclusion

These cases indicate how the narrow interpretation of assurances and their application is carried out in the United States, as well as how assurances are deemed different from the principle of specialty.[612] Concerns about the reliability and enforceability of governmental assurances in extradition cases have been addressed by the ECtHR and some domestic courts. Assurances are not in the nature of treaty obligations, even though they are binding upon the requesting state. Their enforceability is like other forms of representations made by governments to one another in connection with their multifaceted dealings. In the context of possible torture, the use of assurances from the receiving state has been criticized by human rights groups. The nature of torture being conducted in secret makes it difficult to discover and stop. Thus, assurances have not protected certain transferred individuals in the past, and assurance creates a two-tiered system where certain individuals receive special protection that undercuts the sending state's claim that torture in its entirety should be done away with.[613]

8. The Rule of Non-Inquiry[614]

8.1. Nature and Scope of the Rule

United States courts have thus far refused to inquire as to the processes by which a requested state secures evidence of probable cause to request extradition, the means by which a criminal conviction is obtained in a foreign state, or the penal treatment to which a relator may be subjected to upon extradition.[615] Even habeas corpus is not a valid means of inquiry into the

609 Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) at 48 (S. Afr.)

610 United States v. Bin Laden, 156 F. Supp. 2d 359, 366–368 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (citing the Ker-Frisbie doctrine to establish the court's jurisdiction over Mohamed, and reasoning that the South African decision was directed to matters of diplomacy addressed to the other branches of government).

611 Id. at 371.

612 See Bassiouni, supra note 565, at 537 et seq.

613 Deeks, supra note 554, at 21–23.

614 See generally, In re Kasper-Ansermet, 132 F.R.D. 622, 630 (D. N.J. 1990) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (1983)). Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights 118–129 (2001).

615 Rachel A. Van Cleare, The Role of United States Federal Courts in Extradition Matters: The Rule of Non-inquiry, Preventive Detention, and Comparative Legal Analysis, 13 Temp. Int'l & Comp. L. J. 27 treatment of the relator in the requesting state, save for narrow exceptions. One court considered the argument raised by the relator that the requesting country's motives and policy choices in changing the treaty to allow for extradition of relators similarly situated was "specious" as well as precluded by the rule of non-inquiry.[616]

The rule of non-inquiry also extends to the irregularity of a requested state's extradition procedure or of its own substantive law.[617] None of the above can, as a general rule, be used on a procedural basis to challenge the validity of the extradition request made to the United States.[618]

8.2. The Rule of Non-Inquiry as Applied by U.S. Courts in Passive Extradition (When the United States Is the Requested State)

This rule has been developed in deference to the sovereignty of the requesting state. No state can sit in judgment on another state's legal system or process.[619] However, considering the existence of international human rights law norms that apply to national legal systems, some limited inquiry is permitted.[620]

(1999); Jacques Semmelman, Federal Court, The Constitution, and the Rule of Non-inquiry in International Extradition Proceedings, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 1198, 1207 (1991).

616 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 671–672 (E.D. Tex. 2008) (discussing an argument raised in support of a finding of "special circumstances" warranting release on bail).

617 There is an ongoing controversy regarding the United States' extradition request to Jamaica for the extradition of Christopher "Duke" Coke. The extradition request was based in large part on wiretap evidence, which was initially believed to have been obtained in violation of Jamaican law. The Jamaican government's continued handling of the extradition request and other narcotics issues is marred by corruption, particularly as the Jamaican prime minister admitted to hiring a U.S. law firm to lobby the United States not to pursue Coke's extradition. It was also revealed that the Jamaican police force authorized the initial transfer of wiretap evidence to the United States. which contradicted the Jamaican government's claim that a lone police officer revealed the questionable evidence. For a detailed discussion of this controversy, see Bruce Zagaris, Jamaican Prime Minister Will Allow Court to Decide U.S. Extradition Request, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 225–227 (June 2010); Bruce Zagaris, Jamaican PM Approves Extradition after Admission of Hiring U.S. Lobbyist to Oppose U.S. Extradition of Coke, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 268–269 (July 2010); Bruce Zagaris, Former Jamaican Police Commissioner Contradicts Prime Minister and Violence Breaks Out Over Coke Extradition, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 309–311 (Aug. 2010). Coke was ultimately extradited to the United States where he pled guilty to racketeering charges against him. See Reuters, Jamaican Coke Admits to Drug, Racketeering Charges, New York, Aug. 31, 2011, available at http://newsandinsight.thomsonreuters.com/Legal/News/2011/08_-_August/Jamaican_Coke_admits_to_drug,_racketeering_crimes/ (last visited Sept. 19, 2011). See also United States v. Gray, No. 07-00971 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).

618 Ahmed v. Morton, 1996 WL 118543 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 1996); In re Extradition of Sandhu 886 F. Supp. 318 (S.D.N.Y. 1993); United States v. Levy, 947 F.2d 1032 (2d. Cir. 1991); United States ex rel. Cabera v. Warden Metro, Correctional Ctr., 629 F. Supp. 699 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

619 See Ramirez v. Chertoff, 267 Fed. Appx. 668 (9th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion) (refusing to apply a "humanitarian exception" where relator challenged the harshness of punishment in Mexico as compared to the United States, stating that the rule of non-inquiry leaves it to the state, not the courts, to determine whether to deny extradition on humanitarian grounds, and that "it is a longstanding principle that we do not parse the differences between our own criminal law and that of a requesting country.") See also In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 97893, at *34 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 3, 2008) (" 'Under the rule of non-inquiry, courts refrain from investigating the fairness of the requesting nation's justice system, and from inquiring into the procedures or treatment which await a surrendered fugitive in the requesting country.' ").

620 See John T. Parry, International Extradition, the Rule of Non-inquiry, and the Problem of Sovereignty, 90 B.U. L. Rev. 1973 (2010).

In Neely v. Henkel,[621] the relator contended that amendments to the extradition statutes were unconstitutional, in that he was not assured the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution upon surrender to the requesting state. The protections specifically alluded to by Neely were the constitutional prohibitions against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court held:

> [T]hose provisions have no relation to crimes committed without the jurisdiction of the United States against the laws of a foreign country. In connection with the above proposition, we are reminded of the fact that the appellant is a citizen of the United States. But such citizenship does not…entitle him to demand, of right, a trial in any other mode than that allowed to its own people by the country whose laws he has violated and from whose justice he has fled.[622]

The rule of non-inquiry is brought into sharp focus in the line of cases dealing with convictions in absentia. In such cases, the United States follows the general practice in international law that convictions in absentia are not conclusive of the individual's guilt but are regarded as equivalent to indictments or formal charges against the individual sought to be extradited.[623] A careful reading of the decisions applying the rule of non-inquiry in such cases reveals that although the courts prefer not to inquire into the treatment to be received by the relator upon surrender, or the quality of justice he or she is expected to receive, there is nonetheless in some instances a finding of non-extraditability on other grounds. Three such cases are particularly revealing.

The first case, Ex parte Fudera,[624] involved a conviction in absentia of a fugitive found guilty and sentenced for the crime of murder by the Italian courts, the district court, on a writ of habeas corpus, chose to pass over the question of the propriety of the in absentia criminal prosecution and sentencing. The court instead rejected the Italian government's evidence of guilt on the grounds that it was based on pure hearsay and released the relator on the grounds of insufficient evidence.

The second case, Ex parte La Mantia,[625] similarly involved a murder conviction by an Italian tribunal. This time the fugitive alleged that the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution had been violated as he had been denied the right of confrontation and cross examination. The federal district court held that this did not apply to "persons extradited for trial under treaties with foreign countries whose laws may be entirely different."[626] However, the fugitive was again

---

621 Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

622 Id. at 122–123. See also Sahagian v. United States, 864 F.2d 509 (7th Cir. 1988) (holding that the United States has neither the right nor the power to insist that the Spanish courts comply with the United States laws concerning extradition proceedings or criminal procedure), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1087 (1989); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (1990) (holding that the U.S. courts are not required to impose the details of the Constitution or procedural system on a requesting country's judicial system when reading and interpreting treaty obligations). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997).

623 See generally Ch. IX.

624 Ex parte Fudera, 162 F. 591 (S.D.N.Y. 1908), appeal dismissed sub nom., Italian Gov't v. Asaro, 219 U.S. 589 (1911).

625 Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330 (S.D.N.Y. 1913).

626 Id. at 332. See also Flynn v. Schultz, 748 F.2d 1186 (7th Cir. 1984) (holding that the Mexican government is not bound by the requirements of our Constitution even when prosecuting a U.S. citizen, and stating it is not this court's responsibility to supervise the integrity of the judicial system of another sovereign), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 830 (1985).

ordered to be released and extradition was refused because of the insufficiency of evidence presented by the Italian government.

In the third case, In re Mylonas,[627] the district court ruled that Mylonas's conviction in absentia did not preclude extradition, even though the fugitive, convicted of embezzlement, was not represented by counsel and had no one appear for him. Again, however, the court found grounds upon which it ordered the accused discharged from custody, namely that under Article V of the 1931 Treaty of Extradition with Greece, the Greek government's long-delayed effort to take the accused into custody exempted Mylonas from extradition "due to lapse of time or other cause."

In these three cases, the courts, though recognizing the limited scope of habeas corpus and the rule of non-inquiry, freed the relators and denied extradition on other grounds. Notwithstanding these cases, U.S. practice allows extradition based on in absentia convictions. Two opinions, however, voiced disenchantment with the established rule.

In Argento v. Horn,[628] the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit felt constrained to submit to precedent on this question. Argento, the fugitive, had been convicted in absentia by Italian courts for the crime of murder. The murder occurred in 1921 and the conviction was obtained in 1931, but the Italian government did not initiate proceedings for Argento's extradition until the 1950s. The court stated:

> The appellant has apparently been a law-abiding person during the thirty years that he has been in this country. To enter a judgment that will result in sending him back to life imprisonment in Italy, upon the basis of the record before the Commissioner, does not sit easily with the members of a United States court, sensible of the great Constitutional immunities . . . [H]owever, we conceive it our obligation to do so.[629]

The test of the rule of non-inquiry is applied in cases where the relator is likely to encounter such treatment in the requesting state that is significantly offensive to the minimum standards of justice, treatment of individuals, and preservation of basic human rights as perceived by the requested state.[630]

In Gallina v. Fraser,[631] the Second Circuit bowed to precedent and followed the rule of non-inquiry, but indicated in dicta that given a proper case the rule might not be followed. In this case, Gallina had been tried and convicted in absentia by the Italian courts for the crime of robbery. Gallina petitioned the federal district court for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that if extradited to Italy, he would be imprisoned without retrial and without an opportunity to face his accusers or conduct any defense. Judge Waterman stated:

> [W]e have discovered no case authorizing a federal court in a habeas corpus proceeding challenging extradition from the United States to a foreign nation, to inquire into the procedures which await the relator upon extradition. . . . Nevertheless, we confess to some disquiet at this result. We can imagine situations when the relator, upon extradition, would be subject to procedures or punishment

---

627 In re Mylonas, 187 F. Supp. 716 (N.D. Ala. 1960).

628 Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818, reh'g denied, 355 U.S. 885 (1957).

629 Id. at 263–264.

630 See Ch. VIII. See also In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1017 (1990); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 886 F. Supp 318 (1993).

631 Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990).

so antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency as to require re-examination of the principle set out above.[632]

The surrender of a relator, whether a U.S. citizen or not, is unimpaired by the absence in the requesting state of specific safeguards available in the U.S. legal system, and therefore no judicial inquiry into the requesting state's legal system is permitted.[633] Nothing, however, prevents the executive branch from considering policies and practices in the requesting state that may be deemed too fundamentally unfair and contrary to U.S. public policy, thereby permitting the exercise of executive discretion[634] and refusal to surrender the person otherwise judicially found extraditable.[635]

The rule of non-inquiry finds support in the treaties between the United States and certain states on the transfer of prisoners.[636] Under Title 18 § 4100. U.S. courts cannot inquire into 632 Gallina, 278 F.2d, at 78–79 (emphasis added). See also In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 270 (E.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (1973); cf. Esposito v. INS, 936 F.2d 911 (7th Cir. 1991) (holding that the relator may present evidence that calls into question the fundamental fairness of the proceedings that generated an in absentia conviction, and if that evidence is sufficiently compelling, the Board will be precluded from giving it any weight at all). The Gallina dicta has been eroded by Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (1990). In Peroff v. Helton, 1542 F.2d 1247 (4th Cir. 1976), the Fourth Circuit on the basis of the rule of non-inquiry denied petitioner's habeas corpus petition; nevertheless, it made a judgment on the capability of the Swedish criminal justice to ensure the safety of petitioner's while he is in custody in Sweden.

---

633 Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972). A requesting state's internal procedures will only be examined when they are antithetical to the federal court's sense of decency. United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Sahagian v. United States, 864 F.2d 509 (7th Cir. 1988) (holding that a defendant cannot defeat an extradition order by a claim that the extradition treaty does not guarantee the requesting state will give him notice of the charges and opportunity to challenge his arrest and extradition), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1087 (1989); Esposito v. Adams, 700 F. Supp. 1470 (N.D. Ill. 1988). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F.Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); but see Tracey Hughes, Comment, Extradition Reform: The Role of the Judiciary in Protecting the Rights of a Requested Individual, 9 Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 293, 303–312 (1986) (discussing cases in which the rule of non-inquiry has been eroded); Basso v. Pharo, 278 Fed. Appx. 886 (11th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion) (stating after finding no due process right to a "speedy extradition" that "the rule of non-inquiry prevents an extradition magistrate, without exception, from assessing the receiving country's judicial system.")

634 See Ch. IX.

635 Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099 (4th Cir. 1977). In dicta, the court held that the rule of non-inquiry into the future treatment of the offender in the requesting state applies to the judiciary. The proper forum to raise such questions is the executive branch of the government, as that branch can exercise executive discretion in denying a person's surrender to a foreign state (see Executive Discretion, Ch. XI). See Bloomfield, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974); cf. Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for Northern District of California, 834 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1987) (stating that although Congress has provided that extraditability shall be determined by the judge or magistrate in the first instance, the ultimate decision to extradite is ordinarily a matter within the exclusive purview of the executive). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 161 F.3d 11 (9th Cir. 1998); In re Extradition of Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D.Del. 1996); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

636 See Abraham Abramovsky & Steven J. Eagle, A Critical Evaluation of the Mexican–American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Treaty, 64 Iowa L. Rev. 275 (1979); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 249 (1978); Detlev F. Vagts, A Reply to "A Critical Evaluation of the Mexican-American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Treaty," 64 Iowa L. Rev. 325 (1979). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, II International Criminal Law 229–240 (2d ed. 1999).

the manner in which a person was found guilty in the state from which the prisoner has been transferred in order to execute his/her sentence in the United States. This position may be viewed as an extension of the policy of non-inquiry into the manner by which a person was brought into the United States.

In Rosado v. Civiletti,[637] the Second Circuit considering the validity of the provisions of the Treaty on Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and its implementing legislation, reviewed at length the record of torture of the petitioners in Mexico and similar practices in that country. Though expressing strong disapproval, the Court concluded it could not inquire into the internal practices of a sovereign state. The court cited Neely v. Henkel,[638] United States v. Toscanino,[639] United States v. Lira,[640] and Reid v. Covert,[641] to underscore that the U.S. Constitution applies extraterritorially and imposes limitations on U.S. government agents acting outside the territory of the United States, if that conduct violates certain due process standards, in particular the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. But such limits do not apply to sovereign states, which would not in any event be deterred by judicial sanctions in the United States, as they would have no effect on the states' policies and practices.

In Rosado, the court found that the petitioners' request for transfer from Mexico was voluntary, even though the record supported a different conclusion. The court reasoned that its decision was a question of policy. Therefore, it held that the petitioners' detention in the United States on the basis of the treaty and the implementing legislation was valid. This is regrettably a narrow view, though clearly the court felt it best to let the practice of transfer of prisoners continue to proceed unimpeded, as U.S. prisoners transferred to the United States would be better off than had they remained in Mexico. It is the view of this writer, as expressed in testimony before the Senate and House on this treaty[642] and the implementing legislation,[643] that if a foreign penal judgment is based on evidence patently violative of U.S. public policy and minimum standards of justice, the judiciary of the United States should not give it recognition.

The same argument was presented by this writer and others in Escobedo v. United States,[644] but the Fifth Circuit refused to disregard evidence that was proffered supporting a finding

---

637 Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856, reh'g denied, 449 U.S. 1027 (1980). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Pfeifer v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 615 F.2d 873 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 908 (1980); cf. In re Requested Extradition of Smyth, 820 F. Supp. 498 (N.D. Cal. 1993) (the United Kingdom sought the extradition of the defendant to serve the remainder of his sentence for a conviction in Belfast, Northern Ireland. The court rejected Smyth's defense that his situation fell under the Supplemental Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom and concluded the treaty did not nullify the traditional rule of non-inquiry.)

638 Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

639 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir.), reh'g denied, 504 F.2d 1380 (1974), remand, 398 F. Supp. 916 (1975).

640 United States v. Lira, 515 F.2d 68 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 847 (1975).

641 Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 60–61 (1957).

642 Implementation of Treaties for the Transfer of Offenders to or from Foreign Countries, 1977: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., 18; Transfer of Offenders and Administration of Foreign Penal Sentences, 1977: Hearings on S.1682 before the Subcommittee on Penitentiaries and Corrections, 95th Cong., 1st Sess.; Penal Treaties with Mexico and Canada, 1977: Hearings Before the Committee of Foreign Relations, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. on Ex. D, H.

643 18 U.S.C. § 3244 (1994).

644 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980), cert. denied sub nom., Castillo v. Forsht, 450 U.S. 922, reh'g denied, 451 U.S. 934 (1981). See also Linna v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 995 (1986), reh'g denied, 479 U.S. 1070 (1987) (regarding an allegation that subject of deportation proceedings faced death sentence and absence of due process); of probable cause, although the requesting state (Mexico) had obtained it by means of torture. Thus, the United States has so far refused to inquire into foreign states' judicial and administrative practices in observance of the rule of non-inquiry, except if U.S. agents are directly involved in conduct that constitutes a serious violation of due process against a U.S. citizen (and presumably also against a permanent resident of the United States).

There is, however, increasing dicta in the opinions of some circuits to believe the rule of non-inquiry could be eroded given the appropriate case. This could arise in two types of cases: (1) where the evidence presented by a requesting state is the product of a serious violation of due process (such as torture), the court could give no weight or even refuse to admit that evidence; and (2) where there is evidence that the individual may be subjected to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment in the requesting state, the court could refuse to order the relator's extradition. Such a holding could easily rely on existing international instruments binding upon the United States. Among these international instruments are: the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,[645] the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,[646] the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights,[647] and others.[648] The 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees[649] does not permit a court to rely on the rule of non-inquiry to refuse inquiry into the possible persecution of the relator once returned to the requesting state.[650]

The rule of non-inquiry is frequently argued by the government to preclude judicial consideration of issues whose outcome may either not be favorable to the government's position, or which, in its estimation, would tend to prolong the legal proceedings. At times the government argues that judicial inquiry into the political motivation of a requesting state[651] is not justiciable under the rule of non-inquiry and should be left to the secretary of state. Other similar arguments are raised in respect to the interplay between immigration proceedings and extradition (see Chapter IV on Disguised Extradition). Last, the argument is used in connection with any attempt to discover prosecutorial misconduct and "working" arrangements between certain representatives of the U.S. government and foreign governments.[652] Newer cases, however, have tended to bring to light some occasionally improper practices by overzealous prosecutors who tend to put winning cases above the integrity of the legal process of which they are such an important part.[653] Treaties and their judicial interpretations show, however, that there is no uniformity in the articulation and application of the rule of non-inquiry.

Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990) (concerning the allegation that extraditee's conviction came under his confederates' coerced confessions and that he faced torture if returned to requesting state). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 1997); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

645 G.A. Res. 217, U.N. Doc. A/810, at 71 (1948).

646 G.A. Res. 2200, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 6, 1496th plen. mtg., at 165, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).

647 O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1, Nov. 22, 1969.

648 The United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. Res. 46, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., 93 plen. mtg., at 395, U.N. Doc. A/64, at 63 (1984). See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 17 (1977). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, I International Criminal Law 363 (2d ed. 1999).

649 See Ch. III.

650 See Ch. III, Sec. 4.2.

651 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 for the political offense exception.

652 See supra Sec. 7 for a discussion of diplomatic assurances and misrepresentations.

653 See Wang v. Reno, 81 F.3d. 808 (9th Cir. 1995*). See also* Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338, 355 (6th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 295, 130 L. Ed. 2d 205 (1994) (prosecuting attorneys engaged

In Article 3(a) of the 1985 United States–United Kingdom Supplemental Extradition Treaty, extradition is prohibited when the individual, if surrendered, would be prejudiced at trial or punished, detained, or restricted because of race, religion, nationality, or political opinions. Further, in regard to this defense, the trier's findings are immediately appealable either to the U.S. district court, or court of appeals.[654] This clearly alters the traditional view on the rule of non-inquiry,[655] but does not entirely abolish it.[656]

The case of In re Requested Extradition of Artt, Brennan and Kirby[657] involved the 1985 United States–United Kingdom Supplementary Treaty, which was designed to facilitate extradition to the United Kingdom of IRA members who committed acts of violence in Northern Ireland or elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Under Article 3(a), the Treaty requires the court to inquire "to some degree" into whether the relators "were actually guilty of the crimes of which they were convicted."[658] In considering the claims of one of the relators, who was tortured in order to extract a confession, the court did not look at that conduct by the requesting state as dispositive of the issue, namely the refusal to extradite on the grounds that the foreign conviction was based on a confession obtained by torture. Instead, it considered whether the conviction in prosecutorial misconduct when they recklessly disregarded their obligation to provide information specifically requested by detainee, thereby endangering detainee's defense); United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315, 1324 (9th Cir. 1993) ("It's the easiest thing in the world for people trained in the adversarial ethic to think a prosecutor's job is simply to win.") (citing instances of prosecutorial misconduct). In so doing, the government failed in its duty to "win fairly, staying well within the rules" and, more important, to "serve truth and justice first." Kojayan, 8 F.3d at 1323. The district court found that in this case, the government strayed from its responsibility "to vindicate the right of people as expressed in the laws and give those accused of crime a fair trial." Id. Thus,

---

> [i]n a situation like this, the judiciary—especially the court before which the primary misbehavior took place—may exercise its supervisory power to make it clear that the misconduct was serious, that the government's unwillingness to own up to it was more serious still and that steps must be taken to avoid a recurrence of this chain of events.

Kojayan, 8 F.3d at 1325. See also In re Massieu, 897 F. Supp. 176 (D.N.J. 1995) and United States v. Criollo, 962 F. 2d 241 (2d Cir. 1992) wherein the court, rejecting petitioner's claim for review (in an immigration case), did not however foreclose an eventual review by reason of the rule of non-inquiry. Thus, the Second Circuit held:

> [I]n Linnas v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 995, 107 S.Ct. 600, 93 L.Ed.2d 60 (1986), this court stated "that there could arise a situation in which the person to be removed from the United States would be subjected to 'procedures or punishment so antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency' as to require judicial intervention." Id. at 1032 (quoting Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77, 79 (2d. Cir.) cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851, 81 S.Ct. 97, 5 L.Ed.2d 74 (1960)). Although we conclude herein that Saleh's claims on appeal are without merit, this ruling does not foreclose the possibility, under appropriate circumstances, of judicial intervention into such matters.

Id. at 241.

654 Supplementary Extradition Treaty, U.S.–UK, art. 3(a), June 25, 1985, TIAS 12050, entered into force December 23, 1986.

655 See Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 99th Congress, First Session, Hearings of September 18, 276–305 (1985) (testimony of M. Cherif Bassiouni), and M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Political Offense Exception Revisited: Extradition between the U.S. and the U.K.—A Choice between Friendly Cooperation among Allies and Sound Laws and Policy, 15 Den. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (1987). The Fifth Circuit recognized that right and its reviewability on appeal; however, an extradition target must establish by a preponderance of credible evidence that the legal system of the requesting country would treat him differently than other similarly situated individuals because of race, religion, nationality, or political opinions. In re Extradition of Howard, 996 F.2d 1320 (5th Cir. 1993). This Treaty provision allows for a right of appeal within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

656 Howard, 996 F.2d at 1331.

657 In re Artt, 972 F. Supp. 1253 (N.D. Cal. 1997).

658 Id. at 1261.

rested on other evidence, which the U.S. court accepted (on the basis of the UK court's characterization) as "overwhelming evidence of Brennan being caught with the bomb and its paraphernalia."[659] Probably with that conclusion in mind, the court took a narrow approach to what it refers to as the "humanitarian international law exception,"[660] citing several cases.[661]

In Crudo v. United States, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of relator's request to introduce evidence that his confession was coerced in the requested state, the Philippines.[662] Thus, in similar issues involving coerced confessions, the Ninth Circuit reversed a district court's decision and affirmed another. As the question of law appears the same, it must surely be the difference in the facts that led the court to opposite conclusions. Admittedly, in the Crudo case, the circuit court characterized the legal issue in terms of admissibility of the evidence, an area in which the extradition judge has traditionally been given wide latitude.

In determining whether there has been a violation of the doctrine of specialty, courts have consistently examined the terms of the treaty for any limitations on prosecution.[663]

---

659 Id. at 1268.

660 Id. at 1268.

661 Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77, 69 (2nd Cir. 960), Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 789–790 (9th Cir. 1986), Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679, 683 (9th Cir. 1983), Wang v. Reno, 81 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 1996) (in which, however, extradition was denied), Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191, 195 (3rd Cir. 1997), Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 830 (11th Cir. 1993), Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, aff'd 910 F.2d 1063, 1967 (2nd Cir. 1990), Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1107 (5th Cir. 1980), Sinderia v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 174 (2nd Cir. 1980); Peroff v. Hylton, 542 F.2d 1247, 1249 (4th Cir. 1976); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

662 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997).

663 See, e.g., United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567, 1575 (11th Cir. 1995) (citing Treaty on Extradition and Cooperation in Penal Matters, Apr. 6, 1973, U.S.–Uru., Art. XIII, P.I.A.S. 10850), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 933, 133 L. Ed. 2d 239, 116 S. Ct. 341 (1995); United States v. Fowlie, 24 F.3d 1059, 1064 n.2 1065 (9th Cir. 1994) (citing Extradition Treaty Between U.S. and Mex., May 4, 1978, U.S.–Mex, 31 U.S.T. 5059, T.I.A.S. 9656), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1086, 115 S. Ct. 742, 130 L. Ed. 2d 643 (1995); United States v. Andonian, 29 F.3d 1432, 1435 (9th Cir. 1994) (citing Treaty on Extradition and Cooperation in Penal Matters, Apr. 6, 1973, U.S.–Uru., Art. 13, T.I.A.S. 10850), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1228, 130 L. Ed. 2d 883, 115 S. Ct. 938 (1995); United States v. Khan, 993 F.2d 1368, 1373 (9th Cir. 1993) (citing Extradition Treaty, Dec. 22, 1931, U.S.–Pak., Art. 7, 47 Stat. 2124); United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326, 328 (10th Cir. 1990) (citing Extradition Treaty, June 8, 1972, U.S.–U.K., Art. XII, 28 U.S.T. 227), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1049, 112 L. Ed. 2d 778, 111 S. Ct. 759 (1991); Leighnor v. Turner, 884 F.2d 385, 286 T.S. No. 354 (8th Cir. 1989) (citing Treaty Concerning Extradition, June 20, 1967, U.S.–F.R.G., 32 U.S.T. 1485, T.I.A.S. No. 9785); United States v. Sensi, 279 U.S. App. D.C. 42, 879 F.2d 888, 895 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (citing Extradition Treaty, June 8, 1972, U.S.–U.K., Art. XII, 28 U.S.T. 227, T.I.A.S. 8468); United States v. Herbage, 850 F.2d 1463, 1465 (11th Cir. 1988) (citing Extradition Treaty, June 8, 1972/Oct. 21, 1976, U.S.–U.K., Art. XII, 28 U.S.T. 227, T.I.A.S. 8468), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1027, 103 L. Ed. 2d 217, 109 S. Ct. 1158 (1989*);* United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417, 1427 (9th Cir. 1986) (citing Treaty on Extradition, U.S.–Switz., May 14, 1900, 31 Stat. 1928, T.S. No. 354, Art. IX), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1012, 103 L. Ed. 2d 185, 109 S. Ct. 1122 (1989); United States v. Thirion, 813 F.2d 146, 151 (8th Cir 1987) (citing Treaty Respecting Extradition, Feb. 15, 1939, U.S.–Monaco, 54 Stat. 1780); United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986) (citing Treaty on Extradition, May 14, 1900, U.S.–Switz., Art. IX, 31 Stat. 1928, T.S. No. 354); Fiocconi v. Attorney General, 462 F.2d 475, 481 (2d Cir. 1972) (citing Extradition Convention between U.S.-Italy (1868), Art. III, 15 Stat. 631), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1059, 34 L. Ed. 2d 511, 93 S. Ct. 552 (1972). More specifically see Andonian, 29 F.3d at 1435; United States v. Diwan, 864 F.2d 715, 721 (11th Cir. 1989) ("the objective of the rule [of specialty] is to insure that the treaty is faithfully observed by the contracting parties.... The extradited individual, therefore, can raise only

It should be noted, however, that the rule of non-inquiry bars U.S. courts from entertaining claims that the judicial or executive branches of the requested state violated their own laws. Thus, a relator who has been extradited from a foreign state to stand trial in the United States cannot claim that he was surrendered in violation of the foreign requested state's interpretation of what is an extraditable offense.[664]

In In re Extradition of Lui Kin Hong a/k/a Jerry Lui[665] the Massachusetts district court held in support of the rule of non-inquiry, but nonetheless gave the relator great latitude in introducing evidence, and thus making a record, concerning the potential treatment of the relator once he was surrendered to Hong Kong. The court cited the well-established position of the First Circuit in Koskotos v. Roche[666] wherein the court held: "concerns of the sort raised here are for the executive branch because of its exclusive power to conduct foreign affairs, as extradition proceedings necessarily supplicate the foreign policy interests of the United States."[667]

The First Circuit in the cases cited above, as well as the Second,[668] Fourth,[669] and Ninth[670] Circuits, have allowed a relator to make a record of his/her concerns, presumably so that the record can be reviewed by the secretary of state for consideration of "executive discretion."[671] This is probably the best approach, namely, to allow the relator to make a record; only in cases involving obviously egregious results should the extradition court deny extradition. Otherwise, the judicial record can be relied upon by the secretary of state, which conserves time and effort instead of briefing the facts for the secretary's benefit. Furthermore, this gives the government an opportunity to contradict the relator's assertions and to make its own record in an open manner. On the basis of such a record, the secretary of state can make a more enlightened and transparent decision.

The rule of non-inquiry extends to the laws, judicial acts, and administrative decisions of foreign legal systems as part of the deference that states give to each other in respect of their separate sovereignties. Thus, as stated in Mainero v. Gregg[672] the Ninth Circuit found "to date no court [had] ever denied extradition based on a fugitive's anticipated treatment in the requesting country."[673] But courts have nonetheless allowed a limited inquiry as evidenced by the cases cited in this section. The contemporary U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition"[674] and other forms of abductions and unlawful seizures justify expanding the exception to the rule of those objections to the extradition process that the surrendering country might consider a breach of the extradition treaty." (citations omitted)), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 921, 106 L. Ed.2d 595, 109 S. Ct. 3249 (1989).

---

664 United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997).

665 In re Extradition of Lui Kin Hong a/k/a Jerry Lui, 939 F. Supp. 934 (D. Mass. 1996), habeas corpus granted by Kin Hong v. United States, 957 F. Supp. 1280 (D. Mass 1997), reversed by United States v. Kin Hong, 110 F. 3d 103 (1st Cir 1997) (rehearing en banc denied), stay denied by Lui Kin Hong v. United States, 520 U.S. 1206, 117 S. Ct. 1491, 137 L. Ed. 2d 816 (1997).

666 Koskotos v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir. 1991).

667 Id. at 174. See also United States v. Manzi, 888 F.2d 204, 206 (1st Cir. 1989) (per curiam), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1017, 110 S. Ct. 1321 (1990).

668 Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d. Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851, 81 S. Ct. 97, 5 L. Ed. 2d 74 (1960); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980).

669 Peroff v. Hylton, 542 F.2d 1247 (4th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1062, 97 S. Ct. 787, 50 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1977).

670 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986).

671 See Ch. II. See also Sean Murphy, 2 United States Practice in International Law: 2002–2004 (2006).

672 Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1999).

673 Id. at 1210. See also Murphy, supra note 671.

674 See Ch. V.

non-inquiry as indicated by the Second Circuit in United States v. Toscanino[675] for "egregious conduct" whether by U.S. agents abroad or by foreign agents acting as de facto agents for the United States. This limited inquiry may be expanded whenever a treaty allows it, or when an international legal obligation arises under international human rights treaties.

8.3. The Rule of Non-Inquiry: The Death Penalty and Torture

As stated above, the rule of non-inquiry is based on the deference that the judiciary in one state gives to another sovereign state with respect to its laws, judicial practice, and administrative procedures.[676] With the development of international and regional human rights protections, which in turn have permeated national legal systems through constitutions and laws, it has become progressively more difficult since the 1960s to maintain the rigidity of the rule of non-inquiry as it had once existed. Nevertheless, the judiciary continued to give it a high level of adherence, preferring to defer judgment on the laws and practices of requesting states to the executive branch. In time, international treaty obligations on the protection of human rights became justiciable and thus more difficult to avoid by the judiciary in the context of extradition. However, the executive branch, eager to avoid having the judiciary expand its inquiry into human rights issues, sought to reaffirm not only the validity of the rule, but its own primacy in dealing with foreign governments on matters involving the treatment of persons surrendered by the United States. This became particularly evident with respect to torture after the United States adopted national implementing legislation for the CAT.[677] Article 3 of the CAT prohibits extradition whenever there is a likelihood that the relator will be tortured.[678] Because the threat of torture is a substantive bar to extradition, even though it is to be determined by the executive branch, its procedure is covered in Chapter VIII. The Bush administration, rather than allowing the judiciary to make such a determination and to create a legal exception to the rule of non-inquiry, preferred to have these issues determined solely by the secretary of state.[679] Courts, in reliance that the issue of the realtor's torture is properly considered by the secretary of state, have declined to entertain torture as a bar to extradition where the secretary of state has not made a final determination regarding whether the relator will be extradited.[680] One U.S. court held that there was no humanitarian exception available to the relator, because although some federal courts recognized the possibility of such an exception,

---

675 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir.), reh'g denied, 504 F.2d 1380 (1974), remand, 398 F. Supp. 916 (1975).

676 This principle was noted in one author's analysis of the likely argument that could be raised by counsel for Roman Polanski in connection with his extradition to the United States. See Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Government Arrests Polanski on U.S. 1977 Sex Case, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 484, 485 (Dec. 2009). The extradition request for Mr. Polanski was ultimately denied and he was freed. See Dave Itzkoff, Polanski Is Free after Swiss Reject U.S. Extradition Request, N. Y. Times, July 12, 2010.

677 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, (CAT), U.N. Res. 39/46, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. No. 51 at 197 (1984), which entered into force with respect to the United States on November 20, 1994; Torture Victims Protection Act, Pub. L. 102-256, Mar. 12, 1992, 106 Stat. 73. The rule of non-inquiry has been relied on to bar the relator's ability to raise a "humanitarian exception" argument in the context of a CAT claim.See In re Extradition of Santos, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, at *69–*72 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2011).

678 CAT, supra note 507, at Art. 3.

679 See Ch. VIII. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2005–2006).

680 In re Extradition of Tawakkal, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65059, at *42–*46 (E.D. Va. Aug. 22, 2008); In re Extradition of Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47096, at *29–*32 (D.S.D. June 28, 2007). This does not, however, prevent the relator from presenting evidence of his or her fear of torture to the secretary of state.

no federal court has applied it.[681] Other issues involving torture usually arise in the context of the rule of non-inquiry.

Notwithstanding what was mentioned above, the Eighth Amendment to the U.S Constitution concerning cruel and unusual punishment cannot be suspended by the rule, nor can the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Consequently, the rule of non-inquiry is subject to being set aside if any of these two constitutional issues are deemed meritorious enough by the extradition court to consider. This was indicated in dicta in Gallina v. Fraser.[682]

The rule of non-inquiry has not necessarily been without exceptions with respect to foreign requested states, particularly those states that have abolished the death penalty and those states that are bound by regional human rights treaties, such as the European states. In these cases discussed in Chapter VIII extradition to the United States has been denied because of either the possibility of the execution of the death penalty or because of death row syndrome.[683]

There are a number of cases in the United States that specifically address the rule of non-inquiry in the context mentioned above, as well as others.[684] They include: non-inquiry into evidence obtained in what would be considered violations of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments (whether against U.S. or noncitizens, or whether by foreign agents acting alone, or with U.S. agents, or U.S. agents alone); torture resulting in confessions abroad; convictions abroad without due process; potential torture; mistreatment of the relator upon return, including inhuman, cruel, or degrading treatment or punishment; and excessive penalties (so far there have been no cases involving corporal punishment save for one case involving flogging, but no cases involving more serious corporal punishment, amputations, stoning, or beheadings). Last, one could argue that abductions are also covered by the rule of non-inquiry even though U.S. courts admitted to abductions but refused to consider them as an impediment to valid U.S. jurisdiction.[685]

8.3.1. International Human Rights Treaty Law

An exception to the rule of non-inquiry may be gradually developing under the general limitations imposed by human rights conventions. The various human rights conventions consider

---

681 In re Extradition of Stern, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79486, at *11–*13 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2007).

682 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960).

683 See infra Sec. 8.3 discussing Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96 (June 27, 1996) n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996); Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) (S. Afr.); Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by Article 3 would be grossly violated by requesting nation); Regina v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. ex parte Kirkwood, [1984] EWHC (QB) 913, (1984) 1 W.L.R. 913 (Eng.); People v. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court, No. 115353 (1987); Soering Commission Report, reprinted in 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) 1, 67–68 (1989), and in 28 I.L.M. 1063 (1989); Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989); United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 360.

684 Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F. Supp. 2d 651, 660 (E.D. Pa. 2005); In re Extradition of Atuar, 300 F. Supp. 2d 418, 431 (S.D. W. Va. 2003), 156 Fed. Appx. 555 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. dismissed 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5244 (2006); Buell v. Mitchell, 274 F. 3d 337 (6th Cir. 2001); Elzbieta Klimowicz, Article 15 of the Torture Convention: Enforcement in U.S. Extradition Proceedings, 15 Geo. Imm. Law. J. 183 (Fall 2000). See, e.g., Mironsecu v. Costner, 345 F. Supp. 2d 538 (M.D.N.C. 2004) (reaffirming the rule of non-inquiry in connection with the issue of torture); Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Cornejo-Barreto I"); Cornejo-Barreto v. Siefert, 379 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Cornejo-Barreto II"); Cornejo-Barreto v. Siefert, 386 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Cornejo-Barreto III"); Cornejo-Barretto v. Siefert, 389 F.3d 1307 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Cornejo-Barreto IV"). See also supra Secs. 7.1–7.2.

685 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 679–680 (1992).

cruel and unusual punishment violative of those minimum standards of human rights that require protection. Among the relevant provisions are the following excerpts.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states in Article 5:

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[686]

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states in Article 7:

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In particular, no one shall be subjected without his free consent to medical or scientific experimentation.[687]

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms states in Article 3:

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[688]

The American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man states in Article XXV:

> He also has the right to humane treatment during the time he is in custody.[689]

The American Convention on Human Rights states in Article 5:

> 1. Every person has the right to have his physical, mental, and moral integrity respected.
>
> 2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment. All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person.[690]

So far, however, no multilateral extradition convention has taken up the theme of cruel and unusual punishment, nor has any bilateral treaty embodied any of these provisions. There are, of course, other provisions intended to accomplish, at least in part, the same result, as is the case for provisions relating to non-extradition of nationals, double jeopardy, and the death penalty. None of these, however, covers the issue of treatment of accused offenders, whether it is in the nature of the type of corporal punishment, length or type of incarceration, or the conditions to which the relator may be subjected in the requesting state after surrender.[691]

The wide divergence in penological theories and standards of treatment of offenders among countries is such that no uniform standard exists. The United Nations, however, in an effort to provide such a basis, adopted the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Offenders,[692] which were adopted as a resolution and as such are not binding international obligations. The prohibition

---

686 G.A. Res. 217, supra note 645, Art. 5.

687 G.A. Res. 2200, supra note 646, Art. 7.

688 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, art. 3, 213 U.N.T.S. 221.

689 Organization of American States Res. XXX, adopted by Ninth Int'l Conf. of American States (1948), Organization of American States Off. Rec., OEA/Ser. L/V/I.4 Rev. (1965).

690 Organization of American States Off. Rec., OEA/Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (1969).

691 See generally, Vanessa Maaskamp, Extradition and Life Imprisonment, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 741 (Summer 2003); Daniel J. Sharfstein, European Courts, American Rights: Extradition and Prison Conditions, 67 Brook. L. Rev. 719 (Spring 2002); Daniel J. Sharfstein, Human Rights beyond the War on Terrorism: Extradition Defenses Based on Prison Conditions in the United States, 42 Santa Clara L. Rev. 1137 (2002).

692 United Nations Conference on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders of 1955, E.S.C. Res. 663c, U.N. ESCOR, 24th Sess., Supp. No. 1, at 11, U.N. Doc E/3048 (1957). See also United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, U.N. ESCOR, 21st Sess., 522d mtg., U.N. Doc. E/CN.5/SR.522 (1970).

against cruel and unusual punishment can be said to constitute a general principle of international law because it is so regarded by the legal systems of civilized nations. But that alone does not give it a sufficiently defined content bearing on identifiable applications capable of more than general recognition. The application of such a principle to sentences, types and conditions of incarceration, and other correctional questions is therefore still very much in doubt with respect to extradition law and practice, where the rule of non-inquiry precludes the extradition magistrate from inquiring into the treatment that the relator may receive in the requesting state upon his/her return. The rule works well in those states that do not extradite their nationals because the interest of such states in the face of other nationals whom they extradite may well be limited, if it exists at all. The emergence of the individual as a recognized participant in the process of extradition and the applicability of internationally protected human rights are likely to curtail, if not eliminate, the rule of non-inquiry.

The problems presently existing in extradition practice stem from the fact that there is no alternative to denying extradition where a requested state is concerned about the fate of a surrendered person. The alternative is then for the requested state to prosecute the relator on behalf of the requesting state, and punish the person in a manner that is not cruel or unusual, or to permit temporary extradition for the relator's trial in the requesting state and his/her return to the requested state for sentencing or carrying out of a sentence in a manner that would not be cruel or unusual. Such an alternative would avoid pitting two states against each other and the accused's evasion of the process for reasons that do not arise from his/her conduct. This is one of the premises the United States has with certain states on the transfer of prisoners.[693] These treaties and the implementing U.S. legislation provide for a transfer of the respective national of the contracting parties to one another.[694] But in the event of a transfer, the original conviction cannot be subsequently challenged on grounds of cruel and unusual treatment, as was held in Rosado v. Civiletti.[695]

8.4. The Rule of Non-Inquiry as Applied by Courts of Foreign States in Active Extradition (When the United States Is the Requesting State)

The rule of non-inquiry is followed in most legal systems. Some states apply it in the same manner as does the United States. But extradition requests from the United States have been the object of "inquiry" by some states, particularly European states with respect to the death penalty and to the death row syndrome.[696] Other states have followed the European lead.[697]

---

693 See Rishi Hingoraney, International Extradition of Mexican Narcotics Traffickers: Prospects and Pitfalls for the New Millennium, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 331 (2002); Abraham Abramovsky, A Critical Evaluation of the American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Policy, 1980 Wisc. L. Rev. 25; Abramovsky & Eagle, supra note 636; M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Practitioner's Perspective on Prisoner Transfer, 4 J. Crim. Def. 127 (1978); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 29 (1978); Jordan J. Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Mexican and Canadian Prisoners by the United States Government, 12 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 67 (1979); Vagts, supra note 636; David Vaida, Recent Development, Treaties—Mexican–American Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences—Custody of a Prisoner under the Mexican–American Treaty Is Unlawful When Consent to the Transfer Is Coerced: Velez v. Nelson, 475 F. Supp. 865 (D. Conn. 1979), 3 Fordham Int'l L. J. 107 (1979–1980).

694 18 U.S.C. § 4082 (2000).

695 Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856 (1980); cf. Esposito v. Adams, 700 F.Supp. 1470, 1481 (N.D. Ill. 1988). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

696 See Vanessa Maaskamp, Extradition and Life Imprisonment, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 741 (Summer 2003); Sharfstein,European Courts, supra note 691; Sharfstein, Human Rights beyond the War on Terrorism, supra note 691.

697 See, e.g., In re Pedro Alejandrino Flores, 5 Ann. Dig. 289, 290 (CSJN 1929) (Arg.); Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) (S. Afr.); Rishi Hingoraney, International

8.4.1. The Death Penalty[698]

The argument that "death row syndrome" is "cruel" and is barred by general human rights provisions, is the basis for arguments against extradition. The irony in this argument is that "death row syndrome" is caused by the time it takes for U.S. courts to hear appeals and review evidence resulting in a conviction, which is itself an issue of fundamental concern for these states. Opponents of the death penalty argue that these same judicial delays based on concern for the rights of the condemned person are grounds to oppose the extradition, as it results in "death row syndrome." Implicitly, this means that if the execution was swift and the condemned person did not have several opportunities for review, the argument against extradition would fail.

There is no easy answer to the problems posed by the death penalty. Those opposing and those favoring the practice have valid arguments. In the end, it is both a moral and a social policy debate. As the French philosopher Victor Hugo once said, "an irreparable penalty presupposes an infallible jury." In the case of the death penalty, it is clear that the penalty is irreparable, but it is not always clear that the jury or judge who imposes the sentence is infallible. So long as the Gordian knot is not cut, this issue will continue to be with us for years to come. The solution in these cases is for the requested state to assume prosecution as Italy did in 1996 in the case Venezia v. Ministero de Grazia e Givstizia.[699]

Because the United States still allows for the death penalty,[700] many countries refuse extradition outright in capital cases or make the grant of extradition conditional

---

Extradition of Mexican Narcotics Traffickers: Prospects and Pitfalls for the New Millennium, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 331 (2002); Abramovsky, supra note 693; Abramovsky & Eagle, supra note 636; Bassiouni, A Practitioner's Perspective on Prisoner Transfer, supra note 693; Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, supra note 693; Jordan J. Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Mexican and Canadian Prisoners by the United States Government, 12 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 67 (1979); Vagts, supra note 636; Vaida, supra note 693. See Alan W. Clarke et al., Does the Rest of the World Matter? Sovereignty, International Human Rights Law and the American Death Penalty, 30 Queen's L.J. 260, 273–274 (2004); Andrew J. Parmenter, Death by Non-inquiry: The Ninth Circuit Permits the Extradition of a U.S. Citizen Facing the Death Penalty for a Non-violent Drug Offense [Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2005)], 45 Washburn L.J. 657, 670 (2006).

698 See Schabas, supra note 515, at 596–598. See also Craig Roecks, Extradition, Human Rights, and the Death Penalty: When Nations Must Refuse to Extradite a Person Charged with a Capital Crime, 25 Cal. W. Int'l L. J. 189, 230–231 (1994). The United States has had a number of problems with extradition from Canada. See J.G. Kastel & Sharon A. Williams, The Extradition of Canadian Citizens and § 1 and 6(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 25 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 263 (1987), and Sharon A. Williams, Nationality, Double Jeopardy, Prescription, and the Death Sentence as a Basis for Refusing Extradition, 62 Revue Int'le de Droit Pénal 259 (1990); Daniel J. Sharfstein, Human Rights beyond the War on Terrorism: Extradition Defenses Based on Prison Conditions in the United States, 42 Santa Clara L. Rev. 1137 (2002).

699 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). See note 546 for a full discussion of the case.

700 Parmenter, supra note 466; Elizabeth Burleson, Juvenile Execution Terrorist Extradition, and Supreme Court Discretion to Consider International Death Penalty Jurisprudence, 68 Alb. L. Rev. 909 (2005). See Alan W. Clarke et al., Does the Rest of the World Matter? Sovereignty, International Human Rights Law and the American Death Penalty, 30 Queen's L.J. 260, 273–274 (2004); Schabas, supra note 525; David M. Rogers, International Law—Extradition and the Death Penalty—United States v. Bin Laden, 156 F. Supp. 2d 359 (S.D.N.Y. 2001), 26 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 223 (Winter 2002); Craig Roecks, Extradition, Human Rights, and the Death Penalty: When Nations Must Refuse to Extradite a Person Charged with a Capital Crime, 25 Cal. W. Int'l L. J. 189, 230–231 (1994); Bassiouni, A Practitioner's Perspective on Prisoner Transfer, supra note 693; Roper v. Simmons, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (2005); Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).

on not applying the death penalty.[701] Although in most legal systems courts apply the rule of non-inquiry, an exception is often made when the death penalty is a possible

701 See supra Sec. 7.3, discussing cases involving "assurances" including sentencing and the death penalty. See, e.g., Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances, ouncil of Europe, ETS No. 187 (May 2002), entered into force July 1, 2003; Council of Europe Resolution No. 1044 (1994); Protocol No. 6 the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty, as amended by Protocol No. 11, Council of Europe ETS No. 114, ETS No. 155, entered into force November 1, 1998; Giulaino Vassali, Pena Di Morte E Richiesta Di Estradizione Quando Il Ministero Scavalca la Consulta (Death Penalty and Extradition Request When the Ministry Tries to Bypass the Constitutional Court), 22 Diritto E Giustizia 76 (June 2006). Gary Botting, Extradition between Canada and the United States (2005); Robert Harvie & Hamar Foster, Shocks and Balances: United States v. Burns*, Fine-Tuning Canadian Extradition Law and the Future of the Death Penalty*, 40 Gonz. L. Rev. 293 (2004–2005). See Michael J. Kelly, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare and the Death Penalty Extradition Prohibition, 10 Int'l Legal Theory 53 (Fall 2004); Murali Jasti, Extraditing Terrorists Hits a Death Penalty Kibosh, 22 Wis. Int'l L. J. 163 (Winter 2004); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Death as a Penalty in the Shari'a, in Capital Punishment: Strategies for Abolition (Peter Hodgkinson & William A. Schabas eds., 2004); James Finsten, Extradition of Execution? Policy Constraints in the United States' War on Terror, 77 S. Cal. L. Rev. 835 (May 2004); Michael J. Kelly, Cheating Justice. by Cheating Death: The Doctrinal Collision for Prosecuting Foreign Terrorists—Passage of Aut Dedere Aut Judicare into Customary Law & Refusal to Extradite Based on the Death Penalty, 20 Ariz. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 491 (Fall 2003); Vanessa Maaskamp, Extradition and Life Imprisonment, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 741 (Summer 2003); Kathryn F. King, The Death Penalty, Extradition and the War against Terrorism: U.S. Responses to European Opinion about Capital Punishment, 9 Buff. Hum. Rts. L. Rev. 161 (2003); Robert Badinter et. al, Death Penalty—Beyond Abolition (2004); Daniel J. Sharfstein, European Courts, American Rights: Extradition and Prison Conditions, 67 Brook. L. Rev. 719 (Spring 2002); Rishi Hingoraney, International Extradition of Mexican Narcotics Traffickers: Prospects and Pitfalls for the New Millennium, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 331 (2002); M. Cherif Bassiouni & Gamal M. Badr, The Shari'ah: Sources, Interpretation and Rule-Making, 1 UCLA J. Islamic & Near E. L. 135 (Spring 2002); William A. Schabas, Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (2002); Robert Gregg, The European Tendency toward Non-extradition to the United State in Capital Cases: Trends, Assurances, and Breaches of Duty, 10 U. Miami Int'l & Comp L. Rev. 113 (Fall 2002); Matthias Wentzel, Extradition Involving the Possibility of the Death Penalty, 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 335 (1991); Sharon A. Williams, Nationality, Double Jeopardy, Prescription, and the Death Sentence as a Basis for Refusing Extradition, 62 Revue Int'le de Droit Pénal 259 (1990); J.G. Kastel & Sharon A. Williams, The Extradition of Canadian Citizens and § 1 and 6(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 25 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 263 (1987); Abramovsky & Eagle, supra note 636; M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 249 (1978); Jordan J. Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Mexican and Canadian Prisoners by the United States Government, 12 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 67 (1979); Vagts, supra note 636; Vaida, supra note 683; Öcalan v. Turkey, App. No. 00046221/99, Judgment of March 12, 2003 (ECHR); Judge v. Canada, U.N. Human Rights Comm., 78th Sess., para. 10.4, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/78/D/829/1998 (Oct. 20, 2003); United State v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 360 (Can.); Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa, 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) (S. Afr.); Cobb v. United States, 2001 SCC 19 (Can.); Kwok v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 18 (Can.); Tsibouris v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 20 (Can.); Shulman v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 21 (Can.); Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996); Cazzetta v. United States of America, 108 CCC 3rd 536 (1996); Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by Article 3 would be grossly violated by requesting nation); People v. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court, No. 115353 (1987); Shea, supra note 518, at 109, citing UPI, July 24, 1987, available in LEXIS, Nexis Library Wires File; Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989); In re Soering, 1988 Crim. L. Rev. 307. See also Stephan Breitenmoser & Gunter E. Wilms, Human Rights v. Extradition: The Soering Case, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (1990); David L. Gappa, European Court of punishment.[702] The rationale for refusing extradition on the grounds that the relator is likely to incur the death penalty is twofold:

1. The abolition of the death penalty by a given state is predicated on constitutional grounds based on humanitarian considerations and public policy;[703] and

2. Therefore, it would be abhorrent to that state to grant extradition because this would entail using its processes to reach an outcome that is in violation of its laws and public policy.

The number of states that have abolished the death penalty and those that have not are roughly the same.[704] It cannot therefore be said that there is a CIL basis for or against the death penalty on a purely numerical basis. More evidence can be adduced to support that proposition.[705] However, it can be said that the trend toward eliminating the death penalty is more evident because most of the states having the death penalty have limited it only to a few crimes.[706] Moreover, the actual carrying out of the death penalty in these states has significantly diminished in numbers and continues to do so on a yearly basis.[707]

No human rights convention has so far recognized an absolute right to life, and none of the sources of international laws to date elevate the right to life to an absolute right that cannot be abridged. However, several national constitutions do recognize it, and that has a significant impact on extradition with the United States. Western European states have consistently carved an exception to the rule of non-inquiry, not only with respect to the death penalty but to "Death-Row Syndrome."[708]

Human Rights-Extradition—Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Soering Case*, 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Ser. A) (1989)*, 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 463 (1990); James M. Lenihan, Soering's Case: Waiting for Godot—Cruel and Unusual Punishment?, 4 Pace Y.B. Int'l L. 157 (1992); In re Pedro Alejandrino Flores, 5 Ann. Dig. 289, 290 (CSJN 1929) (Arg.).

702 See supra Sec. 7.2 (inquiry into U.S. Practices by Foreign Courts).

703 The humanitarian exception was qualifiedly formulated in Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960).

704 For a list of these states, see Amnesty International, The Death Penalty, available at http://www.amnesty.org/en/death-penalty/numbers. For a general discussion of the abolition of the death penalty in various regions of the world, and an argument that the growing abolition of the death penalty and reliance on assurances against the death penalty is making U.S. extradition more difficult, see Alan W. Clarke & Laurelyn Whitt, The Bitter Fruit of American Justice: International and Domestic Resistance to the Death Penalty 31–49 (2007).

705 See Kelly, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 701; Kelly, Cheating Justice supra note 701; Jasti, supra note 701.

706 Amnesty Death Penalty Website, supra note 704.

707 Id. Except for China, where the official numbers seem to be increasing and have been mostly related to corruption crimes. Some estimate are that the number of annual executions are between 2000 and 8000. Amnesty Death Penalty Website, supra note 704. In Muslim countries, many of whom eschew the Sharī'ā for criminal codes, the death penalty is limited to two major crimes: high treason and murder with intent to kill. They do extend to more complex crimes such as terrorism when death results or forcible felonies, which also result in death. M. Cherif Bassiouni, Death as a Penalty in the Shari'a, supra note 701; Finsten, Extradition of Execution, supra note 470; Bassiouni & Gamal M. Badr, The Shari'ah, supra note 701; Schabas, supra note 525.

708 See Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by article 3 would be grossly violated by requesting nation); Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989). Both cases involved the United States as the requesting state. A total of 129 states have abolished the death penalty in law or practice, while 68 states have retained it. Amnesty International Death Penalty Website, supra note 704. In 2005, 94 percent of all known executions took place in China, Iran, Saudi Arabia, and the United States. Id.

The Council or Europe's member states are required to sign and ratify Protocol 6 to the ECHR, which abolishes the death penalty during times of peace and requires at a minimum a moratorium on the death penalty.[709] The members of the European Union are also signatories to Protocol 6, as well as Protocol 13.[710] Protocol 13 abolishes the death penalty in all times, including times of war or imminent threat of war.[711]

> Protocol 13 states:
>
> Article 1—Abolition of the death penalty. The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed.
>
> Article 2—Prohibition of derogations. No Derogation from the provision of this Protocol shall be made under Article 15 of the Convention.
>
> Article 3—Prohibition of Reservations. No reservation may be made under Article 57 of the Convention in Respect of the provisions of this Protocol.[712]

The 2003 United States–European Union extradition treaty allows E.U. member states to make a conditional grant of extradition provided that the death penalty shall not be carried out; otherwise the request for extradition can be denied.[713]

The United States–European Union Extradition Treaty states in Article 13:

> Where the offence for which extradition is sought is punishable by death under the laws in the requesting State and not punishable by death under the laws in the requested State, the requested State may grant extradition on the condition that the death penalty shall not be imposed on the person sought, or if for procedural reasons such condition cannot be complied with by the requesting State, on condition that the death penalty if imposed shall not be carried out. If the requesting State accepts extradition subject to conditions pursuant to this Article, it shall comply with the conditions. If the requesting State does not accept the conditions, the request for extradition may be denied.[714]

The 1957 European Convention on Extradition states in Article II:

> If the offense for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the law of the requesting state, and if in respect of such offense the death penalty is not provided for by the law of the requested state or is not normally carried out, extradition may be refused unless the requesting state gives such assurance as the requested party considers sufficient that the death penalty will not be carried out.[715]

---

709 Council of Europe Resolution No. 1044 (1994); Protocol No. 6 the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty, as amended by Protocol No. 11, Council of Europe ETS No. 114, ETS No. 155, entered into force November 1, 1998. See also Kathryn F. King, supra note 701; The Death Penalty, Extradition and the War against Terrorism: U.S. Responses to European Opinion about Capital Punishment, 9 Buff. Hum. Rts. L. Rev. 161 (2003); Gregg, supra note 701.

710 Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances, Council of Europe, ETS No. 187 (May 2002), entered into force July 1, 2003.

711 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.3 (Multilateral Treaties).

712 Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances, Council of Europe, ETS No. 187 (May 2002), entered into force July 1, 2003. Protocol 6 is essentially identical to the provision of Protocol 13, except Protocol 13 applies during times of war as well as times of peace.

713 EU–U.S. Extradition Treaty, 2003, Art. 13, Capital Punishment. Senate Doc. 109-14 (June 25, 2003).

714 Id.

715 European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, art. 2, 597 U.N.T.S. 338. See also Wentzel, supra note 701 at 335.]

The European approach is the product of a long history of opposition to the death penalty, which is prohibited by a number of constitutions, such as those of the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and the Scandinavian countries.

The same prohibition is also embodied in the Inter-American Convention on Extradition.[716] The Organization of American States has also adopted a Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty.[717] However, only eight states have ratified the protocol and it has not entered into force. The United States is not a party to the Extradition Convention or the Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights.

The Inter-American Convention on Extradition States:

> The States Parties shall not grant extradition when the offense in question is punishable in the requesting State by the death penalty, by life imprisonment, or by degrading punishment, unless the requested State has previously obtained from the requesting State, through the diplomatic channel, sufficient assurances that none of the above-mentioned penalties will be imposed on the person sought or that, if such penalties are imposed, they will not be enforced.[718]

Certain extradition treaties specifically state that where the death penalty is likely to be imposed for a given offense, extradition for that offense shall be denied. An exception thereto could be made if the surrender is conditional,[719] and the requesting state agrees not to impose the death penalty.

One example is the 2003 United States–United Kingdom extradition treaty, which states in Article 7:

> When the offense for which extradition is sought is punishable by death under the laws in the Requesting State and is not punishable by death under the laws in the Requested State, the executive authority in the Requested State may refuse extradition unless the Requesting State provides an assurance that the death penalty will not be imposed or, if imposed, will not be carried out.[720]

The United States–Brazil treaty of 1961 also provides in Article VI:

> When the commission of the crime or offense for which the extradition of the person is sought is punishable by death under the laws of the requesting state and the laws of the requested state do not permit this punishment, the requested state shall not be obligated to grant the extradition unless the requesting state provides assurances satisfactory to the requested state that the death penalty will not be imposed on such person.[721]

The exemption from the obligation to extradite can be total or partial, as reflected in the 1962 treaty between the United States and Israel, which states in article VII:

> When the offense for which the extradition is requested is punishable by death under the laws of the requesting state and the laws of the requested state do not permit such punishment for that offense, extradition may be refused unless the requesting state provides such assurances as the requested state considers sufficient that the death penalty shall not be imposed or, if imposed, shall not be executed.[722]

---

716 Inter-American Convention on Extradition, O.A.S. Doc. B-47, art. 9, entered into force March 28, 1992.

717 Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty, O.A.S. Doc. A-53, signed June 8, 1990.

718 Id.

719 See supra Sec. 1.

720 United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty, March 31, 2003, art. 7, S. Treaty Doc. 108-23.

721 United States–Brazil Extradition Treaty, Jan. 13, 1961, June 18, 1962, art. 6, 15 U.S.T. 2093.

722 Extradition Treaty, Dec. 10, 1962, U.S.–Isr., art. 7, 14 U.S.T. 1707 (entered into force Dec. 5, 1963).

The United States–Italy Extradition Treaty of 1983 states in Article IX:

> When the offense for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the laws of the requesting Party and the laws of the requested Party do not provide for such punishment for that offense, extradition shall be refused unless the requesting Party provides such assurances as the requested Party considers sufficient that the death penalty shall not be imposed, or, if imposed, shall not be executed.[723]

But conditional extradition presents certain problems of enforceability. In Venezia v. Ministero de Grazia e Giustizia, an extradition case involving Italy, the Italian Constitutional Court held that the prohibition on the death penalty in the Italian constitution precluded granting extradition to any state that imposes the penalty for the crime charged by the requesting state, irrespective of any assurances given.[724] As such, Italy found that even if it obtained assurances from the requesting state that the penalty would not be applied, it would not grant extradition.[725] This conclusion is founded on the fact that the requesting state's executive cannot a priori give a definitive assurance that when the death penalty is decided by the judiciary that the executive will grant clemency or issue a pardon.

Whenever there is no such provision in a treaty or whenever the practice is based on reciprocity or comity, the national laws of the requested state shall be controlling. If these laws prohibit the death penalty, it is likely that extradition will be denied.

An illustration of this proposition is found in a case in which Chile requested the surrender of a fugitive from Argentina for an offense punishable by death.[726] Argentina had abolished the death penalty, and there was no extradition treaty in force between the two states. The practice between these states was, therefore, based on reciprocity. The Supreme Court of Chile informed Argentina that, if extradited, the relator would be judged according to Chilean law, and although it could not give assurance that the lesser penalty would be imposed, it would try to comply with the Argentine conditional extradition. The lower Argentine court held that this was not satisfactory compliance with the condition of Argentine law. On appeal, this view was upheld, but it was found that under the Chilean constitution, the president had the power to pardon, which would thus make possible the fulfillment of a promise to inflict the lesser penalty. On further appeal, the Federal Supreme Court of Argentina held that extradition should be allowed only on a promise of pardon or commutation of sentence by the Chilean executive in case the death sentence was imposed. The Court stated:

> The simple manifestation of good offices of the Supreme Court of Justice of the requesting country does not amount to the promise which the Argentine law imposes as necessary, together with reciprocity, to concede extradition without treaties.[727]

In the United States, the death penalty is permissible, and there is no specific constitutional provision against it except for the constitutional prohibition of "cruel and unusual punishment," which has not been held per se to be applicable thereto.[728] The Supreme Court has, 723 U.S.–Italy Extradition Treaty, Oct. 13, 1983, art. IX, 35 U.S.T. 3023, TIAS 10837 (entered into force Sept. 24, 1984).

---

724 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). As indicated above, Venezia was later tried and convicted in Italy for the same crime under Italian law.

725 Id.

726 In re Pedro Alejandrino Flores, 5 Ann. Dig. 289, 290 (CSJN 1929) (Arg.).

727 Id.

728 Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). See M. Cherif Bassiouni et al., La peine de mort aux Etats-Unis l'état de la question en 1972, in 1973 Rev. de Science Criminelle et de Droit Pénal Comparé 23 (1973).

however, ruled that it is unconstitutional to execute defendants under the age of eighteen[729] or those with a mental disability.[730]

Extradition from a country that has abolished the death penalty to the United States has been the subject of increased restrictions. Conditional extradition and assurances against the application of the death penalty have been used, but with less success.[731] In countries where the executive branch cannot commit the judiciary or place limitations on its powers to impose sanctions, the only avenue is that of presidential pardon. But very rarely, if ever, do heads of state issue a pardon before the sentence is carried out. In other situations, such as in the case of the United States, the federal system precludes the U.S. government from imposing limitations on the powers of states and state judiciaries with respect to the imposition of penalties. The U.S. government can, through the Department of Justice, obtain such a commitment from a governor or the attorney general of the state where the prosecution is to take place. Even then, neither the governor nor the attorney general could limit the application of a sentence mandated by law and which only the judiciary can mete out. The only solution in such a case is a prior commitment by the governor to commute the sentence or exercise clemency. This solution is not without its problems either, as some states have different procedural tracks for cases involving the death penalty, and governors are not likely to make such assurances before a final judicial determination.

With regard to the ECHR as it relates to extradition, there are two ways to apply human rights considerations to the extradition process: either that a relator should not be extradited if extradition would result in the infringement of his/her basic human rights in the requesting state, or that the extradition proceedings in the requested state should comply with human rights.[732] There are signs that indicate that modern extradition law is evolving toward an increasingly explicit recognition of at least certain human rights. Examples of this evolution are the recent extradition laws of Switzerland, Austria, and the Federal Republic of Germany, which have adopted the principle that extradition shall be refused if the procedure in the requesting state is contrary to the European Convention on Human Rights.[733] The Soering decision indicates that ECtHR case law is evolving in the same direction.[734] The question arises as to which human rights, in particular, are obstacles to extradition.[735]

---

729 Roper v. Simmons, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (2005). See also Burleson,Juvenile Execution, supra note 700.

730 Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).

731 In the United States, courts generally view the secretary of state's decision to present the extradition request as a signal of confidence that the fugitive will receive fair treatment in the requesting state. The State Department generally does not present extradition requests from governments whose human rights records are widely condemned. John G. Kester, Some Myths of United States Extradition Law, 76 Geo. L. J. 1441, 1480 (1988). The process is similar in the United Kingdom, except that the fugitive may seek judicial review of the Foreign Minister's final decision to extradite. See, e.g., Re Chinoy CO/792/89 (Q.B. 1990) (LEXIS, Enggen library, Cases file). British courts employ a standard first articulated in Associated Provincial Picture Houses v. Wednesbury Corp., which permits a court to strike down executive decisions only when "no reasonable" executive official would have made them. [1948] 1 K.B. 223, 234. Canadian courts also review the government's final decision to extradite, and they also generally defer. E.g., Kindler v. Canada, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 779 (Can.).

732 Christine Van den Wijngaert, Applying the European Convention on Human Rights to Extradition: Opening Pandora's Box?, 39 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 757, 758 (1990).

733 Id. at 758–759, 760.

734 See also Öcalan v. Turkey, App. No. 00046221/99, Judgment of March 12, 2003.

735 This question becomes more marked given a different approach by the United Kingdon to a U.S. extradition request where torture was at issue. A UK court allowed the extradition of a Muslim cleric, Abu Hamza al-Masri, to the United States despite allegations that certain individuals had been tortured to obtain some of the evidence leading to the U.S. extradition request. This case implicates the U.S. policies of the war on terror, and the relator in this case is wanted in the United States on charges that he Probably as a result of these two cases, the Constitutional Court of Italy in 1996 in the Venezia case[736] ruled that Italy could not extradite to the United States a person charged with murder in Florida for which the death penalty could be imposed. The Italian Constitutional Court held that the prohibition of the death penalty in the Italian constitution precluded granting extradition to any state that imposes the penalty for the crime charged by the requesting state, irrespective of any assurances given.[737] As such, Italy found that even if it obtained assurances from the requesting state that the penalty would not be applied, it would not grant extradition.[738] One problem is that the requesting state's executive cannot a priori give a definitive assurance that when the death penalty is decided by the judiciary, executive clemency or pardon shall be granted. The Department of Justice, supported by the state of Florida, offered assurances that the death penalty would not be sought in the case. The Italian Constitutional Court concluded that it could not accept such assurances, as it did not feel that they displaced the risk of the imposition of the death penalty in case of extradition. Italy, however, proceeded to prosecute Venezia with the cooperation of the Florida prosecutors, resulting in the conviction of Venezia and a sentence to life in prison.

---

provided logistical support to al-Qaeda and the Taliban and that he had a role in the 1998 kidnapping of sixteen Westerners in Yemen. See Bruce Zagaris, U.K. Court Rules Abu Hamza al-Masri Can Be Extradited to the U.S., 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 1–2 (Jan. 2008); Bruce Zagaris, British Appellate Court Affirms Extradition of Radical Muslim Cleric to U.S., 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 314–315 (Aug. 2008). The ECtHR considered al-Masri's case, and rejected his arguments based on diplomatic assurances, extraordinary rendition, the death penalty, and special administrative measures related to his detention in the United States; see Ahmad et al. v. United Kingdom, App. Nos. 24027/07, 11949/08, and 36742/08, (2010). The court did allow al-Masri to raise a claim based on a possible life sentence and detention conditions in the United States. Id. at ¶ 153. Regarding evidence obtained by torture, the ECtHR dismissed the relator's arguments as issues of admissibility of evidence could be fairly decided by U.S. courts. Id. at ¶¶ 159–160. See also European Court of Human Rights Registrar, Applications from Alleged International Terrorists Detained in the UK Pending Extradition to the USA Partly Admissible, Press release 549 (July 08, 2010).

736 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). Venezia was subsequently tried in Italy for the crime for which he was requested in the United States and convicted thereof. Recently, a similar case involving a request by the U.S. based on an indictment by the the state of Connecticut for one Benedetto Cipriani did not follow the same approach in that the Italian minister of justice allowed extradition with U.S. assurances that the crime charged was not subject to the death penalty. But because Cipriani could be charged subsequent to his surrender to the United States with a death penalty crime, the minister's decision was appealed to the Administrative Tribunal of Lazio, with Jurisdiction over Rome's Administrative Agencies. The Tribunal ruled on June 23, 2006, with a decision No. 1046106, Registro Sentenze No. 997/2005, that the minister erred and that even in the case where the crime charged does not carry the death penalty, the assurances of the U.S. government are insufficient. Both this case and the Venezia case evidence Italy's judiciary's distrust of U.S. government assurances. See Giulaino Vassali, Pena Di Morte E Richiesta Di Estradizione Quando Il Ministero Scavalca la Consulta (Death Penalty and Extradition Request When the Ministry Tries to Bypass the Constitutional Court), 22 Diritto E Giustizia 76 (June 2006). The decision declares Article 698 of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure of 1989 as unconstitutional in that it allows extradition in cases where the death penalty can be applied subject to assurances by the requesting state that it shall not apply the penalty. See also William A. Schabas, Indirect Abolition: Capital Punishment's Role in Extradition Law and Practice, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 581, 596–598 (2003). It also declares Article 9 of the U.S–.Italy extradition treaty of 1984 as unconstitutional. The French Consel d'Etat (the Supreme Administrative Court in France) ruled on October 15, 1993, re Joy Davis-Aylor, that assurances given by a requested state are not only that the death penalty will be excluded, but that it will not be enforced. 1994 La Semaine Juridique 22257. See also Dominique Poncet & Paul Gully-Hart, Extradition: The European Approach, in 2 Bassiouni ICL at 297–298.

737 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996).

738 Id.

The death penalty is explicitly abolished by the above-mentioned Protocols 6 and 13, which were adopted in 1983 and 2002, respectively.[739] Both protocols amend Article 2 of the ECHR. States that have ratified the Protocol can henceforth refuse extradition in a capital case by virtue of Article 2 in combination with Protocol 13, without having to invoke death row or other circumstances that may bring the case under Article 3.

The 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR),[740] which was ratified by the United States,[741] provides under Article 6, paragraph 2 the same right as provided for in Article 2 of the ECHR. Though neither provision deals with extradition, they have both been used to oppose extradition in death penalty cases. The Kirkwood and Soering cases discussed above relied on the European Convention. In connection with the ICCPR, a number of communications have been presented to the Human Rights Committee concerning extradition cases that relied on the Soering case.

Among these are the Kindler[742] and Ng[743] cases.[744] In these, the United States sought the extradition of individuals from Canada, which does not have the death penalty. Both of the relators were charged with capital offenses within the jurisdiction of the United States,[745] and both 739 In 1989 the United States had asked from the Netherlands for the surrender of Short, a U.S. serviceman who had murdered his wife while stationed under the NATO allied forces agreement in the Netherlands. The surrender request was based on capital murder. In its decision of March 30, 1990, the Dutch Supreme Court confirmed a lower court's injunction prohibiting the Dutch government from surrendering Short if and in so far as the possibility existed that he would be executed. Surrender resulting in the imposition and execution of the death penalty was held to be contrary to the Sixth Protocol. The Commission rejected the applicability of Article 6, not in general terms, but because the respondent government could not be held directly responsible under the Convention for the absence of legal aid under Virginia law—a matter entirely within the responsibility of the United States. Even though the Court did not find a violation of Article 6 in the case before it, this conclusion is of crucial importance: it shows that the application of Article 6 is no longer excluded per se. Consequently, it can be said that an "opening" has been made toward recognizing international responsibility of requested states in extradition cases on account of Article 6. Id. at 770. See also Ch. IX (concerning procedure); Van den Wijngaert, supra note 525, at 773–779 (discussing human rights in extradition proceedings).

740 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. Res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976.

741 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Reflections on the Ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by the United States Senate, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 1169 (1993). It should be noted that the United States holds the unique position that the ICCPR is not applicable within the United States until national implementing legislation has been adopted. None has been presented so far. This unilateralist position is unique in the array of multilateral treaties because President Bush in transmitting the ICCPR to the Senate for "advice and consent" indicated that the ICCPR's legal obligations would not be binding upon the United States until Congress adopted national legislation and that he did not intend to present any. As of this writing, no such legislation has been presented and adopted. Thus, the United States has signed a treaty it declared would not be enforceable. This is truly a novel approach to treaties.

742 Communication No. 470/1991, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/48/D/470/1991, Nov. 11, 1993.

743 Communication No. 539/1993, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/52/E/539/1993, Dec. 9, 1994.

744 See generally Thomas Rose, A Delicate Balance: Extradition, Sovereignty, and Individual Rights in the United States and Canada, 27 Yale J. Int'l L. 193 (Winter 2002).

745 The cases of Kindler and Ng involved two fugitives from the United States in Canada who contested extradition on the basis that the requesting state did not prohibit the death penalty while the requested stated did. The court in Ng held that the discretion to extradite lies with the executive. Further, courts can exercise judicial review only after discretion has been exercised at first in the federal court of appeals, but not during the extradition hearing. In Canada, where the Charter of Rights and Freedoms prevails over the Extradition Act, the court held in Kindler that capital punishment is not cruel and unusual within § 12 of the charter. Finally, the executive branch of the Canadian government is duty bound to act in accordance with the dictates of the Charter, and in 1988 the federal court of appeals declined to cases were submitted to the Human Rights Committee, which is the adjudicating body of experts established pursuant to the ICCPR. In Kindler and Ng the Committee ruled that the reasoning in Soering was not applicable to these cases, though some of the dissenting opinions on the Committee held otherwise. Subsequently, in the Cox case,[746] the Committee reexamined Kindler and Ng, as well as the "death row phenomenon" (the effects of prolonged detention on the convicted person) and whether it constitutes "cruel and inhumane or degrading treatment or punishment." Unlike the decision of the ECtHR in Soering, the Human Rights Committee concluded that this phenomenon is not a bar to extradition. However, in 2003, the United Nations Human Rights Commission stated that nations that have abolished the death penalty have a duty to refuse extradition or deportation where there is a possibility that the individual will face the death penalty.[747]

A decade after the Kindler and Ng cases, Canada began refusing to extradite individuals to the United States unless it receives assurances that the death penalty will not be executed. Traditionally, Canada applied the rule of non-inquiry to extradition requests and has deferred to the Canadian Minister of Justice to deny extradition requests.[748] The Supreme Court of Canada amended this procedure in 2001 in United States v. Burns.[749] In Burns, the Supreme Court held that the Minister of Justice could not extradite individuals to the United States who would face the death penalty, without assurances that it would not be imposed.[750]

Canada's courts have also inquired critically into U.S. practices with respect to other areas. One such case was Cazzetta v. United States of America,[751] first decided by the Quebec Court of Appeals. The case involved threats made by a U.S. judge that, unless the person sought gave up his legal right to oppose extradition in Canada, he would have to endure imprisonment in a way that would likely result in his homosexual rape. The Canadian court found that this behavior "shocks the Canadian conscience" and "is simply not acceptable." In another case, Cobb v. United States, the Canadian Supreme Court refused to grant extradition to the United States because of similar threats by the prosecutor and the judge.[752]

The obligation to protect individual rights guaranteed by human rights conventions and by national constitutions prompted courts in many countries to inquire into requesting states' legal systems and practices. The United States should, therefore, abandon its rigid interpretation of the rule of non-inquiry.

In the last few years, probably as a result of the United States' lead after September 11, a renewed interest has seemingly emerged on the part of some states to impose the death penalty for a number of terrorism-related offenses.[753] For those states that impose the death penalty hold that capital punishment is inevitably cruel and unusual within the meaning of § 12 of the charter. See Williams, supra note 698, at 272–275.

---

746 Communication No. 539/1993, supra note 743.

747 Judge v. Canada, U.N. Human Rights Comm., 78th Sess., para. 10.4, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/78/D/829/1998 (Oct. 20, 2003). See also Parmenter, supra note 697, at 670.

748 See Clarke, Does the Rest of the World Matter? Supra note 697, at 273–274; Parmenter, supra note 697, at 670.

749 United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 360; Clarke, supra note 469, at 670. See also Harvie & Foster, supra note 701.

750 United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 360.

751 The decision of the Court of Appeals for Quebec is reported in 108 CCC 3rd 536 (1996). Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, which was denied, can be found in 3 S.C.R. xiv (1996).

752 2001 SCC 19. The other companion cases were Kwok v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 18, Tsioubris v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 20, and Shulman v. United States of America, 2001 SCC 21. See also Gary Botting, Extradition between Canada and the United States (2005).

753 See Rogers, supra note 700. Nevertheless, it should be noted that the Supreme Court has limited the application of the death penalty with respect to the mentally ill and those under age eighteen. See Roper for intentional killings, these may not be innovations, unless these laws expand the application of the death penalty to preparatory acts and to aiding and abetting.[754] Not all have followed this trend, however. In the 2001 decision in Mohamed v. President of the Republic of South Africa, the South African Constitutional Court has also refused extradition to the United States because of the death penalty.[755] South Africa had abolished the death penalty in 1994 and the FBI was attempting to have Mohamed surrendered to the United States to face the death penalty on terrorism charges. The South African Supreme Court ruled that surrendering Mohamed to the United States by removal or extradition would be unconstitutional because it would violate his right to life under the South African Constitution.[756]

The arguments for and against the death penalty have historically been consistent. Not much has changed in the positions of proponents of opponents of the penalty. Proponents claim that their arguments are bolstered because of the occurrences of crimes producing greater harm, such as terrorism, and the prospects of the use of weapons of mass destruction against innocent civilians. Conversely, these proponents tend to ignore the use of excessive military force by governments against civilian populations either in the context of international or non-international armed conflicts.[757] Ultimately, as the member states of the European Union have asserted in the United States–European Union Extradition Treaty and as the member states of the Council of Europe have expressed in their adoption of Protocol 13 to the European Convention on Human Rights, it is both an issue of principle and a symbol. The former emphasizes the sanctity of life, irrespective of whether a criminal offender deserves or not to be deprived of life, and the latter symbolizes adherence to this principle. In short, it is a position that reflects the humanism of Western civilization.[758]

8.5. Revisiting the Rule of Non-Inquiry

The rule was developed in deference to the national sovereignty of a requesting state. As such, it applies not only to extradition but to all aspects of international cooperation in penal matters.[759] The treatment that the relator is likely to receive in the requesting state upon his/her

v. Simmons, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (2005); Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002). This is relevant insofar as the United States has not ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), G.A. Res. 44/25, annex, 44 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49) at 167, U.N. Doc. A/44/49 (1989), entered into force Sept. 2, 1990. At one time arguments presented by the United States for not ratifying the CRC were that the Supreme Court had not pronounced itself on the application of the death penalty for minors under the age of eighteen. Obviously after Roper, this argument is no longer valid. The other argument that has not been raised at the international level is the strong lobbying of the American Rifle Association (ARA), which has taken the position that minors under the age of eighteen can be conscripted to bear arms and fight in defense of the country. The CRC prohibits the forceful use of minors in armed conflict, as a result of the horrible experiences in African conflicts in which thousands of children were forced to fight internal wars. The ARA argument leaves much to be desired, and would be an embarrassment for the United States to offer to the international community.

754 One of the problems with terrorism is that it is not defined internationally. There are fifteen conventions that deal with the subject, but on the basis of specific conduct, such as aircraft hijacking, kidnapping of civilians, kidnapping of diplomatic personnel, attacks upon civilians and civilian installation, and using explosives. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 Interanational Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents (1972–2001) (2001).

755 Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) (S. Afr.).

756 Id.

757 See generally, M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Manual on International Humanitarian law and Arms Control Agreements (2000).

758 Badinter, supra note 701.

759 For the transfer and execution of foreign sentences in the United States, see Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179, 1195 (2d Cir. 1980). The Second Circuit refused, on policy grounds, to inquire into how a return there has not been the object of specific provisions in extradition treaties, whether bilateral or multilateral. The reason is that between coequal authoritative decision-making processes there can be no inquiry by one state into the internal affairs of the other.[760]

There are two areas in which inquiry could be made as exceptions to the rule. The first is procedural, where a legal system denies an accused fundamental fairness as established by international human rights standards.[761] Western legal procedures are substantially similar with respect to affording an accused fundamental fairness rights, which, notwithstanding their differences, are such that inquiry into the states' respective legal systems would not be warranted. However, even traditionally fair systems such as that of the United States may, during certain periods, undergo exceptions. This is the case with respect to "unlawful enemy combatants," military commissions, and those incarcerated in facilities such as Guantánamo Bay and detention facilities in Iraq and Afghanistan.[762] It would be reasonable for a requested state, particularly one subject to the ECHR[763] or the Inter-American Convention of Human Rights (IACHR)[764] to deny extradition of a person to the United States if that person were to be designated as an enemy combatant, or if that person would likely be incarcerated in military facilities controlled by U.S. forces in Afghanistan[765] or Iraq. With the exception of these aberrations, Western legal systems are quite similar in the fundamental fairness protection that they offer, particularly due to the influence of the ECHR and IACHR, as well as other international human rights norms, such as those embodied in the ICCPR.[766] conviction was obtained in Mexico, even though it was evident from the record that the conviction was based on tortured confessions. In this case, the Second Circuit opted for not inquiring into this egregious violation by Mexico, on the grounds that it was better not to inquire and have U.S. citizens convicted in that country, then transferred to the United States for the execution of their sentences. See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Grace M.W. Gallagher, Policies and Practices of the United States: Transfer of Sentenced Persons, in 2 International Criminal Law: Procedural and Enforcement Mechanisms (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1999). This would be the case in certain U.S. instances such as designation of a person as an enemy combatant. This policy consideration is different from the one applicable to extradition, which allows for some exceptions. But see Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980) (involving an extradition request from Mexico that was based on tortured confessions). Escobedo rigidly applied this rule. Even though the record showed that the only evidence relied upon by the Mexican government were two tortured confessions, which the Mexican government did not deny, the Fifth Circuit for no apparent policy reasons opted not to inquire into the facts. Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d, 1098.

---

760 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8 (discussing the rule of non-inquiry).

761 See generally, M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (1994); Human Rights and the Administration of Justice: International Instruments (Christopher Gane & Mark Mackarel eds., 1997); Stefan Trechsel, Human Rights in Criminal Proceedings (2005).

762 See Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 126 S. Ct. 2749 (2006); Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2006).

763 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, (ETS 5), 213 U.N.T.S. 222, entered into force Sept. 3, 1953, as amended by Protocols No. 11 (ETS 155), which entered into force on November 1, 1998.

764 American Convention on Human Rights, O.A.S. Treaty Series No. 36, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, entered into force July 18, 1978, reprinted in Basic Documents Pertaining to Human Rights in the Inter-American System, OEA/Ser.L.V/II.82 doc.6 rev.1 at 25 (1992).

765 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Report of the Independent Expert on the Situation of Human Rights in Afghanistan, to the Commission on Human Rights, U.N. Doc. E/CN.42005/122 (March 11, 2005); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Report of the Independent Expert of the Commission on Human Rights on the Situation of Human Rights in Afghanistan, to the General Asembly, U.N. Doc. A/59/370 (Sept. 21, 2004).

766 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976.

Thus, the need for inquiry into their legal processes is eliminated, even though some may have certain peculiarities.[767] Precisely because of these reasons, Western states may have a justified reason for slightly opening the door of inquiry if a person is requested by a state that does not adhere to international standards of fairness. This would provide that the inquiry encompasses the overall nature of the system to determine if, in the aggregate, it has in the past and is likely to in the present to offer fundamental fairness, thus excluding any inquiry into specific rights and specific procedures.[768] United States courts, however, have not been sympathetic to the raising of the lack of due process in the requesting state as a basis for opening the rule of non-inquiry.[769]

Another possible exception to the rule of non-inquiry is in the case of the use of torture to gain evidence. Evidence of torture should be held inadmissible under Article 15 of the CAT, which states: "Each State Party shall ensure that any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture shall not be invoked as evidence in any proceedings, except against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made."[770] As no signatory besides the United States objected or made a reservation to this provision, excluding torture evidence used by the United States as a basis for extradition requests will not unduly burden these states.[771] In the domestic context, the First Circuit Court of Appeals has stated:

> It is unthinkable that a statement obtained by torture or by other conduct belonging only in a police state should be admitted at the government's behest in order to bolster its case. This was the thinking of the Jackson court; and precisely because the jury's concern with convicting a guilty defendant might lead it to credit a coerced confession, the Court required a separate hearing. Yet methods offensive when used against an accused do not magically become any less so when exerted against a witness.
>
> > "Due process does not permit one to be convicted upon his own coerced confession. It should not allow him to be convicted upon a confession wrung from another by coercion. [footnote omitted] A conviction supported only by such a confession could be but a variation of trial by ordeal."[772]

The court made the above statement regarding inculpatory statements made by an adverse witness that were given to the jury to consider without first giving the defendant an opportunity to confront the witness or a court determination as to whether the statement was voluntarily made.[773]

---

767 The United States is among the few countries that have the jury system, and the fact that a person would be extradited to a country that does not have a jury system does not mean that the person would be denied a fundamental fairness right that affects the legal quality of a trial's outcome.

768 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976.

769 But see Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824 (11th Cir. 1993) (possibly the only exception, holding "although the combination of delay and other factors could entitle a U.S. citizen subject to extradition to a foreign country to due process protection, that right being superior to the government's treaty obligation, there are no facts present in this case to trigger that right."). The panel also held "there is no due process to a speedy extradition." Id. at 825. See also McMaster v. United States, 9 F.3d 47 (8th Cir. 1993); In re Burt, 737 F.2d 1477 (7th Cir. 1984); Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225 (9th Cir.).

770 CAT, supra note 507, at Art. 15; Meredith Angelson, Note: Beyond the Myth of "Good Faith": Torture Evidence in International Extradition Hearings, 41 N.Y.U.J. Int'l. L. & Pol'y 603, 633–634 (2009).

771 Id. at 633 (also noting that the ICCPR and European Convention on Human Rights have similar evidentiary exclusion provisions regarding the admissibility in extradition hearings of evidence obtained by torture).

772 LaFrance v. Bohlinger, 499 F.2d 29, 34 (1st Cir. 1974).

773 Id. at 32.

The second exception is the humanitarian exception, which was first formulated in Gallina v. Fraser.[774] The humanitarian exception has to do either with the treatment of the person while in the custody of the requesting state, or the penalty. With respect to the latter, it has mostly been applied where the requested state is opposed to the death penalty, and the requesting state carries out the death penalty with respect to the crime for which extradition is sought. Western European states have consistently carved an exception to the rule of non-inquiry, not only with respect to the death penalty in the United States but to "Death-Row Syndrome."[775] States that have ratified the CAT are prohibited under Article 3 from extraditing a person to a state where he/she is likely to be tortured.[776] The United States has created a separate legal approach for dealing with this issue. It has not allowed the issue to be raised at the extradition hearing, but instead before the secretary of state. Consequently, it has changed its nature from that of a legally justiciable issue into an administrative one, which is subject to political considerations. Under the U.S. approach, if a person is requested for extradition to a state likely to torture a person or to subject him/her to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment as provided for in CAT, and for which extradition is explicitly forbidden, the United States has allowed the issue to be decided on an administrative discretionary basis by the secretary of state, subject only to review under the Administrative Procedure Act.[777] Thus, the burden of proof is on the person sought for extradition. That person does not have a right to an administrative hearing before the secretary of state or any administrative judge, however. The only remedy available is for the person in question to show that the secretary of state's decision constitutes an abuse of discretion in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act—a very unsatisfactory way of addressing a binding treaty obligation upon the United States.[778]

United States courts have given great deference to the rule of non-inquiry as discussed throughout this section, preferring to leave such discretionary matters to the secretary of state.[779] To the best of this writer's knowledge, the secretary of state has never exercised discretion in this area, although there could be classified cases where that occurred.[780] There have only been a handful of cases where courts have applied the doctrine of non-inquiry while admitting that

---

774 Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960). See also Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179, 1195 (2d Cir. 1980); United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 360; Netherlands v. Short, 29 I.L.M. 1375, 1383 (Neth. 1990).

775 See supra Sec. 8.4.See also Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by Article 3 would be grossly violated by requesting nation); Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989).

776 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. res. 39/46, [annex, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984)], entered into force June 26, 1987, art. 3.

777 Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 701–706 (2000).

778 Id.

779 Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009, 1014 (9th Cir. 2005), affirming 294 F. Supp.2d 1165 (C.D. Cal. 2003); Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 1322, 1326 (9th Cir. 1997); United States v. Kraiselburd, 786 F.2d 1395, 1399 (9th Cir. 1986); Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169, 175 (1st Cir. 1991) ("discovery is not only discretionary with the court, it is narrow in scope"); Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1407 (9th Cri. 1988). See also Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 834 F.2d 1444, 1452 (9th Cir. 1987) ("in deciding discovery issues in extradition hearings, one consideration is 'whether the resolution of the contested issue would be appreciably advanced by the requested discovery' "), quoting Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 817 n.41 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410, 415 (6th Cir. 1999), citing Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

780 See Ch. XI.

there existed a serious risk of physical harm to the relator.[781] Indeed, in the current U.S. political climate where torture has been used as a tool in the "war on terror," it is unlikely that a relator's interests would play a substantial part in the secretary of state's calculus.[782] In light of the anomalous result that one U.S. court, applying the non-refoulement provision of Article 3 of the CAT, barred the return of an individual to Egypt where he faced torture, another U.S. court refused to consider the prohibition on torture in Article 3 of the CAT when the alleged torturers were members of the U.S. military.[783] Whether a noncitizen can expect relief under similar circumstances remains unresolved, although there is a strong argument to be made that such noncitizens are entitled to protection under the CAT.[784] In short, the prototype of an obvious egregious practice, which would warrant a court to rely on the humanitarian exception to the rule of non-inquiry, has yet to be adjudicated.

The latest pronouncement on the rule of non-inquiry relative to claims of torture was given by the Supreme Court in Munaf v. Geren.[785] The Supreme Court cited this writer for the proposition that concerns regarding possible torture are to be addressed by the political branches rather than the judiciary.[786] The proper vehicle for providing some protection from the practices of a foreign legal system that may not comport with the U.S. Constitution should, according to the Court, be resolved in the treaty-making process to ensure U.S. citizens' procedural rights are protected abroad.[787] More specifically regarding the possibility of a "humanitarian exception" to extradition based on possible mistreatment, the Court stated:

> The Executive Branch may, of course, decline to surrender a detainee for many reasons, including humanitarian ones. Petitioners here allege only the possibility of mistreatment in a prison facility; this is not a more extreme case in which the Executive has determined that a detainee is likely to be tortured but decides to transfer him anyway. Indeed, the Solicitor General states that it is the policy of the United States not to transfer an individual in circumstances where torture is likely to result. Brief for Federal Parties 47; Reply Brief for Federal Parties 23. In these cases the United States explains that, although it remains concerned about torture among some sectors of the Iraqi Government, the State Department has determined that the Justice Ministry—the department that would have authority over Munaf and Omar—as well as its prison and detention facilities have " 'generally met internationally accepted standards for basic prisoner needs.' " Ibid. The Solicitor General explains that such determinations are based on "the Executive's assessment of the foreign country's legal system and . . . the Executive['s] . . . ability to obtain foreign assurances it considers reliable." Brief for Federal Parties 47.
>
> The Judiciary is not suited to second-guess such determinations—determinations that would require federal courts to pass judgment on foreign justice systems and undermine the Government's ability to speak with one voice in this area. See The Federalist No. 42, p 279 (J. Cooke

781 John T. Parry, International Extradition, the Rule of Non-inquiry, and the Problem of Sovereignty, 90 B.U. L. Rev. 1973, 1990–1991 (2010).

782 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalilzation of Torture in the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010).

783 See David Mueller, Comment: Unsafe Haven: Could Article 3 of the U.N. Convention against Torture Prevent the Extradition of Terrorist Suspects to U.S. Custody?, 28 Penn. St. Int'l. L. Rev. 549, 551–553 (2010).

784 For a detailed analysis of the requirements of the CAT regarding torture and the applicability of Article 3 to an individual's situation, as could be applied to detainees alleging torture at the hands of the United States, see generally, Mueller, supra note 783, at 551–553.

785 Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674, 700–705 (2008). For a discussion of the facts, see Ch. II, Sec. 4.5.

786 Id. at 700.

787 Id. at 701.

> ed. 1961) (J. Madison) ("If we are to be one nation in any respect, it clearly ought to be in respect to other nations"). In contrast, the political branches are well situated to consider sensitive foreign policy issues, such as whether there is a serious prospect of torture at the hands of an ally, and what to do about it if there is. As Judge Brown noted, "we need not assume the political branches are oblivious to these concerns. Indeed, the other branches possess significant diplomatic tools and leverage the judiciary lacks." 479 F.3d at 20, n. 6 (dissenting opinion).[788]

Justice Souter's concurring opinion indicated that the Court would be willing to provide U.S. citizens facing transfer from the American military to a foreign government relief in an "extreme case" including circumstances where "the probability of torture is well documented, even if the Executive fails to acknowledge it."[789] Whether the Supreme Court will extend this principle to provide protection to individuals in an extradition or removal context remains to be seen. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has considered the implications of Munaf in the context of extending the rule of non-inquiry beyond extradition.[790] Although it ultimately concluded that Munaf's reasoning did not apply to the CAT context presented in Khouzam, the Third Circuit decision illustrates the ambiguities left unresolved by the Supreme Court regarding how far the rule of non-inquiry should extend in proceedings involving the formal transfer of persons between or among states. The idea discussed above, that the judiciary may lack the institutional competence to adjudicate the prospective treatment of the relator upon transfer, defies logic, as the same federal courts carry out this very inquiry on a regular basis at the Federal Court of Appeals level.[791] One commentator has noted that the Supreme Court in Munaf opened the door to inquiry in a small number of cases where torture was possible, but that the broad statements made therein have created tensions that the federal courts must now resolve, such as what standard of review a court should apply to ensure the decision by the executive in such a case is not arbitrary.[792] As illustrated above, a circuit split is beginning to form regarding the ability of courts to review the executive's determination regarding torture and CAT claims. The Supreme Court may review the issue in the near future to provide necessary clarity, especially given the executive's concern over review of situations involving possible torture, as has been discussed throughout this book.

It should be noted on a procedural level that the issue of an exception to the rule of non-inquiry arises in the context of a request for discovery.[793] Discovery is not only finite, but discretionary. Extradition proceedings are limited and do not involve the adjudication of guilt or innocence.[794]

A final case of note is the Sixth Circuit case of Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky,[795] which involved essentially two issues. The first was whether the government's attorneys failed to disclose exculpatory information in their possession at extradition proceedings.[796] Second and related to the first question, was whether Demjanjuk was the person who was charged with the commission of the extraditable offense. The identification of the person sought is obviously pivotal to any extradition proceedings, and quite clearly if the government has any

---

788 Id. at 702–703.

789 Munaf, 553 U.S. at 706 (Souter, J. concurring).

790 Khouzam v. Chertoff, 549 F.3d 245, 254 (3d Cir. 2008).

791 See Parry, supra note 781, at 2004–2006.

792 Id. at 2016–2017.

793 See Ch. IX, Sec. 13.

794 Id.

795 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

796 Id. at 339.

information showing that the person brought before extradition proceedings is not the one who is wanted by the requesting state in accordance with the extradition request and the crime charged, then it has an obligation to disclose it. In this case, discovery is appropriate, but it differs from seeking discovery in order to determine whether in the requesting state the person sought will be denied procedural fundamental fairness, and/or will be treated in a manner that violates the CAT and other cruel inhuman, degrading treatment (the humanitarian exception).[797]

797 In 2005 the Ninth Circuit, in Prasoprat v. Benov, upheld the restrictive view concerning the rule of non-inquiry. Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009, 1014 (9th Cir. 2005), aff'g 294 F. Supp. 2d 1165 (C.D. Cal. 2003) (holding that an inquiry into the possible application of the death penalty for a drug violation was not the type of obvious egregious treatment that would fall within the meaning of the humanitarian exception). See, e.g., Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 817 n.41 (9th Cir. 1986) (inquiring into discovery reflected the same issue argued at the hearing that the United Kingdom had suspended fundamental fairness rights in connection with IRA investigations and prosecutions by subjecting individuals who were related to IRA terrorism to torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.)

Chapter VIII

Denial of Extradition: Defenses, Exceptions, Exemptions, and Exclusions

Contents

1. Introduction

Extradition will be denied if any of the substantive requirements[1] or formalities of the practice[2] are not met. In addition, extradition will be denied by reason of the existence of certain specific exceptions, exemptions, exclusions, and defenses that arise out of a treaty or other legal bases. This chapter deals with these specific factors, which constitute grounds for denial of an extradition request that has otherwise met all substantive and formal requirements.

The theoretical foundations of these exceptions, exemptions, exclusions, and defenses vary. They can be distinguished substantively, but they result in the same outcome in that they constitute grounds for denial of the request.

There are four categories of such grounds that, if found to exist, result in denial of an extradition request. They are:

1. Grounds relating to the offense charged:
   a. political;
   b. military; and
   c. fiscal.
2. Grounds relating to the relator:
   a. nationals; and
   b. persons performing official acts and persons protected by special immunity.
3. Grounds relating to the criminal charge or to prosecution of the offense charged:
   a. legality of the offense charged;
   b. double jeopardy;
   c. statute of limitations;
   d. speedy trial;
   e. immunity and plea bargain;
   f. amnesty and pardon; and
   g. trial in absentia.
4. Grounds relating to the penalty and punishability of the relator:
   a. cruel and unusual punishment; and
   b. death penalty.

A fifth category could also be suggested that relates to the expected or anticipated violation of the relator's human rights by the requested state.[3] These potential violations are found in the human rights program as expressed in the United Nations Charter; the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the two United Nations covenants on civil and political rights, and economic, social and cultural rights; multilateral treaties; and in other sources of international law that constitute a scheme for the protection of minimum standards of human rights.[4] However, because these rights also find some of their application in the four categories described above, they are dealt with therein. This methodological choice is dictated by the contemporary state of extradition

1 See Ch. VII.

2 See Ch. IX.

3 See Report of the Committee on Extradition and Human Rights, ILA 67th Conference, Helsinki, May 1996. See also Christine Van Den Wijngaert, The Political Offence Exception to Extradition 89–93 (1980).

4 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. Res. 2200, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 6, U.N. Doc. A/6316, at 49 (1976); International Covenant on Economic and Social Rights, G.A. Res. 2200, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 6, U.N. Doc. A/6316, at 49 (1976); law and practice, which does not recognize the applicability of those minimum standards of human rights to its existing processes,[5] except in the case of asylum[6] and the grounds for denial. These specific exceptions, exemption, exclusions, and defenses are included in extradition treaties, the applicable national legislation, or in the jurisprudence of U.S. courts (as derivatives of treaty rights or constitutional guarantees). Because U.S. legislation does not comprehensively cover such grounds for denial of extradition, the applicable treaty will apply in each case in addition to relevant constitutional provisions. There is therefore no uniformity on these questions.

As a general rule in U.S. practice, the extradition judge will first turn to the treaty to identify any existing defenses, exceptions, exemptions, and exclusions, which some decisions cumulatively refer to as defenses.[7] However, the narrow view that there are 'no defenses' outside that which a treaty provides, ignores the fact that the United States is obligated under other multilateral treaties, such as the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Punishment (CAT).[8]

1.1. The Position of the American Law Institute: The Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States[9]

The American Law Institute has adopted the following statement on grounds for refusal of extradition:

> § 476. Grounds for Refusing Extradition
>
> Under most international agreements, state laws, and state practice:
>
> 1. A person sought for prosecution or for enforcement of a sentence will not be extradited
>
> (a) without a showing that there is cause for holding him for trial for the offense with which he is charged, or that he has been duly convicted of the offense;
>
> (b) if prosecution in the requesting state would be, or was, in contravention of an applicable principle of double jeopardy;
>
> (c) if the offense with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted is not punishable as a serious crime in both the requesting and the requested state; or
>
> (d) if the applicable period of limitation has expired.

American Convention on Human Rights, opened for signature, Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Off. Rec. OEA/Ser. K/SVI/1.1, O.A.S.T.S. No. 36, O.A.S. Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (Jan. 7, 1970); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221; Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217, U.N. Doc. A/810, at 71 (1948) See also The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1994) [hereinafter Bassiouni Compendium].

5 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8 (discussing rule of non-inquiry).

6 See Ch. III.

7 See DeSilva v. DiLeonardi, 125 F.3d 1110, 1112 (7th Cir. 1997), citing Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922); Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312 (1925) (Holmes, J.); ("The alleged fugitive from justice has had his hearing and habeas corpus is available only to inquire whether the magistrate had jurisdiction, whether the offence charged is within the treaty and, by a somewhat liberal extension, whether there was any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty.").

8 United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, December 7, 1984, G.A. Res. 39/46 Annex, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1984/72, Annex (1984), reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984). Consequently, the opinion written by Judge Easterbrook mentioned in note 7 above, DeSilva at 1112, is not entirely accurate. Moreover, there could be "defenses" established by statute, and certainly the Supreme Court could find that some provisions of the Constitution may be deemed applicable.

9 Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations (1987) (hereinafter Restatement (Third)).

2. A person will not be extradited if the offense with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted is a political offense.

3. A state may defer extradition of a person if it is itself holding him for prosecution or punishment for a serious crime, whether or not that crime is connected with the crime for which extradition is sought.

Comment:

(a) Conditions for extradition. The law of extradition as reflected in treaties and statutes, § 475, Comment a [reprinted in Ch. I], balances the demands of the international legal order that serious crime not go unpunished with concern that persons accused of crime not be subjected to unfair methods of adjudication or punishment. This section and § 477 [reprinted in Ch. VII] set forth principles contained, expressly or by implication, in a substantial majority of extradition treaties and statutes, and followed by states even in the absence of treaty or statute. Where an applicable treaty expressly provides otherwise, one or more of the conditions here set forth may not apply.

Although most treaties do not make express provision for judicial hearings, the nearly universal practice is that some type of judicial hearing is provided in the requested state, to insure that the conditions for extradition are complied with. In addition, the executive branch of the requested state generally exercises review, either before or after the judicial hearing, to see that the restraints on extradition are not transgressed.

Extradition ordinarily is initiated by a request transmitted through diplomatic channels. Though the obligations in an extradition treaty run from state to state, typically observance of the requirements and conditions for extradition may be invoked by the person sought to be extradited. In general, a determination as to whether particular defenses to extradition apply is made by the courts or other authorities of the requested state.

In most states, including the United States, if a request for extradition is denied, whether by the executive or by the courts, the requesting state may renew its application, for example on the basis of additional evidence or to cure a technical defect in the extradition papers. In some states, a refusal to extradite bars further efforts to have the person extradited to the same requesting state for the same offense.

(b) Required showing of extraditability. [See Ch. IX.] Extradition laws and treaties use various formulations to describe the proof required to support extradition. Under United States law and treaties, the standard is generally such evidence of criminality as would justify the requested state in holding the accused for trial if the act had been committed within its jurisdiction. In Great Britain and states following the British model, the standard is stricter, equivalent to a prima facie case, i.e., such showing as, in the absence of a defense, would be required for committal of the accused. Among some states, including the parties to the European Convention on Extradition inter se, no review of the evidence is conducted in the requested state.

An extradition hearing, Comment a, is not a trial. Ordinarily, the accused is entitled to introduce evidence only to establish that he is not the person whose extradition is sought; that he is a national of the requested state, if the applicable law or treaty precludes extradition of such nationals; that the crime with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted is not covered by the treaty under which extradition is sought; or that he is not extraditable by reason of one of the provisions of this section. Evidence going to the merits of the charge, including an alibi, a challenge to the veracity of the prosecution witnesses, or justification, duress, insanity, or lack of criminal intent, ordinarily is not admitted in an extradition hearing, on the ground that guilt or innocence is most suitably determined by a court of the state whose law is alleged to have been violated. In some instances, however, the court in the requested state has permitted challenge to the fairness of the procedure or the veracity of the assertions made in support of the request for extradition. See, e.g., § 478 [reprinted in Ch. X], Reporters' Note 2.

With respect to persons whose extradition is sought after conviction in the requesting state, the requirement of Subsection (1)(a) is met by proof of the judgment of conviction and, where applicable, of sentence. For convictions in absentia, see § 475, Comment h.

(c) Double jeopardy. [See infra Sec. 4.3]. The principle that a person should not be subject to double jeopardy is common to legal systems generally and in many countries is constitutionally mandated. Under most treaties, the requested state does not extradite a person if he has already been prosecuted in that state for the acts on the basis of which extradition is sought, whether that prosecution resulted in conviction or acquittal. Some laws and treaties also preclude extradition if the person sought for prosecution has previously been prosecuted for the same offense in the requesting state; some preclude extradition if the person sought has been prosecuted in a third state. The rule of Subsection (1)(b) applies to persons who have been convicted upon prosecution that was in violation of the principle of double jeopardy, as well as where between conviction and enforcement of the sentence in the requesting state the person has been convicted and served a sentence for the same offense in another state.

In general, it is not the denomination of the crime but the act constituting the crime that determines whether the principle of double jeopardy—ne bis in idem in international usage—is applicable. For those states parties to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (see Introductory Note to Part VIII), the prohibition against double jeopardy in Article 14(7) may be applicable even if not spelled out in an applicable extradition treaty.

(d) Double criminality principle. [See Ch. VII, Sec. 2]. Double criminality is required expressly or by implication in the great majority of extradition treaties, and is usually a condition as well for extradition by states that extradite without or apart from treaties under a regime of reciprocity. Under this principle, extradition does not go forward unless the acts charged constitute a serious crime, § 475, Comment c, under the law of both the requesting and the requested state. This requirement is not necessarily met by the fact that the offense charged falls within the definition of extraditable offenses or appears in a schedule of offenses in an applicable treaty. For instance, if perjury is a crime in both states and is specified in the treaty, but in the requested state it is defined as swearing falsely in court while in the requesting state it includes swearing falsely before a government official or legislative hearing, only a charge of swearing falsely in court will satisfy the double criminality rule. See Reporters' Note 1. However, the fact that a particular act is classified differently in the criminal law of the two states would not prevent extradition under the double criminality rule. For instance, if the requesting state charged the person sought with embezzlement but the acts alleged would constitute larceny by trick or fraud in the requested state, extradition would be required.

To satisfy the double criminality principle, the offense charged must have been a serious crime in both states at the time it was committed. Extradition is not precluded by the fact that the treaty pursuant to which extradition is sought entered into force, or was amended to include the crime in question, after the act was committed.

In general, unless a plausible challenge is raised by the person sought, the authorities in the requested state will presume that the acts alleged constitute a crime under the law of the requesting state, and will consider whether the acts alleged constitute a crime under the law of the requested state. The fact that defenses may be available in the requested state that would not be available in the requesting state, or that different requirements of proof are applicable in the two states, does not defeat extradition under the double criminality principle.

If extraditable offenses are defined in the applicable treaty in terms of permissible punishment—for instance, "offenses punished by imprisonment for one year or more"—and the person whose extradition is sought has already been convicted and sentenced, the critical element for purposes of the double criminality principle is the possible sentence under the requesting state's law, not the sentence actually imposed or remaining to be served. However, many treaties preclude extradition if the time left to be served under the sentence is less than a specified period, such as six months.

(e) Extradition and periods of limitation. [See infra Sec. 4.4]. Nearly all extradition treaties provide for the effect of the passage of time. Many bilateral treaties, and the European Convention on Extradition, Introductory Note to this Subchapter, note 3, preclude extradition if prosecution for the offense charged, or enforcement of the penalty, has become barred by lapse of time under the applicable law. Under some treaties the applicable law is that of the requested state, in others that of the requesting state; under some treaties extradition is precluded if either state's statute of limitations has run. The United States is party to treaties of all three types. When a treaty provides for time-bar only under the law of the requesting state, or only under the law of the requested state, United States courts have generally held that time-bar of the state not mentioned does not bar extradition. See Reporters' Note 3. If the treaty contains no reference to the effect of a lapse of time, neither state's statute of limitations will be applied.

For purposes of applying statutes of limitation to requests for extradition in accordance with Subsection (1)(d), the period is generally calculated from the time of the alleged commission of the offense to the time of the warrant, arrest, indictment, or similar step taken in the requesting state, or of the filing of the request for extradition, whichever occurs first. The period may be tolled if the accused has fled from the requesting state or concealed his whereabouts. For differing interpretations of flight or concealment for this purpose, see Reporters' Note 3.

Under the law of the United States and of most common law countries, there is no period of limitations for enforcement of sentences, so that if a person is duly convicted and escapes, either from confinement or pending confinement, he may be returned to serve out his sentence, regardless of when he is captured or when a request is made for his extradition. Under the law of many civil law states, a fugitive from custody who remains at large for the period of his sentence plus a specific additional time may not be returned to custody. When such a law is applicable under a treaty, either as law of the requested or as law of the requesting state, the period of time between escape and recapture must be taken into account in determining whether the treaty requires extradition.

(f) Trial in ordinary courts. [See infra Sec. 2.2]. States are not required to, and normally do not, extradite civilians sought for prosecution before an extraordinary tribunal or court, including a military court, and they extradite military personnel only for common crimes, not for purely military offenses. In general, any substantial departure from the ordinary procedures applicable to prosecution and punishment of serious crimes in the requesting state may be a basis for refusing extradition. The surrender of military personnel of one state stationed in another state is not governed by the rules of extradition, but is generally provided for in Status of Forces or comparable agreements. See § 422 Reporters' Notes 4 and 5. However, persons formerly in military service may be extradited for crimes committed while they were in military service.

(g) Political offense exclusion. [See infra Sec. 2.1]. The substance of Subsection (2) is contained in virtually all extradition treaties (except those between Communist states), and reflects also the practice of states that extradite without a treaty. The definition of "political offense" for purposes of extradition has been subject to various understandings in different states and at different times. See Reporters' Note 5. It may cover both "pure" political acts and so-called "relative" political offense, i.e., ordinary crimes undertaken from political motive, Reporters' Note 4. Some treaties provide that specified offenses may not be classified as political regardless of motive. See § 475, Reporters' Note 5, and Reporters' Note 6 to this section.

(h) Danger of persecution or unfair trial. [See infra Sec. 4]. Extradition is generally refused if the requested state has reason to believe that extradition is requested for purposes of persecution, or because the person sought belongs to a particular political movement or organization, or if there is substantial ground for believing that the person sought will not receive a fair trial in the requesting state. See § 475, Comment g. In the case of a refugee, as defined, extradition to a state where the individual would be subject to persecution may also be prohibited by the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, and the Protocol thereto, § 711, Reporters' Note 7.

(i) Deferred and temporary extradition. [See infra Ch. X]. If criminal proceedings are pending in the requested state with respect to a person sought for extradition, or if he is serving a sentence there, the extradition hearing may nevertheless go forward and a determination may be made as to whether the request is well founded. If the person sought is determined to be extraditable, but extradition is deferred under Subsection (3), extradition may take place after conclusion of the proceedings against him in the requested state and the service of any sentence imposed upon him, subject to an applicable principle against double jeopardy, Subsection (1)(b) and Comment c.

Under some extradition treaties, the parties may make arrangements that a person serving a sentence in the requested state be extradited to the requesting state for prosecution of charges there pending against him while the evidence is fresh; that he then be returned to the requested state to serve the remainder of his sentence; and, if he is convicted in the requesting state, that he be re-extradited to the requesting state following completion of his sentence in the requested state. See 6 Whiteman, Digest of International Law 1052–53 (1968).[10]

2. Grounds Relating to the Offense Charged

2.1. The Political Offense Exception

2.1.1. Historical Development and Meaning

Historically, extradition was the means to which states resorted for the surrender of political offenders. These individuals were guilty of crimes of lèse-majesté, which included, inter alia, treason, attempts against the monarchy or the life of a monarch, and even contemptuous behavior toward the monarch.[11] The first known European political offense was reached in accordance with the laws of the requested state. This development gave rise to the increased role of the judiciary in the practice, which, except for England and Belgium since 1833, had played no part in the process.[12] A treaty that dealt with the surrender of political offenders was entered into in 1174 between England and Scotland.[13] It was followed by a treaty in 1305 between France and Savoy.[14] In the 1600s, Hugo Grotius gave the practice a theoretical framework, which is still the cornerstone of classic extradition law.[15] Until the nineteenth century, extradition constituted a manifestation of cooperation between the family of nations, as attested by various alliances in existence between the reigning families of Europe.[16] The French Revolution

---

10 Restatement (Third) § 476

11 See Christopher Pyle, Extradition, Politics and Human Rights (2002); Christine Van den Wyngaert, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition: How to Plug the "Terrorists" Loophole' without Departing from Fundamental Human Rights, in International Criminal Law and Procedure (John Dugard & Christine van den Wyngaert eds., 1996); Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law 166–169 (1971); Harvard Research in International Law, Extradition, 29 Am. J. Int'l. L. 108 (Supp. 1935) [hereinafter Harvard Draft]. See generally Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition and Transnational Terrorists: Old Doctrine Reformulated and New Norms Created, 1 Am. Soc'y Int'l Law 1 (1977); Marcella D. Malik, Comment, Unraveling the Gordian Knot: The United States Law of International Extradition and the Political Offense Exception, 3 Fordham Int'l L. J. 141 (1980).

12 The Belgian courts were given limited judicial control with the passage of the Extradition Act of 1833. Other countries introduced judicial control much later: England and Luxembourg in 1870, the Netherlands in 1875, Switzerland in 1892, France in 1927, and Germany in 1929. Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 12.

13 Extradition Treaty, Dec. 8, 1174, Eng.–Scot., reprinted in 1 Corps Universal Diplomatique du Droit des Gens 92 (J. Dumont ed., 1726). See Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition in British Practice, 1174–1194, 1964 Ind. Y.B. Int'l Aff., 80–81.

14 Extradition Treaty, May 20, 1303, Eng.–Fr., reprinted in 1 Corps Universal Diplomatique de Droit des Gens, supra note 11, at 334. See Andre Rolin, Quelques Questions Relatives à L'Extradition, 1 Rec. Cours Acad. D. Int'l 197 (1925).

15 Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis bk. 11, ch. 21, § 5 (1625) (enforcing extradition as used for crimes that affect public order, or which are atrociously criminal).

16 This practice continued into the nineteenth century. In 1834, the so-called "Holy Alliance" (Russia, Austria, and Prussia) concluded a treaty for the extradition of crimes such as high treason, lèse-majesté, of 1789 and its aftermath started the transformation of what was the extraditable offense par excellence into what has is now the non-extraditable offense par excellence. In 1833, Belgium became the first country to enact a law on non-extradition of political offenders,[17] and by the beginning of the twentieth century almost every European extradition treaty contained an exception for political offenses.[18] By 1875, the practice was sufficiently established that the determination of what constituted a political offense was reached in accordance with the laws of the requested state.

The political offense exception is now a standard clause in almost all extradition treaties of the world, and is also specified in the municipal laws of many states.[19] Questions involving armed revolt, and acts against the safety of the throne. See André Billot, Traité de L'Extradition 108 (1874).

---

17 The Belgian Extradition Act of October 1, 1833, reprinted in Official Bulletin (Belg.), No. 77 (1833) (unofficial translation), quoted in Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 362–363. See also Lhassa Oppenheim, International Law 704, 706 (Hersch Lauterpacht ed., 8th ed. 1955); Carbonneau, supra note 11, at 7.

18 The first treaty containing the political offense exception was between Belgium and France in their treaty of 1834. Extradition Treaty, Nov. 22, 1834, Belg.–Fr., art. 5, 84 Consol. T.S. 457, 562. For an in-depth analysis of the historical background of the political offense exception in the American treaty process, see Malik, supra note 11.

19 Marjorie Whiteman writes:

> Most extradition laws and treaties provide that extradition need not or shall not be granted when the acts with which the accused is charged constitute a political offense or an act connected with a political offense. Generally, a distinction is drawn between "purely" political offenses (e.g., treason, sedition) and "relative" political offenses or offenses "of a political character" (e.g., murder committed in the course of a rebellion), although generally both types are excepted from extradition . . . In the case of laws and treaties which contain a list of specific offenses for which extradition shall be granted, exception of "purely" political offenses is usually considered unnecessary since such offenses may be excepted by merely not being included in the list. However, provision is often made regarding "relative" political offenses.

Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law (1963), § 15 at 800 [hereinafter Whiteman Digest]. See also Satya D. Bedi, Extradition in International Law and Practice 179–191 (1968); Shearer, supra note 11, at 166–198; Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 21 107. Typical of the language of the political exception is that found in the extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States:

> (1) Extradition shall not be granted if . . . (c)(i) the offense for which extradition is requested is regarded by the requested party as one of a political character; or (ii) the person sought proves that the request for his extradition has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him for an offense of a political character.

Extradition Treaty, June 8–Oct. 21, 1972, U.S.–U.K., art. 5, 28 U.S.T. 227, 230 (entered into force Jan. 21, 1977). Similarly, the extradition treaty between the United States and Japan states:

> Extradition shall not be granted under this Treaty in any of the following circumstances:
>
> (1) When the offense for which extradition is requested is a political offense or when it appears that the request for extradition is made with a view to prosecuting, trying or punishing the person sought for a political offense. If any question arises as to the application of this provision, the decision of the requested Party shall prevail.

Extradition Treaty, Jan. 21, 1972, U.S.–Japan, 31 U.S.T. 892 (entered into force Mar. 26, 1980). Other extradition treaties add a list of offenses that are exempted from the political offense exception. For example, the treaty between the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States includes such a list:

> (1) Extradition shall not be granted if the offense in respect of which it is requested is regarded by the Requested State as a political offense, an offense of a political character or as an offense connected with such an offense.

the "political offense exception" are, like mixed questions of law and fact, subject to a de novo review on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.[20]

Interestingly, however, the rise of terrorism and other forms of international and transnational criminality is causing some governments to make an about-face and to seek to exclude the exception for international crimes and for serious crimes of violence.[21]

---

(2) Extradition also shall not be granted if the Requested State has substantial grounds for believing that the request for extradition has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish the person sought for an offense mentioned in paragraph (1).

(3) For the purpose of this Treaty the following offenses shall not be deemed to be offenses within the meaning of paragraph (1):

(a) A murder or other willful crime, punishable under the laws of both Contracting Parties by a penalty of at least one year, against the life or physical integrity of a Head of State or Head of Government of one of the Contracting Parties or of a member of his family, including attempts to commit such as offense, except in open combat;

(b) An offense which the Contracting Parties or the Requesting State have the obligation to prosecute by reason of a multilateral international agreement.

Extradition Treaty, June 20, 1978, U.S.–F.R.G., 32 U.S.T. 1485 (entered into force Aug. 29, 1980). The extradition treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States also incorporates such a list of exemptions from the political offense exception, but includes a clause vesting the determination of political offenses in the executive:

(1) Extradition shall not be granted when the offense for which it is requested is political or of a political character. [If any question arises as to the application of the foregoing paragraph, the Executive authority of the requested Party shall decide.]

(2) For the purpose of this Treaty, the following offenses shall not be considered to be offenses included in paragraph (1):

(a) The murder or other willful crime against the life or physical integrity of a Head of State or Head of Government or of his family, including attempts to commit such an offense.

(b) An offense which the Contracting Parties may have the obligation to prosecute by reason of a multilateral international agreement.

(3) Extradition shall not be granted when the offense for which extradition is requested is a purely military offense.

Extradition Treaty, May 4, 1978, U.S.–Mex. 31 U.S.T. 5059 (entered into force Jan. 25, 1980).

20 See Ch. XII (habeas corpus).

21 See Kenneth S. Sternberg & David L. Skelding, State Department Determinations of Political Offenses: Death Knell for the Political Offense Exception in Extradition Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 137 (1983) (recognizing that international events might enable terrorists to avoid extradition under the political offense exception and proposing that political offense exceptions should be narrowed by Congress to exclude terrorist acts from the protection of the political offense exception). For examples of treaty provisions excluding terrorist offenses from the political offense exception, see Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 4(2), entered into force Mar. 18,1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5 ("For purposes of this Treaty, the following offenses shall not be considered to be political offenses: a. a murder or other willful crime against the person of a Head of State of one of the Contracting Parties, or a member of the Head of State's family; . . . c. murder, manslaughter, or other offense involving substantial bodily harm; d. an offense involving kidnaping or any form of unlawful detention, including the taking of a hostage; e. placing or using an explosive, incendiary or destructive device capable of endangering life, of causing substantial bodily harm, or of causing substantial property damage; and f. a conspiracy or any type of association to commit offenses as specified in Article 2, paragraph 2, or attempt to commit, or participation in the commission of, any of the foregoing offenses"); Polish Extradition Treaty, art.5(2), entered into force Sept. 17, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-14 (murder or other offense against heads of

Even though widely recognized, the very term "political offense" is seldom defined in treaties or national legislation, and judicial interpretations have been the principal source for its meaning and application.[22] This may be due to the fact that whether a particular type of conduct falls within that category depends essentially on the facts and circumstances of the occurrence. Thus, by its very nature it eludes a precise definition, which could restrict the flexibility needed to assess the facts and circumstances of each case.[23]

As a consequence of the preeminent role played by the judiciary in defining and applying this exception, the courts of the requested state unavoidably apply national conceptions, standards, and policies to an inquiry that relates to a process transcending the interests of that one participant.[24] The term "political offense," according to Oppenheim, was unknown to international law until the French Revolution,[25] and even when the European practice was to secure the surrender of political offenders, the term was not employed.[26] state or their families; murder, manslaughter, assault; kidnaping, abduction, hostage taking; bombing; or attempt or conspiracy to commit any of those offenses); Extradition Treaty with Luxembourg, art. 4(2), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-10, TIAS 12804 (virtually the same); Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 4(2)(a), entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17 (violent crimes against a Head of State or a member of his or her family). See also Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties at 7, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

---

22 Lora L. Deere, Political Offenses in the Law and Practice of Extradition, 27 Am. J. Int'l L. 247, 250 (1933). See also Alona E. Evans, Reflections upon the Political Offense in International Practice, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 1, 15 (1963); Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Nature of Political Offenses: A Knotty Problem of Extradition Law, 48 Va. L. Rev. 1226, 1230 (1962) [hereinafter Nature of Political Offenses]; Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Present Status of Political Offenses in the Law of Extradition and Asylum, 14 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 371, 371–372 (1953). But recently there has been a movement in the United States to transfer the discretionary power to determine political offenses from the judiciary to the executive branch. See Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d. 504, 513 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). Proposed Amendment No. 2373 to S. 1772, Criminal Code Reform. Two bills, each cited as Extradition Act of 1981, were proposed amendments to chapter 209, title 18, United States Code. H.R. 5227, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982); S. 1639, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981). This effort failed, however. See William M. Hannay, Legislative Reform of U.S. Extradition Statutes: Plugging the Terrorist's Loophole, 13 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 53 (1983).

23 Nature of Political Offenses, supra note 22, at 1229. On December 14, 1990, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted four model treaties on international cooperation in criminal matters. One of these treaties deals with extradition; human rights considerations weigh heavily in the mandatory and optional grounds for refusal set forth in the treaty. Model Treaty on Extradition, arts. 3, 4, Dec. 14, 1990, 30 I.L.M. 1407, reprinted in Bert Swart, Refusal of Extradition and the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition, 1992 Netherlands Y.B. Int'l L. 75 [hereinafter U.N. Model Extradition Treaty]. Article 3(a) of the model treaty states that extradition shall not be granted if the offense for which extradition is requested is regarded by the requested state as an offense of a political nature. The model does not attempt to define the political offence, but requires that where an extradition request is for a political offense the requested state not surrender the individual. In other words, the model treaty makes non-extradition for political offenses mandatory, not optional. However, a footnote has been added to the model, suggesting two different limitations to the exception. On one hand, countries may choose to exclude "any offense in respect of which the Parties have assumed an obligation, pursuant to any multilateral convention, to take prosecutorial action where they do not extradite." Furthermore, the note adds that other offenses, which the parties have agreed not to consider as political offenses for the purpose of extradition, may be excluded. Id. at 186–187.

24 Evans, supra note 22, at 17.

25 Oppenheim, supra note 17, at 704.

26 See Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 5–6 (referring to treaties contemplating the surrender of political offenders and not common criminals, as in the Treaty of 1179 between Henry II, King of

The history of the political offense exception is inexorably linked to the rise of eighteenth-century political theories on freedom, democracy, and the right to rebel against oppression.[27] Since then, the development of this exception has been intricately linked to asylum,[28] even though prior to the eighteenth century, this relationship was very tenuous. Indeed asylum, as practiced in the Mediterranean Basin (Egypt, Mesopotamia, Greece, and Rome), had little resemblance to the later European practice bearing the same nomenclature.

The introduction of the political offense exception in the practice of extradition, after Belgium's legislative initiative in 1833, was aptly discussed in the case of In re Fabijan,[29] where in 1933 the Supreme Court of Germany stated:

> What the Belgian legislature understood by the term "political offense" is to be ascertained from the Belgian public and criminal law of the time when the law of 1833 was made. . . . Using the term not in the legal sense but as it is understood in politics, the legislature meant essentially high treason, capital treason, acts against the external security of the state, rebellion and incitement to civil war. . . .Since these acts, because they were political, were not listed among the offenses and crimes enumerated in Article I of the law and were thus not extraditable, it was not necessary to provide specifically in Article 6 that no extradition was admissible in respect of political offenses. This followed also from the so-called principle of identity of extradition and prosecution, laid down elsewhere in the law. [Double criminality is discussed supra Ch. VII.] But special mention of the matter had to be made because the legislature did not merely wish to exclude from extradition offenses against the state, but also certain connected offenses. It was considered that an offense against the state, especially when it took the form of an armed rising against the existing state authority, ought (in order to make the principle of nonextradition effective) to embrace other acts attending it and contributory crimes in themselves, in particular offenses against life and property, as well as offenses respecting the person and liberty of the individual. For persons committing such offenses in connection with and in furtherance of an offense against the state appeared to be not less deserving of asylum than the principle actors themselves. Looked at alone, such offenses are "ordinary offenses." By them the Belgian legislature meant such offenses as were "ordinary" crimes and were closely connected with a "political" offense. . . The term "connected offense" is clearly borrowed from Article 227 of the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, where it is used with reference to the joinder of several counts in one indictment. In the Law of Extradition, just as in the Code of Criminal Procedure, the term refers to a plurality of criminal acts which are connected by some common feature. It follows from this that an offense against the state in the above sense must actually exist and have taken shape. "Connection" exists if another offense, itself an "ordinary" offense, stands in a particular relation to this "principal fact." A purely external connection—identity of time, place, occasion or person—is not alone enough; rather, what is required is a conscious and deliberate relation of cause and effect. The "ordinary" criminal act must, in fact, have been a means, method or cloak England, and William, King of Scotland, and the Treaty of Paris of 1303 between the English and French kings). This history is described in O'Higgins, supra note 13. See also Edward Clarke, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 18–22 (4th ed. 1903) [hereinafter Clarke Treatise]; Arthur Nussbaum, A Concise History of the Law of Nations 214–215 (1954); Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition in British Practice, 1174–1794, 13 Ind. Y.B. Int'l Aff. 78 (1964) (showing "treason" and "rebellion," the two main extraditable offenses, as nonpolitical, even though they are both deemed examples of political offenses par excellence); Charles de Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public International Law 243 (1957). As late as 1834, a treaty among Austria, Prussia, and Russia called for the surrender of persons accused of high treason, armed rebellion, acts against the security of the throne or the government, and acts of lèse-majesté. See 15 G.F. de Martens, Nouveau Recueil Général de Traités (Gottingue, Dieterich 1841).

---

27 See Van den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 8–9; Carbonneau, supra note 11, at 5.

28 See Ch. III.

29 7 Ann. Dig. 360 (Sup. Ct. 1933) (Germany).

> for the carrying out of the "political" offense. To this extent—and to this extent only—the political object of the criminal is relevant for the determination of the question whether his crime is a "connected" act. The antithesis of a "connected" offense is an "isolated" offense, e.g., the murder of a statesman unconnected—or at least without the connection being discerned—with any political revolt. Such "isolated" offenses are extraditable notwithstanding that the motive is political; political asylum does not extend to them.[30]

After Belgium's legislative initiative in 1833, France,[31] and Switzerland[32] enacted similar laws in 1834, and England followed suit in 1870.[33] Initially, the only related U.S. legislation was the provision on political asylum in immigration statutes,[34] but the United States made the exception part of its practice in 1843.[35]

2.1.2. Ideologically Motivated Offenders and Political Offenses[36]

To secure their institutions, societies have devised laws to punish those who seek to affect the existence or functioning of these institutions. These laws may be designed to preclude change altogether or to prevent change by certain means. They are enacted to protect a given social interest and presuppose a value judgment as to the social significance of what is sought to be preserved.[37] Paradoxically, those who violate these laws are usually committed to affecting the very interest sought to be preserved and do not perceive their conduct as morally blameworthy. Indeed, the converse is almost always true. Such an offender is referred to as the ideologically motivated offender. This type of an offender denies the legality of the system, the legitimacy of a given law or the social order it seeks to protect, claiming adherence to a higher legitimating principle.[38] This perception may be based on commonly understood ideals of political freedom or other specific notions, which may or may not reflect the common values of the ordinary reasonable person in that society or in internationally recognized minimum standards of human rights. This type of violation of the law is, therefore, incidental to the ideological or political purposes of the offender and the social order that he/she confronts with such conduct. In a democratic society, where laws are said to embody social values and to change accordingly, the element of social or moral blameworthiness will depend largely on the degree to which the violated law truly embodies prevailing social values. This is particularly true with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws, but even among such laws distinctions must be made.

Throughout the history of mankind, organized societies have characterized certain forms of behavior as offensive to their common morality. These forms of behavior have invariably included that which harmfully affects a commonly shared interest, perceived by almost every 30 Id. at 363–365. See Billot, supra note 16, at 109; Shearer, supra note 11.

---

31 Law of March 10, 1927, tit. 1, art. 5, para. 2, in Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 380–381.

32 Federal Extradition Law of Jan. 22, 1892, art. 10, in Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 423.

33 33 & 34 Vict., ch. 52.

34 See Ch. III.

35 William M. Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols and Agreements between the United States of America and Other Powers 526 (1910). See also John B. Moore, Digest of International Law (1901) [hereinafter Moore Digest] § 604 at 332.

36 This section is based in part on M. Cherif Bassiouni, Ideologically Motivated Offenses and the Political Offense Exception in Extradition—A Proposed Juridical Standard for an Unruly Problem, 19 DePaul L. Rev. 217, 218–226 (1969).

37 Id. at 228. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Political Offense Exception in Extradition Law and Practice, in International Terrorism and Political Crimes 398 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1975); Remmelinck, Politieke Delicten, in Vrijheid en Recht 177–180 (1975), cited in Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 28–29.

38 Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 228.

member of society, irrespective of ideology. Among these have been certain acts affecting the life and physical integrity of individuals, which, by virtue of their consistent recognition in the legal controls of almost all social systems, are referred to as "common crimes."[39]

Every legal system also contains enactments that do not enjoy the same level of recognition granted to "common crimes." These offenses may lack the foundation of commonly perceived and shared values, or they may simply be regulatory norms, as was the case at common law between crimes, mala in se and malum prohibitum. Furthermore, certain offenses may embody ideological values that do not correspond to the commonly perceived values of almost all members of a given society, as in the case of dictatorial regimes.

Some legal doctrines (the positivist, for example) contain no basis for distinguishing between these different types of legal controls, on the assumption that all violations of the law are equal in that they are violations.[40] Other doctrines (the utilitarian and naturalist) seek to distinguish between types of violations because such distinctions would, if nothing else, correspond to a gradation of the violation in terms of the interest it affects or because of a greater degree of individualization of the penalty, both reasons also being based on a certain criminological policy. As applied to the ideologically motivated offender, the latter approach would be of questionable value when applied to an offender who cannot be resocialized and is seldom deterred by the penalty attached to the transgressed legal mandate.[41] However, the inquiry must not be limited to an examination of the professed motivations of the actor; it must also take into account the legal norm that was transgressed in order to have an objective basis, which controls the administration of justice.

There is a distinction between offenses that embody ideological goals and ideologically motivated offenders. Some may well argue that all laws are based on ideological values, and that those who have opposing ideologies in their violation of the law express their own values. However, not every ideologically motivated offender necessarily commits an ideological offense by breaching the law. The two concepts must be distinguished because the nature of the offense may not confer upon the actor certain motives that were not present at the commission of the violation. The character of the offense emanates from the social interest it seeks to preserve, whereas the characterization of the actor's conduct stems from a differing individual perception of the social interest. The ideologically motivated offender, therefore, acts in a way so as to harm the legally protected social interest in order to protect or promote another interest he/she perceives to be more socially redeeming.[42]

When the law that was violated embodies the protection of sociopolitical structures and the actor, moved by a commitment to differing ideological values or beliefs, harms those interests without committing a "common crime," the offense is said to be "purely political." However, if such an offense also involves the commission of a "common crime," usually a private wrong, it ceases to be a purely political offense and could then be labeled either a "relative political offense" or a "common crime."[43]

The problem lies in distinguishing between types of offenses and typology of offenders. Western European doctrine makes a classification whereby it separates relative political offenses into délits connexes and délits complexes.[44] In both cases a common crime is committed with or

---

39 Id. at 229.

40 Id. at 229–230. See also H.L.A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968).

41 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law 73–84 (1978).

42 Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 229–230.

43 This distinction between délits complexes and délits connexes was first made by Andre Billot. Billot, supra note 16, at 104. See Shearer, supra note 11, at 181–183.

44 Shearer, supra note 11, at 181–183.

without the commission of a purely political offense, but is actuated by ideological motives. This approach, however, fails to appreciate the distinction between the nature of the offense and the motives of the actor. These approaches will be discussed below, but two general observations must be borne in mind throughout the discussion of this exception:

1. The significance of value-oriented legal mandates, which by their very nature fluctuate in time and are relative to a given societal framework and cannot therefore give rise to their international recognition, except when the proscribed conduct is sanctioned by the common morality of mankind, as in the case of international crimes (discussed below).

2. However, it must be recognized that although every offense committed by an ideologically motivated offender is an attack upon the law, not every attack upon the law should benefit from the characterization of political offense as an exception to extradition.

The purpose of the political offense exception is to shield persons whose prosecution or punishment by the requesting state is politically motivated or for an offense whose genesis is the criminalization of conduct that constitutes an expression of political or religious belief.[45]

2.1.3. The Political Function and Political Activities of a Relator and the Political Offense Exception

The political offense exception is in a large part designed to ensure that the integrity of the legal processes of the requested state will not be used by the requesting state to achieve certain political ends by prosecuting an individual for his/her political beliefs or politically motivated conduct. It does not, however, mean that a given person who is a public official or political figure in a given country can rely on his/her status to oppose extradition for an offense that does not otherwise fall within the meaning of the relative political offense exception,[46] although he/she may rely on this status to argue the purely political offense exception.[47] The political function of a person or his/her position does, however, raise the issue of immunity with respect to heads of state, and with respect to those with diplomatic immunity. The first is essentially covered by customary international law,[48] and the second by the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Immunity.[49] The political offense exception also should not be confused with a claim arising under the 1967 Protocol amending the 1951 Refugee Convention,[50] which allows a refugee to oppose return to a state where he/she is likely to be persecuted on grounds of, inter alia, political beliefs.[51]

---

45 In re Requested Extradition of Smyth, 61 F. 3d 711, 720 (9th Cir. 1995); In re the Requested Extradition of Artt, Brennan and Kirby, 972 F. Supp. 1253 (N.D. Cal. 1997).

46 See infra Sec. 2.1.5.

47 See infra Sec. 2.1.4.

48 Heads of state and other internationally protected persons are also protected by the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents, G.A. Res. 3166, U.N. GAOR, 28th Sess., Supp. No. 30, at 146, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1974).

49 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Immunity, Apr. 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227, 500 U.N.T.S 95.

50 G.A. Res. 2198, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 6, at 48, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).

51 See Ch. III. For examples of treaties that extend the political offense exception to individuals whose prosecution is politically or discriminatorily motivated, see Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. III(2), entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18 ("Extradition shall also not be granted if… (b) it is established that the request for extradition, though purporting to be on account of the extraditable offence, is in fact made for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing the person sought on account of his race, religion, nationality, or political opinions; or (c) the person sought is by reason of his race, religion, nationality, or political opinions, likely to be denied a fair trial or punished, detained or restricted in his personal liberty for such reasons"); Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 3(1)(c), entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17 ("Extradition shall not be granted when: …the executive authority of the Requested State determines that the request was politically or racially motivated"); Extradition Treaty with Cyprus, art.4(3), entered into force Sept. 14, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-16 (politically motivated); French Extradition Treaty, art.4(4), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY

Two major cases arose in the United States involving heads of state claiming a mixture of head of state immunity and political motivation in the conduct of their governments as well as the government of the United States. These cases involved the former presidents Ferdinand Marcos[52] of the Philippines and Manuel Noriega[53] of Panama. Although neither case involved extradition issues per se, these two cases deserve to be mentioned because of the possible confusion they raise due to the political personality of the individuals involved. On the bases of these cases, if a requesting state asks for the extradition of a former head of state found in the United States or a senior political personality, such personal factors as the public office they held and the activities they conducted may be relevant to determining the motive of the requesting state.[54] They are not, however, sufficient in and of themselves to characterize the nature of the act if the offense charges a common crime that does not qualify for the criteria of the pure political offense. Thus, the embezzlement by a head of state of public funds or the commission of other crimes such as traffic in drugs, money laundering, or ordering political assassination and torture could not be characterized as a part of the relative political offense on the grounds that the person was a head of state or a senior public official. Furthermore, when such acts constitute international crimes such as crimes against humanity, war crimes, or torture, the exception to the relative political offense will not apply.[55]

2.1.4. The Purely Political Offense

The purely political offense is usually conduct directed against the sovereign or its political subdivisions, and constitutes opposition to a political, religious, or racial ideology or to its supporting structures (or both) without having any of the elements of a common crime. The conduct is labeled a crime because the interest sought to be protected is the sovereign or public order, as distinguished from any private wrong.[56] The word "sovereign" includes all the tangible and intangible factors pertaining to the existence and functioning of the state as an organization. It refers to the violation of laws designed to protect the public interest by making an attack upon it a public wrong as opposed to a private wrong, as in the case of common crimes. Such laws exist solely because the very political entity, the state, has criminalized such conduct for its self-preservation. It is deemed a crime because it violates positive law, but it does not cause a private wrong.[57]

DOC. 105-13 (prosecution or punishment on account of the fugitive's "race, religion, nationality or political opinions").

52 Republic of the Philippines v. Marcos, 818 F.2d 1473 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1035 (1989). See also Republic of Philippines v. Marcos, 806 F.2d. 344 (2d Cir. 1986), cert. denied, New York Land Co. v. Republic of Philippines, 481 U.S. 1048 (1987). There are numerous other cases in the Second Circuit involving non–heads of state. See In re Extradition of McMullen, 989 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1993); Doherty v. Thornburgh, 943 F.2d 204 (2d Cir. 1991); In re Extradition of Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981).

53 United States v. Noriega, 683 F. Supp. 1373 (S.D. Fla. 1988), mot. denied, 746 F. Supp. 1506 (S.D. Fla. 1990); cf. Jose v. M/V Fir Grove, 801 F. Supp. 349 (D. Or. 1991).

54 See Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914 (1963).

55 See infra Sec. 2.1.7 (dealing with international crimes; an exception to the political offense exception). See also Marcos, 818 F.2d 1473; United States v. Noriega, 746 F. Supp. 1506 (S.D. Fla. 1990). For a general discussion of the political offense exception, see William J.A. Hobson, A Canadian Perspective on the Political Offense Exception in Relation to War Crimes, 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 339, 340–342 (1991).

56 As one commentator noted, "[b]ecause these acts are not acts against common humanity but only against the state whose interests will suffer in their wake, other states are reluctant to condemn the perpetrator and may in fact praise him." Jan Schreiber, The Ultimate Weapon 153 (1978).

57 "[T]hey are exclusively directed against the state or the political organization without injuring private persons, property, or interests." Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 106. For a discussion of this Treason, sedition, and espionage are offenses directed against the state itself, and are therefore, by definition, a threat to the existence, welfare, and security of that entity. As such, they are purely political offenses.[58] A purely political offense, when linked to a common crime, loses its political character.[59] This is illustrated in the following case.

In 1928, Germany sought the extradition of Richard Eckermann from Guatemala for the crime of murder. It was charged that in 1923 Eckermann was a prominent member of the Black Army, a secret organization of former military officers in Germany whose purported purpose was to protect Germany in case of attack by its neighbors, and to suppress communism and Bolshevism in Germany. When a man named Fritz Beyer tried to join the Black Army, its members thought him to be a spy, and eventually it was alleged that Eckermann gave directions to a subordinate that resulted in the shooting, killing, and burying of Beyer. The crime was not discovered until more than a year later. The subordinate and four others who took part in the crime were tried and imprisoned, but Eckermann escaped to Mexico and then to Guatemala. The extradition case eventually came before the Supreme Court of Justice of Guatemala. Eckermann claimed that the crime was political, particularly in the context of the abnormal conditions that prevailed in Germany after WWI as a result of social, political, and economic upheavals. The Guatemalan constitution provided that "extradition is prohibited for political crimes or connected common ones." In 1929, the court held that extradition should be granted, stating:

> The fact that Eckermann formed part of a patriotic society secretly organized to cooperate in the defense of his country cannot in any way give the character of political crimes to those committed by its members.... Universal law qualifies as political crimes sedition, rebellion and other offenses which tend to change the form of government or the persons who compose it; but it cannot be admitted that ordering a man killed with treachery, unexpectedly and in an uninhabited place, without form of trial or authority to do it, constitutes a political crime.[60] principle, see Medelius-Rodriguez v. United States, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96667, at *17 (E.D.N.C. 2007) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (4th ed. 2002)).

---

58 "These pure political crimes have usually been limited to treason, sedition and espionage." Charles Cantrell, The Political Offense Exception in International Extradition: A Comparison of the United States, Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland, 60 Marq. L. Rev. 777, 780 (1977). See Deere, supra note 22, at 247; Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 113.

59 See Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 106 ("[political offenses] are not accompanied by the commission of common crimes.").

60 In re Eckermann, 5 Ann. Dig. 293, 295 (Sup. Ct. 1929) (Guat.). See In re DeBernonville, 22 I.L.R. 527, 528 (STF 1955) (Braz.) (stating that "treason to a country [is] among political crimes, [and] the authors are not subject to extradition"); accord Chandler v. United States, 171 F.2d 921 (1st Cir. 1949) (holding, inter alia, that political offenders include persons charged with treason); Ex parte Kolcyznski [1955] 1 Q.B. 540, 547 (Eng.) ("Treason is an offense of a political character."); In re Ockert, 7 Ann. Dig. 369, 370 (Federal Tribunal 1933) (Switz.) (stating "high treason, capital treason and the like" are political offenses because "the offense is against the State and its principal organs"); cf. Public Prosecutor v. Zind, 40 I.L.R. 214 (Cass. 1961) (Italy). In Zind, the extradition request of West Germany was denied by Italy on the grounds that the relator's anti-Jewish statements constituted political crimes. Although the court did not characterize the offense as purely political, the absence of the element of a common crime was implicit in its reasoning:

> In fact, when a man professes a particular ideology he cannot always be in harmony—indeed, he is almost always at variance—with the principles of moral order and social doctrine held by the majority of those who live in his society. Such principles exist on a level above that of the various social groups taken together and considered as a whole.

Id. at 216. See also Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Treason, Sedition and Espionage as Political Offenses under the Law of Extradition, 26 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 65 (1964).

Proceeding from the question of what elements and what facts are needed to constitute the offense of treason, the concept of treasonous conduct gives rise to a variety of byproducts, which differ from country to country. For example, as one author noted:

> Although the Soviet formulation reflects the traditional law in regarding treason as breach of allegiance to the State, it nevertheless goes amazingly far in lumping together treason, desertion and espionage, and, even more striking, in setting up escape or flight abroad as a treasonable act.[61]

By contrast, under U.S. law, sedition requires only a communication intended to incite a violation of public peace with intent to subvert the established form of government. The offense is complete upon the utterance, and there is no necessity for the occurrence of a riot or rebellion. In other words, sedition is an insurrectionary movement tending toward treason, but lacking an overt act. It disturbs and affects the stability and tranquility of the state by means not actionable as treason. The distinction among treason, sedition, and incitement to riot is, therefore, relative.[62]

Espionage, on the other hand, has a more easily recognized common denominator, which is the act of obtaining or attempting to obtain information deemed secret or vital to the national security or defense of a given state for the benefit of another state. Unlike treason, there is no element of allegiance required on the part of the offender, and hence no duty that must be breached. As with treason and sedition, it is predicated on the notion that what offends the public interest constitutes a public wrong.

Treason, sedition, espionage, peaceful dissent, and freedom of expression and religion, if they do not incite to violence, are considered purely political offenses because they lack the essential elements of a common crime in that the perpetrator of the alleged offense acts on the basis of his/her beliefs, alone or as an instrument or agent of a political or religious thought or movement, but does not commit a common crime that results in a private harm. There is no way of defining a purely political crime in a manner that would exhaust the imagination of lawmakers, but it could be defined as follows:

> A purely political offense is one whereby the conduct of the actor based on ideology or belief manifests an exercise in freedom of thought, expression and belief (by words, symbolic acts or writings not inciting to violence), freedom of association and religious practice, all of which are committed in violation of a positive law designed to prohibit such conduct.[63]

2.1.5. The Relative Political Offense

The relative political offense can be an extension of the purely political offense when, in conjunction with the latter, a common crime is also committed, or when, without committing

---

61 Garcia-Mora, supra note 60, at 74. With respect to treason, compare the Soviet Criminal Code and Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 745 (codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 951–969) and Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 807 (codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 2381–2390). See also Harold Berman, Soviet Criminal Law and Procedure 178–186 (1966); The Criminal Justice System of the U.S.S.R. (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Valeri M. Savitski eds., 1979); M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Criminal Justice System of the U.S.S.R. and the Peoples Republic of China, 11 Revista de Derecho Puertorrique ñ o 168 (1971).

62 See Bassiouni, supra note 41, at 404 (discussing sedition in U.S. law).

63 Civil disorders in the United States, such as the riots of the 1960s in major American cities, could be considered common crimes, relative political offenses, or purely political offenses, depending upon one's ideological position. The U.S. government under 18 U.S.C. §§ 231–232 (1988), considers such acts common crimes, as witnessed by the Chicago Seven conspiracy trial of the seven defendants accused of such crimes during the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago. All states have legislation that prohibits conduct such as disturbing the peace and arson; such legislation is used against rioters who have engaged in ideologically motivated demonstrations. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Law of Dissent and Riots (1971).

a purely political offense, the offender commits a crime prompted by ideological motives.[64] Although the purely political offense exclusively affects the public interest and causes only a public wrong, the relative political offense also affects a private interest, and constitutes, at least in part, a private wrong in the nature of a common crime against person or property, and is committed in furtherance of a political purpose.[65] The term "relative political offense" is at best a descriptive label of dubious legal accuracy because it purports to alter the nature of the crime committed depending upon the actor's motives.[66] There is nothing that makes a given common crime political, because the nature of the criminal violation and the resulting harm constitute a private wrong that, by definition, is a common crime. That the actor seeks to use the offense or its impact for ulterior political purposes does not alter the nature of the act or its resulting harm, nor does its ulterior or ultimate purpose change its character. The circumstances attending the commission of the crime and the factors and forces that may have led the actor to such conduct render the actor's motivations complex, but not the offense. To call such crimes délits complexes or délits connexes[67] only because the motives of the actor are taken into account, even when they deserve special consideration, is to confuse the nature of the crime with the motives of the actor.[68] Considerations focusing on the offender's motives are not always accepted in all criminal justice systems. For example, U.S. criminal law does not include motive as an element of a criminal offense.[69] The element of intent required for all serious crimes bears upon the state of the actor's mind at the time the actus reus was committed. As such, mens rea in the common law system does not include motive—the underlying reason, the ulterior purpose or the motivating factor that helped form a given state of mind.[70] Certainly, motive is relevant in proving intent, but it is not an element of the crime and, therefore, has no bearing on whether the actor's overall conduct, the accompanying mental state, and its resulting harm will be characterized as a crime. It may, however, be relevant in the determination of the sentence. This, however, is not the case in Roman civil systems, wherein motive in serious crimes is part of the dolus, the intent.

The criminality of an actor is determined by what he/she did and whether he/she acted knowingly and voluntarily, rather than by the ulterior purpose at which the conduct was aimed. Motive is, therefore, a secondary factor in determining whether criminal intent existed.[71] The significance of motive in different penal systems varies greatly. Furthermore, it must be recalled that extradition is an interstate system of cooperation in penal matters. Consequently, the internal views of a given system should not necessarily prevail over the goals of inter-state cooperation, particularly when what is at stake is alleged violative conduct in the requested state.

The issue of motive is complex, particularly because a state that does not share the interest in maintaining the political ideology, system, or policies of another state is less likely to exhibit concern or interest in the maintenance of the internal structures and public safety of that state.

---

64 See generally, In re Extradition of Bravo, No. 10-20559-MC-Dubé, (S.D. Fla. 2010) (shooting was incident to and in course of suppressing a violent terrorist revolution at Trelew, Argentina).

65 See Cantrell, supra note 58, at 780; Nature of Political Offenses, supra note 22, at 1230–1231; Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 248.

66 For a discussion of the terminology difficulties caused by the use of the terms "relative," "related," "mixed," "complex," and "connex political offenses," see Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 108–110. There are various theories on the subject, which are discussed below.

67 See id. at 109–110 (discussing background and applicability of these terms).

68 But see Yousef Said Abu Dourrah v. Attorney General, 10 Ann. Dig. 331, 332 (Sup. Ct. Palestine 1941) ("We know of nothing in the criminal law of this country or of England that creates a specific offense called political murder.").

69 See Bassiouni, supra note 41, at 170–171.

70 Id. at 168–190.

71 Id. at 173–175.

In such a case the requested state is more likely to examine the motives of the offender and to find some redeeming value in his or her conduct, and eventually deem it political in order to deny extradition.[72] Another problem that generally affects all theories on the relative political offense deals with the technical or factual multiplicity of offenses arising out of the same criminal transaction perpetrated by the ideologically motivated offender.

Most penal systems in the world have adopted a policy of grading or dividing crimes designed to protect a given societal interest into various levels of accountability. The purposes of this policy vary, but in general they signify that the criminality of an actor, being dependent upon what he/she does and how he/she does it, must be graded in such a manner as to have the punishment fit the presupposed criminality of the actor. It is further believed that because punishment is a deterrent, the multiplicity of offenses that relate to the same social interest by virtue of such grading will induce the potential offender to do less harm whenever he/she engages in his/her intended criminal conduct. Whatever the reasons for a grading policy, one thing remains certain: too many technically different offenses cover or relate to the same social interest presumably sought to be protected.

In addition to these considerations, a given social harm by reason of its significance will invariably contain lesser or included offenses that, taken independently, are the subject of separate offenses, but in the context of what the offender actually did may be part of the same criminal design or transaction.

The ideologically motivated offender is likely to engage in conduct that will encompass several lesser-included offenses or bear upon other non-included but related offenses. These multiple offenses may either arise out of a single criminal act (for example, a bomb placed on a plane that kills ten persons and destroys the plane will produce at least eleven different crimes), or from the same criminal transaction (for example, an elaborate scheme involving several different crimes related by the single design or scheme of the actor). These related offenses technically may be considered "included offenses" whenever the elements of the higher-degree offense are predicated on some or all of the elements of the lesser-degree offense. In that case, the existence of the lesser-included offense would only be technical and not real. Other offenses deemed related but not included may be committed only by reason of the actor's design, or by the necessity of the scheme, such as when one crime is only a stepping stone or a means to reach the ultimate act sought to be committed. Lesser-included offenses are vertically related in that the elements of the lesser are included in the higher offense. Other related offenses are at best horizontally linked, but only when the actor's design relates them by reason of this scheme and not because of the interrelationship between the elements of the various offenses charged. This problem, more than any other, causes wide disparity in the application of the relative political offense in national laws and judicial decisions and, as a result, precludes a uniform international practice.[73] Invariably, however, three factors are taken into account: (1) the degree of the political involvement of the actor in the ideology or movement on behalf of which he/she acted, his/her personal commitment to and belief in the cause (on behalf of which he/she had acted), and his/her personal conviction that the means (the crime) was justified or necessitated by the objectives and purposes of the ideological or political cause; (2) the existence of a link between the political motive (as expressed in (1)), and the crime committed; and (3) the proportionality or commensurateness of the means used (the crime and the manner in which it was performed) in relation to the political objective to be served.[74] The first of these factors is wholly subjective, the second can be evaluated somewhat objectively, and the last is sui generis.

---

72 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes 62 (1969).

73 See generally Oppenheim, supra note 17, at 707; 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 19, at 779–857.

74 These factors were also cited as a common denominator among the tests applied by three countries compared by the commentator. Cantrell, supra note 58, at 781.

A dominant factor that emerges in the practice of all states recognizing the relative political offenses as falling within the purview of the political offense exception is that the political element must predominate over the intention to commit the common crime. It must constitute the purpose for the commission of that crime.[75] The Bressano court found that the possible international impact of the relator's activities transformed them into matters of international law enforcement.[76] Thus, although it is not clear from the court's reasoning, it appeared to regard as common crimes acts committed in one state that may have international repercussions. In such a case, the court believed, the relator is no longer engaged in a political struggle with the requesting state, but is of concern to other states as well.

In Arambasic v. Ashcroft, which distinguished a purely political offense from a relative political offense, the federal district court concluded that the burden of proving the elements of the political offense exception rests on the relator, and thereafter the requesting state had to prove that the crimes charged were not of a political character. The court stated:

> A purely political offense involves conduct directed against the sovereign or its political subdivisions but does not have any of the elements of a common crime. Treason, sedition and espionage are examples of purely political offenses. A relative political offense involves a crime prompted by ideological motives. It involves a private wrong directed against person or property, but committed in furtherance of a political purpose. M. Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, Ch. VIII, §§ 2.1.4–2.1.5. Petitioner contends that the crimes for which Croatia seeks extradition are relative political offenses subject to protection under Article VI of the Extradition Treaty.
>
> Although the political offense exception is a standard clause in almost all extradition treaties of the world, the term "political offense" is seldom defined in the treaties or national legislation. Judicial interpretations, therefore, have been the principal source for the meaning and application. See generally, M. Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, Ch. VIII, § 2.1.1 (4th Ed.2002).[77]

The court concluded that the existence of political strife or internal conflict "is not a license for the military or anyone else to do whatever they wish to the defenseless that have come under their power."[78] In the court's opinion, the Republic of Croatia, the requesting state, had shown that the crimes charged in the request constituted war crimes, and did not fall within the meaning of the political offense exception.[79]

---

75 See Belgian Extradition Law of Oct. 1, 1833, Les Codes 698 (31st ed. 1965); In re Fabijan, 7 Ann. Dig. 360 (Sup. Ct. 1933) (Germany); cf. Re Bressano, 40 I.L.R. 219, 221 (CFed. 1965) (Arg.) (finding that common crime elements for the alleged offenses of bank robbery and assault predominated over the political element and accordingly granting extradition, despite the relator's assertions that the purpose of these acts was to prepare for guerrilla warfare and to change the system of government in Latin American countries).

76 Bressano, 40 I.L.R. 219.

77 Arambasic v. Ashcroft, 403 F. Supp. 2d 951, 956 (D.S.D. 2005) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (4th ed. 2002)). The court relied on Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F. 2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986) and discussed Barapind v. Enomoto, an en banc decision that reexamined the analysis and holding in Quinn. 400 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2005) (reversing Quinn in part). The Ninth Circuit however reaffirmed Quinn's analysis of the political offense exception and overruled McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986). But Arambasic is a case arising in the District of South Dakota, which is in the Eighth Circuit, where the Ninth Circuit's Quinn decision has not been adopted. Instead, the Eighth Circuit adopted the positions of the Seventh Circuit in Ain v. Wilkes, 671 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981) and that of the Second Circuit in Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989).

78 Arambasic, 403 F. Supp. 2d at 963.

79 Id.

Several theories concerning the relative political offense have emerged from the jurisprudence of the different legal systems. Three major ones are: (1) the political-incidence theory, (2) the injured rights theory, and (3) the political-motivation theory. The European literature on the subject usually refers only to these theories as délits complexes and délits connexes, but they encompass the distinctions made herein. An analysis of certain landmark cases will illustrate the application of these three divisions.

2.1.5.1. The Political-Incidence Theory: The Anglo-American Approach

The political-incidence theory was developed in an early English case, In re Castioni,[80] in which Great Britain refused to extradite a person whose surrender had been requested by the Swiss government for murdering a member of the state council of a Swiss canton. The court held that "fugitive criminals are not to be surrendered for extradition crimes, if those crimes were incidental to and formed a part of political disturbance."[81]

The court in this case set up a threefold standard which must be met for a common crime to be regarded as a relative political offense: (1) there must be a political revolt or disturbance, (2) the act for which extradition is sought must be incidental to the disturbance or form a part of it, and (3) the ideological or political motivation must be established.[82] The court stated: "[t]he question really is, whether, upon the facts, it is clear that the man was acting as one of a number of persons engaged in acts of violence of a political character, with a political object, and as part of the political movement and rising in which he was taking part."[83]

The Castioni ruling reflects the liberal English philosophy of the late-nineteenth century, and is a consequence of its political theories and theories of government. British and U.S. cases recognize In re Castioni as precedent.[84]

This view was confirmed in England, though somewhat liberalized, three years after Castioni in the case of In re Meunier,[85] where the court held a confessed anarchist extraditable. The court stated:

> [I]n order to constitute an offense of a political character, there must be two or more parties in the State each seeking to impose the government of their own choice on the other . . . . In the present case there are not, . . . for the party with whom the accused is identified [anarchists] . . . by his

---

80 [1891] 1 Q.B. 149 (Eng.).

81 Id. at 156 (Hawkins J., quoting 2 J.F. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England 71 London (1863)). Hawkins further stated:

> [T]here are many acts of political character done without reason . . . [I]n heated blood men often do things which are against or contrary to reason; but none the less an act of this description may be done for the purpose of furthering and in furtherance of a political rising, even though it is an act which may be deplored and lamented, as even cruel and against all reason, by those who can calmly reflect upon it after the battle is over.
>
> [1891] 1 Q.B. at 167 (emphasis added).

82 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition in the American Practice and World Public Order, 36 Tenn. L. Rev. 1, 17 (1968).

83 [1891] 1 Q.B. at 159.

84 See In re Extradition of Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963). The court stated: "[a]pplying, by analogy, the action of the English Court in [Castioni,] . . . the conclusion follows that the crimes charged here, associated as they are with the actual conflict of armed force, are of political character." Id. at 999. See also 1 Charles C. Hyde, Digest of International Law § 316 at 573 (1922); Nature of Political Offenses, supra note 22, at 266.

85 [1894] 2 Q.B. 415 (Eng.). See also Re Arton, [1896] 1 Q.B. 108 (Eng.).

> own voluntary statement . . . is the enemy of all governments. Their efforts are directed primarily against the general body of citizens.[86]

Notwithstanding the validity of this position, it must be emphasized that the political offense exception as applied by British courts remains essentially a flexible one.[87] Judge Denman in In re Castioni stated: "I do not think it is necessary or desirable that we should attempt to put into language in the shape of an exhaustive definition exactly . . . every state of things which might bring a particular case within the description of an offense of a political character."[88] This opinion presaged the holding of the English court in Ex parte Kolczynski,[89] that mutiny by the crew of a small Polish fishing trawler was a political offense, notwithstanding that it was not incident to a political uprising. The Kolczynski case indicates that (1) there is no absolute requirement that there be a political uprising in order for the political offense exception to be applicable, but that the only indispensable ingredient is that the acts be politically motivated and directed toward political ends; and (2) the political offense exception can be legitimately applied with greater liberality where the requesting state is a totalitarian regime seeking the extradition of one who has opposed that regime in the cause of freedom. Indeed, these two factors are closely related, particularly because in an effectively repressive totalitarian regime, traditional political disturbances or uprisings may be unknown, despite deep and widespread hostility toward the regime.

In 1973, the UK House of Lords, in Cheng v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, held that for the exception to apply (in addition to the predominance of a political purpose) the act must also be directed against the opposed government.[90]

The United States, as discussed below, adheres mostly to Castioni without due regard to Meunier, Kolcyznski, and other cases that did away with the rigid requirement of an uprising, civil disturbance, or the like.

In a British decision, Matter of Budlong and Kember,[91] the United States sought the extradition of the relators for ten charges of burglary. The relators were charged with trespassing upon various offices of the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS) and U.S. Department of Justice, and taking photocopies of confidential government documents relating to the affairs of the Church of Scientology, of which the relators were members. The court found that the Church of Scientology was engaged in a protracted struggle with the IRS to secure tax-exempt status as a religious organization. It also contested with the Food and Drug Administration the use of a piece of equipment in Scientology's religious practices. There was additional evidence of criminal activity by the Church and its members. The court held that the alleged burglaries

---

86 In re Meunier, [1894] 2 Q.B. 415 (Eng.).

87 As one commentator noted, "[w]hile the Castioni test was affirmatively adopted by American courts, judges for the United States have applied the standard more mechanically, or inflexibly, than have their British counterparts." Note, American Courts and Modern Terrorism: The Politics of Extradition, 13 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 617, 626 (1951) [hereinafter Note, Politics of Extradition].

88 [1891] 1 Q.B. 149, 155 (Eng.). See Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 255.

89 [1955] 1 All E.R. 31 (Eng.). See also Schtraks v. Government of Israel, [1962] 3 All E.R. 529 (Eng.). See generally Oppenheim, supra note 17, at 704–710.

90 [1973] 2 All E.R. 204. See also Regina v. Government of Singapore, Ex parte Fernandez, 51 I.L.R. 312 (H.L. 1971) (U.K.) (granting extradition on grounds that, inter alia, relator had failed to show the possibility that he would be detained or restricted on political grounds); Keane v. Governor of Brixton Prison, 51 I.L.R. 366 (H.L. 1971) (U.K.) (granting extradition despite relator's contention that he would be prosecuted for political offense, on grounds relator produced no evidence of such offense).

91 [1980] 1 All E.R. 701 (Eng.).

did not constitute political offenses within the meaning of the English Extradition Act. The English court stated:

> The Applicants did not order these burglaries to take place in order to challenge the political control or Government of the United States; they did so to further the interests of the Church of Scientology and its members . . . [I]t would be ridiculous to regard the Applicants as political refugees seeking asylum in this country . . . [92]

This approach has been followed by some Latin American courts, even though their interpretation is often more liberal because of Western European influence and indigenous traditions toward political struggles.[93] This position is illustrated in a case decided by the Supreme Court of Chile. Argentina had requested the extradition from Chile of Guillermo Patricio Kelly and others for murder, robbery, and other offenses allegedly committed by Kelly when, during a raid on local communist headquarters in Buenos Aires, in which typewriters and other equipment were taken from the office, he shot and killed the gatekeeper. The Supreme Court of Chile concluded that the exemption from extradition for political offenses applied only when the offense is a purely political offense or is an ordinary crime connected with a political offense. The court held that Kelly should be extradited on the murder and robbery charges, stating:

> These crimes did not occur during an attack [by Kelly] on the security of the state, such as to be considered connected to a separate political offense. They took place at a time of public tranquility during which the murder and theft were isolated acts. The ultimate objective may have been the political one of annihilating communists, but the principles of public international law which this decision accepts do not admit that an ordinary crime is converted into a political one solely because of its ultimate objective.[94]

The court further stated that:

> "Political offense" does not appear to be defined in our positive legislation, nor in the international conventions and treaties previously enumerated, but generally accepted principles are in agreement that a political offense is that which is directed against the political organization of the state or against the civil rights of its citizens and that the legally protected right which the offense damages is the constitutional normality of the country affected. Also included in the concept are acts which have as their end the alteration of the established political or social orders established in the state.
>
> A majority of the authorities consider, moreover, that in order to distinguish between ordinary and political crimes, it is necessary to take into account the goals and motives of the persons charged; that is to say, to consider the objective aspect of the offense as well as its subjective one. Political and social offenses obey motives of political and collective interest and are characterized by the sense of altruism or patriotism which animates them, while ordinary criminal offenses are motivated by egoistic sentiments, more or less excusable (emotion, love, honor), or to be reproached (vengeance, hate, financial gain).
>
> In this area [of non-extraditable offenses] there are to be identified, purely political offenses, which are directed against the form and political organization of the state; improper political offenses, which embitter social or economic tranquility; mixed or complex political offenses, which damage at the same time public order and ordinary criminal law, such as the assassination of the head of state for political reasons; and connected political offenses, which are common crimes

---

92 Id. at 714. See generally 1 V.E. Hartley Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure (1980); Valerie Epps, The Validity of the Political Offender Exception in Extradition Treaties in Anglo-American Jurisprudence, 20 Harv. Int'l L.J. 61 (1979).

93 Garcia-Mora, supra note 22, at 378.

94 In re Extradition of Hector Jose Campora and Others, reprinted in 53 Am. J. Int'l L. 671, 693, 694–695 (1959).

> committed in the course of attempts against the security of the state or related to political offenses, it being necessary to examine intent to determine whether the ordinary crime is one connected, or not, to a political one.[95]

The extension of the political-incidence test may often come from the executive rather than the judiciary.[96] This was revealed in the Rudewitz case in 1908 when a Russian revolutionary and member of the Social Democratic Labor Party, was sought by the Czarist government from the United States for the common crimes of murder, arson, burglary, robbery, and larceny. The U.S. secretary of state, subsequent to the decision of the extradition magistrate to grant the request, concluded that the offenses charged were political in nature and exercised his discretionary power in refusing to issue the surrender warrant.[97]

Another example of judicial–executive correlation in U.S. extradition practice was the case of Chandler v. United States.[98] In that case an American citizen was charged with treason for broadcasting hostile propaganda to the United States from Germany during WWII, thereby giving aid and comfort to enemies of the United States. Chandler claimed that his arrest, which occurred after the war while he was in Germany, violated his rights of asylum conferred by international law. The U.S. Supreme Court held that in the absence of a treaty a state does not violate any principle of international law by declining to surrender a fugitive offender, but that the right is that of the state (Germany) to offer asylum, not that of the fugitive to claim. It also held that because treason is a violation of allegiance, such conduct may be deemed an offense against the United States, even though the acts were committed outside its territorial jurisdiction. The court also found that the acts were political crimes for which extradition is not usually granted, and that, had Germany extended asylum to the offender and requested his return from the United States to Germany, it is quite possible that, in keeping with U.S. custom and practice, Chandler would have been returned to Germany. Although Chandler was in U.S. custody, the court held that international law principles were not violated by his arrest in Germany and his return to the United States. Germany did not object, and therefore there was no claim of violation of German sovereignty with respect to his forcible return to the United States. There was consequently no opportunity to see how executive discretion might have been exercised in this instance.[99]

The position of the United States as a requesting state has usually been consistent with that of U.S. courts. In a memorandum submitted to the French courts in support of an extradition request of two U.S. nationals accused of hijacking, the Department of State stated:

> Common crimes do not constitute offenses of a political character unless they form part of a civil war or similar political disturbance. Political motive alone does not give rise to a political

---

95 Id. at 693–694.

96 Compare In re Fabijan, 7 Ann. Dig. 360 (Sup. Ct. 1933) (Germany):

> [N]either the actual attack on the policeman engaged in the lawful discharge of his duties, nor the "demonstration" of the accused and his three companions against the Carabinieri barracks, constitute a "political crime" in the strict sense of the term. Both parts of the whole act were directed, not against the central political authority, but only against individual organs of the State . . . . There is no proof of a principal political crime with which the acts of the prisoner could possibly be connected. Moreover, he himself has not sought to allege the existence of any such crime, but has merely contended that he had a "political motive." However, as has been explained already, proof of political motive does not make an act a "connected" act when there is no "concrete" political act.

Id. at 367. See also the case of Rudewitz, discussed in Green Haywood Hackworth, Digest of International Law § 316 at 49–50 (1944) [hereinafter Hackworth Digest].

97 Letter from Elihu Root, Secretary of State, to Rosen, Russian Ambassador (1908) (on file in Dep't of State, File No. 16649/9, reprinted in Hackworth Digest, supra note 96 at 49–50). See also Ch. XI.

98 Chandler v. United States, 171 F.2d 921 (1st Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 918 (1949).

99 See Ch. IX.

> offense. In the case of violent crimes particularly, the offense must have a direct relationship to a well-defined political end and must not be out of proportion with it.[100]

These cases, however, serve to demonstrate that the political offense exception is also within the scope of executive discretion. In this context executive discretion can be used to deny extradition even if the judiciary finds the relator extraditable. The role of the judiciary in U.S. practice is conclusive in finding that the exception applies, but is not definitive in its findings that the exception is inapplicable, because executive discretion can override such findings.

The position of the U.S. judiciary with respect to the political offense exception was first enunciated in In re Ezeta.[101] In that case, the government of El Salvador sought the extradition of General Ezeta and four companions on charges of murder and robbery that allegedly occurred while the relators unsuccessfully fought to suppress a revolution. Extradition was denied on the grounds that the offenses were political in character. Citing Castioni, the court adopted the principle that offenses committed in the course of a civil war, insurrection, or political commotion constituted political crimes.[102]

A few years later, and under comparable circumstances, the U.S. Supreme Court adopted the political incidence test as defined in Ezeta. In Ornelas v. Ruiz,[103] the Mexican government requested the extradition of Ruiz and two others for the crimes of murder, arson, robbery, and kidnapping allegedly committed during an attack on a Mexican village, after which the relators fled back to the United States. The Supreme Court held that these offenses were not political and reasoned that the relators, who styled themselves as revolutionaries, were not engaged in a political struggle with Mexican government forces at the time that the alleged crimes occurred.[104] The Court's formulation of the relative political offense within the context of the political incidence test clearly implied that the acts of the relators were not predominately attributable to political motives.

In Ramos v. Diaz,[105] Cuba sought the extradition of the relator for murder of a prisoner whom he was responsible for guarding following the overthrow of the Batista government. The relator allegedly shot the prisoner while he attempted to escape. The relator was convicted of murder and was serving a prison term when he escaped to the United States. The court found that the alleged offenses were political and thus non-extraditable under the then-applicable United States–Cuba extradition treaty. The court reasoned that the relator was a member of a revolutionary movement to which the crime was incidental, because the act happened during the first days of the Castro regime.[106] It is apparent from this case that with the application of the United States' political incidence test, only an attenuated connection need be shown between the common crime and the political act. There was little reason to believe that the murder in Ramos was in any sense closely linked to an offense against the state.

---

100 Extradition: Hijacking, 1975 Digest § 5 at 169. The opportunity to exercise executive discretion was blocked by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981), when the court rejected the first attempt by the U.S. government to argue that the determination of political offenses should properly be vested in the executive branch rather than the judiciary. In rejecting the government's contentions, the court stated that although these arguments may be meritorious, this issue is for Congress to decide, not the courts. Id. at 517.

101 In re Ezeta, 62 F. 972 (C.C.N.D. Cal. 1894). See also In re Extradition of Suarez-Mason, 694 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Cal. 1988).

102 Id. at 997. It has been argued that this case illustrates that the connection between the common crime and the political disturbance need only be attenuated. The Nature of Political Offenses, supra note 22, at 1241.

103 Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502 (1896).

104 Id. at 511–512.

105 Ramos v. Diaz, 179 F. Supp. 459 (S.D. Fla. 1959).

106 Id. at 462–463. One commentator has suggested that the political offense exception was invoked to prevent the surrender of fugitives to a politically hostile government. Epps, supra note 92, at 72–73.

Consistent with this policy and with the precedents discussed above, U.S. courts decided the Artukovic cases.[107] In the appellate court decision concerning the applicability of the political offense exception, Karadzole v. Artukovic,[108] the court of appeals affirmed a district court ruling that the crimes charged against the petitioner (murder and participation in murder occurring while he served as minister of the interior of Yugoslavia), were of a political character within the meaning of the treaty, and that Artukovic could not be extradited. The Yugoslav government charged that more than 30,000 unidentified persons and over 1,200 identified persons were killed on orders of the accused in 1941 and 1942. The appellate court found that the district court properly took judicial notice of the fact that various factions representing different theories of government were struggling for power during this period. In reviewing the appellate court's decision in Karadzole v. Artukovic,[109] the U.S. Supreme Court held, with Justices Black and Douglas dissenting, that the judgment of the court of appeals should be vacated and remanded for hearings on the matter of the political offense. However, prior to this ruling, the Department of State, representing the executive branch of government, expressed its views to the court on the extradition issue that murder, even though committed solely or predominantly with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group, is nonetheless murder within the meaning of the extradition treaty involved, and is not thereby rendered an offense of a "political character within…the treaty…. It does not appear on the face of the pleadings that all of the offenses…were necessarily connected with such struggle for power."[110]

In United States v. Artukovic,[111] the U.S. commissioner found that there was insufficient evidence upon which to believe the accused was guilty of the alleged offenses and in part that "the evidence presented, as well as historical facts of which I take judicial notice, proves…as a fact that the crimes charged in all counts of the amended complaint are political in character." Accordingly, the court denied extradition.[112] That disposition of the case reflected the U.S. commissioner's acceptance of the Castioni standards in finding that a political offense existed in fact and, therefore, that the relator was not extraditable. However, because U.S. practice does not favor the exercise of executive discretion to grant the request after its denial by the judiciary, a conflict was averted that could have arisen between the two branches had the executive overridden the court's findings as indicated by the Department of State's views.[113] It must be noted that this case also included a charge that the relator committed international crimes, which should have precluded the court's findings that the offenses were political in 107 Artukovic v. Boyle, 107 F. Supp. 11 (S.D. Cal. 1952) (holding that no extradition treaty existed between the United States and Yugoslavia), rev'd sub nom., Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954) (holding that a valid extradition treaty existed), on remand sub nom., Artukovic v. Boyle, 140 F. Supp. 245 (S.D. Cal. 1956) (holding that political offense exception precluded extradition), aff'd sub nom., Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), rev'd, 355 U.S. 393 (1958) (holding that full hearing on political offense required), on remand sub nom., United States v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (insufficient evidence to find guilt, but offenses would be considered political), rev'd Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (ruling that mental competence is not relevant or necessary in extradition proceedings). Artukovic was finally extradited in 1986. In re Extradition of Artukovic, 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal.), aff'd, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986). He was executed in the former Republic of Yugoslavia. See also Bozilov v. Seifert, 967 F.2d 353 (9th Cir. 1992), amended by 983 F.2d. 140 (9th Cir. 1993).

---

108 Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), rev'd, 355 U.S. 393 (1958).

109 Karadzole v. Artukovic, 355 U.S. 393 (1958).

110 Letter from the Legal Advisor of the Department of State to the Acting Assistant Attorney General McLean, cited in 6 Whiteman Digest § 15, supra note 19, at 823–824 (submitted by the Solicitor General, Jan. 1958, in No. 462, in the Supreme Court of the United States (Oct. Term, 1957), Karadzole v. Artukovic, on petition for writ of certiorari).

111 United States v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959).

112 Id. at 392–393.

113 See Letter from the Legal Advisor of the Department of State to the Acting Assistant Attorney General McLean, supra note 110.

character, but in fact did not. But twenty-two years later, the United States changed its position and extradited Artukovic to Yugoslavia.[114]

In a 2009 case involving political unrest in the Former Yugoslavia, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the long-standing political-incidence theory. In Pajkanovic v. United States, the relator claimed that his offense of aggravated robbery fell within the political offense exception.[115] The court cited to Escobedo v. United States for the definition of "political offense" in the context of extradition treaties as "an offense committed in the course of and incidental to a violent political disturbance such as war, revolution and rebellion. An offense is not of a political character simply because it was politically motivated."[116] Because the relator was unable to connect his charged offense to a violent political disturbance or show that it was political in nature, the court affirmed the magistrate's denial of the relator's habeas petition.[117]

In another case, the U.S. Supreme Court left undisturbed findings of the extradition magistrate but affirmed the position that relative political offenses are non-extraditable, and that the best test is one of "political incidence."[118] In that case, Italy requested the extradition from the United States of Vincenzo Gallina, who had been convicted in absentia of robbery in the court of Assizes of Caltenisetta on May 30, 1949. After being found extraditable at the extradition hearing, Gallina applied for a writ of habeas corpus contending, inter alia, that the offense was not extraditable under the Extradition Convention of 1868 between the United States and Italy,[119] in particular article III, which provides that "the provisions of this treaty shall not apply to any crime or offense of a political character." The district court rejected Gallina's contention, and the court of appeals affirmed, stating:

> Relator contends that the hearing before the Commissioner established beyond doubt that the offenses for which extradition is sought were of a political character and, under Article III of the Convention of 1868, nonextraditable. Counsel for relator has briefed the point extensively. According to relator, the acts to which he admitted might be ordinary crimes in an atmosphere free of any political ramifications, but because of the motivation for their commission, they must necessarily be deemed of a "political character." While the court is in general agreement with the relator's exposition of the principles of law governing the nonextraditability of political offenders who have found asylum in this country, nevertheless it is the opinion of the court that the Commissioner's decision that the specific acts ascribed to relator in the complaint of the Republic of Italy were not of a political character, whatever his other acts during the period in question might have been, is supported by the evidence in the record…

---

114 Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986).

115 Pajkanovic v. United States, 353 Fed. Appx. 183 (11th Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion).

116 Id. at 185.

117 Id. at 185–186. Another court similarly denied a political offense claim where a relator was charged with killing another Bosnian for hiding salt from him and another individual while they were fleeing from Serbian forces that had taken control of Srebrenica, because the relator could not show that the killing was "incidental to" the political disturbance. United States v. Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 47096, at *28–*29 (D.S.D. 2007) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (4th ed. 2002)). In a case involving an extradition request from Albania, the relator was unable to establish that his shooting resulted from any political activity, uprising, or turmoil, so that the political offense exception was not applicable to his situation. In re Extradition of Harusha, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 28812, at *2–*31 (E.D. Mich. 2008).

118 Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y, Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, (9th Cir. 1990).

119 Extradition Treaty, Mar. 23, 1868, U.S.–Italy, T.S. No. 174, as amended by 16 Stat. 767 (1869), 24 Stat. 1001 (1884), 61 Stat. 3687 (1946).

> The claim that what appeared to be common, ordinary crimes were so admixed with political motives and aims as to be of a political character within the meaning of the Convention of 1868 was based solely on testimony of the relator himself. This testimony, to the effect that relator worked for Torrese and that Torrese took orders from Giuliano, all to advance the political aims of a Sicilian separatist movement, was contradicted by statements taken from relator's admitted accomplices after their arrest in Italy, which tended to indicate that private gain was the sole motivating factor in these robberies. There was also testimony from a Mr. Russo, a witness offered as an expert by the Republic of Italy, who had spent considerable time in Sicily during the years when a Sicilian separatist organization was active, as a member of the Office of Strategic Services, a branch of our wartime forces. Russo testified at length and unqualifiedly, both on direct and on cross-examination, that Guiliano was a bandit who had no legitimate connection with the actual separatist movement, and that Guiliano described his activities as "political" to cloak their true purpose, i.e., private gain for himself and his followers. With the evidence before the Commissioner in such posture, this court cannot say that the Commissioner's decision was not supported by competent, legal evidence. The evidence was conflicting, it is true, but it did not preponderate so heavily in the relator's favor as to require a decision that his offenses were political as a matter of law.[120]

What appears to be a contrary view in a situation equally complex and laden with political implications is the Jimenez case.[121] In that matter a former president of the Republic of Venezuela was sought from the United States for financial crimes and murder. The district court found the murder charge to be non-extraditable on grounds of the political offense exception, but that the financial crimes were not within the exception and granted extradition. Thus the precedent was established that where multiple charges exist, some of which fall outside of the political offense exception, extradition shall be granted unless all charges are related or connected to the political motive, and are incidental thereto. Where there is no such connection and the charges are severable, extradition can be granted on the assumption that the rule of specialty[122] shall preclude the prosecution of the relator for those charges. In view of the fact that the ideologically motivated offender is a more sought-after person than any other person alleged to have committed a common crime because he/she has struck at the very foundation of the requesting state's existence or order, it is naive to believe that the doctrine of specialty can operate as a protective shield to the relator.

One year after the decision in Jimenez, a U.S. court was faced with a request from the Dominican Republic for extradition of a relator accused of torturing and killing two prisoners while acting in a military or quasi-military capacity under a former regime. The U.S. district court in In re Extradition of Gonzalez,[123] citing Castioni as precedent, found the charges to be non-political, and the relator was extradited. The court ruled that in order for a crime to constitute a political offense, "there must be an 'uprising' and . . . the acts in question must be incidental to it." The doctrinal significance of this case is that the U.S. court continued to hold firmly to the political incidence test of Castioni, despite its reference in dicta to the more recent liberal British decisions. The Gonzalez court stated:

> The issue is whether the acts of the relator should be deemed politically motivated because directed towards political ends; . . . nothing in the record suggests that the second factor is applicable [the second factor allows for greater liberality in applying the political offense exception where the demanding state is a totalitarian regime seeking the extradition of one who has opposed

120 Gallina, 177 F. Supp. at 867–868. See also Ernst, 1998 WL 395267; Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290; Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358; Mainero, 164 F.3d 1199.

121 See Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914 (1963).

122 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

123 In re Extradition of Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963).

> that regime in the cause of freedom] as this does not appear to be a case in which the acts in question were blows struck in the cause of freedom against a repressive totalitarian regime.[124]

Another case, consistent with prior political offense decisions that apply the political incidence test enunciated in Castioni, is Garcia-Guillern v. United States,[125] in which the government of Peru sought the extradition of the relator on the charge of embezzlement by a public officer. Responding to the relator's claim that the alleged offense was political in character, the court stated: "A political offense . . . must involve an 'uprising' or some other violent political disturbance. Moreover, the act in question must have been incidental to the occurrence . . . "[126] The court found that no evidence had been presented to warrant a finding of a political offense, and, therefore, found the relator to be extraditable.[127]

In Barapind v. Enomoto, the relator argued that if some of the charges for which he was sought were not extraditable because of the political offense exception, then he could not be extradited for other crimes for which the political offense exception would not apply.[128] The Ninth Circuit rejected this proposition, in reliance on Quinn v. Robinson.[129] However, it should be noted that although this is a valid proposition, it does not exclude inquiry into whether or not the requesting state is seeking extradition for what otherwise appears as valid criminal charges but with the intent to use them for a political motivation. For example, if as in Barapind and 124 Id. at 723 n.9. The court in Gonzalez noted the liberal language of Kolczynski but nonetheless chose to follow Castioni as precedent. Despite the dictum in Gonzalez acknowledging the progressive English position, extradition decisions subsequent to that case strictly adhered to the political incidence test enunciated in Castioni. See Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1192 (5th Cir. 1971) (holding that "a political offense . . . must involve an 'uprising' or some other violent political disturbance."), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 989 (1972); Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502, 511–512 (1896).

---

125 Garcia-Guillern, 450 F.2d 1189; cf. Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989). Although this case raises issues pertaining to the relative political offense exception as relating to an internal armed conflict, it does not depart from existing positions expressed in Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986), cert denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986). It does, however, involve questions of terror violence in the conduct of such an internal conflict and in that respect it follows the line of cases raising the same issues such as In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Sep. 4, 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990). See also In re McMullen, Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979); In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270 (S.D.N.Y. 1984); infra notes 122, 124. It also raises issues with respect to international criminal conduct, and in that respect the decision also follows the Demjanjuk case, infra note 266 and accompanying text. In this context it particularly discusses the international regulation of armed conflicts and the Geneva Convention of 1949, infra note 228, and two additional protocols of 1977. Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of Aug. 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I), art. 51(2), June 8, 1977, 16 I.L.M. 1391, 1413; Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of Aug. 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II), art. 4(2)(d), 16 I.L.M. 1442, 1444 (1977). The case however also emphasizes that the State Department retains a key role in the determination of whether the political offense exception applies.

126 Garcia-Guillern, 450 F.2d 1189 at 1192.

127 For a case affirming a magistrate's findings that charges associated to a relator's forgery of signatures and fingerprints of actual voters to register a political party and take part in a presidential election constituted a crime, see Medelius-Rodriguez v. United States, 2007 U.S. App. Lexis 24137 (4th Cir. 2007).

128 Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 744, 749 (9th Cir. 2005). See In re Extradition of Solis, 402 F. Supp. 2d 1128 (C.D. Cal. 2005); In re Singh, 170 F. Supp. 2d 982 (E.D. Cal. 2001). See also David M. Rogers, International Law—Extradition and the Political Offense Exception—In Re Extradition of Singh, 170 F. Supp. 2d 982 (E.D. Cal. 2001), 26 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 479 (Summer 2003).

129 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986).

Quinn, a relator was found to have committed a number of crimes related to a political purpose for which the political offense exception was recognized as applicable, he/she may nonetheless have committed another crime that may not be connected with the former in terms of the facts but that is related to the overall political activity of the relator. Thus, for example, if as in the case of someone who in the course of an uprising commits a crime for which the political offense exception applies and then, while trying to flee the country, steals a car or food and these acts are directly related to the political uprising, then it should be accepted that the political offense exception does extend to these types of crimes.[130]

In Matter of Sindona,[131] the extradition of a relator was sought by the Italian government from the United States for the alleged crime of "fraudulent bankruptcy," as provided in the extradition treaty between the United States and Italy. In Sindona, the relator sought to raise the political offense exception on the grounds that the alleged offense was "an outgrowth of political events," in that his misappropriation of bank funds was in response to certain governmental decisions influenced by left-wing politicians in the Italian government. Relying upon the political incidence test as formulated in In re Castioni, the Sindona court concluded that Sindona's theory did not meet this test, and stated that "there is no persuasive authority under the law of any country which supports Sindona's position that misappropriation of bank funds becomes a political offense, where it is allegedly carried out in response to actions of government regulations."[132] The court thus implied that the actions by the Italian government did not constitute a political disturbance to which the relator's offense was incidental. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit also rejected the relator's claim, and found that his actions were of a nonpolitical character due to the absence of a severe political disturbance such as war, revolution, or rebellion in Italy at the time the crimes were committed.[133]

In Koskotas v. Roche,[134] the First Circuit held that the political offense exception did not apply to financial crimes, although the crimes allegedly caused violent political uprising. The petitioner alleged neither an intention to promote violent political change nor an intention to repress violent political opposition and ascribed no political motive for criminal conduct with which he was charged. The court embraced the traditional view that criminal financial conduct is not an acceptable means of political expression:

> The "political offense" exception historically has embraced only offenses aimed either at accomplishing political change by violent means or at repressing violent political opposition. [In re Castioni, supra note 72]. The exception is "applicable only when a certain level of violence exists and when those engaged in that violence are seeking to accomplish a particular objective." Quinn, 783 F.2d at 897; see also Escobedo, 623 F.2d at 1104 (kidnapping of Cuban consul for alleged purpose of 130 Barapind, 400 F.3d 744.

131 In re Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672 (S.D.N.Y. 1978). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). cf. In re Extradition of Montiel Garcia, 802 F. Supp. 773, 777 (E.D.N.Y. 1992).

132 Sindona, 450 F. Supp. at 692. See also Koskotas v. Roche, 740 F. Supp. 904 (D. Mass. 1990), aff'd, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir. 1991); cf. In re Mylonas, 187 F. Supp. 716 (N.D. Ala. 1960) (holding that the relator's alleged offenses constituted political crimes and hence were non-extraditable).

As these two cases show, the flexibility with which courts apply the political offense exception adds to its lack of clarity. See also In re Extradition of Montiel Garcia, 802 F. Supp. 773 (E.D.N.Y. 1992).

133 Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 173 (2d Cir. 1980). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (3d ed. 1996)); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 989 (1972); cf. Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989). The relator-defendant was extradited to Italy and was later found dead in her cell, presumably killed by the Mafia. See also Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997).

134 Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d. 169 (1st Cir. 1991).

ransoming political prisoners in Cuba, not "political offense" because not "committed in the course of and incidental to a violent political disturbance").

Criminal conduct in the nature of financial fraud, even involving political corruption, traditionally has been considered outside the "political offense" exception. See, e.g., Sindona, 619 F.2d at 173 (fraudulent bankruptcy, even if "it resulted from political maneuvering and is pursued for political reasons," not an offense of a political character); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 485 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833, 97 S. Ct. 97, 50 L.Ed.2d 98 (1976) (embezzlement by public official, "not in any sense a political offense"); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1192 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 989, 92 S. Ct. 1251, 31 L.Ed.2d 455 (1972) (financial crimes by Peruvian public official, not political offenses); Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547, 560 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914, 83 S. Ct. 1302, 10 L.Ed.2d 415 (1963) (financial crimes by former chief executive of Venezuela, not political offenses). Id.

The most controversial cases that U.S. courts were confronted with in the 1970s and '80s involved Irish Republican Army (IRA)-related acts of violence. Three different circuits addressed these four cases though some of them involved multiple district court and circuit court proceedings. They are In re McMullen,[135] In re Mackin,[136] In re Doherty,[137] and Quinn v. Robinson.[138] 135 In re McMullen, Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979). Since the denial of the United Kingdom's extradition request, the Immigration and Naturalization Service sought McMullen's deportation. McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986) (denying review of finding of ineligibility for asylum), overruled in part by Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d. 744 (9th Cir. 2005) (relying on the incidental prong of Quinn v. Robinson). On the date of McMullen's deportation in 1986, a supplementary treaty between the United States and United Kingdom entered into force. 769 F. Supp. 1278 (1991) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice at 1287 n.10; International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (1983) at 1293), aff'd, 953 F.2d 761 (2d Cir. 1992)). On this same day, a second extradition request was filed. The supplemental treaty would have made McMullen extraditable based on its narrowly defined political offense exception. Id. at 1282–1283. The district court granted habeas corpus, holding that the supplementary treaty, as applied retroactively to a particular alleged fugitive, was an unlawful bill of attainder. Id. at 1279. See also Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000). On rehearing, the appellate court held that the district court erred in classifying the Supplementary Treaty as a prohibited bill of attainder and remanded the case to the district court for resolution of the due process issues that remain unresolved. In re Extradition of McMullen, 989 F.2d 603, 604 (2d Cir. 1993).

---

136 In re Mackin, No. 86 Cr. Misc. 1, at 47, 1988 U.S. Dist LEXIS 7201, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 1981), appeal dismissed, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981).

137 In a similar case, the extradition of Doherty, a PIRA member, to the United Kingdom was denied under the political offense exception. In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270 (S.D.N.Y. 1984). The U.S. government, on behalf of the United Kingdom, then sought a declaratory judgment as a collateral attack on the denial of extradition, which both the district court and the Second Circuit found to be procedurally improper and denied. United States v. Doherty, 615 F. Supp. 755 (S.D.N.Y. 1985), aff'd, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1986). An order for Doherty's deportation was obtained and affirmed on appeal. Doherty v. Meese, 808 F.2d 938 (2d Cir. 1986). Doherty sought review of the orders of the Attorney General denying his motion to reopen deportation proceedings for the purpose of applying for asylum or withholding of deportation. The court of appeals reversed the Attorney General's order denying the motion to reopen, and remanded. Doherty v. INS, 908 F.2d. 1108 (2d Cir. 1990), cert. granted, 498 U.S. 1081 (1991), rev'd, INS v. Doherty, 502 U.S. 314 (1992). The Supreme Court held that the Attorney General did not abuse his discretion in denying the motion to reopen deportation proceeding. Id.

138 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. 1997); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990).

In In re McMullen,[139] the United Kingdom requested the extradition of a member of the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) for an alleged bombing attack against Claro Barracks, a British Army installation, and the magistrate allowed for the exception. In finding that the political offense exception applied, the magistrate held that the accused was a person engaged in acts of political violence with a political end on the simple grounds that he was a member of the PIRA. As to the requirement of an uprising, the court adopted a somewhat liberal view:

> A political disturbance, with terrorist activity spanning a long period of time cannot be disregarded even if, in fact, the PIRA lifted not one single finger in either Northern Ireland or Great Britain to further its cause of nationalism of Ulster on the day Claro Barracks were bombed.[140]

Thus, the court found that the act fell within the exception because it occurred in the larger context of an ongoing political strife and upheaval between the PIRA and the British government over the nationalism of Northern Ireland. The court found that the common crime need not occur as an immediate and direct incidence of the political disturbance in order to constitute a political offense. The court also found a rational nexus between the political objective and the act of violence, and that the killing of an innocent civilian was unintended and incidental to the permissible target, which was a military barracks. A similar conclusion was reached in In re Mackin,[141] concerning another alleged PIRA member who shot a British soldier in civilian clothes. In Mackin[142] the Second Circuit in 1981 held:

> The Government's argument that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to decide the political offense question begins with the language of the Treaty. Article V(1)(c)(i) speaks of an offense which "is regarded by the requested Party as one of a political character." As a matter of the ordinary meaning of language, "the requested Party" would seem in this case to be the Government of the United States, represented, as is uniformly true in matters of foreign relations, by the President, United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319–20, 57 S. Ct. 216, 220–21, 81 L.Ed. 255 (1936); L. Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 45–50, 93 (1972), and not by a judicial officer. The Government asserts that this construction is reinforced by other provisions of the Treaty, notably Articles XIV(1) and XI(1), where it claims the term "requested Party" must mean the Government of the United States and not the courts.
>
> (Note 17) Article XI(1) of the treaty provides that "[t]he requested Party shall promptly communicate to the requesting Party through the diplomatic channel the decision on the request for extradition." This provision hardly establishes that "requested Party" can refer only to the Government (i.e., the State Department), as the Government's brief asserts, p. 28. The term "requested Party" is most naturally interpreted as a reference to the government of the United States or Great Britain, as the case may be, without any intent to refer to a particular branch of those governments. The separate reference to "the diplomatic channel" would be unnecessary if "requested Party" did in fact mean the State Department.
>
> Article XIV(1) of the treaty provides "[t]he requested Party shall make all necessary arrangements for and meet the cost of the representation of the requesting Party in any proceedings arising out of a request for extradition." It does this provision no violence to read it as fixing the international legal obligations of the United States and Great Britain without speaking to the manner in which each nation goes about meeting these obligations as a domestic matter.
>
> Against this Mackin argues that the Government's equation of "the requested Party" with the executive branch does not fit Article V(2) which provides that extradition may be refused

139 In re McMullen, Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979). See also supra note 135.

140 McMullen, Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG at 5.

141 In re Mackin, No. 86 Cr. Misc. 1, at 47, 1988 U.S. Dist LEXIS 7201, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 1981), appeal dismissed, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981). See also supra note 136.

142 In re Mackin, 668 F.2d at 122. Notes 17–20 of the opinion are included below.

> on any ground specified by "the law of the requested Party." This same argument applies to the numerous references in the treaty to "the territory of the requested Party," e.g., Arts. VI, VII, VIII, and IX. Likewise, Article VII(5)(a) speaks of certification of arrest warrants by "a judge, magistrate or other competent authority of the requesting Party," a usage inconsistent with the notion that "requested Party" refers specifically to the executive branch.

It tells us further that the phrase "regarded by the requested Party as one of a political nature" represents a change from the language of older treaties and argues that by calling for the subjective opinion of the requested Party, the Treaty thus refers to the Secretary of State.

The Government's argument ignores the fact that the "new" language or an equivalent has been used in United States treaties at least since the turn of the century. The Extradition Treaty with Peru, 31 Stat. 1921 (1900), at issue in Garcia-Guillern v. United States, supra, 450 F.2d 1189, contained a provision stating "[i]f any question shall arise as to whether a case comes within . . . [the political offense exception] the decision of the authorities of the government on which the demand for surrender is made . . . shall be final." Identical language was contained in a 1901 treaty with Serbia, 32 Stat. 1890, Art. VI. If anything, reference to the "authorities" of the United States Government is more suggestive of the executive branch than is the broader phrase, "requested Party," at issue in this case, thus undercutting the Government's theory that the "requested Party" language was intended to change existing law. Moreover, the phrase "requested Party" was used in the 1963 Extradition Treaty with Israel, 14 U.S.T. 1707, Art. VI(4), as to which the Seventh Circuit has rejected an argument by the Government similar to that here considered, see Eain v. Wilkes, supra, 641 F.2d at 517. See also Extradition Treaty with Brazil, 15 U.S.T. 2093 (1961).

The Government's textual argument also ignores the existence of numerous treaties whose language explicitly envisions that courts will decide the political offense question. For example, a 1932 extradition treaty with Greece provides that "[t]he State applied to, or courts of such State, shall decide whether the crime or offense is of a political character," 47 Stat. 2185. See also Treaty Concerning the Mutual Extradition of Criminals with Czechoslovakia, 44 Stat. 2367 (1925); Treaty of Extradition with Albania, 49 Stat. 3313 (1935); Treaty for the Extradition of Fugitives from Justice with Austria, 46 Stat. 2779 (1930). The Government has suggested no reason, and we are unable to envision any, why courts should determine political offense questions under some treaties, but not under others. If the State Department had wanted to change the rule reflected in the above treaties and in the cases cited infra, it would hardly have done so on a piece meal basis in treaties with individual foreign states and without disclosing its intention to the Senate.

> (Note 18) As far as we are aware, following Justice Nelson's opinion in Ex parte Kaine, supra, the argument that the "requested party" language made the political offense decision solely for the executive branch was not made again until 1980 in Abu Eain, supra.

Rather it would have adopted the more open and decisive approach of seeking legislation, as it is currently attempting to do, see p. 137, infra. It seems much more likely that the language was intended to preclude a foreign state from arguing that the United States was bound by a definition of political offense derived from international law or the law of the requesting state.

The Government seeks to buttress its textual argument with arguments of policy and analogy. It calls attention to decisions that determination whether a case falls within the exception provided by Article V(i)(c)(ii), to wit, that "the person sought proves that the request for his extradition has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him for on offense of a political character" lies solely with the executive branch. See In re Lincoln, 228 F. 70, 73–74 (E.D.N.Y 1915), aff'd per curiam, 241 U.S. 651, 36 S. Ct. 721, 60 L.Ed. 1222 (1916); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, supra, 450 F.2d 1189 at 1192; In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717, 722 (S.D.N.Y. 1963). Recognizing the latter principle, the Seventh Circuit in Abu Eain, supra, 641 F.2d at 516–17, perceived no inconsistency between confiding to the courts a decision with respect to past facts and refusing to allow them to probe the motives of a requesting government—a conclusion with which we agree. The Government notes that a judicial decision on the political offense exception may cause difficulties in this country's foreign relations; such difficulties would exist also, indeed might be heightened, if the decision were placed solely in the executive branch, unless the political offense exception were to be eviscerated in practice in the case of extradition treaties with nations with which we are allied or whose favor we especially desire. See also I.A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law 197-98 (1971). The Government relies on cases such as The Three Friends, 166 U.S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L.Ed. 897 (1897), and Underhill v. Hernandez, 168 U.S. 250, 18 S. Ct. 83, 42 L.Ed. 456 (1897), holding that [the] determination when a state of war or belligerency exists in a foreign country is solely for the executive; these are adequately distinguished in the Seventh Circuit's opinion in Abu Eain, 641 F.2d at 514 n.14. That court likewise sufficiently answered, id. at 514–15, the arguments made here by the Government, on the basis of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., supra, and Chicago & Southern Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111, 68 S. Ct. 431, 436, 92 L.Ed. 568 (1948), as to the special ability of the executive branch to acquire the facts with respect to conditions in foreign countries.

Moreover, whatever we might decide if we were writing on a clean slate, the rock on which the Government's arguments shatter is the long-standing recognition that courts shall determine whether a particular offense comes within the political offense exception. This principle was in existence at least as long as when In re Kaine, supra, was decided in 1852. Four years after enactment of the Act of August 12, 1848, Justice Catron, speaking for four members of the Supreme Court, wrote that "extradition without an unbiased hearing before an independent judiciary . . . [is] highly dangerous to liberty, and ought never to be allowed in this country," In re Kaine, supra, 55 U.S. (14 How.) at 113. Although this statement is directed at extradition proceedings in general and not specifically at the political offense issue, Justice Catron's opinion gives no indication that the political offense issue ought to be treated differently from other issues at the extradition hearing. More importantly, an example cited by Justice Catron, relating to the alleged mistreatment of one Jonathan Robbins, suggests that the members of the Court joining in his opinion were of the view that "an unbiased hearing before an independent judiciary" was particularly necessary in cases where the political offense exception is at issue.

In 1799 Jonathan Robbins (also variously referred to as Thomas Nash and Nathan Robbins) was surrendered by the United States to British naval officials, pursuant to Article 27 of Jay's Treaty. The British sought Robbins' extradition for a murder allegedly committed aboard a British naval vessel. Jay's Treaty contained no provision regarding the procedure to be followed in extradition cases, and at the time there was no legislation on the subject. Believing he had a relatively free hand, President Adams arranged the delivery of Robbins by instructing District Judge Bee of South Carolina to hand the extraditee over to the British. Adams' action caused an extraordinary national outcry. See, e.g., 10 Annals of Congress 580–640 (1800). As Professor Moore notes, "[t]he case created great excitement and was one of the causes of the overthrow of John Adams' administration." 1 Moore, Extradition 550-51 (1922); see also In re Kaine, 55 U.S. (14 How.) at 111–12. The outcry against Adams' action seems to have arisen, in large part, from the widespread perception that Robbins was an American seaman who had been impressed into the British navy and that the murder for which he was charged had occurred either in the course of a mutiny or while fleeing from the British in an escape attempt. See Speech of John Marshall, 10 Annals of Congress 613 (1800), reprinted in, 18 U.S. at 5 Wheat, App. 201, 204–05, 215 (1820). Robbins' supporters apparently conceded that he had committed a murder, yet argued that a murder committed in fleeing from illegal impressment should not be extraditable.

Although the term "political offense" was not current at the time, and apparently was not used in the debates surrounding the Robbins case, 10 Annals of Congress 580–640 (1800), the argument made on Robbins' behalf bears many resemblances to the political offense doctrine. In both instances an otherwise extraditable crime is thought to be rendered nonextraditable by the circumstances surrounding its commission and by the motives of the criminal. Significantly, in later years the Robbins case came to be regarded as centering on the political offense question. As Justice Nelson wrote in Ex parte Kaine, 14 Fed.Cas. 78, 81 (No. 7597) (C.C.S.D.N.Y.) (1853),

"It was the apprehension of the people of this country, at the time, that the offense of Jonathan Robbins, who was delivered up under the treaty with Great Britain of 1794, was a political offense…."

The circumstances of the Robbins case described above assume importance because, as Justice Catron noted in In re Kaine, supra, "[t]hat the eventful history of Robbins' case had a controlling influence on our distinguished negotiator [Daniel Webster], when the Treaty of 1842 was made; and especially on Congress, when it passed the Act of 1848, is, as I suppose, free from doubt." 55 U.S. (14 How.) at 112. With the Robbins case thus firmly in the legislature's mind, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that when Congress charged commissioners and judges with determining whether evidence exists to "sustain [a] charge under the provisions of…[a] treaty," 9 Stat. 302, sec. 1, it had no intention of silently excepting the political offense issue from the magistrates' consideration. Rather, the combination of the view that the Robbins case involved the political offense question, and the perception that extradition without judicial oversight was "highly dangerous to liberty and ought never to be allowed in this country," In re Kaine, supra, 55 U.S. (14 How.) at 113, strongly suggests that it was precisely the political offense question that was of the greatest concern to Congress in passing the Act of August 12, 1848. This view is buttressed by the references to the political offense issue in the debates on the act, see Cong. Globe, July 28, 1848 (remarks of Mr. King and Mr. Bedger).

We recognize that Justice Nelson's later opinion as a Circuit Judge in Ex parte Kaine, supra, 14 Fed. Cas. at 81, contained language suggesting that decisions concerning the political offense exception are solely for the executive branch. Justice Nelson wrote "the surrender, in such cases, involves a political question, which must be decided by the political, and not by the judicial, powers of the government. It is a general principle, as it respects political questions concerning foreign governments, that the judiciary follows the determination of the political power, which has charge of its foreign relations, and is, therefore, presumed to best understand what is fit and proper for the interest and honor of the country." We think Justice Nelson misunderstood the import of the Robbins incident, and that Justice Catron's view of the mistrust of exclusion of the judiciary from the extradition process is a far sounder interpretation of the views of the times. Moreover, this view is more consistent with the concern with individual liberties that formed the basis for Justice Nelson's dissenting opinion in In re Kaine, supra, 55 U.S. (14 How.) at 141-43, 147. If there is to be a change in this, the alteration should come from Congress.

The doctrine that a decision with respect to the political offense exception is for the courts was also recognized in In re Castioni, supra, [1891] 1 Q.B. 149, although, as the Government points out, there was no need to address the question there since the British Extradition Act of 1870 provided a defense to any person who could "prove to the satisfaction of the…magistrate or the Court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, or to the Secretary of State, that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him for an offense of a political character." 33 & 34 Vict., c. 52, §3(1). In In re Ezeta, 62 F. 972 (N.D. Calif. 1894), the court assumed that it had power to determine whether the offense was political. It evidently regarded this as part of its duty, imposed by 18 U.S.C. §3184, to hear and consider the evidence of criminality and to determine whether there is evidence "to sustain the charge under the provisions of the treaty." In Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502, 16 S. Ct. 689, 40 L.Ed. 787 (1896), the Supreme Court reversed a ruling by a district judge discharging, as a political offender, a person whom a magistrate had found not to be one; the Court expressed no disapproval at the magistrate's having decided the question, although saying, id. at 512, 16 S. Ct. at 692, that "[t]he contention that the right of the executive authority to determine what offenses charged are or are not purely political is exclusive is not involved in any degree." The principle that the judicial officers named in §3184 are to determine whether or not the crime charged is a political offense has been sustained in a number of other reported cases, Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914, 83 S. Ct. 1302; 10 L.Ed.2d 415 (1963); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189 (5 Cir. 1962); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2 Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884, 94 S. Ct. 204, 38 L.Ed.2d 133 (1973); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833, 97 S. Ct. 97, 50 L.Ed. 2d 98 (1976); Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894, 102 S. Ct. 390, 70 L.Ed.2d 208 (1981); In re Lincoln, 228 F. 70, 74 (S.D.N.Y. 1915) (dicta); United States ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959); Ramos v. Diaz, 179 F. Supp. 459 (S.D. Fla. 1959); In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963), although only Abu Eain and In re Lincoln contain discussion of the issues.

One reason for the lack of discussion is that the position that the judicial officers designated in §3184 lack power to determine whether the offense was political is a new one for the executive branch. In 1908, a foreign ambassador wrote to the Secretary of State, proposing that a provision be included in the extradition treaty about to be entered into, whereby the political offense determination would be made by the courts of the requested country. In response, Secretary Elihu Root wrote:

> According to the system of jurisprudence obtaining in the United States, the question as to whether or not an offense is a political one is always decided in the first instance by the judicial officer before whom the fugitive is brought for commitment to surrender. If the judicial authorities refuse to commit the fugitive for surrender on the ground that he is a political offender, or for any other reason, the matter is dead . . . Bearing in mind, therefore that under our system of jurisprudence, it is not possible for any fugitive who claims to be a political offender to be extradited, it is hoped that your Government will be satisfied without insisting upon the insertion of an express stipulation providing that the question as to whether an offense is political shall be decided by the judicial authorities. (Emphasis added.)

Letter from Secretary of State Root, dated June 12, 1908; quoted in 4 G. Hackworth, Digest of International Law 46 (1942). In 1960 the Assistant Legal Advisor to the Department of State wrote a United States Attorney:

> With regard to the assertion that Mylonas' extradition is being sought for acts connected with crimes or offenses of a political character, it should be noted that this is a matter for decision, initially, by the extradition magistrate on the basis of the evidence submitted to him. (Emphasis added.)

Letter of State Department Assistant Legal Advisor to U.S. Attorney, dated June 22, 1960, concerning In re Mylonas, 187 F. Supp. 716 (N.D. Ala. 1960); cited in 6 M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law 842–853 (1968).

> (Note 19) The word "initially" refers to the fact that when the judicial officer on a habeas court decides that the offense is not political, the Secretary of State may still decline to order extradition. See Note, Executive Discretion in Extradition, 62 Colum. L. Rev. 1313, 1315 & cases cited in note 18 (1962); 1 Moore, Extradition 549–76 (1891); Hyde, International Law 606–08 (1922).

The view of the Department of Justice and Department of State with respect to the existing law appears also in the materials recently presented to the Senate in connection with S. 1639, §3194(a) of which would remove from the court's jurisdiction "to determine whether the foreign state is seeking the extradition of the person for a political offense, for an offense of a political character, or for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing the person of his political opinions." The Senate was told in the Legal Memorandum accompanying the bill, 127 Cong. Rec. S9956 (Sept. 18, 1981):

> Under the present case law, the courts decide whether the crime for which extradition has been requested is a political offense . . . citing in n.56 four of the cases cited above. An almost identical statement was made by Deputy Legal Advisor McGovern, p. 4.

> It follows that, as the law now stands, both the judicial and the executive branches have recognized that, under §3184, [the] decision whether a case falls within the political offense exception is for the judicial officer. The Government cites us to no overriding principle which dictates a contrary result. The Court said in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211, 212, 82 S. Ct. 691, 706, 707, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962), that "it is error to suppose that every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance" and "a court can construe a treaty and may find it provides the answer." While the policy arguments made by the Government are not without force, particularly in an age of spreading terrorism, they are not so overwhelming as to justify us in concluding that the 1848 statute and its successors did not mean that the judicial officer should decide whether the offense for which extradition is sought is political. Whether the national interests would be better served by the position here advocated by the executive branch, which it has asked Congress to adopt in S. 1639, is for that body to determine. We therefore conclude that the Magistrate correctly sustained her own power to decide the political offense question and thus, for reasons heretofore explained, there is no basis for our issuing mandamus.
>
> Immediately after the Magistrate's decision the Government refiled its extradition request before District Judge Sand in accordance with the procedure recognized in Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d 1360, and applied for a new warrant of arrest. Believing that the question of appealability should be resolved before action by him the judge held this request in abeyance pending a request for a stay to the Magistrate. She granted such a stay pending application to this court for a stay pending expedited appeal, which this court granted. Before we granted the stay, Mackin filed a petition for habeas corpus with this court and a motion for immediate release. Since our stay of the Magistrate's decision will terminate upon the coming down of the mandate, unless the Government should request and we should see fit to grant an extension of the stay pending application for certiorari or the decision of the renewed application before Judge Sand we must consider the petition for habeas corpus.
>
> > (Note 20) Judge Sand should consider the renewed application on the record before the magistrate and such other relevant evidence as the United States or Mackin may introduce and give such weight to the Magistrate's conclusions as he deems appropriate. See Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d 1360 at 1369–70 (concurring opinion of Judge Chambers).
>
> This need not detain us long. The statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2241, provides that writs of habeas corpus may be granted by "the Supreme Court, any justice thereof, the district courts, and any circuit judge within their respective jurisdictions." A court of appeals is conspicuously absent from this list. It has repeatedly been held that courts of appeals have no jurisdiction to entertain petitions such as Mackin's. Posey v. Dowd, 134 F.2d 613 (7 Cir. 1943); Jensen v. Teets, 219 F.2d 235 (9 Cir. 1955); Loum v. Alvis, 263 F.2d 836 (6 Cir. 1959); Parker v. Sigler, 419 F.2d 827 (8 Cir. 1969). See also FRAP 22(a) and accompanying Notes of Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules.
>
> The Government's appeal is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Its alternative application for mandamus is entertained solely on the issue of the Magistrate's jurisdiction to rule on the political offense exception and is otherwise dismissed; the portion entertained is denied on the merits. Mackin's petition for habeas corpus is dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Mackin may recover his costs.[143]

The U.S. government at the time also sought an alternate avenue using deportation proceedings, as exemplified in the Doherty case. In Doherty the Supreme Court held that:

> After more than eight years of proceedings concerning Doherty's status in the United States, the question presented here is whether the Attorney General abused his discretion in refusing to reopen the deportation proceedings against respondent to allow consideration of respondent's claims for asylum and withholding of deportation which he had earlier withdrawn. We conclude that the Attorney General did not abuse the broad discretion vested in him by the applicable regulations.

143 Id. at 132–137 and n.17–20.

In 1982 . . . [the INS] began deportation proceedings against him. Respondent applied for asylum under § 208 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as added by the Refugee Act of 1980, 94 Stat. 105, 8 U.S.C. § 1158. The immigration proceedings were suspended to allow completion of extradition proceedings which were initiated by the United States at the request of the United Kingdom.

In December 1984 . . . [the extradition magistrate] held that respondent was not extraditable because his crimes fell into the political offenses exception to the extradition treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom. In re Requested Extradition of Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 272 (SDNY 1984). The attempts of the United States to attack this conclusion collaterally were rebuffed. United States v. Doherty, 615 F. Supp. 755 (SDNY 1985), aff'd, 786 F.2d 491 (CA2 1986). Respondent, who has been confined since his arrest by the INS, has also twice unsuccessfully filed for habeas corpus relief. Doherty v. Meese, 808 F.2d 938 (CA2 1986); Doherty v. Thornburgh, 943 F.2d 204 (CA2 1991).

When the extradition proceedings concluded, the deportation proceeding against respondent resumed. On September 12, 1986, at a hearing before the Immigration Judge, respondent conceded deportability and designated Ireland as the country to which he be deported pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1253(a). In conjunction with this designation, respondent withdrew his application for asylum and withholding of deportation. The INS unsuccessfully challenged respondent's designation on the basis that Doherty's deportation to Ireland would, in the language of § 1253(a), "be prejudicial to the interests of the United States." . . . The Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) affirmed the deportation order, concluding that the INS had never before rejected a deportee's designation and that rejection of a deportee's country of designation is improper "in the absence of clear evidence to support that conclusion." Id., at 155a.

The Government appealed the BIA's determination to the Attorney General pursuant to 8 CFR § 3.1(h)(iii) (1987). While the order to deport respondent to Ireland was being reviewed by the Attorney General, respondent filed a motion to reopen his deportation proceedings on the basis that the Irish Extradition Act, implemented by Ireland in December 1987, constituted new evidence requiring that his claims for withholding of deportation and asylum now be reopened. In June 1988, Attorney General Meese reversed the BIA and ordered respondent deported to the United Kingdom. . .

The BIA granted respondent's motion to reopen, concluding that the 1987 Irish Extradition Act was a circumstance that respondent could not have been expected to anticipate, and that the result of his designation would now leave him to be extradited from Ireland to the United Kingdom, where he feared persecution. The BIA's decision to reopen was appealed by the INS and was reversed by Attorney General Thornburgh who found three independent grounds for denying Doherty's motion to reopen. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reviewed both the order of Attorney General Meese which denied respondent's designation of Ireland as the country of deportation and Attorney General Thornburgh's order denying respondent's motion to reopen his deportation proceeding. It affirmed the Meese order, but by a divided vote reversed the Thornburgh order. Doherty v. United States Dept. of Justice, INS, 908 F.2d 1108 (CA2 1990) . . .

The Court of Appeals [also] held that the Attorney General had abused his discretion by relying on foreign policy concerns in denying respondent's motion to reopen his claim for asylum . . . The Attorney General had abused his discretion "in denying Doherty's application for reasons that congress sought to eliminate from asylum cases. . . . " Doherty v. United States Dept. of Justice, INS, 908 F.2d, at 1121.

We granted certiorari, 498 U.S. 1081, 111 S. Ct. 950, 112 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1991), and now decide that the Court of Appeals placed a much too narrow limit on the authority of the Attorney General to deny a motion to reopen deportation proceedings. The Attorney General based his decision to deny respondent's motion to reopen on three independent grounds. First, he concluded that respondent had not presented new evidence warranting reopening; second, he > found that respondent had waived his claims to asylum and withholding of deportation by withdrawing them at his deportation hearing in September 1986; and third, he concluded that the motion to reopen was properly denied because Doherty's involvement in serious nonpolitical crimes in Northern Ireland made him statutorily ineligible for withholding of deportation, as well as undeserving of the discretionary rules of asylum. Because we conclude that the Attorney General did not abuse his discretion in denying the motion to reopen either on the first or second of these grounds, we reverse the Court of Appeals, and need not reach the third ground for denial of reopening relied upon by the Attorney General."[144]

Doherty is a case of a failed extradition attempt with a resort to deportation or exclusion proceedings under the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) in order to accomplish the same result. By compartmentalizing these two sets of legal proceedings and by emphasizing the discretionary authority of the executive branch in immigration matters, a dual standard is institutionalized whereby the government can exploit the easier one under immigration practices to defeat the higher standard established in extradition proceedings. This double legal standard flies in the face of the integrity of the legal process and reduces it to formal gamesmanship. Further evidence of the disregard for the integrity of the judicial process manifested by the government is the resort to kidnapping abroad when extradition fails.[145] One cannot help escape the conclusion that the cumulative effect of these practices reduces the credibility of the United States and damages the integrity of its legal processes both when the United States is a requested state and a requesting state. To kidnap abroad or forcefully deport at home are not the types of practice that evidence the high standards of legal integrity in the U.S. process.

In Quinn v. Robinson,[146] the Ninth Circuit considered the application of the political offense exception to "international terrorism."

> The recent lack of consensus among United States courts confronted with requests for the extradition of those accused of violent political acts committed outside the context of an organized military conflict reflects some confusion about the purposes underlying the political offense exception . . . The premise of the analyses performed by modern courts favoring the adoption of new restrictions on the use of the exception is either that the objectives of revolutionary violence undertaken by dispersed forces and directed at civilians are by definition not political . . . or that, regardless of the actors' objectives, the conduct is not politically legitimate because it "is inconsistent with international standards of civilized conduct," Doherty 599 F. Supp. at 274. Both assumptions are subject to debate.
>
> A number of courts appear tacitly to accept a suggestion by some commentators that begins with the observation that the political offense exception can be traced to the rise of democratic governments . . . . Because of this origin, these commentators argue, the exception was only designed to protect the right to rebel against tyrannical governments . . . and should not be applied in an ideologically neutral fashion. . .
>
> These courts then proceed to apply the exception in a non-neutral fashion but, in doing so, focus on and explicitly reject only the tactics, rather than the true object of their concern, the political

---

144 INS v. Doherty, 502 U.S. 314, 317–323 (1992). See also Ch. IV for a discussion of the use of immigration as an alternative to extradition.

145 See United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992). See also Ch. V for a discussion of abduction and unlawful seizure.

146 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Sep. 4, 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d. 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Ang, 486 F.Supp. 1193 (D. Nev. 2006).

objectives. . . . The courts that are narrowing the applicability of the exception in this manner appear to be moving beyond the role of an impartial judiciary by determining tacitly that particular political objectives are not "legitimate."

We strongly believe that courts should not undertake such a task. The political offense test traditionally articulated by American courts, as well as the text of the treaty provisions . . . is ideologically neutral. We do not believe it appropriate to make qualitative judgments regarding a foreign government or a struggle designed to alter that government . . . . Such judgments themselves cannot be other than political and, as such, involve determinations of the sort that are not within the judicial role . . . .

A second premise may underlie the analyses of courts that appear to favor narrowing the exception, namely, that modern revolutionary tactics which include violence direct at civilians are not politically "legitimate." This assumption, which may well constitute an understandable response to the recent rise of international terrorism, skews any political offense analysis because of an inherent conceptual shortcoming. In deciding what tactics are acceptable, we seek to impose on other nations and cultures our own traditional notions of how internal political struggles should be conducted.

The structure of societies and governments, the relationships between nations and their citizens, and the modes of altering political structures have changed dramatically since our courts first adopted the Castioni test. Neither wars nor revolutions are conducted in as clear-cut or mannerly a fashion as they once were. Both the nature of the acts committed in struggles for self-determination . . . and the geographic locations of those struggles have changed considerably since the time of the French and American revolutions. Now challenges by insurgent movements to the existing order take place most frequently in Third World countries rather than in Europe or North America. In contrast to the organized, clearly identifiable, armed forces of past revolutions, today's struggles are often carried out by networks of individuals joined only by a common interest in opposing those in power.

It is understandable that Americans are offended by the tactics used by many of those seeking to change their governments. Often these tactics are employed by persons who do not share our cultural and social values or mores. Sometimes they are employed by those whose views of the nature, importance, or relevance of individual human life differ radically from ours. Nevertheless, it is not our place to impose our notions of civilized strife on people who are seeking to overthrow the regimes in control of their countries in contexts and circumstances that we have not experienced, and with which we can identify only with the greatest difficulty. It is the fact that the insurgents are seeking to change their governments that makes the political offense exception applicable, not their reasons for wishing to do so or the nature of the acts by which they hope to accomplish that goal.

. . .

One of the principal reasons our courts have had difficulty with the concept of affording certain contemporary revolutionary tactics the protection of the political offense exception is our fear and loathing of international terrorism . . . . The desire to exclude international terrorists from the coverage of the political offense exception is a legitimate one; the United States unequivocally condemns all international terrorism. However, the restrictions that some courts have adopted in order to remove terrorist activities from coverage under the political offense exception are overbroad. . . .

The policy and legal considerations that underlie our responses to acts of international terrorism differ dramatically from those that form the basis for our attitudes toward violent acts committed as a part of other nations' internal political struggles. The application of the political offense exception to acts of domestic political violence comports in every respect with both the original justifications for the exception and the traditional requirements of the incidence test. The application of that exception to acts of international terrorism would comport with neither. First, we doubt whether the designers of the exception contemplated that it would protect acts of international violence regardless of the ultimate objective of the actors. Second, in cases of international terrorism, we are being asked to return the accused to the government in the country where the acts were committed; frequently that is not a government the accused has sought to change. In such cases there is less risk that the accused will be subjected to an unfair trial or punishment because of his political opinion. Third, the exception was designed, in part, to protect against foreign intervention in internal struggles for political self-determination. When we extradite an individual accused of international terrorism, we are not interfering with any internal struggle; rather, it is the international terrorist who has interfered with the rights of others to exist peacefully under their chosen form of government.

There is no need to create a new mechanism for defining "political offenses" in order to ensure that the two important objectives we have been considering are met: (a) that international terrorists will be subject to extradition, and (b) that the exception will continue to cover the type of domestic revolutionary conduct that inspired its creation in the first place. While the precedent that guides us is limited, the applicable principles of law are clear. The incidence test has served us well and requires no significant modification. The growing problem of international terrorism, serious as it is, does not compel us to reconsider or redefine that test. The test we have used since the 1800's simply does not cover acts of international terrorism.

. . .

The incidence test has two components—the "uprising" requirement and the "incidental to" requirement. The first component, the requirement that there be an "uprising," "rebellion," or "revolution," has not been the subject of much discussion in the literature, although it is firmly established in the case law. . . . Most analyses of whether the exception applies have focused on whether the act in question was in furtherance of or incidental to a given uprising. Nevertheless, it is the "uprising" component that plays the key role in ensuring that the incidence test protects only those activities that the political offense doctrine was designed to protect.

. . .

The uprising component serves to limit the exception to its historic purposes. It makes the exception applicable only when a certain level of violence exists and when those engaged in that violence are seeking to accomplish a particular objective. . . .

Equally important, the uprising component serves to exclude from coverage under the exception criminal conduct that occurs outside the country or territory in which the uprising is taking place. The term "uprising" refers to a revolt by indigenous people against their own government or an occupying power. That revolt can occur only within the country or territory in which those rising up reside. By definition acts occurring in other lands are not part of the uprising. The political offense exception was designed to protect those engaged in internal or domestic struggles over the form or composition of their own government, including, of course, struggles to displace an occupying power. It was not designed to protect international political coercion or blackmail, or the exportation of violence and strife to other locations—even to the homeland of the oppressor nation. Thus, an uprising is not only limited temporally, it is limited spatially. . . .

In short, the Eain and Doherty courts' objective that this country not become a haven for international terrorists can readily be met through a proper application of the incidence test. It is met by interpreting the political offense exception in light of its historic origins and goals. Such a construction excludes acts of international terrorism. There is no reason, therefore, to construe the incidence test in a subjective and judgmental manner that excludes all violent political conduct of which we disapprove.

. . .

Commentators have criticized United States courts for applying the "incidental to" component too loosely or flexibly. . . . We disagree with this criticism. To put the matter in its proper context, > it is necessary to bear in mind that the offense must occur in the context of an "uprising." Acts "incidental to" an uprising are, as we have noted, limited by the geographic confines of the uprising. In addition, the act must be contemporaneous with the uprising.... The act must be causally or ideologically related to the uprising....

>
> We believe that the traditional liberal construction of the requirement that there be a nexus between the act and the uprising...is appropriate. There are various types of acts that, when committed in the course of an uprising, are likely to have been politically motivated. There is little reason, under such circumstances, to impose a strict nexus standard. Moreover, the application of a strict test would in some instances jeopardize the rights of the accused.
>
> Under the liberal nexus standard, neither proof of the potential or actual effectiveness of the actions in achieving the group's political ends...nor proof of the motive of the accused...is required. Nor is the organization or hierarchy of the uprising group or the accused's membership in any such group determinative.
>
> When extradition is sought, the "offender" at this stage of the proceedings has ordinarily only been accused, not convicted, of the offense. It would be inconsistent with the rights of the accused to require proof of membership in an uprising group.... Furthermore, requiring proof of membership might violate the accused's Fifth Amendment rights both because it might force him to supply circumstantial evidence of guilt of the charged offense and because membership in the group itself might be illegal. Also, we question how one proves membership in an uprising group. Uprising groups often do not have formal organizational structures or document membership. In addition, it is entirely possible to sympathize with, aid, assist, or support a group, help further its objectives and its activities, participate in its projects, or carry on parallel activities or one's own, without becoming a member of the organization. Still, one may be acting in furtherance of an uprising.
>
> On the other hand, a number of factors, though not necessary to the nexus determination, may play a part in evaluating the circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense. For example, proof of membership in an uprising group may make it more likely that the act was incidental to the uprising.... The similarity of the charged offense to other acts committed by the uprising group, and the degree of control over the accused's acts by some hierarchy within the group, may give further credence to the claim that the act was incidental to the uprising. And while evidence of the accused's political motivation is not required and is usually unavailable, evidence that the act was "committed for purely personal reasons such as vengeance or vindictiveness," In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 277 n. 7 (S.D.N.Y. 1984), may serve to rebut any presumption that a nexus exists. The exception is not designed to protect mercenaries or others acting for nonpolitical reasons.[147]

The Ninth Circuit then examined the district court's application of the two tests to the facts in Quinn. The court agreed with the lower court's conclusion that the incidence test had been met. However, it disagreed with the magistrate's factual finding of an uprising in the United Kingdom at the time Quinn was alleged to have committed the acts for which his extradition was sought, stating:

> The magistrate correctly concluded that there was an uprising in Northern Ireland at the time of the offenses with which Quinn is charged. PIRA members, although a minority faction, sought to change the structure of the government in that country, the country in which they lived. Criminal activity in Northern Ireland connected with this uprising would clearly fall within the political offense exception.

147 Id. at 803–810 (citations omitted).

> We cannot conclude, however, that the uprising extended to England . . . [S]ome politically motivated violence was taking place in England as well as in Northern Ireland . . . However . . . in general the violent attacks and the responses to them were far less pronounced outside of Northern Ireland. It is clear . . . that the magistrate correctly concluded that the level of violence outside Northern Ireland was insufficient in itself to constitute an "uprising."
>
> There is a second and even more significant reason why the "uprising" prong is not met in this case . . . [W]hat violence there was was not being generated by citizens or residents of England . . . The critical factor is that nationals of Northern Ireland, seeking to alter the government in that territorial entity, exported their struggle for political change across the seas to a separate geographical entity—and conducted that struggle in a country in which the nationals and residents were not attempting to alter their own political structure.
>
> We do not question whether the PIRA sought to coerce the appropriate sovereign. Nor do we pass judgment on the use of violence as a form of political coercion or the efficacy of the violent attacks in England. But, as we have already said . . . the word "uprising" means exactly that: it refers to a people rising up, in their own land, against the government of that land. It does not cover terrorism or other criminal conduct exported to other locations. Nor can the existence of an uprising be based on violence committed by persons who do not reside in the country or territory in which the violence occurs.[148]

Quinn v. Robinson is one of four cases in which Great Britain sought the extradition of members of the PIRA from the United States. Although Quinn was found extraditable, the extradition of the relators in the other three cases was denied on the grounds of the political offense exception. These three cases, In re McMullen,[149] In re Mackin,[150] and In re Doherty,[151] were decided under the 1972 Treaty of Extradition between the United States and the United Kingdom,[152] in accordance with the long-standing jurisprudence of the United States on the political offense exception.

These cases led to the conclusion of the Supplementary Treaty Concerning Extradition between the United States and the United Kingdom of June 25, 1985.[153] As a bilateral treaty, the Supplementary Treaty has no effect on the general law and jurisprudence of the United States concerning the limits of the political offense exception, except insofar as relations with the United Kingdom are concerned. Article I of the Supplementary Treaty limits the political offense exception by removing certain crimes from the purview of the exception. Article I excludes:

> (a) an offense for which both Contracting Parties have the obligation pursuant to a multilateral international agreement to extradite the person sought or to submit his case to their competent authorities for decision as to prosecution;
>
> (b) murder, voluntary manslaughter, and assault causing grievous bodily harm;
>
> (c) kidnapping, abduction, or serious unlawful detention, including taking a hostage;
>
> (d) an offense involving the use of a bomb, grenade, rocket, firearm, letter or parcel bomb, or any incendiary device if this use endangers any person;
>
> (e) an attempt to commit any of the foregoing offenses or participation as an accomplice of a person who commits or attempts to commit such as offense.

---

148 Id. at 813–814 (citation omitted). See c.f. Ordinola v. Clark, 402 F. Supp. 2d 667 (E.D. Va. 2005).

149 In re McMullen, Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979). See also supra note 135.

150 In re Mackin, No. 86 Cr. Misc. 1, at 47, 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7201, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 1981), appeal dismissed, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981). See also supra note 136.

151 In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270 (S.D.N.Y. 1984). See also supra note 137.

152 Extradition Treaty, supra note 19, 28 U.S.T. at 227.

153 The Supplementary Treaty was ratified by the United States Senate on July 17, 1986. For a discussion of the Northern Ireland conflict in relation to Irish and U.S. extradition laws, see 132 Cong.

The Supplementary Treaty was a landmark in the history of U.S. extradition law and policy. It signaled the end of the Reagan administration's support for years of legislative efforts to revise and update U.S. extradition law, which, for all practical purposes, had remained virtually unchanged since 1848. In addition, the Supplementary Treaty indicated that the selective bilateral treaty approach, rather than the legislative reform approach, had come into favor. The bilateral treaty approach relies on politically convenient bilateral treaties with friendly states and political allies, and denies similar favored-state treatment to less friendly states. In some respects such a policy is a reminder of the time when only friendly sovereigns and states practiced extradition. Extradition was then viewed as a process designed to benefit the mutual interests of political allies, to be used against those individuals who affected the political order or stability of the cooperating monarchs or states. The bilateral treaty approach also reflects a definite choice to revert to the nineteenth-century–view that extradition is a contract between states, for the benefit of states, in which individuals are objects of the process, rather than its subjects.

The position of the United States has been to consider the question of whether an offense is of a political character; this is a mixed question of law and fact, but chiefly one of fact.[154] The extradition magistrate, therefore, has the preponderant role, leaving to the reviewing courts an examination of the interpretation of the law and its proper application to the facts stated in the record. It is important to note that no established standards in the jurisprudence of the United States exist with respect to proof of the political offense exception. The various decisions referred to in this section differ widely on this point. They range from allowing the burden of proof to shift to the prosecution if the defense was raised by "some evidence," at which point the government is to prove its inapplicability by the "preponderance of the evidence," to requiring the defense to do so, or to prove it by "clear and convincing evidence." The latter is the preferable approach, but the circuits vary widely, and there is no national standard that can be relied upon.

The Supplementary Treaty was, for all practical purposes, in the nature of a bill of attainder designed to reach specific individuals who otherwise could not be extradited. In making its decision regarding the existence of a bill of attainder in McMullen,[155] the court relied on a three-pronged test, adopted by the Supreme Court. The test considers, inter alia, whether the act imposed punishment. The court concluded that:

> because the Supplementary Treaty does not in any sense "inflict punishment without a judicial trial," Lovett, 328 U.S. at 315, 66 S. Ct. at 1078 (quoting Cummings, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) at 323), it cannot be classified as a bill of attainder as applied to McMullen. Although punishment may follow extradition, extradition itself never has been considered punishment.[156]

The court continued, arguing that according to 18 U.S.C. § 3184

> the extradition proceeding culminates in a "surrender" to the foreign government rather than in punishment of any sort.... The consequence of McMullen's "surrender" may be punishment

---

Rec. S9119-S9171 (daily ed. July 16, 1986); Michael P. Simon, The Political Offense Exception: Recent Changes in Extradition Law Appertaining to the Northern Ireland Conflict, 1988 Ariz. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 244. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Political Offense Exception Revisited: Extradition between the U.S. and the U.K.—A Choice between Friendly Cooperation among Allies and Sound Law and Policy, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (1987); Christopher L. Blakesley, The Evisceration of the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 109 (1986); William M. Hannay, An Analysis of the U.S.–U.K. Supplementary Extradition Treaty, 21 Int'l L. 925, 928 (1987) (discussing limitation of the political offense exception); T.E. Molner, Recent Development, Extradition: Limitation of the Political Offense Exception, 27 Harv. Int'l L. J. 266 (1986); Abraham D. Sofaer, The Political Offense Exception and Terrorism, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 125 (1986).

154 Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502 (1896). See also Ramos v. Diaz, 179 F. Supp. 459 (S.D. Fla. 1959).

155 In re Extradition of McMullen, 989 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1993).

156 Id. at 611.

> in Great Britain, but that will follow a trial in the common law tradition from which our own criminal justice system is derived. Trial in Great Britain itself is by no means certain, because the government first must prevail at the extradition hearing.[157]

The court concluded that "We do not think that the burdens imposed upon McMullen are so severe that they eclipse the legitimate purposes of the Supplementary Treaty."[158] And that "Even without the retroactive provision, if the United Kingdom were again to request McMullen's extradition, his case would be reevaluated under the Supplementary Treaty. Surely, then, another extradition hearing does not constitute an unconstitutional burden.... A clearly non-punitive purpose has been identified here."[159] The court also noted that Senator Lugar stated that the purpose of the Supplementary Treaty, in the eye's of the Senate was "to reverse the three cases where extradition was denied."[160]

Even though the court found it difficult to conclude that the Supplementary Treaty targeted a certain number of individuals such as McMullen,[161] Mackin,[162] and Doherty,[163] there is no doubt that the purpose of the treaty was to reach individuals who under the traditional doctrine of the political offense exception would not have been found extraditable.

In another landmark extradition case, Eain v. Wilkes,[164] the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit added to the political incidence test that the offense must be directed against the political organization of the state. Applying this formulation to the facts of the case, where an alleged member of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) allegedly set off a bomb in a

157 Id. at 611–612.

158 Id. at 612.

159 Id.

160 Id.

161 See supra note 135.

162 See supra note 136.

163 See supra note 137.

164 Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981); cf. Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986); Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (dealing essentially with weighing evidentiary considerations, particularly the statements of the realtors as they were used in this case as well as in the Eain case); In re Extradition of Suarez-Mason, 694 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Cal. 1988). The court in Quinn was critical of the decision in Eain because that decision "superimposed a number of limitations on the exception that had not previously been a part of the US law." 783 F.2d 802. Essentially, Quinn rejected the notion that courts should balance policy considerations so that the exception, as stated in Eain, "did not afford a haven for persons who commit the most heinous atrocities for political ends." Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 803 (9th Cir. 1986) (quoting In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 275 n.4 (S.D.N.Y. 1984)). The same reasoning was also used in Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270. Quinn also rejected that notion in those terms. Thus, the Doherty court, like the Eain court, concluded that the traditional incidence test is insufficient to determine which offenses are protected by the exception. Both courts felt it necessary and appropriate to judge the political legitimacy of various ends and means and to exclude "illegitimate" acts from protection even if the incidence test was met.

Although not identifying their new limitations as such, both incorporated significant aspects of the Swiss ends-means or proportionality test into Anglo-American jurisprudence. Quinn concluded "we believe that tactics that are used in such internal political struggles are simply irrelevant to the question of whether the political exception is applicable." 783 F.2d 805. The essential difference between Quinn and Eain, the two leading cases on the relative political offense exception, is that Eain considered certain policy and political factors as well as the tactics and nature of the act committed by the realtors, while Quinn focused more on the political motivation of the actor within the context of the civil strife or domestic uprising and other relevant factors to the political incidence test. The two decisions do not substantially differ in their substance but they do in relation to the factors to be taken into account in weighing policy and factual considerations for the determination of the ultimate judgment.

public market square killing two people and injuring thirty-six, the court found that there was no link between the means employed and the target chosen so as to constitute an attack against the state. The court stated that:

> The exception does not make a random bombing intended to result in the cold-blooded murder of civilians incidental to a purpose of toppling a government, absent a direct link between the perpetrator, a political organization's political goals, and the specific act. Rather, the indiscriminate bombing of a civilian populace is not recognized as a protected political act even when the larger "political" objective of the person who sets off the bomb may be to eliminate the civilian population of the country.[165]

Thus, the accused failed to show a link between the act and the political objective, notwithstanding that he was a member of the PLO, whose avowed aim is opposition to the government of Israel. The court, affirming the holding of the magistrate, found that the position of the United States rests on the following tests:

1. The existence of war, revolution, civil strife, or civil upheaval;
2. the ideological motivation of the actor;
3. the target is the state or its political structures; and
4. the existence of a link or nexus between the motive of the actor, and the target of the act.

The court excluded other forms of violence directed at the society at large. The case, though relevant and significant as to the "political offense exception," is clouded by the questionable "probable cause" relied upon, as it was based on the confession of a Palestinian held in an Israeli military prison who subsequently recanted the confession.

The Ninth Circuit in Vo v. Benov summarized the theory of the political offense doctrine as follows:

> The political offense doctrine covers two types of crimes. Quinn, 783 F.2d at 793. The first are "relative" political offenses, which are "otherwise common crimes committed in connection with a political act," or "common crimes . . . committed for political motives or in a political context." Id. at 794 (citations omitted) (alteration in original). For this type of crime, we use the two-prong "incidence" test to decide whether a crime falls under the political offense exception. Id. The second are "pure" political offenses, such as treason, sedition, and espionage. Id. at 793–94. Because these crimes are by definition political, courts generally do not apply the incidence test to them. Id. at 794. Vo's offense is of the first type, and thus the incidence test applies.
>
> We explained the requirements of the incidence test in Quinn, id. at 794–811, which this court, sitting en banc, recently reaffirmed in Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 744, 750–51 (9th Cir.2005) (en banc) (per curiam). For a crime to qualify for the political offense exception under the incidence test, there must be "(1) the occurrence of an uprising or other violent political disturbance at the time of the charged offense, and (2) a charged offense that is 'incidental to' 'in the course of,' or 'in furtherance of' the uprising." Quinn, 783 F.2d at 797 (quoted in Barapind, 400 F.3d at 750) (internal citations omitted).
>
> The uprising prong constitutes the critical part of the incidence test. See Quinn, 783 F.2d at 806 ("[I]t is the 'uprising' component that plays the key role in ensuring that the incidence test protects only those activities that the political offense doctrine was designed to protect."). This prong has a number of facets that must be satisfied in order for an individual's conduct to be protected by the political offense exception. First, a "certain level of violence" must exist for the uprising prong to be satisfied. Id. at 807. Second, the prong involves a geographic limitation. An uprising "can occur only within the country or territory in which those rising up reside," and the charged offense must take place in that geographic area. Id. at 807 ("[T]he uprising component serves to exclude from coverage under the exception criminal conduct that occurs outside the country or territory in which the uprising is taking place."). This limitation ensures that the political offense exception will not serve to protect international terrorism. Id. at 813–14 ("[T]he word 'uprising' . . . does not cover terrorism or other criminal conduct exported to other locations.").[4] Third, the individual charged with the offense must be "seeking to change the form of the government under which [he] live[s]." Id. at 818. If the individual's conduct does not meet these criteria, the individual does not qualify for the political offense exception.[5] Because the level of violence in Vietnam falls far short of that required to qualify as an uprising, we hold that Vo's offense is not protected by the political offense exception to the Treaty. In the alternative, we hold that Vo does not qualify for the exception because his conduct does not satisfy the geographic requirement of the uprising test.

165 Eain, 641 F.2d at 520. See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

---

[4] See also Quinn, 783 F.2d at 807 ("The political offense exception was designed to protect those engaged in internal or domestic struggles over the form or composition of their own government, including, of course, struggles to displace an occupying power. It was not designed to protect international political coercion or blackmail, or the exportation of violence and strife to other locations.").

[5] The government points to another potential facet of the uprising prong: the political offense exception cannot apply where the government seeking extradition is not the same as the government against which the political violence is aimed. In support, it cites Quinn, which states that "in cases of international terrorism, we are being asked to return the accused to the government in the country where the acts were committed: frequently that is not a government the accused has sought to change." 783 F.2d at 806. Neither the district court nor the magistrate judge directly addressed this facet of the doctrine, and it is unnecessary to reach it here as Vo fails to satisfy the uprising prong of the incidence test for other reasons.

1. "A Certain Level of Violence"

The degree of violence in Vietnam at the time of Vo's conduct does not reach the level necessary to characterize it as an "uprising." Quinn described an uprising as synonymous with "rebellion" or "revolution" and involving "a certain level of violence." 783 F.2d at 807. The term does not "apply to political acts that involve less fundamental efforts to accomplish change or that do not attract sufficient adherents to create the requisite amount of turmoil." Id. Rather, an uprising "refers to a people rising up, in their own land, against the government of that land." Id. at 813.

The application of this facet of the uprising prong in other cases clearly demonstrates that the degree of violence in Vietnam at the time of the offense did not reach the level of an uprising. In Quinn, we held that an uprising occurred in Northern Ireland because there had been "a number of bombing campaigns" during a very long and frequently violent period of conflict between Irish nationalists and the United Kingdom. Id. at 812–13 (noting the Provisional Irish Republican Army, of which Quinn was a member, "advocated armed insurrection"). More recently, we found that "'[t]ens of thousands of deaths and casualties' . . . as Sikh nationalists clashed with government officers and sympathizers in Punjab" constituted "[s]ubstantial violence" sufficient to rise to the level of an uprising. Barapind, 400 F.3d at 750. Similarly, a continuing clash between indigenous people and police in northern Canada that was "not just an isolated violent disturbance" but part of a long history of struggle between native people and the government of Canada was found to constitute an uprising. United States v. Pitawanakwat, 120 F.Supp.2d 921, 935 (D.Or.2000).[6] Other courts analyzing the uprising prong have looked for "endemic and widespread violence." Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F.Supp. 389, 409 (E.D.N.Y.1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir.1990) (holding that violence against Israeli settlers in the West Bank, before the Intifada of the 1980s, was not an uprising). The analysis in these cases shows that in order to constitute an uprising, a conflict must involve either some short period of intense bloodshed or an accumulation of violent incidents over a long period of time. Barapind, 400 F.3d at 750; Quinn, 783 F.2d at 812.

---

[6] The district court there stated that: Native people from multiple tribes undertook simultaneous, if not coordinated, action in defense of their unceded lands and in defense of their people on more than one front by petitioning the Queen of England, setting up armed encampments, creating a supply network with other tribes, overtaking a Canadian military base, and taking control of large areas of land. Pitawanakwat, 120 F.Supp.2d at 935.

[. . .]

2. The Territory of the Uprising

Even were we to consider the level of violence in Vietnam at the time of Vo's conduct sufficient to constitute an uprising, Vo still would not qualify for the political offense exception because his crime did not occur "within the country or territory in which those rising up reside," as required by the incidence test. Quinn, 783 F.2d at 807.

[. . .]

Not only does Vo's interpretation of the geographic requirement of the uprising prong conflict with the text of Quinn, it conflicts with the requirement's underlying purpose as well. As we have previously noted, the territorial limitation on the uprising prong plays a critical role in the political offense doctrine—it ensures that the political offense exception is not used to allow international terrorists to escape prosecution or to encourage the spread of civil insurrections to neighboring states. Id. at 813–14.[9] Vo's construction of the territorial restriction would extend the scope of the political offense exception to cover many acts of international terrorism. Under Vo's understanding of the geographic requirement of the uprising prong, an offense that is sufficiently "symbolic"—in terms of either its location or its timing—need not occur in the country or territory of an uprising to be protected by the political offense exception. As many acts of international terrorism are committed for their symbolism (including the September 11, 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center) and often meet the other requirements of the incidence test, Vo's interpretation would allow such acts to be covered by the political offense exception—precisely what the geographic limitation of the uprising prong is designed to prevent. Similarly, the requirement is intended to prevent the use of the political offense exception by those seeking to spread internal conflicts to neighboring countries and thus to turn civil insurrections into regional conflicts. The essence of the exception is to protect against extradition those trying to change their own government by actions within their own territory.[10] Accordingly, we reject Vo's effort to create a discretionary exception to the territorial component of the political offense exception.

---

[9] We emphasized the function of the territorial limitation of the political offense exception in Quinn, stating that "the word 'uprising' means exactly that: it refers to a people rising up, in their own land, against the government of that land. It does not cover terrorism or other criminal conduct exported to other locations." Id. at 813–14; see also id. at 805 ("The application of [the political offense] exception to acts of international terrorism would comport with neither [the original justifications for the exception or the traditional requirements of the incidence test].").

[10] See id. at 807 ("[T]he uprising component serves to exclude from coverage under the exception criminal conduct that occurs outside the country or territory in which the uprising is taking place. . . . [The political offense exception] was not designed to protect . . . the exportation of violence and strife to other locations—even to the homeland of an oppressor nation. Thus, an uprising is . . . limited spatially.").

We also reject Vo's claim that when an offense is committed in another nation against the embassy of the country in which an uprising is occurring, the uprising prong's geographic requirement is met, even though the offense is committed outside of the borders of the country that is the object of the insurrection. We also reaffirm what we said in Quinn: in order to satisfy the geographic requirement of the incidence test's uprising prong, an offense must occur within the geographic borders of the nation at which the uprising is directed or within its occupied territory. Id. at 807. The geographic requirement is not satisfied when an offense occurs on property owned or controlled by that nation that is located within the geographic borders of another state. Because Vo committed the offense outside the territorial boundaries of the state in which the uprising was allegedly occurring, his conduct does not meet the geographic requirement of the incidence test's uprising prong, and therefore the crime does not qualify for the political offense exception.[166]

The third factor has to do with the intent of the person charged with the offense, namely that he/she is seeking to change the forum of government under which he/she lives, thus excluding any person acting with a personal motive as a profit motive.

2.1.5.2. The Injured Rights Theory

The injured rights theory has its basis in the French Extradition Law of March 10, 1927, and suggests that extradition cannot be granted when the circumstances show that it is sought exclusively for a political end.[167] It is not, however, the only theory followed by the French courts, and is considered a supplemental theory rather than an exclusive one. The principal theory followed in Europe is the political motivation theory, discussed below. In practice the injured rights theory often appears as a part of the political motivation theory, and has been evident in the reasoning of cases in France, Belgium, San Marino, Italy, Switzerland, and Germany. The leading case following this theory is In re Giovanni Gatti,[168] where the Republic of San Marino requested extradition of a member of a communist cell for attempted homicide. The court granted extradition and held that: "Political offenses . . . are directed against the constitution of the Government and against Sovereignty . . . and disturb the distribution of powers . . . [S]uch an offense affects the political organization of the state . . . The offense does not derive its political character from the motive of the offender, but from the nature of the rights it injures."[169]

---

166 Vo v. Benov, 447 F.3d 1235, 1243, 1240–1242, 1244–1245 (9th Cir. 2006).

167 See 2 George Levasseur, Juris Classeur de Droit International 405–410 (1965). For other European positions, see P. Lanza, L'Estradizion (1910); Pierre Papadatos, Le Délit Politique (1954); Dominique Poncet & Phillipe Neyroud, L'Extradition et L'Asile Politique en Suisse (1976); Hans Schultz, Das Schweizerische Auslieferungsrecht (1953); Theo Vögler, Auslieferungsrecht und Grundgesetz (1970). See also Laferriere, L'Evolution Récente du Droit Français de L'Extradition, Chronique Administrative Français (1978); Thomas Carbonneau, The Political Offense Exception as Applied in French Cases Dealing with the Extradition of Terrorists, 1983 Mich. Y.B. Int'l Legal Stud. 209; Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Provisional Arrest and Subsequent Release of Abou Daoud by French Authorities, 17 Va. J. Int'l L. 495 (1977); Martin E. Gold, Non-extradition for Political Offenses: The Communist Perspective, 11 Harv. Int'l L.J. 191 (1970); René Koering-Joulin, De Quelques Aspects, Judiciaries des Affaire des Autonomiste Basques Espagnols, Revue Française de Droit Administratif 165 (1985); Antonio Pagliaro, La Nozione di Reato Politico Agli Effeti Dell'Estradizione, 26 Rivista Italiana di Diritto e Procedura Penale 807 (1983); Mario Pisani, Delitto Politico Estradizione, Diritto D'Asilo, in 24 Estratto da Diritto Internazionale 213 (1970); Ray Riggle, L'Affaire Abou Daoud: Some Problems of Extraditing an International Terrorist, 12 Int'l Law 333 (1978); Christine Van den Wijngaert, L'Espace Judicaire Européen; Face à L'Euro- Terrorisme; et la Sauvegarde des Droits Fondementaux au Marché Commun, in Revue Internationale de Criminologie et de Police Technique 289 (1969).

168 14 I.L.R. 145 (Ct. App. Grenoble 1947) (Fr.).

169 Id. The Court of Appeal of Grenoble, France, further stated:

> Political offenses are those which injure the political organism, which are directed against the constitution of the Government and against sovereignty, which trouble the order established by the

A second case, In re Colman,[170] allowed extradition at the request of Belgium of an individual sought for and previously convicted in absentia of the crimes of collaboration with the enemy, carrying arms against the state, and assassination. The court reasoned that "in time of war, in a country occupied by the enemy, collaboration with the latter excludes the idea of a criminal action against the political organization of the state which characterizes the political offence."[171] In the context of executive discretion, it should be noted that the offenses charged against Colman were not covered by the extradition treaty between France and Belgium.[172] An exchange of notes between the two governments, which took place after the commission of the offenses, set forth the terms for the exchange of such offenders, considering them as falling within the scope of the treaty.[173] The court stated that "[the offender] has no right not to be surrendered for facts which were not provided for, at the time of the consummation of the offenses at the time when they were committed."[174] This insistence stretches the principle of nonretroactivity of criminal laws, and somewhat subverts the legislative effect of an extradition theory by its ex post facto amendment.

2.1.5.3 The Political Motivation Theory

The political motivation theory was developed by the Swiss courts, which attempted to modify the political incidence theory[175] developed by the English courts. Under this theory, the court does not look strictly to the nature of the rights injured, but rather tries to correlate the > fundamental laws of the state and disturb the distribution of powers. Acts which aim at overthrowing or modifying the organization of the main organs of the state, or at destroying, weakening or bringing into disrepute one of these authorities, or at exercising illegitimate pressure on the play of their mechanism or on their general direction of the state, or which aim at changing the social conditions created for individuals by the constitution in one or all of its elements, are also political offenses. In brief, what distinguishes the political crime from the common crime is the fact that the former only affects the political organization of the state, the proper rights of the state, while the latter exclusively affects rights other than those of the state.

---

Id.

170 14 I.L.R. 139 (Ct. App. Paris 1947) (Fr.).

171 Id. at 141 (emphasis added).

172 Extradition Treaty, Fr.–Belg., Aug. 15, 1874, cited in In re Colman, 14 I.L.R. 139 at 139.

173 In a case decided by the same court nine months prior to the Colman decision, France refused Belgium's extradition request for the crime of economic collaboration with the enemy, holding that the exchange of notes between the countries could not be considered as it was not mentioned by the requesting government as a grounds for granting surrender. Also, it was stated that "such a convention [the notes] . . . cannot, without ratification and publication, have force of law in the meaning of Article 26 of the Constitution of the French Republic of 1946."

In re Talbot, 14 I.L.R. 142, at 142 (Ct. App. Paris 1947) (Fr.).

174 In re Colman, 14 I.L.R. 139 at 140. For the opposite holding, see Denmark (Collaboration with the Enemy) Case, 14 I.L.R. 146 (STF 1947) (Braz.).

175 Concerning relative political offenses, the Federal Tribunal of Switzerland has stated:

> A relative political offense is one which, while having the characteristics of a common offense, acquires a political character by virtue of the motive inspiring it, of the purpose for which or the circumstances in which it has been committed; in other words, it is in itself a common offense but has a predominantly political character.

In re Ficorilli, 18 I.L.R. 345, 345 (Federal Tribunal 1951) (Switz.). See also In re Barratini, 9 Ann. Dig. 412 (Ct. App. Liege 1936) (Belg.). Frequently, the term "political offense" is used to cover both "purely" political offenses and "relative" political offenses. Thus, the Belgian court of appeal stated in Barratini:

ideological beliefs of the offender and the proportionate effect of his/her acts or offenses, and the political purpose in trying to reach an equitable result which locks in the other theories.

In 1908, the Swiss Federal Tribunal stated in the case of V.P. Wassilief[176] that three general principles had to be met in order for an offense to be political: (1) that the offense was committed for the purpose of helping or ensuring the success of a purely political purpose, (2) that there was a direct connection between the crime committed and the purpose pursued by a party to modify the political or the social organization of the state, and (3) that the political element predominated over the ordinary criminal element.

The problem of interpretation appears in the case of In re Pavan,[177] where the French government requested extradition of an anti-fascist journalist accused of murdering an Italian fascist. The Swiss court, rejecting the defense's plea of political offense, held that the crime > is invested with a predominately political character only where the criminal action is immediately connected with its political object. Such connection can only be predicated where the act is in itself an effective means of attaining this object or where it is an incident in a general political struggle . . . .[178]

The same reasoning was applied in the Ockert case. In 1933, the Prussian minister of justice requested the extradition from Switzerland of Ockert on a charge of homicide. It appeared that Ockert, a member of the Reichsbanner, a quasi-military organization of the German Social-Democratic Party, became involved in an altercation on a street in Frankfurt with certain members of the National Socialist Party, particularly Bleser, whom he struck with his fist. Ockert then ran and when pursued by the group fired several shots at them with his pistol, killing Bleser. Ockert contended that the charge came within Article 4 of the Swiss-German Extradition Treaty of 1874, which prohibited extradition for offenses of a political character. The Federal Tribunal of Switzerland agreed. The Tribunal referred to previous cases involving similar facts, particularly a case in which a Swiss Federal Court had refused extradition of a person convicted of complicity in a brawl between members of the Fascist Party in a small Italian village and their local antagonists on the grounds that the clashes between such groups were not mere casual disputes arising from local or personal enmity, but part of a struggle that was on such a wide scale that it came near to being a civil war. In the instant case, the Tribunal noted that reports of the incident in German newspapers spoke of "Marxist Murder Tactics" and "Sacrifice in the Service of the New Reich," and concluded that the case was essentially one of political conflict and that Ockert was thus not extraditable.[179]

> A political offense is one which, in essence, is directed against the political regime or which, though normally constituting an ordinary crime ("crime de droit commun"), assumes the character of a political crime because the aim of the author of the crime was to injure the political regime. However, an ordinary crime committed under the influence of party passion against an adversary cannot be regarded as political unless it occurred as an episode in a civil war between combatants engaged in a violent struggle in which the constitution of the State was in issue.
>
> 9 Ann. Dig. at 412.

176 Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States 520–521 (1909). See also Deere, supra note 22, at 253.

177 4 Ann. Dig. 347 (Federal Court 1928) (Switz.). See also In re Peruzzo, 19 I.L.R. 369 (Federal Tribunal 1951) (Switz.).

178 Id. at 348–349.

179 In re Ockert, 7 Ann. Dig. 369 (Federal Tribunal 1933) (Switz.). In In re Ragni, 2 Ann. Dig. 286 (Federal Court 1923) (Switz.), Italy unsuccessfully sought the extradition for attempted homicide of one Ragni, who took part in an encounter between fascists on the one hand and socialists, communists, and "Popolari" on the other, in which a number of persons were injured by shots and otherwise. Similarly, a Swiss Federal Court refused an Italian request for the extradition of one Camporini, former mayor of Corresio and secretary of the Social-Democratic Party, accused of shooting and fatally wounding Tizzoni, a

Relating what is called passive resistance to political regimes and the relative political offense, the Swiss approach in the case of In re Kavic[180] linked the noncommission of an act of opposition to the commission of an act likely to be deemed criminal. In this case, Yugoslavia sought the extradition of the members of an airplane crew who had diverted a local flight and landed in Switzerland. They were charged with the crimes of endangering the safety of public transport and wrongful appropriation of property. The Swiss court, in denying the extradition request, held that although the political character of the offense must outweigh its common characteristics (the danger of harm to the passengers being minimal), it need not be related to a realization of political objectives or occurring within a fight for political power.[181] This position is no longer valid in light of the 1963 Tokyo Convention and the 1970 Hague Convention, which established unlawful seizure of aircrafts as an international crime.[182]

An illustrative case outlining the political motivation theory is the Ktir case.[183] The appellant, a French national, was a member of the Algerian Liberation Movement (FLN). Kitr was responsible, along with three other persons, for the November 14, 1960 murder in France of another member of FLN who was suspected of treason by the relator's chiefs. Kitr then fled to Switzerland, and France requested his extradition. He contested the request on the ground that France was at war with the FLN and that the act he had committed was that of killing an enemy. He further contended that, if extradition were granted, it had to be made subject to the condition that he would not be executed, as the offense would not be punished by capital punishment in Switzerland. The Court held that extradition must be granted for the following reasons:

> 1. Political offenses included common crimes which had a predominately political character, from their motive and factual background. However, the damage had to be proportionate to the aim sought; in the case of murder, this had to be shown to be the sole means of attaining the political aim. The offense in this case did not satisfy this requirement of proportionality.
>
> 2. A condition that the accused would not be sentenced to death could be attached to the extradition only if the relevant treaty expressly prohibited capital punishment.
>
> 3. The extradition should be subject to the condition that the appellant would not be prosecuted or sentenced for other activities. This was required in order to give effect to the principle of specialty contained in Article 8 of the Extradition Treaty [of July 9, 1869].
>
> . . .
>
> 4. According to Articles 1 and 2 of the Treaty, extradition is authorized if the acts committed are punishable under both Swiss and French law; if they constitute one of the offenses listed in the Convention; and if they do not constitute political offenses. Political offenses include offenses which, although constituting acts falling under the ordinary criminal law, have a predominately political character as a result of the circumstances in which they are committed,

---

Fascist, during disturbances accompanying the Italian parliamentary elections in 1924. In re Camporini, 2 Ann. Dig. 283 (Federal Court 1924) (Switz.). The Swiss Federal Tribunal, recognizing this deficiency, has said in In re Kavic, Bjelanovic, and Arsenijevic:

> That restrictive interpretation does not, however, bear re-examination; it does not meet the intention of the law, nor take account of recent historical developments, such as the growth of totalitarian States. In such States all political opposition is suppressed and a fight for power is, if not impossible from the start, at least practically without any chance of success. Those who do not wish to submit to the régime have no alternative but to escape it by flight abroad. . . . This more passive attitude for the purpose of escaping political constraint is no less worthy of asylum than active participation in the fight for political power used to be in what were earlier considered to be normal circumstances. 19 I.L.R. 371, 373–74 (Federal Tribunal 1952) (Switz.).

180 19 I.L.R. 371 (Federal Tribunal 1952) (Switz.). See also Poncet & Neyroud, supra note 167.

181 19 I.L.R. at 373.

182 See infra Sec. 2.1.7.

183 34 I.L.R. 143 (Federal Tribunal 1961) (Switz.).

> in particular as a result of the motives inspiring them and the purpose sought to be achieved. Such offenses, akin to relative political offenses, presuppose that the act was inspired by political passion, that it was committed either in the framework of a struggle for power or for the purpose of escaping a dictatorial authority, and that it was directly and closely related to the political purpose. A further requirement is that the damage caused be proportionate to the result sought, in other words, that the interests at stake should be sufficiently important to excuse, if not to justify, the infringement of private legal rights. Where murder is concerned, such a relationship exists only if homicide is the sole means of safeguarding more important interests and attaining the political aim.[184]

Even though the Ktir case also involved an issue of exclusion for military offenses and the death penalty, the court found that if extradition were granted for one or more offenses charged and not for others, the rule of specialty[185] would preclude the prosecution of the relator for such offenses but would not constitute a bar to his extradition for other offenses deemed extraditable.[186] (The position of the United States is to that extent partially compatible with that of Switzerland, and the general practice under customary international law.)

In Ktir, the required ultima ratio was evaluated on an objective basis and examined whether the act was in reality the only possible alternative.[187] This objective approach, however, was abandoned a few years later in the Watin case,[188] where the ultima ratio was determined by a subjective analysis. In that case the French government requested the extradition of the relator for his alleged participation in an attack by the Secret Army Organization against General de Gaulle at Petit-Clamart. In assessing the extradition request the court inquired into whether, in the perpetrator's opinion, the act was the only alternative. The federal tribunal held that Watin's act constituted an ultima ratio, stating that:

> [E]xtradition can be refused even if homicide was not, in reality, the only means to reach the goal sought. It should have appeared in fact to the culprit as the most appropriate means under the given circumstances, even if the interest at stake could, in principle, have been safeguarded in another manner, for example by an electoral victory.[189]

The courts of the Netherlands have adopted the Swiss proportionality theory. In In re Joseph Jean B.,[190] France requested the extradition of a relator who, after being conditionally released from a prison term for participation in a holdup organized by the Secret Army Organization, was then sought to serve the rest of his term because the release decision had been revoked. The Supreme Court of the Netherlands held that although the political motive for the robbery gave a political aspect to the case, this political aspect, when evaluated in light of the other circumstances, was not of primary importance. Thus, the crime in question was determined to be a common offense giving rise to extradition.[191]

In three other cases involving terrorist acts, namely Folkerts, Wackernagel, and Schneider,[192] the relators, all members of the Red Army Faction (also known as the Baader-Meinhof group),

---

184 Id. at 143–144.

185 See Ch. VII., Sec. 6.

186 See supra note 122 and accompanying text.

187 See Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 129.

188 90 Arrêts Tribunal Fédéral Suisse 299 (1964), cited in Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 129.

189 Id. at 300–301, cited in and translated by Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 130.

190 Judgment of Nov. 9, 1976, HR, NJ No. 75 (1977) (Neth.), cited in Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 131.

191 See Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 131.

192 Folkerts, Judgment of Jan. 25, 1978, Trib. Maastricht (Neth.); Wackernagel, Schneider, Judgment of Jan. 26, 1978, Trib. The Hague, cited in Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 131.

were requested for terrorist acts committed by that organization, and the courts of the Netherlands applied the Swiss proportionality test. After being confirmed by the Supreme Court, the extradition requests were granted by the government of the Netherlands.[193]

Although, as mentioned earlier, the French courts have a history of following a more objective approach to the political offense exception, two decisions have added subjectivity to this analysis by expressly emphasizing the seriousness of the act as a requirement for the request for extradition.[194] In Croissant[195] the relator was accused by the German government of establishing communications between criminal organizations and granting indirect assistance to the Red Army Faction, a political organization that engaged in acts of a criminal nature. In rejecting Croissant's claims to the political offense exception, the Court of Appeals of Paris found that the crimes were not inherently political, and that the political motivation was not sufficient to characterize the crime as a political offense. The court stated that the crimes of the accused:

> [d]o not present any common feature which would allow them to be integrated in a systematically organized struggle against something in favor of something else, but which, on the contrary, are characterized by the contempt towards the life [sic] of the victims, innocent because not involved in the political facts, and towards the property of other persons . . . [E]ven assuming that the crimes alleged to the "Baader Gang"—and these are essentially blood crimes—would reveal a certain political motivation, this circumstance would not by itself constitute an obstacle to the extradition of Croissant.[196]

In 1979, the Court of Appeals of Paris confirmed this position in the Piperno case,[197] in which the Italian government requested the extradition of the accused on charges of participating in the kidnapping and murder of Aldo Moro, the former Italian prime minister. The court rejected the relator's contention that this act was of a political character and held that this case, stating that:

> [R]eveals the extreme seriousness of the facts alleged since, in addition to the physical and mental torture implied by a sequestration of many weeks, they have consisted of the killing of the innocent hostage. Whatever be the purpose pursued or the context in which such acts are located, they cannot, taking into account their seriousness, be considered as being of a political character.[198]

The position of Western European states is still ambiguous as to what constitutes a relative political offense, even though the 1957 European Convention on Extradition contains the exception in its Article 3. Member states of the Council of Europe recognize that it is a judicial question that depends essentially on the facts and circumstances of every case. Recent extradition legislation in several of the European states has yet to be applied, and its jurisprudential significance remains to be established.

---

193 Folkerts, Judgment of May 8, 1978, HR, NJ No. 314 (1978) (Neth.); Wackernagel, Judgment of May 8, 1978, HR, NJ No. 315 (1978) (Neth.); Schneider, Judgment of May 8, 1978, HR (not published) (Neth.) cited in Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 131.

194 See Christopher L. Blakesley, Extradition between France and the United States: An Exercise in Comparative and International Law, 13 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 653 (1980). This approach has been referred to by one commentator as "the mixed approach." Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 123.

195 Croissant, Judgment of Nov. 16, 1977, 2d decision, Cour d'Appel de Paris, 93 J. Trib. 52 (1978) (Fr.), cited in and translated by Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 124.

196 Id.

197 Piperno, Judgment of Oct. 17, 1979, arret no. 1343-79, at 14, Cour d'Appel de Paris (not published) (Fr.), cited in and translated by Van Den Wijngaert, supra note 3, at 124.

198 Id.

The 1975 Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition addresses many of the questions raised in the practice of European states but since the additional protocol was adopted, the positions of different member states of the Council of Europe have remained somewhat at variance.[199] Though almost all European states have limited the application of the political offense exception, differences among states remain as to such matters concerning whether the entry of the criminal transaction must be motivated by a political purpose to the exclusion of other motives. On the whole, motives have become secondary to the specific prohibitions in the protocol concerning certain acts. These acts are totally excludable from the political offense exception irrespective of the perpetrator's motives. The protocol supersedes prior differences that existed in the laws and practices of European states. Nevertheless, to the extent that this prior jurisprudence may have an impact on contemporary and future cases, it is described below as illustrative of the variances that existed in European states.

2.1.5.4. International Limitations on the Relative Political Offense

Contemporary political terrorism poses a new dilemma to extradition.[200] Although terrorism is not a new phenomenon, scientific and technological advances have given it new characteristics. In particular the prevalence of mass communication in modern society has made attacks on unknown innocent civilians just as effective in attracting attention as the killing of heads of states, ambassadors, or prominent politicians. In addition, developments in mass transportation have made it easier for an offender to seek refuge in other states. Moreover, the increased availability and destructive use of technological advancements, such as incendiary, biological, chemical, or even nuclear weapons, leave the full potential of terrorist activities unknown.[201] Despite this growing concern there has been no successful, worldwide response. This is due to factors such as the absence of an international consensus, the low level of "prosecutorial fervor" in many states, and the broad interpretation given political offenses in extradition.[202]

In 1972,during the drafting of the United Nations a Draft Convention on the Prevention and Suppression of Terrorism the United States introduced the obligation for signatories to prosecute or extradite any person accused of committing a terrorist act of international 199 See http://conventions.coe.int/Treaty/en/Treaties/Html/086.htm.

---

200 For a case noting this issue as discussed further herein, see In re Smyth, 863 F. Supp. 1137, 1149 (N.D. Cal. 1994).

201 For an in-depth discussion of the trends in modern terrorism, see Louis G. Fields, Jr., Bringing Terrorists to Justice—The Shifting Sands of the Political Offense Exception, in International Aspects of Criminal Law: Enforcing United States Law in the World Community 15 (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981); William M. Hannay, International Terrorism and the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 18 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 381, 381–382 (1979); Steven Lubet & Morris Czackes, The Role of the American Judiciary in the Extradition of Political Terrorists, 71 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 193, 193–195 (1980); Note, Politics of Extradition, supra note 87, at 632–636.

202 See Christopher L. Blakesly, Terrorism, Drugs, International Law, and the Protection of Human Liberty (1992); Jeffrey B. Gaynes, Note, Bringing the Terrorist to Justice: A Domestic Law Approach, 11 Cornell Int'l L.J. 71, 73 (1978). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Control of Terrorists: Some Policy Proposals, 37 Int'l Rev. Crim. Pol'y 44 (1981); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Terrorism, Law Enforcement and the Mass Media: Perspectives, Problems, Proposals, 72 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1 (1981); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Prolegomenon to Terror Violence, 12 Creighton L. Rev. 745 (1979); Cantrell, supra note 58; Carbonneau, supra note 11; Geoffrey S. Gilbert, Terrorism and the Political Offense Exception Reappraised, 34 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 695 (1985); Steven Lubet, Extradition Reform: Executive Discretion and Judicial Participation in the Extradition of Political Terrorists, 15 Cornell Int'l L. J. 247 (1982); Note, Politics of Extradition, supra note 87; Kenneth S. Sternberg & David L. Skelding, Note, State Department Determinations of Political Offenses: Death Knell for the Political Offense Exception in Extradition Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 137 (1983).

significance, but the draft was not adopted.[203] The danger to innocent lives and the threat to international order were advanced as the rationale for the convention. Nevertheless, a number of states have consistently opposed such measures because of concern that action against international terrorism would encompass legitimate national liberation movements, and also because there has been some success in the development of conventions to prevent and punish specific types of terrorist conduct, such as hijacking, attacks on diplomats, and hostage taking. In 1976, however, a European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism[204] was adopted, which lists several offenses that may not be regarded as political offenses. Although the Convention represents progress in the prevention and punishment of terrorism, it falls short of its goal by containing language that permits a requested state to determine whether an offense is one of a political character and to exempt extradition on that basis.

The narrowing view of the political offense exception was expressed by the Supreme Court of Greece in the 1976 extradition of Rolf Pohle, a German accused of terrorism. The Greek Supreme Court adopted "a very narrow definition of a political crime, taking it to cover only the actions aiming directly at overthrowing the existing system, not all those prompted by political ideas or motives."[205] Two cases decided in France also reflect this growing trend.[206] The Paris Court of Appeals, acting on an Italian request for extradition of Francesco Piperno and Lanfranco Pace, two fugitives implicated in the brutal kidnap-murder of Aldo Moro, found that the charges were undeniably common crimes. Despite the political context, the court noted the extreme seriousness of the charges, which involved the murder of an innocent person held against his will. These cases demonstrate persuasively that European courts are beginning to narrow the political offense exception.

2.1.6. A Proposed Juridical Standard of Inquiry into the Political Offense Exception[207]

To determine the relationship of the offenses committed as a part of a political scheme, and particularly under the relative political offense, as shown in the theories discussed above, the motive of the offenses must be examined. But further inquiry must be made into the nature of the criminal transaction. This inquiry leads to the following questions: (1) Were all the offenses committed part of the same (political) criminal transaction? (2) What was the number or extent of these violations? (3) How were they related in scope, time, place, and social significance? (4) To what extent did the political scheme necessitate the commission of such multiple offenses? and (5) Could they readily be identified as lesser-included offenses, or did they appear to be related only by the actor's design?

One interesting question arises at this point: if this inquiry concludes only partially in favor of the relator, should the extradition judge or executive authority weigh the degree of compliance of the relator's conduct to these tests versus his/her noncompliance and determine its outcome by a "preponderance of compliance" test? Or, should the judge disqualify the relator from the

---

203 Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Certain Acts of International Terrorism, U.N. GAOR 6th (Legal) Comm., 27th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/C.6/L850 (1972). See also Robert Friedlander, Terrorism: Documents of International and Local Control (vols. 1–6, 1981); Bassiouni, supra note 36.

204 Jan. 27, 1977, 15 I.L.M. 1272. See also Christine Van den Wijngaert, La Belgique et l'Exception pour Délits Politiques en Matière d'Extradition: Analyse Critique de la Pratique Judiciaire et Administrative, 59 Rev. de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie 833 (1979).

205 See Richard B. Lillich & John M. Paxman, State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens Occasioned by Terrorist Activities, 26 Am. U. L. Rev. 219, 302–303 (1977).

206 In re Piperno, [1979] T.A.C.P. 376 (Fr.); In re Pace, [1979] T.A.C.P. 367.

207 See Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 254–257.

benefit of the "political offense" exception because there was a single instance of noncompliance? In this case, we also see the limited chances of a juridical solution in a world system in which the ultimate relationship between political units is predicated upon a concept of coequal sovereigns exercising all-too-often conflicting coequal authority. Were the alternative a vertical jurisdictional authoritative process, the issue would then be removed from the contentious or opposing coequal horizontal authoritative process and the opportunity for direct conflict would be greatly reduced.

The search for an objective standard can be analogized to the principle of self-defense. Self-defense, the justified use of force against another to insure one's own safety, is commonly accepted in all penal systems. The primary consideration in the law of self-defense is a value judgment based on the inherent justification of self-preservation and the potential harm to be inflicted upon the aggressor. The means authorized, the use of force, is dependent upon the nature of the potential harm sought to be inflicted upon the aggressor. It is also dependent upon the nature of the potential harm sought to be inflicted by the aggressor on the victim, and the latter's need to prevent such harm from occurring. Hence, if an individual's fundamental human rights are seriously violated, either by an institutional entity or a person or persons wielding the authority of the state and acting on its behalf without lawful means of redress, then the individual's conduct, which was necessitated by the need to redress a continuing wrong, is justified or mitigated, and therefore the request for the extradition of the individual warrants a denial.

This right to ideological self-preservation or political self-defense is predicated on three categories of factors: the nature of the rights involved, the conduct of the violative nation-state, and the individual who exercised self-defense. The first, factors bearing upon the nature of the "rights" that were originally violated, include: (1) the nature of those "rights" and their sources; (2) the extent to which those "rights" are indispensable or necessary to the survival or basic values of the people; (3) the historical and traditional existence of those "rights" and the degree of their availability and enjoyment by the people; (4) the extent of the people's reliance upon them in relation to their implantation in the social psychology as necessary, indispensable, or fundamental to the way of life; (5) the duration of their abridgment and, if sporadic, their recurrence; (6) the potential or foreseeable voluntary termination of the transgression by the violating body or person; and (7) the existence or reasonable availability of a local or international remedy or legal method of redress of such wrongs. These factors, for the most part, can be ascertained objectively and tangibly by impartial and objective inquiry into their existence and their validity by the extradition magistrate or the executive authority in the exercise of his/her discretionary power to grant or deny extradition.

The second category includes factors bearing upon the conduct of the nation-state that were seriously violative of these "fundamental rights." These include the following: (1) the nature of the transgression, abridgment, violation, termination, subversion, or abolition of the "right" or "rights" claimed; (2) the quantitative and qualitative evaluation of the violations; (3) the manner in which they were violated, the extent of the violation, the means used to accomplish it, the duration of the violation, and the frequency of their recurrence; (4) the avowed or implicit intentions of continuing these violations or their termination within a declared or foreseeable future time; (5) the issue of whether these violations were conditioned, caused, prompted or forced by conditions or necessity such as natural catastrophes, disasters, war, insurrection or other factors affecting the physical and tangible existence or viability of the nation-state that would justify or mitigate such conduct; (6) the existence of any methods or means of redress, remedies, or channels that were open or made available to the aggrieved party or group to which the relator belongs; and (7) the existence of any repressive actions taken against those who claimed grievance and pursued legal channels of remedy in the prescribed manner or who challenged the offensive public conduct in a manner deemed lawful by the common standards of the ordinary times of that nation. The factors in this category also lend themselves to objective inquiry.

The third category assumes the existence and validity of the conditions of the factors in the first and second categories, and includes factors bearing upon the conduct of the individual who violated the positive law of the state in defense of these "fundamental human rights." These include: (1) the exhaustion of all available local and international remedies, excepting risks or repression; (2) the explicit or implicit common understanding in the ordinary reasonable person (of the nation-state in question) that no redress was available in the reasonably foreseeable future and that such conduct was, if not warranted, at least excusable (exonerating or mitigating) because no other alternative existed; (3) the issue of whether the individual's conduct was proportionate or commensurate with the nature of the right or rights violated in terms of their objective significance in the common understanding of the ordinary reasonable person of the nation-state in which the conduct took place; (4) the issue of whether the individual's conduct was related only to the original wrong in a negative or vengeful way, or whether it was also intended to terminate it or to affect its redress and, thus, has a positive aspect to it; (5) the issue of whether the means used were limited to achieve these purposes, and there was no violation committed that was not necessitated by the attainment of such goals through the least harmful manner; and (6) the issue of whether the assumption of any risks created would fall on the individual perpetrator, and whether the means and tactics used would not endanger innocent persons.

This theory of ideological self-preservation is not advanced as a means to warrant or justify lawlessness or anarchy; rather, the theory is intended to relate an otherwise nebulous concept—the subject of nefarious political manipulations—to the sphere of a legally or judicially manageable theory of law. Although it is beyond the scope of this chapter to expose and discuss the ramifications of such a proposition, this proposed theory is intended to set forth a juridical framework as to what could be considered a politically motivated offense that would shield its perpetrator from the repressive powers of the state against which the violation was directed.

To discern between objective and subjective standards of evaluating the nature of the relator's conduct is not only a procedural question, but also a substantive one, because it is outcome-determinative of the issue of extraditability of the relator. Such a choice by national public policy is one that is largely determined by the overall political outlook of the state in terms of its place in the relationship between the nation-states of the world community and the ideological political alignment of the state in question. To promulgate an objective standard, however, requires the acceptance of a decision made in furtherance thereof, and would eliminate opportunities for conflicts.

2.1.7. International Crimes: The Exception to the Political Offense Exception

Offenses against the law of nations of Delicti Jus Gentium by their very nature affect the world community as a whole. As such, they cannot fall within the political offense exception because, even though they may be politically connected, they are in derogation of the "laws of mankind" in general and international criminal law in particular.[208]

208 See, e.g., M.Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2003); M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code & Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal 21-65 (1987) [hereinafter Bassiouni Draft Code]; 1 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law (Crimes) (2d ed. 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni I ICL]. See also Bart B. Deschutter, La Belgique et le Droit International Pénal (1975); Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Les Priniples Modernes du Droit Pénal International (1928); Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Introduction a L'étude du Droit Pénal International (1922); Stefan Glaser, Droit International Pénal Conventionnel (vol. 1 1977, vol. 2 1978); Stefan Glaser, Infraction Internationale (1957); Stefan Glaser, Introduction a L'étude de Droit International Pénal (1954); Hans-Heinrich Jescheck, Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsor- gane Nach

The concept of crimes against "international law" is a vague and generic term intended to cover all acts proscribed by an international convention declaring the conduct specifically to be an "international crime" or requiring its parties to "prosecute or extradite." Thus, they would constitute an "exception to the exception." In other words, international crimes would be extraditable offenses without the benefit of the political offense exception.[209] International crimes should indeed be considered extraditable offenses without the benefit of the political offense exception, but in order for this position to be accepted as a rule of international law, it must be based either on conventional international criminal law, or customary international law. To date, there is only scant indication that it is recognized as a custom evidenced by the practice of states. A growing trend exists, however, toward acceptance of this position in furtherance of the preservation of a minimum world order.[210] Nevertheless, it must be emphasized that a clear definition of those international crimes falling within the doctrine of the "exception to the exception" must be set forth in conventional international criminal law. Without such clear understanding of those crimes specifically encompassed within the meaning of international criminal law, the rule cannot be effectively or uniformly applied, and consequently such a situation would be detrimental to the goals of judicial assistance and cooperation in extradition.[211] Summarizing this problem, this writer noted:

> In the application of extradition treaties to the cases of persons charged with, or convicted of crimes under municipal law it may be essential, in the exercise of the generally beneficent principle that political criminals shall not be subject to extradition to decide whether or not a crime was political. But where an offense is made by treaty a crime under international law, the principle of non-extradition of political criminals would be contrary to public policy.[212]

Volkerstrafrecht (1952); Joachin Kohler, Internationales Strafrecht (1917); Nino Levi, Diritto Penale Internazionale (1949); Jean Claude Lombois, Droit Pénal International (2d rev. ed. 1979); Friedrich Meili, Lehrbuch des Internationalen Strafrechts und Strafprozessrechts (1910); Friedrich Meili, Bartolus Als Haupt der Ersten Schule des Internationalen Strafrechs: Ein Historisches Bild (1908); Gerhard O. Mueller & Edward M. Wise, International Criminal Law (1965); Dietrich Oehler, Internationales Strafrecht (1973); Vespasian V. Pella, La Codification du Droit Pénal International (1928); Roberto Quadri, Diritto Penal Internationale (1944); Antonio Quintano Ripoles, Tratado de Derecho Penal Internacional e Internacional Penal (2 vols. 1955–1957); Maurice Travers, Le Droit Pénal International et sa Mise en Oeuvre en Temps de Paix et en Temps de Guerre (5 vols. 1920–1922); Otto Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen Zur Entwicklung Des Materillen Volkerstrafrechts Seit Nuremberg (1966); Diritto Penale Internazionale (Consiglio Superiore della Magistratura 1979). See generally M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law Conventions and Their Penal Provisions (1997) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Conventions].

209 See Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Crimes against Humanity and the Principle of Non-extradition of Political Offenders, 62 Mich. L. Rev. 927 (1964); Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, War Crimes and the Principle of Non-extradition of Political Offenders, 9 Wayne L. Rev. 269 (1963) [hereinafter War Crimes]; Jean Graven, L'extradition des Auteurs de Crimes de Guerre et de Crimes Contre L'humanité, 24 Annals de Droit Int'l Medical 7 (1973); Leslie C. Green, Extradition v. Asylum for Aerial Hijackers, 10 Isr. L. Rev. 207 (1975); Leslie C. Green, Political Offenses, War Crimes and Extradition, 11 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 329 (1962); Robert G. Neumann, Neutral States and the Extradition of War Criminals, 45 Am. J. Int'l L. 495 (1951); Gian Domenio Pisapia, Brevi Note in Tema di Estradizione per I Delitti di Genocidio, 9 Rivista del Diritto Matrimoniale e Dello Stato Delle Persone 1 (1967).

210 See, e.g., Myres S. McDougal & Florentino P. Feliciano, Law and Minimum World Public Order (1961).

211 See A Treatise on International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 2 vols. 1973) [hereinafter Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise]. See generally, 2 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law (2d ed. 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni, 2 ICL].

212 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law (2d ed. 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity]; M. Cherif Bassiouni, The History of the

The concept of international crimes encompasses two sources of offensive conduct: (1) that which offends the common morality of mankind, and is recognized as offensive to mankind at large; and (2) that which by treaty has been recognized as an international crime. Only the latter can be recognized as falling within the "exception to the exception."

The process of positing international criminal law and attempting to codify it must be credited to the United Nations, even though certain international crimes, such as piracy and war crimes, long predated the United Nations' efforts. On November 21, 1947, the General Assembly established the International Law Commission as a permanent body, and charged it with "the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification."[213] In another resolution adopted on the same day, the Commission was specifically directed to:

> (a) Formulate the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the tribunal, and
>
> (b) Prepare a draft code of offenses against the peace and security of mankind indicating clearly the place to be accorded to the principles mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) above.[214]

In its report of 1950, the International Law Commission set forth the various principles of international law as recognized in the Charters of the Nuremberg and Tokyo war crimes trials, and in the judgments of those tribunals.[215] In 1954, the Commission formulated the Draft Code of Offenses against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[216]

Among the considerations underlying the principles of international criminal responsibility is the belief that duties may be imposed on individuals by international law without any interposition of municipal law, because, as Justice Robert Jackson said at Nuremberg in his capacity as chief prosecutor: "crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities."[217] Only by punishing individuals guilty of an international crime independently of the law of any particular country can the peace and security of mankind be preserved. This belief implies that individuals have international duties that transcend national obligations of obedience imposed by individual states, and places a duty upon each state to prosecute or surrender for prosecution such offenders. This principle was not always successfully put to the test. A case in point is that of Kaiser Wilhelm II and other German officials who, under Articles 227 and 228 of the Treaty of Versailles (1919),[218] were to be prosecuted for an "offense against international law, morality, and the sanctity of treaties." The kaiser, who sought refuge in the Netherlands, was not surrendered to the Allies. The Dutch government refused his surrender on the grounds that it had a tradition of granting asylum to those "vanquished in

---

Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and the Security of Mankind, 11 Nouvelles Études Pénales 1 (Ass'n Int'l de Droit Pénal 1993); D.H.N. Johnson, The Draft Code of Offenses against the Peace and Security of Mankind, 4 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 445, 456–457 (1955).

213 G.A. Res. 174, U.N. Doc. A/519, at 105 (1947). The latest draft is the 1991 Draft Code of the Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Report of the International Law Commission, 43rd. Sess., Apr. 29–July 19, 1991, 46th Sess., Supp. (No. 10), A/46/10), cited in Association Internationale de Droit Pénal, Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against Peace and Security of Mankind (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1993). See also Bassiouni Draft Code, supra note 205; Bassiouni, I ICL, supra note 205; Bassiouni, Conventions, supra note 208.

214 G.A. Res. 177, U.N. GAOR, 2d Sess., U.N. Doc. A/519, at 111–112 (1947). See also supra note 213.

215 U.N. GAOR, 5th Sess., Supp. 12, at 11–14, U.N. Doc. A/1316 (1950).

216 U.N. GAOR, 9th Sess., Supp. No. 9, at 11–12, U.N. Doc. A/2693 (1954). See also Johnson, supra note 212.

217 1 Trials of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal 223 (1947).

218 See 13 Am. J. Int'l L. 151 (Supp. 1919) (setting forth the text of the treaty).

international conflict."[219] The Dutch government also refused on the grounds of the political offense exception, and no such exception was found applicable because the crimes charged were of an international character. It is significant to note, however, that whenever the international crime does not contain elements that could be characterized as political (such as in the case of aggression,[220] and even in the case of war crimes[221] and crimes against humanity[222]), the world community has found itself cooperating in matters such as suppression of slavery and slave trade,[223] illicit traffic of narcotics,[224] counterfeiting,[225] piracy,[226] and aircraft hijacking.[227]

The following is a catalog of twenty-eight recognized international crimes, each of which should, therefore, constitute an exclusion from the political offense exception: aggression;[228] genocide;[229] crimes against humanity;[230] war crimes;[231] crimes against United Nations and associated

---

219 See James W. Garner, Punishment of Offenders against the Laws and Customs of War, 14 Am. J. Int'l L. 70 (1920); Quincy Wright, The Legal Liability of the Kaiser, 13 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 120 (1919).

220 For a summary of its development, see Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise, supra note 211, at ch. 3; Julius Stone, Aggression and World Order (1958).

221 See Garcia-Mora, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 209. See also 12 Dep't State Bull. 155, 160 (1945).

222 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Law and the Holocaust, 9 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 201 (1979); Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 212.

223 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement as International Crime, 23 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 445 (1991). See Ved P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni, Slavery and Slave Trade: Steps Toward Its Eradication, 12 Santa Clara L. Rev. 424 (1972).

224 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The International Narcotics Control System: A Proposal, 46 St. John's L. Rev. 713 (1972).

225 Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, Apr. 20, 1920. See also 4 Manley O. Hudson, International Legislation 2692–2705 (1931).

226 See Geneva Convention on the High Seas, Apr. 29, 1958, 13 U.S.T. 2312, 450 U.N.T.S. 82 (entered into force Dec. 4, 1969). See also 4 Whiteman Digest, supra note 18, at 657.

227 See 1958 Geneva Convention, supra note 226, art. 15; Tokyo Aviation Convention, Sept. 14, 1963, 20 U.S.T. 2941, 704 U.N.T.S. 219 (entered into force Dec. 4, 1969); Hague Hijacking Convention, Dec. 16, 1970, 22 U.S.T. 1641 (entered into force Oct. 14, 1971). See also 4 Whiteman Digest, supra note 18, at 657–659; Alona E. Evans, Aircraft Hijacking: Its Cause and Cure, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 695 (1969); Arthur I. Hirsch & David Otis Fuller, Aircraft Piracy and Extradition, 16 N.Y.L.F. 392 (1970).

228 G.A. Res. 3314, U.N. GAOR, 29th Sess., Supp. No. 31 at 142, U.N. Doc. A/9631 (1974). See also Benjamin B. Ferencz, Defining International Aggression (2 vols. 1975); M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Definition of Aggression in International Law: The Crime against Peace, in 1 Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise, supra note 211, at 159.

229 The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, Dec. 9, 1948, 78 U.N.T.S. 277. Article III states that genocide shall not be considered as a political crime for the purpose of extradition.

230 Charter of the International Military Tribunal, art. 6, annexed to Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis [London Charter], August 8, 1945, 59 Stat. 1544, 8 U.N.T.S. 279, reprinted in 3 Bevans 1238 (entered into force August 8, 1945; entered into force with respect to the United States August 8, 1945). See also Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 212.

231 See Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land [Second Hague, IV] October 18, 1907, 36 Stat. 2277, 1 Bevans 631 (entered into force January 26, 1910; entered into force with respect to the United States January 26, 1910); Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, Aug. 12, 1949, art. 147, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 75 U.N.T.S. 287 (entered into force August 12, 1949; entered into force with respect to the United States February 2, 1956); Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick of Armed Forces in the Field, August 12, 1949, art. 49, 6 U.S.T. 3114, 3146, 75 U.N.T.S. 31, 62 (entered into force October 21, 1950; entered into force with respect to the United States February 2, 1956); Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick personnel; unlawful possession or use or emplacement of weapons;[232] theft of nuclear materials;[233] mercenarism;[234] apartheid;[235] slavery and slave-related practices;[236] torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment;[237] unlawful human experimentation;[238] piracy;[239] aircraft hijacking and unlawful acts against international air safety;[240] unlawful acts against the safety of maritime navigation and the safety of platforms on the high seas;[241] threat and Shipwrecked Members of the Armed Forces at Sea, August 12, 1949, art. 50, 6 U.S.T. 3217, 3250, 75 U.N.T.S. 85, 116 (entered into force October 21, 1950; entered into force with respect to the United States February 2, 1956); Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, August 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 (entered into force October 21, 1950; entered into force with respect to the United States February 2, 1956); Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts [1977 Protocol I] of June 8, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144 (1977) annex 1, reprinted in 16 I.L.M. 1391 (entered into force December 7, 1977); Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts, [1977 Protocol II], U.N.Doc. A/32/144 (1977) Annex II, reprinted in 16 I.L.M. 1391 (entered into force December 7, 1978). See also The Laws of Armed Conflicts (Dietrich Schindler et al. eds., 1988); Howard S. Levie, Terrorism in War—The Law of War Crimes (1993); The Law of War (Leon Friedman ed., 1972).

---

232 See, e.g., Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons which may be Deemed to be Excessively Injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects, October 10, 1980, U.N. Doc. A/Conf. 95/15 (1980), reprinted in 19 I.L.M. 1523. See also Schindler, supra note 231, at 101–201.

233 Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, March 3, 1980, reprinted in 18 I.L.M. 1419 (entered into force February 8, 1987).

234 International Convention Against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries, December 4, 1990, G.A. Res. 44/34, U.N. Doc. A/RES/44/34 (December 11, 1989).

235 International Convention on the Prevention and Suppression of the Crime of Apartheid, November 30, 1973, G.A. Res. 3068, U.N. GAOR, 28th. Sess., U.N. Doc. A/9030, at 42 (1973), reprinted in 13 I.L.M. 50 (entered into force July 18, 1976); International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, March 7, 1966, 660 U.N.T.S. 195, reprinted in 5 I.L.M. 352 (entered into force January 4, 1969). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel H. Derby, Final Report on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court for the Implementation of the Apartheid Convention and Other Relevant International Instruments, 9 Hofstra L. Rev. 523 (1981) (embodying this writer's report to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, E/CN.4/AC/22CRP.19/Rev. 1 (Dec. 10, 1980)).

236 See Bassiouni, Conventions, supra note 208, at 419–512. See also Bassiouni, supra note 223.

237 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, arts. 7, 8; G.A. Res. 46, U.N. GOAR, 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984) (entered into force June 26, 1987; entered into force with respect to the United States November 20, 1994). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal, nos. 3–4 (1977).

238 M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Appraisal of Human Experimentation in International Law and Practice: The Need for Regulation of Human Experimentation, 72 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1597–1666 (1981).

239 Geneva Convention on the High Seas, supra note 226, 13 U.S.T. 2312; Convention on the Law of the Sea (Montego Bay Convention), December 10, 1982, U.N.Doc. A/CONF.62/122, 516 U.N.T.S. 205, reprinted in 21 I.L.M. 1261 (entered into force November 16, 1994).

240 Tokyo Aviation Convention, supra note 227, 20 U.S.T. 2941, reprinted in 2 I.L.M. 1042; Hague Hijacking Convention, supra note 227, 22 U.S.T. 1641, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 133; Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, September 23, 1971, 24 U.S.T. 564, 974 U.N.T.S. 177, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 1151 (entered into force January 26, 1973); Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation, supplementary to the Convention done on September 23, 1971, adopted on February 24, 1988, S. Treaty Documents 100–119, reprinted in 27 I.L.M. 627 (entered into force November 18, 1994).

241 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, arts. 10, 11, March 10, 1988, I.M.O. Doc. SUA/CON/15 (1988), reprinted in 27 I.L.M. 672 (entered into force March 1, 1992); Protocol for the Supression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Fixed and use of force against internationally protected persons;[242] taking of civilian hostages;[243] unlawful use of the mail;[244] unlawful traffic in drugs and related drug offenses;[245] destruction and/or theft of national treasures;[246] unlawful acts against certain internationally protected elements of environment;[247] international traffic in obscene materials;[248] falsification and counterfeiting;[249] unlawful interference with international submarine cables;[250] bribery of foreign public officials;[251] financing terrorism;[252] and organized crimes.[253]

Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf, March 10, 1988, I.M.O. Doc. SUA/CON/16/Rev.1 (1988), reprinted in 27 I.L.M. 685 (entered into force March 1, 1992).

242 Convention to Prevent and Punish the Acts of Terrorism Taking the Form of Crimes Against Persons and Related Extortion that are of International Significance (Inter-American), arts.3,7, February 2, 1971, O.A.S. Doc. A6/doc.88 rev.1, corr. 1, 27 U.S.T. 3949, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 255 (entered into force October 16, 1973; entered into force with respect to the United States October 20, 1976); Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, arts. 7,8, Dec. 28, 1973, 28 U.S.T. 1975, 1035 U.N.T.S. 167, reprinted in 13 I.L.M. 41 (entered into force February 20, 1977).

243 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, art. 10, December 17, 1979, T.I.A.S. No. 11081, U.N. G.A. Res.34/145 (XXXIV), 34 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No.46) at 245, U.N.Doc. A/34/46 (1979), reprinted in 18 I.L.M. 1456 (entered into force June 3, 1983; entered into force with respect to the United States January 6, 1985); European Convention on the Supression of Terrorism (European Terrorism Convention), arts. 1, 2, 3, 4, January 27, 1977, Europ. T.S. No.90, reprinted in 15 I.L.M. 1272 (entered into force August 4, 1978).

244 See Bassiouni, Conventions, supra note 208, at 311.

245 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, March 30, 1961, 18 U.S.T. 1407, 520 U.N.T.S. 151 (entered into force December 13, 1964); Convention on Psychotropic Substances, February 21, 1971, T.I.A.S. No. 9725, 1019 U.N.T.S. 175, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 261 (entered into force August 16, 1976); United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, art. 6, December 20, 1988, U.N. Doc. E/Conf.82/15 Corr.1 and Corr.2, reprinted in 28 I.L.M. 493 (entered into force November 11, 1990).

246 Convention on the Protection of the Archaelogical, Historical, and Artistic Heritage of the American Nations (Convention of San Salvador), art. 14, June 16, 1976, O.A.S. G.A. Res.210 (VI-0/76) Organization of American States, I Proceedings of the General Assembly, 6th Regular Session, Santiago, 4–18th June 1976, reprinted in 15 I.L.M. 1350; Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property (UNESCO Cultural Convention), November 14, 1970, 823 U.N.T.S. 231, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 289 (entered into force April 24, 1972). See also Hague Convention (1907) and Geneva Conventions (1949), supra note 231.

247 See Bassiouni, Conventions, supra note 208.

248 Agreement for the Suppression of the Circulation of Obscene Publications of May 4, 1919 and Amended by Protocol of May 4, 1949, 47 U.N.T.S. 159 (entered into force March 1, 1950).

249 International Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, art.10, April 20, 1929, 112 L.N.T.S. 371, reprinted in 4 Hudson 2692 (entered into force February 22, 1931); and its optional Protocol of April 20, 1929, 112 L.N.T.S. 395 (entered into force February 30, 1930).

250 Convention for the Protection of Submarine Cables, March 14, 1884, 24 Stat. 989, in 11G.F. de Martens Nouveau Recueil Général de traités (ser.2) 281 (Gottingue, Dieterich 1841) (*entered into forc*e May 1, 1888, entered into force with respect to the United States May 1, 1888). See also Montego Bay Convention, supra note 239.

251 International Agreement on Illicit Payments, (Economic and Social Council Committee) art.11, May 25, 1979, U.N.Doc.E/1979/104, reprinted in 18 I.L.M. 1025.

252 International Convention for the Suppression of Financing Terrorism, G.A. Res. 54/109 (Dec. 9, 1999).

253 Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime; Annex I: Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime; Annex II: Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children; Annex III: Protocol Against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air, G.A. Res. 24, U.N. GAOR, 55th Sess., Supp. No. 49, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (Vol. I.) (2001) (entered into force Sept. 29, 2003).

Of those, the following contain the duty to extradite: genocide; crimes against humanity; war crimes; crimes against United Nations and associated personnel; theft of nuclear materials; apartheid; mercenarism; slavery and slave-related practices; torture; piracy; aircraft hijacking and unlawful acts against international air safety; unlawful acts against the safety of maritime navigation and the safety of platforms on the high seas; threat and use of force against internationally protected persons; taking of civilian hostages; unlawful traffic in drugs and related drug offenses; destruction and/or theft of national treasures; falsification; and counterfeiting.

Only some of these instruments contain a specific requirement that extradition be granted.[254] In all these cases, however, the obligation to extradite arises by multilateral treaty, binding only upon its signatories (subject to proper ratification) and does not constitute a self-executing obligation but must be embodied in bilateral extradition treaties. In the case of all other international crimes, the obligation to extradite arises under customary international law and general principles of international law. But these two sources are somewhat challenged by those states that will not recognize an obligation to extradite outside their treaties,[255] as well as by other states for different reasons.[256] There is a question as to whether violations of minimum standards of human rights have ripened into a crime under international law, but so far there has been no such recognition either by treaty or customary international law.[257] Consequently, such violations cannot be construed, as yet, as international crimes. Similarly, proposals covering terrorism and conscription of minors, which have often been discussed at international conferences, have not been adopted and therefore are not included in this catalog of international crimes. However, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child has an optional protocol regarding the involvement of children in armed conflict, which extends special protections to persons under eighteen years of age and is intended to limit their participation in hostilities and prohibit their forced conscription into armed conflicts.[258]

The issue of international crimes was raised in the Artukovic case, in which the United States Court of Appeals stated:

> We now consider the question whether because the offenses are also called "war crimes" they have lost their character as "political offenses" within the meaning of the treaty. Appellant argues

---

254 See supra notes 228–252. See also Ch. I, Sec. 2. For examples of treaties limiting the reach of the political offense exception to conform to multinational agreements, see Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 4(2)(b), entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Peruvian Extradition Treaty, art. IV(1)–(3), entered into force Aug. 25, 2003, S. TREATY DOC. 107-6; Korean Extradition Treaty, art. 4(2)(b), entered into force Dec. 20, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 106-2, TIAS 12962; Indian Extradition Treaty, art.4(2), entered into force July 21, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-30, TIAS 12873; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 4(2), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5 ("For purposes of this Treaty, the following offenses shall not be considered to be political offenses…an offense for which both Contracting Parties have the obligation pursuant to a multilateral international agreement to extradite the person sought or to submit the case to their competent authorities for decision as to prosecution").

255 See Ch. I.

256 In the case of neutral states, for example, see Neumann, supra note 209.

257 For a survey of international crimes including certain violations of human rights, see 1 Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise, supra note 211. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The "Human Rights Program:" The Veneer of Civilization Thickens, 21 DePaul L. Rev. 271 (1971). Future developments will depend largely on what the late Professor W. Friedmann wrote in his article on changes that must be made to "material" sources of international law. Wolfgang Friedmann, The Use of "General Principles" in the Development of International Law, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 279 (1963). See generally Bin Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Court and Tribunals (2d ed. 1987).

258 Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict, May 25, 2000, 2173 U.N.T.S. 222. This optional protocol entered into force February 12, 2002, and has 128 signatories and 142 parties. See United Nations Treaty > that "war crimes" are crimes for which extradition is to be granted within the meaning of international acts to which the United States is a party. It is argued by recent legal writers that the "barbarity and atrocity of the crimes as in crimes against the law of war and crimes against humanity" when committed weigh so heavily upon the common crime element that the political act has practically ceased to exist and, therefore, that the extradition of the offender is the only justifiable course of action.

>
> Appellant in essence argues that by virtue of resolutions taken in 1946 and 1947 by the United Nations General Assembly as to the surrender of alleged war criminals, it is incumbent on this Court to hold that Artukovic is charged with an offense which is extraditable.
>
> We have examined the various United Nations Resolutions and their background and have concluded that they have not sufficient force of law to modify long standing judicial interpretations of similar treaty provisions. Perhaps changes should be made as to such treaties . . . .[259]

On appeal, the Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the case to the district court,[260] but in a clear and uncompromising decision, the district court declined "to go into the question of extradition for so-called war crimes,"[261] and emphatically held that Artukovic's offenses were of a political character, and thus denied his extradition.[262] The district court apparently saw a close connection between the common crime with which Artukovic was charged and his political activity. As one author noted:

> A case comparable to the Artukovic case is that of Jan Durcansky, recently decided by the Buenos Aires Court of First Instance, and involving a request from the Czechoslovakian Government for the surrender of a person accused of having participated in mass murders of civilians in Czechoslovakia during the period from November, 1944 to the end of the war. In refusing his extradition, the Court said that Durcansky was protected by extinctive prescription according to Article 16 of the Argentine Penal Code. Though apparently the General Assembly's resolutions urging the members of the United Nations to surrender war criminals were before the Argentine court in the same manner as they were before the Court of Appeals in the Artukovic case, the result was still the same since, admittedly, such resolutions are too tenuous to have any legally binding force.
>
> Apart from the countries above mentioned, it has already been seen that Great Britain and Australia have also refused to extradite war criminals upon essentially similar grounds, while Italy has based its refusal to surrender on the well established principle that a State is not required to extradite its own nationals.[263]

Collections, available at: http://treaties.un.org/Pages/ViewDetails.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg_no=IV-11-b&chapter=4&lang=en (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

259 Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198, 204–205 (9th Cir. 1957).

260 355 U.S. 393 (1958).

261 United States v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383, 392 (S.D. Cal. 1959). See also Bozilov v. Seifert, 967 F.2d 353, 355 (9th Cir. 1992), amended by 983 F.2d 140 (9th Cir. 1993).

262 Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. at 393.

263 Garcia-Mora, War Crimes, supra note 209. Garcia-Mora further states:

> [T]hat the reluctance to extradite war criminals is almost universal among the States is excellently illustrated by the Brazilian case In re Kahrs et al., [15 I.L.R. 301 (STF 1948) (Braz.)] involving the request for the extradition of certain Norwegian nationals accused of having been members of an organization guilty of war crimes. In denying their extradition, the Brazilian Supreme Court firmly held that "The accused . . . are charged with genuinely political crimes. They are being prosecuted for their political ideas, such as supporting a nationalist organization or sympathizing with the ideas propagated by the same . . . There arises a question of crimes distinctly political in nature when Norwegian law punishes expressions of thought, opinion, or related matters." [Id. at 301–02.] This decision is quite consistent with the previous Denmark (Collaboration with the Enemy) Case, [14 I.L.R. 146 (STF 1947) (Braz.)] involving the extradition of certain Danish nationals convicted in Yugoslavia's efforts to extradite Artukovic were renewed in 1985. This time the extradition request was granted by the district court,[264] and affirmed by the Ninth Circuit.[265] The Ninth Circuit found that the earlier classification of his offenses as being political had no bearing on the renewed extradition request[266] and so made its own determination that the crimes with which Artukovic was charged were beyond the scope of the political offense exception.

On other grounds, the United States refused extradition to the Soviet Union of a Lithuanian national to whom it had granted asylum. The relator had been convicted in absentia by a Russian tribunal for the mass murder of some 50,000 civilians while in command of a German punitive battalion in 1941. In rejecting the Soviet request, the Department of State vigorously asserted that "a person accused of war time mass murders might not get a trial in the Soviet Union that would be considered fair according to United States standards."[267]

In another case, Israel's request for the extradition of John Demjanjuk, accused of being a Nazi death camp guard known as "Ivan the Terrible," was granted on the basis of the theory of universality of jurisdiction in In re Demjanjuk.[268] The court, however, held Israel's exercise

---

> Denmark of collaborating with the German occupation forces. In refusing their extradition, the Brazilian Supreme Court succinctly said that "the crime of assisting the enemy in time of war is a political one lato sensu because it is a crime against the State in its supreme function, namely, its external defense and its sovereignty." [Id. at 146–47.] The difference between these two Brazilian cases and the Artukovic case is radically important, for while the latter involved the commission of atrocities allegedly in the pursuit of a political end, the Brazilian cases, on the other hand, dealt with the expression of unpopular political opinion and the crime of treason, both of which have been generally regarded as purely political offenses. Thus, the reason for giving asylum to the offenders in the Brazilian cases appears fairly plain.
>
> Id. at 289–290.

264 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal. 1986). In 1985, a class action by Jewish persons who had been citizens of Yugoslavia while Artukovic was in the government there during WWII was dismissed. The suit sought damages from Artukovic for his alleged involvement in deprivations of life and property. The district court dismissed the action on the grounds that the plaintiffs had no private right of action, and that thirty-five years was beyond the time in which the plaintiffs should have brought their claims. Handel v. Artukovic, 601 F. Supp. 1421 (C.D. Cal. 1985).

265 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986).

266 Id. at 1356. Artukovic was extradited in February 1986. In May of that year, he was convicted of the murders of thousands of civilians and prisoners of war during WWII and was sentenced to death. In September 1986, the Yugoslav Federal Court upheld the death sentence for the eighty-six–year-old Artukovic. See Yugoslavia Upholds Nazi's Death Penalty, Chi. Trib., Sept. 3, 1986, at A6. See also Bozilov v. Seifert, 967 F. 2d 353 (9th Cir. 1992), amended by 983 F. 2d 140 (9th Cir. 1993).

267 N.Y. Times, Sept. 17, 1962, at 12. See generally Hyde, supra note 84. In the note of Secretary of State Lansing to the governor of Texas explaining the refusal to extradite General Huertas to Mexico, the Department of State rejected a demand for his extradition because of the probable doubt as to the political character of the crimes charged, the lack of orderly machinery of justice by which a fair trial could be expected, and the possibility that accomplices in Mexico may take this means of obtaining the release and return of their leader. 1915 Foreign Relations of the United States 834. This position is difficult to reconcile with the government's position in other cases on the rule of non-inquiry. See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

268 In re Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 571 (N.D. Ohio), aff'd, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986). In earlier opinions issued in the course of the extradition proceedings, the district court considered whether an extradition request alleging war crimes had to be heard by a military tribunal, and the credibility of the evidence relied upon by Israel to establish that Demjanjuk was "Ivan the Terrible." In re Demjanjuk, 603 F. Supp. 1463 (N.D. Ohio 1984). The court concluded that a military tribunal was unnecessary and then set out the parameters of the issues to be decided, including whether the authority existed to extradite Demjanjuk to Israel when the alleged crimes had not occurred there, and whether the alleged crimes were political offenses. Id. But see United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d of jurisdiction to be consistent with Israel's municipal law[269] and international law. The court found that international law did not prohibit the exercise of a state's jurisdiction over noncitizens or acts committed outside its territory, and that international law provided that punishment for certain offenses could be undertaken by any state where the offenses had been the subject of "universal condemnation and [a] general interest in cooperating to suppress [such offenses], as reflected in widely-accepted international agreements and resolutions of international organizations."[270]

Another case that attracted international attention was that of Klaus Barbie, the "Butcher of Lyon." Barbie's deportation from Bolivia, where he had lived for thirty years as Klaus Altman, was sought by both France and Germany. Rather than extradite him, however, Bolivia expelled him to French Guiana for violating immigration regulations, where he was immediately seized by French authorities and flown to France.[271] While being prosecuted in Lyon

---

1168 (10th Cir. 1991); Leighnor v. Turner, 884 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1989); United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1988).

269 Israel enacted the Nazis and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment) Law, 5710-1950, in 1950, making crimes against humanity, crimes against the Jewish people, and war crimes punishable in Israel.

270 In re Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 544, 555–556 (N.D. Ohio 1985). Demjanjuk sought habeas corpus relief, which was denied. Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 612 F. Supp. 571 (N.D. Ohio), aff'd, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986). See In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 1998); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999); United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997). See also Demjanjuk v. Meese, 784 F.2d 1114 (D.C. Cir. 1986). Demjanjuk sought and was denied a stay of execution of an extradition warrant under the International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide because, inter alia, petitioner was extradited for murder, not genocide. Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel in February 1986, and his trial there began in January 1987. See Stephen Broder, "Ivan the Terrible" Case Isn't Open and Shut, Israelis Admit, Chi. Trib., Sept. 28, 1986, at A4. Demjanjuk was convicted in 1988 and while his final appeal was being argued before the Israeli Supreme Court, the Cincinnati court ordered the case reopened. Mark Hansen, Extradition Reopened: Justice Denies It Withheld Evidence about Ivan the Terrible, ABA J., Sept. 1992, at 33. A subsequent ten-month inquiry by U.S. District Judge Thomas A. Wiseman, Jr. unearthed evidence that suggests that John Demjanjuk is not the murderous Ivan of the Treblinka death camp. In Jerusalem, the Justice Ministry said that Judge Wiseman's report was "irrelevant" to the Israeli case and prosecutors criticized the evidentiary value of the statements. David Johnston, Doubt Cast on Identification of Man as Nazi Guard "Ivan," N.Y. Times, July 1, 1993.

> The Cincinnati court's action was unique in at least two respects. No appeals court has ever reopened an extradition case on its own motion. And no extradition case has ever been reopened on the basis of news accounts and other evidence that is not part of the record . . . By reopening the case, the court also has raised a number of complex legal questions involving jurisdiction, the separation of powers and other matters of international law and diplomacy, experts say . . . . If the appeals court were to decide that Demjanjuk should not have been extradited, the U.S. could ask Israel to send him back, leaving the Israelis free to file a new extradition request for him. But if the Israelis refused, experts say that a recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling, U.S. v. Alvarez-Machain, could prove instructive. In Alvarez-Machain, the Court held that a Mexican doctor who was kidnapped and brought to the United States could be tried here for the torture and murder of a Drug Enforcement Administration agent. The Supreme Court did not find the abduction precluded U.S. jurisdiction, but rather upheld the finding of jurisdiction because the treaty did not explicitly prohibit kidnapping.

Hansen,supra at 33–34. For subsequent developments concerning Demjanjuk, see Ch. IXI, Sec. 13 & Ch. XI, Sec. 2 on Prosecutorial Misconduct. Demjanjuk was ultimately extradited to Germany where he was convicted of war crimes and sentenced to five years in prison. See Jack Ewing & Alan Cowell, Demjanjuk Convicted for Role in Nazi Death Camp, N.Y. Times, May 12, 2011.

271 See Bolivia Expels Fugitive Nazi Barbie, Chi. Trib.., Feb. 5, 1983, at A3; "Butcher of Lyon" Awaits Trial, Chi. Trib., Feb. 6, 1983, at A3; France to Retry Gestapo Murderer, Chi. Trib., Feb. 7, 1983, at A3.

for crimes against humanity, Barbie made a procedural objection to the court's jurisdiction and argued for the applicability of the statute of limitations. However, the Cour de Cassation found that the exercise of jurisdiction was appropriate, that crimes against humanity are not subject to any statute of limitations, and that the procedure followed by the Lyon court was in accordance with both French and international law.[272]

In the 1980s, three states, Australia, Canada, and the United Kingdom, enacted enabling statutes to prosecute war criminals based on a modified version of universal jurisdiction couched in terms of extended and retrospective national criminal jurisdiction.[273] The Australian War Crimes Amendment Act of 1988 allows for the prosecution, in national courts, of war criminals whose crimes were committed between September 1, 1939, and May 8, 1945.[274] Although limited in time, the statute is based upon an application of universal jurisdiction, as it applies to crimes committed outside of Australia and by and against individuals with whom Australia had only a tenuous connection at the time of the crime.[275]

The Canadian legislation is not temporally limited as is that of Australia. The 1987 Act to amend the Criminal Code provides that any person who commits a war crime or a crime against humanity "shall be deemed to have committ[ed] that [crime] in Canada at the time of the act or omission, if the crime, if committed in Canada would constitute an offence against the laws of Canada in force at [that] time."[276] In 1989, Canada made its first prosecution for "crimes against humanity," Regina v. Finta,[277] under the 1987 statute that incorporates this international crime into Canadian criminal law. This statute, which is retrospective but not retroactive, requires that "crimes against humanity" be established under international law at the time the alleged crime was committed and that the specific crimes charged also constitute a violation of Canadian criminal law when the alleged criminal conduct occurred. There are also other jurisdictional requirements needed to satisfy the Canadian law.[278]

In Finta, a former Hungarian Gendarmerie Captain named Imre Finta was charged, inter alia, with the deportation of 8,617 Jews from Szeged, Hungary, to Auschwitz, Poland, and Strasshof, Austria, in June 1944 as a part of Nazi Germany's plan to exterminate Jews.[279] No one knows how many of the deportees died in transit, in that death camp, or in other slave-labor camps. Finta was acquitted on May 25, 1990, and the judgment was upheld by the Ontario

---

272 Judgment of May 7–8, 1986, GP Nos. 127, 128, at 4 (Cass. crim. Dec. 20, 1985) (Fr.). On July 3, 1987, he was convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to life imprisonment. Barbie died in 1991. Nazi Sympathizer in France Gunned Down; Victim Persecuted Thousands of Jews, Chi. Trib., June 9, 1993, at 6; Leila Sadat Wexler, The Interpretation of the Nuremberg Principles by the French Court of Cassation: From Touvier to Barbie and Back Again, 32 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 32 (1994). See Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 212, at 431.

273 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at 511.

274 War Crimes Amendment Act 1988, § 9, 1989 Austl. Acts 926; 119 Parl. Deb., S. 497 (1987); 157 Parl. Deb., H.R. 1613 (1987), cited in Bassiouni, supra note 212, at 512.

275 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at 512. See Maryann Stenberg, Australia: Trial Opens for Pensioner Accused of War Crimes, The Age (Melbourne), source Reuter Textline, Mar. 19, 1993 (stating: "Ivan Timofeyevich Polyukhovich, 77, is charged with two counts relating to his alleged involvement in the 1942 mass annihilation of European Jews. This case is the first under the War Crimes Amendment Act of 1988.").

276 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at 512. As of this writing, the United Kingdom has not formally charged any war criminals, although in 1991, investigators estimated that there would be enough evidence to put the first of more than seventy suspected Nazi war criminals living in Britain on trial by the next year. Alastair Percival, War Criminal Trials a Race against Time, Press Association Limited Press Association Newsfile, May 10, 1991.

277 [1989] 61 D.L.R. 4th 85 (Ontario High Court of Justice) (Can.).

278 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at ix.

279 Id.

Court of Appeal in 1992.[280] The Federal Government later appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, which upheld the lower court's decision.[281] This writer was asked by the Canadian Department of Justice to serve as its legal expert, and reviewing such horrors, even forty-five years later, was deeply moving. Because the facts in this case occurred in 1944, this writer could not rely on the Law of the Charter for precedent. Thus, working on the Finta case was its own small "Nuremberg"—a daunting task.[282]

Trying to establish that "crimes against humanity" existed as an international crime in 1944 left this writer with the conclusion that the legal validity and viability of "crimes against humanity" still needs to be made, Nuremberg and Tokyo notwithstanding, or perhaps despite these precedents. This conclusion leads one to the belief that nothing short of a new comprehensive convention can resolve the problems left to us by the Nuremberg and Tokyo legacy.[283]

As described by this writer in Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application:

> Post-Charter legal developments apply to the substance of CAH [Crimes Against Humanity] as well as to procedural or enforcement aspects related to CAH. There are also other substantive proscriptive norms that encompass the same protected interests as CAH, which are embodied in different international instruments. They are: genocide, war crimes, torture, slavery and slave-related practices, and some aspects of terror-violence.
>
> In the course of CAH's historical evolution from 1945 to 1998, there have been slight variations in the succeeding formulations of CAH. The International Law Commission (ILC) alone had four different formulations. The first was in 1950, when it codified the Nuremberg Principles, then it varied from that text in its 1954 Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, then again it set aside this formulation in favor of a new text adopted in 1991, and lastly that text was abandoned in 1996 in favor of another one. In 1993 and 1994 respectively, the Security Council established two ad hoc international criminal tribunals, the ICTY and ICTR, and their respective statutes had different definitions of CAH. In 1998 the Rome Statute of the ICC was adopted, and it too had a different formulation than all other definitions that preceded it.[284]

As described above, crimes against humanity were prominently included in the statues of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY)[285] and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR),[286] which follow the formulations found in the statutes

---

280 Regina v. Finta, [1992] 92 D.L.R. 4th 1, (Ontario Ct. App.) (Can.).

281 [1994] 1 S.C.R. 701 (Supreme Court of Canada).

282 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at ix. See also J.G. Castel & Sharon Williams, The Extradition of Canadian Citizens and Sections I and 6(I) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1987 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 263.

283 Bassiouni, supra note 212, at ix. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Revisiting the Architecture of Crimes against Humanity, in Forging a Convention for Crimes against Humanity 43 (Leila N. Sadat ed., 2011); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: The Case for a Specialized Convention, 9 Wash U. Global Stud. L. Rev. 401–593 (2011).

284 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application 167–168 (2011). See also id. at 171–183.

285 The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), S.C. Res. 808, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/808 (1993).

286 Statute of International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States, Between January 1, 1994 and December 31, 1994, S.C. Res. 955, Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (Nov. 8, 1994).

of the International Military Tribunal (IMT) at Nuremberg and the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (IMTFE) at Tokyo.[287] Article 5 of the ICTY statute provides that:

> The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for the following crimes when committed in armed conflict, whether international or internal in character, and directed against any civilian population:
>
> (a) murder;
>
> (b) extermination;
>
> (c) enslavement;
>
> (d) deportation;
>
> (e) imprisonment;
>
> (f) torture;
>
> (g) rape;
>
> (h) persecutions on political, racial and religious grounds;
>
> (i) other inhumane acts.

Article 3 of the ICTR statute criminalizes crimes against humanity using the same language.

The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court has equally criminalized crimes against humanity in Article 7,[288] although with a slightly longer list of crimes and expansive descriptions:

> 1. For the purpose of this Statute, "crime against humanity" means any of the following acts when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack:
>
> (a) Murder;
>
> (b) Extermination;
>
> (c) Enslavement;
>
> (d) Deportation or forcible transfer of population;
>
> (e) Imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law;
>
> (f) Torture;
>
> (g) Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity;
>
> (h) Persecution against any identifiable group or collectivity on political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender as defined in paragraph 3, or other grounds that are universally recognized as impermissible under international law, in connection with any act referred to in this paragraph or any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court;
>
> (i) Enforced disappearance of persons;
>
> (j) The crime of apartheid;
>
> (k) Other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health.

On the basis of the incorporation of crimes against humanity into the criminal statutes of the ICTY, ICTR, and ICC, as well as the mixed-model tribunals in Sierra Leone, Cambodia, and 287 See also Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application, supra note 284, at 183–189.

---

288 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90.

Lebanon, most prominently, and the convictions based on these provisions, have firmly established crimes against humanity as an international crime under customary international law, independent of the IMT and IMTFE.

Despite the evolution of crimes against humanity and other substantive principles of international criminal law, their application in domestic courts has been less universal, although this is slowly changing. Only very few extraditions have been requested or granted for an international crime, other than for war crimes and crimes against humanity arising out of WWII.

The most prominent of these is the Habré case, in which Belgium requested the extradition of the former Chadian president Hissène Habré from Senegal for violations of the CAT.[289] In that case Belgium sought Habré's extradition from Senegal, which refused his surrender, and after more than a decade the case was brought before the International Court of Justice (ICJ), which ruled in 2012 that Senegal was in violation of its obligations under the CAT to prosecute or extradite.[290] In the aftermath of the ruling, Senegal has reformed its criminal code and worked with the African Union and the Economic Community of West African States to establish an internationalized tribunal in Senegal to prosecute Habré, with proceedings hopefully commencing in 2013.

Another landmark case involved the issuing of a Belgian arrest warrant for Abdoulaye Yerodia Ndombasi,[291] the former acting Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, for incitement to genocide.[292] In response to the Belgian action the DRC filed an application before the ICJ in 2000, seeking to annul the warrant. In Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belgium), the ICJ ruled that under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations[293] and customary international law, sitting heads of state and government ministers enjoy temporal immunity, as its removal would hinder the minister's capacity to execute his/her duties, and thereby harm the ability of the minister's state to function properly.[294] The Habré and Yerodia cases thus reveal the increasing effects of extra-territorial jurisdiction by states for crimes under international law, and the role of extradition law in that process.

Beyond the Habré and Yerodia cases, which are in the nature of traditional extradition cases, the re-emergence of international criminal tribunals has also required the development of mechanisms for the surrender of accused from national jurisdictions to tribunals.[295] As the ICTY and ICTR began to scale back their operations in advance of their closure they also developed a mechanism for transferring cases and accused back to national jurisdictions for further proceedings under Rule 11*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of each tribunal. Rule 11*bis* of the ICTY provides in pertinent part that:

> (A) After an indictment has been confirmed and prior to the commencement of trial, irrespective of whether or not the accused is in the custody of the Tribunal, the President may appoint a bench of three Permanent Judges selected from the Trial Chambers (hereinafter referred to as the "Referral Bench"), which solely and exclusively shall determine whether the case should be referred to the authorities of a State:
>
> (i) in whose territory the crime was committed; or

---

289 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.4 and Ch. VI, Sec. 8.1. See also Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belg. v. Sen.), 2012 I.C.J. ____ ¶ 99 (July 20).

290 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belg. v. Sen.), supra note 289.

291 See also Ch. VI, Sec. 7.4.1.

292 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.), 2002 I.C.J. 121 (Feb. 14, 2002).

293 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, 500 U.N.T.S. 95. Article 29 of the Vienna Convention provides that "The person of a diplomatic agent shall be inviolable. He shall not be liable to any form of arrest or detention. The receiving State shall treat him with due respect and shall take all appropriate steps to prevent any attack on his person, freedom or dignity."

294 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.), 2002 I.C.J. 121 (Feb. 14, 2002).

295 See also Ch. I, Sec. 7.

> (ii) in which the accused was arrested; or
>
> (iii) having jurisdiction and being willing and adequately prepared to accept such a case, so that those authorities should forthwith refer the case to the appropriate court for trial within that State.[296]

The provision in the ICTR is the same. Under the Rule 11*bis* procedure the ICTY has referred thirteen cases to national jurisdictions,[297] and the ICTR has transferred four to a national jurisdiction.[298]

In addition to these international developments, a number of states have adopted national legislation incorporating crimes against humanity as part of their domestic crimes. Some of these national laws were passed before the entry into effect of the ICC in 2002, while others were passed subsequently as part of these states' implementation of the Rome Statute through the adoption of national legislation.[299] As detailed by this writer in Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application, as of 2011:

> Fifty-five states have legislation criminalizing CAH [crimes against humanity], most of which were developed post-2002. They are Albania (2002); Argentina (2007); Australia (2002); Bangladesh (1973); Belarus (2001); Belgium (2003); Bosnia and Herzegovina (2003); Burkina Faso (2009); Burundi (2003); Canada (2000); Chile (2009); Congo Brazzaville (1998); Costa Rica (2002); Croatia (2003); Cyprus Democratic Republic of the Congo (2005); El Salvador; Estonia (2002); Ethiopia (1957); Fiji (2009); France (1994); Georgia (2003); Germany (2002); Indonesia (2000); Iraq (2005); Ireland (2006); Israel (1950); Kenya (2008); Lithuania (2000); the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (2003); Mali (2001); Malta (2002); Montenegro (2003); the Netherlands (2003); New Zealand (2000); Niger (2003); Norway (2008); Panama (2007); the Philippines (2009); Portugal (2004); Republic of Korea (2007); Romania; Rwanda (2003); Samoa (2007); Senegal (2007); Serbia (2005); Sierra Leone (2002); South Africa (2002); Spain (2004); Sudan (2009); Timor Leste (2009); Trinidad and Tobago (2006); Uganda; United Kingdom (2001); and Uruguay (2006).
>
> . . . [In addition there are states] whose legislation has a label such as genocide or crimes against peace and security that include acts deemed part of CAH under customary international law. Countries in this category include Azerbaijan, Colombia, Hungary, Latvia, Peru, Poland, and Slovenia.[300]

There is no case in which a state upheld the doctrine of an "exception to the exception" after asylum was granted. Even in hijacking cases from Poland and Czechoslovakia to Germany, the requested states, France and Germany, relied on the 1963 Tokyo Convention and prosecuted the hijackers rather than surrender them.[301] Also in cases involving illicit international traffic of narcotic drugs, the request and surrender of such offenders was always on the basis of the 296 International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Nov. 19, 2012, U.N. Doc. IT/32/Rev.48.

---

297 Key Figures of the Cases, International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Apr. 15, 2013), http://www.icty.org/sid/24. The thirteen are: Rahim Ademi, Dušan Fuštar, Momčilo Gruban, Gojko Janković, Vladimir Kovačević, Duško Knežević, Paško Ljubičić, Željko Mejakić, Mirko Norac, Mitar Rašević, Radovan Stanković, Savo Todović, and Milorad Trbić.

298 Status of Cases, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (Apr. 16, 2013), http://www.unictr.org/Cases/tabid/204/Default.aspx. The four are Laurent Bucyibaruta, Bernard Munyagishari, Wenceslas Munyeshyaka, and Jean Bosco Uwinkindi.

299 For a survey of national legislation and practice, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application 660–664 (2011).

300 Id. at 660–663.

301 See Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 219 n.5.

conduct being an extraditable offense in current treaty practice rather than its being an international crime.[302]

There is still difficulty, however, in determining what constitutes international offenses, the elements thereof, and the factual establishment of their occurrence. However, some international agreement exists on the notion that such offenses should constitute an "exception to the exception."[303]

2.1.8. The Political Offense Exception and World Public Order: A Proposed Standard

The reasons for the political offense exception rest in part upon the asylum state's sense of humane treatment and belief in human rights, as well as personal and political freedom.[304] Furthermore, it is generally acknowledged that political crimes affect the requesting state's most sensitive interests, and therefore inspire a passionately hostile atmosphere, which makes an orderly and fair trial very difficult. The asylum state also sees the political offense, unlike ordinary crimes, as a reflection of the individual's resistance to the regime of the requesting state, and therefore the presence of the offender in the requested state is not usually a threat to its domestic tranquility.[305] Consequently, the requested state will not be moved by ordinary criminological considerations but is more likely to be persuaded by political factors, which it will determine by its own interpretation of the meaning of the political offense exception.

---

302 An example was the extradition of August Ricord from Paraguay, charged with smuggling two tons of heroin into the United States. The Paraguayan Supreme Court granted his extradition on September 2, 1972.

303 The late Judge Hersch Lauterpacht said in this connection that acts that per se constitute common crimes and that are contrary to the rules of war cannot legitimately be assimilated to political offenses. Hersch Lauterpacht, The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes, 1944 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 58, 91. For a more recent position predicated on empirical data, see Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Extradite or Prosecute in International Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise eds., 1995) [hereinafter Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare].

The question of prosecution and extradition of accused war criminals arose in the Priebke matter, which involved Argentina and Italy, and now Germany.

On November 20, 1995, Argentina extradited to Italy Erich Priebke, a former SS Captain, who was convicted in absentia for war crimes by the Military Tribunal of Rome, July 20, 1948 (sentence No. 631). At that time he was found guilty of an unlawful reprisal killing of 335 Italians in the Adreatine Caves outside Rome. In his Argentina extradition proceedings, his argument of the "political offense exception" was rejected. Upon his return to Italy he was retried on the same charges of which he was found guilty in 1948 (which is customary in legal systems who allow trials in absentia) and once again he was found guilty. But the court found that he should be released because the Italian statute of limitations on war crimes, thirty years, had lapsed. Italy has neither ratified the 1968 U.N. Convention on the Nonapplicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity, nor its European counterpart. However, on October 14, 1996, the Italian Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial because of prejudicial pretrial statements made by the presiding judge. Priebke was, nevertheless, held in custody pending an extradition request from Germany. Argentina granted permission to Italy to re-extradite Priebke to Germany where he is eventually to be tried, presumably for the same crime. The European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms does not specifically prohibit trials for the same crime between state-parties on the basis of ne bis in idem; it only prohibits them when the retrial is by the same state. In July 1997, a second military court sentenced him to fifteen years in prison, but then reduced the sentence to five years for mitigating circumstances. The case was appealed in 1998 and he was sentenced to life in prison by the Military Court of Appeals.

That sentence was affirmed by the Court of Cassation. He died in October 2013.

304 See Manuel Garcia-Mora, International Law and Asylum as a Human Right (1956). See also Ch. III (discussing asylum).

305 See Garcia-Mora, Present Status of Political Offenses, supra note 22, at 373–374.

The commendable humanitarian objectives of the political offense exception have unfortunately seldom been realized. The reason for this lies in the fact that in every case the definition of political offenses and the determination of whether the crimes charged by the requesting state constitute a political offense are made by the requested state in accordance with its public policy or political interests.

In addition, courts all over the world have invariably experienced difficulty in arriving at a workable definition of what constitutes a political offense.[306] The political offense exception is a double-edged sword. Although it is intended to protect individual rights and personal freedom, it imposes national standards and values on other states. More significant, however, states can, for self-serving interests, deny extradition because the presence of the fugitive in the requested state serves its political purposes. The fugitive may well have committed an extraditable offense, but his/her sudden political opposition to a foreign regime may render him/her so desirable to the requested state that his/her extradition will be denied on political offense exception grounds when, under circumstances involving a friendly state, the fugitive would be surrendered.

The benefits of luring foreign defectors and offering them asylum may sometimes be commendable in terms of human rights or explainable in terms of realpolitik, but it is highly explosive in terms of global strategy for minimum world order when the defector happens to have committed common crimes or international crimes to which the (political) human rights aspect is only tenuously related. This is particularly true with respect to certain acts of terrorism.

Also at times, the political refugee will be a highly placed foreign official who may have committed common crimes or international crimes, the enormity of which will sometimes cast his/her acts in a political character.[307] It would seem that humane considerations and inducements to foreign exiles, defectors, or fugitives should not overshadow concern with the punishability of those who have also committed common crimes and international crimes.

The realization that such problems exist, few and far between as they may be, is, to say the least, problematic and compels the search for a new outlook to avoid the potentially detrimental effects of such problems on the preservation of a minimum world order. One solution is to remove the question in its entirety from the decision-making process of the nation-states involved. This presupposes an international organ, such as the ICJ or a specialized branch thereof, or an international criminal court, which would have either exclusive or review jurisdiction over such matters. This could be accomplished by a universal treaty-statute on extradition,[308] or by granting an international judicial decision-making body the exclusive jurisdiction over such cases, so as to avoid inflammatory situations that may precede a decision on the merits.

---

306 For the intricacies and complexities in determining the nature of a political offense, see Nature of Political Offenses, supra note 22.

307 See the Artukovic cases discussed above and in notes supra 262–266, where the relator was accused of being responsible for the deaths of an estimated 200,000 people. See also the case of Czechoslovak General Jan Sejna, who sought asylum in the United States in 1968 after Dubcek took over. General Sejna was accused of the death of some 10,000 persons, but was granted asylum. See Time, Mar. 15, 1968, at 27.

308 This was proposed by this writer at the 1968 Freiburg International Colloquium on extradition and was submitted to the 10th International Congress on Penal Law, held in Rome in 1969. See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Rapport, Etats-Unis d'Amérique, 39 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 494, 496, 516–517 (1968); Resolution, 39 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 856 (1968). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Remarks, in Actes du Pre-Congres International de Syracuse 475 (Ass'n Int'l de Droit Pénal 1969); Communications, Actes du Pre-Congres International de Syracuse, supra, at 299–378; Resolutions of the Xth International Penal Law Congress of Rome 1969, 40 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 299 (1969).

The problem of the political offense, however, goes further. The definitional issue could be resolved by an international treaty-statute, but the interpretive issue remains until it can be based on certain objective evaluations presently undertaken by most countries, particularly with respect to executive discretion in conceding or denying extradition. With the admitted difficulties of implementing such a proposal, alternatives must nonetheless be found for the serious question of ensuring a fair trial to the relator faced with extradition to the jurisdiction in which the ideologically motivated offense took place. An alternative would be to have the state of asylum or the state of which the relator is a national, if it is not the requesting state, exercise jurisdiction over him/her and prosecute him/her on behalf of the jurisdiction where the offense took place, using the substantive laws of that jurisdiction against which the accused relator committed the alleged offense.[309] If found guilty, the offender could, depending upon the situation, be confined, if the sentence is imprisonment, in the state where the offense was committed, in the state where the offense was prosecuted, or in the state of which he/she is a national. Thus aut dedere aut judicare would be ensured without potentially violating the human rights and the right to procedural fairness of the relator, while simultaneously avoiding disruptions of a world public order, as there would be an alternative to pitting two or more nation-states against each other.[310] Ideally, of course, the offender should be tried by an international criminal court and imprisoned in an international institution, as in the instance of the IMT at Nuremberg and the Spandau prison, respectively, which stand as primary examples of the feasibility of this proposal.

World peace depends on maintaining rules designed to safeguard world public order and to establish legal channels as alternatives to the violent means that prevail in their absence. The Rule of Law is not an ideological equalizer or a method of compromising opposing political doctrines, but instead a process of ordering and channeling conflicts through legal institutions designed for the peaceful resolution of conflicts in a judicial context. It is the gradual building of needed international legal structures not by ideologically superimposing such structures on the nation-states, but by creating them so as to service special purposes designed to eliminate direct confrontations between states, which have potential for disruption of world public order.

2.1.9. The Need for a More Consistent Approach to the Application of the "Political Offense Exception"

The positions of circuit courts have shown a certain inconsistency and sometimes even misunderstanding of what needs to be established in order to determine the existence of the legal elements justifying recognition of the political offense exception to extradition.[311] The following is therefore suggested:

1. There should be both a subjective and objective test. The objective test should require evidence that the acts of violence were directed against a target deemed within the scope of the 309 For an analogy, see Philip C. Jessup, The Doctrine of Erie Railroad v. Tompkins Applied to International Law, 33 Am. J. Int'l L. 740 (1939).

310 See Chs. I and X.

311 Compare Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.) (1986) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (1983)) and Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2005, en banc) (Rymer, J. Dissenting) (calling for Quinn to be overruled); Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588, 2007 WL 52968 (4th Cir. 2007) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (4th ed. 2002)). The Fourth Circuit took a position contrary to Quinn. For a discussion of these contrasting approaches, see Rachael MacKenzie, Case Comment: International Law—Limiting the Political Offense Exception to Extradition Treaties to Crimes Objectively Political—Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588 (4th Cir. 2007), 31 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 711 (2008). These two contrasting positions are particularly evident in United States ex rel. Branko Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F.Supp. 383, 392 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (finding that the political offense exception applies, while rejecting the inquiry war or insurrection,[312] and for the subjective test evidence that the person engaging in the conduct in question is ideologically motivated. The Second, Fifth, and Seventh Circuits require both the objective and the subjective tests.[313]

2. Not any type of act under the objective test is sufficient. If it is related to the intended struggle then it is subject to international constraints,[314] which are contained in international humanitarian law prohibitions, which include attacks upon noncombatants, and the prohibitions of attacks upon certain targets such as hospitals, religious places, archaeological monuments, and others.[315] This was the test in In re Castioni.[316] Justice Dennman noted that "[i]t must at least be shown that the act is done in furtherance of, done with the intention of assistance, as a sort of overt act in the course of acting in a political manner, a political uprising, or a dispute between two parties in the state as to which is to have the government in its hand."[317] The U.S. Supreme Court followed that position in Ornelas v. Ruiz.[318] In Eain v. Wilkes,[319] the Seventh Circuit noted that the political offense exception should not extend to "[i]solated acts of social violence undertaken for person[al] reasons…simply because they occurred during a time of political upheaval."[320] The court further noted that "[t]he indiscriminate bombing of a civilian populous [sic] is not recognized as a protected political act."[321]

3. The exception applies to those who are fighting government and to those who are fighting on behalf of governments provided that their conduct conforms to international law.[322] into whether the perpetrators' actions constituted war crimes) and Ahmad v. Wigen, 727 F.Supp. 389, 408 (E.D.N.Y. 1989) (holding that an action cannot be defined as a political offense if it violates the law of armed conflict).

---

312 The Seventh Circuit in Earn v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981) requires both the objective and the subjective test, as does the Second Circuit in Ahmad v. Wigen, 910 F.2d 1063, 1066 (2d Cir. 1990); and the Fifth Circuit in Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1104 (5th Cir. 1980). Contra Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir.) (1986).

313 See Ordinola v. Hackman, 2007 WL 529 689 (4th Cir. 2007); supra note 311.

314 This was the test in In re Castioni [1891] 1 Q.B. 149, 158 (1890). See also the Fourth Geneva Convention: http://mineaction.org/downloads/Emine%20Policy%20Pages/Geneva%20Conventions/Geneva%20Convention%20IV.pdf

315 Jean-Marie Henckaerts, Study on Customary International Humanitarian Law: A Contribution to the Understanding and Respect for the Rule of Law in Armed Conflct (2005); Customary International Humanitarian Law (Jean-Marie Henckaerts & Louise Doswald-Beck eds., International Commission of Jurists 2006); Frits Kalshoven & Liesbeth Zegveld, Constraints on the Waging of War: An Introduction to International Humanitarian Law (2001).

316 [1891] 1 Q.B. 149, 158 (1890) (opinion of Dennman, J.).

317 Id.

318 161 U.S. 502 (1896) (citing Castioni, 1 Q.B. at 511). See also Ahmad v. Wigen, 910 F.2d 1063, 1066 (2d Cir. 1990) (stating "an attack on a commercial bus carrying civilian passengers on a regular route is not a political offense. Political motivation does not convert every crime into a political offense.")

319 641 F.2d 504, 521 (7th Cir. 1981).

320 Id.

321 Id. See also In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565, 577 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (rejecting the political offense exception because indiscriminate killings of civilians were in the nature of international crimes), and thus qualifying for what this author qualified above as "the exception to the exception." Id. This position was followed in Orindola v. Hackman, which rejected the claim of the relator of the political offense exception for violent acts committed by him allegedly on behalf of his government against innocent civilians. Ordinola v. Hackman, 2007 WL 529, 689 (4th Cir. 2007).

322 See supra note 3 and accompanying text. See also In re Requested Extradition of Mason, 694 F. Supp. 679, 705 (N.D. Cal. 1988).

2.2. Offenses of a Military Character

A considerable number of bilateral treaties and national statutes expressly prohibit granting extradition for acts punishable under the military laws of the requesting state.[323] There are, however, two conditions that limit this exemption, namely: (1) that the acts charged do not constitute a crime under the ordinary laws of the requesting state; and (2) that the acts do not constitute a violation of the laws of war, which would be international crimes.

The problems arising from that category of exemption are those of draft evasion, particularly draft evasion for political purposes.[324] Examples of such cases arose in significant numbers during the military involvement of the United States in Southeast Asia between 1965 and 1972, when draft evaders and deserters from the United States took refuge, and were granted asylum in Canada and Sweden.[325] These problems are usually solved between states maintaining cooperative relations by some alternative means to extradition,[326] although this was not the case with Sweden or Canada in the example cited above.

The problem of military offenses, duty of allegiance, and extradition between friendly or allied states is illustrated in the English case of Ex parte Duke of Chateau de Thierry,[327] where a French citizen had defected to England to avoid serving in the military forces of France during WWI. The English lower court held for the relator in agreeing that the Home Secretary had no power to order an alien deported to a particular country, which had been ordered as an alternative to extradition. On appeal, the decision was reversed on the grounds that, although the Home Secretary had no power to order deportation to a particular country, he could select the particular ship upon which the offender must sail. Even if such ship should happen to sail for the requesting state, it would be of no concern. The court concluded that the duke was not a political refugee,[328] and as French authorities had assured the British government that the offender would be tried solely as a military absentee for desertion, the court, in effect, condoned disguised extradition between allies for the return of those accused of such offenses as the military crime of desertion.

A violation of military laws and regulations, which does not also constitute a crime under the ordinary criminal laws, by a person subject to such military laws (provided also that such violation does not constitute a violation of the laws of war) is recognized as an exclusion from extradition under customary international law.[329] The relationship among military offenses,

---

323 Bedi, supra note 19. See U.N. Model Extradition Treaty, supra note 23, at 187–188 (including no provision for exclusion of offenses under military law); Michael D. Wims, Re-examining the Traditional Exceptions to Extradition, 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 325 (1991) (discussing a proposal to renegotiate treaties among free and democratic governments to include provisions for extradition for purely military offenses). For examples of treaties excluding extradition for military offenses with no equivalent in civilian criminal law, see Extradition Treaty with Latvia, art. 4(4), entered into force Apr. 15, 2009, S. TREATY DOC. 109-15, art. 4(4)

("The executive authority of the Requested State may refuse extradition for offenses under military law that are not offenses under ordinary criminal law."); Italian Extradition Treaty, art. V(3), entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023 ("Extradition shall not be granted for offenses under military law which are not offenses under ordinary criminal law").

324 See David A. Tate, Draft Evasion and the Problem of Extradition, 32 Alb. L. Rev. 337 (1968).

325 The Canadian position has changed, and Canada has deported various U.S. deserters of the recent war in Iraq. See Ch. IV.

326 See Ch. IV.

327 Ex parte Duke of Chateau de Thierry, [1917] 1 K.B. 552 (Eng.). See Ch. IV, Sec. 2 (discussing this case).

328 Duke of Chateau de Thierry, Id.

329 In re Girardin, 7 Ann. Dig. 357 (CFed. 1933) (Arg.).

common crimes, and the political offense exception with respect to wars of national liberation is illustrated by the Ktir case,[330] wherein the Swiss court stated:

> The question at issue, accordingly, is whether it is a political offense and what importance is to be attached to the fact that the act committed by Ktir was, as alleged by him, committed in a war between France and the F.L.N.
>
> As regards the second point, the appellant probably means to rely on Article II of the [Swiss Federal Law of January 22, 1892, on extradition to foreign states], which provides that "extradition shall not be granted . . . for purely military offenses." That provision is not, however, applicable, since the Treaty does not contain any analogous reservation. Furthermore, murder has never been regarded as a "purely military" offense, because it affects human life and does not relate to military organization or military duties.
>
> As regards the political nature of the offense, it should be pointed out, first of all, that the F.L.N. is fighting for power in Algeria. It is active not only in that country, but also in France. The character of the organization is clearly political. The appellant states that he is a member of the F.L.N. and that he committed the act with which he is charged by virtue of that membership and on the orders of his superiors. His declarations are plausible. It may be deduced therefrom that he acted for political, not personal, reasons. It does not, however, follow that the act had a predominantly political character. For this to be the case it is necessary that the murder of Mezai should have been the sole means of safeguarding the more important interests of the F.L.N. and of attaining the political aim of that organization. That is not so. It has not been shown that the interests of the F.L.N. were so gravely compromised by the alleged treason of Mezai that his "suppression" was the sole means of effectively safeguarding them. Nor is it possible to conclude that the murder in which Ktir took part in any way advanced the liberation of Algeria. That murder was primarily an act of vengeance and terror. Its relationship to the political aims of the F.L.N. is too loose to justify it and to give it a predominantly political character. It is, accordingly, not a political offense in the meaning of Article 2, paragraph 1, set forth in the Treaty. Since the other conditions set forth in the Treaty are satisfied, extradition must in principle be granted.[331]

The rationale for this exclusion rests on the appraisal of the very offense, that is, it is particular rather than general, and affects a disciplinary aspect of an internal organization within a given state without causing any private wrong, as in the case of common crimes, or without causing any harm to the world community, as in the case of international crimes. It is also important to reassert that extradition is a means of cooperation between states to combat common criminality and therefore such offenses are excludable from that objective. States that are bound by mutual security pacts and other military agreements are likely to include such offenses in their treaties, or in any event to engage in the practice of disguised extradition to accomplish their purposes of exchanging such fugitive offenders.

2.3. Offenses of a Fiscal Character

Theoretically, the rationale for exclusion of these offenses is said to be the same as in cases of offenses of a military character.[332] It should be stated at the outset that even though there is little practice in extradition for fiscal offenses, there is nothing in customary international law that prohibits it. Furthermore, the term "fiscal" has often encompassed offenses of an economic nature,

---

330 34 I.L.R. 143 (Federal Tribunal 1961) (Switz.).

331 Id. at 145.

332 See Bedi, supra note 19, at 198. Exceptions with respect to fiscal offenses are usual in extradition treaties and extradition laws. Nevertheless, important changes in attitude may be observed. The Second Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition (1978), 17 I.L.M. 813, abolished the exception, as did the German law on international judicial cooperation of 1982, 30 I.L.M. 84. The 1990 Convention applying the Schengen Agreement of June 14, 1985, between the governments of the even though they involve the public interest as opposed to a private interest. It must be recalled that extradition before the twentieth century was closely interwoven with European history, and between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries Europe's fiscal and economic structure was chaotic and oppressive. This explains the origin of the exclusion. Between the eighteenth and early twentieth centuries, economic and fiscal reorganization in European states was interrupted by two world wars, and the emergence of socialism and communism in Eastern and Central Europe. These factors contributed to the continued lack of acceptance of such violations as grounds for extradition except between compatible economic systems. The change occurred after the political and economic transformation of the world and with the recognition that states, in order to carry their public charges, must enforce their economic and fiscal laws.[333] The economic social contract theory of the twentieth century is, however, likely to bring about a radical change in the category of economic offenses, as was the case in the socialist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia, where such offenses ranked with the more serious common crimes, as witnessed by laws on smuggling, traffic in currency, etc. After the beginning of the global financial crisis in 2007 the question of extradition for economic crimes became increasingly important, as a number of "rogue traders" and investment bankers exploited the law and exacerbated existing financial instabilities. One of the most prominent of these is Florian Homm, a German hedge fund manager who disappeared in 2007 after his fund imploded, prompting an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a federal indictment in California. After five years in hiding, some of which included living under an assumed name in Colombia, Homm was arrested in Italy in March 2013 and now awaits extradition to the United States.[334] Another example of extradition for financial crimes is the case of Kareem Serageldin, the London City trader who was sought for extradition on fraud charges related to a coverup of $540 million in losses;[335] he was eventually surrendered, and pleaded guilty in April 2013.[336]

The willingness to include economic crimes among extraditable offences is a newer practice. As early as 1891 Moore criticized the U.S. position on that score, stating:

> In the refusal to include in its treaties of extradition crimes of fraud, the government of the United States failed to recognize the change which, in the development of civilization, has taken place in the relative importance of criminal offenses.[337]

Such offenses are, however, gradually appearing in extradition treaties, but the difficulty remains in satisfying the requirement of double criminality[338] because of the problem of defining such offenses and determining their significance in the economic system of each particular country. Growing international concern over tax evasion and violation of currency restrictions in many states of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the French Republic, on the Gradual Abolition of Checks at their Common Borders, 30 I.L.M. at 110, eliminates the exception only for offenses involving the evasion of indirect taxation. See U.N. Model Extradition Treaty, supra note 23, at 188. The model does not exclude fiscal offenses from extradition. Id.

---

333 A.N. Sack, (Non-)Enforcement of Foreign Revenue Laws in International Law and Practice, 81 U. Pa. L. Rev. 559 (1933).

334 Jack Ewing, Hedge Fund Manager Found and Jailed in Fraud, N.Y. Times, Mar. 10, 2013. See also Marianne Barriaux, Hedge Fund Shares Crash Again as Spat Continues, Guardian, Sept. 20, 2007.

335 Ex-Credit Suisse Trader Faces US Extradition, Reuters, Sept. 27, 2012.

336 Paul Calahan, Trader, Kareem Serageldin, Pleads Guilty to Role in Banking Crash, Independent, Apr. 14, 2013.

337 John B. Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition 111 (1891) [hereinafter Moore, Extradition]. Such offenses are extraditable under the Bustamante Code (1928), 86 L.N.T.S. 120, in 4 Manley O. Hudson, International Legislation 2283 (1931). See also In re Nunez, 7 Ann. Dig. 335 (Sup. Ct. 1934) (Peru).

338 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

countries is causing this exception to disappear from contemporary treaties. In fact, states are entering into special treaties on mutual assistance and cooperation in fiscal and financial matters.

The 1988 United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances (hereinafter the "United Nations Convention"), a fine example of global cooperation, requires both bilateral participation and domestic legislation to effectuate any bilateral agreement.[339] The Convention reflects the desire of states to utilize the immobilization and forfeiture of assets as a means to combat drug trafficking and the accompanying money laundering. This convention is the first step toward recognizing and codifying an international commitment to the suppression of illegal drug trade.

Article 3 defines the offenses and sanctions covered by the United Nations Convention.[340] The United Nations Convention applies to the various crimes associated with drug trafficking. Specifically, the Convention obligates states to criminalize nearly every conceivable facet of the production, cultivation, distribution, sale, or possession of illicit drugs.[341]

The Convention requires the "widest measure of mutual legal assistance" in investigations, prosecutions and judicial proceedings under Article 7. The types of mutual assistance include: taking evidence or statements from persons; effecting service of judicial documents; executing searches and seizures; examining objects and sites; providing information and evidentiary items; providing records and documents, including bank, financial, corporate, or business records; and identifying, or tracing proceeds, instrumentalities, or other things for evidentiary purposes.[342] The United Nations Convention also contains several provisions designed to curb the effects of money laundering associated with illicit drug trafficking. The Convention requires the signatory states to adopt legislation to facilitate the freezing, seizure, and forfeiture of assets.[343] The provisions of the convention are broad and they clearly indicate the prosecutorial perspective that motivates the creation of drug trafficking instruments.

The United Nations Convention is a significant step toward an integration of several forms of interstate cooperation in penal matters. The Convention incorporates provisions for: extradition (Article 6); transfer of proceedings (Article 8); mutual legal assistance (taking of statements, service of process, provisions of evidentiary items, executing searches and seizures, etc.) (Article 7); and the seizure and confiscation of assets (Article 5), the newest modality of assistance in penal matters. This instrument is limited, however, by the complications of its global scope and, to be truly effective, requires the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements. As a result, a state must rely on one of several instruments depending on the type of cooperation required, and this type of fragmentation creates a number of gaps and loopholes that often make these bilateral agreements ineffective.[344]

Due to this limitation, the Convention contemplates integrated regional instruments such as the 1990 Council of Europe Convention on Laundering, Search, Seizure and Confiscation of the Proceeds from Crime.[345] The Convention represents a partially integrated, regional approach to mutual legal assistance, investigative assistance, provisional measures, and

---

339 United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, opened for signature Dec. 20, 1988, 28 I.L.M. 493 [hereinafter UN Convention].

340 Id. at art. 3.

341 Id.

342 Id. at art. 7(2)(a)–(g). With regard to introduction of evidence for a crime that cannot be prosecuted, see Ch. VII, Sec. 6 (discussing specialty).

343 Id. at arts. 5(2), 4(g).

344 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Effective National and International Action against Organized Crime and Terrorist Criminal Activities, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 9, 37–40 (1990).

345 Council of Europe Convention on Laundering, Search, Seizure and Confiscation of the Proceeds from Crime, Nov. 8, 1990, No. 141 Europ. T.S. No. 141, 30 I.L.M. 148 [hereinafter COE Convention].

confiscation of assets, and is intended to work in concert with other Council of Europe conventions on judicial assistance. In regard to the seizure and eventual forfeiture of assets, the Council of Europe Convention is perhaps the most forceful international instrument yet contemplated. The European Convention's focus is to criminalize the offense of money laundering and to provide states the means to confiscate illicit proceeds—including provisional measures to immobilize those assets for eventual forfeiture. The Council of Europe Convention, unlike the United Nations Convention, extends the definition of money laundering beyond drug-related offenses. Whereas the United Nations Convention treats money laundering as tangential to illicit drug trafficking, the Council of Europe Convention tackles money laundering as a major offense in and of itself.

In 1991 the European Council of Economic and Finance Ministers (ECOFIN) passed a directive on the Prevention and Use of the Financial System for the Purpose of Money Laundering.[346] The agreement calls for a multilateral declaration and applies sanctions to financial institutions that do not comply with the reporting requirements.[347]

The prohibition against extradition for fiscal offenses is waning in the practice of states, and recent bilateral extradition and tax treaties provide for extradition for such crimes. In addition, as some of the manifestations of fiscal offenses are linked to money laundering, which is increasingly found in the criminal law of many states, the facts underlying fiscal offenses may also be the basis for money laundering, and thus satisfy the requirements of double criminality for extradition (see Chapter VII, Sec.2).

The United Nations, in response to the difficulty of preventing and punishing financial crimes, enacted the United Nations Convention Against Corruption (hereinafter the "CAC") in October 2003, which entered into force December 2005.[348] This instrument was passed with particular concern for the relationship among corruption, organized crime, and economic crimes such as money laundering.[349] The scope of the CAC is broad, covering "the prevention, investigation and prosecution of corruption and to the freezing, seizure, confiscation and return of the proceeds of offences established in accordance with this Convention."[350] To accomplish this, the CAC calls upon state-parties to enact relevant domestic mechanisms to prevent corruption, as well as to collaborate with each other to develop international programs and projects to prevent corruption.[351] State-parties are to enact domestic systems and regulations to promote the transparency of public officials' actions and hold them to a code of conduct.[352] Significantly, state parties are to look beyond the public sector, establish proper standards for business in the private sector, and make efforts to promote broader societal participation in their effort to combat corruption.[353] The particular financial crimes targeted by the CAC are money laundering,[354] bribery of public

346 1991 O.J. (L 167) 77 (June 10, 1991) [hereinafter EC Directive].

347 Scott Carlson & Bruce Zagaris, International Cooperation in Criminal Matters: Western Europe's International Approach to International Crime, 15 Nova L. Rev. 551 (1991).

348 See United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime, Background of the United Nations Convention Against Corruption, available at http://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/treaties/CAC/index.html (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

349 United Nations Convention Against Corruption, Preamble, G.A. Resolution A/RES/58/4 (October 31, 2003).

350 Id. at Art. 3(1).

351 Id. at Art 5.

352 Id. at Arts. 7–10.

353 Id. at Art 12, Art. 13.

354 Id. at Art. 14.

officials,[355] embezzlement,[356] trading in influence,[357] abuse of function,[358] illicit enrichment,[359] bribery in the private sector,[360] embezzlement in the private sector,[361] laundering of proceeds,[362] concealment of property resulting from an offense under the CAC,[363] and obstruction of justice.[364] Furthermore, legal persons were subject to these offenses, and participation or attempt were also criminalized.[365] Thus, the CAC casts a broad net to capture as much illicit activity as possible, and recognizes the complex interrelation between the private and public sector in these matters. International cooperation under the CAC is similarly expansive. The CAC provides that double criminality is satisfied as long as the underlying conduct was a criminal offense in both countries.[366] The CAC also provides for extensive mutual legal assistance (evidence, service of process, searches and seizures, freezing assets, etc.).[367] The section on extradition, while requiring parties to deem all the offenses included in the CAC to also be included in existing treaties between the individual parties, goes further in stating that parties who use the CAC as a basis for an extradition request "shall not consider any of the offenses established in accordance with this Convention to be a political offense."[368] Although a party may consider the CAC as the legal basis for extradition with a country with which it does not have an extradition treaty, the United States has rejected this in a declaration made pursuant to the CAC.[369] This reflects the U.S. practice of [370]relying exclusively on bilateral extradition treaties, as discussed in Chapter II.[371]

3. Grounds Relating to the Person of the Relator

3.1. Exemption of Nationals

Unlike the political offense exception and the exception or exclusion of military and fiscal offenses, the exemption of nationals has to do with the person rather than with the offense.

---

355 Id. at Art 15, Art. 16.

356 Id. at Art 17.

357 Id. at Art 18.

358 Id. at Art 19.

359 Id. at Art 20.

360 Id. at Art 21.

361 Id. at Art 22

362 Id. at Art 23

363 Id. at Art 24.

364 Id. at Art 25.

365 Id. at Art. 26, Art. 27.

366 Id. at Art 43.

367 Id. at Art. 46.

368 Id. at Art 44(4)

369 S. Exec Doc. No. 109-18 (2005) (stating "the United States declares that the provisions of the Convention (with the exception of Articles 44 and 46) are non–self-executing. None of the provisions of the Convention creates a private right of action").

370 This is the case for Russia and Brazil, and has resulted in diplomatic friction with various requesting states. See Bruce Zagaris, Russia Denies U.K. Request for Lugovoi Extradition, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 343–344 (Sept. 2007); Bruce Zagaris, Brazil Unlikely to Extradite Military Officers to Italy for Operation Condor Crimes, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 91–93 (Mar. 2008); Bruce Zagaris, Controversy between U.S. and Brazil over Extradition for Alleged Murder, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 45–47 (Feb. 2008).

371 For example, the United States–Dominican treaty of 1909 does not require extradition of nationals. Convention for the Mutual Extradition of Fugitives from Justice, United States–Dominican Republic, Art. VIII, June 19, 1909, 36 Stat. 2468, TS 550; 7 Bevans 200. There is a contemporary trend to

The exemption of nationals takes two forms: absolute and qualified. It may be found in the constitution of a given country, in extradition treaties, or in its municipal laws.[372] Many states exempt nationals from extradition, but in these cases, the requested state has the duty to prosecute.[373] A problem arises when an individual is a dual nationality and the requested state does not extradite its nationals. Each state has the power to determine who is a national, but it is well-established that the state with the dominant contacts is the one entitled to assert its either limit the nationality exemption or provide an obligation to prosecute in the state of nationality. See Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 3, entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23 ("Extradition shall not be refused based on the nationality of the person sought."); South African Extradition Treaty, art. 3, entered into force June 25, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-24 (same). See also Argentine Extradition Treaty, art. 3, entered into force June 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 4, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Extradition Treaty with Belize, art. 3, entered into force Mar. 27, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-38 ("Extradition shall not be refused on the ground that the person sought is a national of the Requested State."); Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 3, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3 ("If all conditions in this Treaty relating to extradition are met, extradition shall not be refused based on the nationality of the person sought."); Italian Extradition Treaty, art. IV, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023 ("A Requested Party shall not decline to extradite a person because such a person is a national of the Requested Party."); Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 4, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197 (similar). Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. III(1), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22 ("Neither Party shall be obligated to extradite its own nationals, except when the extradition request refers to . . . (b) murder; voluntary manslaughter; kidnaping; aggravated assault; rape; sexual offenses involving children; armed robbery; offenses related to the illicit traffic in controlled substances; serious offenses related to terrorism; serious offenses related to organized criminal activity; fraud against the government or involving multiple victims; counterfeiting of currency; offenses related to the traffic in historical or archeological items; offenses punishable in both States by deprivation of liberty for a maximum period of at least ten years; or (c) an attempt or conspiracy, participation in, or association regarding the commission of any of the offenses described in subparagraphs (a) and (b)"). Extradition Treaty with Malta, art. 3(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-17 (precluding fugitive's nationality from serving as the sole basis to refuse extradition in relation to thirty listed offenses); Bulgarian Extradition Treaty, art. 3(1), entered into force May 21, 2009, S. TREATY DOC. 110-12 (same). Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. III(1)(a), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22 ("Neither Party shall be obligated to extradite its own nationals, except when the extradition request refers to: (a) offenses as to which there is an obligation to establish criminal jurisdiction pursuant to multilateral international treaties in force with respect to the Parties"). Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 3(2), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5 ("If extradition is refused solely on the basis of the nationality of the person sought, the Requested State shall, at the request of the Requesting State, submit the case to its authorities for prosecution"); Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 3(2), entered into force Jan. 1, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Extradition Treaty with Cyprus, art. 3, entered into force Sept. 14, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-16; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. III(3), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 8(2), entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 8(3), entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. VII, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18 (similar, but also requiring extradition if a fugitive is a national of both the requesting and requested State). See also Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 13–14, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, March 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

---

372 Guyana law has such provisions. See Bruce Zagaris, Guyana Denies Extradition of Guyanese Drug Suspects to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 228–229 (June 2009).

373 See U.N. Model Extradition Treaty, supra note 23, at 192; cf. Extradition Treaty, May 4, 1978, U.S.–Mex., art. 9, 31 U.S.T. 5059, 5065 (reserving to the state-parties the right to refuse extradition of nationals); Extradition Treaty, U.S.–U.K. June 25, 1985, 24 I.L.M. 1104; (1985) (entered into force Dec. 23, 1986) (having no provision for excluding nationals). Article 4(a) of the Model Treaty does not rule out nationality.[374] The fact that a person is a national of another state does not preclude another state from exercising its criminal jurisdiction.

United States extradition treaties generally contain three types of provisions for dealing with nationality. The first does not refer to nationals specifically, but agrees to the extradition of all persons. Judicial construction,[375] as well as executive interpretation,[376] of such clauses have consistently held that the word "persons" includes nationals, and therefore refusal to surrender a fugitive because he/she is a national cannot be justified under such treaty provisions. The second and most common type of treaty provision provides that "neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects under the stipulations of this convention."[377] The official policy of the United States in treaty negotiations has been, until lately, to prevent when possible the surrender of nationals,[378] but this is no longer the case. The secretary of state can always refuse to surrender a citizen of the United States unless there is an explicit treaty provision providing for reciprocity.[379] The third type of treaty provision states extradition of nationals but only makes nationality an optional ground for refusal. It adds that in case of refusal the requested state shall, if the other state so requests, submit the case to its competent authorities with a view to taking appropriate action against its national. Id. For example, extradition in Canada is viewed as a reasonable limitation on the right of a Canadian citizen to remain in Canada [Section 6(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that: "Every citizen has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada"], especially where the objective is the effective prosecution and suppression of international crime. Sharon Williams, Nationality, Double Jeopardy, Prescription and the Death Sentence as Bases for Refusing Extradition, 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 259 (1991). In Federal Republic of Germany v. Rauca, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 441 (Can.), the Ontario Court of Appeals held that extradition prima facie infringes upon a Canadian citizen's right to remain in Canada, which is guaranteed by section 6(1) of the Canadian charter. Williams, supra at 262. The court did extradite, however, because it held that the infringement of a citizen's right to remain in Canada was "a reasonable limit prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" because at the time, the facts of the case would not have allowed for his prosecution in Canada had he not been extradited. Id. The 1987 case of Canada v. Schmidt, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 500, endorsed the approach of Rauca. Williams, supra at 262. In the case where a fugitive could be extradited to another state or prosecuted in Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada held, in United States v. Cotroni and United States v. El Zein, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1469, that although due consideration must be given to constitutional rights in many cases it may be preferable for the accused to be tried in the foreign country and that the decision to extradite must be based upon the prosecutorial discretion of the requested state. Williams, supra at 263. See also Geoff Gilbert, Aspects of Extradition Law 96 (1999); Michael Plachta, (Non)-Extradition of Nationals: A Neverending Story, 13 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 77 (1999); Joshua S. Spector, Extraditing Mexican Nationals in the Fight against International Narcotics Crimes, 31 Mich. J. L. Ref. 1007 (1998); Aristide Baltatzis, La non-extradition des nationaux, 13 Revue Hellenique de Droit International 190 (1960).

---

374 Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco (Fr. V. Gr. Brit), Advisory Opinion, 1923 PCIJ (Ser. B) No. 4 at 24. For references to national laws, judicial decisions, and scholarly writings, see Zsuzsanna Deen-Racsmány, The Nationality of the Offender and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 95 A.M. J. Int'l L. 606, 614–615 (2001).

375 Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 447–457 (1913) (holding that executive recognition of the obligation of the United States to surrender its own citizens under the extradition treaty with Italy of 1868, waived any breach by Italy and left the treaty in force as the supreme law of the land). See also In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

376 Id. at 475–476 (noting memorandum from Secretary of State Knox, which sets forth executive position).

377 See, e.g., Extradition Treaty, U.S.–Iraq, June 7, 1934, T.S. No. 907; Extradition Treaty, Jan. 19–21, 1922, U.S.–Venez., T.S. No. 675.

378 See 4 Hackworth Digest, supra note 96, § 318.

379 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936). See also James Wilford Garner, Comment, Non-extradition of American Citizens—The Neidecker Case, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 480 (1936); cf. Moses v. Allard, 779 F. Supp. 857 (E.D. Mich. 1991). See also Ch. XI.

that "neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this convention, but the executive authority of each shall have the power to deliver the individual if, in its discretion, it be deemed proper to do so."[380] Exercise of such discretion would be consistent with the treaty obligation, and the secretary of state has both granted and denied surrender of U.S. nationals under a treaty of this type. An examination of some landmark cases will better illustrate the application of these provisions.

In Charlton v. Kelly, the Supreme Court of the United States stated:

> That the word "persons" etymologically includes citizens as well as those who are not, can hardly be debatable. The [United States–Italian] treaty contains no reservation of citizens of that country of asylum. The contention is that an express exclusion of citizens or subjects is not necessary, as by implication, from accepted principles of public law, persons who are citizens of the asylum country are excluded from extradition conventions unless expressly included.
>
> …
>
> The conclusion we reach is, that there is no principle of international law by which citizens are excepted out of an agreement to surrender "persons," where no such exception is made in the treaty itself. Upon the contrary, the word "persons" includes all persons when not qualified as it is in some of the treaties between this and other nations. That this country has made such an exception in some of its conventions and not in others demonstrates that the contracting parties were fully aware of the consequences unless there was a clause qualifying the word "persons." This interpretation has been consistently upheld by the United States, and enforced under the several treaties which do not exempt citizens…[381]

As to the obligation to surrender a national, the Supreme Court, in Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker,[382] stated:

> It is a familiar rule that the obligations of treaties should be liberally construed so as to give effect to the apparent intention of the parties…But, in this instance, there is no question for construction so far as the obligations of the treaty are concerned. The treaty is explicit in the denial of any obligation to surrender citizens of the asylum state—"Neither of the contracting Parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens."
>
> Does the treaty, while denying an obligation in such case, contain a grant of power to surrender a citizen of the United States in the discretion of the Executive?
>
> Obviously the treaty contains no express grant of the power so invoked. Petitioners point to Article I which states that the two governments "mutually agree to deliver up persons" who are charged with any of the specified offenses. Petitioners urge that the word "persons" includes citizens of the asylum state as well as others. But Article I is the agreement to deliver. It imposes the obligation of that agreement. Article I does not purport to grant any power to surrender, save as the power is related to and derived from the obligation. The word "persons" in Article I describes those who fall within the agreement and with respect to whom the obligation is assumed. As Article V provides that there shall be no obligation on the part of either party to deliver up its own citizens, the latter are necessarily excepted from the agreement in Article I and from the "persons" there described. The fact that the 380 See, e.g., Extradition Treaty, supra note 19, U.S.–Japan, art. 5, 31 U.S.T. 892, 897; Extradition Treaty, Jan. 21, 1972, U.S.–Arg., art. 4, 23 U.S.T. 3501; Supplementary Extradition Convention, Feb. 12–June 11, 1970, U.S.–Fr., art. 3, 22 U.S.T. 407, 407 (entered into force Apr. 3, 1971); Extradition Treaty, U.S.–Fr., Jan. 6, 1909, T.S. No. 561.

---

381 Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 465–468 (1913). See also In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). Canadian courts have taken the same view. See In re Burley, 1 Can. L. J. 34 (1865). See also Hilario v. United States, 854 F. Supp. 165, 169 (E.D.N.Y. 1994).

382 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 10 (1936).

> exception is contained in a separate article does not alter its effect. That effect is precisely the same as though Article I had read that the two governments "mutually agree to deliver up persons except its own citizens or subjects."
>
> . . .
>
> Applying, as we must, our own law in determining the authority of the President, we are constrained to hold that his power, in the absence of statute conferring an independent power, must be found in the terms of the treaty and that, as the treaty with France fails to grant the necessary authority, the President is without power to surrender the respondents.
>
> However regrettable such a lack of authority may be, the remedy lies with the Congress, or with the treaty-making power wherever the parties are willing to provide for the surrender of citizens, and not with the courts.[383]

Among the problems of nationality are those raised by the loss and acquisition of nationality, dual nationality, and the time of loss or acquisition. In the absence of a specific provision on this point in the law of the requested state or in the extradition treaty under which the request is made, it appears that acquired nationality brings the accused within the nationality exemption regardless of when it was lost or acquired.[384]

A Swiss court held that, as regards the nationality of the person sought for extradition, the material moment was that of the extradition proceedings. In that case Italy sought the extradition from Switzerland of a woman who had lost her Swiss nationality after committing the offense for which extradition was sought. The Switzerland–Italy Extradition Treaty provided that neither country was bound to extradite one of its own subjects, and the Swiss Extradition Law prohibited the extradition of Swiss citizens. Noting that there was considerable difference of opinion as to the extradition of a national who acquired the nationality of the country of refuge after the commission of the offense for which extradition was sought, the court said that there could be no doubt under the Switzerland–Italy Treaty and the Swiss Extradition Law that the determinative moment was that of the extradition proceedings. The court stated that the surrender of a former subject who was a Swiss citizen, when the crime was committed or when the individual was convicted but who later lost Swiss nationality, could not be called the extradition of a Swiss citizen, and that the primary reasons for refusing to surrender citizens (i.e., special ties that bind the subject to his country and his unconditional right to remain in his own country) did not obtain with regard to a person who had lost her nationality. Accordingly, extradition was granted.[385]

---

383 Id. at 11, 18. It appears that in the case of the treaty with Canada and Great Britain, the court considered surrender of nationals discretionary with the executive of those governments. See George V. LaForest, Extradition to and from Canada (1977). It should be noted that in Canada and Great Britain the authority to surrender individuals to foreign governments is found in municipal legislation.

384 See In re D.G.D., 7 Ann. Dig. 335 (Ct. Thrace 1933) (Greece). In 1932, Bulgaria requested the extradition from Greece of one D.G.D., who had been convicted and sentenced in Bulgaria in 1930, but had escaped to Greece and acquired Greek nationality. The court of Thrace held that extradition must be refused, stating: "By Article 2 of the Extradition Treaty . . . the Contracting Parties do not extradite their own nationals. No distinction is made between nationality acquired before and nationality acquired after the act for which extradition is requested." Id. at 335.

In another case the Court of Appeal of Aix-en-Provence held, in 1951, that France could surrender to Italy an individual charged with having committed certain offenses in Italy in 1945 and who had acquired French nationality by naturalization in 1950, although the France–Italy Extradition Treaty of 1870 provided for the non-extradition of nationals of the contracting parties. In re A., 18 I.L.R. 324 (Cour d'Appel d'Aix-en-Provence 1951) (Fr.).

385 In re Del Porto, 6 Ann. Dig. 307 (Federal Court 1931) (Switz.). In 1929, a Greek court refused the request of Albania for the extradition of a person of Albanian nationality but of Hellenic race on the ground that Article 3 of the Extradition Treaty between Greece and Albania, which prohibited the

The issue of the extradition of nationals, when prohibited by the constitution or municipal law of a given state, has been addressed by the Federal Supreme Court of Germany, the constitution of which prohibits the extradition of nationals. In 1954, the Federal Supreme Court of the German Federal Republic held that an effort by German authorities to return to Italy a German national whom Italy was willing to "temporarily extradite" to Germany, on assurances that he would in due course be returned to Italy, would not be contrary to the provision of the Constitution of the Federal Republic prohibiting the extradition of German nationals. The Court distinguished between temporary and definitive extradition, and the return of the person to the country that has temporarily extradited him, holding essentially that the latter restores the situation to its status quo ante.[386]

The rationale for this exemption rests on the notion that the requested national is likely to receive ill-treatment or an unfair trial in the requesting state. To that extent it is a discriminatory practice that differentiates between nationals and non-nationals. The presupposition is that the relator will receive worse treatment in the requesting state than in the requested state of which he/she is a national, if he/she were to be tried or punished therein. Therefore, the same consideration is not afforded to a non-national. Professor Shearer sees the contemporary rationale as follows:

1. A person ought not be withdrawn from his (indigenous) natural judges; and
2. A state owes its citizens the protection of its laws.[387]

This rationale derives to a large extent from a jealously guarded conception of national sovereignty, and presupposes the existence of sharp contrasts in the administration of criminal justice between states, resulting in potentially unfair treatment. The alternative to such an exemption is to try the relator in the requested state, using the substantive laws of the requesting state based on the doctrine of renvoi. Such a proposal resembles federal practice in the United States.[388] This approach was adopted by the Supreme Court of Colombia, which stated:

> The reason for prohibiting the extradition of nationals on the request of another State is obvious. It is due to the risk of possible grave dangers in the trial abroad. In Colombia the prohibition rests also on the basis that such possible risks are unnecessary, since this Republic, with the intention of internationalizing penal law and with the laudable purpose of beginning to make effective the solidarity of nations in the repression of delinquency, has adopted…rules enabling it to apply the Colombian penal law to nationals and foreigners who have perpetrated an offense abroad…. Art. 7 of the Penal Code guarantees that the homicide with which the prisoner is charged will, if it was criminal, not remain without consign judgment in Colombia. In that manner the Colombian State surrender of Greek "nationals," must be understood to include persons of Hellenic race though of a different nationality. Extradition (Albanian National) Case, 5 Ann. Dig. 281 (Areopagus 1929) (Greece).

---

In opposing their extradition to Italy from Palestine, one Goralschwili and another contended that they should be treated as British subjects and thus, under the British–Italian Extradition Treaty of 1873, applicable to Palestine, not extraditable. It appeared that the accused were ex-Ottoman subjects who had applied for and obtained provisional certificates of special citizenship issued by the government of Palestine pending the enactment of the Palestine Citizenship Order. The High Court of Palestine rejected their contention, holding that the Crown had not acquired sovereignty by accepting the Mandate for Palestine and that the subjects of the mandated territory did not become British subjects. They could, therefore, be extradited to Italy, if it were found that they had committed an extraditable offense. Attorney-General v. Goralschwili and Another, 3 Ann. Dig. 47 (High Ct. Palestine 1925).

386 Extradition of German National Case, 21 I.L.R. 232, 234 (BGH 1954) (F.R.G.).

387 Shearer, supra note 11, at 118–119.

388 See 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (1994) (governing diversity of citizenship); Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). See also Jessup, supra note 309.

> will exercise social defense against delinquency, as Venezuela would, leaving intact, at the same time, the sovereignty by which the Republic of Colombia may prohibit the extradition of Colombians and of politico-social delinquents at the request of another State.[389]

The United States frequently finds itself hampered by the failure to secure extradition from a treaty partner on the basis of the exclusion of the extradition of nationals from the requested state. In some cases this is dictated by the constitution of such countries,[390] but in these cases it should be possible for these countries to prosecute such persons provided that national legislation permits it.[391] Most developing countries that have no national legislation on extradition, and whose practice in extradition has been limited, take the position that customary international law precludes extradition of nationals.[392]

However, there is a trend to rectify the situation through national legislation in several countries, as evidenced in the case of Scheinbein. The relator was born a U.S. citizen, and prior to having been formally charged with a murder fled to Israel, where he had never lived previously, in order to benefit from the Israeli law of return, and from that country's ban on extraditing

---

389 In re Arevalo, 10 Ann. Dig. 329, 330 (Sup. Ct. 1942) (Col.). In In re Rojas, the Supreme Court of Costa Rica advised the executive to refuse the request of Nicaragua for Rojas's extradition for the crime of swindling under the Central American Extradition Convention of 1923, on the grounds that Rojas was a Costa Rican and that, under Article 4 of the Convention, the contracting parties are not obliged to surrender their nationals but must prosecute them for the offense. 10 Ann. Dig. 330 (Sup. Ct. 1941) (Costa Rica). In In re Artaza, the Argentine court reversed the decision of the lower court in favor of granting the extradition of Artaza, an Argentine national, to Brazil, where he was charged with homicide. The court noted that there was no extradition treaty in force between the two countries and stated: "In the absence of an extradition treaty with the demanding State, the provisions of Title V, Chapter II, of Book IV, Section II, of the Code of Criminal Procedure govern the proceedings. According to Article 669 of this Code an Argentine citizen has the right to request a trial before an Argentine court. As the appellant has exercised this right, the extradition request is denied." 18 I.L.R. 333 (Ct. Second Inst. 1951) (Arg.). In 1932, Tom Coumas, a naturalized U.S. citizen of Greek origin, fled to Greece after allegedly committing a murder and an assault with a deadly weapon in California. In 1934, the United States, on behalf of California, requested his extradition from Greece under the United States–Greece Extradition Treaty of 1931, U.S.T.S. 355, 47 Stat. 2185. Coumas successfully resisted extradition on the ground that he was a Greek citizen as he had never divested himself of his Greek citizenship, and that under the 1931 Treaty his extradition was not obligatory and was, under Greek law, prohibited. He was, however, tried in Greece for the crimes for which his extradition had been sought, convicted, and sentenced to four years' and four months' imprisonment. After serving his sentence in Greece, he returned to the United States where he was arrested in 1947 on the same charges. The Supreme Court of California held that his prosecution in California was barred by California law, which provided that conviction or acquittal in another state or country also having jurisdiction over an offense within the jurisdiction of California is a bar to prosecution thereof in California. Coumas v. Superior Court, 192 P.2d 449 (Cal. 1948). See also The Bustamante Code of Private and International Law (1928), 86 L.N.T.S. 120 (making extradition of nationals optional).

The United States permits extradition of its nationals irrespective of reciprocity. See Castillo v. Forsht, 450 U.S. 922. This is also the position of the Harvard Draft, supra note 11, at 128. See also C. Shachor-Landau, Extraterritorial Penal Jurisdiction and Extradition, 29 Int'l & Comp. L. Q. 274, 288 (1980); cf. Baltazis, La Non-extradition Des Nationaux, 13 Rev. Hellenique de Droit Int'l 190 (1960).

390 For example, Germany and Italy, as well as a number of Latin American states, including Mexico and until recently Colombia. See supra note 355.

391 See Ch. I, Sec. 5.1. This was the case with Italy with respect to Venezia v. Ministero de Grazia e Givstizia, Corte cost., June 27, 1996, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 815.

392 This is the position adopted by Arab states, as well as many African states.

its own nationals. As a result of this unseemly situation, the Israeli Parliament enacted Amendment VI to its extradition act on April 9, 1999, to allow extradition for similar situations.[393]

The loophole of the non-extradition of nationals is one that needs to be closed, because it allows a person, solely on the basis of nationality, to evade the consequences of his/her criminal action. This goes contrary to a basic concept of justice, and also violates the maxim of aut dedere aut judicare.[394]

Contemporary extradition treaties of the United States permit the extradition of U.S. nationals even to states that prohibit the extradition of their nationals to the United States. Thus, reciprocity is not a conditio sine qua non for the United States, but the secretary of state has the discretion, under 18 U.S.C. § 3196, to refuse the surrender of a U.S. citizen. However, a problem exists in that there are no guidelines for the secretary of state to exercise his/her discretion. Consequently, it makes it very difficult for a petitioner to have any assurance of fair and equal treatment. It also makes it difficult for a petitioner to seek review of the secretary's discretion under the Administrative Procedure Act, which requires that the petitioner seeking review demonstrate that the decision is arbitrary or contrary to the law.[395]

3.2. Persons Performing Official Acts and Persons Protected by Special Immunity under International Law[396]

Individuals performing official acts and those who are protected by special immunities are in different categories, but they share in common the immunity of the actor. The first of these categories applies to persons who, by reason of their official capacity or functions, are immune from the judicial and administrative processes of their own state, the state where they are performing such recognized official acts, or in any state where their official acts have effects. Insofar as diplomats are concerned, their immunity from prosecution arises under customary international law and treaty law (e.g., the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Immunity), while that of other public officials of a given state arises under the act of state doctrine, which is also recognized in customary international law. Both forms of immunity derive from the doctrine of sovereignty. Other persons protected by special immunity are heads of state. This type of immunity applies to prosecution. Implicit in it is an exemption from extradition. There are no references in extradition treaties or national extradition laws to such persons covered by immunity. Whenever the case arises, the matter is determined by the international law of immunity and the act of state doctrine, rather than that of extradition.[397]

It should be noted, however, that no immunity applies to jus cogens crimes, namely: genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture, apartheid, piracy, and slavery and slave-related practices. Nor does it apply where a specific treaty precludes it, as with those dealing with terrorism. In these cases, the immunity of diplomats requires the sending state to prosecute the

---

393 Abraham Abramovsky & Jonathan I. Edelstein, The Post-Sheinbein Israeli Extradition Law: Has It Solved the Extradition Problems between Israel and the United States or Has It Merely Shifted the Battleground?, 35 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1 (Jan. 2002).

394 M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Extradite or Prosecute in International Law (1995).

395 Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §701 (a) (2000). See also Ch. VII, Sec. 8 (The Rule of Non-Inquiry).

396 See 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 19, at 1–66, 342–351, 428–436.

397 Recently, Italy has convicted twenty-three Americans for their role in the U.S. "extraordinary rendition" process. Three of these Americans were acquitted on diplomatic immunity grounds. For a discussion of the applicability of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, see Erik Sapin, Italy Convicts 23 Americans for Alleged Rendition of Terrorism Suspect, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 11–14 (Jan. 2010).

offending diplomat, and with respect to immunity of heads of states, it becomes a temporal immunity, and not a substantive one. Thus, if the diplomat is not prosecuted by the sending state, he/she can be prosecuted by any state where the diplomat is not accredited, and with respect to heads of states, they can be prosecuted once they no longer have that status. These immunities, do not however, apply to international criminal tribunals, as discussed in Chapter 2, Section 4.

4. Grounds Relating to the Criminal Charge or to the Prosecution of the Offense Charged

4.1. Introduction

There are several grounds that can be relied upon to deny extradition based on the criminal charge or the prosecution of the offense charged, although they are quite different. The distinction between these grounds and the extent of their legal effect depends upon whether, in a given legal system, they are considered substantive or procedural. The doctrinal basis of such a distinction and its legal consequences also differs in the various legal systems. It would therefore be very difficult to attempt to characterize each of these grounds as substantive or procedural, particularly with reference to the many different legal systems of the world. But from a practical viewpoint U.S. extradition proceedings have the same legal basis, though they vary in their effect because they can be raised as a defense to extradition. The term "defense" in this context means that the relator can advance these grounds, which the court can rely upon to deny the extradition request. In addition, each of these grounds is a valid basis for a petition for executive discretion,[398] and the secretary of state can rely on these grounds in the exercise of this discretionary power, as indeed has been the case. Because of the differences in defenses, they will be discussed separately. They are:

1. The legality of the offense charged, ex post facto, and the retroactive application of the extradition treaty;
2. Double jeopardy—ne bis in idem;
3. Statute of limitations;
4. Right to a speedy trial;
5. Immunity from prosecution and plea bargain;
6. Amnesty and pardon; and
7. Conviction based on a trial in absentia.

It must be noted that these defenses are principally found in extradition treaties and in the jurisprudence of the courts. Regrettably, they are not included in applicable municipal legislation, which would produce greater national harmony and uniformity. Instead, this task is left to the judiciary, subject to the limitations of each applicable treaty.

4.2. The Legality of the Offense Charged, Ex Post Facto, and the Retroactive Application of the Extradition Treaty

The relator must be formally charged with an offense, be the subject of a valid and outstanding arrest warrant,[399] or be convicted of a crime. The offense charged or the crime for which he/she was convicted must be listed in the treaty,[400] and the charge must satisfy the principle 398 See Ch. IX, Sec. 2 (procedure in the United States).

399 Id.

400 See Ch. VII, Sec. 3 (extraditable offenses).

of "double criminality."[401] If any of the above "substantive requirements"[402] are not satisfied, extradition will not be granted. In practical terms, if the government fails to comply with these requirements, the relator will raise this noncompliance as a defense. In addition, the relator could claim that at the time of the alleged offense the offense was not a crime under the laws of either the requesting or requested state. That type of ex post facto or retroactivity argument would be a valid defense on the general grounds of the "principles of legality."[403]

If the offense in question existed in the requesting state but not in the requested state at the time the alleged act was committed, the same general argument could be made, namely that it would violate the "principles of legality" of the requested state, as these principles relate to the requirement of "double criminality."[404] Nevertheless, it could be argued that there is no constitutional guarantee applicable in this case to one who is not a U.S. national or permanent resident, especially if the relator is a national of the requesting state.

The specific language of the relevant treaty controls, but in the absence of any specific treaty provision the court should consider that "principles of legality" are part of the public policy of the United States and are therefore applicable. In the United States it is not deemed a violation of the "principles of legality"[405] and, in particular, ex post facto laws, that treaty provisions apply retroactively. The earliest case in point is In re De Giacomo.[406] Various decisions have followed, in particular Gallina v. Fraser,[407] but none has been decided by the Supreme Court, although its denial of certiorari of some of these cases may be deemed an implicit recognition of this position. In United States v. Flores,[408] the Second Circuit held in 1976, however, that the "principles of legality," which include the nonretroactivity of criminal laws and the prohibition 401 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2 (Dual Criminality).

402 See Ch. VII (Substantive Requirements).

403 Bassiouni, supra note 36, at 25–26. See also Ennio Amodio & Oreste Dominioni, L'Extradizione e il Problema de ne bis in idem, in Anno X-N. 2 Rivista Del Diritto Matrimoniale e Dello Stato Delle Persone 363 (1968). M. Cherif Bassiouni, Draft Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal, 9 Nouvellesétudes Pénales 35 (1993); M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Time Has Come for an International Criminal Court, 1 Ind. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 1 (1991). M. Cherif Bassiouni & Christopher Blakesley, The Need for an International Criminal Court in the New International World Order, 25 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 151, 174–176 (1992). Recently, France denied a U.S. request for the extradition of an Iranian accused of exporting over one million dollars of dual-use electronics to Iran. The relator's attorney argued, in part, that the charges arose from transactions that arose prior to the enactment of the relevant U.S. export controls on dual-use technology being sent to Iran. See Bruce Zagaris, France Considers Extradition of Iranian for Alleged Dual Use Items, 26 Int'l. Enforcement L. Rep. 227–228 (June 2010); U.S. Extradition Request Denied in France for Alleged Iranian Military Parts Smuggler, Institute for Science and International Security, May 12, 2010, available at http://www.isisnucleariran.org/brief/detail/us-extradition-request-denied-in-france-for-alleged-iranian-military-parts-/ (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

404 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

405 Moore, Extradition, supra note 337, at § 86.

406 7 F. Cas. 366, 368 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1874).

407 Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F.Supp.2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 99 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 200, (9th Cir. 1990) (NO. 98-55069); Markham v. Pitchess, 605 F.2d 436 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 904 (1980); United States ex rel. Oppenheim v. Hecht, 16 F.2d 955 (2d Cir. 1927), cert. denied, 273 U.S. 769 (1927); cf. United States v. McMullen, 953 F.2d 761 (2d Cir. 1992).

408 United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976).

against ex post facto laws, are part of the public policy of the United States and must be relied upon in extradition cases, unless a specific treaty provision denies or alters their application.[409]

A treaty may provide for extraditability for a given offense when the alleged offense was committed before the treaty entered into effect. However, for this to be so, at the time the alleged offense was committed[410] it would have to be a crime in the laws of both states.[411] Even in the absence of a specific treaty provision, such an argument could be made on the ground that retroactivity is contrary to U.S. policy and can only be resorted to when specifically authorized by a treaty. It must also be noted that the entire treaty may also be held to apply retroactively. Whatever the basis for a retroactive application of the treaty or a specific provision thereof, the requirement of double criminality must be satisfied, and the offense charged must have existed in both legal systems at the time of the alleged crime. The problem may arise when a state elects to waive this requirement. In the United States it cannot be waived except by a treaty, and if it were, a constitutional issue would arise with respect to U.S. citizens and permanent residents on due process and equal protection grounds. In most countries of the world these questions would be substantive (or constitutional), but in U.S. extradition cases they have more often been dealt with procedurally, in that they are included in the issue of treaty interpretation, except in the dictum of some opinions.[412]

4.3. Double Jeopardy—Ne Bis In Idem[413]

A Roman law maxim holds nemo bis in idem debet vexari (it is also known as ne bis in idem) and embodies the principle that no one shall be twice placed in jeopardy for the same offense. A corollary of that principle is that society (and the victim) is entitled to but one satisfaction, and that no more than a single penalty should be exacted for a single offense. Criminal punishment has traditionally been retributive, but even the lex talio never required more than an "eye for an eye."

---

409 Id. The Flores case dealt with the 1970 Treaty with Spain, which specifically overcomes the presumption of non-retroactive application of the treaty to crimes committed before the treaty entered into effect. Id.

410 429 F. Supp. 1215 (D. Conn. 1977). See Michael P. Peck, Recent Decision, Extradition—Double Jeopardy Provision of Extradition Treaty Applies even Where Crime Committed before Ratification, 11 Vand. J. Trans. L. 833 (1978); Extradition Treaty, Dec. 3, 1971–July 9, 1974, art. 18, U.S.–Can., 27 U.S.T. 983 (entered into force Mar. 22, 1976) (excluding retroactivity explicitly).

411 For double criminality, see Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

412 In the case of the extradition of Doherty, supra note 137, the United States and the United Kingdom, by renegotiating their existing extradition treaties, in effect retroactively applied the supplementary treaty to Doherty.

413 For other sections also discussing ne bis in idem, see Ch. I, Secs. 4.1 (European Regimes), 7.2 (ICC); Ch. II, Sec. 5.3.3(a) (Interpretive Criteria; Resort to National Legislation); Ch. VI, Sec. 2.2. (Subjective-Objective Territorial Theory), Sec. 3 (Active Personality Theory); Ch. VII, Sec. 2 (Dual Criminality); Ch. VIII, Sec. 1.1 (Restatement), Sec. 4.1 (Grounds Relating to the Criminal Charges). For examples of treaty provisions on Double Jeopardy, see Italian Extradition Treaty, art. VI, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023 ("Extradition shall not be granted when the person sought has been convicted, acquitted or pardoned, or has served the sentence imposed, by the Requested Party for the same act for which extradition is requested"). Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 5, entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23 ("1. Extradition shall not be granted when the person sought has been convicted or acquitted in the Requested State for the offense for which extradition is requested. 2. The Requested State may refuse extradition when the person sought has been convicted or acquitted in a third state in respect of the conduct for which extradition is requested. 3. Extradition shall not be precluded by the fact that the competent authorities of the Requested State: (a) have decided not to prosecute the person sought for the acts for which extradition is requested; (b) have decided to discontinue any criminal proceedings which have been instituted against the person sought for those acts; or (c) are still investigating the person sought for the same acts for which extradition is sought."); Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. V(2), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22 ("Extradition shall not be granted when the person sought has been

A general principle, which has developed throughout history, requires that no person shall be punished twice for the same offense. The application of this principle has, however, been different in the various legal systems of the world and there has always been a question as to its applicability between different legal systems. The reason is that conduct that affects more than one state can be considered as a separate violation, because each state is a separate sovereign. As a result, each state seeks its satisfaction independently of any other state. This approach derives from the doctrine of separate sovereignties whereby each sovereign, considering only the violation of its own public order, enforces its laws regardless of whether the same conduct also affected another state, which may have already prosecuted or punished the offender for the same crime or conduct.[414] But this traditional view is rapidly changing with the development of international and regional human rights norms. In addition certain regions (such as the European members of the Schengen Agreement) and subregional groups of states (such as members of the Benelux countries or Scandinavia) have developed treaties with broader prohibitions of ne bis in idem, which is broader than the double jeopardy principle found in the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Among the problems arising out of the application of this prohibition are the following:

1. Whether punishment in one state for certain conduct satisfies another state if the same conduct is also punishable under its laws?

2. Whether acquittal by one state for a given offense satisfies another state if the same conduct is also punishable under its laws?

---

convicted or acquitted in the Requested State for the offense for which extradition is requested. Extradition shall not be precluded by the fact that the authorities of the Requested State have decided to refrain from prosecuting the person sought for the acts for which extradition is requested or to discontinue any criminal proceedings which have been initiated against the person sought for those acts."). See also Extradition Treaty with Sri Lanka, art. 5, entered into force Jan. 12, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-34; Extradition Treaty with Trinidad and Tobago, art. 5, entered into force Nov. 29, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-21; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 5, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S.

TREATY DOC. 102-17; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 5, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3. Some include language to avoid confusion over whether an American dismissal with prejudice is the same as an acquittal, Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 5(1), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5 ("Extradition shall not be granted when the person sought has been convicted or acquitted or the case dismissed by court order with finding and final effect in the Requested State for the offense for which extradition is requested").

414 Bassiouni, supra note 41, at 499–511. See Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959) (upholding the doctrine of separate sovereigns between states). See also Thomas Franck, An International Lawyer Looks at the Bartkus Rule, 34 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1096 (1959). It is usual for extradition laws and treaties to exclude extradition if there has been a final judgment rendered against the person in the requested state with regard to the offense for which his extradition has been requested. The United Nations model treaty contains the double jeopardy exception in Article 3(e). The situation is different with respect to final judgments rendered in third states. Provisions excluding extradition in such cases are relatively rare. There may, however, be a development toward also applying the exception of ne bis in idem to judgments rendered in the third states. For example, the First Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Trb. 1979 No. 119, Europe. T.S. No. 86, makes refusal of extradition possible. U.N. Model Extradition Treaty, supra note 23, at 199–200. See also Williams, supra note 373, at 266 ("[a] majority on the Canadian Supreme Court felt that a [plea of double jeopardy] could only be raised at trial . . . [and] is not appropriate for an extradition hearing."). In Germany, the law and constant practice have thus far recognized the ne bis in idem principle only in the domestic arena (in which it is guaranteed by the Constitution), but not in relation to foreign judgments. Peter Wilkitski, Defences, Exceptions and Exemptions in the Extradition Law and Practice and the Criminal Policy of the Federal Republic of Germany (Excluding the "Political Offense" Defence), 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 281, 282 (1991).

3. Whether prosecution or any of its preceding stages precludes another state from prosecuting a person for conduct claimed criminal under both laws?

4. Whether the state seeking to prosecute or punish a person already prosecuted or punished by another state for the same conduct considers itself bound by the prior prosecution or punishment, or in reliance upon a technical difference as to the offense charged, will it deem itself free to pursue that same offender?

5. Whether the inquiry be made as to the entirety of a given criminal transaction, or will be made as to each chargeable offense arising out of the respective laws of each state?

These threshold questions make the principle ne bis in idem difficult to apply in extradition with any degree of uniformity, in the absence of internationally accepted doctrines of criminal justice that could provide a conceptual framework for the application of the prohibition. So far, the commonly accepted statement of this principle is that, at a minimum, a person shall not be punished twice for the same crime. At the other end of the spectrum is the prohibition to prosecute for any offense arising out of the same facts that were part of or which formed the basis of the former prosecution. In short, it gives the prosecution one bite of the apple.

Extradition treaties contain specific provisions on ne bis in idem or double jeopardy, and they will usually specify that the law of the requested or requesting state applies.[415] Such a treaty provision will also refer to the prohibition as applying to the "same offense" or to the "same facts" on which the offense charged in the requested state was predicated. Most U.S. extradition treaties refer to the "same offense" or substantially the same offense; some (such as the treaty with France) refer to the "same facts." The use of the term "same facts" creates a broader protection than "same offense."[416]

The distinction between same offense and same facts is indeed considerable, but it stems in large part from the differences between the common law and civilist systems.[417] In the former, the prosecutor has prosecutorial discretion and can therefore select from the facts in a given situation what crimes to prosecute. In that case, the prosecution is barred from retrying the same person for substantially the same crime based on substantially the same facts. In the latter the prosecutor is obligated to prosecute for all crimes that arise from the facts known to him/her at that time. Thus, the prosecutor is barred from any future prosecution of any crime arising out of the same facts irrespective of the legal characterization of the offense charged in the earlier prosecution, and in the subsequent one.

The difference between legal systems may occasion difficulties in the United States, as the civilist concept of ne bis in idem is not only broader than double jeopardy, but it is also based on the prohibition of prosecution for the same facts, and not only for the same or substantially the same crimes arising out of the same facts. The concept of same facts includes same evidence and material propositions of fact.

---

415 Bedi, supra note 19, at 171–179.

416 In an extradition from Mexico, the Mexican Attorney General explained that the relator was extraditable despite having been tried and sentenced for the criminal activity at issue because "facts for which his extradition is sought differ from those for which Mr. Arellano Felix was tried and sentenced." The facts in the U.S. case involved conduct that occurred temporally after the Mexican case. See Bruce Zagaris, Mexico Extradites Benjamin Arellano Felix to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 101 (Mar. 2009). See also In re Extradition of Garcia, 802 F. Supp 773, 777 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) regarding what constitutes an "offense" under ne bis in idem).

417 See Articles 6 and 368 of the French Code de Procédure Pénale (1994) prohibiting ne bis in idem. For a more ample discussion, see 2 Roger Merle & André Vitu, Traitéde Droit Criminal: Procédure Penale 871 (3d ed. 1979); Gaston Stefani et al., Procédure Pénale 794–804 (15th ed. 1993); 2 Albin Eser et al., Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen 1949-1992 at 149, 373, 611–613 (1993). See also Christine Van Den Wijngaert, Criminal Procedure Systems in the European Community (1993).

Contemporary extradition law concerns itself with these questions, but there are few cases on point thus far, because few criminal acts have multi-state effects that are simultaneously or concurrently pursued by more than one state. The range of treaty provisions and judicial interpretation include the following applications:

1. The requested state shall not surrender the relator if he/she was prosecuted and acquitted, or prosecuted and convicted and served his sentence, if he/she is sought for the same offense, with the following variances:

   a. regardless of the state wherein this occurred; or

   b. provided it occurred in the requesting state;[418] or

   c. provided it occurred in the requested state.

2. The requested state shall not surrender the relator if he/she was convicted of an offense and served his/her sentence and was sought for the same offense, with these variances:

   a. by the same state which convicted him; or

   b. by its own judicial authorities; or

   c. by any other state.

3. The requested state will extradite the relator subject to a limitation (contained in the extradition order) on the future prosecution of the relator in the requesting state. Such a limitation will function like any other limitation arising under the principle of specialty (see Chapter VII, Sec. 6). In that case, the specific language of the limitation controls, and it is to be construed in accordance with the laws of the surrendering state.

Ne bis in idem or double jeopardy issues arise, inter alia, in the following instances:

1. Whenever the relator has been prosecuted and convicted by the requested state and is sought by the requesting state for the identical or substantially similar criminal conduct. The rationale in this instance is essentially fundamental fairness, but also that it would be repugnant to the requested state to use its processes to place an individual twice in jeopardy for the same conduct, particularly after that very state had prosecuted and punished the offender for the conduct.

2. Whenever the relator had been prosecuted and acquitted by the requesting state and was not a fugitive there from when he/she came to the requested state. The rationale is also fundamental fairness, but also that the requested state is not likely to lend its processes to give the requesting state another opportunity to prosecute the same person for the same offense of which he/she was found not guilty.

3. A more difficult problem, for which there are no decisions in the United States (and none elsewhere that are known to this writer), is when the relator has been prosecuted, convicted, or acquitted in a given state other than in the requesting or requested state. In this situation and in the absence of a controlling treaty, the requested state can rely on its own public policy, which may differ depending on whether the relator is a national of the requested state.

---

418 This arose in the legal proceedings surrounding the extradition of Japanese businessman Kazuyoshi Muira to California after being acquitted of the same charges in Japan. See generally, Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands v. Muira, 2010 MP 12 (CNMI Supreme Court, 2010). Mr. Muira committed suicide after he was extradited to the United States and before his trial could commence, and the case was dismissed. See Case Dismissed against Muira After Jail Suicide, AP Worldstream, Oct, 15, 2008, available at http://www.highbeam.com/doc/1A1-D93QJOAG0.html (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

It should be noted that the statutes of the ICTY, ICTR, and the ICC contain a provision on double jeopardy. These provisions are:

Article 10 of the ICTY statute states:[419]

> 1. No person shall be tried before a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law under the present Statute, for which he or she has already been tried by the International Tribunal.
>
> 2. A person who has been tried by a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law may be subsequently tried by the International Tribunal only if:
>
> (a) the act for which he or she was tried was characterized as an ordinary crime; or
>
> (b) the national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility, or the case was not diligently prosecuted.
>
> 3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the International Tribunal shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 9 of the ICTR states:[420]

> 1. No person shall be tried before a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law under the present Statute, for which he or she has already been tried by the International Tribunal for Rwanda.
>
> 2.A person who has been tried before a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law may be subsequently tried by the International Tribunal for Rwanda only if:
>
> a) The act for which he or she was tried was characterised as an ordinary crime; or
>
> b) The national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility, or the case was not diligently prosecuted.
>
> 3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 20 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court states:[421]

> 1. Except as provided in this Statute, no person shall be tried before the Court with respect to conduct which formed the basis of crimes for which the person has been convicted or acquitted by the Court
>
> 2. No person shall be tried by another court for a crime referred to in article 5 for which that person has already been convicted or acquitted by the Court.
>
> 3. No person who has been tried by another court for conduct also proscribed under article 6, 7 or 8 shall be tried by the Court with respect to the same conduct unless the proceedings in the other court:
>
> (a) Were for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

---

419 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, S.C. Res. 808, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/808 (1993).

420 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, S.C. Res. 955, U.N. SCOR, 49th Sess., 3453d mtg., Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994).

421 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/9.

> (b) Otherwise were not conducted independently or impartially in accordance with the norms of due process recognized by international law and were conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, was inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice.

Difficulties also arise when relators enter into plea agreements or are extradited based on "assurances," and attempt to raise claims that their subsequent prosecution on given charges would violate the terms of these agreements.[422]

A difficult problem lies in the interpretation of the words "same conduct" and "same offense." The two terms can be interpreted as follows:

1. Same conduct:
   a. Identical acts; or
   b. A series of acts related to each other by the scheme or intent of the actor; or
   c. Multiple acts committed at more than one place and at different times, but related by the actor's criminal design.
2. Same offense:
   a. Identical charge; or
   b. Lesser included offense; or
   c. Related offenses, but not included.

Last, there is the problem of distinguishing between "same facts" and "same acts." The term "same facts" is broader and refers to all legally relevant facts to the charge for which the person was prosecuted, whereas "same acts" refers to the elements of the offense charged. One can therefore conclude that:

> 1. The applicable extradition treaty language controls, unless there is a superseding multilateral treaty that applies to the question. The extradition treaty is, in any event, subject to the national constitution of the requesting state seeking to prosecute a surrendered person.
>
> 2. In the absence of the above and subject to the requirements of the principle of specialty (see Chapter VII, Sec. 6), any limitations contained in the judicial extradition order or executive warrant issued by the surrendering state will control. In that case, the law of the surrendering state will have to be applied in the requested state.

As stated above, various multilateral extradition conventions embody this defense in their provisions, but the choice of terminology reflects different approaches outlined above and thus does not provide a single standard of application.

The relevant provisions of these conventions follow as evidence of the general application of the prohibition, though they also illustrate the different formulations adopted by these instruments.

The Arab Convention on Extradition states in Article V:

> Extradition shall not be granted in case the person sought for has already been committed to trial for the offense for which his extradition is being requested and has not been found guilty, or has been already convicted, or if he is under investigation, or if trial had been started for the same offense in the State from which extradition is being requested.
>
> In case the person in question is under trial for another offense, committed in the state which is being asked to surrender him, his extradition shall be postponed until the trial is terminated

422 See United States v. Salinas-Doria, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 86170 (S.D.N.Y. 2008) (relator raising the ne bis in idem issue based on assurances given to Mexico by the United States); Ramanauskas v. United States, 526 F.3d 1111 (8th Cir. 2008) (relator raising the ne bis in idem issue based on a plea agreement between him and the U.S. government).

> and the penalty inflicted has been executed. However, provisions may be made for the temporary surrender to stand trial in the requesting state, on condition that at the end of such trial and before the execution of the penalty inflicted, he will be returned to the state applying for his extradition.[423]

The Benelux Convention on Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance states in Article 8:

> Extradition shall not be granted if final judgment has been passed on the person claimed by the competent authorities of the requested state in respect of the punishable facts for which extradition is requested. Extradition may be refused if the competent authorities of the requested state have decided either not to institute proceedings in respect of the same facts, or to terminate proceedings already instituted.[424]

The European Convention on Extradition states in Article 9:

> Extradition shall not be granted if final judgment has been passed by the competent authorities of the requested state upon the person claimed in respect of the offense or offenses for which extradition is requested. Extradition may be refused if the competent authorities of the requested state have decided either not to institute or to terminate proceedings in respect of the same offense or offenses.[425]

The European Convention on the International Validity of Criminal Judgments states in Article 9:

> A sentenced person detained in the requesting State who has been surrendered to the requested State for the purpose of enforcement shall not be proceeded against, sentenced or detained with a view to the carrying out of a sentence or detention order for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than for which the sentence to be enforced was imposed.[426]

The Inter-American Convention on Extradition states in Article 13:

> When the person sought is under prosecution or is serving a sentence in the requested state, his surrender shall be deferred until his trial is ended if found not guilty, or until the sentence has been served, as the case may be.[427]

The Schengen Agreement states in Article 54:

> A person who has been finally judged by a Contracting Party may not be prosecuted by another Contracting Party for the same offences provided that, where he is sentenced, the sentence has been served or is currently being served or can no longer be carried out under the sentencing laws of the Contracting Party.[428]

---

423 1952 B.F.S.P. 159, at 606, League of Arab States Treaty Series 27-32, reprinted in 8 Rev. Egyptienne de Droit Int'l 328–332 (1952). See also Said Hussein Youssef Khadr, Extradition Law and Practice in Egypt and Other Arab States (School of Oriental and African Studies, London W.C. 1, Apr. 1977).

424 The Benelux Convention on Extradition and Judicial Assistance in Penal Matters, Tractatenblad van het Koninkrijk der Nederlanded No. 97 (1962).

425 European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, 359 U.N.T.S. 273, reprinted in 1 European Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters 212 (Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1991).

426 European Convention on the International Validity of Criminal Judgments, May 28, 1970, 973 U.N.T.S. 57, E.T.S. No.70, reprinted in 1 European Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters 519 (Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1991).

427 Second Draft Convention on Extradition, adopted by the Inter-American Juridical Committee, July 10, 1957.

428 Convention Applying the Schengen Agreement of June 14, 1985 between the governments of the States of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic on the Gradual Abolition of Checks at Their Common Borders, June 19, 1990, 30 I.L.M. 84; H. Meijers

These multilateral conventions, as well as bilateral treaties, national laws, and customary practice, warrant the conclusion that the principle is a part of conventional and customary international law. While the principle of ne bis in idem reflects the penological policy of the state applying it, its general acceptance by the world community gives it recognition as a "general principle of international law." As such, it is also embodied in human rights conventions.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) states in Article 14(7):

> No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again for an offense for which he has already been finally convicted or acquitted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of each country.[429]

The Inter-American Convention on Human Rights (IACHR) states in Article 8(4):

> An accused person acquitted by a nonapplicable judgment shall not be subjected to a new trial for the same cause.[430]

The historical recognition given the principle ne bis in idem in various legal systems, its enunciation in human rights conventions, and its embodiment in bilateral and multilateral extradition treaties make it a part of all the sources of international law. As such, it operates either as a bar to extradition or as a bar to prosecution after extradition. However, there are problems in its application, as each state will apply the prohibition in accordance with its laws and jurisprudence, unless it is required to apply the law of the surrendering state.

An analysis of U.S. precedent dealing with the double jeopardy issue is instructive. The basic test for double jeopardy within the federal system, as well as within the state systems, is found in Blockburger v. United States.[431] In the United States, the doctrine of double jeopardy does not bar one state from prosecuting crimes for which another state or the federal government, a separate sovereign, has prosecuted the same individual.[432] In United States v. Ryan,[433] it was found that no constitutional right existed for a non-U.S. citizen to be protected against double jeopardy as between separate sovereignties.[434] This is true unless a treaty provision holds otherwise.[435] The basis for this and other similar decisions appears in United States v. Martinez,[436] et al., Schengen: Internationalisation of Central Chapters of the Law on Aliens, Refugees, Privacy, Security, and the Police 173 (1991).

---

429 G.A. Res. 2200, supra note 4, art. XIV; Symposium: The Ratification of the International Covenant in Civil and Political Rights, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 4 (1993).

430 Nov. 22, 1969, Organization of American States Off. Rec. OEA/Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 2, reprinted in 9 I.L.M. 673.

431 Blockburger v. United States, 248 U.S. 299 (1932). In Blockburger the Supreme Court held that "The applicable rule is that, where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not." Id. at 304.

432 See Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959); Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187 (1979). See also Daniel K. Mayers & Fletcher L. Yarbrough, Bis Vexari: New Trials and Successive Prosecutions, Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1960). For estoppel of subsequent prosecution in violation of double jeopardy, which is also part of the due process provisions of the Fourteenth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, see Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970). See also Hurtado-Hurtado v. United States Attorney General,2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125460, at *12–*14 (S.D. Fla. 2009).

433 United States v. Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 270 (E.D.N.Y. 1973).

434 Id. at 274. See also Coumas v. Superior Court, 192 P.2d 449 (Cal. 1948) (barring subsequent prosecution in California, pursuant to extradition treaty between Greece and United States, of a naturalized American citizen [a native Greek who naturalized without consent of the Greek government] convicted in Greek court); cf. People v. Mims, 289 P.2d 539, 542 Cal. Ct. App. (1955).

435 See Ch. II, Sec. 5.4, discussing Sindona v. Grant.

436 United States v. Martinez, 616 F.2d 185 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 994 (1981). See also Gusikoff v. United States, 620 F.2d 459 (5th Cir. 1980); supra note 199 and accompanying text.

in the case of a relator subject to double jeopardy (prosecuted in Cuba and then in the United States). In addition, if the case involved a non-U.S. citizen, the claim could be made that the prohibition against double jeopardy applies territorially within the United States to all persons,[437] but does not extend extraterritorially except to U.S. citizens. It must be noted, however, that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,[438] the ICCPR,[439] and the IACHR[440] provide for protection against double jeopardy. It can therefore be argued that such a prohibition can be raised as a bar to prosecution in the requested state. However, in the case of the ICCPR, one court found the treaty to be non–self-executing and as such Article 14(7) was not judicially enforceable.[441]

The Second Circuit court, in Galanis v. Pallanck,[442] stated that double jeopardy is a treaty right. Thus, when the crime for which extradition is sought occurred before ratification of the applicable treaty, but the extradition proceedings had begun after ratification, the double jeopardy provision of that treaty applies.[443]

In Sindona v. Grant,[444] the Second Circuit, relying on this writer's position, held that the defense of double jeopardy can be validly raised as a bar to extradition, but construed it narrowly as the language of the 1973 United States–Italy Extradition Treaty was law-driven, namely by the offense charged, the facts being a secondary test, namely whether to mean the same or substantially the same crime based on the same or substantially the same facts upon which the relator has been or is being prosecuted in the United States.[445] The 1983 United States–Italy Extradition Treaty 437 The prohibition against double jeopardy does not bar prosecution by two or more states for the same offense. Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985), cert. denied, Heath v. Jones, 502 U.S. 1077 (1992). See also United States v. Rashed, 83 F. Supp. 2d 96 (D.D.C. 1999); James A. Shellenger & James A. Strazella, The Lesser Included Offense Doctrine and the Constitution: The Development of Due Process and Double Jeopardy Remedies, 79 Marq. L. Rev. I (1995).

---

438 G.A. Res. 217, supra note 4.

439 G.A. Res. 2200, supra note 4, at art. XIV.

440 See American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (Jan. 7, 1970).

441 Hurtado-Hurtado v. United States Attorney General,2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 125460, at *14–*18 (S.D. Fla. 2009).

442 Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1977). See Peck, supra note 410. See also Smalis v. Penn., 476 U.S. 140 (1986) (ruling on defendants' demurrer holding that evidence insufficient to establish factual guilt was an acquittal under double jeopardy clause and barred the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania's appeal).

443 See also United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974); Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972); cf. In re Extradition of Singh, 123 F.R.D. 127 (D.N.J. 1987); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. 1998), United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

444 Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 178 (2d Cir. 1980), aff'g 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Jurado-Rodriguez & Garcia-Montilla, E.D.N.Y. CR 94-547, Nov 3, 1995, Memorandum and Order on Double Jeopardy. Only four reported federal decisions and one state decision refer to the doctrine of ne bis in idem. See Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959) (Black J. dissenting); Garcia v. United States, 987 F.2d 153 (2nd Cir. 1993) ("Garcia II"); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 1967 (2d Cir. 1980); Garcia v. United States, 802 F. Supp. 773 (E.D. N.Y. 1993) ("Garcia I"); State v. Barger, 242 Md. 616, 220 A. 2d 304 (Md. 1966) Of those five, only Sindona and Garcia I have any substantive discussion whatsoever of the doctrine.

445 See also In re Gambino, 2006 WL 709445 (D. Mass. 2006). See Ch. II, Sec. 5.4. In a similar but unrelated issue, Judge Weinstein concluded that "same offense" and "same conduct" are subject to broad interpretative leeway, and that unless a treaty specifies whether the determination is to be law-driven that it should be considered fact-driven. See also United States v. Jurado-Rodriguez, 907 F. Supp. 568 (E.D.N.Y. 1995) (relying on Gallanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2d. Cir. 1977) and the Restatement contains a similar provision in Article VI. It states that extradition is not available in cases where the requested person has been acquitted or convicted of the "same acts" in English and the "same facts" in the Italian text. It is obvious that any exercise in treaty interpretation needs to ascertain the parties' intention by relying on the plain language and meaning of the words, if possible. Thus, the real inquiry must be into the parties' intentions. In the case of Italy, the parties intended to reflect their national legislation in the treaties. For example, Italy's law prohibiting ne bis in idem specifically uses the words stessi fatti, which are the same words used in the Italian version of Article VI, which mean "same facts." Understandably, Italy could not ratify a treaty that was inconsistent with its national legislation. Therefore, Italy intends the "same facts" to prevail, as opposed to the more narrow meaning of "same acts," because fatti, or "facts," may include multiple acts. One district court discussed the "discredited dictum in the Sindona opinion" and applied the "same conduct" test in finding a relator extraditable to Mexico.[446]

United States courts may still make a constitutional determination under the Fifth Amendment of the applicability of double jeopardy to extradition cases, particularly with respect to a requesting state's right to keep on reviewing its request for the same facts in the hope of finding a sympathetic magistrate or judge while the requested person remains in custody.[447]

Title 18 §§ 3181–3196 does not contain a provision applicable to double jeopardy. Consequently, the question is left to be answered by the various bilateral treaties between the United States and other countries. Where the United States relies on a bilateral treaty that is silent on double jeopardy, or on a multilateral treaty that does not contain reference to double jeopardy or a source of reliance, the U.S. courts will have to consider whether the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States applies. So far, that issue has been avoided because the (Third), § 476 & comment); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F. 2d 167 (2d. Cir. 1980). Even though civilest countries do not recognize the concept of conspiracy, many European countries are now moving toward legislation of attempt that is closer to conspiracy, and also includes participation in a criminal organization as a basis for criminal responsibility. This is the case with Italy. See Article 416 and 416*bis* of the Italian Criminal Code with respect to associazione per delinquere and associazione per delinquere di stampo Mafioso. France has a similar article in its criminal code called: Association de Malfaiteurs. As foreign legislation may seek to emulate the United States' general conspiracy provision, as well as narrowly defined conspiracies to commit certain crimes, it is likely that issues of interpretation will arise, and in that case comparative legal analysis will be required.

---

446 In re Extradition of Ye Gon, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 12559, at *54–*62 (D.D.C. Feb. 9, 2011).

447 In Ahmad v. Wigen, the Court held:

> Judge Korman held that as a matter of law the United States Attorney was entitled to file a second extradition complaint after Magistrate Caden had denied the initial extradition request. Ahmad, 706 F. Supp. at 1036. Even though this procedure permits the United States Attorney to relitigate issues of fact and law that have been decided by a magistrate, a de novo extradition hearing is permissible and does not violate principles of res judicata or double jeopardy. See, e.g. Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426, 429-30, 43 S. Ct. 618, 619, 67 L.Ed. 1062 (1923) (double jeopardy principles are inapplicable to multiple extradition applications); United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491, 501 (2d Cir. 1986) (upon denial of extradition request, sole recourse for government is to file request for another proceeding; application of res judicata is inappropriate); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1366 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 932, 99 S. Ct. 323, 58 L.Ed.2d 327 (1978) (only limitation on number of extradition requests is that each such request must be based on good faith determination "that extradition is warranted").
>
> The proceedings here were neither vindictive nor designed to harass the petitioner—two of the evils which double jeopardy prevents. Cf. Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 187–88, 78 S. Ct. 221, 223–24, 2 L.Ed.2d 199 (1957). They were intended to meet the problem of the government's lack of power to appeal the denial of extradition. See United States v. Doherty, 615 F. Supp. 755 (S.D.N.Y.1985), aff'd, 786 F.2d 491, 495–96 (2d Cir. 1986). It would be desirable to allow an appeal by either side from an extradition decision. But this is a matter for the legislature, not the courts. (Legislation to this effect has been proposed but not yet enacted. See Proposed Extradition Act of 1984, H.R. 3347, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 3195(a)(1), various cases in which the constitutional issue was raised were deemed to be controlled by the applicable bilateral treaty. Nevertheless, U.S. courts may still determine the applicability of a constitutional provision despite the fact that there is an existing treaty. So far there has been some reticence on the part of U.S. courts to apply constitutional protections to extradition, as evidenced in judicial reluctance to apply the Fourth Amendment "probable cause" requirement to provisional arrest (see Chapter IX, Section 9), and to extradition hearings (see Chapter X) (essentially because Section 3184 requires "probable cause") the right to bail (see Chapter IX, Sec. 12), and the Fifth Amendment right to be protected against self-incrimination (see Chapter VII, Sec. 8). As the jurisprudence of the United States presently stands, the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution does not prevent extradition to another state unless the relevant treaty provides that double jeopardy shall apply. Nor does it apply to sentencing enhancement based on evidence of relevant conduct of another crime. Thus, the relevant extradition treaty will control as to whether it is the law of the requesting state or that of the requested state that will apply. If it is that of the requesting state, the court will either have to take judicial notice of the law of that country or seek to have it proven as a matter of fact through the laws, judicial decisions, and the writings of authoritative commentators. If it is the law of the requested state, namely the United States, the issue is whether to apply exclusively U.S. domestic legal standards applicable to criminal cases, or whether in addition to that, U.S. courts will take into account the applicability of international law.

In Elcock v. United States,[448] Judge Targer held in a learned opinion that:

> The Fifth Amendment's protection against double jeopardy extends only to successive prosecutions brought by the same sovereign. See Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187, 193-195, 79 S. Ct. 666, 670, 3 L. Ed. 2d 729 (1959) (enunciating separate sovereign theory of double jeopardy); United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377, 382, 43 S. Ct. 141, 142 67 L. Ed. 314 (1922); Moore v. Illinois, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 13, 19–20, 14 L. Ed. 306 (1852) (same). As a result, the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Constitution does not prevent extradition from the United States for the purpose of a foreign prosecution following prosecution in the United States for the same offense. See In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 370, 274 (E.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973) (Table). The principle of double jeopardy, or ne bis in idem as the concept is more commonly known in civil law, is, however, an internationally recognized principle of criminal justice. See Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 177 (2d Cir.1980) (Friendly, J.); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice 598 (3d rev. ed. 1996) [hereinafter Bassiouni, International Extradition], as negotiated since World War II—contain provisions on double jeopardy. See Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177 (citing numerous examples); 4 Michael Abbell & Bruno A. Ristau, International Judicial Assistance 109 (1990 & Supp. 1997).[449] reprinted in H.Rep. 998, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 54 (1984) (permitting appeal from an extradition order by government or defendant)).
>
> …

---

Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, 397 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 497 U.S. 1054 (1990). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997). See contra, In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 370 (E.D.N.Y), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973).

448 Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). See also United States v. Rashed, 83 F. Supp. 2d 96 (D.D.C. 1999); United States v. Rashed, 234 F.3d 1280 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (applying the treaty between United States and Greece); United States v. Rezak, 899 F. Supp. 697 (D.D.C. 1998).

449 Elcock, 80 F. Supp. at 70. A number of circuits have made an exception in the dual sovereignty theory for "sham prosecutions." See, e.g., United States v. Raymer, 941 F.2d 1031 (10th Cir. 1991); United States v. Bernhardt, 831 F.2d 181 (9th Cir. 1987); United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666, 118 S. Ct. 2218 (1998).

Relying in part on Judge Friendly's opinion in Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), the Government urges that Article should be interpreted solely in light of the domestic law of double jeopardy and that this court should apply the Blockburger or "same elements" test to determine whether the German charges concern the same offense as the charges for which Elcock has been prosecuted in the United States. See Resp't's Mem. Opp. at 5, 8–9. See generally United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 703–12, 113 S. Ct. 2849, 2859–64, 125 L. Ed. 2d 556 (1993) (adopting Blockburger as the exclusive test for determining whether multiple prosecutions violate the Double Jeopardy Clause); Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304, 52 S. Ct. 180, 182, 76 L. Ed. 306 (1932) (holding that two crimes constitute different "offences" within the meaning of the Double Jeopardy Clause if each "requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not").

In Sindona, Judge Friendly was required to construe the prior jeopardy clause of the United States' then-current extradition treaty with Italy. In language close to that of Article 8, the treaty with Italy barred extradition in cases where the "person whose surrender is sought is being proceeded against or has been tried and discharged or punished in the territory of the requested Party for the offense for which his extradition is requested." Treaty on Extradition, Jan. 18, 1973, U.S. –Italy, art. VI(1), 26 U.S.T. 493 (superseded by Treaty on Extradition, Oct. 13, 1983, U.S.–Italy, T.I.A.S. No. 10,837). Italy had requested Sindona's extradition to face charges of fraudulent bankruptcy in Italy following his prosecution in the United States for securities fraud and other securities law offenses. Rejecting Blockburger as too narrow a test for determining identity of "offenses" within the meaning of the treaty, Judge Friendly instead looked for guidance in Justice Brennan's concurring opinion in Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 453–54, 90 S. Ct. 1189, 1199, 25 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1970) (Brennan, J., concurring) (stating that the Double Jeopardy Clause requires joinder of "all the charges against a defendant which grow out of a single criminal act, occurrence, episode or transaction") and the Department of Justice's (then-current) Petite n9 policy, See United States Attorneys' Manual § 9-1.242 (n.d.) (Barring federal prosecutors from trying a case where there has been a state prosecution for "substantially the same act or acts" unless there are "compelling Federal interests for such prosecution"), quote in Sindona, 619 F.2d at 178. See Sindona, 619 F.2d at 178–79. Applying these principles, Judge Friendly determined that the Italian charges against Sindona did not involve the same "offense" as did his American prosecution.

Although Judge Friendly's opinion has sometimes been cited for the proposition that domestic law should be applied to determine the effect of a double jeopardy clause in an extradition treaty. see e.g., United States v. Jurado-Rodriguez, 907 F. Supp. 568, 577–78 (E.D.N.Y. 1995), such a view may well represent a misreading of the opinion. The passage in Sindona generally cited for the proposition that recourse to domestic law is appropriate in these cases is not actually a holding or even dictum of the court. Rather, it is a paraphrase of a descriptive observation by a commentator:

> Perhaps because of the diverse origins of the rule . . . no established solution exists for the famous problem of identity of offenses for application of ne bis in idem . . . Thus, he [commentator M. Cherif Bassiouni] observes, the scope of any given double jeopardy provision will hinge in large part on the interpretations given these terms that are borrowed from the domestic law and policies of the contracting parties.

Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177 (citing M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order 459 (1974) [hereinafter Bassiouni, World Public Order]) (internal quotations and other citations omitted) (second emphasis added). Nowhere in the opinion does Judge Friendly expressly endorse the observation as a normative principle. On the contrary, Judge Friendly subsequently cautioned that:

> In construing a double jeopardy clause in a treaty, embodying an ancient and widely recognized principle of civilized conduct, a court should not deem itself bound by a quiddity of the law of the requested party.

Sindona, 619 F.2d at 178. Although Judge Friendly did ultimately look to domestic principles, "Justice Brennan's concurring opinion in Ashe v. Swenson, and the Department of Justice's Petite policy" in deciding the scope of the double jeopardy protection in Sindona, he did so simply to find a familiar standard that was broad enough to capture what he saw as the most likely understanding of the principle in the international law context. Far from being a ringing endorsement of the application of domestic law, Judge Friendly's Sindona opinion appears instead to be a qualified acceptance of domestic law as a second-best solution to the difficult problem of applying a transnational legal concept whose precise meaning is not fixed by international law. See In the Matter of the Extradition of Montiel Garcia, 802 F. Supp. 773, 778 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) (commenting that Sindona "recognized the need for some reference to domestic law in light of the absence of international agreement on the scope of the concept" (emphasis added)), aff'd, 987 F.2d 153 (2d Cir. 1993) (per curiam). It is, therefore, a distortion of Judge Friendly's reasoning to suggest that he concluded that extradition treaties should, in the first instance, be interpreted in light of domestic law, and then to argue that if Judge Friendly had had the benefit of the Supreme Court's later opinion in Dixon, he would have necessarily applied the Blockburger test to Sindona's extradition. See Resp't's Mem. Opp. at 5, 8-9.[450]

. . .

Notably, in Sindona, the Government argued that a substantially identical clause in the treaty there under consideration required that the determination whether two "offenses" are the same be made in accordance with domestic double jeopardy law. See Sindona, 619 F.2d at 178. Although Judge Friendly never expressly rejected nor endorsed this reading of the clause, his remark that "a court should not deem itself bound by a quiddity of the law of the requested party" would seem to be an implicit rejection of a reading of the clause that would require an extradition court to apply domestic double jeopardy law.. Id. at 178.[451]

. . .

Although double jeopardy is a widely accepted principle of criminal justice with roots in Roman law, see Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121, 151-55, 79 S. Ct. 676, 695–97, 3 L. Ed. 2d 684 (1959) (Black, J., dissenting); Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177; M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice 598 (3d rev. ed. 1996) [hereinafter Bassiouni, International Extradition]; J. A. Sigler, Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy 120–21 (1969), there is no international consensus on its precise meaning or the general rules governing its application to particular cases, See Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177; Montiel Garcia, 802 F. Supp. at 778; Bassiouni, International Extradition, supra at 598-699; 2 M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda, Treatise on International Criminal Law § 7.9, at 273 (1973). Although it appears relatively clear that use of the term "same acts" in a ne bis in idem clause confers broader protection against extradition than a clause that uses the term "same offense" (as does Article 8 and the ne bis in idem clauses in most United States extradition treaties), see Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177; 4 Abell & Ristau, supra, at 110–11, 215–216, 320; bassiouni, international extradition, supra at 600, little more can be said with certainty other than that a non bis en idem clause is more likely to be applied "when the requested state has already commenced prosecution for 'the same, meaning identical, conduct,' " Sindona, 619 F.2d at 177 (quoting bassiouni, international extradition, supra at 602). See generally 4 Abbell & Ristau, supra, at 109–11, 214–16, 320 (discussing judicial uncertainty over the scope of ne bis in idem clauses); bassiouni, international extradition, supra, at 605–07 (same).[452]

. . .

To prove Elcock guilty of smuggling, the United States was required to show that Elcock knowingly or fraudulently (1) either imported or brought into the United States, or received after importation, (2) merchandise, (3) contrary to law. See 18 U.S.C. § 2315 (Supp. 1999).

---

450 Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. at 77.

451 Id. at 78.

452 Id. at 80.

> Clearly, the German theft offense includes elements not included in any of the American offenses. For example, the German theft charge requires proof that Elcock took the personal property of another (or did so jointly), whereas the American international transportation, smuggling, and receipt or possession charges do not. Conversely, the American charges include elements that the German theft charge does not. The German theft charge does require proof that Elcock transported, transmitted, or transferred the stolen property in foreign commerce, or that he imported or brought merchandise into the United States unlawfully, or that the stolen property crossed a United States boundary, as do the American international transportation, smuggling, and receipt or possession charges, respectively. Thus, under Blockburger and the Treaty, the German theft charge is a different "offense" than the charges in the American indictment.
>
> The result is [sic] same with respect to the second charge of the German arrest warrant. In order to prove Elcock guilty of grand larceny under the German statute, the prosecutor must establish, in addition to the requirements for theft, that the items taken were "protected in a special manner against removal by a locked container or by another protective device." German Crim. Code § 243 (1). Again, the German charge is not the same "offense" as any of the American charges under the Blockburger test. None of the American charges include any requirement that the stolen money or merchandise had to have been protected by a locked container or any other protective device. Conversely, the German grand larceny charge does not require proof that the item taken was subsequently transported in international commerce or that it crossed United States borders in any way.
>
> Because neither of the charges in the German arrest warrant constitute the same "offense" as any of the charges in the American indictment, Elcock's conviction on Counts One and Three and the dismissal of Count Two of the indictment do not bar Elcock's extradition to Germany under Article 8 n.18.[453]
>
> . . .
>
> For the reasons stated, Article 8 of the Treaty does not bar Elcock's extradition to Germany to face prosecution for the 1997 bank robbery. Accordingly, Elcock's petition for writ of habeas corpus prevent his extradition is denied.[454]

The contemporary position in the United States, based on the more recent treaties, is fact-driven. In contemporary practice, the extradition judge will have to look at the underlying facts and conduct of the relator to determine whether the situation in the request is based on the same facts and therefore is part of the same conduct and therefore supports the two charges, which are presumably different and which are barred by ne bis in idem. Obviously if the treaty specifies that extradition is barred only if it is for the same crime, then ne bis in idem will be law-driven and it will be the specific charge that will be controlling. In both of these cases, this will be considered an issue of fact, which will have to be proven in court. The burden of proof is by preponderance of the evidence. The government will have to establish that the two charges, which are contended, do not violate the ne bis in idem provision.

It should be noted that in the United States a claim of double jeopardy is controlled by Blockburger v. United States.[455] Double jeopardy does not apply as between separate sovereignties, as in Bartkus v. Illinois.[456] Among the future issues likely to arise are those relating to multiple conspiracies, each constituting a separate crime for double jeopardy purposes.[457]

---

453 Id. at 85.

454 Id. at 87.

455 Blockburger v. United States, 248 U.S. 299 (1932). See also In re Extradition of Coleman, 473 F. Supp.2d 713 (N.D. W. Va. 2007).

456 See Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959).

457 Katteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750 (1946).

Finally, it appears from United States v. Riviere[458] that an apparently general waiver by the requested state can allow the prosecution of a relator for the same crime for which he was already convicted of in the requested state, notwithstanding the specific prohibition contained in the extradition treaty against double jeopardy. In Riviere the relator argued the applicability of the treaty but the Third Circuit held that he had no standing to do so because of the general waiver that was presumed to have been granted by the requested state.

4.3.1. Ne Bis In Idem as between International and National Tribunals

A number of international judicial bodies were established in the 1990s, starting with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in 1993 and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in 1994, followed by the International Criminal Court (ICC) in 1998. Several mixed national/international bodies were also established soon after, such as the Special Panels for Serious Crimes of the Dili District Court in East Timor in 2001, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) in 2002, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) in 2003, and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) in 2007.[459]

These international and mixed-model tribunals have different relationships with national criminal jurisdictions, depending upon the legal basis upon which these bodies were established. Thus, in the case of the ICTY and ICTR, the Security Council established them, and consequently, any request for the surrender of individuals by these tribunals is backed by the authority of the Council, which can exercise its sanctions power to enforce the surrender request. However, the ICC was established by treaty, and although there is mutuality of legal obligations for member states to carry out the duty to surrender, there is no coercive enforcement mechanism, nor are there any sanctions other than suspending the applicability of the ICC treaty to the non-complying state. The question remains whether the Security Council has an obligation to enforce its own referrals under Article 13(b) of the Rome Statute, as is the case with the Sudan and Libya, although the actions of the Council after making the referrals indicate that it is not interested in enforcing the compliance of states in surrendering indicted individuals to the ICC. Similarly, the SCSL, ECCC, and STL were created by individual states primarily, and although they work with the United Nations to various degrees, they do not have the backing authority of the Security Council, and are thus left without the means to enforce compliance.

These and other international mechanisms may face situations where the person they are seeking to prosecute may have been previously convicted or acquitted by a given state for the same or substantially the same facts. The reverse also applies, where a national criminal jurisdiction seeks to prosecute a person for a crime based on the same or substantially the same facts for which the person was previously acquitted or convicted before an international or mixed-model judicial body. In these cases, the question arises as to how the concept of ne bis in idem will apply.

First, it is important to note that there is no international treaty compelling one state to recognize another state's penal judgments or to give recognition to another state's judgment of acquittal or conviction. In other words, there is no interstate ne bis in idem. The ICCPR, the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), and the IACHR recognize ne bis in idem, but its applicability is within a given state and not between states. This is based on the concept that each state is a separate sovereignty. Thus, even though the same facts may be the basis for multiple prosecutions in the two separate states, the fact that they are separate sovereignties does not, so far, permit overriding of the exercise of their respective national criminal jurisdiction. The same principle presumably applies to relations between a state and a given international judicial body unless that body's statute provides otherwise. In that case its statute would be binding upon it, but only binding upon other states if the international judicial body was established by the Security Council, which would bind the statute upon all states that are members of the United Nations. If the statute is part of a treaty, like that of the ICC, it would be binding only on the member states. In these cases, as mentioned above, it is the statutes and jurisprudence of these international judicial bodies that control. However, each state will also be able to rely on its own national legislation and jurisprudence unless the statute and jurisprudence of the international judicial body are binding upon a given state. As can be seen from the above, the situation is far from clear and the relationship between the international judicial bodies and national legal system is not uniform.

458 United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3d Cir. 1991).

459 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law: Second Revised Edition 721–784 (2d ed. 2013). See also Post Conflict Justice (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2002).

In prosecutions before international criminal tribunals and mixed-model tribunals, it seems that the applicable standard is the same fact-based one found in Blockburger v. United States.[460] This would apply with respect to the prosecution by these bodies following national prosecutions. Within the international and mixed-model, the same standard seems to apply whenever the person is charged with multiple crimes arising out of the same conduct. The jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, which is likely to serve as a valid precedent for the ICC and other similar bodies that may be established in the future, is likely to be the following: if the same set of facts evidence the commission of separate crimes requiring different elements, ne bis in idem would not apply and, therefore, it would be possible to prosecute a person either in the same or subsequent trials for different crimes arising from the same set of facts provided that any crimes require proof of a separate or different fact or a separate or different intent.

The ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in the Čelebići case is the leading case addressing the issue of cumulative charges and convictions in the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR.[461] Before Čelebići, both the ICTY and the ICTR Trial Chambers had dealt with the issue of cumulative charging and convictions (based on the same set of facts) at various stages of their proceedings.[462] In the Čelebići case, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY found three of the accused 460 See Attila Bogdan, Cumulative Charges, Convictions and Sentencing at the At Hoc International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, 3 Melbourne J. Int'l L. 1 (2002) (hereinafter "Bogdan, Cumulative Charges"). See also Hong Wills, Comment: Cumulative Convictions and the Double Jeopardy Rule: Pursuing Justice at the ICTY and the ICTR, 17 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 341 (2003); Nisha Valabhji, Cumulative Convictions Based on the Same Acts under the Statute of the I.C.T.Y., 10 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 185 (2002). On the application of ne bis in idem in the context of the ICC, see Immi Tallgren, Article 20: Ne Bis In Idem,in Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Observers' Notes, Article by Article 419–435 (Otto Triffterer ed., 1999); Machtel Boot, Genocide, Crimes against Humanity, War Crimes: Nullum Crimen Legel and the Subject Matter Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (2002).

---

461 Prosecutor v Mucić et al.(Appeals Chamber Judgment) ("Čelebići"), Case No IT–96–21–A (Feb. 20, 2001). In Čelebići the indictment charged the accused, Mucić, Delić, Landžo and Delalić, with a total of forty-nine counts under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute of the ICTY. Although separate tribunals, the ICTR and ICTY share a common Appeals Chamber.

462 See Prosecutor v Kupreškić (Decision on Defence Challenges to Form of the Indictment), Case No IT–95–16–PT (May 15, 1998): "the Prosecutor may be justified in bringing cumulative charges when the Articles of the statute referred to are designated to protect different values and when each Article requires proof of a legal element not required by the others." In Prosecutor v Krnojelac (Decision on the Defense Preliminary Motion on the Form of the Indictment), Case No IT–97–25–PT (Feb. 24, 1999), at paras.5–10, the Trial Chamber noted that:

> [T]he prosecution must be allowed to frame charges within the one indictment on the basis that the tribunal of fact may not accept a particular element of one charge which does not have to be established for the other charges, and in any event, in order to reflect the totality of the accused's conduct so that the punishment imposed will do the same. Id. at 10.

guilty of both grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and violations of laws or customs of war based on the same facts.[463] The defense appealed these convictions, arguing in part the convictions imposed by the ICTY Trial Chamber violated the U.S. Supreme Court's Blockburger standard, as well as prior Trial Chamber decisions that have addressed the issue.[464] In considering the matter, the Appeals Chamber considered the Blockburger standard, several other national approaches, as well as the jurisprudence of the U.S. Military Tribunal established pursuant to Allied Control Council Law No. 10 in the aftermath of WWII.[465] With respect to the issue of charging, the Appeals Chamber held that:

> Cumulative charging is to be allowed in light of the fact that, prior to the presentation of all of the evidence, it is not possible to determine to a certainty which of the charges brought against an accused will be proven. The Trial Chamber is better poised, after the parties' presentation of the evidence, to evaluate which of the charges may be retained, based upon the sufficiency of the evidence. In addition, cumulative charging constitutes the usual practice of both this Tribunal and the ICTR.[466]

It concluded that the same conduct can offend more than one of Arts 2, 3, and 5, as they are each "designed to protect different values, and…each requires proof of a particular element which is not required by the others." Id. at 8. In Prosecutor v Naletilić and Martinović (Decision on Vinko Martinović's Objection to the Amended Indictment and Mladen Naletilić's Preliminary Motion to the Amended Indictment), Case No IT–98–34–PT (Feb. 14, 2001), the issue of cumulative charging was raised in the context of a preliminary objection insofar as it related to a new charge. The Trial Chamber noted that "the fundamental harm to be guarded against by the prohibition on cumulative charges is to ensure that an accused is not punished more than once in respect to the same criminal act." However, it warned that a strict prohibition on cumulative charging could interfere with the work of the prosecutor. The Trial Chamber asserted that:

> As the Tribunal's case law develops, and the elements of each offence are clarified, it will become easier to identify overlap in particular charges prior to the trial, but at present, and certainly in this case, it is enough that permitting cumulative charging results in no substantial prejudice to the accused.

See also Prosecutor v Kvočka (Decision on Defense Motions for Acquittal), Case No IT–98–30/1–T (Dec. 15, 2000), where the Trial Chamber found that:

> Issues of cumulative charging are best decided at the end of the case. So long as the proof adduced by the Prosecution could satisfy a reasonable court beyond reasonable doubt that the elements of one of the allegedly cumulative charges had been satisfied, the case continues.

For the jurisprudence of the ICTR, see Prosecutor v Akayesu (Trial Chamber Judgment), Case No ICTR–96–4–T (Sept. 2, 1998) ("Akayesu") and Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana, Case No ICTR–95–1–T (May 21, 1999) ("Kayishema"). For the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR on the issue of cumulative charging and convictions see Bogdan, Cumulative Charges, supra note 460, at 9–30.

463 See Čelebići Trial Judgment, Case No IT–96–21–T (Nov. 16, 1998).

464 The defense also relied on the ICTY Trial Chamber Judgment in the Kupreškić case, which heavily relied in the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Blockburger in addressing the issue of cumulative charging and convictions. For example, in relation to the Blockburger test, the Trial Chamber in Kupreškić noted that:

> The test then lies in determining whether each offence contains an element not required by the other. If so, where the criminal act in question fulfils the extra requirements of each offence, the same act will constitute an offence under each provision.

See Prosecutor v Kupreškić (Trial Chamber Judgment), Case No IT–95–16–T (Jan. 14, 2000) ("Kupreškić"). See also Bogdan, Cumulative Charges, supra note 460, at 9–15.

465 The Appeals Chamber examined the German and Zambian law on the issue, as well as the U.S. Military Tribunal decision Trial of Josef Alstötter. U.S. Military Tribunal, Nuremburg (Dec. 3–4, 1947), extracted in UN War Crimes Commission, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (1948) vol 6, 1. See Čelebići, Case No IT–96–21–A, at ¶¶ 401–410.

466 Čelebići, Case No IT–96–21–A, at ¶ 400.

With respect to the issue of cumulative convictions based on the same set of facts, the Appeals Chamber concluded that:

> [M]ultiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.[467]

In cases where this test is not satisfied, the Appeals Chamber stated that:

> [T]he Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.[468]

The holding in Čelebići on the issue of cumulative charges and convictions based on the same set of facts was later followed in the jurisprudence of both the ICTY and ICTR.[469]

In Prosecutor v. Tadić at the ICTY, the issue of ne bis in idem was also raised.[470] The German Federal Supreme Court had issued an indictment against Tadić for charges of aiding and abetting genocide during the conflict in the former Yugoslavia.[471] Shortly thereafter, the ICTY Prosecutor requested from Germany the deferral of the case to the international tribunal.[472] This request was complied with and Tadić was transferred to the ICTY. In his Motion on the Principle of Non-Bis-In-Idem, the accused argued that because his trial in Germany has already begun, the proceedings before the ICTY constituted a separate prosecution prohibited by the principle of ne bis in idem.[473] After reviewing Article 14(7) of the ICCPR, the European Convention on the Transfer of Proceedings in Criminal Matters, and the Draft Statute of the ICC, the Trial Chamber held that:

> [T]here can be no violation of non bis in idem, under any known formulation of that principle, unless the accused has already been tried. Since the accused has not yet been the subject of a judgment on the merits on any of the charges for which he has been indicted, he has not yet been tried for those charges. As a result, the principle non bis in idem does not bar this trial before this Tribunal.[474]

Another issue arises whenever a prosecution before an international criminal tribunal or national/international tribunal is concluded by an acquittal or conviction of a crime arising out of a given

---

467 Id. at ¶ 412.

468 Id. at ¶ 413.

469 See, e.g., Prosecutor v Jelisić (Trial Chamber Judgment), Case No IT–95–10–T (Dec. 14, 1999); Prosecutor v. Krstic, Case No IT–98–33 (Aug. 2, 2001). See also Bogdan, Cumulative Charges, supra note 460.

470 Prosecutor v. Tadić, Decision on the Defense Motion on the Principle of Non-Bis-In-Idem (Case No. T-94-1-T) (Nov. 14, 1995) ("Tadić, Decision").

471 Tadić, Decision, supra note 470, at 4.

472 Id.

473 Id. at 2. The defense also argued that "the transfer of the Accused to the International Tribunal was contrary to the European Treaty on the Transfer of Proceedings in Criminal Matters of 1972, that because the International Tribunal may intervene in legal proceedings before national courts, pursuant to Article 9 of the Statute only in a situation covered by Article 10(2) of the Statute; and that the exercise of jurisdiction by the International Tribunal in this case, pursuant to the procedure provided for in Rule 9(iii) of its Rules, is contrary to the Statute." Id.

474 Id. at 9. Addressing the defense argument that Germany could still prosecute Tadić after the proceedings before the ICTY were concluded, the Trial Chamber rejected the defense argument, noting that "having deferred the case of the accused to the International Tribunal, Germany could not proceed to retry him for the same acts after the disposition of his case here." Id. at 6.

set of facts for which the same person is sought to be prosecuted before a national tribunal, either for the same or another crime arising from the same set of facts. In this case, national law would control the application of ne bis in idem. In all cases involving prosecution before a national criminal tribunal, international criminal tribunal, or mixed-model tribunal, international human rights norms on ne bis in idem are applicable. For example, the ICCPR,[475] ECHR,[476] and the IACHR[477] contain provisions on ne bis in idem. However, these norms only apply with respect to ne bis in idem within the same system, and not with respect to other legal systems, in view of the fact they constitute separate sovereignties. The only exception is the ICC, which is considered complementary to national criminal jurisdictions, and thus presumably, these international norms would apply with respect to ne bis in idem.

4.3.2. The United States and International Tribunals as to Ne Bis In Idem

The ICTY and ICTR, to which the United States is obligated to surrender felons charged with a crime (see Chapter I, Section 7 and Chapter II, Section 4), contain provisions prohibiting ne bis in idem, respectively in Articles 10 and 11. The ICC also contains a similar provision in Article 20, but the United States is not a party to it.

Consequently, the United States and the ICTY and ICTR must reciprocally recognize the principle in accordance with their respective jurisprudence, but not in accordance with the ICTY and ICTR statutes. The statutes of the ICTY and ICTR, having been promulgated by the Security Council pursuant to the law of the U.N. Charter, are binding on the United States, which is a party to the charter. The jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR have interpreted ne bis in idem in a manner consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court decisions in Blockburger and Ashe.[478]

4.4. Statute of Limitations

There are two approaches to the legal effects of a statute of limitation. The first is that it is merely a bar to prosecution (procedural) and the second is that it extinguishes the offense for purposes of its legal effects (substantive). The legal effects of a statute of limitation and amnesty[479] may be treated alike regardless of whether they extinguish the criminality of the actor or constitute a bar

---

475 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976, at Art. 14(7).

476 Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 213 U.N.T.S. 222, entered into force Sept. 3, 1953, as amended by Protocols No. 3, 5, 8, and 11, which entered into force on September 21, 1970, December 20, 1971, January 1, 1990, and November 1, 1998 respectively.

477 American Convention on Human Rights, O.A.S.Treaty Series No. 36, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, entered into force July 18, 1978, reprinted in Basic Documents Pertaining to Human Rights in the Inter-American System, OEA/Ser.L.V/II.82 doc.6 rev.1 at 25 (1992).

478 Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970). In Ashe, the Court held that > "Collateral estoppel" is an awkward phrase, but it stands for an extremely important principle in our adversary system of justice. It means simply that, when an issue of ultimate fact has once been determined by a valid and final judgment, that issue cannot again be litigated between the same parties in any future lawsuit. Although first developed in civil litigation, collateral estoppel has been an established rule of federal criminal law at least since this Court's decision more than 50 years ago in United States v. Oppenheimer, 242 U. S. 85. As Mr. Justice Holmes put the matter in that case,

>
> It cannot be that the safeguards of the person, so often and so rightly mentioned with solemn reverence, are less than those that protect from a liability in debt.

Id. at 443.

479 See infra Sec. 4.7.

to prosecution. It must be noted, however, that in the United States a statute of limitation bars prosecution, as those statutes of limitations are provided for in the relevant treaty, but does not extinguish the criminality of the actor, whereas amnesty may be construed as doing so.[480]

The question of whether the offense exists and is prosecutable goes to the requirement of whether an extraditable offense exists, and if so, whether double criminality is satisfied. The answer to this question largely depends on the legal bases of the practice. If it is a treaty practice, then the treaty is controlling, and in the absence of any reference to statute of limitation therein, the defense may not be accepted. This is the prevailing view in the United States.

Whiteman described the defense of lapse of time or statute of limitation as follows:

> One of the most common exemptions from extradition relates to offenses for which prosecution or punishment is barred by lapse of time, usually referred to as barring by "lapse of time," prescription, or statute of limitation. A provision prohibiting extradition in such cases appears in most treaties and laws dealing with the subject of extradition. In treaties, the provision sometimes appears in the form of a prohibition of extradition where punishment or enforcement of penalty is barred by the law of the requesting state or is or would be barred by the law of the requesting or the requested state.[481]

The manner in which the treaty or national law provision is applied varies from country to country.[482] The requested state may consider the case as if the offense had been committed in the requested state and apply its own statute of limitation to determine whether prosecution would be barred. If so, extradition will be refused.[483]

Prior to the 1982 Extradition Act, there were two conflicting views in the United States on the question of whether the requested state's statute of limitation applies in the absence of a treaty.

---

480 See generally, Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 15–16 and accompanying footnotes, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

481 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 19, at 859.

482 See In re Plevani, 22 I.L.R. 514 (Cass. 1955) (Fr.); In re Romaguera de Mouza, 19 I.L.R. 378 (Cass. 1952) (Venez.); In re Weill, 10 Ann. Dig. at 334 (CSJN 1939) (Arg.); In re Addis, 6 Ann. Dig. 306 (Ct. App. Brussels 1931) (Belg.); Bedi, supra note 19, at 168–171. With regard to an unreasonable delay in extradition, in The Republic of Argentina v. Hector Mellino, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 536, the Supreme Court of Canada faced an application by the fugitive to stay the extradition on two grounds. First, Mellino argued that extradition violated his right under section 11(b) of the Charter to a trial within a reasonable time. Id. at 537. Second, he contended that the extradition proceedings constituted an abuse of process. Id. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the appeal should be allowed in favor of Argentina, and that the matter should be remitted to the extradition judge to continue the proceedings. Id. at 537–539. The Court ruled that section 11(b) of the Charter did not apply to extradition hearings. Id. at 538. It applies only to charges made in Canada for prosecutions in Canada. Id. With regard to the claim that the delay resulted in an abuse of process and that the proceedings should be stayed, the court found that the extradition hearing is more closely related to a preliminary hearing than a criminal trial in the Canadian criminal law system. Id. at 538–539. According to Canadian jurisprudence, the power to stay proceedings has occurred only in clear cases, and most important, only in actual criminal trials. Id. at 539. Again, such a matter should be raised at trial in the foreign country. The extradition judge's role is not to find guilt or innocence, or comment on any defenses. Id. at 538–539. See Williams, supra note 373, at 268–269, 271.

483 See also Public Prosecutor v. Muller, 43 I.L.R. 243 (Ct. App. Brussels 1965) (Belg.) (holding that under Belgian law the prosecution of the relator in Switzerland, the requesting country, was time-barred, even though the formal steps taken by Swiss authorities had the effect of suspending the period of limitation in Switzerland).

The position holding that the defense is unavailable without an express treaty provision is well summarized in Freedman v. United States, in which the disctrict court stated:[484]

> As a general proposition it is well established that in the absence of a treaty provision, a statute of limitations may not be raised as a defense to the extradition proceedings. E.g., Merino v. United States Marshal, 326 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 997, 84 S. Ct. 1922, 12 L.Ed.2d 1046; Hatfield v. Guay, 87 F.2d 358, 364 (1st Cir. 1937). See First National Bank of New York v. Aristeguieta, 287 F.2d 219, 227 (2d Cir. 1960) (citing the general proposition without, however, applying the rule). Petitioner has not raised the five-year statute of limitations provided by 18 U.S.C. § 3282, in the traditional sense that such term was used in the foregoing decisions announcing the general rule. On the contrary, petitioner contends that "the statute of limitations is applicable as an element of the crime which must be considered in determining probable cause under the terms of the treaty," even in the absence of any specific treaty provision compelling reference to the statute of limitations of either the asylum or the demanding state.
>
> While the argument sub judice has been raised on several prior occasions, e.g., Vaccaro v. Collier, 38 F.2d 862 (D.Md 1930) modified on other grounds, 51 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1931); Asselin v. Jenkins (Commissioner's Docket 1, Case No. G-12) (N.D. Cal. 1966) [Dept. of State File PS 10-4 CAN-US]; In the Matter of the Extradition of Daniel William O'Connor, No. 4825 (W.D. Wash. 1959), it has only been authoritatively ruled upon in one decision. Asselin v. Jenkins, supra. Moreover, one of the leading authorities on Canadian extradition law has observed that:
>
> > Whether in the absence of express provisions [in a treaty] extradition will be granted where exemption has been obtained by the lapse of time according to the laws of the requested country has not been decided. G. La Forest, Extradition To and From Canada 4 (1967).
>
> The cases cited for the general proposition that absent a specific treaty provision, the statute of limitations may only be raised as a defense to criminal proceedings after return to the demanding country have all arisen in connection with challenges to extradition based upon the statute of limitations of the demanding state. E.g., Merino v. United States Marshal, supra; Hatfield v. Guay, supra. Thus even where there is an express treaty provision, the person whose extradition is sought presumably has an ample opportunity to raise the limitation as a defense to the criminal proceedings. On the other hand, the question of whether the prosecution is time-barred according to the laws of the asylum state, is a consideration unique to the committing magistrate and is not subject to review upon return to the demanding state. Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 485 (2d Cir. 1976).[485]

Another position was taken in Jhirad v. Ferrandina,[486] where the Second Circuit held that the federal statute of limitation in 18 U.S.C. § 3282[487] applies instead of the state statute pertaining to the crime charged, as would have been the case in strict application of the principle of 484 Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977). See Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817 (1984). See also Murphy v. United States, 199 F.3d 599 (2d. Cir. 1999); cf. In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999).

---

485 Freedman, 437 F. Supp. 1252 at 1263–1264. See also United States ex rel. Caputo v. Kelly, 96 F.2d 787 (2d Cir. 1938).

486 Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976). See also In re Kraiselburd, 786 F.2d 1395 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 990 (1986); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 563 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), modified, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir.), dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973).

487 This statute reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense, not capital, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within five years next after such offense shall have been committed.

"double criminality."[488] It must be noted that in Jhirad,[489] though the court found the relator extraditable (because his flight from India tolled the statute of limitations), the secretary of state, in reliance on "executive discretion,"[490] refused to issue the certificate of surrender on the grounds that the fifteen-year time lapse since the commission of the alleged crime would render an adequate defense by the relator very difficult, and that this was precisely the type of a situation to which periods of limitation were intended to apply.[491]

The European Convention on Extradition states in article 10:

> Extradition shall not be granted when the person claimed has, according to the law of either the requesting or requested state, become immune by reason of lapse of time from prosecution or punishment.[492] In case of doubt over the applicability of the statute of limitation, extradition should be granted, since the matter is better resolved by the courts of the requesting state.[493]

United States courts, in determining the applicable statute of limitations, must first look to the treaty language to determine whether the statute of limitations of the requested or requesting state, or both, applies.[494] Once this determination is made, the U.S. court must then determine the appropriate source of law to apply, that is,. state or federal law if the extradition involves a country where a federal system is in place. Where the statute of limitations of both requesting 488 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2. But see Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1971); Vaccaro v. Collier, 38 F.2d 862 (D. Md. 1930), modified, 51 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1931); cf. United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991); cert. denied, 506 U.S. 835 (1992); Tang Yee-Chun v. Immundi, 686 F. Supp. 1004 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000).

---

489 Jhirad, 536 F.2d 478.

490 See Ch. XI.

491 Extradition: Procedure: Standards for Evidence, 1976 Digest § 5, at 115–116.

492 See the position of Arab Convention on Extradition of 1953, article 6, quoted in Bedi, supra note 19, at 168.

493 See Lazzeri v. Schweizerische Bundesanwaltschaft, 34 I.L.R. 134 (Federal Tribunal 1961) (Switz.), where:

> [T]he appellant was sentenced in absentia, on May 13, 1956, to six months imprisonment for fraudulent bankruptcy and fraud. His extradition was requested by the Italian authorities. He was arrested on August 6, 1960, on arrival in Switzerland from Germany. He contested his extradition on a number of grounds. First, it was contended on his behalf that the proceedings which had led to his conviction were vitiated by procedural faults and could accordingly not be recognized. Secondly, it was argued that further proceedings must be assumed to be time-barred, since the date of the original offense was not known. Thirdly, it was claimed that on extradition, the appellant would run the risk of being prosecuted for a new offense, namely, bigamy.

Id. at 134–135. The court held that extradition should be granted; it examined the statutes of limitation applicable to the offenses charged in the two countries concerned and found that they did not prevent extradition. For one offense there was a doubt under Italian law, but extradition had to be granted so that the doubt, relating to the application of Italian law, could be resolved by the Italian courts. Id. at 137.

494 There are a variety of treaty provisions on this point. For treaties specifying that the law of the requested state is the applicable law, see Argentine Extradition Treaty, art. 7, entered into force June 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866; French Extradition Treaty, art. 9(1), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-13. For treaties specifying that the law of the requesting state is the applicable law, see Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 7, entered into force Jan. 1, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Indian Extradition Treaty, art. 7, entered into force July 21, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-30, TIAS 12873; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 6, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 6, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. VII, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023. For treaties specifying the extradition is precluded by the running of either state's statute of limitations, see Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 5, ¶ 2, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T.

and requested states applies, the federal/state statute of limitations inquiry would theoretically apply in all instances as the U.S. federal system would be implicated in all such instances.

The Ninth Circuit is the leading federal circuit court of appeals on this issue. The Ninth Circuit has ruled that extraditions for murder are not barred by the statute of limitations as there is no statute of limitations in the United States regarding murder, and the court must focus on the statutes charged as opposed to the relator's conduct.[495] Two Ninth Circuit cases considered the proper determination of statutes of limitations regarding capital and noncapital crimes where Mexico was the requesting state and the United States was the requested state. In Sainez v. Venables, the relator challenged the denial of his habeas corpus petition, in part, on an improper calculation of the relevant statute of limitations regarding his homicide charge.[496] The court cited the relevant language of the United States–Mexico extradition treaty, which provides that:

> Extradition shall not be granted when the prosecution or the enforcement of the penalty for the offense for which extradition has been sought has become barred by lapse of time according to the laws of the requesting or requested Party.[497]

The court then conducted a detailed analysis of the relevant Mexican criminal code and the effect of the issuance of a Mexican arrest warrant in tolling the statute of limitation, concluding that:

> Crotte was charged with homicide. This charge falls under Article 213 of the State of Jalisco Criminal Code. The magistrate judge found that the most analogous United States offenses to the Mexican homicide charge were murder, as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 1111, and manslaughter, as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 1112. The magistrate judge then determined that the applicable statute of limitations for Crotte's crime was five years, as articulated in 18 U.S.C. § 3282. Crotte does not argue that § 3282 is inapplicable, but contends that the statute of limitations expired because he was arrested in December, 2006, more than five years after Sandoval died on June 26, 1999. He argues that the Mexican arrest warrant should not toll the statute of limitations in Mexico because it does not constitute an indictment or information under the laws of the United States.
>
> The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law provides:
>
> > For purposes of applying statutes of limitation to requests for extradition . . . the period is generally calculated from the time of the alleged commission of the offense to the time of the warrant, arrest, indictment, or similar step in the requesting state, or of the filing of the request for extradition, whichever occurs first
>
> . . .

3197. For treaties specifying that the passage of time is no bar to extradition, see Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 6, entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23 ("The decision by the Requested State whether to grant the request for extradition shall be made without regard to any state of limitations in either State."); Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 6, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3 ("The decision whether to grant the request for extradition shall be made without regard to provisions of the law of either Contracting State concerning lapse of time"); Extradition Treaty with Belize, art. 8, entered into force Mar. 27, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-38; Extradition Treaty with Cyprus, art. 7, entered into force Sept. 14, 1999, S. TREATY DOC.105-16. See also Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 15–16, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

495 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 816, 818 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Extradition of Kraiselburd, 786 F.2d 1395, 1398 (9th Cir. 1986); Clarey v. Gregg, 138 F.3d 764, 766–767 (9th Cir. 1998).

496 Sainez v. Venables, 588 F.3d 713, 714–715 (9th Cir. 2009). See also In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9573 (S.D. Cal. 2008) (Magistrate Judge Opinion); In re Extradition of Ortiz, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87426, at*20–*21 (S.D. Cal. 2011) (applying Sainez v. Venables).

497 Sainez v. Venables, 588 F.3d 713, 716 (Article 7 of the extradition treaty).

> Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law § 476, cmt. e (1987).
>
> Consistent with the Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, in Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 480 (2d Cir. 1976), the Second Circuit recognized an Indian document as the "functional equivalent of [a United States] indictment." We agree that for the purpose of a civil proceeding such as an extradition, a Mexican arrest warrant is the equivalent of a United States indictment and may toll the United States statute of limitations.
>
> Crotte's argument that the Mexican arrest warrant did not toll the statute of limitations because it is in no way analogous to a United States indictment lacks merit. We do not reach this conclusion by attempting to analogize a Mexican arrest warrant to an American indictment. Rather, we reach this conclusion by adhering to our established approach of giving credence to foreign proceedings. Indeed, we have declined to rule on the procedural requirements of foreign law out of respect for other nations' sovereignty "and because we recognize the chance of erroneous interpretation is much greater when we try to construe the law of a country whose legal system is not based on common law principles." Emami v. United States Dist. Court, 834 F.2d 1444, 1449 (9th Cir. 1987) (citation omitted). See also Theron v. United States Marshal, 832 F.2d 492, 496, 499–500 (9th Cir. 1987), abrogated on other grounds by United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482 (1997) ("[I]t would be inappropriate to engage in such an inquiry into the formal procedure a country uses in instituting prosecution.") (citation omitted).
>
> Giving credence to the arrest warrant issued by Mexican authorities, the five-month period between the date the homicide occurred and the issuing date of the Mexican arrest warrant was well within the five-year limitations period of section 3282, rendering the extradition on the homicide charge timely. In short, Crotte's extradition was not barred by the applicable statute of limitations. [internal citations omitted][498]

The relator argued that his prosecution was barred by the U.S. statute of limitation.[499] The Sainez court applied the rule set forth in Clarey v. Gregg, writing that: "in determining what United States statute of limitations is applicable, this Court looks to the substantive offense under United States law which is most closely analogous to the charged offenses, and applies the statute of limitations applicable to that offense."[500]

The Ninth Circuit considered the calculations of the statute of limitations in a noncapital crime context in Gullers v. Bejarano.[501] The same extradition treaty and statute of limitations provision as in Sainez applied in this case. It is odd to note that although Article 7 of the United States–Mexico extradition treaty is written in the disjunctive regarding the laws of the requested and requesting state, the court stated, "for Causbie to be extraditable, the prosecution against her must fall within the statute of limitations according to the laws of both the 'requesting party,' i.e., Mexico, and the 'requested party,' i.e. the United States."[502] In this case, the relator argued that her extradition was barred by both U.S. and Mexican statutes of limitation.[503] The court found that the Mexican arrest warrant was sufficient to constitute a proper charge within the five-year U.S. statute of limitations, although the Mexican arrest warrant was not the same type of instrument that would be used in the United States.[504] The relator's argument that the action was barred by the Mexican statute of limitations was that the victim had

---

498 Id. at 716–717.

499 Id.

500 Id.

501 293 Fed. Appx. 488 (9th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion) (criminal fraud extradition from United States to Mexico). For a discussion of the calculation of the statute of limitations in a noncapital case under the United States–Poland extradition treaty, which focuses on the requesting state's statute of limitations, see In re Extradition of Tuniewicz, 2007 U.S. Dist 25789 (E.D.N.Y. 2007).

502 Id. at 489.

503 Id. at 489–490.

504 Id. at 489.

not filed a complaint within six months as required for a fraud action.[505] The Mexican Jalisco Code states, in part:

> [T]he right of the victim to file a complaint for a crime, whether the crime be continuous or not, that can only be prosecuted by the complaint of a party, will terminate in six months, as of the day on which the victim has knowledge of the crime and the felon . . . (Emphasis added) [footnote omitted][506]

However, the court noted that under Mexican law, criminal action would be barred by the statute of limitations "in a term equal to the arithmetic average of the term of the incarceration penalty that corresponds to the crime, plus one fourth of such term."[507] A Mexican court calculated that the statute of limitations period for fraud under this calculus was eight years and nine months.[508] The issue then arose as to whether the relevant statute of limitations was six months or eight years and nine months. As the district court had not considered whether the fraud action at issue could only be prosecuted by the complaint of a party, it remanded the matter to the district court for this determination.[509] These cases are illustrative of the U.S. practice of looking to U.S. federal law in determining the statute of limitation.[510]

Under the 1984 Draft Extradition Reform Act, § 3194(d)(2), a relator may claim the defense of statute of limitations if such a defense is permissible under either the applicable treaty or the limitations of the law of the requesting state. Previous to the Act, the position of the United States was that in the absence of a specific treaty provision, the defense of lapse of time was governed by 18 U.S.C. § 3282, which required commencement of prosecution within five years from the alleged commission of the crime for a noncapital offense. Under either approach, the problem remains one of determining when the period begins and what causes it to toll.

On tolling a statute of limitations, the Tenth Circuit held in 1999, in Ross v. U.S. Marshal for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, the following:[511]

> We review the district court's interpretation of the tolling statute de novo; United States v. Morgan, 922 F.2d 1495, 1496 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 501 U.S. 1207, 111 S.Ct. 2803, 115 L.Ed.2d. 976 (1991), and the court's determination Mr. Ross was fleeing from justice for clear error. United States v. Greever, 134 F.3d 777, 781 (6th Cir. 1998); United States v. Marshall, 856 F.2d 896, 900–01 (7th Cir. 1988).
>
> As a preliminary matter, we must first determine what constitutes "fleeing from justice" under the statute. The circuit courts are currently split on the issue. A small minority of circuits have held mere absence from the jurisdiction in which the crime was committed is enough to toll the statute. In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157, 1162 (8th Cir. 1982); McGowen v. United States, 105 F.2d 791, 792 (D.C.Cir. 1939). The district court, on the other hand, adopted the majority view, which requires the prosecution to prove the accused had an intent to avoid arrest or prosecution. See Greever, 134 F.3d at 780; United States v. Rivera-Ventura, 72 F.3d 277, 283 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Fonseca-Machado, 53 F.3d 1242, 1244 (11th Cir.), cert. Denied, 516 U.S. 925, 116 S.Ct. 326, 133 L.Ed.2d 227 (1995); United States v. Marshall, 856 F.2d 896, 900

505 Id. at 490.

506 Id.

507 Id.

508 Id.

509 Id. at 490–491.

510 See also Roberto Iraola, Statutes of Limitations and International Extradition, 2010 Mich. St. L. Rev. 103, 117–118 (2010).

511 Ross v. U.S. Marshall for the E. Dist. of Oklahoma, 168 F. 3d. 1190 (10th Cir. 1999).

(7th Cir. 1988); United States v. Gonsalves, 675 F.2d 1050, 1052 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 837, 103 S.Ct. 83, 74 L.Ed.2d 78 (1992); Donnell v. United States, 229 F.2d 560, 565 (5th Cir. 1956); Brouse v. United States, 68 F.2d 294, 295 (1st Cir. 1933). The Supreme Court has not squarely addressed the issue. However, in considering the predecessor to 18 U.S.C. § 3290, the Court in Streep v. United States, 160 U.S. 128, 16 S.Ct. 244, 40 L.Ed. 265 (1895) implicitly recognized intent as an element of fleeing from justice, id. at 133, 16 S.Ct. 244 ("In order to constitute a fleeing from justice . . . [I]t is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention of avoiding being prosecuted.") Consistent with Streep, we conclude "fleeing from justice" requires the government to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, the accused acted with the intent to avoid arrest or prosecution.

It has to be understood that statutes of limitations are essentially designed to ensure due process and fundamental fairness. This is evident in the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 3282, whereby most federal crimes are barred by a five year statute of limitations. However, there are many issues involving when the statute starts running and what tolls the statute.[512] The statute of limitations may also be tolled pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3290, which provides that the statute of limitations is tolled for fugitives from justice. The Ninth Circuit applied this provision in Choe v. Torres.[513] There is a split among the federal circuit courts of appeals regarding whether fugitive intent to avoid prosecution must be shown in addition to absence from the jurisdiction where the crime occurred in order to trigger the tolling provisions of Section 3290. The First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits require a showing of intent, while the Eight Circuit and District of Columbia Circuit have not required a similar showing.[514]

It must be mentioned, however, that when extradition is sought for an international crime, there should be no statute of limitations bar to extradition. Although this principle is not yet universally accepted with respect to all international crimes, as discussed below, it is the subject of an International Convention on the Nonapplicability of Statutes of Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity.[515]

---

512 In re Extradition of Harrison, 03 Crim. Misc. 01 Page 49 (HP), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9183 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) at *4–*8 (relying on United States v. Mercedes, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30007, 1997 WL 127785 (S.D.N.Y. 1997)).

513 Choe v. Torres, 525 F.3d 733 (9th Cir. 2008).

514 See generally, Roberto Iraola, Statutes of Limitations and International Extradition, 2010 Mich. St. L. Rev. 103, 115–117 (2010); Brouse v. United States, 68 F.2d 294, 295 (1st Cir. 1933); United States v. Florez, 447 F.3d 145, 151 (2d Cir. 2006); Ferebee v. United States, 295 F 850, 851 (4th Cir. 1924); Donnell v. United States, 229 F.2d 560,565 (5th Cir. 1956); United States v. Greever, 134 F.3d 777, 781 (6th Cir. 1998); United States v. Marshall, 856 F.2d 896, 900 (7th Cir. 1988); United States v. Wazney, 529 F.2d 1287, 1289 (9th Cir. 1976); United States v. Fonseca-Machado, 53 F.3d 1242, 1243–1244 (11th Cir. 1995); King v. United States, 144 F.2d 729, 731 (8th Cir. 1944); McGowen v. United States, 105 F.2d 791, 792 (D.C. Cir. 1939).

515 Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, G.A. Res. 2391, U.N. GAOR, 23rd Sess., Supp. No. 18, at 40, U.N. Doc. A/7218 (1968) (forty-five state-parties). See also Bassiouni, Conventions, supra note 208, at 285; 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal, nos. 3, 4 (1968); Christine Van den Wijngaert, War Crimes, Crimes against Humanity and Statutory Limitations, in 3 International Criminal Law 89 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni 3 ICL]. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application (2011).

4.5. Right to a Speedy Trial

The right of an accused to a speedy trial is guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution,[516] and as such applies to all criminal cases. Extradition is sui generis, but partakes of a criminal nature and, therefore, the right should apply. But there is no decision explicitly stating that the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial applies to extradition hearings.[517] Furthermore, there is no federal statute equivalent to the Speedy Trial Act applicable to extradition.[518] Presumably that right should apply whenever there is unreasonable and unnecessary or purposeful delays which prejudice the rights of the defense. In other words, it can become subsumed in the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

The importance of the right to a speedy trial was emphasized by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Salzmann,[519] which involved a U.S. citizen residing abroad in order to avoid the draft in the United States. The Salzmann court explained:

> The last decade has brought an increasing awareness of the vital importance to both society and the accused, of a speedy trial. The criminal defendant's interest in prompt disposition of his case is apparent and requires little comment. Unnecessary delay may make a fair trial impossible. If the accused is imprisoned awaiting trial, lengthy detention eats at the heart of a system founded on the presumption of innocence. Where a defendant is not detained prior to trial, the mere pendency of the indictment for a substantial period can create great hardship. It may "disrupt his employment, drain his financial resources, curtail his associations, subject him to public obloquy, and create anxiety in him, his family and friends." United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 320, 92 S. Ct. 455, 463, 30 L.Ed. 2d 468 (1971). Moreover, we cannot emphasize sufficiently that the public has a strong interest in prompt trials. As the vivid experience of a witness fades into the shadow of a distant memory, the reliability of a criminal proceeding may become seriously impaired. This is a substantial price to pay for a society that prides itself on affording fair trials. In addition, the accelerating crime rate and emergence of procedures to make the criminal process more evenhanded have placed heavy burdens on court dockets. It is essential, therefore, that the courts rise to the challenge by avoiding the sort of fatal delay "that undermines the law's deterrent effect by demonstrating that justice is not swift and certain but slow and faltering." President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society 154 (1967).[520]

The court in Salzmann was faced with delay of trial due to the "unavailability" of the accused at trial as a result of his residence in a foreign country. The court determined that the government did not exercise due diligence to obtain the presence of the defendant as a result of the failure

---

516 The Sixth Amendment guarantees that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial." U.S. Const. amend. VI.

517 Courts have affirmatively stated that "there is no Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial in extradition." See In re Extradition of Ortiz, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 87426, at *17 (S.D. Cal. 2011). See also In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9573, at *58 (S.D. Cal. 2008).

518 Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161–3174 (2000).

519 United States v. Salzmann, 548 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1976); cf. United States v. Blanco, 861 F.2d 773, 780 (2d Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1019 (1989). In Blanco, the court concluded that the government had fulfilled its duty to make a diligent good faith effort to bring the relator to trial. The court stated: "It is clear that the government has a constitutional duty to make a diligent, good faith effort to bring a defendant to trial promptly. See Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 383, 89 S. Ct. 575, 579, 21 L. Ed. 2d 607 (1969); United States v. Diacolios, 387 F.2d 79, 82 (2d Cir.1988)." Blanco, 861 F.2d at 778. The government, however, did not have to use extraordinary means to do so. The court distinguished Salzmann as relied upon by the relator with respect to a footnote of that decision, 548 F.2d 395, 403 n.2 (2d Cir. 1976), regarding the meaning of a fugitive. 861 F.2d at 780.

520 Salzmann, supra note 519, at 399–400.

to respond to his claims of indigence by notifying him that funds would be made available for his return to the United States. Therefore, in light of the improper delay of six months and the defendant's assertion of his right due to possible prejudice, the court held that he was entitled to dismissal of the indictment.[521] In another case involving an accused in a foreign country, United States v. Judge,[522] the defendant challenged an indictment for mail fraud for denial of his right to a speedy trial. The court determined that the U.S. government was aware of the defendant's address in Ecuador, but inexcusably made no effort to inform him of the indictment until over four years later when he was arrested upon arriving in the United States. Because the defendant was ignorant of the indictment, and had suffered prejudice resulting from the delay, the federal district court dismissed the charges.[523]

The right to a speedy trial was also recognized where an accused was incarcerated in a foreign prison and was absent for trial. In United States v. McConahy,[524] the court held that the government's constitutional obligation to provide a speedy trial on pending charges is not relieved unless the defendant fails to demand that an effort be made to return him and the prosecuting authorities made a diligent, good faith effort to have him returned and are unsuccessful, or can show that such an effort would be futile. In this case, the defendant attempted to secure permission to return for trial from British officials and requested assistance from the U.S. government, but his request was ignored. Therefore, the court held that the five-year delay irremediably prejudiced the defendant by loss of testimony pertaining to his failure to appear.[525] In United States v. Pomeroy,[526] where Pomeroy was incarcerated in Canada, deported to Montana, and extradited to North Dakota, the court said that:

> Although the court discussed the possible applicability of the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3161, it based its decision on sixth amendment speedy trial grounds. The court found that, as applied to the facts of the case, the four factors set out in Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 530, 920 S. Ct. 2182, 2191, 33 L. Ed. 2d 101 (1969), weighed in favor of dismissing the indictment against Pomeroy.
>
> Additionally, the court noted that various cases have placed an obligation on the Government to seek extradition of an accused incarcerated in a foreign state when a treaty exists under which the accused could be extradited. Because the treaty between Canada and the United States listed robbery as an extraditable offense, the court felt that the Government had an obligation to request Pomeroy's extradition despite the fact that Canadian officials had the option of deferring Pomeroy's surrender until he completed his sentence.
>
> The Government subsequently moved to reconsider based on the Supreme Court's intervening decision in United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 106 S. Ct. 648, 88 L.Ed. 2d 640 (1986), where the Court reversed an order dismissing an indictment on sixth amendment speedy trial grounds. On May 16, 1986, having found that Loud Hawk was "factually and logically distinguishable" from the present case, the court affirmed its earlier order. This appeal followed.[527]

---

521 Id. at 401. In Barker v. Wingo, the U.S. Supreme Court recognized four factors that are considered in determining whether the defendant has been deprived of his right of a speedy trial: (1) the length of the delay, (2) the reason for the delay, (3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and (4) the prejudice to the defendant. 407 U.S. 514, 530–533 (1972). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes: The Law of Public Order 476–479 (1969).

522 United States v. Judge, 425 F. Supp. 499 (D. Mass. 1976).

523 Id. at 503–504.

524 United States v. McConahy, 505 F.2d 770 (7th Cir. 1974); cf. United States v. Walton, 814 F.2d 376 (1987); United States v. Hooker, 607 F.2d 286 (9th Cir. 1979). See also United States v. McDonald, 172 F. Supp. 2d 941 (W.D. Mich. 2001) (granting defendant's motion to dismiss for delay).

525 Id.

526 United States v. Pomeroy, 822 F.2d 718, 720 (8th Cir. 1987).

527 Id.

The court then held that where a request by a government would not have been futile, the government has a:

> constitutional duty to make a diligent, good-faith effort to bring [the fugitive] before the [district] court for trial. United States v. McConahy, 505 F.2d 770, 773 (7th Cir. 1974) (citing Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 383, 89 S. Ct. 575, 579, 21 L. Ed. 2d 607 (1969)); accord United States v. Raffone, 405 F. Supp. 549, 550 (S.D.Fla.1975); see also United States v. Rowbotham, 430 F. Supp. 1254, 1257 (D. Mass.1977) (duty to obtain fugitive was one factor court looked at in dismissing indictment under Fed. R. Crim. P. 48(b)); compare United States v. Hooker, 607 F.2d 286, 289 (9th Cir.1979) (no duty to obtain fugitive where offense was not extraditable under existing treaty), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 905, 100 S. Ct. 1083, 63 L. Ed. 2d 321 (1980). Under the facts of this case, we see no reason to depart from this rule.[528]

It must be noted, however, that the defense of a right to a speedy trial will not be effective where the delay is caused by the defendant's own acts. It is a well-established principle that where the defendant's unlawful flight or failing to appear is the reason for the delay in his trial, he is held to have waived his right to a speedy trial.[529] In United States v. Steinberg,[530] the delay in bringing the defendant to trial was caused by his flight from Illinois and continuing unavailability until he arranged for his return. The defendant claimed that the government could have requested his return so he could have speedily answered the charges against him. The court noted, however, that the U.S. government could not effectively request the defendant's expulsion or extradition from Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) because the United States did not recognize the legal existence of that country in accordance with the principles of the U.N. Charter.[531] The court recognized that the U.N. Charter is a ratified U.S. treaty "which cannot run counter to the provisions of the Constitution," but held that State Department officials acted in good faith by making informal and indirect requests to Rhodesia to obtain the defendant's return. In their effort to obtain the defendant's return, "the government was not obligated to violate either the letter or spirit of the Charter of the United Nations."[532]

In a similar vein, in United States v. Ocampo,[533] the court considered whether a nine-year, seven-month period between the relator's indictment and arrest violated his right to a speedy trial.[534] The court found it significant that the government was unable to arrest the relator in Colombia, as the charges against him predated the effective date of the extradition treaty.[535] As such, the government lacked a legal basis to demand the relator's extradition. However, the

---

528 Id. at 722.

529 See Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30, 48 (1970) (Brennan, J., concurring); United States v. Cartano, 420 F.2d 362, 364 (1st Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 1054 (1970). But see United States v. Salzmann, 548 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1976) (Feinberg, J., concurring) (stating a court must exercise due diligence even where a fugitive is beyond the court's jurisdiction).

530 United States v. Steinberg, 478 F. Supp. 29 (N.D. Ill. 1979).

531 The court noted that there was no extradition treaty between the United States and Rhodesia, but that the United States was bound by Resolution 277 of March 18, 1970, in which the Security Council condemned as illegal the proclamation of republican status by Rhodesia. The court further noted that the Council decided "that Member States [of which the United States, of course, was one] shall refrain from recognizing this illegal regime [of Rhodesia] or from rendering any assistance to it," and that the Council had called "upon Member States to take appropriate measures, at the national level, to insure that any act performed by officials and institutions of illegal regime in Southern Rhodesia shall not be accorded any recognition, official or otherwise, including judicial notice by the competent organs of their State." Id. at 31.

532 Id. at 33.

533 266 Fed. Appx. 63 (2d Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion).

534 Id. at 64.

535 Id. at 65.

government's entry of the relator's criminal conviction and indictment in various databases showed due diligence.[536] Thus, the court held that there was no violation of the relator's right to a speedy trial.[537]

In United States v. Corona-Verbera,[538] the court considered whether the relator's speedy trial rights were violated by an eight-year delay between indictment and arrest.[539] Although the court found that an eight-year delay was presumptively prejudicial, triggering an inquiry into the other Barker factors—namely the length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's responsibility to assert his right to a speedy trial, and the prejudice to the defendant, although as the Supreme Court explained, "these factors have no talismanic qualities; courts must still engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process"[540]—the court concluded that the government exercised due diligence by entering the relator's name in various criminal databases where the government had established the futility of an extradition request in the 1990s.[541] As the relator asserted his speedy trial right only after requesting numerous continuances, the court found that this factor weighed in favor of neither the relator nor the government.[542] Regarding the final factor, prejudice to the defendant, the burden was on the relator to show specific prejudice, which he failed to do.[543] Thus, the court held that the relator's Sixth Amendment speedy trial right was not violated.[544]

It is clear that unnecessary delays could occur between the time a complaint for extradition is filed and the hearing,[545] or an arrest with or without a subsequent release on bail and the extradition hearing. Such delays could be based upon the failure of the government to prosecute, which could be based upon the requesting government's failure to produce documents necessary to demonstrate probable cause.[546] In these and other certain instances, there is a basis for a petition for a writ of habeas corpus or for a motion to dismiss the complaint for denial of speedy trial. The government may also move to dismiss the complaint sua sponte for unnecessary delay in pursuing the case due to the foreign government's lack of cooperation or due to failure to produce documents. This would be analogous to the dismissal of a case on appeal if the grounds are frivolous or the legal basis unjustified.[547]

In the Salzmann case,[548] discussed above, the district court reviewed the status of whether the right to a speedy trial under the Sixth Amendment was applicable to a case involving the failure of a "fugitive"[549] to return to the United States to face prosecution for draft evasion.[550] The Salzmann court looked to Smith v. Hooey[551] for guidance. In Smith, the Supreme Court stated that the federal

---

536 Id.

537 Id.

538 509 F.3d 1105 (9th Cir. 2007).

539 Id. at 1114.

540 Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 530–533 (1972).

541 United States v. Corona-Verbera, 509 F.3d 1105, 1114–1116 (9th Cir. 2007).

542 Id. at 1116.

543 Id.

544 Id.

545 See Ch. IX, Secs. 1 and 2.

546 See Ch. X.

547 See Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967), reh'g denied, 388 U.S. 924 (1967); cf. Com. v. Turner, 544 A.2d 927 (Pa. 1988).

548 United States v. Salzmann, 417 F. Supp. 1139 (D.C.N.Y. 1976).

549 See Ch. IX, Sec. 8.

550 See David A. Tate, Draft Evasion and the Problem of Extradition, 32 Alb. L. Rev. 337 (1968) (reviewing draft evasion cases in the context of extradition).

551 Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374 (1969).

government has "a constitutional duty to make a diligent, good faith effort" to obtain a "fugitive," even though it has no legal right to demand the return of the fugitive.[552] Because Smith involved rendition between the federal government and a state, both of which are subject to the provisions of the Sixth Amendment, it did not resolve the issue of whether the Sixth Amendment applies to international extradition.

The Salzmann court turned to a review of appellate decisions in other federal jurisdictions. It noted that in United States v. Estremera,[553] the Second Circuit held that the federal government was required to exercise due diligence in seeking or granting extradition. In addition, the Salzmann court noted that in United States v. McConahy,[554] the Seventh Circuit held that there was no reason not to apply the rule of Smith v. Hooey when the defendant was incarcerated by a foreign government rather than the United States or one of its states.[555] Ultimately, the Salzmann court determined that the federal government's failure to request extradition was a failure to act with due diligence.[556] It noted that it was the defendant's burden to show that the government acted without due diligence.[557]

This line of precedent demonstrates that the Supreme Court's decision in Smith v. Hooey can be applied by analogy to extradition cases, such that it imposes upon the federal government a duty under the Sixth Amendment to exercise due diligence in obtaining the surrender of a person in a foreign state for the purposes of facing prosecution or punishment in the United States.[558]

It should be noted again that there is no case specifically holding that there is a right to a speedy extradition within the meaning of the right to a speedy trial. However, if there is gross negligence amounting to a violation of due process, such a right may be invoked.[559]

---

552 Id. at 383.

553 United States v. Estremera, 531 F.2d 1103 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 979 (1976).

554 United States v. McConahy, 505 F.2d 770 (7th Cir. 1974).

555 Id. at 773.

556 Salzmann, 417 F. Supp. 1139, 1158 (E.D.N.Y. 1976).

557 Id. at 1161.

558 See also Barrett v. United States, 590 F.2d 624 (6th Cir. 1978), wherein the court, in reliance on 18 U.S.C. § 3188, found that a delay of a few days before the two-month period of limitations required for the issuance of the order of commitment from the date the extradition magistrate signed the certificate was not mandatory, and that the entire record was to be examined to determine whether there was prejudice in the nature of a violation of the right to a speedy trial. See also In re Extradition of Heilbronn, 773 F. Supp. 1576 (1991). But see Sabatier v. Dabrowski, 586 F.2d 866 (1st Cir. 1978) (holding the Sixth Amendment inapplicable because extradition proceedings cannot properly be characterized as "criminal prosecutions" within the meaning of the Sixth Amendment); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976). See generally Jiminez v. U.S. Dist. Ct. S. Dist. Florida, 84 S. Ct. 14 (1963) (Goldberg, J., in chambers). See also Hababou v. Albright, 82 F. Supp. 2d 347 (D. N.J. 2000).

559 In re Extradition of Harrison, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9183, at 22–23 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (relying on United States v. Mercedes, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30007):

> In addition, it is well established in this Circuit that there is no right to speedy extradition. "While delay in seeking extradition may be relevant to the Secretary of State's final determination as to whether a fugitive should be extradited, . . . 'delay may not . . . serve as a defense to judicial extradition proceedings.'" Murphy v. United States, 199 F.3d 599, 602 (2d Cir. 1999), citing Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225, 1227 (9th Cir. 1984). "Nothing in the Constitution or in the applicable federal statute indicates that a fugitive has a right to a 'speedy extradition' or that there exists a statute of limitations for extradition." Strachan v. Colon, 941 F.2d 128, 132 (2d Cir. 1991), accord In re Extradition of Ribaudo, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1456, No. 00 Crim. Misc. 1 Pg. (KNF), 2004 WL 213021 at *10 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 3, 2004).

Harrison, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9183, at 22–23.

The right to a speedy trial has not yet been interpreted by the various circuits to translate into a defense of laches, whereby a delay in seeking extradition can be grounds for denying it or into a constitutional right protected under the Sixth Amendment.[560]

4.5.1. Relationship between Statute of Limitations and Speedy Trial

There is occasional confusion between the statute of limitations and the constitutional right to a speedy trial.[561] Irrespective of the similarities between the concepts of statute of limitations and speedy trial, they are nonetheless different. A statute of limitations is embodied in a law that provides specificity as to the lapse of time between two events. These two events are usually the time between the commission of the crime or its discovery and the time at which prosecution is commenced or the trial completed. Laws in different countries vary as to the application of such statutory periods, as do provisions on this question in extradition treaties. The different periods of time can be between the discovery of a crime and indictment, between the indictment and the prosecution, between arrest or indictment and trial, or between the conviction and the execution of the sentence. Whatever these time frames may be, they are specified by law. The right to a speedy trial, however, whether under the U.S. Constitution[562] or international human rights law standards,[563] is not set in a normatively defined period of time. Instead, it is a mixed question of law and fact to determine the reasonableness of the period of time that lapsed between the commission of the crime or discovery of the crime, and the commencement of prosecution and its reasonably diligent continuation up to judgment.[564]

As a general rule, the right to a speedy trial under the Sixth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is not applicable to extradition cases unless a treaty provides for it. If, however, a treaty does provide for a speedy trial, the language of the treaty controls. In a decision from the Eleventh Circuit, Yapp v. Reno,[565] the majority opinion confused the questions of statute of limitations and speedy trial, and their application under the treaty, even though the case in point dealt with the 1931 Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, which was then applicable to the Bahamas.[566] The Yapp court stated:

> Deciding this case, however, also requires us to interpret the meaning of the lapse of time provision of the 1931 Extradition Treaty. Treaty interpretation presents a question of law, subject to de novo review. In re Extradition of Howard, 996 F.2d 1320, 1329 (1st Cir.1993); United States

560 In Re Ribaudo, No. 00 Crim. Misc. 1 Pg. KN, 2004 WL 213021, *5 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); In re Extradition of Ernst, N0. 97 Crim. Misc. 1, 1998 WL 395267, *22 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).; In re Extradition of Rabelbauer, 638 F. Supp. 1085, 1087 (S.D.N.Y. 1986); Lo Duca v. United States, No. 95 Civ. 713, 1995 WL 428636 (E.D.N.Y. 1995); Strachan v. Colon, 941 F.2d 128 (2d Cir. 1991); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.2d 410 (6th Cir. 1999); Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824 (11th Cir. 1993); McMaster v. United States, 9 F.3d 47 (8th Cir. 1993).

561 See In re Extradition of Salazar, 2010 U.S. Dist. Lexis 74370, at *13–*19 (S.D. Cal. July 23, 2010); United States v. Cruz Garfias, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80763 (N.D. Cal. 2009).

562 U.S. Const. amend. VI; Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647 (1992).

563 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice: Identifying International Procedural Protections and Equivalent Protections in National Constitutions, 3 Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L. 235 (1993). See generally Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 4.

564 Yapp v. Reno, 26 F.3d 1562, 1565 (11th Cir. 1994).

565 Id.

566 Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, 47 Stat. 2122 (entered into force June 24, 1935); Supplementary Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, T.I.A.S. 12050 (entered into force Dec. 23, 1986).

> v. Merit, 962 F.2d 917, 919 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, U.S. 113 S.Ct. 244, 121 L.Ed.2d 178 (1992). Determining whether a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated is a mixed question of law and fact; we review the law de novo and findings of fact for clear error. United States v. Premises Located at Route 13, 946 F.2d 749, 754 (11th Cir.1991); United States v. Wragge, 893 F.2d 1296, 1298 n.4 (11th Cir.1990).[567]

The dissenting opinion aptly noted this confusion. Clearly if a treaty provides for what is tantamount to a "speedy trial" right under the laws of the requested or the requesting state, it is that treaty provision that triggers the application of the constitutional or statutory right to a speedy trial even though the constitutional and statutory provisions of the subject would not otherwise accommodate that right.[568]

4.5.2. Non-applicability of Statutes of Limitations to Certain International Crimes

International crimes that are erga omnes are not subject to statutes of limitations. In addition to war crimes and crimes against humanity,[569] the crimes of genocide[570] and apartheid[571] are also not subject to statutes of limitations. Curiously, however, the 1984 Convention on Torture does not contain such a provision.[572] The United Nations Convention on the Non-applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity states that:

> Article I
>
> No statutory limitation shall apply to the following crimes, irrespective of the date of their commission:
>
> (a) War crimes as they are defined in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Nurenberg, of 8 August 1945 and confirmed by resolutions 3 (I) of 13 February 1946 and 95(I) of 11 December 1946 of the General Assembly of the United Nations, particularly the "grave breaches" enumerated in the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the protection of war victims;
>
> (b) Crimes against humanity whether committed in time of war or in time of peace as they are defined in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Nurenberg, of 8 August 1945 and confirmed by resolutions 3 (I) of 13 February 1946 and 95(I) of 11 December 1946 of the General Assembly of the United Nations, eviction by armed attack or occupation and inhuman acts resulting from the policy of apartheid, and the crime of genocide as defined in the 1948 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, even if such acts do not constitute a violation of the domestic law of the country in which they were committed.
>
> Article II
>
> If any of the crimes mentioned in Article I is committed, the provisions of this Convention shall apply to representatives of the State authority and private individuals who, as principals or accomplices, participate in or who directly incite others to the commission of any of those 567 Yapp, 26 F.3d at 1565.

568 Id. at 1568–1573.

569 Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, art. 1, Nov. 26, 1968, 754 U.N.T.S. 73 (entered into force Nov. 11, 1970).

570 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, Dec. 9, 1948, 78 U.N.T.S. 277 (entered into force Jan. 12, 1951).

571 International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, Nov. 30, 1973, 1015 U.N.T.S. 243, 13 I.L.M. 50 (1974).

572 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, U.N. G.A. Res. 39/46 Annex, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/708, Annex (1984), reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984).

> crimes, or who conspire to commit them, irrespective of the degree of completion, and to representatives of the State authority who tolerate their commission.[573]

There is also a similar European convention, the European Convention on the Non-applicability of Statutory Limitation to Crimes against Humanity and War Crimes.[574]

4.6. Immunity from Prosecution and Plea Bargain

Immunity from prosecution is a technique used primarily in the pursuit of criminal investigations; it has been widely employed in the United States since 1964.[575] It is a device whereby a person is granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for cooperation in a criminal investigation or trial. Immunity is the quid pro quo for waiver of the right to remain silent and is granted in exchange for testimonial cooperation. Whenever granted, immunity is a bar to prosecution. Similar to a statute of limitations, however, it does not extinguish the criminality of the actor, nor does it absolve him/her from responsibility for the criminal conduct; rather, it merely bars the state from prosecuting for such offenses as may have been disclosed under the grant of immunity. When immunity is granted as part of a plea bargain, the U.S. government, under United States v. Galanis,[576] is bound not to transmit the evidence obtained under immunity to a requesting state. Immunity does not bar extradition, however.

If the relator had negotiated a plea of guilty with respect to conduct that is the same or substantially the same as that giving rise to the criminal charge for which extradition is requested, the United States cannot grant extradition without vacating the plea and any judgment entered. Granting extradition in certain cases would violate the United States' treaty obligations, unless it could be argued that the guilty plea and resulting conviction can be the basis of a "double jeopardy" defense.[577] The court cannot, therefore, certify a relator as extraditable if he/she was granted specific immunity or entered a negotiated guilty plea without vacating the guilty plea or judgment.

This problem was addressed in Geisser v. United States,[578] in which the relator, a Swiss national who escaped from a Swiss prison, made a plea bargain that provided that the prosecution would use its "best efforts" to secure parole for the relator after she served three years of a seven-year sentence. In exchange for her testimony in a drug conspiracy trial, the plea deal was also designed to prevent her eventual extradition to France or Switzerland. The court held that the prosecution, in return for the relator's cooperation, at least had a duty to make a strong presentation to the State Department as to the nature of the promises and the dangers the relator

---

573 See supra note 515, arts. 1, 2.

574 Jan. 25, 1974 (entered into force on June 7, 2003 with three ratifications), Europ. T.S. No. 82 (1974), in 2 European Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters 1169 (Ekkehard Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 2d ed. 1991).

575 Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964); Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n N.Y. Harbor, 378 U.S. 52 (1964). The Supreme Court sanctioned the practice in Kastigar v. United States, 408 U.S. 931 (1972), and in Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971). See also United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 382 U.S. 70 (1965); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Recent Supreme Court Decisions Strengthen Illinois Law Enforcement, 2 Ill. Cont. Leg. Ed. 111 (1964); Jack Pirozzolo, The States Can Wait: The Immediate Appealability of Orders Denying Eleventh Amendment Immunity, 59 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1617 (1992); Sumner J. Koch, Note, In re Flanagan: Grand Jury Secrecy and Fear of Foreign Incrimination, 17 Cornell Int'l L. J. 357, 360 (1984).

576 United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215 (D. Conn. 1977).

577 See supra Sec. 4.3.

578 Geisser v. United States, 513 F.2d 862 (5th Cir. 1975), on remand, In re Petition of Geisser, 414 F. Supp. 49 (S.D. Fla. 1976), vacated on other grounds, 554 F.2d 698 (5th Cir. 1977), appeal after remand, 627 F.2d 745 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied sub nom., Bauer v. United States, 450 U.S. 1031 (1981).

would be likely to encounter were she to be extradited to Switzerland. The court also ordered the government to advise the Parole Board of the bargain and of the important public interest to be served by honoring it. On remand the district court held the constitutional rights arising from a plea bargain superseded obligations under a treaty. The Second Circuit, which vacated on other grounds, held the government to its "best efforts" duty undertaken in the bargain.[579] The problem and its legal ramifications were stated by the court as follows:

> The agreement made by the United States with Bauer had several elements; the extradition issue remains to be resolved. The nature of the bargain with regard to extradition has been characterized in two ways. After the first hearing on Bauer's habeas corpus petition, Judge Mehrtens found that the Justice Department made a definite agreement with Bauer that she would not be deported to Switzerland or France upon her release from prison. On appeal the Government challenged that finding of fact, arguing that the obligation involved only the Government's promise to use its "best efforts" to prevent Bauer's extradition.
>
> In its first opinion this Court remanded the case to the district court for further hearings on the question of "just what has been done with the promise 'to use our best efforts'." Geisser v. United States, 513 F.2d 862 at 872. Thus the Court concluded that the agreement made by the Government could most accurately be characterized as a promise to use "best efforts" to prevent Bauer's extradition. In conformance with this conclusion Judge Mehrtens evaluated the Government's actions from a "best efforts" perspective and found them inadequate. We agree.
>
> In this Court's first opinion Chief Judge Brown suggested how the Government could comply with its "best efforts" promise to Bauer:
>
> The best effort would, at a minimum, be a strong presentation to the Department of State as to what had been promised and the likely dangers to the bargainee-defendant-witness. Geisser v. United States, 513 F.2d 862 at 869. The documentary evidence presented to the district court fails to reveal a "best efforts" performance by the United States Government through the Departments of State and Justice. The letter written by Deputy Attorney General Tyler only obliquely refers to the reason for the nonextradition agreement. In none of the documents is there a "strong presentation" of the likely dangers to Bauer suggested by this Court. Under the "best efforts" bargain the Government obligated itself to serve, in effect, as Bauer's personal advocate on the issue of her extradition. In contrast, the letters are written from the perspective of those concerned not so much about commitments to a client but about a damaging legal precedent. The reasons underlying the original bargain, Bauer's admirable performance in keeping her part of the agreement, her "intense fear of reprisals," and the conclusion of Government agents on the case that her fears were well-founded were never presented to the State Department by the Department of Justice nor by the former to the Swiss Confederation.
>
> The Department of Justice conceded at oral argument the Deputy Attorney General Tyler's letter to Secretary of State Kissinger did not contain a representation that Bauer feared for her life on extradition to Switzerland and that some Justice Department staff members had concluded at the time of the bargain that her fears were well-founded. The Department nevertheless contends that such an omission is irrelevant because the Swiss Embassy was aware of such concerns and concluded they were unrealistic. We do not agree. The "best efforts" bargain requires that the Government advocate Bauer's case for nonextradition to Switzerland and France in the most effective terms possible. Her intense fear for her life was the predicate for the bargain, and the Government's failure to explain fully and strongly this part of the agreement reduced its advocacy of her cause almost to an empty gesture.
>
> In Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 92 S. Ct. 495, 30 L.Ed. 427 (1971), the Supreme Court held that the petitioner's constitutional rights had been violated when the prosecutor failed to keep its bargain to make no sentence recommendation. The Court reached this result even though the judge stated at sentencing that he was "not at all influenced" by the district attorney's recommendation.

579 In re Petition of Geisser, 554 F.2d 698 (1977) (recognizing that a breached plea bargain may in some instances form the basis for an order enjoining extradition in reliance on Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)).

We need not reach the question whether the sentencing judge would or would not have been influenced had he known all the details of the negotiations for the plea. He stated that the prosecutor's recommendation did not influence him and we have no reason to doubt that. Nevertheless, we conclude that the interests of justice and appropriate recognition of the duties of the prosecution in relation to promises made in the negotiation of pleas of guilty will be best served by remanding the case to the state courts for further consideration. 404 U.S. at 262–63, 92 S. Ct. at 499. The same reasoning applies here. The Government promised to use its "best efforts" to prevent Bauer's extradition, and this Court determined that the commitment at a minimum requires a "strong presentation" of what was promised and of the likely dangers to the bargainee. The Government failed to make such a presentation. That the Swiss may to some extent be aware of her fears does not relieve the Government of the obligation to make the strongest case possible for the non-extradition of Bauer to Switzerland and France. As the Supreme Court stated in Santobello: "[W]hen a plea rests in any significant degree on a promise or agreement of the prosecutor, so that it can be said to be part of the inducement or consideration, such promise must be fulfilled." 404 U.S. at 262, 92 S. Ct. at 499.

. . .

Here a promise remains unfulfilled, and the plea is therefore involuntary unless the breach is remedied. "It is axiomatic [under Santobello] that no guilty plea that has been induced by an unkept plea bargain can be permitted to stand." Dugan v. United States, 521 F.2d 231 (5th Cir. 1973); United States v. Pihakis, 545 F.2d 973 (5th Cir. 1977); Scrivens v. Henderson, 525 F.2d 1263 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 919, 97 S. Ct. 311, 50 L. Ed. 2d 285.

As the foregoing discussion suggests, the district court's finding that the Government failed to use its "best efforts" to forestall the petitioner's extradition is not clearly erroneous. Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a). We reject the Department of Justice's contention that the clearly erroneous standard is inapplicable to review a record confined to documentary evidence. . .

The appellant's burden, under Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a), of showing that the trial judge's findings of fact are "clearly erroneous" is not as heavy . . . as it would be if the case had turned on the credibility of witnesses appearing before the trial judge . . . . However, regardless of the documentary nature of the evidence and the process of drawing inferences from undisputed facts, the reviewing court must apply the "clearly erroneous" test. (Footnote omitted.) Sicula Oceanica v. Wilmar Marine Eng. & Sales Corp., 413 F.2d 1332, 1333-34 (5 Cir. 1969). See Volkswagen of America, Inc. v. Jahre, 472 F.2d 557, 559 (5 Cir. 1973); Burston v. Caldwell, 506 F.2d 24, 26–27 (5 Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 990, 95 S. Ct. 1995, 44 L.Ed.2d 480.

. . .

Chief Judge Brown discussed the remedies available in this case in his opinion in the first appeal:

> [T]he avenues of redress available for Bauer are few. Eradicating the impact of her testimony is impossible. And, of course, an opportunity to replead seems superficial and unrealistic in view of her long confinement. Specific performance may well be the only way out to keep the bargain. Geisser v. United States, 513 F.2d at 871. The district court's remedy gives decisive weight to Bauer's fears for her life on extradition to Switzerland or France; it vacated the outstanding extradition order against Bauer. We decline to go that far at this juncture. We conclude that a narrowly drawn remedy specifically enforcing the Government's "best efforts" agreement is required. The Government must again try to prevent Bauer's extradition to Switzerland or France. We are not convinced that the vast powers of persuasion at the command of the Departments of Justice and State have been adequately applied to Bauer's cause. The bargain she made with the United States Government in entering her guilty pleas and waiving her constitutional rights requires no less.

> While retaining jurisdiction, we remand the case to the district court if, in the discretion of that court, further proceedings are necessary or appropriate. The Government has a reasonable time in which to use its "best efforts" to prevent the extradition of Bauer to Switzerland or France. Enforcement of the extradition order outstanding against Bauer must of course be held in abeyance until this case has been resolved.[580]

In 1992 the Fifth Circuit reexamined the issue of a plea bargain by virtue of which a defendant in a United States court entered a guilty plea on the basis of certain assumptions concerning sentencing. In United States v. Schmeltzer,[581] the court reviewed Geisser[582] and distinguished these decisions as follows:

> In Geisser, the government became obliged to use its best efforts to refrain from deporting Geisser to Switzerland, a country where she was under a sentence of imprisonment for patricide. However, the government's assurance—had it been literally realized—would have abrogated an international treaty. This court initially required the government to exercise diligence in satisfying its bargain with Geisser. After much diplomatic wrangling and numerous court proceedings, the government claimed that it had expended its "best efforts," but was unable to persuade the Swiss government to relent in its pursuit of Geisser. This court agreed and Geisser was extradited to Switzerland. The Second Circuit relied on the first Geisser decision to free a defendant who had received a prosecutor's assurance of a limited sentence when the prosecutor was powerless to fulfill such promise, beyond asserting influence on parole officials. Palermo v. Warden, 545 F.2d 286 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. dism'd, 431 U.S. 911 (1977).
>
> Neither of these cases rises to Schmeltzer's aid. The government ultimately fulfilled its bargain with Geisser—best efforts were extended. Palermo represents a more difficult case; Palermo received an "ultra vires" promise from the prosecutor, which the court ordered fulfilled. Similarly, the U.S. Attorney prosecuting Schmeltzer was wholly without authority to ignore the minimum mandatory sentence. While Schmeltzer's counsel was understandably anxious about the maximum penalty, the trial record suggests that both prosecution and defense counsel viewed the explicit minimum mandatory provision as being susceptible to negotiation. Notwithstanding, Palermo is factually distinguishable from the case at bar. The U.S. attorney fulfilled his promise to Schmeltzer: the government did not seek the enhanced penalty.
>
> Quite beyond the factual disparity between the instant case and those cited by Schmeltzer is the unequivocal language of the Sentencing Guidelines:
>
> > Where a statutorily required minimum sentence is greater than the maximum of the applicable guideline range, the statutorily required minimum sentence shall be the guideline sentence.[583]

The Eighth Circuit in Ramanauskas v. United States[584] considered whether the relator's plea bargain between with the U.S. Attorney barred his extradition under the United States–Lithuania extradition treaty's double jeopardy provision.[585] The relator was accused of smuggling counterfeit currency and drugs into the United States.[586] The relator served a U.S. prison sentence on counterfeiting charges, and was subsequently indicted in the United States for conspiracy to 580 Geisser, 554 F.2d at 703–706.

---

581 United States v. Schmeltzer, 960 F.2d 405 (5th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 1003 (1992).

582 See also Palermo v. Warden, 545 F.2d 286 (2d Cir. 1976) (using the first Geisser decision to free a defendant who had relied on prosecution's assurance of a limited sentence), cert. dismissed, 431 U.S. 911 (1977)).

583 Schmeltzer, 940 F.2d at 407–408.

584 Ramanauskas v. United States, 526 F.3d 1111 (8th Cir. 2008).

585 Id. at 1112–1113.

586 Id. at 1113.

deal in counterfeit currency, with no reference to drug charges.[587] While the U.S. charges were pending, Lithuanian authorities filed drug and counterfeiting criminal charges against the relator, and formally requested his extradition from the United States.[588] The relator entered into a plea agreement wherein the U.S. Attorney agreed "to not bring any additional charges against [Ramanauskas] based upon the information known to it . . . to wit [his] participation in distribution of Ecstacy. This commitment . . . does not apply to any other agency or department of the United States, or to any other proceeding such as deportation, extradition or the like."[589] Less than one month after the relator's sentencing on counterfeiting charges, the United States filed the extradition complaint on behalf of Lithuania, but requested the counterfeiting charges be dismissed as they fell within the United States–Lithuania extradition treaty's double jeopardy provision.[590] The relator defended the extradition request with the treaty provision, which he argued prevented extradition following an "agreed resolution approved by a court with final and binding effect," such as a plea agreement.[591] The court rejected this construction of the treaty and reasoned as follows:

> The contention is fatally flawed because it ignores the previous words in the second sentence, "under Lithuanian law." In our view, the plain import of these limiting words is that the second sentence was inserted because, under Lithuania's legal system, the words "convicted or acquitted" in the first sentence of Article 5.1 might not include dispositions of Lithuanian criminal proceedings to which the double jeopardy protection should apply. In other words, the second sentence only applies when Lithuania, rather than the United States, is the "Requested State." The Treaty's legislative history in the United States confirms this interpretation. In urging ratification, the Report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations explained:
>
> > ARTICLE 5(1)—PRIOR PROSECUTION
> >
> > The Lithuanian delegation expressed concern that the terms "convicted or acquitted" used in the first sentence are not broad enough to cover all matters under Lithuanian law. Therefore, the following sentence was added to provide a broader definition: "Conviction or acquittal also means, under Lithuanian law, an agreed resolution approved by a court with final and binding effect."
>
> S. EXEC. REP. No. 107-13, at 5 (2002).
>
> This interpretation of Article 5.1 is reinforced by the plain meaning of Article 5.2, which provides in relevant part that "[e]xtradition shall not be precluded by the fact that the competent authorities of the Requested State have decided . . . not to prosecute the person sought for the acts for which extradition is requested . . . " Here, as the district court concluded, the Minnesota United States Attorney's commitment in the plea agreement not to bring additional charges was a decision "not to prosecute" known but uncharged drug offenses for which Lithuania was seeking extradition. The plea agreement expressly stated that it did not apply "to any other proceeding such as . . . extradition," and Ramanauskas later asked the district court to remove any references to drug activity from the PSR "to preserve his rights, whatever those may be in Lithuania." Ramanauskas offers no support, textual or otherwise, for his assertion that Article 5.2 only applies when the Requested State's authorities make a "unilateral" decision not to prosecute, without court approval.
>
> Ramanauskas complains that, under the government's interpretation of Article 5.2, Lithuania may now prosecute him for the additional counterfeiting charges the United States dismissed pursuant to the plea agreement. This contention confuses distinct Treaty provisions. The 587 Id.

588 Id.

589 Id.

590 Id.

591 Id. at 1115.

> government dropped all Lithuanian counterfeiting charges from the extradition complaint. If he is extradited, Lithuania has agreed in Article 16.1(a) of the Treaty (titled the "Rule of Specialty") to prosecute him only for offenses "for which extradition was granted." On the other hand, had the United States not dropped the Lithuanian counterfeiting charges from the extradition complaint, the district court would have needed to decide before issuing a certificate of extradition whether those specific charges were barred by Article 5 of the Treaty. Compare Elcock v. United States, 80 F.Supp.2d 70 (E.D.N.Y.2000); Matter of Montiel Garcia, 802 F.Supp. 773 (E.D.N.Y.1992), aff'd, 987 F.2d 153 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 509 U.S. 930, 113 S.Ct. 3056, 125 L.Ed.2d 740 (1993).[592]

Plea negotiations are often the subject of abuse and are not enforced in a manner that instills confidence in the good faith of U.S. prosecutors, or even the federal judiciary. The reason could be that U.S. prosecutors may tend to make representations designed to induce a "bargain" in a way that leaves them the opportunity of backing away from some of the representations they made or impressions they created. Surely, that should not be the case. United States prosecutors should act not only with the utmost integrity in every respect but should also avoid making representations that will not be carried out or creating false impressions to delude a relator-defendant into a plea bargain agreement. As U.S. federal and state criminal legislation has become significantly inflated with new statutes, which at times duplicate existing ones but sometimes are in the nature of aggravating factors, and because of the complexity of sentencing, particularly with the Sentencing Guidelines,[593] the opportunities for misrepresentation or erroneous representation or misperception or misapprehension are more markedly significant than in the past. This situation requires legislative clarification as to the type of plea negotiations that will be acceptable in the United States and incorporated in a "specialty" type statement in the extradition order so as to give the relator the opportunity to raise the issue abroad if need be with the assurance that the United States will "protest" any breach thereof.[594] Similarly, legislative guidelines should be established for negotiated arraignments with a relator sought by the United States prior to his/her surrender or subsequently (when the plea agreement bears upon the conditions of extradition). Until such time as this occurs, and considering the tendency of the courts as evidenced by the Geisser, Palermo, and Schmeltzer decisions, which seem to have favored the government's position over the defendant-relators, attorneys representing defendant-relators should remember the old contract law maxim: caveat emptor, or buyer beware.[595]

Plaster v. United States[596] raised the issue of the enforceability of an immunity plea bargain agreement between U.S. military officials and a relator who was in the military. The relator and another member of the U.S. armed forces were suspected of the murder of a West German taxi driver, which occurred while they were stationed in West Germany. The two deserted and traveled to Madison, Wisconsin, where both men were arrested in connection with another

---

592 Id. at 1115.

593 It should be noted that the Federal Sentencing Guidelines were modified, so that finds not established beyond a reasonable doubt were in violation of the Sixth Amendment and could not factor in the sentence ultimately imposed. See United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).

594 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6 (discussing the rule of specialty).

595 It should also be noted that it will likely be difficult for a relator to succeed on a motion to withdraw a guilty plea based on alleged coercion where the district court makes an adverse credibility finding. United States v. Muller, 305 Fed. Appx. 457, 458 (9th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion).

596 Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340 (4th Cir. 1983). The case was vacated and remanded for a factual determination of the authority of the military officer who had entered into the immunity agreement. The district court again granted the relator a writ of habeas corpus. Plaster v. United States, 605 F. Supp. 1532 (W.D. Va. 1985), aff'd, 789 F.2d 289 (4th Cir. 1986).

murder. While in custody the two were questioned about and confessed to involvement in the West German murder.

Under the Status of Forces Agreement between the United States and West Germany, Germany automatically waived its jurisdiction over the relator in favor of the American military authorities. Germany chose not to recall its waiver, but asked to be kept informed of the efforts by the U.S. military to obtain custody of the relator and his companion in order to bring them to trial for the West German murder.

The U.S. military authorities chose not to pursue prosecution of the relator after the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision in Miranda v. Arizona,[597] concluding that the confessions of the relator and his companion would be inadmissible. Germany then attempted to regain jurisdiction. The U.S. military authorities chose instead to offer immunity to the relator in exchange for his testimony against his companion so that the companion could be prosecuted in the United States. The relator accepted the immunity agreement, but the military authorities never actually sought the relator's testimony. After the conclusion of a new extradition treaty between the United States and West Germany in 1978,[598] twelve years after the immunity agreement, Germany requested the extradition of both the relator and his companion. The relator was certified as extraditable and sought habeas corpus relief. The district court granted the relator a writ of habeas corpus, and the United States appealed.

On appeal the Fourth Circuit established two points regarding the immunity agreement between the relator and the U.S. military authorities: (1) high-ranking military officials who are in a position of apparent authority have the right to bind the United States and do indeed bind the United States; and (2) an immunity agreement or plea bargain agreement is binding upon the United States when entered into by persons in authority, and constitutes an enforceable agreement even against a foreign government.[599] The court stated that the grant of immunity was tantamount to a plea bargain agreement and that the government was therefore obligated to carry out its part of the agreement.

The court did not address the question of conflicting authority between an obligation assumed by the U.S. government, which is ratified by the U.S. Senate, and an agreement that may be entered into between a prosecutor and an individual in a particular case without the knowledge of the government. By extension, this position could lead to a situation in which an immunity agreement is entered into by any prosecuting authority in the United States with apparent official authority, and the agreement would not only bind the United States in all of its prosecutorial functions at the state and federal level, but would also bind the United States with respect to its international obligations and even supersede those obligations.

In In re Burt[600] the same facts arose as in the Plaster case. The issues in Burt related more to general due process, speedy trial, and various diplomatic and prosecutorial decisions involving a U.S. serviceman in Germany, his return to the United States, his prosecution, and his subsequent extradition to Germany. Among these issues was also the question of whether the NATO Status of Forces Treaty (NATO-SOFA) applied and to what extent there was an interplay of prosecutorial discretion used under NATO-SOFA,[601] the subsequent prosecution in the United States, and the subsequent extradition to Germany. A key point is whether the decision 597 Miranda v. Arizona, 396 U.S. 868 (1969).

---

598 Extradition Treaty, supra note 19, 32 U.S.T. at 1485.

599 This situation is analogous to the extension of the applicability of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination with respect to immunity agreements to state and federal courts alike. Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n N.Y. Harbor, 378 U.S. 52 (1964). See also United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); Koch, supra note 575.

600 In re Burt, 737 F.2d 1477 (7th Cir. 1984).

601 June 19, 1951, 4 U.S.T. 1792.

not to surrender him to Germany under NATO-SOFA at the time he was a serviceman on his return to the United States, where he was prosecuted, de jure or de facto constituted, inter alia, a specific or implied promise that he not be extradited to Germany. The facts do not disclose whether promises or representations were made to the relator at the time he was in Germany and the military authorities refused to surrender him to Germany. It would otherwise seem unusual that he would not be surrendered and would be returned to the United States for prosecution if it were not a substitute for his extradition, thus raising the question of whether some promises or representations were made. In Burt, the Seventh Circuit held:

> Generally, so long as the United States has not breached a specific promise to an accused regarding his or her extradition, see Plaster, 720 F.2d at 352; Petition of Geisser, 554 F.2d 698, 704-06 (5th Cir. 1977); Petition of Geisser, 627 F.2d 745, 750 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1031, 101 S. Ct. 1741, 68 L.Ed.2d 226 (1981), and bases its extradition decisions on diplomatic considerations without regard to such constitutionally impermissible factors as race, color, sex, national origin, religion, or political beliefs, and in accordance with such other exceptional constitutional limitations as may exist because of particularly atrocious procedures or punishments employed by the foreign jurisdiction, [Of course, in proceeding with an extradition, the United States must also comply with the terms of the extradition treaty and the procedures prescribed in 18 U.S.C. § 3184.] cf. Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179, 1197–98 2d Cir.], cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856, 101 S. Ct. 153, 66 L.Ed.2d 70 (1980); Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77,79 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851, 81 S.Ct. 97, 5 L.Ed. 2d 74 (1960), those decisions will not be disturbed. Here, petitioner's due process argument has not pointed to any conduct by the United States that would run afoul of the constitutional limitations on extraditions we have suggested. Petitioner will have to make his arguments about prejudicial prosecutorial delay in the courts of the prosecuting party, West Germany.[602]

In McKnight v. Torres,[603] the court considered whether the United States violated the terms of an immunity agreement it entered into with the relator. The relator entered into a "direct use immunity" agreement with the U.S. Attorney in his drug importation case.[604] The relator agreed to cooperate with the U.S. Attorney "in exchange for the government's promise 'not to offer in evidence in its case-in-chief or for the purpose of any sentencing hearing, any statements made by [McKnight] at any meeting' in either 'the above-captioned case [or] in any other prosecution that may be brought against [McKnight] by this Office.' "[605] However, the United States transmitted the information obtained from McKnight under this immunity agreement, which formed part of the basis of the relator's in absentia judgment and sentence in France.[606] The relator challenged his subsequent finding of extraditability on the grounds that the government breached its immunity agreement.[607] The court rejected the relator's argument, reasoning as follows with regard to immunity agreements:

> We agree that the words of McKnight's immunity agreement were clear, explicit, and unambiguous. McKnight concedes as much. He acknowledges that "the [U.S. Attorney's] dissemination of the proffer was not expressly prohibited by the agreement," and that, at the time he signed the agreement, he recognized he "had to take the risk that his [statement might become] known and available to some other jurisdiction [that] could then use his statements to incriminate, and convict, him." He further admits that the U.S. Attorney's agreement not to use his statements "was limited to the pending prosecution and any other prosecution [the U.S. Attorney] might 602 Burt, 737 F.2d at 1487. See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999).

603 563 F.3d 890 (9th Cir. 2009).

604 Id. at 891.

605 Id.

606 Id.

607 Id. at 892.

> bring against [him]," and that it did not reflect any promise by the government either to disclose or not to disclose his statements "to other jurisdictions."
>
> The unambiguous words of the agreement are the end of the story. "As a rule, the language of an instrument must govern its interpretation if the language is clear and explicit." Brookwood v. Bank of Am., 45 Cal.App.4th 1667, 1670–71, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 515 (1996) (quoting Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Rancho Santa Fe Assn., 177 Cal.App.3d 726, 730, 223 Cal.Rptr. 175 (Cal.Ct.App.1986)); see also Yount v. Acuff Rose-Opryland, 103 F.3d 830, 835–36 (9th Cir.1996) ("[W]hen a contract has been reduced to writing, a court must ascertain the parties' intent from the writing alone."). Because the agreement here was clear, we must determine its meaning by reference to the parties' "objective intent, as evidenced by the words of the contract." Cedars-Sinai Med. Ctr. v. Shewry, 137 Cal.App.4th 964, 980, 41 Cal. Rptr.3d 48 (Cal.Ct.App.2006) (quoting Founding Members of the Newport Beach Country Club v. Newport Beach Country Club, Inc., 109 Cal.App.4th 944, 956, 135 Cal.Rptr.2d 505 (Cal.Ct.App.2003)). Accordingly, the parties' "uncommunicated subjective intent is irrelevant." Reigelsperger v. Siller, 40 Cal.4th 574, 579, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 887, 150 P.3d 764 (2007). Here, McKnight's unambiguous agreement with the government does not contain any limitation on the government's freedom to share his admissions with France. The U.S. Attorney's disclosure therefore did not violate the agreement.
>
> McKnight nevertheless argues that the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing "supplement[s]" the immunity agreement, incorporating his "reasonabl[e] expect[ation] that the [U.S. Attorney] would . . . not facilitate his proffer being used by another jurisdiction." In his view, the government's disclosure "frustrated" the "promise" of "protection" made to him by the U.S. Attorney. This argument fails because it presumes away the dispute—i.e., that the "protection" offered by the U.S. Attorney included protection from prosecution abroad. This broad construction of the "protection" offered simply is not reflected in the clear language of the agreement.
>
> Assuming arguendo that the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing applies here, it "is limited to assuring compliance with the express terms of the contract, and cannot be extended to create obligations not contemplated by the contract." Spinks v. Equity Residential Briarwood Apartments, 171 Cal.App.4th 1004, 90 Cal.Rptr.3d 453, 476 (2009) (quoting Pasadena Live v. City of Pasadena, 114 Cal.App.4th 1089, 1094, 8 Cal.Rptr.3d 233 (Cal.Ct.App.2004)). The condition operates only to prevent a party from taking an action that " 'will injure the right of the other to receive the benefits of the agreement.' " Major v. W. Home Ins. Co., 169 Cal.App.4th 1197, 1209, 87 Cal.Rptr.3d 556 (2009) (quoting Gruenberg v. Aetna Ins. Co., 9 Cal.3d 566, 573, 108 Cal.Rptr.3d 480, 510 P.2d 1032 (1973)). It neither "alter[s] specific obligations set forth in the contract" nor "add[s] duties independent of the contractual relationship." Shawmut Bank, N.A. v. Kress Assocs., 33 F.3d 1477, 1503 (9th Cir.1994) (applying California law).
>
> In this case, while McKnight may have hoped the U.S. Attorney would not disclose his statements to the French authorities, there is nothing in the plain words of the agreement that provided that protection, and the implied covenant of good faith simply cannot be employed to read it into the agreement. [footnote omitted][608]

In connection with cooperation agreements between the U.S. government and a person sought for extradition, it is clear that the courts have an obligation to enforce such agreements whether they are part of a plea bargain or not.[609] This obligation also extends to immunity agreements.[610] However, there is a question as to whether the United States should enforce a

---

608 Id. at 892–894.

609 In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999), citing Santibello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971) (holding plea bargains are generally binding upon the government); United Staets v. Streebing, 987 F.2d 368, 372 (6th Cir. 1993); Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340, 350 (4th Cir. 1983). See also Valenzuela v. United States, 286 F. 3d 1223 (11th Cir. 2002); In re Extadition of Burt, 737 F.2d 1477 (7th Cir. 1984).

610 United States v. Fitch, 964 F.2d 571, 574 (6th Cir. 1992) (binding government to agreement unless it can show a material breach by defendant).

cooperation agreement between the requesting state and the person sought for extradition. The Sixth Circuit held that the extradition judge in the United States, when it is the requested state, should not address the issue.[611]

It is not uncommon for extradition requests to be submitted by a requesting state many years after an arrest warrant or indictment has been issued, or a conviction obtained. This may be due to a variety of circumstances, including the fact that the person sought has been a fugitive or changed his identity, whereabouts unknown; was held in custody or serving a prison sentence; or simply because of some fortuitous reason on the part of the requesting state. Notwithstanding how long this period of time may be, the United States and most other countries of the world do not consider that to be grounds for denial of extradition.[612]

The problem here is essentially that the judiciary is not in a position to develop the practical alternatives that are required to resolve this dilemma; the problems should be legislated. The better solution in this case would be that federal and state authorities not be authorized to enter into an immunity agreement without referring to the Department of State for verification that such an agreement does not conflict with existing international obligations of the United States.

Under the 1984 Draft Extradition Reform Act, the questions of immunity from prosecution and plea bargain are not addressed. However, under § 3193, which provides for waiver of the hearing, its requirements, and withdrawal, the legislative history indicates that withdrawal of a waiver should be treated in the same manner as guilty pleas in criminal proceedings.[613] Thus it could be assumed by analogy that a plea bargain, which would operate as a waiver or have the same consequences as a waiver under § 3193, should also be subject to the same limitations as exist in other federal criminal cases.

4.7. Amnesty and Pardon

Amnesty and pardon are both a bar to prosecution and punishment. Save for specific legislative pronouncement, they do not extinguish the crime, but rather the criminal action against the person who is believed to have committed a crime or who has been found guilty. Amnesty and pardon, however, also apply to situations where a person has been legally found to have committed a crime and is subsequently given the benefit of a remission of sentence or a removal of the consequences of the criminal conviction. The difference in substance and application of these two legal modalities for arresting, prosecution, and punishment is significant in many respects.

Amnesty is usually granted before prosecution or conviction, and in that respect it resembles a statute of limitations,[614] whereas pardon is usually granted after a person is found guilty. In extradition, however, the common question is whether they both can serve as a bar.[615]

---

611 See In Re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999) (holding that an agreement between Drayer and Canada was best adjudicated in Canada regarding its scope and validity, not in the context of extradition.)

612 In re Gambino, 2006 WL 709445 (D. Mass. 2006) (extradition request was made fifteen years after warrant issued); Drayer, 190 F.3d at 410 (where the request was made fourteen years after the issuance of the Canadian arrest warrant).

613 See H.R. Rep. No. 627, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 1, at 13 (1982).

614 See supra Sec. 4.4.

615 Certain national legislations, such as that of Germany, consider that a bar to prosecution or punishment (i.e., statute of limitation, amnesty, or pardon) is also a bar to extradition. See Heinrich Grutzner, Rapports: Allemagne, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 379 (1968). See also Lazzeri v. Schweizerische Bundesanwaltschaft, 34 I.L.R. 134 (Federal Tribunal 1961) (Switz.); In re Issel, 18 I.L.R. 331 (Eastern Provincial Court 1950) (Den.); In re Zanini, 8 Ann. Dig. 372 (Supreme Court of the Reich 1936) (Germany).

Pardon and clemency are executive privileges available to the president and governors. Pardon has been used essentially to erase criminal records and the civil disabilities that are imposed on persons convicted of crimes. It has also been used as a substitute for clemency. Unlike parole, which is an institutionalized and regulated procedure, pardon, with a few minor exceptions (e.g., Federal Board recommendations of pardon to the president), is almost wholly discretionary with the chief executive.[616] In some states, amnesty, when it is general, bars prosecution and extinguishes the offense as related to the category of offenders benefiting from it.

Amnesty and pardon can only be considered defenses to extradition when declared by the competent authority of the requesting state. In the United States, amnesty and pardon could be a procedural bar to extradition because they do not extinguish the crime committed in the requesting state, nor for that matter do they eliminate the crime for "double criminality" purposes. There are no U.S. cases on point.

There are several analogies among amnesty, pardon, and statutes of limitations, discussed above, but the major difference is that the latter derive from a legislative source, which can be said to run into the substantive requirement of double criminality. Therefore, it is possible for the requested state to rely on its laws on the subject to deny extradition, while the former two are discretionary executive prerogatives, and can only be asserted when they originate in the requesting state.

The 1984 Draft Extradition Reform Act does not deal with this question, although a treaty would control, of course, and it could be argued that under § 3194(d)(1)(C), amnesty or pardon extinguishes the crime, and it therefore is no longer punishable under the laws of the requested or requesting state, which is a requirement of double criminality.[617]

4.8. Conviction Based on Trial in Absentia

This defense is not recognized in those states whose legal systems permit such trials, while it may be a defense in those legal systems that do not permit such trials.[618] Although the issue has been raised unsuccessfully in the United States it resurfaces periodically.[619] 616 Executive clemency is founded on Article II, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution and is regulated by Title 28 of the United States Code and 28 C.F.R. § 1 (1992). In the United States, clemency and pardon are synonymous. See United States v. Wilson, 32 U.S. 150 (1833). For the pardon of former President Nixon by President Ford, see 10 Wkly. Comp. Pres. Doc. 1108 (Sept. 8, 1974). Though the proclamation was labeled "Granting Pardon to Richard Nixon," it is in fact in the nature of an amnesty, as it precludes prosecution.

---

Article II, section 2 of the Constitution grants the president "Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment." U.S. Const., art. II, § 2. See, e.g., Edward S. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers (1984); Willard H. Humbert, The Pardoning Power of the President (1941). President Wilson resorted to pardon, and the case was tested in Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79 (1915), rev.'d, Curtin v. United States, 236 U.S. 96 (1915), as did President Johnson before him in Armstrong v. United States, 80 U.S. 154 (1871). For a comparison of state statutes and authority, see Samuel P. Stafford, Clemency: Legal Authority, Procedure and Structure (1977).

617 See also Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

618 For example, in German practice, extradition requests based on judgments in absentia create difficult problems, especially for requested states the laws of which barely address absentia proceedings. Under case law and in the legal doctrine of the Federal Republic of Germany, the decisive factor regarding the admissibility of extradition based on an absentia judgment is whether and how in the proceedings prior to the judgment (especially those concerning summons, defense, and possible legal remedies following seizure of the person concerned) the court granted the minimum rights associated with fair proceedings of the kind guaranteed in both Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and applicable case law of the European Court of Human Rights. Wilkitski, supra note 414, at 284. For a case involving this issue in South Africa, see Judgment in Trevor Claud Robinson v. Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Director of Public Prosecutions, 2006 (6) SA 214 (C) (S. Afr.); Robinson v. S, 2004 (3) SA 267 (CC) (S. Afr.).

619 See Germany v. United States, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 6576 (E.D.N.Y. 2007) (denying argument by relator where U.S.–France extradition treaty had a provision regarding additional requirements for

One of the landmark cases in the United States is Gallina v. Fraser.[620] The court's decision indicates in obiter dictum that if the trial in absentia would be so fundamentally unfair by generally recognized standards of justice and not only by U.S. or common law standards, the outcome[621] would be different.

The court in this case, as well as others, granted extradition where a conviction in absentia had been rendered against a fugitive relator.[622] These decisions evaded the crux of the issue by asserting individuals convicted in absentia, indicating that the parties contemplated extradition of relators tried in absentia); In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97893 (W.D. Mich. 2008) (rejecting challenge to evidence presented at trial in absentia as failing to establish the required probable cause finding); United States v. Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47096 (D.S.D.) (same probable cause challenge as in Bilanovic). This issue was present, though not raised, in the extradition of Manuel Noriega to France. See Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Extradites Noriega to France on Money laundering Charges, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 279–280 (July 2010).

---

620 Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856, 861–862, 867–868 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). Relator claimed that he committed the robberies to collect funds for the Sicilian separatist movement, and that he could not therefore be extradited because his offenses were of a political character. The Commissioner, however, apparently found that relator and his associates used the separatist movement to further their true objectives of personal gain. Following the arrest of his associates in 1946, the relator went into hiding. He was tried in absentia in 1949 and 1951. His whereabouts were apparently unknown until 1955 when he entered the United States, probably as a stowaway. Id. at 861–862. See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y., July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 99 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 200, (9th Cir. 1990) (NO. 98-55069). If a conviction is the result of a trial in absentia, the conviction is regarded as a charge, requiring independent proof of probable cause. Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77, 78–-79 (2d Cir. 1960); Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258, 264 n.1 (6th Cir. 1957); In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648, 653 n.3 (S.D.N.Y. 1959), remanded, 185 F. Supp. 925 (S.D.N.Y. 1960), appeal dismissed sub nom. United States ex rel. D'Amico v. Bishop, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir. 1961); Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330, 331 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1913); Ex parte Fudera, 162 F. 591 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1908), appeal dismissed sub nom. Italy v. Asaro, 219 U.S. 589, 31 S. Ct. 470, 55 L. Ed. 348 (1911). Thus, the extradition judge must make an independent finding of probable cause notwithstanding the existence of a conviction in absentia by a foreign court.

621 See In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1959). This case became moot, however, when the Italian consul represented to the court that D'Amico would be tried anew if extradited. The court of appeals in reviewing these decisions also considered Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957) and Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902); cf. In re Extradition of Suarez-Mason, 694 F. Supp. 676, 687 (1988). See also Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. 540 (1840). The court correctly noted that nothing in those cases supported relator's claim, with the exception of the dictum in United States ex rel. Argento v. Jacobs, 176 F. Supp. 877 (N.D. Ohio 1959); neither was there anything in them directly contrary to relator's claim. The inter-state extradition cases in particular were irrelevant, because a fugitive claiming his conviction violated due process would be told that he could test his claim in the courts of the state where he was convicted. Cf. Sweeney v. Woodall, 344 U.S. 86 (1952). In Ex parte Fudera, 162 F. 591 (C.C.N.Y. 1908), a habeas corpus proceeding, the very treaty now in question was asserted as the basis of a request for extradition of the petitioner. From a reading of the case it seems clear that the person who had committed the crime had been convicted in contumacium in his absence by the Italian government. Yet the court expressed not the slightest doubt that extradition would have been granted under these circumstances had sufficient evidence of the criminality of the petitioner been presented to it. The fact that petitioner was discharged from custody was due to the lack of competent evidence that the crime charged had been committed.

622 See also Arambasic v. Ashcroft, 403 F. Supp. 2d 951, 962 (D.S.D. 2005) stating:

> Also, the fact that Arambasic was convicted in absentia does not alone warrant a denial of extradition. See, M. Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, Ch. VIII, § 4.8. However, where a conviction is the result of a trial in absentia, the conviction is regarded merely as a that in order for extradition to be granted, it is not necessary to advance that the relator has been convicted, but only that a prima facie case of guilt had been proven.[623] Furthermore, the executive may at his/her discretion grant extradition subject to the condition that a new trial be granted the relator.[624] This solution rests on the extension of the "principle of specialty"[625] as a means of ensuring compliance with conditional extradition.[626]

The position of the United States is not clear as to whether the courts, in examining the request or in their review by habeas corpus, will consider the question of fundamental fairness of a relator's trial or punishment.[627] At present, however, it seems that a trial in absentia is not charge, requiring independent proof of probable cause. In re Ribaudo, 2004 WL 213021 (S.D.N.Y.) (not reported in F.Supp.2d); In re Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y.1998) (not reported in F.Supp.2d); Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77, 79 (2d Cir. 1960). Id.

---

623 In Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1913), again involving extradition under this same treaty, the court stated that it made no difference whether there was a conviction in contumacium; insofar as the hearing on the criminality of the accused was concerned, he was to be regarded as only charged with the crime. Although in that case the accused was discharged for lack of competent evidence of identity, there can be no doubt that had such evidence been produced, the court would have ordered the accused held for extradition despite the fact that he had already been tried for the offense and would, in all probability, be incarcerated immediately upon his return to Italy. See also In re Mylonas, 187 F. Supp. 716 (N.D. Ala. 1960) (involving extradition by Greece); cf. Koskotas v. Roche, 740 F. Supp. 904, 912 (D. Mass. 1990), aff'd, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir. 1991); In re Ribaudo, No. 00 Crim. Misc. 1 Pg. KN, 2004 WL 213021, *5 (S.D.N.Y. 2004), relying on Spatola v. United States, 920 F. 2d 615, 618 (2d Cir. 1991).

624 Despite the desirability of giving the executive maximum discretion in extradition matters, and despite the difficulty of finding an appropriate remedy, judicial intervention should be available to protect the rights of the requested person when the alternatives have been exhausted. Cf. Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 467 (1938); Johnson v. Dye, 175 F.2d 250 (3d Cir. 1949), rev'd 175 F.2d 250 (3d Cir. Pa. 1949), rev'd per curiam, 338 U.S. 864, 896 (1949) (holding that remedies in state courts had not been exhausted).

625 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

626 Italy's willingness to make such agreements is illustrated by In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1959). In that case the Italian consul, apparently without waiting for a request from the State Department, assured the court that the requested person would receive a new trial. Id. at 651 n.3.

627 In Gallina v. Fraser, the district court stated:

> [R]egardless of what constitutional protections are given to persons held for trial in the courts of the United States or of the constituent states thereof, those protections cannot be claimed by an accused whose trial and conviction have been held or are to be held under the laws of another nation, acting according to its traditional processes and within the scope of its authority and jurisdiction.... For the present we hold that extradition of a person convicted (in absentia)...is not contrary to due process of law even where it appears that the extradition will not be followed by a new trial, but rather by immediate incarceration for the offense charged upon a sentence previously imposed...

177 F. Supp. 856, 866 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960) (emphasis omitted). This statement could also be interpreted as holding that the test of due process in this context is whether the foreign procedure is lawful and in accord with the traditional processes of that country. If this latter interpretation of the holding is correct, then the district court decision is based upon a rejection of the relator's second argument. See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 99 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 200 (9th Cir. 1990) (No. 98-55069). In Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818 (1957), no constitutional issue was raised. In United States ex rel. Argento v. Jacobs, 176 F. Supp. 877 (N.D. Ohio 1959), the court rejected in dictum a constitutional argument similar to that advanced in Gallina, saying that although a trial in absentia "does not comport with our ideas of justice or fairness, it must be remembered that petitioner is an Italian national and alleged to be a fugitive from that country. The offense was committed in Italy and is governed by considered by the U.S. Supreme Court as a sufficiently extreme denial of fundamental fairness under principles of public policy to warrant denial of extradition.[628]

The issue involved in a trial in absentia is essentially one of fairness based on notions of due process. This has been the basis of all decisions in the United States on that subject. But this also poses a question as to the ability of the judiciary of one state to pass judgment on the fairness of the judicial process of another state. In the United States that process is limited. The Supreme Court held in Wilson v. Girard[629] that the surrender of a person for trial to another state that does not have the same procedural safeguards does not violate due process. In that respect, the U.S. judiciary is limited by the "rule of non-inquiry."[630]

In a European cause célèbre—the Bozano case decided by the French Court of Appeals of Limoges[631]—extradition was denied by France to Italy because the relator was found guilty in absentia by the Appellate Court of Assizes of Italy after having been acquitted by the trial court. In addition to the fact that France had no similar procedure (i.e., reciprocity),[632] the relator was precluded under Italian criminal procedure from appealing that decision even before the highest court (Corte Supreme di Cassazione). Had this extradition matter been in the United States, it is quite likely that on the basis of this country's jurisprudence (even though much of it is dicta) the same result would have obtained. Bozano was subsequently abducted into Switzerland and then extradited to Italy, where he is now in jail.

The 1984 Draft Extradition Reform Act does not deal with this issue, although presumably if the trial in absentia—as supported by the record presented in the extradition proceeding—supports the proposition that the trial was so fundamentally unfair as to violate minimum standards of criminal justice in the United States and that the return of the relator would be fundamentally unfair, the secretary of state could exercise his/her discretion under §§ 3194(e)(3)(A) and 3196.[633]

Italian law which permits the trial of a criminal case in absentia." Id. at 879. The requested person was discharged, however, for lack of sufficient evidence of guilt. The issue of fundamental fairness of a relator's trial or punishment is discussed in the section dealing with the rule of non-inquiry, see Ch. VII, Sec. 8, and the scope of habeas corpus, see Ch. XI, Sec. 1.

628 Note, Foreign Trials in Absentia: Due Process Objections to Unconditional Extradition, 13 Stan. L. Rev. 370, 376 (1961). See U.N. Model Extradition Treaty, supra note 23, at 197. Article 3(g) states that the judgment of the requesting state rendered in absentia is a mandatory ground for refusal of extradition. Id.

629 Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957). In United States v. Galanis, the court held:

> An extradition proceeding is not a criminal prosecution, and the constitutional safeguards that accompany a criminal trial in this country do not shield an accused from extradition pursuant to a valid treaty. Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901); Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330 (S.D.N.Y. 1913). As Judge Smith stated in Gallina v. Fraser:
>
> > Regardless of what constitutional protections are given to persons held for trial in the courts of the United States or of the constituent states thereof, those protections cannot be claimed by an accused whose trial and conviction have been held or are to be held under the laws of another nation, acting according to its traditional processes and within the scope of its authority and jurisdiction. The fact that the United States "participates" in the arguable denial of a constitutional protection by surrendering the defendant to the demanding nation does not implicate the United States in an unconstitutional action. Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972).
>
> 429 F. Supp. 1215, 1224 (D. Conn. 1977).

630 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8 and Ch. XI, Sec. 1.

631 Judgment of May 15, 1979, Cour d'Appel de Limoges, No. 37. See also Opinion, Trib. gr. inst. Paris, Ordonnance de Référé, Jan. 14, 1980.

632 See Ch. VII, Sec. 1.

633 See also Ch. XI.

5. Torture: A Substantive Bar to Extradition

The extension of non-inquiry by U.S. courts into cases of torture courts is a violation of our public policy, as expressed in the Constitution's Eighth Amendment.[634] Moreover, the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), which the United States has ratified, provides in Article 3 that extradition is prohibited whenever there is a likelihood that the relator will be tortured in the requesting state. Under the CAT this is known as the non-refoulement principle.[635]

The procedure in connection with the determination of torture is as follows. Once the extradition court determines a person to be extraditable, the court defers to the secretary of state to exercise executive discretion on the basis of a petition that the relator would present to the secretary of state. The petitioner, in such a case, has an ulterior remedy if the secretary of state rejects the petition, namely, recourse pursuant to the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act (FARR Act).[636] The secretary of state's prerogative is discretionary,[637] but that discretion is reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act.[638] The FARR Act does not limit a petitioner's right of review by way of habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241.[639] Thus, the extradition court, notwithstanding the jus cogens nature of torture,[640] does not have jurisdiction to review a petitioner's claim under the Torture Convention because the FARR Act does not authorize judicial enforcement of the Convention.[641] Presumably there is judicial review for abuse of discretion. Basically there have been few cases that have arisen in the extradition context involving potential torture in the requested state.

The treatment that the relator is likely to receive in the requesting state upon his/her return there has not been the object of specific provisions in extradition treaties whether they are bilateral or multilateral. The reason is that as between coequal authoritative decision-making processes there can be no inquiry by one state into the internal affairs of the other.[642]

---

634 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2006); Sean Murphy, 2 United States Practice in International Law 2002–2204 (2006).

635 The United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. Res. 46, U.N. GAOR 39th Sess., 93 plen. Mtg., at 395, U.N. Doc. A/64 at 63 (1984). See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 17 (1977). See also M.Cherif Bassiouni, I International Criminal Law 363 (2nd rev. ed. 1999); Torture Victims Protection Act, Pub. L. 102-256, Mar. 12, 1992, 106 Stat. 73.

636 Pub. L. No. 105-277 § 2242, 1999 U.S. C. C.A.N. (122 Stat. 2681) 872.

637 22 C.F.R. § 95.4 (2001).

638 5 U.S.C. § 704 (2001).

639 Felker v. Turfin, 518 U.S. 561, 1165 S. Ct. 2333 (1996).

640 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2006); M. Cherif Bassiouni, III International Criminal Law: Enforcement (2nd rev. ed. 1999); John Dugard & Christine Van den Wyngaert, Reconciling Extradition with Human Rights, 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 198 (1998).

641 Cornejo-Barretto v. Seifert, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000). See also Chen v. U.S. Marshal (In re Chen), 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir., Sept. 4, 1998), which, however, cites Emami v. United States, 834 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1987) and Arnbjornsdotti-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679 (9th Cir. 1983), which recognized a "humanitarian exception" to the rule of non-inquiry. See also J. Semmelmen, Federal Courts, the Constitution, and the Rule of Non-Inquiry in International Extradition Proceedings, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 1198 (1991).

642 In re Extradition of Atuar, 300 F. Supp. 2d 418, 431 (S.D. W. Va. 2003), 156 Fed. Appx. 555 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. dismissed 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5244 (2006). See, e.g., Mironsecu v. Costner, 345 F. Supp.2d 538 (M.D.N.C. 2004) (reaffirming the rule of non-inquiry in connection with the issue of torture);

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has refused to rule on claims raised by relators that their extradition would result in torture that would violate the United States' obligations under the CAT and domestic U.S. implementing legislation, despite finding such review not barred by the rule of non-inquiry.[643] The most prominent case on this point is Mironescu v. Costner.[644] Pursuant to the United States–Romania extradition treaty, the Romanian government submitted a formal extradition request for the relator, who had been prosecuted and convicted in absentia for various automobile crimes.[645] The relator filed a habeas corpus petition alleging that he faced torture upon his extradition, which triggered the secretary of state's mandatory duty under the CAT and its U.S. implementing legislation not to extradite him.[646] The issue presented on appeal for the Fourth Circuit's resolution was whether the "rule of non-inquiry," combined with the language of the FARR and Administrative Procedure Acts, barred judicial review of the secretary of state's extradition decision.[647]

The Mironescu court provided a succinct overview of the history of the CAT's domestic implementation in the United States through the FARR Act as follows:

> A central issue in this appeal is whether the Secretary's discretion in extradition matters has been constrained by Article 3 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture (CAT), see United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted Dec. 10, 1984, art. 3, 23 I.L.M. 1027, 1028, 1465 U.N.T.S. 85, 114, and § 2242 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act (the FARR Act) of 1998, see Pub.L. No. 105-277, div. G, 112 Stat. 2681-822 (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1231 note). As is relevant here, Article 3 of the CAT provides:
>
> 1. No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003); Buell v. Mitchell, 274 F. 3d 337 (6th Cir. 2001); Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000), later proceeding at, 379 F.3d 1075, vacated, reh'g granted by, 386 F.3d 938, vacated by, 389 F.3d 1307; Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F. Supp. 2d 651, 660 (E.D. Pa. 2005); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y., Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980), cert. denied sub nom., Castillo v. Forsht, 450 U.S. 922, reh'g denied, 451 U.S. 934 (1981). See also Linna v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 995 (1986), reh'g denied, 479 U.S. 1070 (1987) (regarding an allegation that subject of deportation proceedings faced death sentence and absence of due process); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990) (concerning the allegation that extraditee's conviction came under his confederates' coerced confessions and that he faced torture if returned to requesting state); Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856 (1980); cf. Esposito v. Adams, 700 F. Supp. 1470, 1481 (N.D. Ill. 1988).

643 See generally Russell Bikoff, Extradition and the U.N. Convention against Torture: Mironescu v. Costner, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 256–262 (July 2007); Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 24 and accompanying footnotes, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011) ("Thus far, most reviewing courts have found that CAT and its implementing legislation have carved a limited exception to the judicially created rule of non-inquiry. However, the circuits have split on the issue of whether judicial review of CAT-based claims in extradition proceedings has nonetheless been barred by statute").

644 480 F.3d 664 (4th Cir. 2007).

645 Id. at 667.

646 Id. at 668. Although the facts are not elaborated in the Fourth Circuit's opinion, Mironescu was alleged to have supervised a gang of car thieves who sold stolen cars in neighboring Moldova. He was a local Roma leader who had been physically abused by Romanian authorities in the past and claimed the car theft prosecution was a sham. See Bikoff, supra note 643.

647 Id. at 666, 668–669.

> 2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.
>
> 23 I.L.M. at 1028. President Reagan signed the CAT on April 18, 1988. The Senate adopted a resolution of advice and consent to the Convention in 1990 but conditioned that consent on its declaration that "the provisions of Articles 1 through 16 of the Convention are not self-executing." 136 Cong. Rec. S17486-01, S17492 (1990). And, the President ratified the CAT for the United States subject to this same declaration. See Ogbudimkpa v. Ashcroft, 342 F.3d 207, 211–12 & n. 11 (3d Cir.2003) (recounting ratification history of the CAT).
>
> In light of the Senate's determination that the CAT was not self-executing, Congress enacted the FARR Act to implement the treaty. The FARR Act provides that "[i]t shall be the policy of the United States not to expel, extradite, or otherwise effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which there are substantial grounds for believing the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture, regardless of whether the person is physically present in the United States." Section 2242(a). It also directs heads of the appropriate agencies to "prescribe regulations to implement the obligations of the United States under Article 3." Section 2242(b).
>
> The applicable State Department regulations identify the Secretary as "the U.S. official responsible for determining whether to surrender a fugitive to a foreign country by means of extradition." 22 C.F.R. § 95.2(b) (2006). They provide that "to implement the obligation assumed by the United States pursuant to Article 3 of the Convention, the Department considers the question of whether a person facing extradition from the U.S. 'is more likely than not' to be tortured in the State requesting extradition when appropriate in making this determination." Id. They further state that in each case in which there is an allegation relating to torture, "appropriate policy and legal offices [shall] review and analyze information relevant to the case in preparing a recommendation to the Secretary as to whether or not to sign the surrender warrant." 22 C.F.R. § 95.3(a) (2006). And, they provide that "[d]ecisions of the Secretary concerning surrender of fugitives for extradition are matters of executive discretion not subject to judicial review." 22 C.F.R. § 95.4 (2006).[648]

The court began to analyze the rule of non-inquiry by noting that, historically, habeas corpus could not serve as a means of reviewing a commissioner's decision regarding the propriety of holding the accused.[649] The court went on to consider Neely v. Henkel and Glucksman v. Henkel before concluding that "the rule of non-inquiry does not warrant a finding that the district court lacked jurisdiction to review the Secretary's extradition decision on habeas."[650] In reaching this conclusion, the court found its prior decision in Plaster v. United States applicable where, as in Mironescu, evaluation of the executive's decision to extradite is subject to review where it is claimed to be unconstitutional.[651] This is because "although the Executive has unlimited discretion to refuse to extradite a fugitive, it lacks the discretion to extradite a fugitive when extradition would violate his constitutional rights."[652] Further, the court reasoned that no other cases had discussed habeas review involving the alleged violation of a federal statute.[653] In fact, the government in Mironescu case conceded that the FARR Act would have prevented the secretary of state from extraditing the relator were he likely to be tortured in Romania.[654] The court reasoned that the FARR Act also gave habeas petitioners a federal right to particular 648 Mironescu, 480 F.3d 664, 666–667 (4th Cir. 2007) (footnotes omitted).

---

649 Id. at 669 (discussing Oteiza v. Jacobus, 136 U.S. 330, 334 (1890)).

650 Id. at 670.

651 Id. The relator in Plaster filed a writ of habeas corpus claiming that the extradition would violate his due process rights, specifically by violating the terms of an immunity agreement he had reached with the U.S. government.

652 Id. (citing Plaster).

653 Id. at 670–671.

654 Id. at 671.

treatment, which was not the case under the Supreme Court's decision in Neely where constitutional as opposed to federal statutory rights were at issue.[655] The court rejected the government's arguments regarding separation of powers and lack of institutional competence of the judiciary to review the executive's decision. The court reasoned that the limited review it would conduct under the CAT and FARR Act on the issue of torture would not require a court to consider "whether extradition would further our foreign policy interests or, if so, how much to weigh those interests. Rather, it would be required to answer only the straightforward question of whether a fugitive would likely face torture in the requesting country."[656]

However, this conclusion did not end the court's inquiry, and the court ultimately held that the plain language of the FARR Act precluded district court jurisdiction over the relator's claim.[657] The FARR Act provides in § 2242(d) as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and except as provided in the regulations described in subsection (b), . . . nothing in this section shall be construed as providing any court jurisdiction to consider or review claims raised under the Convention or this section, or any other determination made with respect to the application of the policy set forth in subsection (a), except as part of the review of a final order of removal pursuant to section 242 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. § 1252).[658]

Thus, under the plain language of the FARR Act, courts may only consider or review CAT or FARR Act claims in the context of a final removal order in immigration proceedings.[659] This provision of the FARR Act was distinguishable both linguistically and factually from the cases cited by the district court in support of its position that it had jurisdiction to review the secretary of state's decision, particularly as those cases involved challenges to removal as opposed to extradition.[660] The Fourth Circuit indicated a reluctance to reach this decision by inviting Supreme Court review of whether the rule requiring Congress to explicitly mention habeas or § 2241 in order to bar habeas review should apply to the construction of the FARR Act in future cases such as Mironescu's.[661]

However, two subsequent district court cases considering the same issues raised in Mironescu dealt with the relator's habeas corpus petition. In Prasoprat v. Benov, the relator filed a habeas corpus petition challenging the secretary of state's decision to extradite the relator to Thailand where he claimed he would be tortured.[662] The court stated that there was no merit to the government's claim that the rule of non-inquiry and the CAT and FARR Act precluded judicial review, relying on the Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Cornejo-Barreto I to find habeas review appropriate.[663] However, the court denied the habeas petition because any claim of torture was based on outdated media reports, which did not render the secretary of state's determination "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with the law."[664]

---

655 Id.

656 Id. at 672. The court also posited that judicial review and denial of extradition would not have as adverse an effect on foreign relations as if the secretary of state made the decision, and any confidentiality concerns could be resolved through in camera review of the evidence. Id. at 673.

657 Id. at 674, 676.

658 Id. at 674.

659 Id.

660 Id. at 674–677.

661 Id. at 676.

662 Prasoprat v. Benov, 622 F. Supp. 2d 980, 983 (C.D. Cal. 2009).

663 Id. at 984–985.

664 Id. at 987–988.

Similarly, in Garcia v. Benov,[665] the court held that it could review the secretary of state's decision to extradite the relator under the Administrative Procedure Act as the claim was ripe for review following the secretary of state's decision to extradite.[666] Although Garcia v. Benov mentions § 2242 of the FARR Act, the court did not reach the same conclusion as the one in Mironescu did.[667] In this case, because the government provided no administrative record for the court to review, the court concluded that the secretary of state's decision was per se arbitrary and not entitled to deference because the secretary of state could not present any rationale in support of the decision.[668]

In Juarez-Saldana v. United States, the district court followed the reasoning of Mironescu in denying the relator's habeas corpus petition, stating:

> Article 3 of the CAT gives rise to domestically-enforceable rights only to the extent provided by its implementing legislation, the FARR Act. Nothing in the FARR Act or its implementing regulations indicates that Congress intended to create judicial review and silently alter the existing statutory extradition scheme or the rule of non-inquiry. At the time the FARR Act was passed, Congress was certainly aware that the Secretary of State was responsible for determining whether to surrender a fugitive by means of extradition pursuant to statute, and that the rule of non-inquiry limited the scope of judicial review of this determination. Despite this awareness, the FARR Act and its implementing regulations do not contain any language which suggests that these statutory procedures and judicial restraint principles should be superseded for CAT claims. Even after enacting the FARR Act, Congress made no changes to the statutory extradition provisions for cases involving CAT claims. In light of these factors, the Court finds that the jurisdiction provisions of the FARR Act, see § 2242(d), and its implementing regulations, see 22 C.F.R. § 95.4, comport with and preserve the statutory division of labor pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §§ 3184 and 3186 and the rationale supporting the rule of non-inquiry, both of which limit the role of the judiciary in the extradition context.[669]

The Ninth Circuit, in Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert,[670] dealt with a situation in which the relator expressed a fear that his extradition to Mexico would result in his torture at the hands of the Mexican police. This case, which was first decided in 2000, had an unusual procedural history.[671] A three-judge panel reviewed the obligations for the United States arising under the CAT, and then the national implementing legislation pursuant to the FARR and Administrative Procedure Acts.[672] The court reaffirmed the validity of the U.S. national implementing legislation, requiring the judiciary to defer to the executive branch, namely the secretary of state, for a determination of whether a person who has been certified for extradition may risk torture in that country and therefore should not be extradited. However, the Ninth Circuit seems to have been unclear as to its understanding of the respective roles of the judiciary and the executive branch in connection with the potential of torture of a person after extradition. Upon issuing its order granting extradition, the court would stay execution until the matter is referred to the secretary of state by the relator. Ordinarily, once an extradition court finds a

---

665 2009 U.S. Dist. Lexis 115843 (C.D. Cal. 2009).

666 Id. at *10–*16.

667 Id. at *10–*11.

668 Id. at *19.

669 Juarez Saldana v. United States, 700 F. Supp. 2d 953, 960 (W.D. Tenn. 2010) (citing International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (5th ed. 2007)).

670 Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000), later proceeding at 379 F.3d 1075, vacated, reh'g granted by 386 F.3d 938, vacated by 389 F.3d 1307. But see the discussion below on the case's complex history.

671 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000).

672 Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §701 (a), 704 (2000), 22 C.F.R. §95.2 (Supp.); Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1921 § 42, 8 U.S.C.A. § 1231.

person to be extraditable, a petition would be filed by the relator to the secretary of state, who would then rule on the petition, subject to the petitioner's right to challenge the secretary of state's position in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act. The basis for review is whether the secretary of state's decision is found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.[673] This means that the extradition court no longer has any say in respect to the issue of torture, and its jurisdiction is limited to maintaining or staying execution of its order, pending the course of the administrative process.

However, the abovementioned U.S. implementing legislation regarding the CAT does not suspend the Eighth Amendment, which prohibits cruel and unusual punishment, or the Fifth Amendment Right, which guarantees due process. Presumably such issues, which may arise in connection with torture in a foreign country, are still within the province of the U.S. judiciary in connection with extradition matters. It is in the context of an extradition hearing that the extradition judge considers a relator's claim under either or both the Eighth and Fifth Amendments, and in which the rule of non-inquiry arises.

Contrary to this, in Cornejo-Barreto I, the rule of non-inquiry did not arise in connection with the extradition judge deferring to the secretary of state on a claim by the relator arising under the CAT and the national implementing legislation as discussed above.[674] Thus Cornejo-Barreto II, which held that the rule of non-inquiry applied to the extradition judge in connection with the secretary of state's determination, is incorrect.[675] The rule of non-inquiry applies to the judiciary in connection with looking into the laws and practices of a requesting state. In Cornejo-Barreto III, the Ninth Circuit ordered the case to be reheard but also held that:

> Upon the vote of a majority of nonrecused regular active judges of this court, it is ordered that this case be reheard by the en banc court pursuant to Circuit Rule 35-3. The three judge panel opinion shall not be cited as precedent by or to this court or any district court of the Ninth Circuit, except to the extent adopted by the en banc court.[676]

Subsequently, an en banc court of the Ninth Circuit held:

> The government has filed an unopposed motion to dismiss the case as moot. It has also filed a motion for leave to supplement its motion papers, which we grant. We grant the motion to dismiss the appeal as moot.
>
> Given dismissal of the appeal, the parties' stipulated request for an order releasing Cornejo-Barreto pending determination of the motion to dismiss is moot. However, as there is no longer any basis upon which to hold Cornejo-Barreto in custody, the Attorney General and United States Marshall shall immediately release Cornejo-Barreto.
>
> We vacate the panel opinion filed August 16, 2004 and published at 379 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2004) as moot. We deny the government's request to vacate other published opinions in this case. The judgment of the district court entered July 10, 2002, SACV 01-00662 AHS (C.D.Cal. July 10, 2002), is vacated as moot. We remand to the district court with instructions to dismiss the action.
>
> The mandate shall issue forthwith.[677]

---

673 5 U.S.C. § 706, § 95.2 ed. 2d (2000).

674 Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, 218 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Cornejo-Barreto I"). See also Abra Edwards, Cornejo-Barreto Revisited: The Availability of a Writ of Habeas Corpus to Provide Relief from Extradition under the Torture Convention, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 889 (Spring 2003).

675 Cornejo-Barreto v. Siefert, 379 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Cornejo-Barreto II").

676 Id.

677 Cornejo-Barretto v. Siefert, 389 F.3d 1307 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Cornejo-Barreto IV"). See also Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009, 1012 n.1 (9th Cir 2005) (holding that Cornejo-Barreto I is still good law).

In Hoxha v. Levi, the District Court of Pennsylvania held that the State Department has the discretion of review under the CAT. It stated:

> The State Department has enacted regulations, pursuant to the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1231 (2005), aimed at implementing the Convention Against Torture. The clear policy of the United States is "not to expel, extradite, or otherwise effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which there are substantial grounds for believing the person would be in danger of being subject to torture, regardless of whether the person is physically present in the United States." Act of Oct. 21, 1998, Pub.L. No. 105-277, 112 Stat. 2681. The regulations, however, mandate that "the Secretary is the U.S. official responsible for determining whether to surrender a fugitive to a foreign country by means of extradition." 22 C.F.R. § 95.2(b) (2005). In other words, while the judicial branch is charged with deciding whether an individual is extraditable, the decision to extradite the individual rests with the executive branch. Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 789 (9th Cir.1986). It is within the sole discretion of the Secretary of State to refuse to extradite an individual on humanitarian grounds in light of the treatment and consequences that await that individual. Singh, 123 F.R.D. at 130 (citing Quinn, 783 F.2d at 789-90); see also In re Extradition of Chan-Seong-I, 346 F.Supp.2d at 1153-54 ("Whether humanitarian concerns should preclude extradition is an issue committed to the sole discretion of the executive branch, specifically the Secretary of State."). Indeed, regulations are in place for situations when allegations of torture are asserted. In such cases, "appropriate policy and legal offices review and analyze information relevant to the case in preparing a recommendation to the Secretary as to whether or not to sign the surrender warrant." 22 C.F.R. § 95.3(a). Then, the Secretary is charged with surrendering the individual, denying surrender of the individual, or surrendering the individual subject to conditions. 22 C.F.R. § 95.3(b). The Secretary's decision, in this regard, is not subject to judicial review. 22 C.F.R. § 95.4 ("Decisions of the Secretary concerning surrender of fugitives for extradition are matters of executive discretion not subject to judicial review.").[678]

In In re Atuar, the Southern District of West Virginia acknowledged the existence of torture as defined in the CAT.[679] The court held that the CAT is not self-executing,[680] but is dependent in its application on U.S. legislation. It concluded that legislation applies in U.S. courts, namely the provisions of the FARR Act, which removes the determination of torture from the extradition court to the secretary of state.[681] Thus, the rule of non-inquiry is still not overcome even when the record establishes a basis for the existence of torture—a position with which this writer disagrees.[682] The reason is that torture is an international crime and the rule of non-inquiry cannot bar a court from inquiring into the commission of such an illegal act because it does not merit the deference given to states in the exercise of their sovereignty in connection with the administration of justice.[683] Accordingly, the extradition court should have the right to establish the facts, leaving it up to the secretary of state, in accordance with the FARR Act, to decide what to do, particularly as Article 15 of the CAT specifically prohibits extradition of a person to a state where he/she is likely to be tortured.

---

678 Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F.Supp.2d 651, 660 (E.D. Pa. 2005).

679 In re Extradition of Atuar, 300 F. Supp. 2d 418, 431 (S.D.W. Va. 2003), 156 Fed. Appx. 555 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. dismissed 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5244 (2006).

680 Buell v. Mitchell, 274 F. 3d 337 (6th Cir. 2001).

681 Elzbieta Klimowicz, Article 15 of the Torture Convention: Enforcement in U.S. Extradition Proceedings, 15 Geo. Imm. Law. J. 183 (Fall 2000).

682 See, e.g., Mironsecu v. Costner, 345 F. Supp. 2d 538 (M.D.N.C. 2004) (reaffirming the rule of non-inquiry in connection with the issue of torture).

683 See Ch. XI.

As can be seen from this discussion, there is a split in authority among the circuits regarding this issue, with the Fourth and Sixth[684] Circuit Courts of Appeals finding review barred by the FARR Act, and the Third[685] and Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals finding the ability to review the secretary of state's decision notwithstanding the FARR Act. As this split grows, Supreme Court review becomes more likely on this point.

It must be noted in this general context that if evidence is secured by the requesting state on the basis of torture or other grounds deemed in the United States as "cruel and unusual," U.S. courts will neither inquire into the source nor disallow it. In the case of Escobedo v. United States,[686] the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held in 1980 that evidence obtained in Mexico by means of torture would not be excluded in the consideration of "probable cause."[687] However, the "rule of non-inquiry"[688] may become subject to certain exceptions should a U.S. court find the appropriate case that clearly offends its public policy and notions of fairness and civilized justice. Such a case was Rochin v. California,[689] wherein the Court declared that such standards as "shock[] the conscience," "offend[] the sense of justice," "run[] counter to the decencies of civilized conduct," "offend[] the community's sense of fair play and decency in accordance with the traditions and conscience of our people," and are contrary to "the[] canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of English-speaking people." The general standards of fairness, decency, and humane treatment, although they lack formal exactitude and fixity of meaning, are clearly embodied in the Due Process Clause and have been expressed in numerous Supreme Court decisions over the last hundred years.[690] The Court has shifted from a substantive due process "shocks the conscience" standard to an objective Fourth Amendment analysis.[691] In what may be the best approach, an extradition court should take into account an issue of torture under Article 3 of the CAT, which as explained above has been ratified by the United States.

---

684 Tennessee is in the Sixth Federal Circuit. See United States Court Locator, available at http://www.uscourts.gov/court_locator.aspx (last visited Sept. 19, 2011).

685 See Hoxha v. Levi, 465 F.3d 554, 565 (3d Cir. 2006) (finding that although the "APA provides for review of 'final agency action,' " such as extradition decisions, the secretary of state had not yet made a decision to extradite the relator).

686 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980).

687 See Ch. X.

688 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

689 Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952).

690 Id.

691 The substantive due process "shocks the conscience" standard on which the Gumz criteria are based originated in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952). In Rochin, the Supreme Court held that forcing an emetic down a suspect's throat to induce vomiting to obtain evidence from the suspect violated the suspect's right to due process of law. Id. at 166. The Rochin Court found that the police's conduct "shock[ed] the conscience and was 'bound to offend even hardened sensibilities." ' Id. at 172.

At the time the Court decided Rochin, the Court had not yet held that the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule applied to the states. See Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 28–33 (1949) (holding that exclusionary rule did not apply to the states). See also Comment, Excessive Force Claims: Removing the Double Standard, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1369, 1379 (1986). Thus, the Rochin Court used the "shocks the conscience" standard to exclude the evidence obtained by pumping the suspect's stomach. Subsequent to Rochin, the Supreme Court reversed itself, and applied the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule to the states. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). Consequently, the Court has not relied on the Rochin "shocks the conscience" standard but has instead applied a Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis in cases that, like Rochin, involved highly intrusive searches or seizures. In Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 766–772 (1966), the Court held that admitting evidence obtained from a warrantless blood test in a drunk driving trial did not violate the Fourth Amendment. In Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753

The contemporary practice of torture and extraordinary rendition by the United States under the guise of the "war on terrorism" constitutes grounds for denial of extradition.[692] It is obvious that the George W. Bush administration was distrustful of the judiciary in allowing it to determine for extraditability purposes whether a person should not be extradited to another state pursuant to Article 3 of the CAT, preferring instead for the decision to be made by the secretary of state. Considering the record of past administrations in connection with "extraordinary rendition,"[693] it is obvious that the executive branch cannot be entrusted with carrying out the treaty obligations of the United States, in addition to which its decisions may violate the Fifth and Eighth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. As the secretary of state's decision is only narrowly reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act, it places a high burden of proof on the petitioner, and leaves him/her without judicial review. This situation is likely to continue to be the subject of further litigation. The basis for such litigation will be on the applicability of the Fifth and Eighth Amendments of the Constitution, whose protections cannot be circumvented by any legislative legerdemain in the context of an extradition proceeding, or for that matter, in any other context in which a person seeks judicial protection against being extradited, surrendered, or delivered by any means to a state likely to torture that person.

6. The Special Problems of Death Penalty Exclusion[694]

One of the most significant challenges to the international extradition regime is the growing division between states that have abolished the death penalty, which number approximately 140 as of 2012, and those states that maintain the punishment, which number approximately 58, although only approximately a third of retentionist states carried out an execution in 2012.[695] Increasingly abolitionist states are refusing to extradite individuals sought for capital offenses in retentionist states, which is adding a new element to the international practice of extradition, and potentially unsettling the practice for all capital offences.

The historic norm has been for requested states to refrain from analyzing the nature of the proceedings or the treatment and punishment of the individual in the requesting state, as per the (1985), the Court used a Fourth Amendment analysis to hold that a state could not compel a suspect to undergo surgery under a general anesthetic to remove a bullet that could provide evidence of the suspect's guilt or innocence. And in United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985), the Court used a Fourth Amendment analysis to uphold the lengthy detention of a drug smuggler so that officials could examine her feces for drugs.

---

The Court's shift from a substantive due process "shocks the conscience" standard to an objective Fourth Amendment analysis in these cases is most pronounced in Lee and Montoya. In Lee, the Court mentioned Rochin only in passing, in a footnote. See Lee, 470 U.S. at 762 n. 5. In Montoya, the Court did not even mention Rochin. Schmerber, Lee, and Montoya all suggest that the Supreme Court today would not employ a "shocks the conscience" test in Rochin but would decide the case on Fourth Amendment grounds. See Comment, supra at 1378–1379.

See Lester v. City of Chicago, 830 F.2d 706, 710–711 (7th Cir. 1987) (parallel citations omitted). See also Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78, 102 (1908), overruled by Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes 316–324 (1969); Edward S. Corwin, The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law (1965); Edward S. Corwin, The Constitution and What It Means Today (14th ed. 1948).

692 See Leila N. Sadat, Ghost Prisoners and Black Sites: Extraordinary Rendition under International Law, Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. (2006). See also Ch. V.

693 See Ch. V.

694 See also Ch. VII, Sec. 6.11.

695 Of the abolitionist states, ninety-seven have abolished the death penalty for all crimes, eight for ordinary crimes, and thirty-five are "abolitionist in practice" meaning that they have not carried out an execution in the last ten years. Amnesty International, Death Sentences and Executions 2012, at 51 (2012).

doctrine of non-inquiry.[696] There have been some exceptions to this norm, in particular the political offense exception[697] and grounds relating to the charges themselves, namely fair trial rights.[698] More recently human rights issues such as the treatment and punishment of the relator have served to block extraditions,[699] and since the early 1980s the death penalty, especially by European states.

The lawfulness of the transfer of individuals from European states to the United States first came under scrutiny in the early 1980s, when the death penalty was scaled back on a European level after the adoption of Protocol 6[700] to the ECHR in 1982,[701] which abolished the practice in peacetime. Twenty years later Protocol 13 abolished the punishment at all times, whether in times of peace or war.[702] Given the expanding protections afforded individuals under Protocol 6, requesting states were required to give assurances to European states to the effect that the individual sought for extradition would not be exposed to the death penalty. The nature and form of assurances in death penalty cases needed to be fine-tuned, however, and a series of important cases were brought before the European Commission and European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) to resolve the essential components of assurances, in particular with respect to the system of government in the requesting states—in particular U.S. federalism, and the powers reserved to state and local prosecutors and courts—and the effectiveness of the assurance in light of constitutional limitations on the authority of the government entity giving the assurance.

The first landmark case before the ECtHR was Kirwood, in which a U.S. citizen living in the United Kingdom was sought for prosecution in California for a double murder.[703] In that case the U.S. government provided assurances that Kirkwood would not be subjected to the death

---

696 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

697 See supra Sec. 2.1.

698 See supra Sec. 4.

699 See supra Sec. 5.

700 Protocol No. 6 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the abolition of the death penalty, June 28, 1983, E.T.S. 114. There are foty-six state-parties to Protocol 6, namely: Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Russia has signed but not ratified the Protocol; however, Amnesty International considers Russia to be abolitionist in practice.

701 European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, opened for signature Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221. The text of the Convention had been amended according to the provisions of Protocol No. 3 (ETS No. 45) (entered into force Sept. 21, 1970), Protocol No. 5 (ETS No. 55) (entered into force on December 20, 1971), Protocol No. 8 (ETS No. 118) (entered into force Jan. 1. 1990), Protocol No. 2 (ETS No. 44) (Sept. 21, 1970), Protocol No. 11 (ETS No. 155) (entered into force Nov. 1, 1998). For the European Convention's provisions on cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment, see European Convention, supra at Art. 3.

702 Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, concerning the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances, May 3, 2002, E.T.S. 187. There are forty-three state- parties to Protocol 13, namely: Albania, Andorra, Austria, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Armenia and Poland have signed but not ratified the Protocol; however, Amnesty International considers both to be abolitionist in practice.

703 For a detailed analysis of the case, see Ch. VII, Secs. 6.11 and 7.

penalty. Kirkwood, however, challenged his extradition before the European Commission on the grounds that the long delays in carrying out the death penalty would result in his developing "death row syndrome," which in turn would constitute cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment in violation of Article 3 of the ECHR.[704] Although the European Commission acknowledged the merits of the Kirkwood's argument about death row syndrome, it failed to find a violation of the ECHR, due to the assurances provided by the U.S. government. On that basis his extradition to the United States was approved.[705] The matter was complicated, however, by the fact that the U.S. government had failed to secure assurances from the District Attorney in San Francisco, who had the absolute authority under California law to determine whether to pursue the death penalty, and in fact had made the determination to do so under California's dual track prosecution system for capital punishment.[706] The failure of the U.S. government to secure assurances from the San Francisco District Attorney rendered the assurance a dead letter without any effect. Eventually the prosecution withdrew its pursuit of the death penalty for reasons other than the assurance, thus preserving the concerns of European states.

Due to the failure of the U.S. government's assurance in the Kirkwood case the issue inevitably arose again when the United States sought the extradition from the United Kingdom of Jens Soering, a German citizen who was accused of double murder in Virginia. This time the U.S. government secured an assurance from the Virginia prosecutor that the death penalty would not apply, but Soering argued before the U.K. courts that the assurances were insufficient to ensure his rights. Although the U.K. divisional court rejected his argument,[707] the ECtHR recognized that an extradition without sufficient assurances against the imposition of the death penalty would violate the ECHR.[708] In particular, the court concluded that:

> 69. Relations between the United Kingdom and the United States of America on matters concerning extradition are conducted by and with the Federal and not the State authorities. However, in respect of offences against State laws the Federal authorities have no legally binding power to provide, in an appropriate extradition case, an assurance that the death penalty will not be imposed or carried out. In such cases the power rests with the State. If a State does decide to give a promise in relation to the death penalty, the United States Government has the power to give an assurance to the extraditing Government that the State's promise will be honoured.
>
> According to evidence from the Virginia authorities, Virginia's capital sentencing procedure and notably the provision on post-sentencing reports (see paragraph 47 above) would allow the sentencing judge to consider the representation to be made on behalf of the United Kingdom Government pursuant to the assurance given by the Attorney for Bedford County (see paragraph 20 above). In addition, it would be open to the Governor to take into account the wishes of the United Kingdom Government in any application for clemency (see paragraph 60 above).

---

704 Kirkwood v. United Kingdom, App. No. 10479/83, 37 Eur. Comm'n H.R. Dec. & Rep. 158, 190 (1984) (holding that applicant failed to show that rights guaranteed by Article 3 would be grossly violated by requesting nation).

705 See Regina v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. ex parte Kirkwood, [1984] EWHC (QB) 913, (1984) 1 W.L.R. 913 (Eng.).

706 People v. Kirkwood, San Francisco Superior Court, No. 115353 (1987).

707 In re Soering, 1988 Crim. L. Rev. 307. See also Stephan Breitenmoser & Gunter E. Wilms, Human Rights v. Extradition: The Soering Case, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (1990); David L. Gappa, European Court of Human Rights—Extradition—Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Soering Case*, 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Ser. A) (1989)*, 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 463 (1990); James M. Lenihan, Soering's Case: Waiting for Godot—Cruel and Unusual Punishment?, 4 Pace Y.B. Int'l L. 157 (1992); Michael P. Shea, Expanding Judicial Scrutiny of Human Rights in Extradition Cases after Soering, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 85 (1992).

708 Soering v. United Kingdom, 161 EUR. CT. H.R. (ser.A) (1989).

The court ultimately determined that "the assurance received from the United States must at the very least significantly reduce the risk of a capital sentence either being imposed or carried out.[709](emphasis added by author)

Ten years later, in Einhorn v. France,[710] the ECtHR affirmed the extradition of Ira Einhorn, a U.S. citizen, from France to the United States, noting that > it is clear from the affidavits sworn by the District Attorney, Ms Abraham, on 23 June 1997 and 10 June 1998 (see paragraph 12 above) that the prosecution will not seek the death penalty in respect of the applicant and that the trial court will be unable to impose the death penalty of its own motion. Ms Abraham states that the affidavit sworn by her in her capacity as District Attorney is binding on her, on all her successors in that post and on any other prosecutors who might deal with the case; that statement is confirmed by the diplomatic notes from the United States embassy. Secondly, the diplomatic note of 2 July 1998 from the United States embassy expressly states that "if the Government of France extradites Ira Einhorn to the United States to stand trial for murder in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the death penalty will not be sought, imposed or executed against Ira Einhorn for this offense."

>
> Consequently, the Court notes that the circumstances of the case and the assurances obtained by the Government are such as to remove the danger of the applicant's being sentenced to death in Pennsylvania. Since, in addition, the decree of 24 July 2000 granting the applicant's extradition expressly provides that "the death penalty may not be sought, imposed or carried out in respect of Ira Samuel Einhorn," the Court considers that the applicant is not exposed to a serious risk of treatment or punishment prohibited under Article 3 of the Convention on account of his extradition to the United States.[711]

During the decade between the Soering and Einhorn judgments the ECtHR thus moved from requiring that assurances "significantly reduce" the risk of the application of the death penalty to requiring that they "remove the danger" of the penalty's application. The trend of the ECtHR is clearly toward the tighter enforcement of assurances. In some cases the Court has rejected them as being unable to guarantee the applicant's rights under the ECHR. In Bader and Kanbor v. Sweden, for instance, the ECtHR determined that as the applicant had been sentenced to death in absentia, his extradition to Syria would constitute a violation of the European Convention due to the "real risk of being executed and subjected to treatment contrary to Articles 2 and 3 if deported to his home country."[712] In Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, the Court ruled that if "there were serious and well-founded reasons for believing that extradition would expose the applicants to a real risk of extra-judicial execution" a violation of the ECHR would ensue.[713]

The tightening of guarantees in assurances has also been visible in domestic proceedings. In Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others, the South African Constitutional Court ruled that the South African government had violated its duties when deporting an individual to the United States for prosecution related to the 1998 bombing of the U.S. embassy in Dar es Salaam, holding that:

> In handing Mohamed over to the United States without securing an assurance that he would not be sentenced to death, the immigration authorities failed to give any value to Mohamed's 709 Soering v. United Kingdom, at ¶ 93 (emphasis added).

710 Case of Einhorn v. France, Final Decision on Admissability, App. no. 71555/01 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Oct. 16, 2001).

711 Id. at ¶ 26 (emphasis added)

712 Case of Bader and Kanbor v. Sweden, App. no. 13284/04 (Eur. Ct. H.R., Feb. 8, 2006).

713 Id. at ¶¶ 371–372 (emphasis added).

> right to life, his right to have his human dignity respected and protected and his right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment.[714]

In 2011 the South African Constitutional Court again took up the matter in Minister of Home Affairs and Others v Tsebe and Others, ruling that under the South African Constitution:

> the Government is under an obligation not to deport or extradite Mr Phale or in any way to transfer him from South Africa to Botswana to stand trial for the alleged murder in the absence of the requisite assurance. Should the Government deport or extradite Mr Phale without the requisite assurance, it would be acting in breach of its obligations in terms of section 7(2), the values of the Constitution and Mr Phale's right to life, right to human dignity and right not to be subjected to treatment or punishment that is cruel, inhuman or degrading. In my view no grounds exist upon which the judgment of the High Court can be faulted.[715]

The Constitutional Court also proposed that, if the requesting state, Botswana, was unable or unwilling to give the requisite assurance, the South African government could adopt laws with extraterritorial provisions in order to prosecute individuals where extradition is impossible. To this end, the Court noted that > if South Africa could pass legislation to give its courts jurisdiction to try crimes which have been committed outside South Africa, there is no reason why similar legislation cannot or should not be put in place to ensure that persons in Mr Tsebe's and Mr Phale's position can be tried by the South African courts when countries in which they allegedly committed the crimes are not prepared to give the requisite assurance.[716]

In United States v. Burns the Supreme Court of Canada also reversed its earlier rulings on assurances, and also rejected extradition without assurances, holding that

> When principles of fundamental justice as established and understood in Canada are applied to these factual developments, many of which are of far-reaching importance in death penalty cases, a balance which tilted in favour of extradition without assurances in Kindler and Ng now tilts against the constitutionality of such an outcome.[717]

Perhaps the most important case in respect to assurances is the decision of the Italian Constitutional Court in Venezia v. Ministero de Grazia e Giustizia.[718] In Venezia the Italian Constitutional Court rejected an assurance, holding that they could not satisfy the protections afforded individuals by the Italian Constitution as the executive branch of the requesting state is unable in any circumstance to provide an assurance given the separation of powers and the independence of the judiciary in requesting states.

Given the increasing rigor with which domestic courts and the ECtHR are approaching the issue of assurances in death penalty cases it is not unforeseeable that the Italian Constitutional Court decision in Venezia will be followed by other jurisdictions. The trend is clearly in that 714 Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others, 2001 SA 893 at para. 49 (S. Afr.).

---

715 Minister of Home Affairs and Others v Tsebe and Others, Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Another v Tsebe and Others, 2012 SA 467 at para. 74 (S. Afr.).

716 Id. at Para. 61.

717 United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283 at para. 144 (Can.).

718 Venezia v. Ministero di Grazia e Giustizia, Corte cost., sentenza 223/96, June 27, 1996, n. 223, 79 Rivista di Diritto Internazionale 825 (1996). Venezia was subsequently tried in Italy for the crime for which he was requested in the United States and convicted thereof. Recently, a similar case involving a request by the United States of the state of Connecticut followed the same approach. See Giulaino Vassali, Pena Di Morte E Richiesta Di Estradizione Quando Il Ministero Scavalca la Consulta, 22 Diritto E Giustizia 76 (June 2006). See also William A. Schabas, Indirect Abolition: Capital Punishment's Role in Extradition Law and Practice, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 581 (2003).

direction, and it is likely that in the future only those eighteen U.S. states,[719] as well as Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia, that have abolished the death penalty will be able to secure the extradition of individuals from foreign abolitionist states. Conversely, it seems likely the other thirty-two retentionist states may in the future find themselves unable to secure the extradition of individuals for trial from abolitionist states.

It should be noted that all of the recorded cases that have arisen in the United States, irrespective of whether the U.S. government is the requested or requesting state, have always been with counterpart states that have employed a form of the death penalty that has not been found to violate the "cruel and unusual punishment" clause of the Eighth Amendment. The same applies with respect to the modes relied upon by states within the United States in carrying out the death penalty. There has, however, been significant debate within the United States, as well as much state and federal litigation, on the issue of what type or mode of execution would constitute a violation of the "Cruel and Unusual" Punishment Clause of the Eighth Amendment.[720] There has also has been significant litigation over the conditions preceding the carrying out of the death penalty, particularly the long delays, referred to as "death penalty syndrome."[721]

---

719 Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

720 The U.S. Supreme Court first dealt with the issue of the death penalty in Wilkerson v. Utah, in which the Court affirmed the use of a firing squad. Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130 (1878). In that case, the Supreme Court held that "Difficulty would attend the effort to define with exactness the extent of the constitutional provision which provides that cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted; but it is safe to affirm that punishments of torture, such as those mentioned by the commentator referred to, and all others in the same line of unnecessary cruelty, are forbidden by that amendment to the Constitution." Id. at 135–136. In arriving at this line the Court considered disapprovingly "where the prisoner was drawn or dragged to the place of execution, in treason; or where he was emboweled alive, beheaded, and quartered, in high treason. Mention is also made of public dissection in murder, and burning alive in treason committed by a female." Id. at 135. In In re Kemmler the Supreme Court affirmed the use of the electric chair, noting that "Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel within the meaning of that word as used in the constitution. It implies there something inhuman and barbarous,- something more than the mere extinguishment of life." In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 447 (1890). In 1947 the Supreme Court held that it was not cruel and unusual when a prisoner was not killed be electrocution after the first attempt failed due to a mechanical failure. See Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459 (1947). A number of cases have affirmed the use of the electric chair since. See Spinkellink v. Wainwright, 578 F.2d 582, 616 (5th Cir. 1978); Williams v. Hopkins, 983 F. Supp. 891, 895 (D. Neb. 1997); Hamblen v. Dugger, 748 F. Supp. 1498, 1503 (M.D. Fla. 1990). The Nevada Supreme Court, however, found the punishment unconstitutional in State v. Mata, 745 N.W.2d 229 (2008).

The U.S. Supreme Court found the death penalty to constitute cruel and unusual punishment in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). Four years later the Supreme Court reversed its finding and determined that the death penalty is permissible under the Eighth Amendment. See Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976). The Supreme Court has, however, progressively limited the application of the death penalty for certain categories of crimes. In 1977 the Court rejected the punishment for rape, see Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977); in 2002 it struck down the punishment for the mentally handicapped, see Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002); in 2005 it did the same for individuals who committed the crime while under the age of eighteen, see Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005); and finally in 2008 it struck down the punishment for the rape of a child, see Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407 (2008).

721 The Supreme Court addressed the "death row phenomenon" in Solesbee v. Balcom, where it recognized that inmates may go insane. See 339 U.S. 9 (1950).

United States courts and the U.S. government have so far not confronted issues involving certain usages of the death penalty by foreign states that could potentially request the extradition of individuals. This would include a number of states that apply various punishments in accordance with Islamic law, including stoning as a means of execution for adultery,[722] and beheading.[723] According to Professor Babcock, Iran also prescribes dropping an individual from an unknown height as a form of capital punishment. This form of punishment cannot be verified by this writer, but the punishment is clearly not provided for in Islamic law.[724] The other known forms of capital punishment are shooting by firing squad, shooting, lethal injection, gas chamber, and electrocution, all of which have been accepted by U.S. courts and are presumptively constitutional, notwithstanding particular limitations in state courts. It should be noted that under the sharīʿā, an individual may be punished in a number of ways beyond those identified above. The sharīʿā provides for a category of crimes known as qiṣāṣ, which can be roughly translated as equivalence, and provides for the punishment of an individual by the same means or ends by which he harmed the victim unless the victim or his/her heirs accept compensation.[725] For instance, in 2013 Saudi Arabia sentenced an individual to be paralyzed after he was convicted of having paralyzed his victim.[726] In Iran a well-publicized acid attack on a woman resulted in a sentence of blinding by acid, but an eleventh hour "pardon" by the victim resulted in the non-application of the punishment.[727] Other qiṣāṣ crimes may prompt any number of possible punishments, potentially including the dropping-from-height sentence imposed by Iran that Professor Babcock cited.

Should a state that preserves capital punishments such as stoning or beheading, or would inflict a punishment of paralyzation or blinding for qiṣāṣ crimes, request the extradition of any individual from the United States who would be subject to these punishments, the United States would clearly have the obligation to refuse extradition under both the Eighth Amendment's "cruel and unusual punishment" clause and the CAT, which also forbids "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."[728] The question would arise in these cases if the United States could obtain assurances from such a requesting state that another method of execution would be used instead of stoning or beheading. It is the opinion of this writer that in these cases, for principled and symbolic reasons, U.S. courts should follow the precedent established by the Italian Constitutional Court in the Venezia case and refuse extradition, irrespective of any assurances from the requesting state. There would also be a very pragmatic reason for this denial, namely that the United States would not be able to enforce diplomatic assurances where these punishments are mandatory under the requesting states' laws.

---

722 Stoning is the sanctioned punishment for adultery in Indonesia, Iran, Mauritania, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen. See Methods of Execution, Death Penalty Worldwide, available at http://www.deathpenaltyworldwide.org/methods-of-execution.cfm (last visited August 17, 2013)

723 Beheading is a sanctioned form of execution in Benin, Republic of the Congo, Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen. Id.

724 Id.

725 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sharīʿā and Islamic Criminal Law in Time of Peace and War (forthcoming 2013). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Death as a Penalty in the Shari'a, in The Death Penalty: Condemned 65 (International Commission of Jurists, 2000).

726 Emily Alpert, Saudi Arabia's Punishment by Paralysis Condemned as "Grotesque," L.A. Times, Apr. 4, 2013, available at http://www.latimes.com/news/world/worldnow/la-fg-wn-saudi-arabia-paralysis-sentence-20130404,0,2990292.story.

727 Saeed Kamali Dehghan, Iranian Woman Blinded by Acid Attack Pardons Assailant as He Faces Same Fate, Guardian, July 31, 2011, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2011/jul/31/iran-acid-woman-pardons-attacker.

728 Convention against Torture, supra note 8.

Chapter IX

Pretrial Proceedings

Contents

1. Sources and Content of Procedural Rules: Some Comparative Aspects

In almost all countries procedural rules in extradition proceedings emanate from one or a combination of the following three sources: (1) treaties, whether multilateral or bilateral;[1] (2) specific (extradition) legislation; or (3) general criminal law and procedure legislation. Multilateral and bilateral treaties are the most characteristic sources, as extradition is mostly regulated through such international agreements. However, treaties seldom prescribe domestic procedural rules. Consequently, many states have enacted specific legislation relating to extradition procedure. In the United States, where extradition treaties are deemed self-executing, the United States Code directs the judicial officer (either a U.S. magistrate or a federal district court judge) and the secretary of state to act according to the stipulations of the applicable treaty or convention.[2] By comparison, in the United Kingdom, where treaties are not self-executing but require implementing legislation (required in all cases where private rights may be created or affected), the provisions of the applicable treaty are incorporated into law. A legislative Act is then applied to each new treaty by means of an Order-in-Council, which recites the terms of the treaty and is subject to the limitations and qualifications contained in each new treaty.[3] In the United Kingdom, if the scope of the treaty is broader than national law, the latter prevails, while conversely in the United States treaty provisions supersede national law. The reason for this divergence in these two common law systems is that the U.S. Constitution provides for the supremacy of treaties, while the United Kingdom has no written constitution and such matters are regulated by the Parliament.

In countries where extradition is granted on the basis of reciprocity or comity, national extradition law applies. Such is the case under the French Law of 1927, which provides that "in the absence of a treaty, the conditions, the procedure and the effects of extradition are determined by the provisions of the present law. The present law applies as well to matters which are not regulated by treaties."[4]

The contemporary treaty practice of most states, including the United States, provides that national law sets forth the conditions under which extradition proceedings are to be conducted in the absence of a superseding treaty provision.[5]

Treaties and specific legislation supersede other laws.[6] Where they do not provide absolute clarity or guidance, courts resort to laws applicable to criminal proceedings to fill gaps and aid in judicial interpretation. This approach to judicial interpretation is more prevalent in common law countries than in other legal systems.

---

1 See Ch. I for a discussion of multilateral and bilateral extradition treaties. See Ch. II for a discussion of U.S. treaty practice.

2 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 (2000); infra Sec. 2 (discussing U.S. procedure).

3 See for example the 2003 Extradition Act, available at http://www.opsi.gov.uk/acts/acts2003/20030041.html; Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition (1995); Regina v. Wilson, [1877] 3 Q.B. 42 (Eng.); V.E. Hartley-Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure (1980).

4 Law of March 10, 1927, art. 1, reprinted in Harvard Draft Research in International Law, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 117, 380 (1935) [hereinafter Harvard Draft]. See also Christopher Blakesley, Extradition between France and the United States: An Exercise in Comparative and International Law, 13 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 653 (1980). For two early classics, see André Billot, Traité de L'Extradition (1874); John B. Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition (Boston, Boston Book Co., 1891) [hereinafter Moore, Extradition].

5 The European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, Europ. T.S. No. 24, 597 U.N.T.S. 338, states in Article 22 that "[e]xcept where this Convention provides, the procedure with regard to extradition and provisional arrest shall be governed solely by the law of the requested Party."

6 In the United States, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure on admissibility of evidence are inapplicable to extradition proceedings.

In the United States, international extradition proceedings (as opposed to interstate rendition)[7] are regulated by federal statute, namely 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196. Treaties whose provisions differ prevail over the applicable statute.[8] It must be noted that in the United States, because treaties prevail over national legislation, whether these be specific or general, and because treaties vary with respect to procedural norms, federal jurisprudence is not uniform in extradition proceedings. Extradition judges may also resort to federal and state law with respect to certain specific issues such as ascertaining dual criminality.[9]

Treaties may designate the competent national authority, such as the Department of State or the Attorney General, to handle extradition matters. The requested state determines whether under its laws all questions concerned with extradition procedures should be dealt with at the executive level or whether they should be assigned exclusively or partially to the judiciary. A standard practice is to use diplomatic channels in the presentation of the request and the supporting documents and for other communications between the respective states. Increasingly, however, states communicate through their respective ministries of justice or equivalent agencies.

In most states the judiciary is entrusted with the legal determination of extraditability.[10] However, because extradition involves a state's foreign relations, the ultimate decision of surrender is left with the executive branch.[11] Until the nineteenth century extradition in most countries was entirely in the prerogative of the executive. France, for example, surrendered fugitive criminals under its treaties without any reference to the courts until 1875. Great Britain followed a similar practice by granting to the king the prerogative of expelling aliens regardless of any treaty requirements,[12] a process that was used until 1815.[13] In the United States, judicial review of executive discretion was developed through case law from 1799 until the enactment of the Extradition Act of 1848.[14] In 1842, Great Britain and the United States entered into the Webster–Ashburton Treaty, which committed them to provide a judicial hearing as part of the extradition process.[15] Belgium, in 1833, was the first state to introduce judicial control in extradition proceedings, requiring all extradition cases to be submitted to judicial consideration; it did not, however, make the judicial determination binding on the executive, as the executive could disregard the judiciary's determination.[16]

---

7 The U.S. federal system is predicated on the sovereignty of the states comprising the Union. See U.S. Constitution. Therefore, each state and the federal government that seeks the surrender of a person must go through inter-state rendition procedures. See U.S. Constitution Art. 4, Sec. 2 and 18 U.S.C. § 3182.

8 Miner v. Atlass, 363 U.S. 641, 650 (1960).

9 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

10 See infra Sec. 4.

11 See infra Sec. 3. See also Ch. XI for a discussion of executive discretion in international extradition practice.

12 See Mure v. Kaye, 4 Taunt. 34 (1811); East India Company v. Campbell, 1 Ves. Sen. 246 (1749). See also Hartley-Booth, supra note 3; Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition and Rendition in the United Kingdom, 6 Brit. Dig. Int'l L. 643 (1965); Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition in British Practice 1174–1794, 13 Ind. Y.B. Int'l Aff. 80 (1964). See generally 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries 366.

13 Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Oct. 4, 1815, in 2 Arnold McNair, International Law Opinions 44 (1956).

14 See Act of August 12, 1848, ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302, 303; Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540 (1840); In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas. 232 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1847) (No. 9,511); In re Sheazle, 29 F. Cas. 1214 (C.C.D. Mass. 1845) (No. 12,734); United States v. Davis, 25 F. Cas. 786 (C.C.D. Mass. 1837) (No. 14,932); Ex parte Dos Santos, 7 F. Cas. 949 (C.C.D. Va. 1835) (No. 4,016); United States v. Robbins, 27 F. Cas. 825 (C.C.D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175); Commonwealth ex rel. Short v. Deacon, 10 Serg. & Rawle 125 (Pa. 1823); In re Washburn, 4 Johns. Ch. 106 (N.Y. Ch. 1819). See also Ch. II, Sec. 1.

15 8 Stat. 572, T.S. No. 119, 12 Bevans 82.

16 In re Rozzoni, 24 I.L.R. 506 (Cass. 1957) (Belg.).

Judicial control assumed a different role in the Anglo-American system, though the executive retained the discretionary power to deny a judicially authorized extradition. This approach was first adopted by Great Britain in legislation implementing the treaties of 1842 and 1848,[17] and by the United States in its first extradition statute of 1848.[18]

France, which had adopted the Belgian judicial advisory systems in 1875, changed its position under its Ordinance of 1927 to judicial control somewhat similar to the Anglo-American patterns.[19] Other states adopted various formulas, some allowing the judiciary to impose conditions and limits on extradition. In the United States only the executive can impose specific conditions, but a judicial decision establishes the basis for the "principle of specialty,"[20] whereby the requesting state can prosecute the relator only for the specific offense for which he/she was extradited.

Since the 1950s Germany has stood at the opposite end of the spectrum by assigning exclusive competence in all extradition matters to its judicial authorities.[21] Although the fugitive is deprived of a last resort appeal to the executive—a feature of the Anglo-American systems—it is nonetheless true that German law since 1949 offers a wide scope of judicial inquiry.[22]

In civil law systems, extradition is a tool of judicial cooperation in penal matters such that the authorities do not even make a prima facie inquiry into the issue of guilt. In the common law systems, on the other hand, the use of judicial processes must meet certain judicial standards such as "probable cause." In the United States and for the United Kingdom and most Commonwealth countries that standard is "prima facie."[23]

The contrast between the two types of systems can be seen through the following two decisions of the United States and Switzerland. The Supreme Court of the United States held in Benson v. McMahon that the test as to whether such evidence of criminality has been presented is the same as that:

> of those preliminary examinations which take place every day in this country before an examining or committing magistrate for the purpose of determining whether a case is made out which will justify the holding of the accused, either by imprisonment or under bail, to ultimately answer to an indictment, or other proceeding, in which he shall be finally tried upon the charge made against him.[24]

This is in essence the same as the test of whether there is "probable cause" to believe that an offense has been committed, and that the relator is the person who committed it.[25]

---

17 6 & 7 Vict., Chs. 75, 76. See also 33 and 34 Vict., Ch. 52.

18 Act of August 12, 1848. See also In re Stupp, 23 F. Cas. 281 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1873); 1 Moore Extradition, supra note 4, at 551–556.

19 See Jean Claude Lombois, Droit Pénal International 576 (2d ed. 1979).

20 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

21 See Extradition Law of December 23, 1929, Reichsgesetzblatt 1 Teil, 1, 1929, S. 239, reprinted in Harvard Draft, supra note 4, at 385–392.

22 See Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany, 1949, art. 16(2); Extradition (Yugoslav Refugee in Germany) Case, 28 I.L.R. 347 (BGH 1959) (F.R.G.). For extradition and other modalities on interstate cooperation on penal matters, see Otto Lagodny, Die Rechtsstellung des Auszuliefernden in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (1998); Theo Vögler, Auslieferungsrecht und Grundgesetz (1970); Theo Vögler & Peter Wilkitzki, Gesetz Über die Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (Irg) Kommentar (1992); Wolfgang Schomburg & Otto Lagodny, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (5d. ed. 2012).

23 See Ch. X, Sec. 4.

24 Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 462–463 (1888).

25 See Ch. X, Sec. 4.

Compare this with the extradition of an individual named Wyrobnik from Germany to France. In that case the Federal Republic of Germany sought the extradition from Switzerland of a Polish national charged with the crime of forgery; the accused contended that the offense fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of American occupation authorities and that Germany was not competent to seek extradition. The Swiss Federal Tribunal stated:

> It is for the Federal Council to decide whether a request for extradition complies in form with the requirements of treaty or law. The Federal Tribunal, therefore, does not have to deal with the question whether the present request has been made by the competent authority or whether the warrant attached to it was issued by a competent organ. Similarly, it is not for the Federal Tribunal to examine whether the court before which the person extradited is to be tried has jurisdiction under the law of the requesting State; the only argument which could be taken into consideration would be that the court was a tribunal with special powers (Ausnahmegericht) . . . [Extradition for trial by a special court being prohibited by Swiss law.] The Federal Tribunal is also not competent to decide the question of guilt. Extradition is granted on the basis of the facts alleged in the indictment attached to the request for extradition . . . .[26]

Civil law–inspired systems such as Switzerland do not inquire into the issue of "probable cause," and accept the formal requisitions as prima facie evidence sufficient to grant extradition without more than the fulfillment of those formal obligations embodied in the treaty. This is usually limited to:

1. Proof of identity of the relator; and
2. Conformity of the requisition to treaty requirements.

Proof of such requirements is found in the requisition and accompanying documents, such as the indictment or its counterpart charging document, or a court's validated judgment. The substantive content of these documents is not subject to review by the authorities of the requested state. But defenses, exclusions, and exemptions found in the treaty or national legislation apply.[27] Furthermore all member states of the Council of Europe are bound by the provisions of the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), as well as its fifteen Protocols for those states who have ratified some or all of them.[28]

The contemporary trend in Europe is to develop specialized legislation on extradition as part of an integrated approach for all forms of judicial assistance and mutual cooperation in penal matters. Switzerland, Austria, and the Federal Republic of Germany have enacted such integrated legislation covering all aspects of international cooperation in penal matters.[29]

---

26 In re Wyrobnik, 19 I.L.R. 379 (Federal Tribunal 1952) (Switz.). For Swiss extradition law and practice, see Hans Schultz, Das Schweizerische Auslieferungrecht (1953).

27 See Ch. VIII.

28 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.4.1 for a detailed discussion of the death penalty. Protocol 6 of the ECHR abolished the death penalty in times of peace after it came into effect in 1985. Protocol 13 of the ECHR abolished the death penalty in all circumstances after it came into effect in 2003. Of the members of the Council of Europe, only Russia has failed to ratify Protocol 6, but has not executed individuals since 1996 and is abolitionist in practice. With regard to Protocol 13, Armenia and Poland have signed the Protocol but failed to ratify it, while Azerbaijan and Russia have failed to sign or ratify the Protocol. Belarus is the only state in Europe that retains the death penalty.

29 There are a number of European Conventions on inter-state cooperation in penal matters, and the Council of Europe is considering their integration in a single test. For a complete list of Council of Europe treaties, see http://www.conventions.coe.int/Treaty/Commun/ListeTraites.asp?CM=8&CL=ENG. See also Schomburg & Lagodny, supra note 22; Gert Vermeulen, Tom Vander Beken, Laurens Van Puyenbroeck & Sara Van Malderen, Availability of Law Enforcement Information in the European Union: Between Mutual Recognition and Equivalent Right of Access (2005); Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni, The European Conventions on Inter-State

In addition to the multilateral treaty approach of the Council of Europe, the European Union has eschewed the cooperation model in favor of the judicial space model whereby on the basis of the Lisbon[30] and Schengen[31] agreements, the Commission has the power to adopt Directives and has done so in connection with the European Arrest Warrant,[32] which regulates not only substantive but procedural matters.[33]

It should also be noted that the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations,[34] although not specifically addressing extradition, has a provision requiring states to notify the embassy or consulate when one of that state's nationals has been arrested, which applies also to an arrest for extradition.[35]

In most other countries of the world, the extradition process involves the executive and judicial branches of government. At the executive level, it includes the ministries of foreign affairs, justice, and the interior, and at the judicial level it can also include those administrative functions of the ministry of justice. As a result, extradition goes through different official layers, which may cause confusion and delays. For example, in court proceedings in the United States, the Department of Justice may represent that the responsible person in the ministry of justice of the requesting state is the "appropriate legal authority" (as usually described in a treaty), but that person may only have this qualification with respect to sending or receiving communications to and from a foreign country, and lack the authority to grant substantive legal requests, which only the judicially competent court of the requesting state can do. If the court in the requested state does not inquire into such representations the relator's rights may be violated, particularly where there is collusion between the functionaries of the two ministries of justice who are seeking to expedite the process. The same problems arise in connection with certain representations.[36]

Cooperation in Penal Matters (2d rev. ed. 1993). See also, e.g.. M. Cherif Bassiouni, 2 International Criminal Law (2d rev. ed. 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni 2 ICL].

30 Treaty of Lisbon amending the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, signed at Lisbon, December 13, 2007, 2007/C 306/01.

31 Schengen Agreement of June 14, 1985.

32 Council Framework Decision of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states, July 18, 2002, 2002/584/JHA. See Ch. I, Sec. 5.1.

33 See Ch. I, Sec. 5.1.

34 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Apr. 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77, 596 U.N.T.S. 261.

35 The United States has violated Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations on several occasions. The same would apply if the United States incarcerates a person pending extradition without notifying the consular official of that person's nationality, something that seldom occurs in extradition cases. Although the U.S. government assumes that the detention of the person sought for extradition is known to his/her country of nationality, it is not the purpose of the provision. The real purpose is to ensure a foreign national who is incarcerated in a country other than that of his nationality will have the full benefits of fairness. This rationale would apply to extradition proceedings even if the requesting state is that state of nationality. Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Par. v. USA), 1998 I.C.J. 426 (Nov. 10); Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex. v. U.S.), 2004 I.C.J. 12 (Mar. 31) LaGrand Case (Ger. v. U.S.), 2001 I.C.J. 466 (June 27). (Germany protested the pending execution of two German national brothers); Federal Republic of Germany v. United States, 526 U.S. 111 (1999); LaGrand v. Stewart, 170 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 1999).

36 It is quite common for an AUSA to represent to the extradition judge that the requesting state has made a certain assertion or declaration, or expressed a certain legal opinion, which turns out to be more self-serving than entirely accurate. The ACSA usually obtains such information from the OIA/DOJ, who in turn obtains it from its foreign counterpart. In these situations, expert witnesses will be asked to clarify the contested questions of foreign law or treaty law.

2. Procedure in the United States[37]

Title 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 regulates extradition proceedings in the United States. The legislation, which was first enacted in 1848 and last amended in 1965, was the subject of reform efforts between 1981 and 1984.[38] Regrettably, however, these legislative efforts did not produce the anticipated results.

The process of extradition when the United States is a requested state commences with a request of a foreign state, pursuant to a treaty, for a provisional arrest pending submission of a formal request or a formal request for extradition.[39] The requesting state can initiate its request in three ways: (1) by presenting the request to the Department of State (directly or through diplomatic channels), which transmits it to the Department of Justice, which in turn forwards the 37 18 U.S.C. § 3181–3196 (2000). See also U.S. Department of State Foreign Affairs Manual Volume 7, 7 FAM 1630 Extraditoin of Fugitives from the United States, (CT:CON-326; 05-04-2010) (Office of Origin: CA/OCS/PRI), available at http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/86815.pdf; Memorandum Relative to the Applications for the Extradition from Foreign Countries of Fugitives from Justice (Dep't of State 1969, and subsequent editions); Comment, A Comparative Analysis of the U.S. Extradition Treaties with Mexico and South America, 4 Cal. W. L. Rev. 315 (1968); Note, The New Extradition Treaties of the United States, 59 Am. J. Int'l L. 351 (1965); Note, United States Extradition Procedures, 16 N.Y.L.F. 420 (1970). See also Ch. II.

38 H.R. Rep. No. 3347, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. (1984). For examples of treaty provisions regarding provisional arrest, see Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 10(1)–(2), entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16 ("In case of urgency, either Contracting Party may request the provisional arrest of any accused or convicted person. Application for provisional arrest shall be made through the diplomatic channel or directly between the Department of Justice…and the Ministry of Interior in Thailand…. (2) The application shall contain: a description of the person sought; the location of that person, if known; a brief statement of the facts of the case including, if possible, the timeand location of the offense; a statement of the existence of a warrant of arrest or a judgment of conviction against that person…and a statement that a request for extradition of the person will follow"); Extradition Treaty with Estonia, art. 12, entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-16; Protocol Amending U.S.–Israel Extradition Treaty, art. 7, entered into force Jan. 10, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 109-3 (replacing art. 11 of earlier treaty). Such provisions usually also call for the release of the fugitive upon the failure to submit a formal request within a designated period of time; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, supra, art. 10(4) (sixty days); Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 12(4), entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23 (discretionary release after sixty days); Argentine Extradition Treaty, art. 11(4), entered into force June 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866 (sixty days); Korean Extradition Treaty, art. 10(4), entered into force Dec. 20, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 106-2, TIAS 12962 (two months); Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 11, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5 (sixty days); Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 10(4), entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17 (sixty days); Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 11(4), entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3 (sixty days with a possible thirty-day extension); Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. VIII(4), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22 (sixty days); Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XII(4), entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023 (forty-five days); Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 11, ¶ 1, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197 (forty-five days). Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 12, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17 ("A person detained pursuant to the Treaty shall not be released until the extradition request has been finally decided, unless such release is required under the extradition law of the Requested State or unless this Treaty provides for such release").

39 See Jones, supra note 3; Hartley-Booth, supra note 3; 4 Green Haywood Hackworth, Digest of International Law 77–78 (1944) [hereinafter Hackworth Digest]. For extradition procedures in the United Kingdom, see http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/police/extradition-intro11/ (last visited Oct. 19, 2011). The United Kingdom has national legislation on extradition between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth countries, and between the United Kingdom and non-Commonwealth countries. The United Kingdom is also bound by the European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, Europ. T.S. No. 24, 597 U.N.T.S. 338, and by other relevant European conventions, such as the request to the appropriate United States Attorney in the district where the individual is believed to be located; (2) by presenting it to the Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs; or (3) by retaining private counsel to bring an action before the federal district court where the requested person may be located.[40] Extradition proceedings, however commenced, are recorded in the civil docket of the federal district court, even though it has many characteristics of criminal proceedings and the proceedings are deemed of a sui generis nature.

It must be remembered that extradition cases are not Article III judicial proceedings. Instead extradition courts derive their jurisdiction from Article II of the Constitution as an extension of the executive's authority.[41] Extradition proceedings are therefore conducted as judicial proceedings under Article II pursuant to the relevant extradition treaty.[42] In addition to a particular treaty, whether bilateral or multilateral,[43] the adjudicative part of extradition proceedings is conducted pursuant to §§ 3181–3196. Extradition proceedings are therefore conducted by a U.S. magistrate and do not provide for appeal, as that right is only guaranteed in Article III proceedings. However, review can achieved by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which allows for the de novo review of questions of law and fact by a federal district court.[44] A denial of the petition for a writ of habeas corpus by the district court can be appealed to the circuit court of appeals.

The purpose of an extradition hearing pursuant to § 3184 is not to determine guilt or innocence of the relator, but rather to ascertain: (1) whether there exists a valid treaty in force, (2) whether the person in question is the one sought in the extradition request,[45] (3) whether the request has been made in due form with the treaty and U.S. legislation, (4) whether the crime for which the person is requested is an extraditable offense in accordance with the treaty, (5) whether the underlying facts of the crimes charged are sufficient to be considered criminal under the laws of both states, (6) whether there is probable cause (which is determined in accordance with a standard similar to that of preliminary hearings in U.S. criminal cases),[46] (7) whether there are treaty or statutory grounds for denying the extradition request, and (8) whether the extradition order specifies the criminal charges for which extradition is requested in order to ensure the principle of specialty in the requesting state.

European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Sept. 3, 1953, 213 U.N.T.S. 222. See Ch. I, Sec. 4.5 (Commonwealth Extradition Scheme).

40 See Ex parte Schorer, 197 F. 67, 69 (C.C.E.D. Wis. 1912). This forum has been practically nonexistent for the last thirty years.

41 See Ch. II, Secs. 1–5.

42 See Ch. II for extradition procedures in United States.

43 See Ch. II.

44 The standard of review is one of "clearly erroneous" on the facts and/or contrary to the law. See Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1364 (9th Cir. 1978); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 1025 (9th Cir. 1999).

45 For example, the district court denied extradition to the Philippines when it was clearly demonstrated that this was a case of mistaken identity, even though one has to be surprised that the United States proceeded with that case without first ascertaining the person's identity. The same problem arose in Demjanjuk, where however, extradition was not denied to Israel. In re Extradition of Strunk, 293 F. Supp. 2d 1117 (E.D. Cal. 2003); In re Extradition of Chavez, 408 F. Supp. 2d 908 (N.D. Cal. 2005) (case of mistaken identity).

46 See Ornellas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690 (1996) (Supreme Court held that probable cause does not mean reasonable suspicion, and the two are not the same). See also United States v. Schaafsma, 318 F.3d 718, 722 (7th Cir. 2003) (on probable cause); United States v. Hayes, 236 F.3d 891, 894 (7th Cir. 2001); United States v. Gilliam, 167 F.3d 628, 633 (D.C. Cir. 1999); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1369 (9th Cir. 1978); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th 1986). In summary all of these cases consider that probable cause means something similar to what is used in preliminary hearings in both federal and state courts as deriving from the Fourth Amendment as well as the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. It is a practical, common sense, flexible standard, which is not based on any technical conceptions or yardstick, and it will derive from the totality of the circumstances

In short, these judicial proceedings, unlike the subsequent executive proceedings,[47] are limited and may not inquire into substantive issues involving the criminal charge, except insofar as they are necessary to determine probable cause and protect the integrity of U.S. judicial processes[48] by ensuring that it is used in a manner that is consistent with the U.S. Constitution and public policy, as well as the rights of any person who is subject to the coercive practices of the state in accordance with international human rights protections and in accordance with the U.S. Constitution. This does not mean, however, that a person is entitled to the same rights as he/she would enjoy in the course of criminal proceedings and consequently, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and Federal Rules of Evidence are not applicable except insofar as they are necessary to ensure certain minimum standards of due process and whatever the extradition judge may, in his/her discretion, determine to be necessary and appropriate in a particular case.[49]

It should be noted that U.S. courts will examine different issues depending on whether the extradition is from or to the United States. For example, if the extradition is from the United States, in addition to the applicable treaty and legislation, the court will consider the application of the conventional and customary international law, including international human rights law issues. Issues concerning the extradition of a person to the United States are resolved in Article III criminal proceedings in which the individual is the defendant, and not in Article II extradition hearings. However, in such cases, the defendant enjoys only limited rights to raise issues pertaining to his/her extradition even though he/she enjoys all the constitutional rights and statutory rights afforded in any other criminal hearing, such as application of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and the Federal Rules of Evidence. In short, although the forum for the challenge changes to the relevant criminal court hearing the case, the court does not have jurisdiction to rule on the manner in which the individual was surrendered unless it was "outrageous."[50] Thus while in a criminal case involving a defendant who was extradited to as applied in a reasonable and common sense manner by the extradition magistrate. However, the judge must determine that the evidence is sufficiently reliable, credible, and of sufficient weight to warrant a given conclusion, which is based on the facts presented by the government.

---

47 See Ch. XI.

48 This question has been raised most consistently with abductions abroad as an alternative to extradition. See Ch. V. It has also been raised in connection with confessions obtained under torture or coerced statements obtained abroad, and particularly when U.S. agents are involved in the process, whenever the evidence presented by or on behalf of the requesting state is forged, false, or constitutes a misrepresentation, and last, when representatives of the U.S. government acting on behalf of a requesting state act in a manner that is deemed as prosecutorial misconduct or in violation of the cannons of ethics of the legal profession. These issues are discussed throughout the book. In particular for prosecutorial abuse cases, see Petrovsky v. United States, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993); In re Lightfoot, 217 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2000); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); United States v. Levy, 905 F.2d 326 (10th Cir. 1990); United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995).

49 This position has been enunciated in Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1919). See, inter alia, Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922); Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913). For a consistent and well-articulated position in the Second Circuit, see also Austin v. Healey, 5 F.3d 598 (2d. Cir. 1993); Simmons v. Braun, 627 F.2d 635 (2d Cir. 1980); Shapiro v. Ferrendina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d. Cir. 1993); Ahmed v. Wigen, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d. Cir. 1990), cert denied 510 U.S. 1165 (1994). See In re Extradition of Orellana, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3175 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (holding that coerced confessions are not a bar to extradition because U.S. courts do not apply the same constitutional standards in extradition cases that they would in criminal cases); but see United States v. Escalante, No. 00-56787, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 23136 (9th Cir. 2001) (applying the Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure).

50 United States v. Anderson, 472 F.3d 662 (9th Cir. 2006) (In United States v. Anderson the relator was a anti-tax activist who assisted U.S. citizens avoiding paying their income taxes; he settled in Costa Rica and subsequently applied for citizenship, which was eventually granted. After the United States filed an extradition request the Costa Rican government annulled his naturalization and a court granted the

the United States, the criminal court judge will not inquire into the manner in which jurisdiction was obtained over the fugitive in the requested country.[51]

Jurisdictional defects or issues relating to jurisdiction are deemed waived whenever a surrendered person enters a guilty plea after his/her surrender and return to the United States.[52] Conversely, if the extradition is to the United States, a fugitive does not have standing to raise any issues substantive or procedural arguments so long as he/she is a fugitive.[53]

An extradition request, however presented, must follow the requirements of the treaty pursuant to which the request is made and is subject to the procedures set forth in 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196. The treaty may contain certain provisions controlling procedural matters; otherwise the appropriate provisions of federal law apply. Upon filing the extradition request with the federal district court, the United States Attorney (or private counsel) will request that a warrant for the arrest of the relator be issued. Whenever a formal request has not yet been filed and the treaty permits "provisional arrest"[54] prior to the filing of the formal request, the United States Attorney may also request the issuance of an arrest warrant, which is deemed "provisional."[55] An arrest warrant is always issued by a U.S. magistrate or a federal judge upon a complaint made on oath or affirmation, stating the basis for the arrest and the facts supporting it. The investigation, search, and arrest of the relator are made by the FBI, as extradition is a matter subject to federal jurisdiction. Whether the arrest is made on the basis of a "provisional" warrant, or an arrest subsequent to the formal filing of the request, the relator is entitled to a bail hearing as soon as possible after the arrest, similar to what he/she is entitled to after arrests in criminal cases.[56]

Subsequent to the bail hearing, an extradition hearing will be held to establish "probable cause" under 18 U.S.C § 3184.[57] Evidentiary questions arising in bail hearings are regulated extradition request. While Anderson was appealing both decisions he was surrendered to the United States and subsequently convicted for defrauding the U.S. government. On appeal Anderson argued that his extradition was in violation of the extradition treaty or, in the alternative, an act of " 'misconduct' of the most shocking and outrageous kind." The Ninth Circuit rejected Anderson's claims, holding that the governmental conduct was not "outrageous" and therefore not subject to inquiry.).

---

51 This includes abductions. See United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).See Ch. V. See also Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980); David v. Att'y General United States, 699 F.2d 411 (7th Cir. 1983). With respect to the use in the United States of a confession induced through torture or coercion, constitutional limitations apply. But they do not extend extraterritorially with respect to extradition proceedings to or from the United States, though an exception may exist with respect to egregious conduct with respect to the United States. Toscanino v. United States, 500 F.2d 267 (2d. Cir. 1975) (unlawful seizure case), distinguished by United States v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1981); United States v. Wilson, 721 F.2d 967(4th Cir 1983); In re Extradition of Singh, 123 F.R.D. 140 (D.N.J. July 29, 1988); Harbury v. Deutch, 233 F.3d 596 (D.C. Cir. 2000); United States v. Valeriano-Valles, 73 Fed. Appx. 78 (5th Cir. 2003); United States v. Herbert, 313 F. Supp. 2d 324 (S.D.N.Y. 2004*)*. Denial of the right to suppress evidence illegally obtained in criminal proceedings is permitted whenever the violation does not amount to a breach of an international legal obligation, whether it may be included in customary or conventional international law. This always applies to international protected human rights. See United States v. JIminez-Nava, 243 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 2001).

52 See United States v. Cordero, 42 F.3d 697 (1st Cir. 1994).

53 See Ch. X.

54 See generally 4 Hackworth Digest, supra note 39, at 103; 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 920 (1963) [hereinafter Whiteman Digest]. Most treaties provide for provisional arrest. See, e.g., Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Spain, art. XI, 22 U.S.T. 738, T.I.A.S. No. 7136 (entered into force July 2, 1971); Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Italy, T.I.A.S. No. 10,837 (entered into force Sept. 24, 1984).

55 See infra Sec. 9.

56 See infra Sec. 12.

57 See Ch. X, Sec. 4.

by § 3190.[58] The "probable cause" hearing determines, among other things, if a treaty exists between the requesting state and the United States, if the offense is extraditable under the treaty, and if the offense constitutes a crime in the state in which the individual is found at the time of the arrest.[59] If the above requirements are satisfied, the relator is found to be extraditable, and the extradition magistrate enters such an order. In the event that the individual is found to be non-extraditable, the proceedings end.

If the individual is found to be extraditable, he/she may file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus[60] in the federal district court.[61] The petition will still be filed with the federal district court even if the extradition magistrate is a federal district court judge sitting as a U.S. magistrate for purposes of the "probable cause" extradition hearing. This procedure is anomalous in U.S. law, as it allows for a review of a finding by the same judge who originally made it. The only way to avoid that eventuality is to move for the judge's recusal, if such grounds exist, with all the attendant dangers of alienating the judge, or causing another judge to whom the case may be transferred (if the motion for recusal is granted) to be particularly attentive to the case so as not to appear to offend his/her brethren on the court. In the event the district court habeas petition is denied, the relator has the right of review in accordance with federal habeas corpus procedures[62] to the U.S. courts of appeals; thereafter, the relator has the right of review by means of a petition for a writ of certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court.[63]

It must be noted that as there is no appeal of an extradition order, habeas corpus is the only means of review. But because habeas corpus can also be resorted to with respect to other aspects of the case (e.g., as a way of reviewing an order denying bail), it must be distinguished from the right of review by means of a habeas petition irrespective of other similar petitions that may have been filed for other reasons. If the habeas petition is granted by the district court or by the court of appeals, a new hearing may be ordered or the relator may be discharged. If the relator is discharged, the government or private counsel acting on behalf of the requesting state does not have the right to seek review of the order. However, nothing precludes the requesting state from presenting a new request for extradition, as the Fifth Amendment protection against double jeopardy does not apply to Article II cases.[64]

Whenever a relator is found extraditable, the court sends a certificate of extraditability to the Department of Justice, which in turn forwards it to the Department of State. The Department of State will then issue a final extradition order. However, the secretary of state has the right to invoke "executive discretion"[65] and to refuse to sign the order for the surrender of the relator.[66] If a surrender order is issued, the U.S. marshals take custody of the relator to be delivered to the authorities of the foreign state on the basis of a formal or an informal agreement between the two states. The delivery of the person may be accomplished either by U.S. marshals accompanying the relator to the requesting state or by agents of the requesting state authorized to enter the United States in order to take custody of the relator from the U.S. marshals or U.S. territory.

---

58 See Ch. X, Sec. 5.

59 See supra notes 48–49 and related text. See also Ch. VII.

60 28 U.S.C. § 2241 (2000).

61 See Ch. XI.

62 28 U.S.C. § 2241 (2000). See also Ch. XI.

63 28 U.S.C. § 2101 (2000).

64 See Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426, 429 (1923); Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739, 748 n.19 (2d Cir. 1980) (holding that extradition request that results in release of accused does not bar requesting state from initiating a new request).

65 See Ch. XI.

66 See 4 Hackworth Digest, supra note 39, § 316 at 49–50.

In Vo v. Benov, the Ninth Circuit laid out the extradition process:

> An extradition court—in this case the magistrate judge—exercises very limited authority in the overall process of extradition. As we have explained, "[e]xtradition is a matter of foreign policy entirely within the discretion of the executive branch, except to the extent that the statute interposes a judicial function." Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 1322, 1326 (9th Cir.1997) (citing In re Metzger, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 176, 188, 12 L.Ed. 104 (1847)). Extradition from the United States is initiated when the nation seeking extradition makes a request directly to the State Department. Blaxland v. Commonwealth Dir. of Pub. Prosecutions, 323 F.3d 1198, 1207 (9th Cir.2003). "After the request has been evaluated by the State Department to determine whether it is within the scope of the relevant extradition treaty, a United States Attorney . . . files a complaint in federal district court seeking an arrest warrant for the person sought to be extradited." Id. Upon the filing of a complaint, a judicial officer (typically a magistrate judge) issues a warrant for an individual sought for extradition, provided that an extradition treaty exists between the United States and the country seeking extradition and the crime charged is covered by the treaty. 18 U.S.C. § 3184. After the warrant issues, the judicial officer conducts a hearing to determine whether there is "evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention," id., or, in other words, whether there is probable cause.
>
> If the judicial officer determines that there is probable cause, he "is required to certify the individual as extraditable to the Secretary of State." Blaxland, 323 F.3d at 1208 (emphasis added) (citing Lopez-Smith, 121 F.3d at 1326). After an extradition magistrate certifies that an individual can be extradited, it is the Secretary of State, representing the executive branch, who ultimately decides whether to surrender the fugitive to the requesting country. Id.; see Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 789 (9th Cir.1986).[1] The authority of a magistrate judge serving as an extradition judicial officer is thus limited to determining an individual's eligibility to be extradited, which he does by ascertaining whether a crime is an extraditable offense under the relevant treaty and whether probable cause exists to sustain the charge. See Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009, 1014 (9th Cir.2005); Blaxland, 323 F.3d at 1208 (quoting United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103, 110 (1st Cir.1997)). Part of determining whether the offense is extraditable is examining whether it falls within the political offense exception. If it does, the individual is not eligible for extradition. Quinn, 783 F.2d at 787.
>
> ---
>
> [1] As we noted in Blaxland, "It is a generally established principle . . . that the Secretary of State, exercising executive discretion through delegation of this authority by the President, may refuse to extradite a relator despite a judicial determination that extradition would be compatible with the terms of the applicable treaty." Id. at 1208 (internal quotations and citations omitted).
>
> [. . .]
>
> The decision to certify an individual as extraditable cannot be challenged on direct appeal. Rather, a habeas petition is the only available avenue to challenge an extradition order. Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 1201–02 (9th Cir.1999). The district court's habeas review of an extradition order is limited to whether: (1) the extradition magistrate had jurisdiction over the individual sought, (2) the treaty was in force and the accused's alleged offense fell within the treaty's terms, and (3) there is "any competent evidence" supporting the probable cause determination of the magistrate. Id. at 1205; Quinn, 783 F.2d at 790. We have held that "the political offense question is reviewable on habeas corpus as part of the question of whether the offense charged is within the treaty." Id. at 791. This factor is a mixed question of law and fact. Id. Mixed questions are reviewed de novo, though we cautioned in Quinn that if "the determination is 'essentially factual' . . . it is reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard." Id. (citing United States v. McConney, 728 F.2d 1195, 1203 (9th Cir.1984) (en banc)).[67]

67 Vo v. Benov, 447 F.3d 1235, 1237–1238, 1240 (9th Cir. 2006).

3. The Initial Executive Process[68]

At the executive level the extradition request is made through a formal diplomatic request.[69] Even though there is no specific form for the request, it must be addressed to the secretary of state by the competent authorities of the requesting state.[70] The request can be made by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or the Ministry of Justice of the requesting state, as its law determines, and is presented through diplomatic channels to the United States. Such diplomatic channels can be either to the U.S. embassy in the requesting state, or by the requesting state's embassy in the United States to the Department of State. Because of the length in diplomatic transmissions, several states allow their ministries of justice to present requests to their counterpart ministries of justice. Many states now have offices of international affairs or extradition sections in their ministries of justice that deal with these issues. For instance, the Department of Justice has an Office of International Affairs that deals with all questions of interstate cooperation in penal matters. Some U.S. embassies also have attachés from the Department of Justice to ensure more effective cooperation between the territorial state and the United States.

Treaties differ as to the substantive requirements of the requisition, but these questions are of limited significance because the diplomatic note embodying the requisition can always be amended or supplemented during the judicial hearing. Even substantive errors in the requisition are not fatal to the case of the requesting state, as it is possible to submit another requisition after the denial of the initial one; this is so even where one requisition is denied on the grounds of an adverse judicial finding.[71] The U.S. Supreme Court has held that double jeopardy does not attach in such cases.[72]

There is no time limit required for the submission of the requisition to the secretary of state. Therefore, it can be made before, during, or after the judicial proceedings. However, it must be submitted before the Department of State can certify the surrender of the relator.[73] This, of course, is subject to specific treaty stipulations, most of which require that the requisition be filed no later than two calendar months after the relator has been arrested and confined on the extradition warrant. After the specified time has lapsed, the relator must be released and the surrender warrant quashed, though not on the basis of a constitutional right.[74]

---

68 See Ch. XI.

69 See 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 55, at 906.

70 See 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (2000). See also United States v. Conicino-Perez, 151 F.R.D. 521, 525 (E.D.N.Y. 1993); In re Extradition of Neto, 1998 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19918 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).

71 See Ex parte Schorer, 197 F. 67 (C.C.E.D. Wis. 1912).

72 Collins, 262 U.S. See also Romeo v. Rache, 820 F.2d 540 (5th Cir. 1987) ("[E]xtradition proceedings, however, are generally not considered criminal prosecutions"); In re Extradition of Garcia, 802 F. Supp. 773 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) (stating that the United States–Mexico extradition treaty permits prosecutions for the same acts that constitute two separate crimes under each state's statutes); Artukovic v. Rison, 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal. 1986) (declaring political offense exception not available), aff'd, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986); Artukovic v. Boyle, 107 F. Supp. 11 (S.D. Cal. 1952) (holding 1902 treaty between United States and Kingdom of Serbia not in effect as basis of extradition request by Yugoslavia), rev'd sub nom. Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954); Artukovic v. Boyle, 140 F. Supp. 245 (S.D. Cal. 1956) (holding extradition barred by political offense exception), aff'd sub nom. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), vacated and remanded, 355 U.S. 393 (1958), on remand, United States ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (holding lack of probable cause), overruled by Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (ruling competence is not relevant or necessary in extradition proceedings).

73 Schorer, 197 F. 67. See also 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 55, at 905.

74 Such decisions have been based on a statutory right to release under 18 U.S.C. § 3188 (1948), originally enacted as § 5 of the Act of August 3, 1882, ch. 378, 22 Stat. 216. See Jimenez v. U.S. Dist. Ct, 84 S. Ct. 14 (1963); Hababou v. Albright, 82 F. Supp. 2d 347 (D.N.J. 2000); Wright v. Henkel, 190

If multiple requests are received from more than one country, the treaties in question may specify that a number of factors be considered in determining the request to which priority will be given. These factors include the territory on which the offense was committed[75] and the seriousness of the crime.[76] Otherwise, the priority determination is discretionary and rests with the executive.

A good example of this is the 2005 case of Yevgeny Adamov, the former Russian Minister of Energy, who was sought for extradition from Switzerland by both the United States and Russia.[77] The charges against Adamov were connected to a program funded by the United States to improve safety at Russian nuclear facilities. The U.S. indictment charged Adamov and other Russian officials with stealing the funds provided by the United States.[78] After a ruling by the Swiss Supreme Court, Switzerland extradited Adamov to Russia, his country of nationality, which was also the country where the alleged acts took place.[79] In giving priority to Russia, Switzerland emphasized priority in concurrent jurisdiction requests to the country of nationality. In an unrelated aspect of the case, the United States did not request Adamov's extradition from Russia, but left the indictment pending in the Western District of Pennsylvania. In an astute procedural move, Adamov waived his appearance in the United States, so that the case against him could proceed while he was in custody in Russia. The goal was to make sure that Adamov would not appear before a U.S. court. Adamov was convicted and sentenced by a Russian court to five-and-a-half years' imprisonment for abuse of office and fraud, but was released two months later by a Russian court after his sentence was suspended.[80]

U.S. 40 (1903); Barrett v. United States, 590 F.2d 624 (6th Cir. 1978); In re Factor's Extradition, 75 F.2d 10 (7th Cir. 1934); In re Normano, 7 F. Supp. 329 (D.C. Mass. 1934); Ex parte Reed, 158 F. 891 (C.C.D.C.N.J. 1908); In re Dawson, 101 F. 253 (C.C.D.C.N.Y. 1900). On when commitment starts, see Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 33 S. Ct. 945, 57 L. Ed. 1274 (1913); In re Chan Kam-Shu, 477 F.2d 333 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 847 (1973). See also In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

75 See, e.g., (Montevideo) Convention on Extradition between the United States and Other American States, art. 7, 49 Stat. 3111, 3115, T.S. No. 882, 165 L.N.T.S. 47, which reads:

> When the extradition of a person is sought by several States for the same offense, preference will be given to the State in whose territory said offense was committed. If he is sought for several offenses, preference will be given to the State within whose bounds shall have been committed the offense which has the greatest penalty according to the law of the surrendering State. If the case is one of different acts which the State from which extradition is sought esteems of equal gravity, the preference will be determined by the priority of the request.

Id. at 53.

76 See, e.g., Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland, art. X, 28 U.S.T. 227, 232–233, T.I.A.S. No. 8468 (entered into force Jan. 21, 1977), which provides:

> If the extradition of a person is requested concurrently by one of the Contracting Parties and by another State or States, either for the same offense or for different offenses, the requested Party shall make its decision in so far as its law allows, having regard to all the circumstances, including the provisions in this regard in any Agreements in force between the requesting States, the relative seriousness and place of commission of the offenses, the respective dates of the requests, the nationality of the person sought and the possibility of subsequent extradition to another State.

77 United States v. Adamov, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35408 (W.D. Penn. 2006).

78 Id.

79 Id.

80 Charles Digges, Former Russian Atomic Minister Adamov Sentenced to 5 ½ Years in Penal Colony for Fraud and Abuse of Office, Bellona, Feb. 20, 2008, available at http://www.bellona.org/articles/articles_2008/Adamov_sentenced (last visited Sept. 24, 2012); Aleksei Sokovnin, Yevgeny Adamov's Sentence Suspended, Kommersant, Apr. 18, 2008, available at http://dlib.eastview.com/browse/doc/20450033 (last visited Sept, 24, 2012).

The secretary of state, upon request by the requesting state, may present a preliminary note to the court. This is not the usual practice, however, and such a preliminary note is not a prerequisite for the initiation of the judicial proceedings. The practice is for the requesting state's appropriate authorities to initiate such proceedings on their own motion.[81] In the United States, it is the United States Attorney of the federal district wherein the relator is believed to be located, or if the relator's whereabouts are unknown, the proceedings shall be commenced by the United States Attorney for the Federal District of the District of Columbia.[82]

4. The Judicial Process[83]

Extradition proceedings are initiated by a request made by an authorized representative of the requesting government. In the United States, it is the Department of Justice. It is not necessary that the representative of the requesting state be a consular or diplomatic officer, though it is almost always the practice, provided that the person making the request to the United States is authorized to do so by the requesting state. In United States ex rel. Caputo v. Kelly,[84] the Second Circuit held that:

> Extradition proceedings must be prosecuted by the foreign government in the public interest and may not be used by a private party for private vengeance or personal purposes; but if in fact the foreign government initiates the proceedings, no reason is apparent why it may not authorize any person to make oath to the complaint on its behalf.[85]

An order for the provisional arrest of the relator may be made, but must be issued by a competent federal judicial officer subject to constitutional limitations. It must be recalled that the judicial process commences only after the executive initiates the process in accordance with the provisions of the applicable treaty.[86]

The court must have in personam jurisdiction before proceeding with the hearing.[87] Such jurisdiction vests in the federal district court before which the relator is brought after his/her initial

---

81 See 4 Hackworth Digest, supra note 39, at 93; 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 55, at 916. See also Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902); In re LoDolce, 106 F. Supp. 455 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1952); In re Schlippenbach, 164 F. 783 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1908); Ex parte Van Hoven, 28 F. Cas. 1020 (C.C.D. Minn. 1876) (No. 16,858).

82 See Ch. XI.

83 See Ch. X.

84 United States ex rel. Caputo v. Kelly, 92 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1937), cert. denied, 303 U.S. 635 (1938).

85 Id. at 605. See also In re K.A. Evans, 52 I.L.R. 355 (Sup. Ct., Full Court 1963) (H.K.) (holding that the requesting state was not required to be represented at the extradition proceedings).

86 In Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, the Supreme Court stated:

> It cannot be doubted that the power to provide for extradition is a national power; it pertains to the national government and not to the states . . . But, albeit a national power, it is not confided to the executive in the absence of treaty or legislative provision. At the very beginning, Mr. Jefferson, as Secretary of State, advised the President: The laws of the United States, like those of England, receive every fugitive, and no authority has been given to their Executives to deliver them up. As stated by John Bassett Moore in his treatise on extradition—summarizing the precedents—the general opinion has been, and practice has been in accordance with it, that in the absence of a conventional or legislative provision, there is no authority vested in any department of the government to seize a fugitive criminal and surrender him to a foreign power. Counsel for the petitioners do not challenge the soundness of this general opinion and practice. It rests upon the fundamental consideration that the Constitution creates no executive prerogative to dispose of the liberty of the individual. Proceedings against him must be authorized by law.

Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 8–9 (1936). See also Ex parte Charlton, 185 F. 880 (C.C.N.J. 1911), aff'd, 229 U.S. 447 (1913).

87 A judge of a U.S. district court has jurisdiction to hear extradition proceedings under 18 U.S.C. § 3184. Goldsmith v. M. Jackson & Sons, Inc., 327 F.2d 184 (10th Cir. 1964); Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d apprehension. That court should be the one having competence over the territory in which the relator was first apprehended, irrespective of where the arrest warrant was issued.

5. The Request

The extradition process begins with a complaint, which must be sworn to or affirmed.[88] The complaint is akin to an indictment or information,[89] and as such it must inform the relator of the charges brought against him/her in order to allow the relator to make a factual showing that the complaint fails to establish "probable cause"[90] and defend against the request according to the treaty and applicable law.

The complaint must satisfy the requirements of the applicable treaty and relevant legislation, and these require that it set forth the basic facts upon which it is founded. It is to that extent akin to any other federal criminal complaint, and it can be amended to comply with these requirements or with any other order by the court requiring more specificity. It is also possible for the government to amend the complaint after its filing if new charges are brought against the relator. The converse is also true. Whenever the United States is the requesting state, it can amend its original request to take into account a superseding indictment.

The following facts are usually included in a complaint:

1. The name of the relator;
2. The relevant treaty in force;[91]

---

547 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914 (1963); Bernstein v. Gross, 58 F.2d 154 (5th Cir. 1932) (interpreting previous § 651 now embodied in § 3184). A judge of a state court has jurisdiction under 18 U.S.C. § 3184 even though the accused is a federal official. In re Keene's Extradition, 6 F. Supp. 308 (S.D. Tex. 1934) (interpreting previous § 651, now embodied in § 3184). A U.S. commissioner (now a U.S. magistrate) has jurisdiction when authorized by a U.S. district court and the accused is within the commissioner's district. Vaccaro v. Collier, 38 F.2d 862 (D. Md. 1930), rev'd on other grounds, 51 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1931).

88 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (2000).

89 See Fed. R. Crim. P. 7. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes 448–450 (1969).

90 In the case of In re Wise, 168 F. Supp. 366 (S.D. Tex. 1967), a district court held that the complaint must be sufficient to inform the accused of the charges against him. The court stated:

> Despite intimations to the contrary in some of the cases, a complaint seeking the issuance of a warrant for extradition to a foreign country must allege facts sufficient to apprise the defendant of the nature of the charge against him and to show that an extraditable offense has been committed. While it is not necessary to charge the offense with the particularity of an indictment, it should be sufficiently explicit to inform the accused of the nature of the charge. This principle is best set out in Ex parte Sternaman [citation omitted] . . . It is implicit in all of the cases announcing the rule that the complaint need not meet the requirements of an indictment.

Id. at 369. Similarly, the court in Ex parte Sternaman, 77 F. 595 (C.C.D.C.N.Y. 1896), stated:

> The complainant should set forth clearly and briefly the offense charged. It need not be drawn with the formal precision of an indictment. If it be sufficiently explicit to inform the accused person of the precise nature of the charge against him it is sufficient. The extreme technicality with which these proceedings were formerly conducted has given place to a more liberal practice, the object being to reach a correct decision upon the main question—is there reasonable cause to believe that a crime has been committed? The complaint may, in some instances, be upon information and belief. The exigencies may be such that the criminal may escape punishment unless he is promptly apprehended by the representatives of the country whose law he has violated. From the very nature of the case it may often happen that such representative can have no personal knowledge of the crime. If the offense be one of the treaty crimes and if it be stated clearly and explicitly so that the accused knows exactly what the charge is, the complaint is sufficient to authorize the commissioner to act.

Id. at 596.

91 Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902); United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886); Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818, reh'g denied, 355 U.S. 885 (1957);

3. The allegation that an extraditable offense under the treaty was committed;[92]

4. The allegation that the offense constitutes a crime under U.S. federal law or the laws of the state wherein the district court is located;[93]

5. Where applicable, the non-applicability of a treaty defense;[94]

6. A summary of the factual circumstances of the alleged offense; and

7. A showing that "probable cause" exists that the relator is the person charged or convicted, and has committed the crime charged or for which he/she was convicted.[95]

The following documents must be attached to the complaint:

1. A certified copy of the arrest warrant, charging instrument, or judgment of conviction in the requesting state issued by its competent authorities, showing the offense charged and any other documents on which the complaint is based;[96]

2. A sworn or verified statement by the appropriate foreign legal authority describing the facts and the relevant documents; and

3. Accompanying affidavits, documents, and evidence on the applicable foreign law and the facts alleged.[97]

Artukovic v. Boyle, 107 F. Supp. 11, 28 (S.D. Cal. 1952), rev'd sub nom. Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954); Artukovic v. Boyle, 140 F. Supp. 245 (S.D. Cal. 1956), aff'd sub nom. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), vacated and remanded, 355 U.S. 393 (1958), on remand, United States ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (holding lack of probable cause), overruled by Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (ruling competence is not relevant or necessary in extradition proceedings). See also Ch. I.

92 Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426 (1923). See also Ch. VII, Sec. 3.

93 United States v. Stockinger, 269 F.2d 681 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 913 (1959). See also Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

94 See Ch. VIII.

95 This requirement is illustrated in In re Extradition of Mazur, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 52551 (N.D. Il. 2007). For a commentary on the probable cause issue in this case, see Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Magistrate Finds Lack of Probable Cause, Declines to Extradite Accused Murderer to Poland, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep 345–346 (Sept. 2007). This point is discussed in In re Extradition of Herrera, 268 F. Supp. 2d 688 (W.D. Tex. 2003). See also Ch. X.

96 Any foreign documents presented either to the executive or judicial branch in an extradition proceeding must be authenticated by the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States in the requesting state. This officer must certify that the documents are entitled to be received for similar purposes, for example, as evidence of criminality in the requesting state. See 18 U.S.C. § 3190 (2000). See also Collins, 262 U.S. 426; O'Brien v. Rozman, 554 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1977); United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215 (D. Conn. 1977).

97 In Desmond v. Eggers, 18 F.2d 503 (9th Cir. 1927), the court of appeals stated:

> The complaint filed before the judge or committing magistrate in this country was upon information and belief, but it set forth the source of information, by referring to certain affidavits and documents which were later received in evidence upon the hearing. Assuming for the present that such affidavits were properly authenticated, the sufficiency of the complaint is amply supported by authority....

Id. at 504. See also Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. U.S. 508, 514 (1919); Rice v. Ames, 180 U.S. 371, 375–376 (1901). But see United States ex rel. McNamara v. Henkel, 46 F.2d 84 (S.D.N.Y. 1912) (holding that a complaint based on information and belief made pursuant to a telegraphic request without supporting documents was sufficient, provided the request was made by a person whom the U.S. authorities were justified in believing). One of the most frequent objections to an extradition complaint based on information and belief is that the information, the certifications, the depositions, etc., are all hearsay. However, such testimony is admissible in the extradition hearing. In Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir. 1957), the court held that:

The foreign documents must be duly certified by the appropriate issuing authority and authenticated by the U.S. consul in whose diplomatic territory the issuing authority is located. The documents must also be translated, the translation subscribed or sworn to and authenticated by the appropriate U.S. consul.

Upon the filing of a complaint, the magistrate or judge may issue a warrant for the arrest of the relator. The warrant is valid anywhere in the United States, and any authorized judicial officer can hear the case even if he/she did not issue the warrant.[98]

6. The Complaint

A complaint is the basis for commencing extradition proceedings. As stated above, it is made by the Attorney General, through the U.S. Attorney for the federal district having jurisdiction, and that is where the person sought was found. The complaint must be made under oath or affirmation similar to verified complaints in civil matters[99] and an information in criminal matters.[100]

The complaint must be supported by authenticated documents, as described in Section 7 below. The attached documents must include:

1. A copy of the request of the foreign state for extradition;

2. A judicial document authorizing the arrest or detention of such person on account of accusation or conviction of a crime issued by the competent legal authority of the requesting state;

> The sworn statements were taken ex parte in Italy without the knowledge of the appellant or his counsel. They were obviously hearsay, and clearly would have been inadmissible in a criminal trial in the United States. [However], that is not the test. The only question to be answered under the statute is whether the statements were "properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals" of Italy.... It was the unambiguous testimony of an expert in Italian law that they were.

Id. at 263.

98 In In re Farez, 8 F. Cas. 1007 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1870) (No. 4,645), the court held that if the warrant was issued by a commissioner, his authority to do so had to appear on the warrant. See also In re Henrich, 11 F. Cas. 1143, 1146 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1867) (No. 6,369). In Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205 (1904), the appellee, Walshe, was arrested in Indiana by a U.S. marshal acting under the authority of a warrant issued by a commissioner in New York City. The warrant directed the marshal to return the accused to the New York commissioner to hear evidence of criminality. Petitioner challenged the validity of the requirement that the marshal return him to a New York commissioner. In affirming the grant of habeas corpus, the Supreme Court ruled that the petitioner had to be brought before the nearest authorized judicial officer in the place where he was found (i.e., Indiana). The Court stated that:

> The alleged criminal shall be arrested and delivered up only upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive person so charged is found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offense had been there committed. As applied to the present case, that stipulation means that the accused, Walshe, could not be extradited under the treaties in question, except upon such evidence of criminality as, under the laws of the state of Indiana—the place in which he was found—would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime alleged had been there committed.
>
> ...
>
> [I]t is made the duty of a marshal arresting a person charged with any crime or offense to take him before the nearest Circuit Commissioner or the nearest judicial officer, having jurisdiction for a hearing, commitment or taking bail for trial in cases of extradition.

Id. at 217–219. In Jimenez v. Aristiguieta, 311 F.2d 547, 553 (5th Cir. 1962), the court held that the warrant was returnable before any justice, judge, or magistrate authorized to hear evidence of criminality in extradition cases under 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (2000).

99 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.1 (concerning secondary action by shareholders); Fed. R. Civ. P. 27(a) (regarding depositions to perpetuate testimony); Fed. R. Civ. P. 65 (covering injunctions); Fed. R. Civ. P. 66 (governing receivers). See generally 2 Moore's Federal Practice 11.03 (1982).

100 See Fed. R. Crim. P. 3. See also Gaither v. United States, 413 F.2d 1061 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

3. Documents required by the applicable treaty concerning the law of the requesting state;

4. Information sufficient to identify the person sought; and

5. The essential factual allegations of conduct constituting the offense that the person sought is believed to have committed.

All the foreign documents must be translated into English and the translation authenticated pursuant to § 3190.

7. Documentation

The requesting state must submit documentation in support of the extradition request.[101] These documents must be certified and authenticated by the U.S. consul in the requesting state and transmitted to the United States through diplomatic channels. The courts have held that such documents, once certified according to 18 U.S.C. § 3190, are conclusively admissible.[102]

Courts in various circuits have consistently held that § 3190 does not require that the evidence be admissible in the foreign tribunal—only that it meet the authentication requirement imposed by the foreign tribunal as a condition to admissibility in U.S. proceedings.[103]

---

101 For examples of documentary evidence required by treaty, see generally, Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 8(2)–(4), entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3 ("2. All requests shall contain: (a) documents, statements, photographs (if possible), or other types of information which describe the identity, nationality, and probable location of the person sought; (b) information describing the facts of the offense and the procedural history of the case; (c) the text of the law describing the essential elements of the offense for which extradition is requested; (d) the text of the law prescribing the punishment for the offense; and (e) the documents, statements, or other types of information specified in paragraph 3 or paragraph 4 of this Article, as applicable. 3. A request for extradition of a person who is sought for prosecution shall also contain: (a) a copy of the warrant or order of arrest issued by a judge or other competent authority; (b) a copy of the charging documents; and (c) such information as would provide a reasonable basis to believe that the person sought committed the offense for which extradition is requested. 4. A request for extradition relating to a person who has been found guilty of the offense for which extradition is sought shall also contain: (a) a copy of the judgment of conviction or, if such copy is not available, a statement by a judicial authority that the person has been found guilty; (b) information establishing that the person sought is the person to whom the finding of guilt refers; (c) a copy of the sentence imposed, if the person sought has been sentenced, and a statement establishing to what extent the sentence has been carried out; and (d) in the case of a person who has been found guilty in absentia, the documents required in paragraph 3."). See also South African Extradition Treaty, art. 9(2)–(4), entered into force June 25, 2001; S. TREATY DOC. 106-24; Extradition Treaty with Luxembourg, art. 8(2)–(4), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-10, TIAS 12804; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 8(2)–(4), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 8(2)–(4), entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. VI(2)–(6), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22.

102 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 66 L. Ed. 956, 42 S. Ct. 469 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp.2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Shapiro v. Ferrendina, 478 F.2d 894, 903 (2d. Cir. 1993); Desmond v. Eggers, 18 F.2d 503 (9th Cir. 1927); United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215, 1225–1229 (D. Conn. 1977), rev'd on other grounds, 568 F.2d 234, 240 (2d Cir. 1977); In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22, 24 (D. Minn. 1972); In re Benson, 34 F. 649 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1888); In re McPhun, 30 F. 57 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1887); In re Behrendt, 22 F. 699 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1884); In re Wadge, 16 F. 332 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1883); In re Fowler, 4 F. 303 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1880). But see United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991) (stating extradition request is not the only possible source of charges); United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding that ambiguity in extradition request requires interpretation in keeping with rule of specialty).

103 Esposito v. Adams, 700 F. Supp. 1370, 1475 n. 6. 1476 (N.D. Ill. 1988); In re Extradition of Tang Yee-Chun, 674 F. Supp. 1058, 1061–1062 (S.D.N.Y. 1987); United States v. Galanis, 429

The District Court of Delaware in In re Lehming[104] outlined the process, holding:

> The purpose of § 3190 is to afford the Government an efficient method of satisfying obligations under extradition treaties and supply a framework through which the Government can introduce evidence to efficiently extradite fugitives. United States v. Taitz, 134 F.R.D. 288, 291 (S.D. Cal. 1991), citing Oteiza v. Jacobus, 136 U.S. 330 10 S. Ct. 1031, 34 L.Ed. 464 (1890). Based upon the aforementioned statute, this Court may examine all the documents admitted into evidence, including the Warrant of Arrest, to make a probable cause determination.[105]

The court further stated:

> A fugitive is permitted to introduce evidence which rebuts the finding of probable cause, but this proffer is limited solely to evidence explaining the circumstances before a court. Explanatory evidence has been defined as "reasonably clear-cut proof which would be of limited scope and have some reasonable chance of negating a showing of probable cause . . . the extraditee cannot be allowed to turn the extradition hearing into a full trial on the merits." Matter of Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672, 685 (S.D.N.Y. 1978). This Court shall exclude evidence which is proffered to contradict testimony, challenge the credibility of witnesses or establish a defense to the crimes alleged. Id. at 782, also see Collins, 259 U.S. 309, 315–16, 42 S. Ct. 469, 471–72 (admissible evidence is that which might explain ambiguities or doubtful elements of the prima facie case); In re Okeke, No. 96- 7019 P-01, 1996 WL 622213 (D.N.J. 1996) (fugitive is limited to explanatory evidence that offers a benign explanation for the evidence presented against them); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1369 (9th Cir.), cert. denied 439 U.S. 932, 99 S. Ct. 323, 58 L. Ed. 2d 327 (1978).[106]

8. The Meaning of "Fugitive"

The term "fugitive" as used in extradition treaties refers to any person who has left the state in which the alleged crime was committed for whatever reason and is physically within the territory and subject to the jurisdiction of the requested state. In United States v. Steinberg,[107] the district court defined the term in the context of dismissing the relator's argument that he did not receive a speedy trial. The relator in Steinberg was indicted for conspiracy, embezzlement, and fraud and had appeared before a grand jury before leaving the United States to establish a domicile in Salisbury, Rhodesia (now Harare, Zimbabwe), where he stayed for seven years. Although there was no extradition treaty between the two countries, government officials, in good faith, made informal approaches to obtain the defendant's return. The relator eventually returned to the United States of his own free will, at which time he was arraigned and pled not guilty to the two seven-year-old indictments against him. The relator moved to dismiss

---

F. Supp. 1058, 1061–1062 (S.D.N.Y. 1987); Oen Yin`Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1406 (9th Cir. 1988); Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 834 F.2d 1444, 1451 (9th Cir. 1987); O'Brien v. Rozman, 554 F.2d 780, 782–783 (6th Cir. 1977); United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215, 1226–1229 (D. Conn. 1977); Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234, 240 (2d Cir. 1977).

104 In re Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505, 514–515 (D. Del. 1996).

105 In a footnote, the court stated:

> Lehming argues that this Court cannot utilize the Warrant of Arrest to reach a determination of probable cause. D.I. 32. However, § 3190 specifically allows the Court to do so. The statute provides "warrants . . . offered into evidence . . . shall be received and admitted . . . for all purposes of such hearing . . . " An unrefuted purpose of extradition hearing is to evaluate probable cause. Therefore, while the warrant of arrest in this case may not be the sole "document to which one looks to determine the issue of probable cause." (D.E. 43 at 1), this Court can and will consider it in conjunction with other properly admitted evidence.

Id. at 514.

106 Id. at 514.

107 United States v. Steinberg, 478 F. Supp. 29 (N.D. Ill. 1979).

the indictments, contending that his right to a speedy trial had been violated.[108] However, the court concluded that the relator was a fugitive from justice and that the Sixth Amendment had not been violated. The Steinberg court held:

> [I]f, after the commission of a crime within a state, the person who allegedly committed it leaves the state, no matter for what purpose, with what motive, or under what belief, he becomes, from the time of such leaving, within the Constitution and laws of the United States, a fugitive from justice.[109]

A person will therefore be deemed a fugitive from the moment that he/she is sought for extradition, irrespective of whether he/she knows that he/she is sought or seeks to evade legal proceedings. Thus the meaning of the term "fugitive" in U.S. extradition practice is curious.

In United States v. Blanco, the Second Circuit held that a defendant who attempted to conceal her true identity and acted in a manner suggesting that she would not return to the United States to face trial could be considered a fugitive for speedy trial purposes.[110] And that is an approach more consonant with traditional criminal law on the determination of the status of fugitive. The Blanco court noted that:

> Blanco argues that she was not a fugitive, relying on a footnote in Chief Judge Feinburg's concurrence in United States v. Salzmann, 548 F.2d 395, 403, n.2 (2nd Cir. 1976). In this footnote, Chief Judge Feinburg wrote that he doubted whether defendant Salzmann was a fugitive when his address in Israel was known, when he made no attempt to hide it, and when he was in communication with the United States Attorney. Id. at 403 n. 2. Salzmann also suggested to the government that he would return to the United States to face prosecution if the government would finance his trip. Id. at 401. Blanco's case is easily distinguished from Salzmann's. Although the government knew Blanco's address in Colombia, Blanco did not live openly. She travelled under a false name and carried a false passport. She was not in communication with the government, nor did she ever suggest that she would be willing to return to the United States to face prosecution.

Coming from a former fugitive, Blanco's claim that her right to a speedy trial was denied carries almost no weight. As Chief Judge Wilfred Feinburg wrote in Salzmann:

> A true fugitive, whose location is unknown, or who is successfully resisting government efforts to bring him into the jurisdiction, will not be able to obtain dismissal of an indictment. This is as it should be. Otherwise the courts would be sanctioning the playing of games by fugitives.[111]

As such, courts will look to the defendant's conduct to determine whether to consider the defendant a fugitive or the victim of undue delay by the government.[112]

---

108 Id. at 32. Presence in the United States, even if fortuitous, is sufficient for jurisdiction to attach and for considering the relator a fugitive for purposes of extradition. Vardy v. United States, 529 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1976), reh'g denied, 533 F.2d 310 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 978 (1976); Ex parte Hammond, 59 F.2d 683 (9th Cir. 1932); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 1155, 1162 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1973). Contra Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981).

109 United States v. Steinberg, 478 F. Supp. 29, 32 (N.D. Ill. 1979). See Vardy v. United States, 529 F.2d 404, 407 (5th Cir. 1976), reh'g denied, 533 F.2d 310 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 978 (1976); In re Chan Kam-Shu, 477 F.2d 333, 348 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 847 (1973); Hammond v. Sittel, 59 F.2d 683 (9th Cir. 1932), cert. denied, 287 U.S. 640 (1932); In re David, 390 F. Supp. 521, 523 (E.D. Ill. 1975); United States ex rel. Eatessami v. Marasco, 275 F. Supp. 492 (S.D.N.Y. 1967); In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1959); 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 55, at 768. See also United States v. $45,940 in U.S. Currency, 739 F.2d 792, 796 (1984) (discussing definition of fugitive).

110 United States v. Blanco, 861 F.2d 774, 780 (2d Cir. 1988).

111 United States v. Salzmann, 548 F.2d 395, 404 (Feinburg, C.J., concurring) (footnote omitted).

112 See, e.g., United States v. Diacolis, 837 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1988); Branion v. Gramly, 855 F.2d 1256, 1269 (7th Cir. 1988) (stating cause-and-prejudice rule does not apply when the prisoner flees the United

Similarly, in In re Assarsson,[113] the Eighth Circuit held that a fugitive is a person who leaves the jurisdiction, either with the intent to evade its criminal processes or with the intent to avoid arrest or prosecution.[114] The determination of whether a person is a fugitive is important for the purposes of the application of the statute of limitations,[115] as exemplified in the Ninth Circuit decision in United States v. Fowlie.[116]

In Fowlie, the defendant appealed his conviction[117] for drug-related offenses on the basis that the alleged acts had transpired more than five years prior to his indictment, and consequently outside the requisite statute of limitations as prescribed by 18 U.S.C. § 3282.[118] However, the court of appeals held that the defendant could be characterized as a fugitive "fleeing justice," thereby excluding the defendant from having the availability to use the applicable statute of limitations as prescribed by the exception within 18 U.S.C. § 3290.[119] The Ninth Circuit defined a fugitive "fleeing justice" as one who affirmatively and voluntarily acted with the corresponding intent to avoid prosecution.[120] The court of appeals saw three instances of affirmative action by Fowlie to avoid prosecution, thus making him a fugitive to whom the exception to the statute of limitations did apply: first, when Fowlie left his ranch in California prior to the investigation related to his indictment; second, when Fowlie did not return to his ranch although he was allegedly supposed to return; and third, States after a conviction); United States v. Pomeroy, 810 F.2d 184 (8th Cir. 1987), superseded by 822 F.2d 718 (1987). See also United States v. Eng, 951 F.2d 461 (2d Cir. 1991).

---

113 In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157 (8th Cir. 1982), aff'g 538 F. Supp. 1055 (D. Minn. 1982). See also United States v. Catino, 735 F.2d 718, 721 (2d Cir. 1984) (holding that flight from justice in one jurisdiction tolls statute of limitations in all jurisdictions within the United States).

114 Assarsson, 687 F.2d at 1161. See also Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981); United States v. Ballesteros-Cordova, 586 F.2d 1321 (9th Cir. 1978) (per curiam); United States v. Wazney, 529 F.2d 1287 (9th Cir. 1976); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1973). Note that in United States v. Walton, the court explained that "a formal request for extradition must be made before due diligence can be found to have existed for purposes of the Speedy Trial Act." 814 F.2d 376, 379 (7th Cir. 1987).

115 See Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157. See also United States v. Catino, 735 F.2d 718 (2d Cir. 1984); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1981) (stating that the government's failure to prove that relator concealed himself with intent to avoid arrest and prosecution precluded finding that relator was a fugitive from justice and did not toll statute of limitations); King v. United States, 144 F.2d 729 (8th Cir. 1944) (holding absence from jurisdiction alone is enough to consider individual a fugitive); McGowen v. United States, 105 F.2d 791 (D.C. Cir. 1939), cert. denied, 308 U.S. 552 (1939). In Catino, the court held that although Catino was imprisoned in France, and could not return to the United States, his failure to accommodate the U.S. Department of Justice constituted "constructive flight from justice." Catino, 735 F.2d at 722. The court stated:

> Although Catino's imprisonment prevented him from returning, we do not think he was relieved of a duty to do all he could to return. As it was, instead of consenting to return to the United States, he actively resisted the extradition proceedings. This fact, coupled with his letter expressing a desire to resist all future extradition requests, constituted a constructive flight from justice, thereby tolling the statute of limitations.

Id. at 722–723. For statute of limitations, see Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.4.

116 United States v. Fowlie, 24 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 1994).

117 See id.

118 Id. at 1071.

119 Id. "[N]o statute of limitations shall extend to any person fleeing from justice." 18 U.S.C. § 3290 (2000).

120 Id. at 1072. The court cited to its prior decision of United States v. Wazney, where the defendant, after learning of a warrant for his arrest, failed to return to his home. However, in Wazney the defendant concealed his whereabouts in Los Angeles, a large city, unlike Fowlie, who lived openly in a small Mexican town. Id.

when Fowlie remained in Mexico, where he lived and worked without any concealment of his whereabouts.[121]

Had the majority read the facts of in Fowlie as the dissent did[122] no affirmative act to flee done with the intent to evade prosecution would have been found. Fowlie's act of "fleeing" actually occurred prior to the government's search of Fowlie's ranch, and therefore could not have been, as the opinion suggested, the basis for finding an intent to avoid prosecution.[123] Also, as the dissent noted, "every case tolling the statute of limitations under § 3290 has relied on defendant's affirmative conduct of fleeing or concealing himself,"[124] and Fowlie's open conduct did not comport with either prerequisite for tolling the statute of limitations. Therefore, Fowlie's convictions should have been reversed for they would have been based on an indictment that fell outside of the applicable statute of limitations.

A 2006 Second Circuit decision[125] in United States v. Florez provides a thorough overview of the law regarding fugitive status relative to the statute of limitations. In Florez the Second Circuit stated:

> In construing the flight requirement of § 3290, we begin with Streep v. United States, 160 U.S. 128, 16 S.Ct. 244, 40 L.Ed. 365 (1895), in which the Supreme Court considered the meaning of the phrase "fleeing from justice" as used in an earlier statute creating an exception to the application of a limitations period. In Streep, the Court stated:
>
> It is unnecessary, for the purposes of the present case, to undertake to give an exhaustive definition of the[] words ["any person fleeing from justice"]; for it is quite clear that any person who takes himself out of the jurisdiction, with the intention of avoiding being brought to justice for a particular offence, can have no benefit of the [statute of] limitation[s], at least when prosecuted for that offence in a court of the United States.
>
> Id. at 133, 16 S.Ct. 244.
>
> Drawing from this language, most courts, including our own, have concluded that a person's mere absence from a jurisdiction is insufficient, by itself, to demonstrate flight under § 3290 (or its statutory predecessor); there must be proof of the person's intent to avoid arrest or prosecution. As we observed in Jhirad v. Ferrandina, in the context of an extradition proceeding, "the phrase 'fleeing from justice' carries a common sense connotation that only those persons shall be denied the benefit of the statute of limitations who have absented themselves from the jurisdiction of the crime with the intent of escaping prosecution." 486 F.2d 442, 444–45 (2d Cir.1973) ("Jhirad I") (emphasis added); accord United States v. Rivera-Ventura, 72 F.3d 277, 283 (2d Cir.1995). Many of our sister circuits agree that such intent is a necessary component of flight. See Ross v. United States Marshal, 168 F.3d at 1194 (10th Cir.1999) (holding that "fleeing from justice" requires proof that "the accused acted with the intent to avoid arrest or prosecution"); United States v. Greever, 134 F.3d at 780 (6th Cir.) (holding that § 3290 requires proof "that the defendant concealed himself with the intent to avoid prosecution"); United States v. Fonseca-Machado, 53 F.3d 1242, 1244 (11th Cir.1995) (holding that "a fugitive from justice . . . must be found to have absented himself from the jurisdiction with the intent to avoid prosecution"); United States

121 Id. at 1071–1072.

122 The majority opinion stated the facts to be that "(1) Fowlie left Rancho Del Rio a few days prior to the search on March 1, 1985; (2) he was expected to return; [and] (3) defendant did not return to Rancho Del Rio, but went instead to Mexico." Id. at 1071. The dissent saw the same facts to state that "(1) Fowlie left his ranch prior to the search and went to Mexico, and (2) he was expected to return but did not." Id. at 1074 n.1 (Reinhardt, J., dissenting).

123 Id. at 1074–1045.

124 Id. at 1075 (citing United States v. Gonsalves, 675 F.2d 1050, 1052 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 837 (1982)).

125 United States v. Florez, 447 F.3d 145, 150–151 (2d Cir. 2006).

> v. Marshall, 856 F.2d at 900 (7th Cir.) (concluding that "defendant's intent to avoid arrest or prosecution must be proved in order to trigger the tolling provisions of Section 3290"); United States v. Wazney, 529 F.2d 1287, 1289 (9th Cir.1976) (holding that "intent to avoid prosecution is an essential element of 'fleeing from justice' "); Brouse v. United States, 68 F.2d 294, 295 (1st Cir.1933) (holding that "essential characteristic of fleeing from justice is leaving one's residence, or usual place of abode or resort, or concealing one's self, with the intent to avoid punishment").
>
> Although decisions by the Eighth and D.C. Circuits suggest that the specific intent to avoid prosecution is not essential to toll a statute of limitations on account of flight, see In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157, 1162 (8th Cir.1982); McGowen v. United States, 105 F.2d 791, 792 (D.C.Cir.1939), the latter court, at least, has tempered this view when the evidence of flight does not show actual departure from the jurisdiction, see United States v. Singleton, 702 F.2d 1159, 1169–70 (D.C.Cir.1983) (concluding that showing of intent to avoid prosecution is required for § 3290 tolling when accused does not leave jurisdiction where crime was committed). No matter. In this circuit, the rule in criminal prosecutions remains that stated in Jhirad I and Rivera-Ventura: a finding of flight under § 3290 requires proof that a defendant intended to avoid arrest or prosecution.[126]

Beyond the issue of a fugitive's status relative to the statute of limitations, a relator's status may support a probable cause determination on the underlying extraditable offense.[127] It should be noted, however, that there is no prerequisite that the relator be a fugitive in order to seek his/her extradition. Thus, a person may be sought for extradition who is not a fugitive, and who may not even know that he/she is being sought by a given requesting state.

A treaty may specifically allow for extradition from the United States if the person has been tried and convicted in absentia, provided that the person will be given the right to a new trial upon his/her return. In such cases, the court may deem probable cause to be satisfied by the foreign judgment; however, such a judgment in absentia is not conclusive proof of probable cause.[128] The converse situation presents a different problem insofar in that states do not provide for a trial de novo for a person who has been found guilty in absentia because that person has become a fugitive after jurisdiction has attached and the criminal proceedings have begun. Whenever the United States has sought extradition on that basis it has had to find ingenious ways to ensure that the surrendered person receives a new trial.

The determination that a person is a fugitive is foundational to a person's right to petition a court, as discussed in connection with standing in Chapter XI, Section 4.

9. Provisional Arrest

9.1. Introduction and General Considerations

Provisional arrest is a temporary arrest made prior to, and in contemplation of an extradition request pursuant to a treaty that authorizes it, for the limited period of time provided for in the treaty. The arrest is made pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge or magistrate.[129]

---

126 Id.

127 See, e.g., Esposito v. Adams, 700 F. Supp. 1470 (N.D. Ill. 1988) (holding that testimony of alleged accomplices, corroborated by petitioner's flight from Italy to the United States and change of identity, sufficient to support probable cause determination that petitioner committed the acts alleged in the extradition request). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

128 See In re Ribaudo, No. 00 Crim. Misc. 1 Pg. KN, 2004 WL 213021, *5 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) relying on Spatola v. United States, 920 F.2d 615, 618 (2d Cir. 1991); In re Extradition of Ernst, N0. 97 Crim. Misc. 1, 1998 WL 395267, *22 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).

129 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 55, at 727.

Since the late 1960s, treaties usually have included a provision on "provisional arrest."[130] A representative example of the provisional arrest terminology in contemporary treaties is that of Article XIII in the 1983 treaty between the United States and the Republic of Italy:

> In case of urgency a Contracting Party may apply for the provisional arrest of the person sought pending the presentation of the request for extradition through the diplomatic channel. This application may be made either through the diplomatic channel or directly between the Italian Ministry of Grace and Justice and the United States Department of Justice. The application shall contain a description of the person sought, and indication of intention to request the extradition of the person sought and a statement of the existence of a warrant of arrest or a judgment of conviction, including convictions in absentia and in contumacy, against that person, and such further information, if any as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed, or the person sought been convicted, in the territory of the requested Party.
>
> On receipt of such an application the requested Party shall take the necessary steps to secure the arrest of the person claimed.
>
> A person arrested upon such an application shall be set at liberty upon the expiration of forty-five days from the date of his arrest if a request of this extradition accompanied by the documents specified in Article XI shall not have been received. This stipulation shall not prevent the institution of proceedings with a view to extraditing the person sought if the request is subsequently received.[131]

The Department of State requires the following information from the requesting state prior to making a request for provisional arrest through the Department of Justice: the fugitive's name; the offense charged, including the date and place that the arrest warrant or charging instrument was issued or the judgment of conviction; the circumstances of the crime; a description and identification of the accused; and the individual's whereabouts, if known.

In In re Extradition of Orozco, the court found that a magistrate judge has jurisdiction to consider releasing a person detained on a provisional arrest warrant and a complaint seeking extradition. The court held:

> The rationale for distinguishing pretrial release in extradition cases from domestic criminal cases in which pretrial liberty is the norm is that extradition proceedings involve the Government's overriding foreign relations interest in complying with treaty obligations and producing extradited persons. United States v. Leitner, supra; United States v. Taitz, supra; United States v. Messina, 566 F.Supp. 740, 742 (E.D.N.Y.1983). As the Taitz court explained, "[i]f the United States were to release a foreign fugitive pending extradition and the defendant absconded, the resulting diplomatic embarrassment would have an effect on foreign relations and the ability of the United

---

130 In the EU–US 2003 Extradition Treaty, Sen. Treaty Doc. No. 109-14 the language of Article 7 on provisional arrest reads:

> If the person whose extradition is sought is held under provisional arrest, the requesting State may satisfy its obligation to transmit its request for extradition and supporting documents through the diplomatic channel pursuant to Article 5(1), by submitting the request and documents to the Embassy of the requested State located in the requesting State. In that case, the date of receipt of such request by the Embassy shall be considered to be the time limit that must be met under the applicable extradition treaty to enable the person's continued detention.

For a case noting the informality of the request, see Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622, 624 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

131 Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Italy, art. XIII, 26 U.S.T. 493, 502, T.I.A.S. No. 8052 (entered into force Mar. 11, 1975). This treaty has been superseded by a new United States–Italy treaty, T.I.A.S. 10,837 (entered into force, Sept. 24, 1984). The new treaty was declared unconstitutional in July 1996 by the Constitutional Court of Italy because it allowed extradition from Italy for death penalty offenses, which is barred by the Italian Constitution.

> States to obtain extradition of its fugitives." Taitz, supra, 130 F.R.D. at 444; United States v. Hills, 765 F.Supp. 381, 385 (E.D.Mich.1991).
>
> This "special circumstances" requirement creates a different standard for extradition cases than for federal criminal cases, where bail is granted unless the judicial officer determines that release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the defendant as required. 18 U.S.C. § 3146(a). The additional showing required in extradition belies [the defendant's] claim that bail is one of the remedies and recourses of United States law to which an extraditee is entitled. Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225, 1228 (9th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817, 105 S.Ct. 85, 83 L.Ed.2d 32 (1984); Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914, 920 (2d Cir.1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 971, 102 S.Ct. 519, 70 L.Ed.2d 389 (1981) (citing, Wright v. Henkel, supra, 190 U.S. at 62, 23 S.Ct. at 786, Beaulieu v. Hartigan, supra, 554 F.2d at 2; United States v. Williams, 611 F.2d 914 (1st Cir.1979)).[132]

The court granted extradition on the ground that Orosco was not a flight risk and that the criminal charge in Mexico was also an available offense in that country. Obviously this does not constitute an exceptional circumstance, other than perhaps the personal needs of the relator who was about to take an examination for a state dental license.[133]

The policy of the U.S. government is to accommodate such requests "in the best possible way," even though presumably such requests will be granted only if the necessary documentation includes information that the fugitive is likely to flee before the formal extradition request is filed, or before there is an opportunity for the arrest warrant to be issued.[134]

The element of urgency, however, is seldom more than an allegation made by the requesting state, and no case exists where a U.S. court has rejected the request for a provisional arrest on that ground. This is true even when the treaty requires a showing of urgency. A person provisionally arrested is eligible for bail on the same basis as a person arrested on a warrant issued after a formal request has been filed,[135] but the likelihood of bail in these cases is rare if for no other reason than the fact that the relator does not know the nature of the forthcoming charges.

The specific elements needed to justify a provisional arrest are: (1) that there be a condition of emergency or urgency or some type of exigent circumstances; (2) that the provisional arrest warrant be based on effectively the same substantial ground as would authorize the issuance of a warrant by a U.S. court for the crime charged; and (3) that other conditions for issuance of arrest warrants pursuant to the treaty and extradition law be satisfied. There are therefore two substantive conditions required for "provisional arrest."

The first condition deals with the existence of "urgency," which is usually ignored, while the second deals with some type of "probable cause," which receives summary consideration by the magistrate or judge before whom the case is brought. There is nothing in existing treaties or U.S. legislation to explain the meaning of "urgency," but explanatory notes accompanying treaties may indicate what is meant by it. Reasonable standards of interpretation lead to the belief that "urgency" describes such conditions relating to the nature of the offense charged and the personality of the prospective relator, such as whether hearing of the impending request would make him/her susceptible of fleeing the jurisdiction or being likely to destroy the evidence, without which the request or eventual prosecution could not proceed. It is ultimately a question of fact that must be determined by the court on the basis of reasonably credible evidence, but this is not always the case.

---

132 In re Extradition of Orozco, 268 F.Supp.2d 1115, 1116–1117 (D. Ariz. 2003).

133 Id.

134 Extradition: Provisional Arrest, 1975 Digest § 6 at 175–176.

135 Id. § 5 at 156.

The essential purpose of the provisional arrest is to detain an individual for fear that he/she may flee pending arrival of the formal documents of extradition. The practice and practicality of situations in which a "provisional arrest" is requested are that the requesting state rushes its request in the form of a telex, fax, or diplomatic cable that states a few facts, seldom sending with it sufficient evidence that would satisfy a U.S. judge that evidence of "probable cause" exists. This situation places the individual in question in the difficult position of having to prove a negative: that is to prove that he/she is not the person sought, that there is no "urgency," or that there is no "probable cause." It must be noted that neither existing treaties nor applicable federal legislation state the standard of proof required by the government or by the relator. Thus, cases have applied every possible standard, including no standard at all.

As a provisional arrest warrant is an ex parte warrant, there is very little that the issuing magistrate can rely on other than the representations of the requesting state as presented by the U.S. government. Nevertheless, the U.S. government can be selective in its representations and as to those made to it by the requesting state. This means, in effect, that the U.S. government will rely substantially, if not entirely, on the representations of a foreign government without, in most cases, proffering sufficient evidence of "probable cause." Such warrants are analogous to ex parte warrants issued on the basis of hearsay evidence. In that respect, under federal practice, the hearsay evidence must either be corroborated by external evidence or must be based on reliable sources of information that have in the past produced such similar information. Presumably the representations of a sovereign state are to be treated as reliable.

Most provisional arrest cases are instances in which the request is either communicated by facsimile, telex, or diplomatic channels, as in the instance of two landmark cases, Abu Eain[136] and Caltagirone.[137]. The magistrates in Abu Eain and the judge in Caltagirone had no basis to determine either the urgency or the conditions upon which urgency should be tested against, other than the assertions of the requesting state.

The second question that arises in the context of provisional arrest is whether there must be a standard of "probable cause" to detain the relator. This question raises the issue of the applicability of the Fourth Amendment[138] protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. The question thus arises as to whether a "provisional arrest" can be made without "probable cause" or can be based on a lesser standard. The government argued in the Abu Eain and Caltagirone cases, in which the treaties with Israel and Italy were respectively applicable, that only the applicable treaty provisions on the question applied and nothing else, including the U.S. Constitution.

Irrespective of whether "probable cause" under the treaty or the applicable law applies or not, the Fourth Amendment does apply. If the standard is to be less than "probable cause," would a treaty provision such as Article XIII of the 1973 Italian Extradition Treaty or others on provisional arrest effectively displace the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment? This would clearly present a constitutional question, and would appear on its face to be unconstitutional, unless one would broadly interpret the meaning of the Fourth Amendment to make an analogy between the provisional arrest and such other standards of reasonableness in the performance of an arrest as, for example, the reasonableness standard applied in the arrest of somebody in a

---

136 Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

137 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980).

138 The Fourth Amendment states:

> The right of people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no [search] warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

U.S. Const. amend. IV.

motor vehicle for fear that the motor vehicle may be moving outside the jurisdiction.[139] That, however, leaves open the question of whether the standard of reasonableness is to be tested in any particular way by the magistrate who issues the warrant, or whether the magistrate is simply to take the representations of the requesting state at face value and as conclusive evidence. This raises again the question presented earlier regarding the issuance of a warrant based on hearsay.

Another issue is whether a person arrested on the basis of a provisional arrest warrant can be admitted to bail.[140] How does such a person meet the exacting requirements of proving "exceptional circumstances" to be admitted to bail when the person has nothing to go on except the naked assertion of the requesting state? This situation simply overturns the presumption of innocence, as it places the burden of proof on the arrested person. One of the most important cases in this area is Caltagirone,[141] where two Italian citizens were arrested in the United States pursuant to the Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Italy.[142] In the extradition proceedings, the Republic of Italy sought the surrender of the two Caltagirone brothers to face trial for fraudulent bankruptcy in contravention of Italian penal statutes. Pursuant to the issuance of a warrant for this provisional arrest, the Caltagirones were arrested in New York and denied bail. The U.S. government argued that it had no duty to show "probable cause" pursuant to § 3184, and no duty to prove "urgency," and that no other requirement existed outside Article XIII of the treaty. Subsequently, a warrant issued pursuant to a formal request was substituted for the provisional arrest warrant, and bail was also denied. Upon denial of bail and pending a rehearing on same, a petition was filed before the Second Circuit, which found that the issue was not moot, because of the pending rehearing on bail, and that Article XIII did require showing "some probable cause" such as would convince a U.S. judge under the same circumstances that the individual should be arrested. The case was thus reversed and remanded to the district court.[143] The district court granted bail.

In his appeal, Francesco Caltagirone's counsels, joined by this writer who was counsel for Gaetano Caltagirone, contended that the brothers' provisional arrest and detention were 139 As a general rule, searches conducted without a warrant approved by a judge or magistrate are per se unreasonable. This rule, however, is subject to many exceptions based on special circumstances. See, e.g., United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606 (1977) (holding border searches excepted from warrant requirement); Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969) (stating that search incident to lawful arrest does not require warrant); Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967) (holding exigent circumstances excuse warrant requirement); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925) (holding search of automobile permitted without warrant).

---

140 See supra Sec. 2.

141 In re Caltagirone, 622 F.2d 572 (2d Cir. 1980).

142 26 U.S.T. 493, T.I.A.S. No. 8052. Title 18 U.S.C. § 3187 (2000) deals with fugitives from foreign countries in the United States:

> Whenever there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the United States and any foreign government, any justice or judge of the United States, or any magistrate authorized so to do by a court of the United States, or any judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any State, may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person found within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government with any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention, issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such justice, judge, or magistrate, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. If, on such hearing, he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of State, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the treaty or convention; and he shall issue his warrant for the person so charged to the proper jail, there to remain until such surrender shall be made.

143 In Caltagirone the Second Circuit reasoned as follows:

> Article XIII of the Treaty provides that an application for provisional arrest must contain four elements: a description of the person sought; and indication of intent formally to request the extradition unlawful even though at the time they were no longer in any way detained on account of the provisional arrest. This raised the question of mootness under Article III of the Constitution, which limits intervention by the federal judiciary to cases and controversies that exist at the time they are presented for review. The question was not academic after the provisional arrest was replaced by an arrest warrant, because the relator could have been rearrested under a new provisional arrest warrant if he/she had been released, or if the extradition request had been denied. Thus the Second Circuit agreed with counsel that the question was not moot, as the government contended, and the case was heard accordingly.

These cases and the problems they raise highlight the importance of establishing certain standards by which a U.S. judge may determine: (1) whether urgency exists, (2) whether there are grounds sufficient for a U.S. court to issue such a warrant for the arrest of an individual pending a determination of the case, (3) what bail standards to apply in such cases, and (4) what standards to apply for rearrest and bail under rearrest.

In comparison, the practice in other countries shows that provisional arrest is not a serious obstacle to extradition. In Europe, the Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 European of the person; and allegation that a warrant for the person's arrest has been issued by the requesting state; and finally, "such further information, if any, as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party." Since the "requested Party" in the instant case is the United States, the sufficiency of the information provided to support Caltagirone's arrest must necessarily be judged by American law. Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 485 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976). The district court, however, simply noted that an Italian warrant of arrest was outstanding, and then refused to "second-guess" the Republic of Italy's determination that a warrant should issue. Apparently, the district court saw no need to determine whether a sufficient showing had been made to support an arrest under United States law.

---

Judge Cannella also deferred to Italian practice in rejecting Caltagirone's argument below that language in Article XIII—"In case of urgency"—requires the Government to show urgency before securing a warrant, and that no such urgency was shown here. Judge Cannella decided that the Government of Italy in applying for the warrant must have found present whatever urgency was required under Article XIII, and he refused to review its determination. While we have reservations concerning Judge Cannella's reluctance to review, we need not reach this question, because we reserve the district court on other grounds. The Treaty does not contemplate a review of the validity, under Italian law, of the Italian arrest warrants, but rather a simple factual determination whether a warrant has been issued. In this limited sense, deference to a foreign judicial determination is entirely proper. It is quite another matter, however, to assert that the Republic of Italy's decision to apply for provisional arrest will be taken as an unreviewable determination that the application conforms to all Treaty provisions. This is particularly true with respect to the "further information" requirement, since we cannot suppose that the drafters intended that an official of the requesting state would make a final determination of the law of the requested party. We proceed, therefore, to the application of United States standards for arrest and detention.

Had the offense of "fraudulent bankruptcy" been committed in the United States, a showing of probable cause would have been necessary to justify the issuance of an arrest warrant. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 4; Whitely v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560 (1971); Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480 (1958). Nonetheless, the Government concedes, and our examination of the record confirms, that no showing of probable cause was made prior to the issuance of the March 20 warrant commanding Caltagirone's provisional detention. Indeed, Italy's application for appellant's provisional arrest contained no "such further information" as would establish probable cause to believe that Caltagirone had committed an extraditable offense. Though the Senate report prepared in conjunction with the Treaty's ratification is short, it demonstrates clearly that our legislators contemplated all applications for provisional arrest to be "accompanied by appropriate supporting evidence." S. Rep. No. 93-19, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., reprinted in 119 Cong. Rec. 32054 (1973). Here, however, none was provided.

Convention on Extradition simplified extradition proceedings to deal with the urgency question in cases where provisional arrest requests are made.[144] For example, in a West German case,[145] the court held that the West German–Austrian Extradition treaty did not limit the competence of German authorities under national law to make a provisional arrest on the basis of a note communicated to German police by Interpol stating only the relator's name and date of birth, and that a copy of the enclosed arrest warrant would be followed by the warrant itself and by a formal extradition request. Reciprocal treaty obligations existed only between the contracting parties and did not govern preparatory measures.

An unusual example of provisional arrest arose when Australia detained a naturalized Croatian Serb accused of having committed war crimes in Croatia. The individual, Dragan Vasiljković, was detained on a provisional Croatian extradition request from January 2006 until September 4, 2009, when he was released after a finding by an Australian court that he would be unable to secure a fair trial in Croatia.[146] On appeal Vasiljković's extradition was affirmed.[147]

9.2. Requirements and Procedure

The requirements for provisional arrest are as follows: (1) the arrest warrant must be issued by a judge or magistrate in the federal district where the person sought is believed to be located, or by the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, if that person's whereabouts are unknown in the United States; (2) the legal basis for the issuance of the warrant is a treaty provision specifically authorizing it; (3) the duration of the warrant's validity is only for that period which the treaty specifies; (4) the issuance of the warrant must be pursuant to a requesting state's submission to the U.S. government that it wants a given person detained pending preparation and/or presentation of a formal extradition request pursuant to a valid treaty between the requesting state and the United States; and (5) the existence of some "probable cause" must be shown to satisfy the requirements of the Fourth Amendment.

The premise for including provisional arrest clauses in contemporary extradition treaties is that fugitives from justice are likely to continue their flight if they suspect that a formal extradition request is being prepared or is in the process of being filed in the country where they may be found. Thus, to detain such persons and prevent their flight pending the preparation and/or presentation of the formal extradition request, with all the necessary supporting evidence, authorities resort to provisional arrest. Provisional arrest is warranted by reason of necessity and justified by reason of the brevity of the provisional arrest period.

Most contemporary extradition provisions authorizing "provisional arrest" are discretionary and are for periods ranging from forty to sixty days.[148] Such periods, however, appear too long considering the rapid means of communications between governments. Why then is so much time needed for foreign governments to prepare and/or submit their formal requests? The reason is that prosecutors and judges in most countries are overburdened and their offices understaffed, as are those responsible officials in ministries of justice and foreign affairs who have to

144 See Michael Plachta, Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 831–835 (Aug. 2011).

145 Provisional Arrest for Extradition Case, 45 I.L.R. 378 (BGH 1965) (F.R.G.).

146 See Bruce Zagaris, Accused Croatian War Criminal Loses Effort to Block Australian Extradition Hearing, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 54–55 (Feb. 2007); Trevor Bormann, Background: Captain Dragan's Legal Fight, Australian Broadcasting Corporation News, May 27, 2011, available at http://www.abc.net.au/news/2011-05-27/background-captain-dragans-legal-fight/398996 (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). See also Vasiljkovic v. Commonwealth (2006) 228 A.L.R. 447 (Austl.).

147 Accused Serb War Criminal Loses Australia Extradition Appeal, Reuters, Sept. 30, 2011.

148 For the text of United States treaties, see Igor Kavass, A Guide to U.S. Treaties in Force (1982–Present, Supp. 2010).

forward the request and satisfy certain formal requirements such as translation and legalization of documents. Thus, governments agree on longer periods of "provisional arrest." There would be no substantial issue with "provisional arrest" periods of up to sixty days if such a detention would be subject to the constitutional standards of "probable cause," but that is not the case, as is discussed below. Furthermore, as "provisional arrests" are seldom accompanied by evidence presented by the requesting government, the relator, seldom if ever, has a chance to be released on bail. The right to be released on bail is not, as of yet, constitutionally or statutorily recognized, but is a judicially fashioned right that requires the relator to demonstrate that "special circumstances"[149] exist that would warrant such a release. In "provisional arrest" situations, the usual absence of evidence of "probable cause" presented by the requesting government leaves the relator with precious little to argue for in support of his/her release on bail. And that makes the period of up to sixty days appear excessive.

Most submissions for a "provisional arrest" warrant consist of an affidavit by an Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA) swearing to the fact that: (1) a telex, facsimile, or actual document was received from a requesting state with which the United States has an extradition treaty; (2) that the request is for the "provisional arrest" of a named or identified person, whose presence is believed to be in the United States; (3) that the request is based on a treaty offense that satisfies the requirements of "double criminality;" (4) that an arrest warrant was issued by a competent judicial authority in the requesting state for that offense; and (5) that the requesting state intends to submit a formal extradition request in accordance with the requirements of the applicable treaty within the period of time provided for in the treaty provision authorizing "provisional arrest."

For all practical purposes most "provisional arrest" documentation submitted by a requesting state is limited to: (1) an arrest warrant, and sometimes an Interpol communication asserting that such a warrant exists; and (2) an affidavit by an AUSA who usually has no other information than what the requesting state's or the Interpol's communication contains. There is, therefore, no way for the relator to test, question, or challenge the validity of the arrest warrant, except on constitutional grounds. Indeed, there is no requirement for the government to submit an authenticated copy of the arrest warrant in the provisional arrest context absent a treaty provision requiring it.[150] When hearing challenges to these limited requirements, the courts have not construed the law to the benefit of the relator. Thus, as stated above, the relator cannot effectively challenge the absence of "probable cause" if there is no evidentiary requirement that the requesting state has to meet. Furthermore, without specific evidence being presented in support of the "provisional arrest," the relator can seldom meet the high threshold judicially established for bail.[151]

In most cases, the principal supporting document that the government will present in such cases is a communication from the national Interpol office of the requesting state. That Interpol communication usually contains only scant information about the fact that an arrest warrant is outstanding and that the person named is sought by the judicial or police authority in the requesting state. Frequently this document is referred to as an Interpol warrant or an international arrest warrant. But neither of these two labels is correct. Arrest warrants are issued by the judicial authority of a given state on the basis of its national laws. Interpol merely communicates these warrants through its liaison office, which consists of national police officers assigned to work in that capacity.[152]

---

149 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903). See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); In re Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

150 In re Extradition of Washington, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2722, at *19–*20 (W.D.N.Y. 2007).

151 See infra Sec. 12.

152 See Mary Jo Grotenroth, Interpol's Role in International Law Enforcement, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 375, 376 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988).

Interpol uses two color codes to alert member police organizations about persons wanted by the police or judicial authorities of a given state: red and blue. These colors indicate the degree of interest that a given state has in the wanted individual. Accordingly, a "Red Notice" requests that the recipient state "seek the location and arrest of a person wanted by a judicial jurisdiction or an international tribunal with a view to his/her extradition."[153] The "Blue Notice," by contrast, requests that the recipient state "locate, identify or obtain information on a person of interest in a criminal investigation."[154] In addition, INTERPOL can issue a "Purple Notice," which requests that the recipient state "provide information on modi operandi, procedures, objects, devices or hiding places used by criminals."[155]

Computerized police, customs, and immigration systems make identification of wanted persons easier and more rapid. But the benefit of such technology can also result in judicially or legally uncontrolled law enforcement cooperation. For example, State A may believe a person to have committed a crime but is unable to identify him, and thus issues a "John Doe" arrest warrant (or the like), or issues a police alert notification with or without a complete identification. The police of State B, could, on the basis of certain facts known to it, notify State A's police of the possible identity of the heretofore unidentified person wanted in State A, and suggest to State B to issue a "provisional arrest" warrant for the individual whose identity was in fact supplied by State B. Upon being arrested in State B, the individual would have no way of knowing that his/her identification did not come from State A, which requested the "provisional arrest," but rather that it was in effect State B that had supplied the needed personal identification. At a judicial hearing, the judge would not know these facts either, and therefore police cooperation aided by advanced technology can circumvent the legal process for at least as long as the "provisional arrest" is in effect. During that period of time the law enforcement and prosecutorial officials of States A and B can cooperate in preparing their case.

There is also the problem of representations made by the AUSA to the court. These representations are unverifiable by the court, and the relator cannot rebut what remains unproven. For example, an AUSA may claim that a credible official of the requesting state, who has the authority to make such representations, advised the AUSA that even though the submission for "provisional arrest" is for an economic crime, the person sought is known for his/her violent tendencies and is believed to have also committed several violent crimes. On the strength of these representations the judge then issues the "provisional arrest" warrant and subsequently denies bail. Judges seldom question AUSAs as to the veracity, authenticity, credibility, and corroboration of such representations, and routinely reject the relator's requests to do so.

The same type of problem arises also when the only document that the AUSA presents to the court for issuance of a "provisional arrest" warrant is a facsimile from Interpol. Frequently, it is no more than a message from the national police of the foreign state communicated through their Interpol liaison office or a communication from the U.S. liaison office of Interpol on the basis of a foreign communication. Such a document could state only that it is believed that an arrest warrant was issued and that the named person should be arrested at once because of his/her believed dangerousness or the seriousness of his/her crimes. With respect to terrorism, organized crime, and drug cases, judges will readily accept such communications without verification.

Law enforcement and prosecutorial cooperation can, and does occasionally, take advantage of this situation, which can easily result in the detention of a person for the entire duration of the treaty-authorized period, sometimes up to sixty days. Should subsequent investigations result in the preparation of a legally sufficient extradition request, combined with "probable cause," the hearing under § 3184 will be successful and the relator will be extradited, thus mooting any issues of prior irregularities. Even if the issues in question are shown not to be constitutionally moot, most courts will not act in time for a decision to be handed down before the relator has been surrendered to the requesting state.

153 Interpol, Fact Sheet: International Notices System, Doc. no. COM/FS/2012-01/GI-02.

154 Id.

155 Id.

The government could also use the period of a "provisional arrest" to pressure the relator into cooperation, to bargain a "waiver" of the § 3184 Hearing,[156] or to enter a plea bargain with respect to any charges that may be pending in the United States. In any event, it is always the strategy of the government to keep relators detained so as to increase the pressure on them to cooperate or bargain, or to reduce delays in the legal process (by inducing the relator not to prolong the proceedings and review process).

The time period commences when the individual who is the subject of a "provisional arrest" warrant is detained thereunder, irrespective of whether he/she is also detained under another warrant for another cause. Thus a person may be incarcerated or detained on another criminal charge or on administrative grounds, such as an immigration detention, and be served with an extradition "provisional arrest" warrant or denied bail on another charge because of the existence of a "provisional arrest" warrant, and the period will commence running as of that day. At the end of that period, the individual is constitutionally entitled to unconditional release from detention under that "provisional arrest" because the legal validity of the warrant is extinguished with the lapse of time specified by the treaty under the authority of which the warrant was issued. The appropriate recourse in such cases is by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus before the federal district court wherein the relator is detained. Sometimes the petition will be assigned to the same judge to whom the case was assigned, and therefore may deny the relator the opportunity to appear before another judge. If the case was assigned to a U.S. magistrate, then the petition will be assigned to a federal district court judge. Appeals on negative rulings on such petitions can be taken to the circuit court of appeals.

In United States v. Wiebe,[157] the Eighth Circuit held that a filing at the U.S. embassy (in Madrid) before the forty-fifth day was valid and sufficient even though the U.S. government did not actually file the request with the federal district court until much later. But in this case, the court confused two issues: the period of "provisional arrest" and the foreign state's right to file an extradition request with the U.S. embassy in the requesting state. Thus, this case was an improper interpretation of the treaty's "provisional arrest" provision and a violation of the relator's Fourth Amendment right. It was a cover-up for an embarrassing situation, because the U.S. embassy in that case had lost or mislaid Spain's original request and all supporting documents, and Spain had to prepare a new request, assemble new documents, then authenticate and legalize them. Thus the court, at the government's behest, found that the relator was not entitled to be released after the treaty's forty-five days of "provisional arrest" had lapsed on the theory that Spain had filed its request with the U.S. embassy in Madrid before the forty-fifth day had lapsed, even though the court had no record of such a filing or actual knowledge or evidence of the filing in accordance with the treaty requirements.

At any time during the period of a person's arrest under "provisional arrest," the formal extradition request may be received by the U.S. government and filed with the court. In such cases, the "provisional arrest" warrant is withdrawn and a warrant is substituted for it that is issued pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3184, which requires "probable cause" even though such "probable cause" is usually tested only at the "hearing" on the merits of the extradition request, which may be heard only several months later. Nothing, of course, precludes the filing of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to test the existence of "probable cause" for the arrest. But if the issues are similar to those that will be raised at the "extradition hearing" and the relator raises the same issues again in a second post-§ 3184 hearing petition, the court may hold the issues to have already been adjudicated and dismiss the second petition. Thus, it forces the relator to appeal the denial and argue that the first petition was to test sufficiency of "probable cause" for the issuance of an arrest warrant, or for purposes of bail, and that the second petition was for purposes of reviewing the court's "probable cause" finding under § 3184.

156 See Ch. X.

157 United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1984).

Usually AUSAs do not seek to substitute an extradition warrant for the "provisional arrest" warrant. Some judges, however, consider the substitution an unnecessary formality.

The Fourth Amendment prohibits issuance of arrest warrants without "probable cause" and the Fifth Amendment requires "due process of law" in all legal proceedings, including extradition. The two constitutional provisions comport no exceptions for "provisional arrest" in extradition proceedings. But the Supreme Court has yet to rule on the constitutionality of "provisional arrest" without "probable cause." The Second Circuit in Caltagirone v. Grant,[158] discussed above, held that "probable cause" is required before a judge or magistrate can issue a warrant for "provisional arrest."[159] But that decision was based on the language of the then-applicable 1973 extradition treaty between the United States and Italy.[160] Thus the holding in Caltagirone was partly predicated on the existence of treaty language that required "probable cause" for the issuance of a warrant for "provisional arrest." This decision may, however, hold the Fourth Amendment "probable cause" requirement applicable to "provisional arrest" even in the absence of relevant treaty language requiring it.[161] As a result of this decision, the 1984 United States–Italy Treaty[162] does not contain language in Article XII on "provisional arrest"[163] similar to Article XIII of the 1973 Treaty[164] under which the Caltagirone case was decided.

The constitutionality of "provisional arrest" by means of a treaty, which is deemed to supersede the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, has yet to be directly ruled upon. Reasonable constitutional interpretation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments does not comport any exceptions, and no treaty can supersede such fundamental constitutional rights. To hold otherwise would be to permit the executive branch, with the "advice and consent" of the Senate, to for the benefit of a foreign state thwart the most basic rights of the U.S. Constitution, while at the same time precluding the right of judicial review as to the substantive rights of a person detained in the United States. But such a situation has existed de facto for some time, and this may explain why it has been the practice of the Senate in recent years to give its "advice and consent" to certain treaties subject to the provision that the treaty is subject to the U.S. Constitution.

Caltagirone could financially afford to appeal the case to the Second Circuit, and his able counsels would have surely made a compelling argument before the Supreme Court had it

158 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980).

159 A New York District Court has ruled that judges making such a "probable cause" determination must "evaluate the totality of the circumstances presented," and may rely on hearsay in reaching the probable cause determination, and that "statements of a victim and eye-witness to an alleged crime constitute probable cause, absent reasons to doubt the veracity of such sources." In re Extradition of Washington, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2722, at *11–*12 (W.D.N.Y. 2007). The complaint in this case was supported by eyewitness statements and communication from French officials, which supported the probable cause finding made in the case. Id. at *14–*16.

160 Id. at 744.

161 In 2007 a New York district court was presented with the issue of whether the probable cause requirement was met in the case of a U.S. citizen held under provisional arrest pending a French extradition request. Based on the language in Caltagirone, the court reasoned that "if the Complaint establishes probable cause for Washington's provisional arrest, pursuant to Article 13 [of the U.S.–France extradition treaty], it is unnecessary to decide whether probable cause is required under the Fourth Amendment or the Treaty." Washington, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2722, at *10.

162 Treaty on Extradition, Sept. 24, 1984, U.S.–Italy, T.I.A.S. No. 10,837.

163 Id. at art. XII.

164 Treaty on Extradition, Jan. 18, 1973, U.S.–Italy, 26 U.S.T. 493.

proven to be necessary. But few relators are similarly situated. Most similar cases are simply folded in the subsequent proceedings of a § 3184 hearing on the merits. Very few relators have the resources and inclination to argue a question for its principle.

As treaties provide for a specific period of time for "provisional arrest," the relator presumably has only that period to challenge the constitutionality or legal validity of the arrest, but such is not the case. The government will usually try, as a matter of trial strategy, to delay any review or hearings on issues relating to "provisional arrest" until the formal extradition request has been received. The government will encourage an early bail hearing[165] when the relator has very little to argue with or advance his/her case, and is very likely to lose his/her motion for release on bail. Once the period of "provisional arrest" expires and the formal extradition request is filed, the bail motion may be renewed, but the next stage is a hearing under § 3184, which if scheduled within a relatively short period of time will add support for the government's opposition to bail. Once the extradition request is filed, the government may argue that all prior issues of legality or validity of the "provisional arrest" or its "probable cause" are moot. That argument is appealing on its face, but misleadingly erroneous. The constitutionality of someone's unlawful detention is never moot. In addition, as an extradition request may be refiled against the same individual, and for the same charge after an earlier one was denied,[166] the issue of that person's "provisional arrest" and its "probable cause" basis cannot be moot because the proceedings have gone beyond that stage.[167] It must nevertheless be said that such preliminary arrests are needed and are frequently based on sufficient facts from which to adduce urgency or risk of flight.[168] This is particularly so in cases involving drug traffickers.

10. Arrest Warrants

An arrest warrant for purposes of provisional arrest is issued by any U.S. magistrate or federal district court judge where the individual may reasonably believed to be found.[169] If this were not the rule, a person could frustrate any efforts to arrest him/her by moving from one federal district to another.[170] This rule has existed since the Act of April 30, 1790.[171] Such an arrest warrant is valid in that federal district and in any other federal district where the person may be found.[172] The validity of such a warrant in a district other than the one issuing it does not affect the relator's right to have a hearing in the district in which he/she was arrested. The relator cannot be transferred to the district in which the warrant was issued, because he/she is entitled to the application of the substantive laws of the state where he/she is found in accordance with the principle of "double criminality."[173] This does not apply, however, to transfers within a given district or in another district having jurisdiction in the same state. The same rule applies to intra-district transfers from one division to another. The substance of the question lies in the difference between jurisdiction and venue; jurisdictional transfers would violate the principle of "double criminality,"[174] whereas venue transfer would not. Nothing, however,

165 See infra Sec. 12.

166 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739, 749 (2d Cir. 1980).

167 Id.

168 In re Extradition of Washington, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2722, at *20–*27 (W.D.N.Y. 2007) (discussing urgency established by the relator's fleeing France, refusing requests to surrender to French authorities, and failing to advise French authorities of his whereabouts).

169 Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205 (1904).

170 United States v. Provoo, 124 F. Supp. 185 (S.D.N.Y.), rev'd on other grounds, 215 F.2d 531 (2d Cir. 1954).

171 Ch. 9, § 5, 1 Stat. 112.

172 Shapiro v. Ferrendina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d. Cir. 1993).

173 See Ch. VII, Secs. 2 and 5.

174 Id.

precludes a different approach should there be legislation on point, as "double criminality" can also be found under federal law.

11. Timeliness of the Extradition Request and Complaint

An extradition request can be submitted by a requesting state at any time subject only to the limitation contained in the particular treaty. Some of these limitations pertain to a statutory period relating to the offense charged.[175] Others concern the period of time within which the request is to be filed, and presumably that term also means "served upon the relator" when the relator has been arrested subject to a provisional arrest.[176] Thus, if the applicable treaty provides for a period of forty-five days of provisional arrest pending receipt of the request by the U.S. government and a complaint based thereon filed with the court having jurisdiction, that period of time becomes jurisdictional with respect to the relator's arrest. If the complaint, based on the formal request of the requesting state made in accordance with the treaty, is not filed within that period of time, the relator must be released. Nothing, however, precludes the government from filing another complaint based on that same formal request at any subsequent time. With such a filing, the government may seek the rearrest of the relator. Because extradition requests are not deemed res judicata, and new requests can be filed for the same relator and based on the same facts,[177] there can be limitations of a timeless nature on the submission of the request or the filing of a complaint based thereon. However, the relator must be released after the date specified in the applicable treaty, whereupon the original provisional complaint and warrant are to be dismissed. All these proceedings may then start again ab initio.

There are occasions where the last day specified by the treaty (forty-five days) may fall on a holiday, and in such cases the court may apply by analogy Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 45(a), which tolls the last day if it is a Saturday, a Sunday, or a legal holiday.[178]

The Eighth Circuit considered the issue of the release of the relator based on the expiration of the forty-five day period in United States v. Wiebe.[179] In that case, the court stated:

> Wiebe also claims that because the extradition documents were not delivered to the United States within forty-five days after Spain was notified of his arrest as required by article I of the Supplementary Treaty, he is entitled to be set at liberty. We disagree. Extradition treaties are to be construed liberally to effect their purpose, i.e., the surrender of fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses. Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 57 S. Ct. 100, 81 L. Ed. 5 (1986). See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 293, 54 S. Ct. 191, 195, 78 L. Ed. 315 (1933). We agree with the reasoning set forth in United States v. Clark, 470 F. Supp. 976 (D.Vt. 1979), and adopted by the district court, to hold that Spain had complied with the forty-five day requirement for filing the extradition documents. As indicated, the American Embassy received the extradition documents well within the forty-five day period set forth in the treaties, but these documents were lost and not replaced until after the forty-five days had run. The Clark court construed a forty-five day provision in an extradition treaty similar to the one in the case at bar as follows:
>
> We are satisfied, however, that the Treaty does not require receipt at the courts of the asylum country. If this were the case, the interests of the demanding country under the Treaty could

175 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.4.

176 See supra Sec. 9.

177 See Ch. XII, Sec. 3.

178 See Liberto v. Emery, 724 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1983) (tolling the forty-sixth day, which was a holiday). In this case, however, the court failed to distinguish between the relator's right to be released after the forty-fifth day and the government's right to initiate an action after that period. See also United States v. Guerro, 694 F.2d 898 (2d Cir. 1982).

179 United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1984). See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

> consistently be undercut by bureaucratic sluggishness within the asylum country's executive agencies. The Treaty requires demands for extradition to be made through "the diplomatic channel" only, not directly to the courts of the asylum country. . . . We infer from this requirement and from the language quoted above that the purpose of the forty-five day provision is to protect the asylum country and respondents in its custody from custodial burdens and deprivations due to footdragging on the part of the demanding country. See In re Chan Kam-Shu, 477 F.2d 333, 339 (5th Cir. 1973). Whether subsequent delay within the government of the asylum country violates the rights of potential extraditees would at most be a question of the asylum country's national law, and is not a sufficient basis, standing alone, on which to deny an extradition demand under the Treaty. United States v. Clark, 470 F. Supp. at 979 (footnote omitted). In the present case, Spain, the demanding country, was not guilty of delay at any time. Indeed, the Spanish government fully complied with all treaty provisions within eleven days of Wiebe's arrest. Therefore, the district court did not err in denying the petition for habeas relief.[180]

The court in Wiebe confused the treaty rights of the relator to be released after the specified period of time for the provisional arrest, and whether the requesting state acted within that period of time. The two are separate and indeed severable issues. The period of forty-five days in this case is designed to protect the relator from lingering in jail for what is already a lengthy period of time to accommodate the requesting state in preparing the treaty and statutorily required documents. The period of limitation is therefore on the detention of the relator, and not on the right of the requesting state to present its request at any time so long as the treaty in force permits it.

Finally, in the context of timeliness, it should be noted that there are no limitations of time, save for statutory limitations if they apply under the treaty, as to a requesting state's initiation of the criminal action against the relator in its own national criminal justice system, or for that matter, of the timeliness between such national proceedings and the submission of an extradition request.[181] Indeed, it would be unconscionable for U.S. courts to inquire into the judicial systems of foreign sovereigns to determine the timeliness or speediness with which these processes function, and indeed the procedure is effectively barred under the non-inquiry rule.

12. Bail

12.1. The Constitutional and Legal Bases for Bail

Bail is usually an issue that arises before the commencement of the hearing,[182] but it can also be raised at any time during the course of the extradition proceedings.

The Eighth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution states that "[e]xcessive bail should not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."[183] Furthermore, the Fifth Amendment provides that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."[184] Notwithstanding these constitutional rights, relators are denied the right to bail; the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment,[185] the Eighth

180 Id. at 554.

181 United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159 (2d Cir. 1986); In re Russell, 805 F.2d 1215 (5th Cir. 1986).

182 See Ch. X.

183 U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

184 U.S. Const. amend. V.

185 Upholding the meaning and purpose of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the U.S. Supreme Court, in United States v. Salerno, stated: "in our society liberty is the norm, and detention prior to trial or without trial is the carefully limited exception . . ." 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987). In domestic criminal proceedings, the Supreme Court has created two exceptions to an individual's right to liberty: (1) the relator posses a serious danger to the community, and (2) the relator is a severe flight risk; however, it is important to note that these exceptions are not applied in extradition proceedings. Id.

Amendment, and the Bail Reform Act of 1984[186] encompass the law governing the right to bail in all criminal proceedings in the United States. Yet these are not applied in extradition cases because of the characterization of extradition as a sui generis procedure. This is particularly troublesome in the pre-extradition phase of provisional arrest where persons sought for extradition are faced with a presumption against bail, and can be detained, for all practical purposes, without any legal basis, for up to ninety days under the provisions of certain treaties.[187]

---

186 The Bail Reform Act assumes a presumption for bail, and provides for bail in cases in which the person is not a danger to the community and not a flight risk. Interestingly, the Bail Reform Act of 1984 only applies to persons accused of committing crimes in violation of U.S. law; therefore, it does not apply to cases involving international extradition. For a recent case surveying the judicial approach to the Bail Reform Act in international extradition proceedings, and applying the Bail Reform Act factors to the case before it, see In re Extradition of Garcia, 761 F. Supp. 2d 468, 477–481 (S.D. Tex. 2010). See United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 666–667 (E.D. Tex. 2008); In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 F. Supp.2d 684 (N.D. Ill. 2002); request denied 202 F. Supp. 2d 782 (N.D. Ill. 2002); In re Extradition of Sutton, 898 F. Supp. 691 (E.D. Mo. 1995); United States v. Glantz, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5448, at 1 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 29, 1994);* Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225, 1227–1228 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817 (1984) (finding that because extradition cases are not criminal in nature, the Bail Reform Act does not apply). See also In re Extradition of Bowey, 147 F. Supp. 2d 1365, 1367–1368 (D. Ga. 2001) (discussing the Bail Reform Act).

In In re Extradition of Bowey, the court held:

> The Supreme Court has held that while bail should not ordinarily be granted in extradition cases, release was not foreclosed where special circumstances exist. See Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 23 S.Ct. 781, 47 L.Ed. 948 (1903). The Eleventh Circuit has held that there is a presumption against bond, and that a defendant in an extradition case will be released on bail only if he can prove "special circumstances." See Martin v. Warden, Atlanta, Pen, 993 F.2d 824, 827 (1993). This presumption in extradition cases varies from the procedure under the Bail Reform Act of 1984, 18 U.S.C. § 3142, and its presumption in favor of release for persons awaiting trial in federal court for offenses against United States law, except in cases where there is a flight risk or threat of harm to the community or to any person. The reason for distinguishing granting release in extradition cases from federal criminal cases is that extradition cases involve an overriding interest in meeting treaty obligations. "If the United States were to release a foreign fugitive pending extradition and the defendant absconded, the resulting diplomatic embarrassment would have an effect on foreign relations and the ability of the United States to obtain extradition of its fugitives." United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 444 (S.D.Cal.1990) (citation omitted).
>
> [. . .] Even though Mr. Bowey would be entitled to bail under the Bail Reform Act, because he is facing extradition, the general presumption against bail in extradition cases requires that he also show that special circumstances exist. The first factor that shows special circumstances exist in this case is that releasing Mr. Bowey on bail would allow him to participate in the divorce proceedings in Cobb County Superior Court. Some courts have held that the accused's desire to participate in pending civil actions is not a special circumstance. See Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir.1991); see also United States v. Hills, 765 F.Supp. 381 (E.D.Mich.1991). However, in the instant case, the civil proceedings in Cobb County Superior Court are directly related to the reasons for his extradition and the resolution of the issues in that matter could directly affect the prosecution of the charges he faces in France. Accusations by Mr. Bowey's estranged wife and the French Government should not be allowed to limit his ability to attend the divorce and custody proceedings by entangling him in extradition proceedings, particularly when the divorce and custody issues are the underlying disputes from which all these proceedings arise.

Bowey 147 F. Supp. 2d at 1367–1368.

187 The difference in the standard applied between domestic bail cases and extradition proceedings is best illustrated in the case of Duca v. United States, in which the magistrate, after finding probable cause to support extradition, indicated that he would have granted the relator continued release on bail if the case were a domestic criminal proceeding; however, he could not find any exceptional circumstances that would warrant bail in the context of an extradition proceeding. 1995 WL 428636, at 4 (E.D.N.Y.

Detention of a person for periods of up to ninety days[188] without "probable cause" and without bail is of questionable constitutional validity, but it remains in practice.

The Northern District Court in Illinois held in In re Extradition of Molnar:

> Some ninety nine years ago in Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 23 S.Ct. 781, 47 L.Ed. 948 (1903), the Supreme Court held that while bail should not ordinarily be granted in extradition cases, release was not foreclosed where special circumstances exist. 190 U.S. at 63, 23 S.Ct. 781. The courts that have interpreted Wright v. Henkel generally agree that there is a presumption against bail in an extradition case and that a defendant facing an extradition hearing has the burden of establishing special circumstances in order for a court to order pre-hearing conditional release. Salerno v. United States, 878 F.2d 317 (9th Cir.1989); United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159 (2d Cir.1986). The rationale for distinguishing pretrial release in extradition cases from federal criminal cases is that extradition cases involve an overriding national interest in complying with treaty obligations. If the United States were to release a foreign fugitive pending extradition and the defendant absconded, the resulting diplomatic embarrassment would have an effect on foreign relations and the ability of the United States to obtain extradition of its fugitives. U.S. v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442 (S.D. Cal.1990). Also see generally, Hall, A Recommended Approach to Bail in International Extradition Cases. 86 Mich.L.Rev. 599 (1987); Whiteman, 6 Digest of International Law, 1033–1044 (1968). Additionally, because an extradition proceeding is not a criminal case, the Bail Reform Act of 1984 does not govern, nor is its presumption in favor of bail a part of extradition proceedings. Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225, 1227–1228 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817, 105 S.Ct. 85, 83 L.Ed.2d 32 (1984).[189]

The Second Circuit in Caltagirone held that the relator was entitled to a hearing to establish the existence of "probable cause" justifying his detention, stating:

> Article XIII requires applications for provisional arrest to set forth "such further information as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party." Clearly, the parallelism was intended by the Treaty's draftsmen, and this suggests that in all cases where the United States is the "requested party," a showing of probable cause is required under both articles [Article XIII, which deals with provisional arrests, and Article XI, which governs formal requests for extradition].[190]

In Caltagirone the court concluded that even though Italy had issued warrants for the relator's arrest for fraudulent bankruptcy, the warrants were insufficient to satisfy the treaty requirements set forth in Article XIII.[191] As a result, the realtor was granted bail, and after pending for four years, the Italian Supreme Court reversed the lower court order on which the extradition request was based. Thus extradition was denied and the realtor was free to leave the United

---

July 7, 1995). See also In re Extradition of Russell, 805 F.2d 1215, 1216 (5th Cir. 1986); In re Extradition of Sacirbegovic, 280 F. Supp. 2d 81 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (granting bail.).

188 It is important to note that relators are often detained longer than the ninety days. See In re Extradition of Siegmund, 887 F. Supp. 1383, 1387 (D. Nev. 1995) (holding that "a ninety-day wait while extradition proceedings are in the works would not even come close to violating defendant's due process rights").

189 In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 F. Supp. 2d 684, 686–687 (N.D. Ill. 2002).

190 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739, 744 (2d Cir. 1980).

191 The court stated:

> Article XIII of the Treaty provides that an application for provisional arrest must contain four elements: a description of the person sought; an indication of intent formally to request the extradition of the person; an allegation that a warrant for the person's arrest has been issued by the requesting state; and, finally, "such further information, if any, as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party."

Id.

States. Had the relator in this case not been released on bail he would have needlessly spent four years in jail.[192]

Because most treaty provisions do not specify what information must be sent along with the provisional arrest request, most requests are sent via a one-page fax; therefore, it is likely that the relator may be detained absent the knowledge of the bases for the charges pending against him. As discussed below, in order for the detainee-relator to avail himself/herself of bail, he/she must prove: (1) that he/she is subject to "special circumstances" warranting his/her bail, and (2) that he/she is not a risk of flight. However, it is very difficult to demonstrate "special circumstances" when the detainee-relator is unaware of the legal bases of the charges pending against him, and it is equally difficult for the relator to prove he/she is not a risk of flight as the facts relevant to such an inquiry usually corresponds with the type of crime he/she is charged with. Therefore, for all practical purposes, this process has given the government the right to detain people without due process of law on the sole representation of the requesting government and with no more than a fax containing a few lines regarding the applicable treaty provision, the person sought for extradition, and the charge.

Detention of a relator without bail has become the government's favorite tool to pressure a person into waiving his/her right to challenge the request in extradition proceedings, and thereby consent to extradition. It is also a way to reduce the relator's will to fight extradition. This is particularly effective in white collar crimes where the relator is unaccustomed to jail conditions. It is also an effective way of pressuring relators who do not have the economic capabilities to sustain an extended period of litigation while incarcerated and without the means to earn income to pay for their defense and support their families. In many cases, the government also combines its efforts to keep the relator detained with the freezing of his/her assets, thereby depriving him/her of the opportunity to secure representation. The fact that the relator is detained also makes it more difficult for him/her to fight the government's freezing of his/her assets. This is why the government in almost all extradition cases opposes bail and works constantly to encourage judges in the belief that there is no right to bail under the Eighth Amendment, and that there is a presumption against bail. This leaves the relator with the limited right of proving "special circumstances," and proving he/she is not a risk of flight, before being eligible for bail, as discussed below.[193]

The question of whether there exists a constitutional right to bail has been avoided by U.S. courts because it appeared moot insofar as a right to bail was available under the "special circumstances" standard that was espoused in 1903 by the U.S. Supreme Court in Wright v. Henkel.[194] Defining the role of lower courts in granting bail, the Supreme Court stated:

> We are unwilling to hold that the Circuit Courts possess no power in respect of admitting to bail other than as specifically vested by statute or that, while bail should not ordinarily be granted in 192 An example of a relator who was denied bail only to be released upon a finding that there was no probable cause to support the extradition request was Edward Mazur. Mr. Mazur spent about two-and-a-half months in jail on baseless charges. See Bruce Zagaris, Delays Plague U.S. Extradition in Polish Contract Murder Case, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 263–264 (July 2007). The magistrate judge stated the only "special circumstance" in this case was "the heinous and high profile nature of the crime." Id. at 264. Mazur was released after the decision of July 20 in In re Extradition of Mazur, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52551 (N.D. Il. 2007). This shows that the political nature of the proceedings can cloud the court's focus on the relator's rights.

193 See United States v. Epstein, in which the magistrate judge allowed bail, but the decision was reversed by the Eastern District court on the grounds that the defendant lacked ties with the United States but had extensive ties to Brazil with which the United States did not have an extradition treaty. Interestingly, both the decision to grant bail and to reverse it did not delve into the standard of "special circumstances." United States v. Epstein, 155 F. Supp. 2d 323 (E.D. Penn. 2001).

194 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903).

> cases of foreign extradition, those courts may not in any case, and whatever the special circumstances, extend that relief.[195]

Even though the Wright case recognized lower courts' right to grant bail absent a specific statutory or treaty provision, it mandated that bail only be granted in "special circumstances."[196] Therefore, special circumstances became the constitutional standard for the granting of bail. Through the years, the "special circumstances" standard has been disconnected from the right to bail; as a result, "special circumstances" has been transformed into a presumptive anti-bail standard. On its face, the standard appears to be neutral; however, because the Wright court failed to define what would qualify as "special circumstances" and did not address the constitutional implications of its decision, the standard has been inconsistently applied.[197]

In 1997, the Ninth Circuit, in Parretti v. United States, which was vacated on other grounds, reopened the question of whether a constitutional right to bail exists by holding that "until such time as an individual is found to be extraditable, his or her Fifth Amendment interest trumps the government's treaty interest unless the government proves to the satisfaction of the district court that he or she is a flight risk."[198] Therefore, under Parretti, if it were to be in effect, the relator's right to bail would be subject to the same standards as applied to criminal cases, thereby recognizing the existence of a presumption for bail except in cases in which the government can prove that the relator is a flight risk or possibly a danger to the community. No other circuit so far has adopted the Parretti standard, and, therefore most courts continue to apply the "special circumstances" standard. For example, and in opposition to the Parretti decision, the District Court for the District of Connecticut stated: the special circumstances "standard was set by the United States Supreme Court and has been followed by every court, except the Ninth Circuit in Parretti, for the past 90 years; and this court will not now disregard it or brand it unconstitutional."[199]

The fact that the relator in Parretti fled from the United States to Italy raises the question of whether relators should be given bail in any circumstance.[200] This is a significant question,

---

195 Id. at 63 (emphasis added).

196 Id. Interestingly, in Wright, the relator's petition for bail on the grounds that continued incarceration would be injurious to his health by precipitating pneumonia was rejected as failing to constitute "special circumstances." Traditionally, bail pending extradition is granted only under "special circumstances." Borodin v. Ashcroft, 136 F. Supp. 2d 125 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) ("special circumstances" are limited to situations in which the justification for release is "pressing as well as plain"); United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159, 161 (2d Cir. 1986); Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914, 920 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied 454 U.S. 971 (1981); Beaulieu v. Hartigan, 554 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1977); In re Mitchell, 171 F. 289 (S.D.N.Y. 1909) (defining the scope of "special circumstances" as those that are "the most pressing…and when the requirements of justice are absolutely peremptory.").

197 See Wright, 190 U.S. 40.

198 Parretti v. United States, 112 F.3d 1363, 1384 (9th Cir. 1997), vacated by 143 F.3d 508 (9th Cir. 1998), cert. denied 1998 U.S. LEXIS 5702 (1998). Parretti had been granted bail on the unprecedented basis that the Sixth Amendment applied, as opposed to "the special circumstances test" for bail provided for in Wright, 190 U.S. 40. The opinion of the Ninth Circuit in this case was probably the most far-reaching of any extradition case in any circuit in the United States with respect to issues of bail and probable cause, thus, making it more regrettable that the opinion had to be vacated after Parretti jumped bail and escaped to Italy where he was held non-extraditable because Italy's constitution prohibited the extradition of nationals. The United States could have asked Italy to prosecute him, as the Italian Criminal Code allows for prosecution of nationals. This was done with respect to the Venezia case, where Italy denied extradition because of the death penalty in the United States, but prosecuted him on the basis of the nationality principle. He was found guilty of murder on the same facts underlying the Florida indictment for murder for which his extradition was denied.

199 In re Extradition of Rovelli, 977 F. Supp. 566, 567 (D. Conn. 1997).

200 Joshua T. Fougere, Let's Try This Again: Reassessing the Right to Bail in Cases of International Extradition, 42 Colum. J.L. & Soc. Probs. 177 (2008) (arguing against bail pending extradition, in part, based on potential foreign relations embarrassment if the released relator flees again).

particularly as international extradition requests have increased in number over time, and the United States may seek to extradite terrorism suspects who are not subjected to abduction or unlawful seizure, including extraordinary rendition.[201] Rather than allow for bail, some have suggested that a relator only be allowed to challenge government delay in conducting an extradition hearing following provisional arrest or the filing of a formal extradition request, either through a writ of habeas corpus or a mandamus.[202] This suggestion is based on the claim that: (1) the "special circumstances" outlined in Wright v. Henkel was dicta; (2) legislative history shows that legislators were more concerned with compliance with treaty requirements than with providing bail to a relator; (3) bail is a function of an Article III court under the U.S. Constitution, and does not obtain in Article II proceedings concerning extradition; and (4) analogous immigration proceedings allow a challenge to unreasonable detention in the removal context, which could be applied to extradition.[203] The suggestion that, absent a legislative action by the U.S. Congress on the matter, the only ground for relief available to the relator should be a challenge to unreasonable government detention pending the extradition hearing is based on the premise that the government will expeditiously seek to institute proceedings against the relator in accord with strict deadlines.[204]

However, this altruistic view of the government's motivations and processes ignores the government's use of detention as a means to pressure the relator to waive extradition proceedings and consent to extradition. According to one proposed standard, the relator could theoretically be detained up to ninety days on a provisional arrest warrant, depending on the treaty involved, and then another six months after the filing of a formal extradition request, before an extradition hearing is set.[205] Spending nine months in a U.S. prison, even if the relator can expect to mount a successful defense to the extradition proceedings, is a harsh prospect to face and a weighty consideration in the decision of whether to waive the hearings altogether.

It is unsurprising that the history of extradition treaty negotiations and federal legislation regarding the extradition process do not confer a right to bail, as historically extradition treaties concerned the relation of sovereign states and the role of the individual in international law was subordinate to that of the state. Thus, the U.S. Supreme Court in Wright, when considering the bail question in the extradition case before it, looked to a British decision in Queen v. Spilsbury in which the court held that British courts had jurisdiction to admit to bail under the common law, independent of statutory provisions.[206] The British case presented the same problem that the U.S. case did: the applicable bail provisions differed as between domestic rendition in Britain and extradition pursuant to the British Extradition Acts.[207] Although the power was to be exercised sparingly, this common-law–based power reflects the practical reality that absent judicial intervention in certain circumstances, there would be no effective way to challenge abuse of detention by the government in the extradition context. This same policy concern remains relevant in the modern context and militates against removing the current bail analysis.

---

201 See Ch. V. See also Fougere, supra note 201, at 180–181 (discussing the increase in international extradition requests over time).

202 Fougere, supra note 201, at 213–224.

203 Id. The case of Zadvydas v. Davis is discussed in this article for an analog to the immigration removal context, to suggest that a six-month delay could allow a relator, like an alien facting removal, to challenge the basis of his continued detention. Id. at 216.

204 Id. at 213–224.

205 Id. at 216.

206 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 63 (1903).

207 Id.

12.2. Jurisprudential Applications of Bail: The Meaning of "Special Circumstances"[208]

Over the years, the reiteration of the "special circumstances" standard has been presented by the government as if it were a presumption against bail because of the likelihood that the relator might flee, which would thwart the United States' ability to fulfill its treaty obligations with the requesting state.[209] Therefore, the determination of whether to grant bail requires federal courts to balance the relator's liberty interest with that of the nation's foreign policy interests. While recognizing the importance of the United States' duty to uphold its treaty obligations, the court in United States v. Messina stated that "the broad authority of the executive in matters bearing on foreign affairs is not absolute when constitutional interests are implicated."[210] However, despite the court's holding, there remains a strong presumption against bail in extradition cases.

Moreover, the actual application of the "special circumstances" standard illustrates that the relator's ability to receive bail is wholly dependent on successfully proving the existence of "special circumstances." Thus, courts have established that the burden of proving "special circumstances" rests on the relator, and only once that is proven can the relator offer evidence that he/she is not a risk of flight. This establishes a double burden of proof on the relator to have access to bail. It should be noted that the "special circumstances" test has been applied to both pre- and post-certification stages of extradition.[211]

"Special circumstances" have come to represent factors that other relators would not normally experience; therefore, they must be extraordinary and unique to that individual. As a result, a realtor's discomfort in jail,[212] his/her minor health problems,[213] or his/her need to consult with counsel or to run an ongoing business have been deemed insufficient to constitute "special 208 For a thorough discussion of all the issues presented in this section, see In re Extradition of Garcia, 761 F. Supp. 2d 468 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

209 See Pavel Borodin v. Ashcroft, 136 F. Supp 2d 125, 128 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) (finding that a presumption against bail exists because of the important national interest in successfully fulfilling United States' obligations under extradition treaties with other countries); In re Mainero, 950 F. Supp. 290, 293 (S.D. Cal. 1996) (finding that a presumption against bail exists; the court quoted Wright v. Henkel, in which the Supreme Court stated that "the demanding government is entitled to delivery of the accused on the issue of proper warrant, and the other government is under obligation to make the surrender; an obligation which it might be impossible to fulfill if release on bail were permitted."); United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 444 (S.D. Cal. 1990) (stating that "[i]f the United States were to release a foreign fugitive pending extradition and the defendant absconded, the resulting diplomatic embarrassment would have an effect on foreign relations and the ability of the United States to obtain extradition of its fugitives."); United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159 (2d Cir. 1986) (stating that "issues of comity, and the nation's concern for its relationship with other countries requires the court to apply standards in an extradition case far more strict than those applied in a domestic criminal cases."). See also Fougere, supra note 201 (arguing against bail pending extradition, in part, based on potential foreign relations embarrassment if the released relator flees again).

210 United States v. Messina, 566 F. Supp. 740 (E.D.N.Y. 1983).

211 Wroclawski v. United States, 634 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1005 (D. Ariz. 2009).

212 United States v. Williams, 611 F.2d 914, 915 (1st Cir. 1979).

213 The court in In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge held that because the relator's condition was not debilitating and easy to control, his health condition did not warrant a finding of special circumstances. 829 F. Supp. 1210, 1216 (D. Nev. 1993) (citing United States v. Kidder, 869 F.2d 1328, 1330–1331 (9th Cir. 1989), in which the court stated that to avoid incarceration defendant "must show that no constitutionally acceptable treatment can be provided while he is imprisoned"); United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442 (S.D. Cal. 1990) (holding that health problems must be unique or they cannot be dealt with while in custody so as to warrant a finding of special circumstances).

circumstances." For example, in United States v. Tang Yee-Chun, the court rejected granting bail because the relator, who was from Hong Kong and spoke a unique Chinese dialect, did not adequately demonstrate that it was more burdensome for him to defend his case while being detained.[214]

It should be emphasized that the "special circumstances" standard is a separate and independent issue from that of the risk-of-flight inquiry. A two-part test[215] best highlights the analysis that courts face when deciding whether the relator should be afforded the right to bail: (1) the court must ascertain whether any "special circumstances" exist;[216] and (2) if "special circumstances" do exist, the court must determine whether the relator presents a risk of flight.[217] The court in In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge stated that "given that special circumstances are absolutely required for bail, and that risk of flight is not determinative, the best approach first explores special circumstances, and then only after a finding of special circumstances examines risk of flight."[218] The fact that the relator is not a flight risk is not considered a "special circumstance;"[219] instead, "special circumstances" constitute a threshold that a person must reach in order to be considered for bail.

---

214 United States v. Tang Yee-Chun, 657 F. Supp. 1270 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

215 Currently, courts are split on whether the analysis should begin with "special circumstances" and then move to the risk of flight inquiry, or with the risk of flight inquiry and then analyze the existence of "special circumstances." For purposes of this book, the former analysis will be accepted as the test for deciding whether to grant bail. Courts that begin with the risk of flight inquiry reason that such point is the correct starting point because of the connection between the presumption against bail and the relator's flight risk. See Salerno v. United States, 878 F.2d 317, 318 (9th Cir. 1989) (espousing a two-part test to analyze whether the relator should be afforded the right to bail; the first part of the test requires the court to ascertain whether the relator is a flight risk, and if the relator is not a flight risk, then the court must consider whether any "special circumstances" exist. These cases are, however, cited as illustrations of what "special circumstances" have been considered and the standards used to establish "special circumstances.") See United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 445 (S.D. Cal. 1990) (found that the relator did not pose a flight risk, and then analyzed whether "special circumstances" existed warranting realtor's bail); In re Extradition of Russell, 647 F. Supp. 1044, 1049 (S.D. Tex.), aff'd, 805 F.2d 1215 (5th Cir. 1986); United States v. Smyth, 795 F. Supp. 973, 976 (N.D. Cal. 1992) (stating that "the court follows the analysis employed in Taitz which held that, under Salerno, the court must first determine whether there is a risk of flight. If there is no risk of flight, the court must then determine whether "special circumstances" exist which support granting release on bail.").

216 Courts will likely deny bond if no special circumstances are presented in support of a relator's request for release on bond, even if the relator raises a fear of torture if extradited. See generally In re Extradition of Stern, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79486, at *14 (S.D. Fla. 2007).

217 The district court in In the Matter of the Extradition of Mainero found that in the absence of a finding of "special circumstances" it becomes unnecessary to assess the risk of flight. 950 F. Supp. 290, 295 (S.D. Cal. 1996) See also In re Extradition of Morales, 906 F. Supp 1368 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (finding that the "special circumstances" inquiry comes first, and if "special circumstances" are shown, then the person must demonstrate that he will not flee or pose a danger to the community). See also In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054 (E.D.N.Y. 2011) (finding that the relator must first establish "special circumstances" exist and then show that the relator is "neither a risk of flight nor a danger to the community").

218 In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210, 1216 (D. Nev. 1993).

219 United States v. Tang Yee-Chun, 657 F. Supp. 1270 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (holding that "even if he could prove a low risk of flight, such a finding would not be a sufficient showing of 'special circumstances' in and of itself to justify bail"). In re Russell, 805 F.2d 1215, 1217 (5th Cir. 1986); United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159, 161 (2d Cir. 1986); United States v. Williams, 611 F.2d 914, 915 (1st Cir. 1979) ("Applicant's arguable acceptability as a tolerable bail risk is not a special circumstance.") (citations omitted); In re Martinov, No. 06mj336, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87389, at *2 (N.D. Iowa Dec. 1, 2006); In re Santos, 473 F. Supp. 2d 1030, 1035–1036 (C.D. Cal. 2006); In re Harrison, No. 03 CR.

Once deemed eligible for bail the relator must pass the risk-of-flight test, which involves an assessment of several factors, including: (1) the type of crime committed, (2) the possible danger the realtor may pose to the community, (3) the relator's past criminal conduct, (4) the realtor's past behavior with other court dates,[220] (5) the relator's ties to the community, (6) the relator's relationship with his/her place of origin, and (7) the relator's character.[221] However, it should be remembered again that the "special circumstances" assessment is also a factor, and that a finding that the relator is not a flight risk will not in and of itself justify bail in an extradition case.[222]

As is apparent, the factors identified above closely mirror those applied in bail hearings in Article III cases. Indeed, although the Bail Reform Act is not formally applicable to bail hearings in extradition proceedings, its factors have been used as a reference point for establishing flight risk.[223]

An example of the application of these factors came in In re Extradition of Ernst, where the federal district court for the Southern District of New York held that the relator was a low risk of flight based on the following factors:

1. Ernst had lived and worked in the community for approximately ten years;

2. The Pretrial Services Agency reported that Ernst had a stable family consisting of his wife and two sons;

3. Ernst was not accused of a violent crime;

MISC. 01, 2004 WL 1145831, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. May 21, 2004); In re Sacirbegovic, 280 F. Supp.2d 81, 88 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 F. Supp. 2d 684, 687 (N.D. Ill. 2002); Borodin v. Ashcroft, 136 F. Supp. 2d 125, 130 (E.D.N.Y. 2001); Hababou v. Albright, 82 F. Supp. 2d 347, 352 (D.N.J. 2000); In re Gonzalez, 52 F. Supp. 2d 725, 735 (W.D. La. 1999); Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622, 628 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); United States v. Bogue, No. CRIM.A. 98-572-M, 1998 WL 966070, at *4 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); In re Ernst, No. 97 CRIM.MISC.1PG.22, 1998 WL 51130, at *13 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 5, 1998); In re Rovelli, 977 F. Supp. 566, 568 (D. Conn. 1997); In re Mainero, 950 F. Supp. 290, 295 (S.D. Cal. 1996); Duca v. United States, No. 95-713, 1995 WL 428636, at *16 (E.D.N.Y. July 7, 1995); In re Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537, 539 (N.D. Ill. 1993); United States. v. Smyth, 795 F. Supp. 973, 976 (N.D. Cal. 1992); United States v. Hills, 765 F. Supp. 381, 386 (E.D. Mich. 1991); United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 445 (S.D. Cal. 1990); cf. Salerno v. United States, 878 F.2d 317, 318 (9th Cir. 1989) ("[Flight risk] is not the requirement for release in an extradition case.").

220 Where the relator has fought his removal in legal proceedings for years, this has supported a finding that the relator does not pose a flight risk. See United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp. 2d 49, 63–64 (D. Mass. 2010).

221 In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210, 1222 (D. Nev. 1993). See also In re Extradition of Santos, 473 F. Supp. 2d 1030, 1041 (C.D. Cal. 2006), stating:

> Among other things, the court may consider the nature and circumstances of the charged offenses; the weight of evidence against the potential extraditee presented in the extradition complaint and supporting affidavits; the seriousness of the offense charged and the range of possible penalties; the potential extraditee's past conduct, including history of drug or alcohol abuse, any prior criminal convictions and association with known criminals and evidence of attempts to avoid arrest; the potential extraditee's use of or access to dangerous weapons; his or her family ties and ties to the community, employment, and financial resources; whether the potential extraditee's release poses a danger to any person or to the community; and the possibilities of posting security for an appropriate bond.

222 In re Extradition of Rovelli, 977 F. Supp. 566, 568 (D. Conn. 1997). Rovelli, who was held without bail, consented to his return to Italy where after nine months' detention "under investigation," he was released. See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 710, at *39 (citing United States v. Letiner, 784 F.2d 159, 161 (2d Cir. 1986)).

223 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp.2d 662, 667–671 (E.D. Tex. 2008) (applying the Bail Reform Act factors and determining that the relator was not a flight risk).

4. Ernst had no criminal record in the United States; and

5. Ernst faced a relatively modest two-year sentence in Switzerland.[224]

However, even though Ernst was found to be a low flight risk, the court refused to grant bail because he had failed to prove "special circumstances," an inversion of the usual practice of assessing special circumstances before considering the specific factors enunciated above. This was not the case in In re Extradition of Kapoor, where the federal district court for the Eastern District of New York found that the relator did not pose a flight risk as he had established ties to the community in the United States, established a family in the United States, and agreed to strict conditions of release.[225]

In In re Extradition of Garcia the federal district court for the Southern District of Texas also inverted the order and considered whether the relator posed a flight risk before considering the existence of "special circumstances." In that case the relator, Garcia, was found to be a flight risk and a danger to the community for the following reasons:

1. He desired to avoid an inhumane death for being a government informant;

2. He was charged with a crime of violence facing a potential sentence of twenty to fifty years in prison;

3. He had virtually no ties to Mexico (the requesting state);

4. He had no ties to the Laredo (Texas) community (where he lived); and

5. He had a criminal history in the United States, including two felony drug convictions, two other drug arrests, and a misdemeanor driving offense.[226]

Accordingly, Garcia's bail request was denied.

The effects of the Wright decision and its progeny on the relator's ability to receive bail have made bail in extradition the exception. The courts have, however, recognized various factors as constituting "special circumstances." They include: (1) length of the proceedings and detention, (2) the relator's need to consult with counsel due to the complicated nature of the case, (3) health condition of the relator,[227] (4) age of the relator, (5) availability of bail to relator at home or abroad, (6) likelihood of the relator showing absence of probable cause or showing the applicability of a treaty defense, (7) deprivation of religious practices while incarcerated; (8) attendance at other legal proceedings, (9) the court's liberal application of the bail standard, (10) lack of any diplomatic necessity for detention, and (11) the relator's work with special groups.

The following situations have been deemed to constitute "Special Circumstances:"

---

224 Ernst, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 710, at *39.

225 In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054, at *14–*15 (E.D.N.Y. 2011).

226 In re Extradition of Garcia, 761 F. Supp.2d 468, 476–477 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

227 But see In re Kim, No. CV 04-3886-ABC (PLA), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12244 (C.D. Cal. 2004) (holding that health condition of bad back did not require release on bail). See also In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210 (D. Nev. 1993); In re Extradition of Morales, 906 F. Supp. 1368 (S.D. Cal. 1995); In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 F. Supp. 2d 684 (N.D. Ill. 2002) (granting bail because it was warranted under the circumstances, even though they did not constitute special circumstances); In re Extradition of Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (denying bail even though relator had heart condition, as it was treatable with medication); In re Extradition of Gonzalez, 52 F. Supp. 2d 725 (W.D. Louisiana) (granting bail where a court found that relator had a reasonable likelihood of succeeding on the merits of the extradition due to the unreliability of the principle witness in the case); In re Extradition of Mainero, 950 F. Supp. 290 (S.D. Cal. 1996) (looking at cumulative effect of several factors to constitute special circumstances); United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442 (S.D. Cal. 1990) (allergic reactions to common food and substances in prisons was deemed special circumstances).

12.2.1. Length of the Proceedings and Detention

Courts have not established a bright-line rule defining when the length of the proceedings or detention is so excessive as to warrant a finding of "special circumstances." Instead, this determination is largely dependent on the facts of the case and the reasons for the delay. For example, the court in In re Gannon granted bail because the hearing was delayed for more than two months due to the difficulty in obtaining witnesses.[228] Similarly, in Vardy v. United States, the relator was granted bail because his case had already been pending for two years following his arrest.[229] In In re Extradition of Santos, the court reasoned that a seven-month delay constituted a special circumstance where evidence showed that the relator twice successfully challenged the underlying Mexican arrest warrant through an amparo action, showing that this was not an ordinary delay in extradition matters.[230] In In re Extradition of Morales the court held that: "the seven months which have already passed, together with the additional time the Court anticipated will be required before this matter is resolved, to be an undue delay and to constitute a special circumstance justifying Morales' release on bail."[231]

These cases can be distinguished from United States v. Leitner, in which the court found that a six-month delay in executing a provisional arrest warrant did not present a "special circumstance" because the relator was not detained during this period of time.[232] Similarly, in United States v. Nolan, the federal district court for the Northern District of Illinois reasoned that a seven-month delay by the government in filing charges was not sufficient to constitute "special circumstances."[233]

It has been held that "the normal passage of time inherent in the litigation process [does not] constitute[] a 'special circumstance.' "[234] Further, mere anticipation of delay is generally insufficient to constitute "special circumstances."[235] However, in certain circumstances, the "normal length of proceedings" can be extended beyond that which truly constitutes the normal length of a proceeding. For example, a court found that an eleven-year delay in seeking the relator's

---

228 In re Gannon, 27 F.2d 362 (E.D. Pa. 1928). It should be noted that the court's decision was also influenced by the fact that the offense committed by the relator was bailable under both the laws of Pennsylvania and the laws of Canada, the country seeking extradition. Id.

229 United States v. Williams, 611 F.2d 914, 915 (1st Cir. 1979). See also In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210, 1215 (D. Nev. 1993).

230 In re Extradition of Santos, 473 F. Supp. 2d 1030, 1036–1038 (C.D. Cal. 2006).

231 In re Extradition of Morales, 906 F. Supp. 1368, 1374–1375 (S.D. Cal. 1995).

232 United States v. Leitner, 784 F.2d 159 (1986).

233 United States v. Nolan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111299, at *5 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

234 United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 83 F.3d 523, 525 (1st Cir. 1996). In United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, where an officer of the British American Tobacco Co. was accused of conspiracy to receive bribes in order to monopolize the export of cigarettes to China, the court held that protracted proceedings, because of Hong Kong's reversion, did not justify release on bail; however, the court noted that if an unusual delay was to transpire, the relator would be able to file a new motion for release on bail. Id., on remand 939 F. Supp. 934 (D. Mass 1996),habeas corpus granted by 957 F. Supp. 1280 (D. Mass 1997),rev'd by 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997).See also United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp.2d 49, 57 (D. Mass. 2010). The relator was a lieutenant in the Peruvian military alleged to have been involved in a massacre of civilians. However, after legal proceedings, it was undisputed that neither the relator nor his troops engaged in the massacre. The relator had also applied for amnesty based on threats on his life by the Peruvian Communist Party, and had been in related proceedings since 1993. This protracted history supported the court's reasoning that the length of proceedings constituted "special circumstances." See also United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 676 (E.D. Tex. 2008).

235 In re Extradition of Juarez-Saldana, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58434, at *10 (W.D. Tenn. 2009). The court has also considered the record before it to determine whether proceedings are likely to be protracted. In re Extradition of Patel, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28399, at *6 (D. Or. 2008).

extradition constituted "special circumstances," but the government attempted to justify the delay, purely on conjecture, by arguing that it resulted from an investigation in the requesting state.[236]

Where the anticipated length of delay was due to complex arguments that the relator intended to raise, one court combined this factor with another factor to support a finding of "special circumstances."[237] Another court held that anticipated delay did not constitute a "special circumstance" where the government was ready to hold the extradition hearing and the delay was caused by the relator's defense.[238]

12.2.2. Need to Consult with Counsel

On occasion courts will find a "special circumstance" where the relator can show the need to consult with his/her counsel. For the most part, however, courts have been reluctant to grant bail on the basis of the relator's need to consult and work with counsel. Instead, the relator must prove that it is almost impossible for him/her to defend his/her case while incarcerated irrespective of his/her constitutional right to the effectiveness of representation and due process requirements. This is surely an unfair standard.[239]

In In re Mitchell, the court held that the relator's need to consult with his counsel constituted a "special circumstance." In that case, the relator was charged with larceny by the requesting state, but the U.S. district court released him on bail on the grounds that his continued detention rendered him incapable of consulting with his counsel. The court was careful to emphasize that it was imperative for the relator to obtain the advice of counsel because his entire fortune depended upon doing so. This assertion was the main ground upon which the court rested its opinion:

> [I]t seems to me that the hardship here upon the imprisoned person is so great as to make peremptory some kind of enlargement at the present time, for the purpose only of free consultation in the conduct of civil suit upon which his whole fortune depends.

The decision in Mitchell has been attributed not only to the fact that the relator's whole fortune was dependent on the outcome of the case, but also the immediacy of the trial.

In United States v. Smyth the court also found that the relator's need to consult with his attorney warranted bail because his defense was particularly fact intensive, rather than legal in nature, which has been rejected as a "special circumstance" because it does not require the relator's participation to ensure a fair defense. The court in Smyth stated that:

> Smyth must be given the opportunity to aid his counsel in the difficult task of amassing evidence, from another part of the world, regarding events which occurred between eight and fifteen years ago. It is highly unlikely that Smyth's counsel will be able to locate key witnesses or evidence without his extensive aid.[240]

---

236 Wroclawski v. United States, 634 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1008 (D. Ariz. 2009).

237 In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054, at *11–*12 (E.D.N.Y. 2011) (involving complex CAT claims).

238 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 676 (E.D. Tex. 2008).

239 United States v. Tang Yee-Chun, 657 F. Supp. 1270, (S.D.N.Y. 1987). See also United States v. Messina, 566 F. Supp. 740, 743 (E.D.N.Y. 1983), in which the relator contended that special circumstances existed because he needed to assist his attorney to prepare his substantive defenses to the extradition hearings; however, the court disagreed, holding that because the issues being dealt with were purely legal, the relator's personal participation was unnecessary.

240 United States v. Smyth, 795 F. Supp. 973, 977 (N.D. Cal. 1992). See also United States v. Hills, 765 F. Supp. 381, 385 n.5 (E.D. Mich. 1991) (denying bail, the court stated that "pending civil litigation" and "the defendant's asserted needs to consult with his attorney to assist in the preparation of defense of the extradition proceedings" were not independently sufficient to demonstrate "special circumstances").

By contrast, in In re Extradition of Russell the court rejected the relator's claim that his pending civil action was a "special circumstance" even though a large part of his economic stability was tied to the case. The court reasoned that the relator had sufficient time to consult with his attorney prior to the beginning of the case; as a result, his situation did not warrant a finding of "special circumstances." Courts have refused to find the existence of "special circumstances" when the relator's pending litigation has not reached the trial stage and his/her whole fortune is not dependent on the outcome of the case.[241]

12.2.3. Health Condition of the Relator

Most courts have been reluctant to find that a relator's health condition constitutes a "special circumstance," unless the relator can prove that his/her health problems are unique and cannot be dealt with while detained. For instance, in the landmark case Wright v. Henkel the Supreme Court acknowledged the lower federal courts' power to grant bail to persons facing extradition; however, bail was denied to the relator in that case who presented an affidavit showing that he suffered from bronchitis and the chills.[242] Instead, the Supreme Court upheld the district court's finding that the petitioner's health condition was not an "unusual circumstance" warranting bail.[243]

Similarly, in In re Nacif-Borge the court rejected the relator's argument that his health condition, which included the fact that he only had one kidney and required a special diet plus exercise, warranted a finding of special circumstances. The court stated that "because his condition is not debilitating and is easy to control, his health condition does not warrant a finding of special circumstances."[244] In In re Extradition of Garcia the court declined to find that the relator's back problems and growth on his neck, both requiring surgery, constituted "special circumstances" because the relator did not establish that "his condition is either life-threatening or so serious that his medical needs cannot be accommodated by the United States Marshal's Service while in custody."[245]

It is also imperative for the relator to show a deterioration in his/her health caused by the confinement.[246] However, courts have rejected relators' petitions for bail when they arise out 241 In re Extradition of Koskotas, 127 F.R.D. 13(D. Mass. 1989) (finding that the fact that the relator is currently involved in a civil suit is not automatic grounds for bail; instead the relator's "whole fortune" must be involved in the civil suit); In re Extradition of Russell, 647 F. Supp. 1044 (S.D. Tex. 1986) (rejecting the granting of bail, the court distinguished this case from In re Mitchell by stating that the relator is not on the eve of a complex civil litigation that involves his whole fortune).

---

242 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 43 (1903).

243 Id.

244 The court also took into consideration that since the realtor had been detained he had not taken affirmative steps to request a special diet, or to make use of the exercise equipment in the detention facility. See In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge (D. Nev. 1993) (citing United States v. Kidder, 869 F.2d 1328, 1330–1331 (9th Cir. 1989), in which the court stated that to avoid incarceration the relator "must show that no constitutionally acceptable treatment can be provided while he is imprisoned."). See Bolanos v. Mukasey, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87991, at *11 (D.N.J. 2009) ("Bolanos's application for bail alleges that she can obtain better health care for her cancer in a private medical setting than she can obtain in prison. The mere availability of a better, private form of medical treatment is not sufficient to overcome the presumption against bail.")

245 In re Extradition of Garcia, 761 F. Supp. 2d 468, 481–482 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

246 In re Extradition of Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537, 541 n.9 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (holding that a realtor who has a heart condition that can be controlled with medication that can be administered in the detention facility does not constitute a "special circumstance" warranting bail). But see In re Kim, No. CV 04-3886-ABC (PLA), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12244 (C.D. Cal. 2004) (holding that health condition of bad back did not require release on bail). See also In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210 (D. Nev. 1993); In re Extradition of Morales, 906 F. Supp. 1368 (S.D. Cal. 1995); In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 of a general discomfort with confinement or stress associated with such confinement.[247] In United States v. Nolan the federal district court for the Northern District of Illinois rejected the relator's application, holding that where the relator was receiving treatment for it, skin cancer leading to a deterioration of his health did not qualify as "special circumstances."[248]

However, in United States v. Taitz the court granted bail to the realtor who suffered from an allergic reaction to corn and corn sweeteners, which were common substances used in the food at the detention center, and an allergic reaction to the soap used to wash the inmates' clothing.[249] The court noted that because of the realtor's allergic reactions caused by certain substances within the detention center, the realtor's health had clearly deteriorated due to his confinement.

Courts have also refused to recognize the deteriorating health of a relator's family member as a "special circumstance" warranting bail. In the case of Lo Duca v. United States the relator argued that his wife's advanced Alzheimer's disease and his role as her primary caretaker constituted "special circumstances."[250] The court reasoned that because the realtor's wife was being cared for by other family members, the relator's justification for release was not "pressing as well as plain." Therefore, the court refused to grant bail, leaving the "special circumstances" standard as narrow and strict as it previously was.[251]

12.2.4. Age of the Relator

A relator's character or specific traits are not usually sufficient grounds to justify bail.[252] However, in Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia the court found that because the relator was only sixteen years old when he allegedly committed a robbery in Hong Kong, and no suitable detention center could be found for him, bail was warranted.[253]

12.2.5. Availability of Bail to Relator at Home or Abroad

In 1928, a district court in Gannon laid the foundation for a relator to petition for bail based on the availability of bail in the requesting state and/or the state in which the relator was

---

F. Supp. 2d 684 (N.D. Ill. 2002) (granting bail because it was warranted under the circumstances, even though they did not constitute special circumstances); In re Extradition of Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (denying bail even though relator had heart condition as it was treatable with medication); In re Extradition of Gonzalez, 52 F. Supp. 2d 725 (W.D. Louisiana) (granting bail where a court found that relator had a reasonable likelihood of succeeding on the merits of the extradition due to the unreliability of the principle witness in the case); In re Extradition of Mainero, 950 F. Supp. 290 (S.D. Cal. 1996) (looking at cumulative effect of several factors to constitute special circumstances): United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442 (S.D. Cal. 1990) (allergic reactions to common food and substances in prisons was deemed special circumstances). In re Extradition of Patel, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28399, at *6 (D. Or. 2008) ("the court has not been made aware of any health or age problems arguing for respondent's release").

247 In re Klein, 46 F.2d 85 (S.D.N.Y. 1930); United States v. Nolan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111299, at *6–*7 (N.D. Ill. 2009) (placement in solitary confinement by itself not enough to justify "special circumstances.")

248 United States v. Nolan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111299, at *7 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

249 United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442 (S.D. Cal. 1990).

250 Duca v. United States, 1995 WL 428636, at l (E.D.N.Y. 1995).

251 Financial and emotional hardship to a relator's family where relator was the primary wage earner did not constitute "special circumstances" where this was no different from the hardship experienced by other families in similar circumstances. In re Extradition of Juarez-Saldana, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58434, at *8 (W.D. Tenn. 2009).

252 Id. at *9.

253 Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 971 (1981).

arrested.[254] Thereafter, the availability of bail has been considered a "special circumstance" warranting bail. For example, the court in Gannon granted bail to the relator because of the availability of bail for the underlying substantive offense in both Pennsylvania, where the extraditee was arrested, and the requesting state.[255] Building on the holding in Gannon, the district court in Nacif-Borge granted bail to the relator whose extradition was requested by Mexico for alleged offenses involving tax evasion, as he could prove by "clear and convincing" evidence that bail would be available to him in Mexico on the underlying substantive offense.[256] It is evident that in certain cases bail will be granted if the relator can prove by "clear and convincing" evidence that bail is commonly granted in the requesting state.[257] Bail may also be granted in situations in which the relator can demonstrate the possibility of being granted bail in the requesting state even if bail is not guaranteed.[258]

Some courts have rejected the availability of bail as a "special circumstance" because it "force[s] courts to make searching reviews of foreign laws to determine whether bail is appropriate for a given defendant in a given country for a given offense."[259] Such a review has been considered by some federal courts to be not only troublesome, but unnecessary. Some courts, in reconciling these two opposing views, have reasoned that the possibility of bail may be considered together with other factors to determine whether to grant bail.[260] However, in response, it can be argued that it is the role of the federal courts to ensure the appropriate application of the law, which, at times, may require the court to investigate the applicable laws derived from the extradition treaty.

Other courts consider the availability of bail in the country seeking extradition to be irrelevant to the consideration of whether bail will be available in the extraditing country.[261]

---

254 In re Gannon, 27 F.2d 362 (E.D. Pa. 1928).

255 Id. It is important to note that the decision in Gannon was influenced by other factors, such as the likelihood that the relator might flee if not granted bail and the high probability of a delay in the proceedings because the witnesses were coming from some distance away.

256 In re Extradition of Nacif-Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210 (D. Nev. 1993). While excepting the realtor's petition for bail based on the availability of "special circumstances," the court rejected the relator's other "special circumstances" arguments, which included: (1) substantial claims with a high probability of success; (2) serious deterioration of health during incarceration; (3) unusual delay in the extradition hearing; (4) length and complexity of the extradition proceedings could each constitute a "special circumstance"; (5) the timing of the provisional arrest as indicative of ulterior motives of the government extradition; (6) the nature and seriousness of the underlying offense itself justifying release on bail; (7) character letters and assurances of individuals willing to post bond on the defendant's behalf; and (8) disparate treatment in the requested country. Id. See also Wroclawski v. United States, 634 F. Supp.2d 1003, 1008–1009 (D. Ariz. 2009) (following Nacif-Borge and Gannon on the issue of bail and finding "special circumstances.")

257 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp.2d 662, 675–676 (E.D. Tex. 2008) (unavailability of bail for manslaughter charges in the United Kingdom resulted in the court not finding relator's argument regarding availability of bail a "special circumstance").

258 United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp. 2d 49, 58–59 (D. Mass. 2010) (following the Nacif-Borge line of reasoning).

259 In re Extradition of Siegmund, 887 F. Supp. 1383 (D. Nev. 1995) (citing In re Extradition of Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537 (N.D. Ill 1993)). The court in Siegmund rejected the availability of bail as a "special circumstance" for a relator who was sought for extradition by Austria on charges of aiding and abetting fraudulent bankruptcy. Id.

260 In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054, at *9–*10 (E.D.N.Y. 2011) (reasoning that availability of bail in the requesting state contributed to a finding of lack of diplomatic necessity for denying bail as a "special circumstance"); United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp. 2d 49, 58–59 (D. Mass. 2010).

261 Rouvier, 839 F. Supp. 537.

12.2.6. Likelihood of the Relator Being Found Not-Extraditable (on legal or factual grounds)

A "high probability of success" in winning the underlying charge was recognized as a "special circumstance" in Salerno v. United States.[262] However, the district court in In re Sidali denied bail after finding that the probability of success in avoiding extradition at the hearing was outweighed by the gravity of the relator's offense. Even though the relator argued that there was a high probability that he would not be extradited because he was acquitted twice by local courts in Turkey and was sent a document stating that his arrest had been rescinded, the court refused to recognize his probability of success as a "special circumstance" warranting bail.[263]

In contrast, the Western District of Louisiana in In re Extradition of Gonzalez found that the government's showing of evidence in which to support the relator's extradition was insufficient. The court stated:

> [T]he government of Mexico has an affirmative obligation to properly identify persons being sought for extradition. Article 10 P2(e) of the Treaty requires the government to furnish "facts and personal information of the person sought which will permit his identification and, where possible, information concerning his location" So far, the government has failed to produce any description of the robbers resulting from its own investigation. The government's reliance upon identifications provided by the Lafayette Police Department is highly suspect under these circumstances.[264]

Because of the lack of evidence provided by Mexico, the court found that it would be likely for the relator to prevail in challenging his extradition, thereby warranting bail.

Where the evidence before the court is insufficient, a court will decline to find "special circumstances" or grant bail based on this factor alone.[265] However, where the relator can defeat probable cause, bail is likely to be granted.[266] Roberto Guillermo Bravo, the subject of an Argentine extradition request, was granted bail in a case where eyewitnesses had disappeared or died, he was tried and acquitted of the charges, and he was able to raise a viable political offense exception defense to his extradition.[267]

Where a relator has successfully had the underlying arrest warrant set aside, this has established a high probability of defeating extradition and constituted a "special circumstance" warranting release on bail.[268]

---

262 Salerno v. United States, 878 F.2d 317 (9th Cir. 1989).

263 In re Sidali, 868 F. Supp. 656, 658–659 (D. N.J. 1994).

264 In re Extradition of Gonzalez, 52 F. Supp.2d. 725, 737 (W.D. La. 1999).

265 In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054, at *12–*14 (E.D.N.Y. 2011). See also United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp. 2d 49, 61–63 (D. Mass. 2010) (challenging for lack of probable cause, double jeopardy, and the political offense exception); Wroclawski v. United States, 634 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1008 (D. Ariz. 2009) (challenging for lack of probable cause and application of Polish statute of limitation, but inconsistent results regarding the statute of limitations were reached).

266 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp.2d 662, 679–682 (E.D. Tex. 2008) (distinguishing the low probable cause standard in the United States for the purposes of a finding of extraditability with the higher UK probable cause standard likely to be applied at the relator's trial in finding that the relator was not likely to succeed in obtaining a non-extraditability ruling in the United States).

267 See Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Trial Court Denies Extradition Request on Murder Charges, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 512–514 (Jan. 2011).

268 In re Extradition of Santos, 473 F. Supp. 2d 1030, 1038–1040 (C.D. Cal. 2006) (relator succeeded twice in Mexican amparo challenge to the underlying arrest warrant).

12.2.7. Deprivation of Religious Practices while Incarcerated

Even though the deprivation of religious practices while incarcerated has not by itself justified a finding of "special circumstances," it has been held that such a deprivation should be considered in light of the remaining circumstances.[269] In United States v. Taitz the relator, an Orthodox Jew, was granted bail partly because of his inability to carry out the rituals of his religion due to the lack of materials and facilities in the detention center, while the court also took into consideration other "special circumstances."[270] Had the relator not proven the existence of other "special circumstances" warranting his bail, it is unlikely he would have been released based solely on the deprivation of religious practices. However, in In re Extradition of Patel the disctrict court refused to find "special circumstances" where the relator had difficulty obtaining a diet that comported with his religious practices where the problem was remedied and the relator received appropriate meals.[271]

12.2.8. Attendance at Other Legal Proceedings

In In re Extradition of Bowey the district court held that attendance at another legal proceeding constituted "special circumstances:"

> The Supreme Court has held that while bail should not ordinarily be granted in extradition cases, release was not foreclosed where special circumstances exist. See Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 23 S. Ct. 781, 47 L. Ed. 948 (1903). The Eleventh Circuit has held that there is a presumption against bond, and that a defendant in an extradition case will be released on bail only if he can prove "special circumstances." See Martin v. Warden. Atlanta, Pen, 993 F.2d 824, 827 (1993). This presumption in extradition cases varies from the procedure under the Bail Reform Act of 1984, 18 U.S.C. § 3142, and its presumption in favor of release for persons awaiting trial in federal court for offenses against United States law, except in cases where there is a flight risk or threat of harm to the community or to any person. The reason for distinguishing granting release in extradition cases from federal criminal cases is that extradition cases involve an overriding interest in meeting treaty obligations. "If the United States were to release a foreign fugitive pending extradition and the defendant absconded, the resulting diplomatic embarrassment would have an effect on foreign relations and the ability of the United States to obtain extradition of its fugitives." United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 444 (S.D.Cal. 1990) (citation omitted).
>
> …
>
> Even though Mr. Bowey would be entitled to bail under the Bail Reform Act, because he is facing extradition, the general presumption against bail in extradition cases requires that he also show that special circumstances exist. The first factor that shows special circumstances exist in this case is that releasing Mr. Bowey on bail would allow him to participate in the divorce proceedings in Cobb County Superior Court. Some courts have held that the accused's desire to participate in pending civil actions is not a special circumstance. See Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir. 1991); see also United States v. Hills, 765 F. Supp. 381 (E.D.Mich. 1991). However, in the instant case, the civil proceedings in Cobb County Superior Court are directly related to the reasons for his extradition and the resolution of the issues in that matter could directly affect the prosecution of the charges he faces in France. Accusations by Mr. Bowey's estranged wife and the French Government should not be allowed to limit his ability to attend the divorce and custody proceedings by entangling him in extradition proceedings, particularly when the divorce and custody issues are the underlying disputes from which all these proceedings arise.[272]

---

269 United States v. Taitz, 130 F.R.D. 442, 443 (S.D. Cal. 1990). See also In re Extradition of Alfie-Cassab, No. 89-2493M (S.D. Cal. July 5, 1989), affirmed as modified, July 7, 1989 (Judge Brewster).

270 As previously noted, the court also took into consideration the probability of a lengthy hearing, the relator's severe allergies, the lack of a criminal record, and the lack of a diplomatic necessity for denying bail.

271 In re Extradition of Patel, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28399 (D. Or. 2008).

272 In re Extradition of Bowey, 147 F. Supp. 2d 1365, 1367–1368 (D. Ga. 2001).

A court has also reasoned that the relator proceeding pro se in a workers' compensation matter who is the only one who could attend to pursue the claim does not constitute "special circumstances," because if extradited and incarcerated he would be ineligible to receive workmen's compensation benefits.[273] This appears to be another situation where a court has chosen to combine factors in determining "special circumstances," as the denial of special circumstances on this ground is implicitly based on a finding of lack of success on the merits of any challenge to extradition.

12.2.9. Liberal Application of the Special Circumstances Test

Bail has frequently been granted in international extradition cases without any reference to any deconstruction of the "special circumstances" standard. In United States v. Clark the relator, a U.S. citizen, was sought for extradition by Canada for the crime of importing cannabis resin oil into Canada and with possession of cannabis resin oil for the purpose of trafficking. The court in Clark granted bail following the apprehension of the relator on a provisional arrest warrant without any reference to the "special circumstances" test.[274]

Similarly, in Sindona and in Molnar[275] the court granted bail prior to the extradition hearing without any showing of "special circumstances."[276]

In dicta, the district court in United States v. Ramnath discussed sua sponte how courts could use the Bail Reform Act factors to find "special circumstances" in a case,[277] stating:

> . . . after almost a quarter century of deciding on a daily basis whether a person is entitled to bail, the undersigned should know an appropriate case when he sees it.
>
> This is such a case. Nothing beyond the naked presumption for detention counsels the court to keep Dr. Ramnath confined with the customary contingent of "crackheads," crazies, and miscreants who usually inhabit dank county jails. On the other hand, every rational concern augurs for her release. Her husband and minor children need their wife and mother. Critically ill patients could benefit were she available. She is not a risk of flight. This matter, therefore reflects "most pressing circumstances" where "requirements of justice are absolutely peremptory."[278]

Although the court did state that these factors "weigh[ed] in favor of the court finding a special circumstance relevant to bail" in the case before it, it is unclear to what extent this sua sponte analysis is to be given weight.

In In re Extradition of Kapoor the district court held that a lack of diplomatic necessity for denying bail constituted "special circumstances," stating

> The most compelling argument in favor of release is the Indian government's "significant delay" in bringing its request for extradition. (Transcript of Oral Argument, dated May 26, 2011 ("Tr."), at 5.) The records submitted with the extradition request indicate that the Indian government has had reason to believe that Kapoor was living in Queens, New York, since at least 2002, if not earlier. In addition, the original warrant for Kapoor's arrest was issued in 2003. Unlike in In re Extradition of Garcia, 615 F. Supp. 2d 162, 172 (S.D.N.Y. 2009), in which the court failed to find a lack of diplomatic necessity because numerous hearings had been ongoing

---

273 In re Extradition of Garcia, 761 F. Supp. 2d 468, 482–483 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

274 United States v. Clark, 470 F. Supp. 976 (D. Vt. 1979).

275 In re Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672 (S.D.N.Y. 1978) (following the extradition hearing the court granted Italy's extradition request and issued a warrant for the arrest of Sindona so he could be held prior to his extradition).

276 In re Extradition of Molnar, 182 F. Supp. 2d 684 (N.D. Ill. 2002) (granting bail because it was warranted under the circumstances, even though they did not constitute special circumstances).

277 United States v. Ramnath, 533 F. Supp. 2d 662, 682–683 (E.D. Tex. 2008).

278 Id. at 685.

> in the Philippines, there is no indication in the record of any legal proceedings occurring in India between 2006 and 2010. This long delay signals that the Indian government has "not made prosecution of this offense a priority." Chapman, 459 F. Supp. 2d at 1027. In Chapman, the court found special circumstances and granted bail in part because Mexico had waited three years after an incident and arrest before bringing extradition proceedings, displaying a "lack of any diplomatic necessity for denying bail." Id. In this case, the delay is even more glaring. [footnote omitted].[279]

Two unusual claims of "special circumstances" were raised in Wroclawski v. United States, namely the relator's work with Olympic athletes and with military and law enforcement personnel. The district court reasoned as follows:

> Magistrate Judge Burns found that Petitioner's work in preparation for the Beijing Olympics constituted a special circumstance. (Magistrate Case Dkt. # 60 at 8.) Petitioner contends that although the next summer Olympics will not take place for nearly three years, he will likely participate in the training of future athletes and will likely attend the Olympic trials. Petitioner presents letters of support from numerous athletes and individuals who request that Petitioner be released to continue with his efforts to assist them in their training. (Dkt. # 24, Exs. 4–5.) But Petitioner presents no evidence that he is currently training any athlete and the Court finds that the 2012 Olympics are too far in advance to necessitate Petitioner's involvement at this time. Consequently, the Court does not find Petitioner's speculative participation in the 2012 Olympics to constitute a special circumstance.
>
> …
>
> Petitioner's focus has now changed from working with Olympic athletes to working with members of the armed forces and law-enforcement. Petitioner's expertise in the area of Greco-Roman wrestling is unique and undisputed. It is in this area that his training of military and law-enforcement personnel is particularly useful. And the affidavits of David Toledo, Alfredo Jimenez, and Joshuah Landspurg present compelling testimony that Petitioner is offering specific and unequaled assistance in their work in the military or law enforcement. Specifically, Petitioner has taught the affiants about hand-to-hand combat techniques, which present themselves at war and, at times, in the course of normal police activity. (Dkt. # 24, Exs. 1 and 3, Toledo Aff. ¶¶ 2–3, Jimenez Aff. ¶¶ 2–4, Doc. # 32, Landspurg Aff. ¶¶ 2–4.)
>
> In response, the Government does not dispute Petitioner's unique talents or his sincerity in providing his services in support of the military or other law-enforcement personnel. Rather, the Government seemingly contends that the war effort is not meaningfully affected by Petitioner's efforts and, therefore, do not constitute a special circumstance. (Dkt. # 27 at 13). Obviously the Court cannot find that the success of U.S. military efforts or the safety of local law-enforcement depends upon Petitioner's continued ability to train military or law-enforcement personnel in the art of Greco-Roman wrestling techniques, and Petitioner concedes as much. But a factor of that magnitude is not required to constitute a special circumstance. Rather, a special circumstance is something that is unique and not faced by all individuals facing extradition. See U.S. v. Hills, 765 F.Supp. 381, 387 (E.D.Mich.1991) (factors faced by nearly all potential extraditees are not special circumstances). And the Court finds Petitioner's selfless and useful help to our military and law-enforcement to be compelling and fully justified to be considered a special circumstance.[280]

Although this case is unique in the jurisprudence of the United States, it shows how unreliable the "special circumstances" test is.

---

279 In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65054, at *7–*8 (E.D.N.Y. 2011). See also United States v. Castaneda-Castillo, 739 F. Supp. 2d 49, 57–58 (D. Mass. 2010).

280 Wroclawski v. United States, 634 F. Supp. 2d 1003 (D. Ariz. 2009).

12.3. The Artificial Legal Notion of "Special Circumstances"

As is obvious from the above, the "special circumstances" test is indeed peculiar, if not to say anachronistic, in a country where a constitutional provision specifically exists with respect to the right to bail. The peculiarity of the "special circumstances" test was evident from the moment of its creation in that there is no constitutional or statutory exception that justifies the Supreme Court decision in Henkel v. Wright and allows the Court to override the Constitution by requiring this test.[281]

Surprisingly, no subsequent case has caused the Supreme Court to reexamine what in any other context would be deemed a questionable ruling that overrides a specific constitutional provision without offering a compelling legal justification.

Since Henkel, circuit and district courts have dealt with the "special circumstances" test in an inconsistent manner, taking into consideration circumstances that are lacking in consistency. Moreover, circuit and district court cases tend to confuse factors relating to risk of flight, which are inherent in any bail consideration, with "special circumstances." This is unsurprising given the ubiquity of the risk-of-flight assessment in criminal proceedings and the tendency of judges to rely on what they know best.

Courts have also considered the length of time it took for the requesting state to file an extradition request as "special circumstances," which by its very nature has nothing to do with the circumstances connected to the relator's status in the United States. The same is true with respect to the likelihood of success of a petitioner seeking bail in the requesting state, which relates more to the likelihood that the petitioner is not a flight risk than any "special circumstance." Such factors, which relate to risk of flight and likelihood that the petitioner will appear in court, are unrelated to "special circumstances."

It must be remembered that "special circumstances" have to do exclusively with factors existing at the time of the person's arrest, and that relate to the circumstances of the petitioner, including his/her health[282] and age,[283] access to counsel and preparation of defense,[284] nature of the relator's work in the United States,[285] and likelihood that the extradition request may be denied on the merits.[286]

---

281 Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903).

282 This evaluation entails an assessment of the relator's need for health treatment and access to medical services or other health-related special requirements. It also applies to disabled or special needs individuals, and individuals with psychiatric or psychological needs.

283 The age assessment applies to individuals who are of advanced age or are minors with age-specific needs who cannot be housed with adults or with conditions imposed on adults. (With respect to advanced age there is an overlap between this factor and the health factor.)

284 This applies to those situations where, given the complex nature of the case, the relator requires significant access to lawyers, paralegals, accountants, or other consultants in order to present his/her case. This is particularly so in extradition cases for alleged financial crimes such as bank fraud, securities violations, and complex bankruptcies.

285 This includes someone who may be in the armed forces on active duty and living on a military base, or a scientist undertaking particular research whose medical and scientific value is deemed significant enough to warrant continuation of the work. A medical practitioner providing services that are required by the community, or anyone who fulfills a needed role in the community and who has demonstrated a particular commitment to the fulfillment of this role.

286 This includes situations involving a relator who has received political asylum or who has a pending petition for political asylum that is likely to be granted, or who has a treaty argument that is likely to bar his/her extradition, such as the possibility of being tortured in the requesting state, which is a circumstance barring his/her extradition under the CAT.

All of the above indicates that it is difficult to distinguish between factors taken into account in ordinary criminal cases for purposes of bail, and factors taken into account with respect to bail in extradition cases. Given these difficulties and the problems with Henkel, "special circumstances" and circumstances relating to the flight risk of the relator should really be examined contextually and concurrently. Precisely because courts have to grapple with this artificial standard of "special circumstances," a diversity in jurisprudence has evolved between the circuits. In short, judicial decisions are all over the map with respect to bail,[287] frequently tending to deny bail when the government requests it, and that is usually to bring about greater pressure on the relator to consent to extradition or at least not to prolong the judicial proceedings.

13. Discovery

13.1. Policy Considerations

Extradition is a process designed to determine whether a person is to be surrendered to a requesting state in order to answer criminal charges or to carry out the execution of a criminal sentence. It is not, therefore, a process by which the requested state determines whether the person sought is guilty of the crime charged.

Section 3184 describes a probable cause hearing[288] to be conducted by the extradition judge as determining the extraditability of the relator based on a finding of sufficient evidence "to sustain the charge under the provision of the proper treaty or convention."[289] Thus, extradition is not a process by which the guilt or innocence of a person is determined.[290] Rather, its purpose is simply to ascertain whether there is sufficient evidence of probable cause to surrender a person to a requesting state in order to stand trial on the charges for which the person was requested.[291] This is why discovery is limited and in the discretion of the extradition judge.

13.2. Constitutional Dimensions

Within the scope of a limited probable cause determination of extradition hearings, it is important for the court to ensure "due process" as required by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. It is within this context that a constitutional issue arises, namely, whether the 287 For a case that conflates many of these factors, see Wraclowski v. United States, 634 F. Supp. 2d 1003 (D. Ariz. 2009).

288 See Ch. X for a detailed discussion on the requirement of probable cause in extradition hearings. See also Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1102 (5th Cir. 1980) (the court lays out the test for probable cause in extradition hearings, holding that the test is "the existence of probable cause to sustain the charges against [the extraditee] or, in other words, the existence of a reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty.").

289 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (2000).

290 See First Nat'l City Bank of New York v. Aristeguieta, 287 F.2d 219 (2d Cir. 1960); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 485 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 428 U.S. 833 (1976); In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 108, 116 (D.N.J. 1987); Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 316 (1922); Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 828 (11th Cir. 1993).

291 The courts' view of the limited nature of an extradition hearing is also due to the courts' determination that extradition is neither a criminal nor a civil proceeding, and therefore the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure that are based on the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments do not apply; that is, the accused has no right to a speedy trial or to cross examine witnesses presented by the government. See Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 829 (11th Cir. 1993). See also Chewning v. Rogerson, 29 F.3d 418 (8th Cir. 1994).

relator is entitled to obtain from the government exculpatory evidence in accordance with the constitutional standards set forth in Brady v. Maryland[292] and United States v. Giglio.[293]

In Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky[294] the Sixth Circuit held that Supreme Court holdings in Brady[295] and Giglio[296] apply, as a matter of right, in extradition proceedings. In Brady the Court held that "the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution."[297]

In Demjanjuk the relator was denaturalized of his U.S. citizenship and extradited to Israel to stand trial for crimes he allegedly committed as a Nazi war criminal.[298] It was determined by the Israeli Supreme Court that Demjanjuk had been mistakenly identified, and that someone else had committed the crimes with which the relator was charged. After Demjanjuk's return to the United States the Sixth Circuit reheard the case and found that the prosecution acted with "reckless disregard for the truth and for the government's obligation to take no steps that prevent an adversary from presenting his case fully and fairly."[299] The prosecution had in its possession exculpatory evidence that showed it was someone else who committed the war crimes. The court held that discovery of any Brady material should be granted in "extradition cases where the government seeks denaturalization or extradition based on proof of alleged criminal activities of the party proceeded against."[300] The Sixth Circuit further held that the lower court erred in not holding that the U.S. government officials failed to "observe their obligation to produce exculpatory materials,"[301] and that by "recklessly assuming"[302] the relator's guilt, they thereby committed misrepresentation and engaged in an abuse of prosecutorial power. Notwithstanding this blatant abuse, the Department of Justice officials were not disciplined.[303] However, further the court stated that prosecutors had a "constitutional duty"[304] to produce any Brady materials that the relator had requested.

Reaffirming its holding in Demjanjuk, the Sixth Circuit cited United States v. Giglio.[305] In Giglio the Court held that "the prosecutor's office is an entity and as such it is the spokesman for the government,"[306] and it has the responsibility as a corporate entity for the disclosure of exculpatory materials.

Demjanjuk was precedence-setting because of the peculiar nature of its facts, the result of which was that the relator was subjected to years of incarceration, a criminal trial in Israel followed by an appeal, and ultimately the reversal of the conviction based on error in the identification of 292 Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

---

293 United States v. Giglio, 405 U.S. 150 (1972).

294 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

295 Brady, 373 U.S. 83.

296 Giglio, 405 U.S. 150.

297 Brady, 373 U.S. at 87 (emphasis added).

298 For a more detailed discussion of the Demjanjuk case, see Ch. IV, Sec. 3.2.3.

299 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338, 354 (6th Cir. 1993) (emphasis added). See also In re Extradition of Chavez, 408 F. Supp. 2d 908 (N.D. Cal. 2005).

300 Id.

301 Id.

302 Id.

303 The four men working for the Office of Special Investigations and the Department of Justice were Allan Ryan, Norman Moscovitz, George Parker, and John Horrigan. Id.

304 Id.

305 United States v. Giglio, 405 U.S. 150 (1972).

306 Id. at 154.

the relator. The government of Israel assumed the costs of these trials, as well as the difficulty of having its Supreme Court reverse a criminal conviction in such a high-visibility case. In short, this was an egregious violation by those responsible in the U.S. Department of Justice, whom the Sixth Circuit condemned in very clear terms. Because of the judicial fallout of the case, it is doubtful that there will be other similar cases of misconduct. Consequently, when the same circuit confronted the same issue in In re Extradition of Drayer,[307] it distinguished Demjanjuk as being based an "unusual set of circumstances."[308] The court explained that in Demjanjuk, "the United States ha[d] conducted its own investigation of the offense underlying the request for extradition and uncovered exculpatory material in the course of that effort."[309] In Drayer the government did not conduct such investigation; rather, the court explained, "the involvement of the United States can only be characterized as ministerial."[310] Therefore, under Drayer, the rule of non-inquiry deprives the relator of the ability to assert his/her due process rights as the United States Attorney can reasonably claim that he/she does not have any discoverable material, and the U.S. magistrate or judge is barred from ordering the production of evidence by the requesting state.

Other courts dealt differently with the constitutionality of discovery in extradition. In In re Singh[311] the District Court of New Jersey held that the Due Process Clause only guarantees the relator the right to a statutorily required hearing, and the court's denial of any request of discovery would not be denial of due process.[312] The court in Singh further held that the holding in Brady is not applicable to extradition cases, because discovery would convert the extradition hearing into a trial where the guilt or innocence of the relator is determined.[313] The court also reaffirmed the widely held view that extradition proceedings are not analogous to criminal prosecutions, and therefore the constitutional protections afforded in the latter are not available to relators seeking to challenge their extradition.[314]

U.S. courts have given great deference to the rule of non-inquiry during discovery proceedings, and limited discovery while at the same time making it discretionary and leaving matters to the secretary of state.[315]

Frequently, during a discovery request, an exception to the rule of non-inquiry will arise. Extradition proceedings are limited and do not involve the adjudication of the guilt or innocence of the relator.[316] Discovery is appropriate in cases such as Demjanjuk, but, it differs from seeking discovery in order to determine whether in the requesting state the person sought will

---

307 In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410 (6th Cir. 1999).

308 Id. at 414.

309 Id. (emphasis added).

310 Id. (emphasis added).

311 In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 108, 116 (D.N.J. 1987).

312 Id. at 116.

313 Id.

314 Id.

315 See also Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009, 1014 (9th Cir. 2005), aff'g 294 F. Supp.2d 1165 (C.D. Cal. 2003); Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 1322, 1326 (9th Cir. 1997); United States v. Kraiselburd, 786 F.2d 1395, 1399 (9th Cir. 1986); Koskotas v. Roche 931 F.2d 169, 175 (1st Cir. 1991) (discovery is not only discretionary with the court, it is narrow in scope); Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1407 (9th Cri. 1988); (P. 1014). See also Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 834 F.2d 1444, 1452 (9th Cir. 1987) (in deciding discovery issues in extradition hearings, one consideration is " 'whether the resolution of the contested issue would be appreciably advanced by the requested discovery' "), quoting Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 817 n.41 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410, 415 (6th Cir. 1999), citing Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

316 See Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 828 (11th Cir. 1993).

be denied procedural fundamental fairness and/or will be treated in a manner that violates the CAT and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (the humanitarian exception).[317]

13.3. Jurisprudential Developments

As there is no statutory provision dealing with discovery in extradition proceedings, judicial interpretations of the requirements of "due process" determine the availability and the scope of discovery.

Although most courts are reluctant to recognize a relator's right to discovery, the common practice is for judges to provide discovery other than with respect to Brady and Giglio material, which is required. Even though some circuits have been more explicit than others, thus creating a disparity within the circuits, it was seen as consistent with the requirement of due process that Brady and Giglio material is discoverable as a matter of right. With respect to additional discovery, the jurisprudence shows that discovery has been left to the discretion of the extradition judge, and only in a few cases have the circuit courts found that the extradition judge abused his/her discretion.

The cases in which discovery has been more generously granted have usually involved extradition requests for economic crimes where the material requested under discovery is related to the determination of probable cause.[318]

The law of discovery in extradition was first articulated by the Second Circuit in First National City Bank of New York v. Aristeguieta.[319] In Aristeguieta the court held that discovery should only be granted if it is warranted by an exceptional situation. In making such a holding, the court reversed the lower court's decision, which permitted discovery to the government of Venezuela of U.S. banks' records, to be later used during the relator's trial of embezzlement in Venezuela. The court stated that Venezuela had failed to show any exceptional circumstances that would justify granting the discovery request. The court reasoned that the threshold of evidence to satisfy the probable cause required to extradite had already been reached by evidence introduced to the court, and therefore no further discovery was needed. This suggests that if Venezuela's request of further discovery was to uncover evidence necessary to establish probable cause, then the court would have probably allowed discovery. Although not clearly stated by this court, discovery of evidence pertinent to probable cause was how the Second Circuit measured the "exceptional situation" test.

Another landmark case on the subject of discovery in extradition came years later. The Southern District of New York, in Jhirad v. Ferrandina,[320] determined the limits of the "exceptional situation" test, stating "[U]nder the traditional extradition standards discovery is limited and discretionary. . . ."[321] The Second Circuit, on appeal, reaffirmed this statement, explaining the "limited but discretionary" standard by stating that the court shall order discovery "as law and 317 See, e.g., Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 817 n.41 (9th Cir. 1986) (inquiring into discovery reflected the same issue argued at the hearing that the United Kingdom had suspended fundamental fairness rights in connection with IRA investigations and prosecutions by subjecting individuals who were related to IRA terrorism to torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment).

318 See Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980). This case dealt with fraudulent bankruptcy (in Italy) of a very large proportion. To establish probable cause required going through an enormous volume of documents. Discovery was quite liberal with the cooperation of the government. The actual extradition phase took over four years, and the case was ultimately dismissed after the holding of the bankruptcy court that issued a judgment on fraudulent bankruptcy was reversed by the Italian Supreme Court.

319 First Nat'l City Bank of New York v. Aristeguieta, 287 F.2d 219 (2d Cir. 1960).

320 Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 362 F. Supp. 1057 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), aff'd, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 428 U.S. 833 (1976).

321 Id. at 1060.

justice require"[322] while keeping in mind "the well-established rule that extradition proceedings are not to be converted into a dress rehearsal trial."[323] The language used in Jhirad has been used by other Circuits and lower courts as a basic statement of the law of discovery in extradition cases.[324]

The Ninth Circuit, in Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson,[325] stated that before granting discovery the court should keep in mind "whether the resolution of the contested issue would be appreciably advanced by the requested discovery."[326] This test was explained by the Southern District Court of California in In re Extradition of Powell,[327] which held that if the discovery will appreciably advance the negation or explanation of the government's showing of probable cause, then justice requires courts to exercise their inherent authority and to order discovery.[328] This test harkens back to a "due process" basis for discovery.

In United States v. Seguy, the discovery magistrate provided extensive discovery:

> Montemayor has complained that he was given insufficient opportunity to discover the records of Pemex and the prosecutor. The court, however, has allowed extensive production of documents over the last six months. This discovery was especially generous when one considers the preliminary nature of this proceeding. Also, much of the requested material relates only to whether the prosecutor in Mexico is factually and legally correct in his positions before the court there. None has to do with the propriety of extradition under the American Constitution, American statutes, or the Mexican–American treaty. If this were an extradition between two American states, the record would have been much more constrained than it has been here. Discovery beyond the extensive applications by the governments was allowed by this court out of caution, not doubt.[329]

13.4. Conclusion

Clearly, the limits of discovery are determined by the admissibility of evidence. As the scope of discovery in extradition proceedings is limited to the determination of probable cause, then so will the type of discoverable material.

However, there should be no question, in the opinion of this writer, about discovery of information arising under Brady and Giglio, as well as information involving the identity of the person requested, which is necessary in order to avoid the type of denial of justice that occurred in Demjanjuk.[330] If this information is in the possession, control, and custody of the U.S. government, then it must be provided to the relator.[331] However, when the question deals with the discovery of Brady materials that are within the possession of the requesting state, the result

322 Jhirad, 536 F.2d 478.

323 Id.

324 See Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996); aff'd, 121 F.2d 1332 (9th Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Powell; 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986); Jhirad, 536 F.2d at 485.

325 Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1988).

326 Id. at 1407.

327 In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

328 Id. at 960.

329 United States v. Seguy, 329 F. Supp. 2d 871, 879 (S.D. Tex. 2004). The same matter was brought before the Southern District of Texas on two separate actions. See Seguy, 329 F. Supp. 2d 880, habeas corpus denied, 329 F. Supp. 883 (S.D. Tex. 2004).

330 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

331 Id. See also Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); United States v. Giglio, 405 U.S. 150 (1972); United States v. Aggurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976); In re Extradition of Drayer, 190 F.3d 410, 414 (6th Cir. 1999); United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667 (1985); Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995).

might differ under the rule of non-inquiry. Therefore, requesting the government to seek evidence or additional material from the requesting state should be limited to information about the identity of the requested person. This may include evidence or information concerning any treaty defenses that would, as a matter of law under that treaty, preclude extradition.[332] The policy supporting this proposition is to spare the respective governments and the relator him/herself the costs, hardship, and embarrassment of extraditing a person who should not be extradited under the applicable treaty and the laws of the requested state.

A line of cases held that in extradition proceedings the extradition judge has the "inherent power to order discovery as law and justice requires."[333] It is important, however, to emphasize the limited function of the extradition magistrate, which is to perform the task of determining the extraditability of the relator, and not his/her guilt or innocence.[334]

The extradition magistrate would have to be guided by the policies and purposes of extradition, keeping in mind considerations for the proof or negation of "probable cause," in order to determine in each and every case whether discovery should be granted and to what extent. In this context, the magistrate can make an initial determination as to whether the discovery material is available to the government or is known by the government to exist. This is the "ease of access" test that this author would propose, as it would not be cumbersome to the government to produce such evidence. If the government contends that such materials are prejudicial to its case, then it should reinforce the court's conviction that such materials are discoverable because they would necessarily tend to be exculpatory under Brady or Giglio, or of a nature that undermines the government's finding of probable cause, as required by § 3184 of the extradition statute.[335]

---

332 See In re Extradition of Smyth, 826 F. Supp. 316 (N.D. Cal. 1993) (Smyth was an Irish Catholic national who was the subject of an extradition request by the United Kingdom. He sought discovery to provide support to the claim that he would be "punished, detained or restricted in his personal liberty by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinion," as provided by the United States–United Kingdom extradition treaty. The Northern District of California ordered the material discoverable, as it deemed it relevant to the subject matter of the extradition proceeding). See also In re Requested Extradition of McMullen, 989 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1993). The discoverable material may also include information dealing with facts relevant to the statute of limitations or a prior conviction or acquittal that maybe relevant to double jeopardy.

333 See In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 828 (11th Cir. 1993).

334 Martin, 993 F.2d at 828.

335 8 U.S.C. § 3184 (2000).

Chapter X

The Extradition Hearing

Contents

1. Introduction

This chapter describes the processes of the Extradition Hearing (hereinafter referred to as "Hearing") held pursuant to § 3184.[1] It is, as described below, in the nature of a "preliminary hearing" in criminal cases, though it is more formal and there are a greater number of legal issues at stake. However, it is not a mini-trial of the person sought for extradition, and the Hearing is limited to the nine issues identified below. It is therefore something in-between a bare-bones "preliminary hearing" in criminal cases and a summary trial of certain legal and factual issues.

Some of the questions presented at the Hearing pertain to substantive legal issues arising from the applicable treaty and U.S. law, as discussed in Chapters VII and VIII; consequently this chapter has to be read in connection with them. However, to assist the reader, some of the substantive legal issues that are likely to be addressed at the Hearing are addressed in this chapter. But this is only intended to explain how the procedural aspects of the Hearing evolve and how these issues arise and are addressed. The full coverage of these substantive legal issues is, as stated above, found elsewhere in this book. Appropriate cross references will guide the reader.

1 See In re Extradition of Joseph, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 41848 (S.D. Cal. June 6, 2007) for an illustrative overview of the extradition process in which each of the steps recruired under § 3184 is considered. See also In re Extradition of Morales, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48954 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 29, 2011); In re Extradition of Hart, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138358 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 22, 2010); In re Extradition of Siddique, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14436 (D. Kan. Feb. 24, 2009); Parretti v. United States, 122 F.3d 758, 772 (9th Cir. 1997); Parretti v. United States, 112 F.3d 1363, 1376 (9th Cir. 1997).

Because of the primary importance of the Hearing it is useful to summarize its salient characteristics first:

1. The Hearing, though sui generis in nature, is similar to a probable cause hearing in federal criminal cases, but is more complex because of all of the treaty and legislative issues involved.

2. Though not criminal in nature, and not subject to the Federal Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Hearing nonetheless partakes of them by reason of analogy based on the judge's discretion.

3. The Hearing is not a mini-trial on the merits of the relator's guilt or innocence. Exculpatory evidence is not allowed per se, but only explanatory evidence is admissible. The judge's discretion applies in making this determination.

4. Evidence is not subject to statutory and other common law limitations such as hearsay.

5. The scope of the Hearing is limited to nine issues, which are intended to determine whether:[2]

a. There exists a valid extradition treaty between the United States and the requesting state;

b. The relator is the person sought;

c. The offense charged is extraditable;[3]

d. The offense charged satisfies the requirement of double criminality;[4]

e. There is probable cause to believe the relator committed the offense charged;

f. The evidence is sufficient and credible to support probable cause;

g. The documents required are presented in accordance with U.S. law, subject to any specific treaty requirements, translated, and duly authenticated by a U.S. Consul in the requesting state;[5]

h. There are no treaty or statutory bars to extradition; and

i. Treaty requirements and statutory procedures are observed.

The Hearing commences after the filing of a "complaint"[6] by the U.S. government on behalf of a foreign state and receipt by the court of the documentary evidence presented. This is frequently the sole evidence that the government will produce. In some cases witnesses are presented, usually officials of the requesting state. Conventionally a bail hearing and preliminary motions will have taken place by then. It is at the Hearing stage that the relator can first argue any question regarding the "certification" of documents[7] and the sufficiency of the complaint.

---

2 For cases citing this list, see In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112, 1115 (S.D. Cal. 1998); In re the Extradition of Sindona, 584 F. Supp. 1437, 1446 (E.D.N.Y. 1984).

3 See Ch. I.

4 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

5 See Ch. IX.

6 See Ch. IX, Sec. 6.

7 See Ch. IX, Sec. 7.

The sufficiency of the complaint does not hinge on whether the United States has knowledge of the sufficiency of the relevant facts.[8] If the complaint fails to state specific details, there is no prejudice to the defendant provided that the defense counsel is sufficiently appraised of the facts.[9] In addition, technical variances between the complaint and the evidence are not fatal,[10] and extradition will not be denied because of technicalities that are either remedied or deemed harmless.[11]

During the Hearing the extradition magistrate or judge hears and considers the evidence of criminality and commits the accused for surrender if he/she deems the evidence sufficient to constitute probable cause to sustain the charge under the provisions of the treaty and the applicable legislation. As indicated above, the Hearing is not in the nature of a criminal trial, as it is a sui generis proceeding.

The extradition order is not a final order, and thus not appealable.[12] The Supreme Court addressed this issue in Benson v. McMahon, stating:

> We are of the opinion that the proceeding before the commissioner is not to be regarded as in the nature of a final trial by which the prisoner could be convicted or acquitted of the crime charged against him but rather of the character of those preliminary examinations which take place every day in this country before an examining or committing magistrate for the purpose of determining whether a case is made out which will justify the holding of the accused, either by imprisonment or under bail, to ultimately answer to an indictment, or other proceeding, in which he shall be finally tried upon the charge made against him.[13]

Concerning the distinction between criminal trials and Hearings, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes stated in Glucksman v. Henkel:

> It is common in extradition cases to attempt to bring to bear all the factitious niceties of a criminal trial at common law. But it is a waste of time. For while of course a man is not to be sent from the country merely upon demand or surmise, yet if there is presented, even in somewhat untechnical form according to our ideas, such reasonable ground to suppose him guilty as to make it proper that he should be tried, good faith to the demanding government requires his surrender. Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 184. See Pierce v. Creecy, 210 U.S. 337, 465. We are bound by the existence of an extradition treaty to assume that the trial will be fair.[14]

---

8 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); United States ex rel. Petrushansky v. Marasco, 325 F.2d 562 (2d Cir. 1963). See also In re Burt, 737 F.2d 1477, 1482 (7th Cir. 1984); Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); Liberto v. Emery, 724 F.2d 23, 25 (2d Cir. 1983).

9 Petrushansky, 325 F.2d at 564; Ex parte Sternaman, 77 F. 595 (C.C.N.D.N.Y. 1896), aff'd sub nom. Sternaman v. Peck, 83 F. 690 (2d Cir. 1897).

10 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933); Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1910). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); United States ex rel. Rauch v. Stockinger, 269 F.2d 681 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 913 (1959); In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22, 25 (D. Minn. 1972).

11 Factor, 290 U.S. 276. See also Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922); Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511 (1916); Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902); Rice v. Ames, 180 U.S. 371 (1901); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998).

12 See Ch. XI.

13 Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 462–463 (1888).

14 Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508, 512 (1910). See also Cleugh v. Strakosch, 109 F.2d 330 (9th Cir. 1940); United States ex rel. Argento v. Jacobs, 176 F. Supp. 877 (N.D. Ohio 1959). The court in Argento held:

> Recognizing fully the right of the Republic of Italy, under the treaty, to extradite its subjects to make them answer to a criminal charge, it is something else where the extradition, in effect, seeks to

The position of the United States on this point is unchanged:

> The United States as the requested state may ask the requesting state to furnish additional evidence or information. The United States Attorney relies on his prosecutorial discretion to request such additional information or evidence and may also in reliance on said discretion not introduce into evidence documents, exhibits or other evidence which the requesting state may present. The U.S. Attorney may also, if he deems it appropriate, file a petition with the court requesting dismissal of the request if he feels that the evidence presented does not constitute "probable cause."[15]

Marjorie Whiteman, synthesizing U.S. policy and practice, described the documents the requesting state must produce as follows:

> The requirements regarding what documents must be submitted by a requesting State in support of its extradition request vary depending on whether the person sought has already been tried and convicted in the courts of the requesting State and then escaped or whether he is merely charged with an offense but has not yet been brought to trial. Further, in the case of one merely charged with an offense, the documentation required varies depending on whether the requesting State must, under the laws of the requested State or the applicable treaty, establish a prima facie case of the guilt of the accused in order to obtain his extradition. Under the laws and treaties of many countries, it is sufficient merely to show that the person sought is charged in the requesting State, and a warrant of arrest or similar document issued by the authorities of that State is sufficient evidence, insofar as possible guilt is concerned, to warrant extradition. In the case of other countries, notably the United States, Canada and Great Britain, it is necessary to submit some further evidence of the person's guilt.[16]

Though this official position was stated in 1968, it has been consistently followed since then.

The government may always seek to dismiss a pending case on its own motion if it determines that there is lack of probable cause, insufficient evidence, or the availability of a valid defense under the treaty or legislation.[17] > execute on an in absentia conviction. In such a case the Court must scrutinize the evidence carefully to determine at least a reasonable probability that the petitioner was guilty of the crime.

>
> In my judgment, there was not sufficient evidence to warrant a reasonable belief that petitioner was guilty of the crime of murder, and the Commissioner's finding to the contrary is not supported by the evidence.

176 F. Supp. at 883. As can be seen in the case of Taylor v. Jackson, 470 F. Supp. 1290 (S.D.N.Y. 1979), the relator in U.S. proceedings has only limited rights at the hearing. In Taylor, the relator, convicted of various serious offenses in New York, escaped state custody and was later apprehended in Canada. Petitioner was returned to the state of New York upon an extradition request. Petitioner contended that the extradition hearing afforded him was in violation of the extradition laws of the United States, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3195 and the Treaty on Extradition between the United States and Canada, 27 U.S.T. 983, T.I.A.S. No. 8237 (entered into force Mar. 22, 1976), in that inter alia the court declined to appoint an attorney to represent petitioner. The court ruled that petitioner had no right to appointed counsel at his extradition hearing, as the rights guaranteed to an accused by the Sixth Amendment apply only to "criminal prosecutions," and international extradition hearings are not within the scope of the amendment. 470 F. Supp. at 1292. See also Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 486 F.2d 442, 485 n.9 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976); United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215, 1224–1225 (D. Conn. 1977); Hystad v. Rhay, 533 P.2d 409 (Wash. App. 1975).

15 See Yale Kamisar et al., Cases, Comments and Questions on Modern Criminal Procedure 905–960 (1974) (discussing prosecutorial discretion). See also Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967); Charles Breitel, Controls in Criminal Law Enforcement, 27 U. Chi. L. Rev. 427 (1960); John Kaplan, The Prosecutorial Discretion—A Comment, 60 Nw. U. L. Rev. 174 (1965).

16 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 954 (1963) [hereinafter Whiteman Digest].

17 This is analogous to the holding in Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967). See also Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 394 (1992); Kaplan, supra note 15.

It should be noted that international human rights treaties such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) cannot be used to challenge extradition at the Hearing, as those treaties are not self-executing and Congress has not enacted any implementing legislation allowing for their judicial enforcement.[18] Accordingly, a relator cannot challenge his/her extradition by resorting to rights contained in these treaties. Reliance on non–self-executing international treaty rights are therefore based on national implementing legislation and on interpretation by U.S. courts.[19]

2. Standing of the Relator in Extradition Hearings

The issue of standing arises during the course of a Hearing, including the question of standing to object to the charge on the basis of the rule of specialty.[20] More commonly, however, standing arises with respect to a person who is not present before the court and would therefore be considered a fugitive. Under the doctrine of fugitive disentitlement, a person cannot contest an extradition request from the United States or to the United States while he/she is a fugitive.[21] In the United States a person lacks standing to object or raise any defenses otherwise available under U.S. law and the applicable treaty unless he/she is both before the court and subject to its jurisdiction.[22] In this respect the relator is not afforded the opportunity to have counsel present a special and limited appearance to challenge the jurisdiction of the court.

There is, however, a limited opportunity for challenging the jurisdiction of the court in extradition matters if the relator is not within the territory of the United States, and counsel representing him seeks to dismiss the charges on the grounds that because he is not within the territory of the United States, he/she therefore cannot legally be subject to the court's jurisdiction.[23]

A 2009 example of this came in In re Hijazi, in which the relator, a Lebanese citizen domiciled in Kuwait, filed a motion to dismiss charges against him in the United States after Kuwait refused to grant a U.S. extradition request.[24] The magistrate refused to rule on Hijazi's motion, holding that he lacked standing and needed to appear in order to challenge the applicability of the statute in question.

Both the district and circuit courts rejected the magistrate's holding that the fugitive disentitlement doctrine barred Hijazi's claim, as Hijazi "did not flee from the jurisdiction or from any restraints placed upon him," and in fact had turned himself in to the Kuwaiti authorities upon learning of the indictment.[25] The fugitive disentitlement doctrine only applies in situations where the relator willfully leaves the jurisdiction in order to evade the court's jurisdiction and then seeks to use his procedural rights while safely beyond the reach of the court.

---

18 In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757, at *9 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008).

19 See Ch. II, Sec. 5.4.

20 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

21 See Ch. XI, Sec. 3 (concerning the standing). See also Weiss v. Yates, 375 Fed. Appx. 915 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion), cert. denied, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 3062 (U.S. Apr. 18, 2011); United States v. Mann, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3891 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). This situation also arose with regard to Roman Polanski's extradition, although he was ultimately not extradited to the United States. See Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Court Orders Bail for Polanski during His Fight against U.S. Extradition Request, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 49–50 (Feb. 2010).

22 See United States v. Mann, 829 F.2d 849, 852 (9th Cir. 1987) ("A treaty may create standing if it indicates the intention to 'establish direct, affirmative, and judicially enforceable rights.' "). This issue arises in "Next Friend" cases such as that of Anwar al-Aulaki. See Ch. XI, Sec. 3 on the doctrine of standing and the firewall that exists between the U.S. and foreign legal proceedings.

23 See Ch. XI, Sec. 3.

24 In re Hijazi, 589 F.3d 401, 403–405 (7th Cir. 2009).

25 Id. at 412.

The Seventh Circuit, however, also rejected the district court's ruling that Hajizai must appear due to the "the desire for mutuality in litigation . . . [that] if he wants the United States to be bound by a decision dismissing the indictment, he should be similarly willing to bear the consequences of a decision upholding it."[26] Rather, the Seventh Circuit held that this qualification similarly violated the proscription against disentitlement, noting that "Outside of the core fugitive disentitlement context, the Supreme Court has indicated that disentitlement is 'too blunt an instrument' to redress the indignity of a defendant's absence. Degen v. United States, 517 U.S. 820, 828 (1996)."[27] Given the adverse consequences of denying Hijazi's motion, including his inability to travel or conduct business due to the outstanding INTERPOL Red Notice, as well as the possibility of his extradition from Kuwait in the future, the court ruled that Hijazi had standing to contest the applicability of the statute even though he was still in Kuwait.

In certain circumstances the relator may be in custody in another jurisdiction and cannot appear before the court. There are two scenarios under which this could arise, namely: (1) where the relator is not within the actual custody of the court but is within the "constructive custody" of the court, and (2) where the relator is neither within the custody of the court nor within the "constructive custody" of the court. There are a few circumstances in which the relator would be neither within the custody of the court nor within the "constructive custody" of the court. These include situations where the relator is a fugitive, situations where the relator is detained by a foreign country without the United States requesting the relator's detention or otherwise involved in the relator's detention, and situations such as the one that presented itself in In re Hijazi.[28]

Under the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 2241 courts may issue a writ of habeas corpus when the petitioner is "in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States or is committed for trial before some court thereof."[29] Given the ability of the U.S. executive to have individuals seized or detained by third parties outside the jurisdiction of the courts, "actual physical custody of an individual . . . is unnecessary for habeas jurisdiction to exist."[30] However, in order for constructive custody to obtain, the petitioner must show that "the respondent was responsible for significant restraints on the petitioner's liberty."[31] The rationale for "constructive custody" standing is rooted in the obligation of the judiciary to limit the government's ability to improperly restrain the liberty of individuals, which is a recognized basis for judicial oversight in extradition proceedings.[32]

In Abu Ali v. Ashcroft the plaintiff, a U.S. citizen, was held in custody by Saudi Arabia at the behest of the United States.[33] Although the court in Abu Ali did not rule on the merits of the petitioners "constructive custody" claim, the district court firmly rejected the U.S. government's

---

26 Id. at 413.

27 Id. at 413–414.

28 See Ch. IX for a discussion of the definition and effect of a relator being a "fugitive."

29 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c).

30 Abu Ali v. Ashcroft, 350 F. Supp. 2d 28, 47 (D.D.C. 2004).

31 Id. at 48.

32 See for instance Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936) (requiring that the relator be charged with an offense in accordance with the terms of the treaty). See also Hensley v. Mun. Ct., 411 U.S. 345, 351 (1973) ("The custody requirement of the habeas corpus statute is designed to preserve the writ of habeas corpus as a remedy for severe restraints on individual liberty."); Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians, 85 F.3d 874, 894 (2d Cir.1996). (Habeas jurisdiction exists not only in cases of physical custody by the executive, but in all circumstances in which "federal adjudication is necessary to guard against governmental abuse in the imposition of severe restraints on individual liberty.").

33 Id. at 32.

argument "for nothing less than the unreviewable power to separate an American citizen from the most fundamental of his constitutional rights merely by choosing where he will be detained or who will detain him."[34] As the court stated, "the United States may not avoid the habeas jurisdiction of the federal courts by enlisting a foreign ally as an intermediary to detain the citizen."[35] However, the instances where the United States is correctly deemed to be operating through a foreign ally as an intermediary for purposes of habeas jurisdiction will be exceptional, and a federal court's inquiry in such cases will be substantially circumscribed by the separation of powers. Nonetheless, the executive's authority over foreign relations has never in our nation's history been deemed to override entirely the most fundamental rights of a U.S. citizen—the right to challenge as arbitrary and unlawful his/her detention allegedly at the will of the executive.[36]

A similar situation arose in In re Petitioners Seeking Habeas Corpus Relief in Relation to Prior Detentions at Guantanamo Bay, where a number of former Guantanamo Bay detainees sought standing before the district court for the District of Colombia.[37] The petitioners, however, had been transferred to the custody of a foreign state or released and subsequently taken into custody by another state, and on that basis the court ruled that the U.S. government did not exert the same "level of control over Petitioners" as in Abu Ali.

A prominent example of constructive custody involves the attempted extradition of former Guatemalan [resident Alfonso Portillo on money laundering charges. On the basis of a U.S. extradition request Portillo was taken into custody in Guatemala. Although Portillo challenges the legality of the extradition request, he cannot do so because neither Guatemalan nor U.S. courts will hear his claim. Guatemalan courts have refused to address the issue because it is a question of U.S. law, and this would violate the rule against non-inquiry.[38] United States courts have ruled that Portillo is not in U.S. custody and therefore lacks standing. Portillo's U.S. lawyers, including this writer, have argued that Portillo is in the "constructive custody" of the United States, but this argument was rejected by the district court judge.[39]

The Portillo holding conflicts with the "significant restraint" standard adopted by the district court in Abu Ali, which was itself based on Supreme Court precedent.[40] Other than the political nature of the indictment and the fact that Portillo is not a U.S. citizen, it is unclear how his confinement in Guatemala does not meet that standard. Having been denied standing, Portillo is effectively unable to address an essential right that goes to the heart of his detention, and leaves him caught in a legal black hole.

The issue of standing also arises with respect to the relator's objection to evidence presented at the Hearing by the U.S. government on behalf of the requesting state. The court will usually deny such objections without referring to the issue of standing, simply because the government has significant leeway in introducing evidence because the Hearing is not a trial on the merits of a criminal charge.

---

34 Id. at 40.

35 Id. at 41

36 Id.

37 In re Petitioners Seeking Habeas Corpus Relief in Relation to Prior Detentions at Guantanamo Bay, 700 F. Supp. 2d 119 (D.D.C. 2010).

38 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

39 Portillo v. Bharara, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67224 (May 10, 2012). This issue is dealt with in Ch. XI, Sec. 3, concerning the firewall between domestic and foreign legal proceedings. This firewall effectively acts as a barrier to prevent individuals from accessing the courts despite their being in custody.

40 Abu Ali v. Ashcroft, 350 F. Supp. 2d 28, 48 (D.D.C. 2004), citing Hensley v. Mun. Ct., 411 U.S. 345, 351 (1973); Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians, 85 F.3d 874, 894 (2d Cir. 1996).

An issue of standing, however, arises with respect to a relator challenging evidence which may not pertain to his/her case, and to others who are not a party to the proceedings but who seek to challenge evidence presented by or on behalf of a requested state.[41] The Ninth Circuit addressed this issue in United States v. Antonakeas, reasoning that:

> The United States argues that Appellant has no standing to raise noncompliance with procedural provisions of the Treaty as a bar to jurisdiction in the district court. We agree. An early Supreme Court case, United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 409-10, 430, 433 (1886), recognized the right of a person extradited to enforce what has become known as a "specialty" provision in a treaty—a requirement that the receiving country may proceed against the person extradited only for offenses that are enumerated in the treaty and upon which extradition actually rested. In Rauscher, the treaty enumerated murder as an eligible offense, and extradition rested on that offense, but the defendant was tried and convicted for the then-existing lesser offense of "cruel and unusual punishment." Id. at 409–10. The Supreme Court reversed. Id. at 433. A more recent Supreme Court case, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 659–60 (1992), expressed agreement that a defendant may not be prosecuted in violation of the terms of an extradition treaty, citing Rauscher. But there the Court held that a treaty could not be violated where it was not invoked (because the defendant had in fact been kidnapped, not extradited). Id. at 669–70. In United States v. Najohn, 785 F.2d 1420, 1422 (9th Cir. 1986) (per curiam), another specialty case, this court made the broad statement that "the person extradited may raise whatever objections the rendering country might have." Despite this broad pronouncement, however, we conclude that, unlike the substantive right of specialty, procedural violations do not give rise to individually enforceable rights.
>
> "Whether or not treaty violations can provide the basis for particular claims or defenses . . . depend[s] upon the particular treaty and claim involved." United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d 882, 885 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 481 (2000). Unlike specialty, which is a substantive requirement that goes to the heart of the requested country's decision to allow extradition, a deadline is a procedural requirement without similar import. If a dead-line is missed during the extradition process, the requested country can simply refuse extradition on that ground. By contrast, once the person sought has been turned over to the requesting country for specified offenses, the requested country has no recourse if the offenses ultimately charged are different from the offenses upon which extradition was allowed. For this reason, it is necessary to allow the person extradited to raise this type of treaty violation in the requesting country because the requested country has no opportunity to enforce the specialty provision on its own behalf. If the authorities in Germany believed that there was a treaty violation, they could have refused extradition. There is no policy reason to accord Appellant standing to raise in this court an alleged missed extradition deadline after Germany has determined that the treaty provisions were fulfilled and extradition was proper.[42]

3. The Requirement of a Charge or Accusation

Treaties usually require that the relator be "charged" with a crime in the requesting state before the request is presented or the extradition is granted. If a treaty states that the request can be founded on an accusation, then an arrest warrant will suffice. If the treaty, however, uses the term "charge" or "charged" (with an offense), then the question arises as to whether this requires a formal criminal charge in the nature of a complaint, information, or indictment in U.S. law, or whether it is synonymous with "accused," whereby an arrest warrant without a formal accusation will suffice. Whether a person is "charged" or not should be determined on the basis of the law of the requesting state, and not on that of the requested state. This is, however, a question of treaty interpretation,[43] and with respect to this issue it is about the intent of the 41 See Peltier v. Henman, 997 F.2d 461 (1993).

42 United States v. Antonakeas, 255 F.3d 714, 719–720 (9th Cir. 2001) (citations omitted).

43 See Ch. II, Sec. 5.4.

treaties. In any event, the court will have to ascertain the existence in fact of a valid warrant or criminal charge in accordance with the laws of the requesting state. If the term "charge" is meant to require formal accusation its validity is to be established in accordance with the laws of the requesting state. To some extent, such a finding by the U.S. extradition judge should have the same characteristics as a charging instrument under U.S. law. The offense charged must be criminal under the laws in force within the jurisdiction of the requesting state, the formal charge must be valid and in effect in that state, and both must satisfy the requirements of "double criminality"[44] in its substantive as well as its procedural aspects.[45]

These requirements are significant and relevant to the showing of probable cause related to the offenses charged.[46] In In re Assarsson,[47] which concerned the extradition treaty between the United States and Sweden, it was found that there is no substantive requirement that a formal "charge" be filed. This does not, however, preclude a finding of probable cause that the relator committed the crime of which he has been accused.

In Assarsson, the relator Jan Assarsson was ordered to be extradited to Sweden for trial on charges of arson, fraud, and attempted fraud.[48] At the Hearing, Assarsson, through his counsels including this writer, contended that extradition was inappropriate because no "charges" were pending against him under Swedish law.[49] The relator contended that although ordered arrested by the Swedish courts, a formal document, called a "charge" in the Swedish criminal code, had not been filed against him. The relator argued that the extradition treaty, which used the term "charged," required the existence of a formal charge and not an arrest warrant.[50] However, the extradition court found that because the filing of a formal charge is not required as a prerequisite to extradition,[51] no substantive requirement existed that the "charge" be filed. In addition, the court found that when an individual is named in an arrest warrant as having committed a crime, he is "charged" within the meaning of an extradition treaty. The court effectively equated "charged" with "accused."

The use of the term "charged" in the United States–Sweden Extradition Treaty, however, as argued by this writer and other counsel, could be interpreted as meaning a formal charge in the nature of a complaint, information, or indictment under Swedish law, whose counterpart should be found in U.S. law, because if it were as the Seventh Circuit held, the treaty would have used the term "accused" instead of "charged." This is the case in the Israel–Sweden

---

44 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

45 See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 298 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). But see In re Extradition of Ylipelkonen, 768 F. Supp. 347 (S.D. Fla. 1991) (refusing to allow counsel from Finland to testify to the likelihood of the relator receiving probation upon his return to Finland).

46 See e.g., Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); Hill v. United States, 737 F.2d 950 (11th Cir. 1984); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, (9th Cir. 1990); Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358; United States v. Bogue, 1998 WL 966070 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996).

47 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 938 (1981). See also In re Burt, 737 F.2d 1477, 1483 (7th Cir. 1984); In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157, 1159–1160 (8th Cir. 1982) (presenting the same issues concerning another relator by the same name and for the same facts considered in the Seventh Circuit decision, in which the Eighth Circuit took the same position as the Seventh Circuit), aff'g 538 F. Supp. 1055 (D. Minn. 1982). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999).

48 Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 at 1238.

49 Id. at 1239.

50 Id. at 1241.

51 Id. at 1242.

Extradition Treaty,[52] which states that the relator must be "accused or convicted" (emphasis added) of an enumerated offense. Similarly, the language of the United Kingdom–Sweden Extradition Treaty[53] is virtually identical, that is, that the relator must be "accused or convicted" (emphasis added) of an enumerated offense. Thus, the language of these treaties suggests that extradition can be achieved by means of an arrest warrant, and that a formal charge need not be made. Thus, if the term "accused" is used in some treaties but not in others, it is obviously intended to relay different meanings, as in the case of the United States–Sweden Treaty. The Seventh Circuit, however, held otherwise.

The importance of the term "charged" appears in relationship to the rule of specialty,[54] which holds that the requesting state may prosecute or punish the relator only for the crime for which extradition is granted. This rule recognizes the right of the requested state, once extradition is granted, to limit the prosecution of the relator in the requesting state solely to those crimes found to be extraditable offenses under the law of the requested state, and for which that state's standard of probable cause is applied to determine if the evidence presented provides reasonable grounds to believe that the relator committed crimes for which extradition is granted.[55] The rule of specialty is thus the bridge between the requirement that the relator be formally charged in the requesting state and the requirement that the requested state find that he/she has been charged with an extraditable offense binding the requesting state to prosecution limited to those crimes. If this right of the requested state were not recognized in international law, the requesting state could prosecute or punish the relator for an offense other than the one for which extradition is granted and thereby abuse the processes of the requested state.

To grant extradition to Assarsson without requiring that he be formally charged with a specific crime for which he would be prosecuted could have opened the way for the Swedish government to attempt to punish him for any offense it may elect, including one that may not be deemed extraditable and for which extradition would not have been granted had the U.S. government been fully informed. The fact that Sweden affirmed seeking Assarsson for a certain number of offenses for which he had not yet been formally charged would not bind it to prosecute him only for those offenses. That is precisely why a substantive criminal charge upon which prosecution commences should be required.

It must be added, however, that if the treaty specifies that the relator be "accused," then the requesting state, which relies only on an arrest warrant, must specify the crime, meet the test of probable cause, and be thereafter legally bound to prosecute the relator for that offense or lesser-included offenses, and not for any other without first obtaining the consent of the requested state.[56]

An extradition request must charge a person with a crime. However, the term "charge" does not necessarily imply that a person has been formally charged in the requesting state in a manner that is similar to charges on which prosecution can be initiated in the United States. An accusation of a crime supported by an arrest warrant is sufficient.[57] A criminal accusation showing intent to prosecute is enough.[58] Similarly, an accusation issued for the purposes of conducting an investigation is sufficient where the requesting state has an inquisitorial criminal

52 516 U.N.T.S. 3.

53 390 U.N.T.S. 118.

54 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

55 See Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252, 1259 (N.D. Ga. 1977).

56 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

57 In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157, 1162 (8th Cir. 1982), aff'g 538 F. Supp. 1055 (D. Minn. 1982).

58 Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for N. Dist., 834 F.2d 1444, 1449 (9th Cir. 1987). See also Kaiser v. Rutherford, 827 F. Supp. 832 (D.D.C. 1993); cf. In re Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996).

system under which "investigative purposes" is considered a "charge."[59] The question in these cases arises when the requesting state's laws permit arrest for the sole purpose of a criminal investigation.[60]

Whether an extradition request is deemed sufficient with respect to an investigation may involve political considerations, especially where there may be collusion between the requesting, the requested state, and potentially third-party states. In other words, the request for investigation may be a subterfuge to achieve an individual's re-extradition to a heretofore unannounced state using the requesting state's expressed wish to conduct as "investigation."

This may be the case with Julian Assange, the founder of the Wikileaks organization, whose extradition is sought by Sweden from the United Kingdom for an alleged investigation into sexual misconduct claims by two women. It is believed that the United States is seeking to obtain custody of Assange, whom the U.S. Department of Defense has allegedly declared an "enemy,"[61] in order to prosecute him for violations, possibly including the Espionage Act of 1917 and trafficking in stolen property, for his connection with the release of classified documents.[62] The hypothesis is that the United States cannot obtain the extradition of Assange from the United Kingdom, as UK laws and jurisprudence would preclude his extradition either on the basis of freedom of expression or as a political offense.[63] Rather, it is hypothesized that he could be extradited by the United Kingdom to Sweden, and that Sweden may be more amenable to extraditing him to the United States thereafter. Therefore, Assange's extradition to Sweden may indicate that Sweden is in collusion with the United States and the United Kingdom, and that Sweden will re-extradite him to the United States to face trial.[64]

Issues can also arise where the initial charge has expired due to the running of the statute of limitations[65] or to fundamental changes in the legal system of the requesting state. A number of cases involving crimes committed in Bosnia and Herzegovina illustrate this problem. A prominent example of this arose in Sacirbey v. Guccione.[66] In that case, the Second Circuit held that an individual was no longer "charged" within the meaning of the treaty when a Bosnian court

---

59 In re Extradition of Lam, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43075, at *8–*10 (E.D. Cal. 2009) (discussing Belgian criminal system and "charging" for purposes of investigation).

60 This is the case in Germany. See Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct. N. Dist. Cal., 834 F.2d 1444, 1451 (9th Cir. 1987) and In re Extradition of Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996). It also applies in Italy. See In re Extradition of Rovelli, 977 F. Supp. 566 (D. Conn. 1997).

61 Philip Dorling, US Calls Assange "Enemy of State," Sydney Morning Herald, Sept. 27, 2012, available at http://www.smh.com.au/opinion/political-news/us-calls-assange-enemy-of-state-20120927-26m7s.html.

62 Charlie Savage, U.S. Prosecutors Study WikiLeaks Prosecution, NY Times, Dec. 7, 2010,available at http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/08/world/08leak.html.

63 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

64 See Ch. VII.

65 In re Extradition of Chapman, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81944 (D. Haw. 2007). This case involved the issue of whether the Mexican statute of limitations ran in regard to arrest warrants issued for U.S. bounty hunters accused of "unlawful deprivation of liberty" for capturing a fugitive U.S. citizen in Mexico. The Mexican court that issued the original arrest warrant subsequently granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the pending criminal action, finding that the limitations period under Mexican law was not tolled during the defendant's arrest in the United States. The issue in this case was "whether, under the laws of the state of Jalisco, this ruling of the trial court has been stayed during the pendency of the prosecutor's appeal." Id. at *6. The court reasoned that the Mexican court's clarifying order stating that the arrest warrant was "cancelled" despite the Mexican prosecutor's appeal, especially as no contrary evidence was provided, meant that the statute of limitations had run and there was no "charge" against the defendants in Mexico or valid arrest warrant for their arrest. Id. at *6, *10–*11. Thus, the extradition proceedings were dismissed.

66 Sacirbey v. Guccione, 589 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 2009).

lost jurisdiction over the crime due to judicial reforms.[67] Sacirbey, the relator, was a naturalized U.S. citizen[68] who served as Bosnia's ambassador to the United Nations from 1992 until 2000,[69] when he resigned due to political changes in Bosnia. The new Bosnian foreign minister subsequently opened an investigation into financial irregularities at the U.N. Mission to the United Nations, which resulted in the issuance of an international arrest warrant for Sacirbey by a Cantonal Court in Bosnia.[70]

After issuing the arrest warrant, the Bosnian judicial system was reorganized and the Cantonal Court that issued the warrant lost jurisdiction over the financial crimes alleged in the warrant. No new arrest warrant was issued after the reorganization,[71] although the Counselor to the Bosnian Embassy in Washington, DC, affirmed her country's intent to prosecute Sacirbey, and the Assistant United States Attorney affirmed that the National Court in Bosnia intended to proceed against Sacirbey upon his surrender.[72]

Sacirbey was found extraditable by the U.S. magistrate judge, and he subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition to the district court. In the habeas petition Sacirbey argued that the dissolution of the Bosnian Cantonal Court negated its jurisdiction and voided the indictment, and therefore that he was not "charged" within the meaning of the treaty.[73] The district court rejected this argument, reasoning that the requirement of a "charge" was satisfied if the relator was "accused" or the requesting state showed its intent to prosecute.

---

67 The court framed the issue in a more outcome determinative manner, namely "whether an arrest warrant issued by a foreign court that no longer has jurisdiction over the accused, nor the power to enforce the warrant, can provide an adequate basis for the extradition of a United States citizen." Id. at 54.

68 Id. at 54.

69 Id. at 55–56.

70 Id. The new Bosnian foreign minister was a perceived political adversary of Sacirbey. This political aspect of the investigation may have played a role in the Second Circuit's decision.

71 Id. at 59.

72 More particularly, the letters presented by the government were as follows:

> Kosovic's first letter, dated October 11, 2005, stated that "[the National Court] will proceed in the matter of [Sacirbey] if the request for extradition would be approved by the appropriate authorities of [the] United States." J.A. 960 (Oct. 11, 2005 Letter of Amra Kosovic). A second letter, dated November 10, 2005, was more equivocal on the question of whether the National Court had jurisdiction over the case. Kosovic's letter stated in relevant part:
>
> > The Cantonal Court . . . exists and hears all cases that are within its jurisdiction. During the period of justice system reforms, the [National Court] was established and the [National] Court can, on request of the parties in a case, decide to hear this case of extradition or any other case if the necessary requirements according to the [Bosnian Criminal Procedure Code are met]. As you were informed, [the] Prosecutor's Office of Bosnia . . . has sent notice that [it] took the investigation which was previous[ly] held by [the] Prosecutor's Office of Canton Sarajevo.
>
> J.A. 961 (Nov. 10, 2005 Letter of Amra Kosovic) (emphasis added). Recognizing that these letters "do not elaborate on the relationship between the Cantonal Court, which originally issued the arrest warrant and demand for investigation against Mr. Sacirbey, and the [National Court], which now appears to be . . . seized of jurisdiction over Mr. Sacirbey's case," the government argued that these letters nevertheless demonstrated that "a Bosnian court . . . would handle Mr. Sacirbey's proceeding upon his extradition." J.A. 958 (Nov. 22, 2005 Letter of Assistant United States Attorney Anjan Sahni).
>
> Id. at 60–61.

73 Id. at 59. This author suggested in a telephonic conference before the magistrate judge that the implications of the change in Bosnia from a civil law system to a common law system were unclear, and that Bosnia should be requested to submit some official judicial document confirming the ongoing validity of the arrest warrant issued by the Cantonal prosecutors. No such submission was made by Bosnia in this matter.

The Second Circuit reversed the district court's findings, ruling that Sacirbey was no longer "charged" within the meaning of the treaty after the reforms.[74] The court reasoned that the United States–Serbia extradition treaty, upon which the request was based, required the submission of a valid arrest warrant and evidence that the individual was "charged" within the meaning of the treaty,[75] and noted that the subsequent declarations supplied by Bosnia were ambiguous as to whether Sacirbey would be prosecuted or merely investigated.[76] Relying on this interpretation of the plain language of the treaty, the court concluded that the arrest warrant was a "dead letter" after the Cantonal Court lost jurisdiction, and that it therefore no longer constituted a valid arrest warrant.[77]

The Second Circuit did, however, reject Sacirbey's argument that a relator must also be subject to ongoing judicial proceedings before a judicial body to which the relator may petition for relief, holding that it was for the executive to negotiate such provisions into a treaty.[78]

The Sacirbey court's ruling has been criticized for its narrow reading of the meaning of "charge," especially in light of the Supreme Court's ruling in Factor v. Laubenheimer favoring the liberal construction of treaties, as well as the customary international law principle of good faith interpretation of treaties in light of their object and purpose, as expressed in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[79] The Sacirbey opinion has also come under criticism for failing to address whether the extradition treaty's procedural requirements were superseded by the extradition statute under the later-in-time rule.[80] In two previous cases the Supreme Court had denied the accused standing to demand compliance with procedural requirements contained in the treaties at issue.[81] Perhaps the central criticism of the Sacirbey ruling is its failure to consider whether the substance of the reforms in the Bosnian judicial system vested the new Bosnian National Court with jurisdiction by virtue of the judicial reorganization that transferred cases from the Cantonal Court. This critique is aptly made in Judge Amalya Kearse's dissent.[82]

---

74 Id. at 69–70.

75 Id. at 66–67. Article III states that when "[a] fugitive is merely charged with crime, a duly authenticated copy of the warrant of arrest in the country where the crime has been committed, and of the depositions or other evidence upon which such warrant was issued, shall be produced."

76 Id.

77 Id. at 67.

78 Id. at 65–66, 69.

79 See Jacques Semmelman, International Decision: Sacirbey v. Guccione: International Extradition—Treaty Interpretation—Requirement in Extradition Treaty That Accused Be Charged—Judicial Reorganization Affecting Validity of Extradition Request, 104 A.J.I.L. 641, 644–645 (2010).

80 Id. at 645.

81 Id. at 645–646. Semmelman discusses Grin v. Shine, where the Supreme Court reasoned that the requirement in the United States–Russia treaty that an authenticated copy of an arrest warrant or equivalent judicial document must be submitted where the relator was merely charged with an extraditable crime was superseded by congressional legislation making no reference to this requirement in extradition proceedings. Further, in Charlton v. Kelly, the Supreme Court denied the relator the ability to demand enforcement of the United States–Italy treaty requirement that the formal demand for extradition be filed within forty days of arrest, as such requirement was not found in the extradition statute that applied to all extradition treaties. Thus, Semmelman argues that as the current extradition statute does not require submission of a foreign arrest warrant, the government could have argued that Sacirbey lacked standing to demand enforcement of this procedural requirement, and Sacirbey presented an opportunity to revisit these earlier cases to clarify the application of the latter-in-time rule and interplay of the extradition statute and extradition treaties.

82 Sacirbey, 589 F.3d at 72–75 (2d Cir. 2009) (Kearse, J., dissenting). Contrary to the majority, Judge Kearse concluded that:

> The Bosnian court reforms automatically divested the Sarajevo Cantonal Court of jurisdiction to entertain a prosecution of Sacirbey and assumes that a loss of jurisdiction in the Cantonal Court

In Zelenovic v. O'Malley the district court for the Northern District of Illinois considered whether the judicial reforms in Serbia, including the dissolution of the court that issued the relator's arrest warrant, defeated the basis of the extradition request, for the same reasons raised in Sacirbey.[83] The Zelenovic court distinguished the case from Sacirbey because "the evidence submitted by the Government here demonstrates that Zelenovic's arrest warrant was ratified by a Serbian court with jurisdiction over the matter," which was not the case in Sacirbey.[84] The question remains, however, whether the same result would remain in Zelenovic if there had been the same political undertones as in the Sacirbey case.

The Zelenovic and Sacirbey cases highlight a particular difficulty in extradition law. States in transition after conflicts often reform their judicial systems, sometimes multiple times. Consequently, arrest warrants and charging instruments may be issued by courts whose jurisdiction is subsequently removed, or the court itself is abolished or merged with others. The question of the validity of orders issued by such courts has to be determined in accordance with the laws of that state. A better practice is for a requesting state to reissue the order or to have it certified as legally valid, as in Zelenovic. Failure to do so, as in the Sacirbey case, may well be due to the fact that the extradition request is politically motivated. This was the case with respect to Muhamed Sacirbey, particularly because the originally investigated financial situation arose during a politically turbulent and contentious time in Bosnia.

4. The Requirement of "Probable Cause"[85]

The finding of probable cause is specifically required by legislation in 18 U.S.C. § 3184, and is also embodied in U.S. treaties. But inexplicably, it has not yet been interpreted as emanating from the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Thus, its meaning, content, and application have acquired a dimension that is separate and distinct from the constitutional probable cause standard applicable to arrests, and to searches and seizures in the United States or under U.S. law if carried out extraterritorially. Nevertheless, because probable cause applies to a finding under the law of the requesting state for an offense whose existence and meaning is to be found under the law of the requesting state by virtue of the principle of double criminality,[86] which is also required by legislation and treaty, it is difficult to separate probable > means that no court has jurisdiction. In my view, neither assumption is correct. Although I agree that the Sarajevo Cantonal Court no longer has jurisdiction, it appears to me, given the provisions of the Bosnia CPC, that the divesture of jurisdiction was not automatic but instead results from the decision of the Bosnian National Court to take the case. I see no reason—and the majority does not explain—why a nation's court reforms cannot entail the transfer of cases from one court to another; and it appears that the Bosnia reforms envision the retention of jurisdiction by the Cantonal Courts in some cases and the transfer to the National Court of other cases of which the National Court wishes to take jurisdiction.

---

>
> …
>
> Thus, while I agree with the majority that the Sarajevo Cantonal Court no longer has the power to proceed in the matter of Sacirbey, I reach that conclusion because the Bosnia National Court has decided to take the case. I do not agree with the majority that extradition should be denied on the theory that rather than having been transferred to the National Court, the original warrant for Sacirbey's arrest has become a "dead letter," Majority Opinion ante at 23 (internal quotation marks omitted).

83 Zelenovic v. O'Malley, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92632, at *7–*10 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 7, 2010).

84 Id. at *10–*11.

85 S*ee* Hermanowski v. United States of America, 2006 149 F.C.R 93 (Austl.); United States v. Andrade, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89870 (D. Or. 2006); United States v. Andrade, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70040 (D. Or. 2006); In re Extradition of Waters, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24399 (E.D.N.Y. 2003).

86 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

cause for extradition from probable cause for an arrest, most obviously because the Hearing on extradition would not be held if the relator had not been arrested.

The "probable cause" standard applied in the process of extradition originated as one of the grounds upon which the relator could challenge both the order for his/her extradition and the lawfulness of his/her detention during a habeas corpus review.[87] The U.S. Supreme Court has defined this standard as requiring that competent legal evidence be presented in order to warrant the reasonable conclusion that the relator committed the offense for which he/she is sought,[88] and not simply that he/she is suspected of having done so.

The requesting state need not, however, adduce evidence sufficient to justify a conviction.[89] Moreover, it is accepted practice that the probable cause standard must be satisfied in accordance

---

87 See Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903); Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502 (1896); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); United States v. Bogue, 1998 WL 966070 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also Elias v. Ramirez, 215 U.S. 398 (1910); Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902); Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U.S. 424 (1902); Ex parte Bryant, 167 U.S. 104 (1897); Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457 (1888); Bovio v. United States, 989 F.2d 255 (7th Cir. 1993) (reviewing probable cause determination to decide whether there is any competent evidence supporting the determination); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 874 F.2d 1402, 1414 (11th Cir. 1989) ("When a grand jury indicts a defendant, and the defendant is tried for the precise offense contained in the extradition order, the doctrine of specialty does not purport to regulate the scope of proof admissible in the judicial forum of the requesting state"); United States ex rel. D'Amico v. Bishopp, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir. 1961); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Hoi-Pong v. Noriega, 677 F. Supp. 1153 (S.D. Fla. 1988); Na-Yuet v. Hueston, 690 F. Supp. 1008 (S.D. Fla. 1988); In re Extradition of Suarez-Mason, 694 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Cal. 1988); In re Extradition of Pazienza, 619 F. Supp. 611 (D.C.N.Y. 1985); In re Application of D'Amico, 185 F. Supp. 925 (D. Conn. 1960), appeal dismissed sub nom.; In re Cortes, 42 F. 47 (1890).

88 In Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922), the Court stated that:

> The function of the committing magistrate is to determine whether there is competent evidence to justify holding the accused to await trial, and not to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to justify a conviction.

Id. at 316. This standard was similarly adopted in earlier decisions.

See also Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511, 517 (1916) (discussing "competent and adequate evidence"); McNamara v. Henkel, 226 U.S. 520, 524 (1913) (stating that there must be "competent evidence that the crime . . . had been committed"); Correll v. Stewart, 941 F.2d 1209 (6th Cir. 1991); Peters v. Egnor, 888 F.2d 713 (10th Cir. 1989). See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Valencia v. Scott, 1992 WL 75036 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 24, 1992); Carr v. United States, 782 F. Supp. 945 (D. Ver. 1991); In re Extradition of Atta, 706 F. Supp. 1032 (E.D.N.Y. 1989).

89 Collins, 259 U.S. at 316. See also Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312 (1925); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726, 730–731 (9th Cir. 1975); Merino v. U.S. Marshal, 326 F.2d 5, 11 (9th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 997 (1964); Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547, 562 (5th Cir. 1962); United States v. Bogue, 1998 WL 966070 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 270, 273 (D.C.N.Y. 1973), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973). Note that in this context, hearsay is sufficient for a probable cause determination, even though it would not be admissible at trial. See Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct. N. Dist. Cal., 834 F.2d 1444, 1451 (9th Cir. 1987). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Dec. 10, 1997); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

with the law of the requested state; in the United States, it must meet the federal standards set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 3184, and as defined and applied by the Supreme Court.[90]

Reliance on the probable cause standard reflects the universal disinclination of the courts to transform the limited inquiry of the Hearing into a trial on the merits. Consequently, certain evidentiary showings inadmissible at trial will be admitted, because the courts are not required to reach a decision respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused but only whether he/she should be brought to trial in the requesting state.[91] It also has been held that because the Hearing is not a trial on the merits, it lacks res judicata effect on the issue of guilt or innocence, as well as on the basic question of the relator's extraditability.[92] Nevertheless, it could be validly argued that the court's findings of facts and conclusions of law should bar readjudication of the same or substantially same facts and legal issues if the request is denied and a new request submitted, although the government may repeatedly request an individual's extradition if it fails the first time.

The probable cause standard is akin to a prima facie standard. Whatever else may be implied, probable cause effectively means that sufficient evidence has been presented to the court of the requested state to warrant bringing the relator to trial in accordance with the laws of the requesting state, and not simply that the individual is suspected of criminality with no basis in fact to support the allegation. If indeed no evidence of probable cause exists, then the assertions presented by the requesting state constitute nothing more than mere suspicion, and the request must be denied.[93]

---

90 Collins, 259 U.S. at 317. See also Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169 (1st Cir. 1991) (applying Greek law on forgery to determine whether evidence supported probable cause determination); Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976); Sindona v. Grant, 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), aff'd, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980). In Greci, had the more demanding state standard of probable cause (requiring sufficient evidence to convict) been adopted, the relator would not have been certified for extradition. 527 F.2d at 958; But see Merino v. U.S. Marshal, 326 F.2d 5, 12 (9th Cir. 1963) (applying the California probable cause standard, which was equivalent to the federal standard, which was satisfied). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

91 See Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. 1997); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1368 (9th Cir. 1978); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1191 (5th Cir. 1971); Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679, 685 (5th Cir. 1969); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp.1155, 1063 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). See also Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996) and United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

92 Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978).

93 In re Gonzalez, 305 F. Supp. 2d 682 (S.D.Tex. 2004) (holding that probable cause is evidence sufficient to cause a person of ordinary prudence and caution to conscientiously entertain reasonable belief that a person has committed the crime, even though the rules of evidence do not limit the type of evidence that can be presented, while at the same time, the relator is limited to only evidence explaining that which the government presents.) How far the court will entertain contradictory evidence varies from case to case as is appropriate, because what constitutes reasonable grounds to believe will vary depending upon the facts. It should be noted that the largest volume of extradition cases are between the United States and Mexico, most of which raise the issues of double criminality and probable cause. See also Escobedo v. United States, 623 F. (5th Cir. 1980); In re Extradition of Kuri, No. 04-6049M-DKD, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31905 (D. Ariz. 2006); In re Chavez, 408 F. Supp. 2d 908 (N.D. Cal. 2005); In re Extradition of Solis, 402 F. Supp. 2d 1128 (C.D. Cal. 2005); Extradition of Valles, 268 F. Supp.2d 758 (S.D. Tex 2003); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003); In re Extradition of Herrera, 268 F Supp. 2d 688 (W.D. Tex. 2003); In re Extradition of Medina, 210 F. Supp. 813 (N.D. Tex. 2002); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Maguna-Celaya v. Haro, 19 F. Supp. 2d 1337, 1341–1343 (S.D. Fla. 1998); In re Extradition of Massieu, 897F. Supp. 176 (D.N.J. 1995); In re Extradition of Garcia, 890 F. Supp. 914

United States courts apply the "clearly erroneous" standard in evaluating a challenge to a probable cause determination by a magistrate or judge, and will uphold a magistrate or judge's finding of probable cause if there is any competent evidence in the record to support it.[94] In Pliego the court denied extradition for lack of probable cause based on the testimony of a forensic documents expert who revealed that the documents presented by the U.S. government on behalf of the government of Mexico were forgeries. The government objected to the analysis even though one would assume that the U.S. government has an interest in protecting the integrity of the judicial process during extradition proceedings. It is noteworthy that this testimony was accepted as explanatory of the evidence presented.[95]

In Lukes[96] the relator's extradition to the Czech Republic was denied due to the lack of probable cause. In that case, the court examined the voluminous material presented by the Czech Republic and concluded that the only extraditable charge was for embezzlement, but that it was not sufficient to constitute probable cause.[97] This case is indicative of similar white collar crime matters in which the requesting state may introduce a significant volume of evidence in support of the application for extradition. For example, in the Extradition of Caltagirone,[98] which was ultimately dismissed, the documents presented were so voluminous as to fill a ten-by-ten foot space.

In Rablebauer,[99] for instance, there were twelve six-inch binders full of documents. Extradition judges are understandably reluctant to go through such voluminous material if for no other reason than the amount of time that it would take. But there is also the assumption that the requesting state, and surely the U.S. government, would not have presented such a voluminous amount of material if they were not convinced of its relevance to the charges that underlie the extradition request. However, it is not uncommon in extradition, as in other types of litigation in the United States, for one side to drown the other with documentation. In the Rablebauer case over 1,000 pages of documents were presented, of which only three related to the extraditable offense itself. Had the extradition judge been deterred by the volume of documents presented by the government it would have not been apparent to him that there was very little relevant documentation pertaining to the extraditable offense. When the extradition judge was done with reviewing those three pages he concluded that there was no probable cause for extradition.

Similarly, in In re Extradition of Mazur[100] the State Department submitted five volumes of original documents containing evidence in support of the extradition request. The relator was a wealthy businessman who could afford representation by a large law firm, which was able to parse through the voluminous submissions to find the many inconsistencies and lack of corroboration within the submitted evidence. This analysis ultimately showed that the "evidence"

(S.D. Cal. 1994); In re Extraditon of Nacif Borge, 829 F. Supp. 1210 (D. Nev. 1993); In re Extradition of Contraras, 800 F. Supp. 1462 (S.D. Tex 1992).

94 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 318 (1925); Quinn v. Robison, 783 F.2d. (1986); Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1971) (evidence is deemed competent in extradition proceedings if it is probably authenticated); 18 U.S.C. § 3190 (1948). See also Barapind v. Enomoto (9th Circ. 2004); In re Extradition of Garcia, 188 F. Supp. 2d 921 (N.D. Ill. 2002) (standard of probable cause is to determine whether there is competent legal evidence that justifies apprehension and commitment for trial).

95 In re Pliego, 320 F. Supp. 2d 947 (D. Ariz. 2004).

96 In re Lukes, No. 2:02-MC-23-FTM, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26094 (M.D. Fla 2003).

97 Id.. See also United States v. Peterka, 307 F. Supp. 2d 1344 (M.D. Fla 2003) (denying extradition because insufficient evidence to determine probable cause and to meet dual criminality).

98 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980).

99 In re Rabelbauer, 638 F. Supp. 1085 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

100 In re Extradition of Mazur, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52551 (N.D. Ill. July 20, 2007).

presented was speculative, and Mazur was able to call relevant witnesses at the Hearing to rebut the government's submissions.[101] In its analysis of the evidence presented regarding probable cause, the district court aptly summarized the situation, stating:

> if probable cause turned on sheer volume, the record in this case would likely be enough to satisfy any standard… But probable cause is not established merely with quantity; the determination turns on the nature of the specific evidence presented.[102]

Probable cause is a constitutional, statutory, and treaty requirement. When courts look at it as a treaty requirement they tend to construe it liberally so as to give effect to the intention of the contracting parties.[103] That could also result in an interpretation that is less exacting than its counterpart under U.S. criminal law, though it should not be construed as such if the requirement is deemed part of the requirement of double criminality.[104] However, probable cause is also a statutory requirement and should be interpreted accordingly.

4.1. Probable Cause as a Constitutional Requirement

There are no treaties that derogate from the probable cause requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 3184. A question would arise, however, in the event that a treaty required less than probable cause, and thus came in conflict with the legislation. In this case the issue of whether the treaty or the statute controls would depend on the Supreme Court's determination that the probable cause standard in § 3184 embodies the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution, which requires probable cause in all cases involving searches and seizures. Nevertheless, irrespective of whether the Supreme Court would reach such a determination, extradition proceedings are subject to the requirement of the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause, which incorporates the Fourth Amendment with respect to the requirement of probable cause as the basis for any lawful search and seizure.[105] Could a treaty 101 Mazur was represented by Jenner & Block, LLP. For a description of the extradition hearing proceedings, see id. at *40–*51.

---

102 Id. at *61.

103 See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 298 (1933); Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511, 517 (1916). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). Note that determining whether a valid extradition treaty exists is a mixed question of law and fact. See Hoi-Pong v. Noreiga, 677 F. Supp. 1153, 1155 (S.D. Fla. 1988). See also DeSilva v. DeLeonardi, 181 F. 3d 865, 866 (7th Cir. 1999); Bovio v. United States, 989 F.2d 255 (7th Cir. 1993); Jenkins v. Bowling, 649 F.2d 1225 (7th Cir. 1982); In re Extradition of Salas, 161 F. Supp. 2d 915 (N.D. Ill. 2001).

104 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2. See infra Sec. 5.2.2 for the evidentiary standard of probable cause and the sufficiency of evidence. Burden of proof in defenses rests with the relator, though no clear legal standard emerges from the cases. Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, 408 (E.D. N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990); Abu Eain v. Adams, 529 F. Supp. 685, 694 (N.D. Ill. 1980), aff'd sub nom. Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 520 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); cf. In re Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672, 693–694 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

105 It is uncertain where a relator could make this kind of argument to effectively defeat a probable cause finding based on allegedly illegally obtained evidence. The federal district court for the Southern District of New York reasoned that the protection afforded by the Fifth Amendment to a foreign national prosecuted in the United States was not absolute, and did not allow the relator to raise a Fourth Amendment argument against illegal wiretap evidence under the guise of a Fifth Amendment substantive due process claim. See United States v. Coke, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94012 at *14–*15 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 22, 2011). The court went on to note that in order to succeed on a Fifth Amendment substantive due process claim, the relator would have to show that the government's conduct was " 'so outrageous' that common notions of fairness and decency would be offended." Id. at *17. This is a high standard, which would be very difficult for realtors to meet, and indeed the relator did not meet that threshold in Coke where the consequently derogate from the principle of probable cause as a constitutional requirement? No answer to this question has yet been provided by the Supreme Court, as the issue has not arisen so far.

The question did exist at one time as to whether probable cause was required in provisional arrests, which began appearing in U.S. extradition treaties in 1970. Among these, for example, is the Treaty of Extradition between the United States and Italy, which provides in Article XIII:

> In case of urgency a Contracting Party may apply for the provisional arrest of the person sought pending the presentation of the request for extradition through the diplomatic channel. . . . The application shall contain a description of the person sought, and indication of intention to request the extradition of the person sought and a statement of the existence of a warrant of arrest . . . against that person, and such further information, if any, as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party.[106]

The problem did not arise before a circuit court until Caltagirone v. Grant,[107] where the court stated:

> The overwhelming evidence that Article XIII itself prohibits provisional arrest without probable cause relieves us of the need to examine the constitutional propriety of a treaty that purports to permit such arrests. But one factual aspect of the Government's claimed practice under Article XIII leads us to comment. According to the Government, the United States may detain Caltagirone for forty-five days with no showing of probable cause. Caltagirone, however, enjoys no guarantee that his detention will end even then.
>
> In Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426 (1923), the Supreme Court held that an extradition proceeding which ends in the relator's release from custody does not bar a subsequent extradition demand by the requesting state on the same charge. Should Italy's current extradition attempt fail, Article XIV of the Treaty specifically provides that a second may be initiated. Thus, if the Government fails to establish probable cause in the proceeding now pending in the district court, it may nonetheless seek the immediate rearrest of Caltagirone on the same charge. Indeed, counsel for the Government readily conceded at argument that he would seek Caltagirone's rearrest should the present extradition request be denied.[108]

Concerning the due process rights of a relator under provisional arrest procedures, the Caltagirone court stated:

> [I]n the Government's view, a foreign state could apply for, and the Government could effect, the unlimited detention of Caltagirone by stringing together an infinite strand of forty-five day provisional arrests, all without a judicial determination of probable cause, or a formal extradition request. This elaboration of the Government's view raises grave questions concerning the constitutional propriety of any interpretation of Article XIII which does not require a showing of probable cause. United States v. Williams, 480 F. Supp. 482, 486 (D. Mass.) (expressing reservations as to the constitutionality of thirty-day provisional arrest detention without showing of probable cause), reversed on other grounds, 611 F.2d 914 (1st Cir. 1979) (per curiam); Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330, 331 (S.D.N.Y. 1913) (reserving the issue since probable cause was present). See also Rosado v. Civiletti, Nos. 80-2001/3, slip op. at 2525, 2557 (2d Cir. Apr. 23, only questionable actions were DEA–Jamaican memoranda of understanding concerning the gathering and sharing of wiretap evidence.

---

106 Treaty on Extradition between United States and Italy, art. XIII, 26 U.S.T. 493, 502, T.I.A.S. No. 8052 (entered into force Mar. 11, 1975). A new United States–Italy treaty entered into force on September 24, 1984, T.I.A.S. No. 10,837.

107 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980).

108 Id. at 747 (emphasis added).

> 1980) (dictum) ("to the extent that the United States itself acts to detain a relator pending extradition, it is bound to accord him due process"), citing Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 184 (1902).
>
> Moreover, since the Treaty by its terms applies both to aliens and to Americans, the arguably lesser rights accorded aliens, see, e.g., Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67 (1976), cannot provide a complete answer. Indeed, the Government, if its view were accepted, could arrest and indefinitely detain American citizens upon no more than an allegation by a foreign government that a warrant for the citizen was outstanding. We doubt that the tenuous relationship between an application for provisional arrest and a subsequent request for extradition implicates a sufficiently strong foreign policy interest in the executive to justify such a departure from usual Fourth Amendment protections. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957). Under our historic mandate to construe ambiguous enactments in a manner that comports with the Constitution, Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 128–30 (1958), we would be loathe to permit any construction of the Treaty that could be read to support the purported practice to which we have just alluded. See NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979). In our view, the language of Article XIII so clearly demands a showing of probable cause before any warrant for provisional arrest may issue, that we need not reach the constitutional question. Nunquam decurritur ad extraordinarium sed ubi deficit ordinarium. (We must not resort to the extraordinary until the ordinary fails.)[109]

The court held on the basis of the treaty language that some type of probable cause is also required for provisional arrests,[110] though it is clear from the Caltagirone opinion, as well as the practice before U.S. magistrates and federal district court judges, that § 3184 does not apply to provisional arrests, but only to the actual Hearing. One of the reasons that issues surrounding provisional arrests been not heard by circuit courts is that usually the provisional arrest is limited to forty-five days or sixty days by the terms of the treaty. Thus, by the time the issue is raised on appeal, it may already be moot because the time has lapsed or because the relator has been released on bail. However, in the Caltagirone case, the court held that the issue is not moot because a relator may be released or the extradition request denied, and the subsequent request could be brought again and the individual rearrested and the issue readjudicated.[111] A denial of extradition is therefore not a bar to a new request, and double jeopardy does not apply as a defense.[112]

Finally, it should be noted that the application of ex post facto laws in the requesting state does not necessarily negate a probable cause finding by the extradition magistrate or judge despite the prohibition against the practice in the U.S. Constitution. For instance, in In re Extradition of Tawakkal, the federal district court for the Eastern District of Virginia concluded that the relator did "not sufficiently challenge the competency of the evidence before the Court because they exceed the bounds of issues that properly can be contemplated during an extradition hearing."[113] That said, the U.S. Supreme Court has yet to express its views on these constitutional questions.[114]

4.2. The Peculiarity of in Absentia Convictions

A number of legal systems, including Italy and France, allow for trials in absentia. A person can therefore be convicted in absentia. If an extradition request is based in an in absentia

109 Id. at 748 (emphasis added).

110 Id. at 747–748.

111 Id.

112 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

113 In re Extradition of Tawakkal, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65059, at *39–*40 (E.D. Va. 2008).

114 See infra Sec. 5.2.1, which addresses some of these issues of evidentiary exclusions on constitutional grounds.

conviction the question arises as to whether the evidence presented during the in absentia proceedings may be enough to satisfy the requirement of probable cause.

An in absentia conviction would not be considered in the United States as satisfying the requirements of due process, and the conviction in that legal system would not be deemed to be a conviction in the United States. But the evidence presented at such a trail may be deemed sufficient for purposes of issuance of an arrest warrant, because it would be considered to be the equivalent of a hearing before a judge. A probable cause hearing in the United States is not conducted in the presence of the accused, and consequentially the evidence presented in foreign criminal proceedings conducted in absentia could be considered to be sufficient for purposes of probable cause if the U.S. magistrate so deems it.

The difficulties with in absentia criminal proceedings is that a person may have been tried and be found innocent, and yet subject to an appeal of that conviction before the appellate court. As is the case in Italy, the appeals courts in these countries can retry the accused in absentia and find such a person guilty, even though the person was acquitted at the trial level. For purposes of extradition, two questions arise out of this procedure. The first is whether a retrial on appeal resulting in a conviction after the person has been acquitted at the trial level satisfies due process requirements and is sufficient for extradition, or whether such a procedure is so fundamentally contrary to public policy that extradition will not be granted. To date U.S. courts have not taken a position on this issue, and that leaves open the question of whether the evidence submitted either at the trial court or at the appellate court, particularly in absentia, is sufficient to satisfy probable cause.

This issue arose in Haxhiaj v. Hackman,[115] where the court looked at the evidence presented during the in absentia proceedings, as reflected in the opinion of the Italian Court of Appeals that convicted the relator, as well as other evidence in the record supporting probable cause. In support of this process the cited Prushinowski v. Samples,[116] Kastnerova v. United States,[117] and Fernandez v. Phillips.[118] The court specifically rejected the petitioner's contention that probable cause needed "actual evidence" as being something of a different nature than what is required under Title 18 U.S.C. § 3184, and in U.S. jurisprudence relating to the interpretation of the probable cause requirement contained in bilateral extradition treaties.[119] The court further cited Ordinola v. Hackman[120] for the proposition that "the applicable extradition treaty often bares upon the scope of probable cause by establishing what constitutes an evidentiary hearing."[121] The Haxhiaj court continued,

> Finally, Article X specifically addresses requests to extradite those who were convicted of an extraditable offense in absentia:
>
> > "If the person sought has been convicted in absentia or in contumacy, all issues relating to this aspect of the request shall be decided by the Executive Authority of the United States or the competent authorities of Italy. In such cases, the Requesting Party shall submit such documents as are described in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of this Article and a statement regarding the procedures, if any, that would be available to the person sought if he or she were extradited."

115 Haxhiaj v. Hackman, 528 F.3 282 (4th Cir. 2008).

116 Prushinowski v. Samples, 734 F.2d 1016 (4th Cir. 1984).

117 Kastnerova v. United States, 365 F.3d 980, 984 (11th Cir. 2004).

118 Fernandez v. Phillips, 45 U.S. 541 (1925).

119 Haxhiaj, 528 F.3 at 288.

120 Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588, 608 (4th Cir. 2007).

121 Haxhiaj, 528 F.3 at 288.

> Id., art. X, ¶ 5. By incorporating the requirements of paragraph three into paragraph five, the Treaty requires more proof than just the fact of an in absentia conviction, and directs that a summary of the facts and evidence be supplied to establish "a reasonable basis to believe that the person sought committed the offense for which extradition is requested," id., art. X, ¶¶ 3(b), i.e., probable cause under § 3184.
>
> Therefore, for an extradition request based upon a conviction in absentia, the Treaty requires more detail than mere proof of the fact of conviction to establish probable cause, i.e., "a reasonable basis to believe that the person sought committed the offense," id., art. X, ¶ 3(b), but it clearly does not require the kind of actual evidence suggested by Haxhiaj, such as trial testimony or transcripts of the wiretap evidence. Instead, the Extradition Treaty requires merely a summary of the facts and relevant evidence sufficient to provide a reasonable basis to believe the relator committed the offense. We conclude that the certified copy of the appellate opinion of the Court of Appeal of Milan satisfies the showing required by the Treaty and clearly affords a reasonable basis upon which to find probable cause. The opinion is remarkable for its detailed description of the evidence developed during the investigation of Haxhiaj's drug trafficking ring, including this key wiretap describing Haxhiaj's role . . . [122]

5. Evidentiary Matters

5.1. Admissibility of Evidence

Extradition proceedings are deemed sui generis, and partake of both civil and criminal procedure. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not apply to them, however.[123] Furthermore, because a Hearing is not a full-fledged criminal proceeding, and is not a trial on the merits, the relator is not entitled to all the rights guaranteed in a federal criminal trial.[124]

The Federal Rules of Evidence are inapplicable to extradition proceedings.[125] The basic evidentiary normative provision is set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 3190.[126] Rather, the admissibility of evidence is within the discretionary power of the extradition judge, and the exercise of such discretion is not a violation of due process unless it is clear error. In Vo v. Benov, the Ninth Circuit held:

> We have repeatedly held that an extradition court's decision not to consider evidence, or not to make findings relevant to a discretionary exception, does not violate due process. In

---

122 Id. at 289.

123 For example, Fed. R. Crim. P. 54(b)(5). Hearsay evidence is admissible. United States v. De Loera, 2:06-MJ-98-PRC, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35653 (Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Criminal Procedure do not apply to extradition cases). See also Bovio v. United States, 989 F.2d 255 (7th Cir. 1993); Zanazanian v. United States, 729 F.2d 624 (9th Cir. 1984). See also Afanasjev v. Hurlburt, 418 F.3d 1159 (11th Cir. 2005) (unsworn statements may be admissible, it becomes a question of credibility, hearsay permissible, only thing required is the proper authentication of documents).

124 Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1911). See also Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901); Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457 (1888); United States v. Stockinger, 269 F.2d 681 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 913 (1959); In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757, at *21 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). For example, the relator does not have the right to confront and cross examine witnesses against him. Ex parte La Mantia, 206 F. 330 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1913); Neely v. Henkel, 103 F. 631 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1900), aff'd, 180 U.S. 109 (1901).

125 See Merino v. U.S. Marshal, 326 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1963); Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976); F.R.E. 1101(d)(3).

126 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 791 (9th Cir. 1986). See also Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. 1997); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); Cucuzzella v. Keliikoa, 638 F.2d 105 (9th Cir. 1981); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336, 1342 (9th Cir. 1981).

> Lopez-Smith, for instance, the petitioner sought a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the extradition magistrate had violated the petitioner's due process rights by refusing to consider evidence regarding whether the Secretary ought to exercise the discretion provided by the terms of the extradition treaty not to extradite him to Mexico. We rejected this claim on the ground that extradition is "entirely within the discretion of the executive branch, except to the extent that the statute interposes a judicial function." Lopez-Smith, 121 F.3d at 1326. We stated that the statutorily imposed judicial functions encompass the entirety of a court's obligations in the extradition process, emphasizing that "[t]he magistrate judge has no discretionary decision to make." Id. Because discretionary decisions are within the province of the Secretary of State and not the extradition magistrate, we held that "it is . . . for the Secretary to decide what evidence might have a bearing upon" a discretionary decision. Thus, an extradition court's failure to consider evidence that might aid the Secretary does not deprive an individual of due process. Id. Similarly, in Prasoprat, we rejected a petitioner's claim that a magistrate judge deprived him of due process by denying a discovery motion seeking evidence related to a discretionary exception in the applicable extradition treaty because "the evidence that Prasoprat sought in his motion for discovery was not relevant to the extradition judge's limited inquiry." Prasoprat, 421 F.3d at 1015.[127]

The question of admissibility of evidence goes to the issue of determining what type of evidence can be presented at a Hearing. It does not go to the weight or sufficiency of the evidence presented. It is established in case law that an extradition proceeding is not a criminal trial in which the guilt or innocence of the relator is adjudicated.[128] As the purpose of the Hearing is to determine simply whether the evidence of the relator's criminal conduct is sufficient to justify his/her extradition under an appropriate treaty, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are not entirely applicable. The standard is whether the statements in question are truthful or whether they are unreliable, self-contradictory, coerced, uncorroborated by other evidence, or the result of torture.[129] As the defenses available to a relator in an extradition proceeding are sharply limited,[130] the courts will restrict the relator's evidence rebutting probable cause to evidence that "clarifies" that which the government presented.[131]

However, in Hunte v. United States the magistrate allowed contradictory evidence:

> Evidence submitted in support of an extradition request is deemed truthful and its credibility generally may not be challenged at an extradition hearing. Vukcevic, 1995 WL 675493, at *7; Ahmad, 726 F.Supp. at 399–400. The function of a magistrate judge reviewing an extradition request "is to determine if there is 'any' evidence sufficient to establish . . . probable cause." Shapiro

---

127 Vo v. Benov, 447 F.3d 1235, 1247 (9th Cir. 2006).

128 See, e.g., Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 482 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976). See also Simmons v. Braun, 627 F.2d 635, 637 (2d Cir. 1980) (holding that in the extradition hearing, the exclusionary rule is inapplicable); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000).

129 In re Extradition of Atuar, 300 F. Supp. 2d 418 (S.D. W. Va. 2003), 156 Fed. Appx. 555 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. dismissed 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5244 (2006) (finding the relator extraditable and the confession of an accomplice obtained under torture to be truthful). See also Extradition of Mainero, 990 F. Supp. 1208 (S.D. Cal. 1997); Extradition of Garcia, 890 F. Supp. 914 (S.D. Cal. 1994); Extradition of Contreras, 800 F. Supp 1462 (S.D. Tex 1992*);* Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028 (S.D.N.Y. 1990); Extradition of Atta, 706 F. Supp 1032 (E.D.N.Y. 1989); Rep. of France v. Moghadam, 617 F. Supp. 777 (N.D. Cal. 1985).

130 See In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

131 See In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204 (1st Cir. 1989) (holding that defendant needed to produce evidence supporting the materiality of alleged Italian appellate decisions that purportedly reversed the Italian convictions).

> v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 905 (2d Cir.1973). Thus, a defendant challenging extradition is limited to evidence which explains or obliterates, rather than contradicts, the government's proof. Id. Moreover, "[t]he extent of such explanatory evidence to be received is largely in the discretion of the judge ruling on the extradition request." Sindona, 450 F.Supp. at 685. Evidence which raises questions of credibility "should properly await trial." Shapiro, 478 F.2d at 905; see also Sindona, 450 F.Supp. at 687.[132]

The Hunte court also noted that:

> Probable cause is determined by examining the "totality-of-the-circumstances." Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238, 103 S.Ct. 2317, 2332, 76 L.Ed.2d 527 (1983). Generally, an accomplice's incriminating statements, if corroborated, are sufficient to establish probable cause. United States v. Ceballos, 812 F.2d 42, 50 (2d Cir.1987). In extradition proceedings in particular, "courts have consistently held that accomplice testimony, whether corroborated or not, is competent evidence to support a finding of probable cause." In re Extradition of Vukcevic, 1995 WL 675493, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Nov.14, 1995) (citations omitted). See also, Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 510 (7th Cir.1981); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F.Supp. 389, 400 (E.D.N.Y.1989); In re Extradition of Atta, 1988 WL 66866, at *5 (E.D.N.Y. June 17, 1988); In re Extradition of Tang Yee-Chun, 674 F.Supp. 1058, 1062 (S.D.N.Y.1987).[133]

Thus, evidence of alibi[134] or of defenses such as insanity,[135] have been held inadmissible, as has newly discovered evidence that someone other than the relator committed the offense.[136] Similarly, the courts will bar evidence that merely contradicts probable cause or that presents a different version of the events than alleged by the requesting state.[137] The relator cannot introduce any evidence that would be admissible at trial as to the issue of guilt, as this "would defeat the whole object of extradition if a complete trial were necessary prior to extradition."[138] Similarly, the relator may not attack the evidence submitted solely on the grounds that it consisted of summaries of other

---

132 United States v. Hunte, 2006 WL 20773, at *6 (E.D.N.Y. 2006).

133 Id. Corroborated accomplice evidence was also used to establish probable cause in In re Extradition of Medina, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11546 (E.D.N.Y. 2009). See also In re Extradition of Atta, 1988 WL 66866 (E.D.N.Y. June 17, 1988).

134 See Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed by agreement of the parties, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). See also In re Extradition of Santos, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, at *51–*53 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2011); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

135 Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed by agreement of the parties, 414 U.S. 884 (1973). See also Elcock, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70; Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998).

136 See Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099 (4th Cir. 1977).

137 Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1369 (9th Cir. 1978); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed by agreement of the parties, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977); In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973); In re Extradition of Santos, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672 at *46–*48 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2011); In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9573 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2008). See also United States v. Cardoso, 2005 WL 1228826 (M.D. Fla. 2005).

138 Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508, 512 (1911).

evidence by the requesting state's prosecutor, where the other evidence would have been admissible in and of itself.[139]

The limited scope of admissibility of evidence in extradition proceedings was concisely stated in the case of In re Shapiro,[140] in which the relator's extradition was sought by Israel, where he was wanted on charges of fraud, conspiracy to defraud, use of fraudulent documents, forgery, deceit, theft, and false entry. The court considered the question of whether the evidence submitted by the requesting state evinced probable cause to suppose that the specified extraditable offenses, or any of them, were committed by Shapiro. However, the court first set forth what evidence would be considered, stating:

> An extradition hearing is not to be equated with a trial of the merits. The actual guilt of the fugitive does not have to be established. The demanding country's evidence need show only such reasonable ground to suppose that the fugitive is guilty as to make it proper that he should be tried.
>
> The defenses available to the fugitive in an extradition proceeding are sharply limited. For example, alibi evidence and evidence contradicting the demanding country's proof, and evidence in the nature of a defense, such as insanity, are inappropriate to such a hearing. The fugitive's right is limited to adducing evidence which explains rather than contradicts the supporting proof.[141]

Similar to the issue of the sufficiency of evidence presented in extradition proceedings with regard to establishing probable cause, is the question as to whether state or federal law is to be applied. On the issue of admissibility of evidence, case law shows that it could be governed by federal law[142] or state law according to the court's interpretation of treaty requirements.

---

139 In re Extradition of Jarosz, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82957 (N.D. Ill. July 28, 2011).

140 In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

141 Id. at 644–645. See also Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1102 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980).

142 See, e.g., Escobedo, 623 F.2d at 1102; O'Brien v. Rozman, 554 F.2d 780, 783 (6th Cir. 1977). Also, in Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), the court considered the question of the law to be applied to determine the introduction of evidence:

> Moving beyond his interrelated political claims, Sindona next urges two Treaty-based arguments of a more technical nature. The first derives from Article V of the Treaty, which provides in relevant part:
>
> Extradition shall be granted only if the evidence be found sufficient, according to the laws of the requested Party, to justify [the requested person's] committal for trial if the offense of which he is accused had been committed in its territory.
>
> Sindona contends that the test under the Treaty is United States national procedural law and not the procedural law of New York, a proposition with which we agree, Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976), that by virtue of the Fifth Amendment committal of Sindona for a federal trial on charges as grave as those made in Italy, would have to be indictment; and that an indictment requires a prima facie case and not merely probable cause.
>
> We are not at all sure of the validity of this last link, see United States v. Mackey, 474 F.2d 55, 56–57 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 941 (1973); 8 Moore's Federal Practice, paragraph 6.83[2] (1972). Although federal prosecutors generally go considerably beyond proving probable cause before a grand jury, this is doubtless due to the desire to obtain an indictment rather than because of any legal requirement. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 363, (1956), and United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 344 (1974), indicate that indictments will not be examined for adequacy of evidence. However, we need not decide the question since the whole line of argument runs afoul, among other cases, of Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457 (1888). There under a treaty with Mexico which also referred to national law, id. at 463, 8 S. Ct. at 1243, the Court held the proper standard of sufficiency to be similar to those applicable in: > > those preliminary examinations which take place every day in this country before an examining or committing magistrate for the purpose of determining whether a case is made out which will justify the holding of the accused, either by imprisonment or under bail, to ultimately answer to an indictment, or other proceeding, in which he shall be finally tried upon the charge made against him.
>

The concomitant of "evidence of guilt" is "evidence in defense," and clearly, if the former is grounded in a "probable cause" standard, then the latter as its corollary cannot be excluded from the context of the required standard. As stated in Jimenez v. Aristeguieta:

> The accused is not entitled to introduce evidence which merely goes to his defense but he may offer limited evidence to explain elements in the case against him, since the extradition proceeding is not a trial of the guilt or innocence but is of the character of a preliminary examination held before a committing magistrate to determine whether the accused shall be held for trial in another tribunal.[143]

Summarizing what is basically the historic position of the United States, and which is still followed in practice today, Marjorie Whiteman stated in 1968 that:

> Inasmuch as the actual trial of the accused (assuming he is merely charged with an offense) is to take place in the requesting state if and when he is extradited, the extradition hearing which the requested State may accord the accused normally limits the scope of its inquiry to whether a proper case for extradition has been made out under the applicable law and/or treaty on the basis of the evidence furnished by the requesting State in support of its extradition request. While the accused may introduce evidence to show that the case comes within a prohibition against extradition contained in the applicable treaty and/or law (e.g., political offense, national or asylum State, prosecution barred by lapse of time) or to show that he is not, in actuality, the person sought by the requesting State, he may not, generally, introduce evidence in defense to the merits of the charge or merely to contradict the evidence of guilt submitted by the requesting State.[144]

> Id. See Fed. R. Crim. Pro. 5.1(b). This was the clear holding in Greci, supra, 527 F.2d at 959. While that opinion did not discuss the possibility that a federal standard higher than probable cause might have been intended, it would have been remarkable indeed that when, as appears from the Greci opinion, the Treaty drafters opted for federal law rather than the law of the state of the crime, they meant anything other than the probable cause standard that had been regularly employed in extradition cases in the past. See, e. g., Benson v. McMahon, supra, 127 U.S. 457, 8 S.Ct. 1240; Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502, 512, 16 S.Ct. 689, 692, 40 L.Ed. 787 (1896); Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 315-, 42 S.Ct. 469, 471-72, 66 L.Ed. 956 (1922) (Brandeis, J.); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, supra, 478 F.2d at 901 (2 Cir.); Peroff v. Hylton, supra, 542 F.2d at 1249; Jhirad v. Ferrandina, supra, 536 F.2d at 485; Garcia-Guillern v. United States, supra, 450 F.2d at 1191–92.
>
> 619. F. 2d at 175.

143 Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547, 556 (1962). See also Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922); Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998).

144 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 16, at 998–999. See also Ch. VII. The identity of the relator is usually established from photographs. Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508 (1910); Bagley v. Starvich, 8 F.2d 42 (9th Cir. 1925); In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972); United States ex rel. Argento v. Jacobs, 176 F. Supp. 877 (N.D. Ohio 1959). United States' practice does not differ from the practice of virtually any other state. See, e.g., In re Janssens, 17 I.L.R. 266 (Sup. Ct. 1950) (Venez.). In seeking to prevent his extradition from Venezuela to Belgium where he stood convicted of "abuse of confidence" for having converted certain sums entrusted to him, Frederick J.J.A. Janssens contended that his conviction was improper, as the alleged abuse of confidence was a civil matter that had been settled by gradual payment. The Supreme Court of Venezuela held that extradition should be granted stating: "It is settled law in this Court that issues raised by the interested party on the merits are beyond its power to decide since final judgment on these matters should properly be rendered by the courts of the demanding country." Id. at 267. The U.S. district court held that in an extradition proceeding, evidence in defense of the charge for which the fugitive's surrender is sought is not admissible, even if the evidence can be characterized as an affirmative defense such as justification, In re Ezeta, 62 F. 972, 986 (C.C.N.D. Cal. 1894). The same is true for insanity, Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913). The defense of insanity

There is some confusion in judicial decisions concerning exculpatory evidence in extradition proceedings. When the issue arises as part of discovery, courts tend to look at Brady v. Maryland and determine the issue on that basis. On occasion, the issue will arise in the context of the evidence presented by the requesting state and whether that state has the obligation to come forth with exculpatory evidence.[145] If there is nothing in the treaty requiring the production of exculpatory evidence, it will not be required of the requesting state. There are no cases known to this writer where a court has compelled the U.S. government to secure exculpatory evidence on behalf of the relator from the requesting state. The only exception to that may be where there is an issue of identity or mistaken identity.[146] was also rejected by the Supreme Federal Tribunal of Brazil in In re Santucci Lazaro, 5 Ann. Dig. 288 (STF 1929) (Braz). Alibi was likewise rejected in Desmond v. Eggers, 18 F.2d 503, 506 (9th Cir. 1927), motion for stay of execution denied, 274 U.S. 722 (1927). In In re Wadge, 15 F. 864 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1883), aff'd, 16 F. 332 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1883), the court held that evidence in defense of the charge for which extradition is sought amounts only to a denial of the demanding government's charges through evidence contradicting or impugning its witnesses. See also Desmond v. Eggers, 18 F.2d 503 (9th Cir. 1927); In re Ezeta, 62 F. 972 (N.D. Cal. 1894). Under Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922), the leading Supreme Court case on the subject, the defendant is permitted to explain, through his/her testimony and that of others, any ambiguities there may be in the evidence offered by the demanding government. See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); In re Application of D'Amico, 185 F. Supp. 925, 930 (D. Conn. 1960), appeal dismissed sub nom. United States ex rel. D'Amico v. Bishopp, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir. 1961). The defense of superior orders was rejected in In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963). But see In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 274 (S.D.N.Y. 1984). The "Act of State" defense was rejected in Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914 (1963).

---

145 Montemayor v. United States, 329 F. Supp. 2d 883, 888 (S.D. Tex. 2004).

146 In Montemayor v. United States, the court stated:

> Montemayor mentions the extradition of John Demjanjuk who was an immigrant to America who was accused of being the infamous Nazi officer "Ivan the Terrible." He says that the Constitution requires the United States to give the accused all of its exculpatory evidence before the hearing. See Demjanjuk, 10 F.3d at 353. To put it mildly, the facts and process of the case are exceptional.
>
> At the initial hearing or on habeas review, the district judge did not ascertain that the government had not disclosed all the documents as he had ordered. Independent habeas review by the court of appeals also failed to catch the government's failure. Demjanjuk was extradited, and then he was acquitted through the competence of the foreign tribunal. Strangely, after it was all over, that court of appeals reopened the case on its own motion, appointed a special master, took evidence, and decided to vacate the extradition because the American prosecutors had defrauded the court by not disclosing exculpatory evidence.
>
> That case is meaningless. It decided nothing; it had no parties and no justiciable issue. Demjanjuk had been extradited, tried, and acquitted.
>
> Even if it had been a genuine "case or controversy," the situations of the defendants and prosecutors was entirely distinct. The exculpatory evidence for Demjanjuk was discovered by the United States from its own investigation. The government promised to give Demjanjuk all of its evidence, and it dishonestly did not. Also, the after-the-fact decision about Demjanjuk is not parallel because Montemayor specifically disclaimed any corrupt activity by the American prosecuting attorney. The United States did not lie in this case. Seguy v. U.S., 329 F.Supp. 2d 883, 889 (S.D. Tex. 2004).

In Montemayor, which had been ruled upon previously in 329 F. Supp. 2d 871 (S.D.Tex. 2004), the relator raised the issue of forged documents. If there had been evidence of forgery, the court would have disregarded the forged document from its consideration for purposes of probable cause, as proof of probable cause requires that the evidence be truthful, reliable, and credible. See also In re Extradition of Chavez, 408 F. Supp. 2d 908 (N.D. Cal. 2005) (finding insufficient evidence of relator's identity); but see Garza v. United States, No. 05-40112, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 12006 (5th Cir. 2006) (refusing

It is well-established that extradition proceedings are not a trial of the guilt or innocence of the relator, but rather an inquiry into whether he/she should be delivered to the requesting state to stand trial. What is at issue, therefore, is not punishability but prosecutability. In this respect, a unique case in the annals of extradition is the Insull case, in which a Greek court examined the guilt of the relator.[147] The United States opposed this ruling as inconsistent with its treaty with Greece. Subsequently, however, it had to add a protocol to that treaty that in Article I prohibits inquiry into the ultimate guilt or innocence of the relator.[148]

5.2. Documentary Evidence

As discussed in Section 5.1, the magistrate has a great deal of latitude in admitting or denying admission of evidence. An exception to this latitude is where extradition law and treaty requirements compel otherwise, such as with respect to authentication of documents and exclusion of evidence not subscribed and sworn to as duly authenticated by a U.S. consular officer. Subscribed or sworn to written statements are deemed competent evidence, and the relator may not cross examine their authors.

The court must, however, determine whether documents in support of probable cause have been properly authenticated in accordance with 18 U.S.C. § 3190 and will therefore admit evidence relevant to this question.[149] 18 U.S.C. § 3190 states that:

> Depositions, warrants, or other papers or copies thereof offered in evidence upon the hearing of any extradition case shall be received and admitted as evidence on such hearing for all the purposes of such hearing if they shall be properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped, and the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign country shall be proof that the same, so offered, are authenticated in the manner required.

Deposition evidence is admissible.[150] Also admissible is hearsay evidence.[151] An authenticated copy of a foreign verdict with a certified translation is admissible, and sufficient to establish evidence showing that the eyewitness of the relator's crime was unable to identify him, because evidence was contradictory as opposed to explanatory).

---

147 7 Ann. Dig. 344 (Ct. App. Athens 1933) (Greece). See Charles C. Hyde, The Extradition Case of Samuel Insull, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 307 (1934).

148 51 Stat. 357, E.A.S. No. 114, 8 Bevans 366 (entered into force Sept. 2, 1937).

149 See Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d. Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973). See also Spatola v. United States, 925 F.2d 615 (2d Cir. 1991) (stating a certified copy of Italian appellate convictions sufficient for probable cause determination); Merino v. U.S. Marshal, 326 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1963); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 476 cmt. b (1987).

150 Wacker v. Bisson, 370 F.2d 552, 553 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 387 U.S. 936 (1967); Manta v. Chertoff, 518 F.3d 1134, 1146–1147 (9th Cir. 2008) (stating that the only requirement for evidence was that it be authenticated, and noting that depositions were not required in all cases under the treaty).

151 Harshbarger v. Regan, 599 F.3d 290, 292–294 (3d Cir. 2010); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1099 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 905 (2d Cir. 1973); In re Extradition of Salazar, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74370, at *22 (S.D. Cal. Jul. 23, 2010); In re Extradition of Cifuentes, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142064, at *10–*11 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 29, 2010); United States v. Samuels, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9616 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2009); In re Extradition of Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47096, at *22 (D.S.D. June 28, 2007). See also In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 270, 273 (D.C.N.Y. 1973), aff'd without opinion, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973); See also United States v. Taitz, 134 F.R.D. 288, 290 (S.D. Cal. 1991).

probable cause even if it was a trial in absentia.[152] Because the relator can only introduce evidence to clarify the requesting state's evidence, the magistrate has ample latitude to decide on its admissibility.[153] Nothing precludes the U.S. government from acting on behalf of the requesting state and requesting further evidence or taking depositions from witnesses in the United States or in any foreign state in accordance with federal rules on the subject, in particular those of consular practices. It is also possible for defense counsel to secure depositions abroad, wherever possible, in accordance with consular practices and to introduce them in evidence. Such practice is, however, almost impossible in most countries, and thus the defense is at a disadvantage. Admissibility will depend on whether the depositions are explicative of the government's evidence. As stated before, any such depositions or other documents sought to be introduced in evidence must also be "properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped…."[154] The validity of authentication can be established by expert testimony in accordance with the legal requirements and practices of that state.[155] Further, arrest warrants need not be sworn to be admissible as long as they are otherwise properly authenticated.[156]

Where the treaty requires the production of documents such as an arrest warrant, the magistrate or judge has broad discretion in finding this to be satisfied absent specification in the treaty of a certain form of the order or warrant.[157] In In Re Trinidad the district court for the Northern District of California rejected the relator's argument that Latvia's submission of an arrest "order" did not comply with the extradition treaty's requirement that there be an arrest warrant, noting that:

> There is nothing in the Treaty that prescribes the specific form of order, or that the order or arrest warrant must be issued with the original charges. Latvia has produced an order which requires Trinidad's arrest, and this satisfies its obligation to produce "a copy of the warrant or order of arrest issued by a judge, court, or other authority competent for this purpose." Treaty, Art. 4.[158]

It should also be noted that the U.S. government can obtain evidence abroad either by asking the requesting state to procure it, or by relying on Mutual Legal Assistance Treaties (MLATs).

---

152 In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97893, at *23–*24 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 3, 2008); In re Extradition of Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47096, at *21–*22 (D.S.D. June 28, 2007). See Ch VIII Sec. 4.8 for a discussion of the use of evidence based on a trial in absentia.

153 In re Extradition of Ye Gon, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 12559, at *46–*54 (D.D.C. Feb. 9, 2011) (refusing to consider relator's argument regarding reliability of the witness statements as they were properly certified under § 3190, which was enough to render them admissible).

154 18 U.S.C. § 3190 (2000).

155 Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258, 260 (6th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818 (1957). See also 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 16, at 968. Trial evidence made available by a foreign government to the United States has been held admissible. See United States v. Tierney, 448 F.2d 37 (9th Cir. 1971); United States v. Shea, 436 F.2d 740 (9th Cir. 1970); Stonehill v. United States, 405 F.2d 738 (9th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 960 (1968); Brulay v. United States, 383 F.2d 345 (9th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 986 (1967); United States v. Marzano, 388 F. Supp. 906 (N.D. Ill. 1975); In re Henrich, 11 F. Cas. 1143 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1867); United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, No. 86-0107-JLI-Crim. (S.D. Cal. Feb. 18, 1987) (unpublished memorandum decision).

156 In re Extradition of Pelletier, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44979, at *17 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 12, 2010) ("Binding Eleventh Circuit precedent demonstrates that properly authenticated documents submitted by a requesting state may be considered by a magistrate judge regardless of whether the statements they contain are sworn or unsworn. See Afanasjev v. Hurlbut, 418 F.3d 1159, 1165 (11th Cir. 2005); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1102, n.10 (5th Cir. 1980).").

157 In re Extradition of Trinidad, 754 F.Supp. 2d 1075 (N.D. Cal. 2010).

158 Id. at 1080.

The United States has MLATs with fifty-six states as of January 2011.[159] But under all such treaties only the U.S. government can make such a request. Individuals can neither benefit from MLATs nor can they counsel the U.S. government to resort to an MLAT procedure to produce evidence needed for the defense. However, it is the contention of this writer that if the U.S. government knows of the existence abroad of evidence that is clearly exculpatory, the integrity of the legal process under the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause requires the government to secure the evidence and present it to the court.

5.2.1. Exclusion of Evidence on Constitutional Grounds[160]

As probable cause has so far been held to be a treaty and statutory requirement but not specifically a constitutional one, although this writer asserts that it is, the question arises as to whether constitutional limitations arising out of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments are applicable and could exclude otherwise admissible evidence. If violations of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments are committed in the production of evidence sought to be admitted by the government, and are committed in the United States, constitutional exclusions should apply, although there is no Supreme Court decision stating so explicitly. A reasonable construction of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clauses, and their incorporation of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendment standards, leads to this conclusion.

Conversely, however, if the violation occurred outside the United States and was not committed by U.S. agents, the court would not exclude the evidence.[161] Such has been the explicit ruling in Escobedo v. United States,[162] and by implication in Rosado v. Civiletti.[163] This position however is subject to the spirit of United States v. Toscanino.[164]

---

159 See United States Department of State, Treaties in Force, January 2011, available at http://www.state.gov/s/l/treaty/tif/index.htm (last visited Oct. 20, 2012).

160 See also supra Sec. 4, which addresses the question of the Constitution's applicability to "probable cause."

161 See, e.g., United States v. Peterson, 812 F.2d 486 (9th Cir. 1987); United States v. Coke, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94012, at *14–*15 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 22, 2011) (rejecting a Fifth Amendment substantive due process challenge to the admissibility of allegedly illegally obtained wiretap evidence by Jamaican officials). Jonathan F. Cheatwood, Recent Development: Constitutional Law—"Good Faith" Exception to the Exclusionary Rule for Warrantless Searches Made by United States Agents Who Reasonably Rely on Assertions by Foreign Police That a Search Is Valid, 21 VAND. J. TRANSNAT'L L. 631 (1988).

162 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1036 (1980). The exclusionary rule does not apply to illegal searches and seizures when conducted by state officers, and their "fruits" may be presented at a federal hearing on extradition. See Romeo v. Roache, 820 F.2d 540 (1st Cir. 1987). The court in Romeo, however, held that if the conduct was "more egregious," it would warrant judicial intervention. Id. at 545. See also Ch. V, Sec. 5 (discussing the extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment). See also Simmons v. Braun, 627 F.2d 635 (2d Cir. 1980) (holding that a motion to suppress defendant's identification as to the fruit of an illegal stop and search would not be granted in extradition hearings); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000). See also In re Extradition of Atuar, 300 F. Supp. 2d 418 (S.D.W. Va. 2003), 156 Fed. Appx. 555 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. dismissed 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5244 (2006); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

163 Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir. 1980). In Rosado, however, the court dealt with the Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences, Nov. 25, 1976, U.S.–Mex., T.I.A.S. No. 8718, reprinted in S. Exec. Doc. D., 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (1977). See In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 127 (D. N.J. 1987) (stating treaties and statutes, not the Constitution, confer procedural rights on defendants in foreign arrests). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). See also United States v. Hashmi, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71859 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 7, 2009) (discussing Miranda rights abroad and referencing Rosado).

164 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974) (stating that the government should be denied the right to exploit its own illegal conduct when, as in Toscanino, a person was illegally seized in a foreign country by U.S. agents in violation of the Fourth Amendment). Here the question is different, but the principle is the same: whether the integrity of the judicial process and of the judicial system of the United States does not preclude reliance on any evidence or process that is so contrary to due process of

A Fourth Amendment challenge to unsworn witness testimony was rejected by the Ninth Circuit in Manta v. Chertoff.[165] Relators attempted to rely on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment but the Court found this argument to be "without merit."[166]

5.2.2. Evidentiary Standard for Probable Cause and Sufficiency of the Evidence

The standard of probable cause in international extradition is the same as the one used in preliminary hearings in federal criminal proceedings.[167] The sufficiency of the evidence, however, has invariably been a difficult one, as it relates not only to the nature of "probable cause" in U.S. law but also because it depends on the offense charged and its elements under the law so as to fall within the meaning of what the U.S. Supreme Court expressed in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), namely whether the conduct "offend[ed] those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples" so as to "shock the conscience," and "offend a sense of justice." 342 U.S. at 172–175; cf. Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255, 263 (7th Cir. 1990) ("This court has previously expressed skepticism about whether the government would ever by outrageous conduct surrender its authority to prosecute as a matter of due process. But we have never foreclosed the possibility for entrapment cases, excessive force cases . . . ") (Will, J., concurring). See also Ch. V.

---

165 518 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2008), noting that > Manta's final argument is that the use of unsworn testimony to support extradition violates the Fourth Amendment. Under 18 U.S.C. § 3184, a magistrate judge is authorized to issue a provisional warrant, to bring the accused before the court to hear evidence against him, and a final warrant, and to commit the accused to prison until the foreign government requests surrender of the accused. Manta is correct that the Fourth Amendment's protections extend to those arrested pursuant to treaties. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 15, 77 S.Ct. 1222, 1 L.Ed.2d 1148 (1957) ("[N]o agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or any other branch of Government, which is free from the restraints of the Constitution."); see also U.S. Const. amend. IV ("[N]o Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation . . . "). But Manta's attempt to expand the Fourth Amendment's oath requirement to all evidence offered in an extradition proceeding is unfounded.

>
> Manta cites no case to support the contention that the Fourth Amendment requires every piece of evidence relied on in an extradition proceeding be sworn. Moreover, such a requirement would run contrary to our well-established case law that evidence offered for extradition purposes need not be made under oath. Zanazanian, 729 F.2d at 627 ("Neither the applicable treaty nor United States law requires evidence offered for extradition purposes be made under oath."). We therefore hold that Manta has not established that the Fourth Amendment entitles her to relief.

Id. at 1147.

166 Harshbarger v. Regan, 599 F.3d 290, 294 (3d Cir. 2010), noting that the relator's > equal protection challenge is curious and unique. She argues that because the individual was "unextraditable in Sylvester . . . , the extradition order in place against her violates her constitutional right to equal protection." Appellant's Br. at 7. The equal protection afforded by the Fifth Amendment (and, by incorporation, the Fourteenth Amendment) is for federal or state action. Ms. Harshbarger cites no legal authority to support her argument that a mere conflict in legal interpretation by judges in the same court supports an equal protection challenge, and we have found none. Ms. Harshbarger also cites no authority to support her void-for-vagueness challenge to the Canadian statute. In any event, the challenge amounts to a defense that should be heard in the Canadian court, not here. See Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 462, 33 S.Ct. 945, 57 L.Ed. 1274 (1913).

167 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). For a more recent case, see Austin v. Healey, 5 F.3d 598 (2d Cir. 1993). See also Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Neto, 1999 WL 627426 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 17, 1999).

substantive law being applied.[168] Furthermore, federal courts have been inconsistent in their enunciation and application of evidentiary standards. In the landmark case of Collins v. Loisel, the Supreme Court stated:

> The function of the committing magistrate is to determine whether there is competent evidence to justify holding the accused to await trial, and not to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to justify a conviction. Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 197 (1902); Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 461 (1888); Ex parte Glaser, 176 F. 702, 704 (2d Cir. 1910). In In re Wadge, 15 F. 864, 866, cited with approval in Charlton v. Kelly, supra, 461, the right to introduce evidence in defense was claimed; but Judge Brown said: "If this were recognized as the legal right of the accused in extradition proceedings, it would give him the option of insisting upon a full hearing and trial of his case here; and that might compel the demanding government to produce all its evidence here, both direct and rebutting, in order to meet the defense thus gathered from every quarter. The result would be that the foreign government, though entitled by the terms of the treaty to the extradition of the accused for the purpose of a trial where the crime was committed, would be compelled to go into a full trial on the merits in a foreign country, under all the disadvantages of such a situation, and could not obtain extradition until after it had procured a conviction of the accused upon a full and substantial trial here. This would be in plain contravention of the intent and meaning of the extradition treaties." The distinction between evidence properly admitted in behalf of the defendant and that improperly admitted is drawn in Charlton v. Kelly, supra, between evidence rebutting probable cause, and evidence in defense. The court there said, "To have witnesses produced to contradict the testimony for the prosecution is obviously a very different thing from hearing witnesses for the purpose of explaining matters referred to by the witnesses for the Government." And in that case evidence of insanity was declared inadmissible as going to defense and not to probable cause. Whether evidence offered on an issue before the committing magistrate is relevant is a matter which the law leaves to his determination, unless his action is so clearly unjustified as to amount to a denial of the Hearing prescribed by law.
>
> The phrase "such evidence of criminality" as used in the treaty refers to the scope of the evidence or its sufficiency to block out those elements essential to a conviction. It does not refer to the character or specific instruments of evidence or to the rules governing admissibility. Thus, unsworn statements of absent witnesses may be acted upon by the committing magistrate, although they could not have been received by him under the law of the State on a preliminary examination. Elias v. Ramirez, 215 U.S. 398 (1910); Rice v. Ames, 180 U.S. 371 (1901). And whether there is a variance between the evidence and the complaint is to be decided by the general law and not by that of the State. Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508, 513 (1913). Here the evidence introduced was clearly sufficient to block out those elements essential to a conviction under the laws of Louisiana of the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses. The law of Louisiana could not and does not attempt to require more. It is true that the procedure to be followed in hearings on commitment is determined by the law of the State in which they are held. In re Farez, 7 Blatchf., 345, Fed. Cas. No. 4645; In re Wadge, supra; In re Kelley, 25 Fed. 268; In re Ezeta, 62 Fed. 972, 981. But no procedural rule of State could give to the prisoner a right to introduce evidence made irrelevant by a treaty.[169]

---

168 See, e.g., In re Extradition of Savage, 819 F. Supp. 896 (S.D. Cal. 1993); Carr v. United States, 782 F. Supp. 945 (D. Vt. 1991); Esposito v. Adams, 700 F. Supp. 1470 (N.D. Ill. 1988). See also In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Barr, 619 F. Supp. 1068 (D. Pa. 1985); In re Extradition of Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 544 (D. Ohio 1985).

169 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 316–317 (1922). See also In re Extradition of Szepietowski, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4658, at *26–*32 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2009); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998).

In Application of D'Amico the relator raised the question of sufficiency of the evidence, and the district court, after reviewing the evidence presented by the requesting government at the Hearing, remanded the case to the extradition magistrate for further proceedings, including the taking of further evidence, stating:

> It is plain that the evidence presented against D'Amico was unsatisfactory to say the least. There is at the least grave doubt on the present record as to whether there was any evidence warranting a finding that there were reasonable grounds to believe D'Amico guilty of the crime charged.
>
> In this state of the record it becomes of significance that there is real doubt as to whether the Commissioner actually made a finding that there was probable cause to believe that D'Amico committed these crimes. A careful reading of his findings indicates that he passed directly only upon the two questions raised by the relator at the hearing—whether the crime charged was extraditable under the treaty and whether relator was in fact the Vito D'Amico "mentioned in the judgment filed in Italy." The Commissioner found against the relator on both of these points but his findings go on to say "accordingly" there is probable cause to believe that the offense charged was committed by the respondent.
>
> This does not seem to me, in the light of the circumstances here, to be an independent finding that there was probable cause to believe that the offense was committed by the relator. The explanation or the omission of any independent finding on this point may well be that the sole question of fact raised by relator's previous counsel on the hearing was the question of identity. Nevertheless, the Commissioner was required under the statute and the treaty to make a specific finding as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish probable cause that relator had committed the offense. See Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. at page 463, 8 S. Ct. at page 1243, 32 L. Ed. 234. . . . [I]n the light of this record and the circumstances of this case, such an ambiguity in the findings cannot be viewed as merely a harmless technicality. The relator is entitled to evaluation of the evidence on the issue of whether it establishes that there is probable cause to believe that relator committed the offenses charged and to an independent finding on that issue.[170]

A more lenient standard is used to review a magistrate's determination that the evidence submitted is sufficient to find probable cause. The Supreme Court stated in Fernandez v. Phillips that the magistrate's determination as to probable cause will be affirmed if there is "any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty."[171] In Valencia v. Limbs, the Ninth Circuit stated:

> Before extradition may be ordered, the Magistrate must determine that: > > there is "competent legal evidence which . . . would justify . . . apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed in [the forum] state."
>
>
> Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1367 (9th Cir. 1978), quoting, Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 315 (1921). The necessary finding was made in this case and commitment pending extradition was ordered. No appeal lies; review is possible only by writ of habeas corpus. See, e.g., Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364, 369, 40 S. Ct. 347, 349, 64 L.Ed. 616 (1920); Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d at 1364.
>
> The scope of habeas review of a Magistrate's extradition order is traditionally limited to an examination of the following factors: (1) the jurisdiction of the extradition judge to conduct extradition proceedings; (2) the jurisdiction of the extradition court over the fugitive; (3) the force and effect of the extradition treaty; (4) the character of the crime charged and whether it falls within the terms of the treaty; (5) whether there was competent legal evidence to support a finding of extraditability. See, e.g., Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312, 45 S. Ct. 541, 542, 69 L. Ed. 970 (1925); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 at 1340 (9th Cir. 1981); Hooker v. Klein,

---

170 In re Application of D'Amico, 185 F. Supp. 925, 930–931 (S.D.N.Y. 1960), appeal dismissed sub nom. United States ex rel. D'Amico v. Bishopp, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir. 1961).

171 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312 (1925) (emphasis added).

573 F.2d at 1368. It is generally for the Magistrate to determine if the evidence establishes probable cause to believe that the fugitive committed the crime for which he stands accused. Review of the evidence before the Magistrate has been limited to a determination that there was competent evidence supporting the finding of extraditability. Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. at 312, 45 S. Ct. at 542; United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726, 730 (9th Cir. 1975). Appellant suggests that this standard has recently and radically been changed by the decision in Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979).

In Jackson, the Supreme Court held that a federal court has power by writ of habeas corpus to review a state prisoner's criminal conviction and determine whether any rational factfinder could have found the prisoner guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. 443 U.S. at 318–19, 99 S. Ct. at 2789. This decision altered the perception of many courts of appeal that they could not inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence in a habeas review of a state criminal conviction. 443 U.S. at 316, 99 S. Ct. 2788. This circuit had often held before Jackson that "allegations of insufficient evidence in a state court trial [were not] reviewable by writ of habeas corpus." Freeman v. Stone, 444 F.2d 113,114 (9th Cir. 1971) (per curiam).

Appellant suggests a parallel between this scope of review in extradition and state criminal cases. His theory is that extradition courts did not review the sufficiency of the evidence of probable cause because they erroneously applied the pre-Jackson scope of habeas corpus review. He suggests a broader scrutiny in the light of the Supreme Court decision. We do not agree that Jackson has changed the standard of evidentiary review appropriate in extradition cases and we affirm.

We do not believe that Jackson, which itself says nothing about extradition, applies to extradition cases. Under these circumstances, we are institutionally bound by well-settled principles requiring a limited review of the evidence supporting a request for international extradition. Appellant's fundamental misconception is that an extradition proceeding is enough like habeas review of a state criminal conviction to call for similar standards. The courts have consistently rejected efforts to invoke such an equation and we do so now.

When a state prisoner petitions a federal court on habeas corpus alleging insufficient evidence existed for conviction, his guilt has already been adjudged. The Fourteenth Amendment requires that the evidence has been sufficient to persuade the factfinder beyond a reasonable doubt. See In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 90 S. Ct. 1068, 25 L. Ed. 2d 368 (1970). Jackson holds that the writ of habeas corpus is available to assure state compliance with this fundamental constitutional requirement. 443 U.S. at 319–20, 99 S. Ct. 2789–90.

The extradition proceeding, however, makes no determination of guilt or innocence. See, e.g., Collins v. Loisel, supra, 259 U.S. at 315, 42 S. Ct. at 471, 66 L. Ed. 956; United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, supra, 520 F.2d at 730–31. It is designed only to trigger the start of criminal proceedings against an accused; guilt remains to be determined in the courts of the demanding country. See Merino v. United States Marshal, 326 F.2d 5, 11 (9th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 997, 84 S. Ct. 1922, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1046 (1964); accord, Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 484 (2d Cir. 1976) (culpability is to be determined in the demanding country's courts). Thus, the evidence necessary for extradition is of a wholly different character from that mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment to test due process in a state criminal conviction. "Competent evidence to establish reasonable grounds is not necessarily evidence competent to convict." Fernandez v. Phillips, supra, 268 U.S. at 312, 45 S. Ct. at 542. The Jackson standard is simply inappropriate when the purpose is to demonstrate probable cause to commit the appellant to stand trial.

Nothing in Jackson abridges the distinctions between extradition orders and state criminal trials. We affirm the well-established principle that the two are different, and Jackson therefore does not alter nearly a century of case law that requires we determine only whether "any evidence warrant[s] the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty." Fernandez v. Phillips, supra, 268 U.S. at 312, 45 S. Ct. at 542. Applying that standard, appellant does not > seriously contend that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding and order of extradition. The judgment of the district court denying habeas corpus relief is therefore affirmed."[172]

For probable cause to be established on the basis of an in absentia conviction, it is sufficient to have a certified copy of the court decision. Probable cause in such cases does not require additional "actual evidence." For instance, in Haxhiaj v. Hackman the Fourth Circuit upheld the probable cause finding despite the lack of "actual evidence" such as "trial testimony, documents created by investigators, transcripts of wiretapped conversations or affidavits from law enforcement officials with personal knowledge of the evidence against [the relator]."[173] The court reasoned that although > an extradition request based upon a conviction in absentia… requires more detail than mere proof of the fact of conviction to establish probable cause, i.e., "a reasonable basis to believe that the person sought committed the offense,"...it clearly does not require the kind of actual evidence suggested by Haxhiaj, such as trial testimony or transcripts of the wiretap evidence. Instead, the Extradition Treaty requires merely a summary of the facts and relevant evidence sufficient to provide a reasonable basis to believe the relator committed the offense. We conclude that the certified copy of the appellate opinion of the Court of Appeal of Milan satisfies the showing required by the Treaty and clearly affords a reasonable basis upon which to find probable cause. The opinion is remarkable for its detailed description of the evidence developed during the investigation of Haxhiaj's drug trafficking ring, including key wiretap describing Haxhiaj's role.[174]

The Haxhiaj court rooted this threshold for probable cause in comity between nations, noting that "a requirement that the requesting government present 'actual evidence' that it intended to submit, or already had submitted, at trial is antithetical to the comity basis that underlies extradition."[175]

The application of a low evidentiary threshold by some lower federal courts[176] has greatly facilitated the task of requesting states, while correspondingly posing a difficult challenge to

---

172 See Valencia v. Limbs, 655 F.2d 195, 197–198 (9th Cir. 1981). See also Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1191 (5th Cir. 1971). For a more recent case referring to the "competent evidence" standard, see Polikarpovas v. Stolic, 256 Fed. Appx. 127 (9th Cir. 2007) (unpublished opinion).

173 Haxhiaj v. Hackman, 528 F.3d 282, 287–288, (4th Cir. 2008).

174 Id. at 288–289 (footnotes omitted).

175 Id.

176 The lower courts have seldom departed from the formulation of the probable cause standard in Fernandez. For example, the circuit court in Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978), stated "the duty of the extraditing court is to determine only whether there exists competent evidence which justifies the apprehension and commitment of the fugitive." Id. at 1368. Similarly, the circuit court in Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679 (5th Cir. 1969) stated "The magistrate does not inquire into the guilt or innocence of the accused; he looks only to see if there is evidence sufficient to show reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty." Id. at 689. Cf. Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 362 F. Supp. 1057, 1063 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) (formulating the probable cause standard in two parts: first, "reasonable cause to believe that a crime was committed" and second, "reasonable grounds to believe that the petitioner was guilty of that crime."). See also Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 563 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) (requiring evidence to be both competent and sufficient). See also In re Extradition of Trinidad, 754 F. Supp. 2d 1075, 1080 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (applying a "competent evidence" standard and refusing to consider the relator's contradictory construction of supplemental government evidentiary submissions); In re Extradition of Salazar, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74370, at *19 (S.D. Cal. July 23, 2010) (applying an "any evidence" standard). A small minority of courts have discussed probable cause in a manner suggesting that the requesting state make a prima facie showing, thereby imposing a somewhat higher standard. See Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976); In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). Neither of these courts, however, regarded the extradition hearing as akin to a trial, nor the habeas corpus proceeding as a full appeal.

individuals seeking to avoid extradition, for they must demonstrate that no competent evidence has been presented to justify the charges against them.[177] The quantum of evidence required has varied considerably,[178] but courts have, with few exceptions,[179] been traditionally persuaded that sufficient evidence exists.

It is important to make the distinctions between the admissibility of evidence, the sufficiency of evidence, and the weight of evidence.[180] The case of In re Assarsson[181] is unique in that it addressed each of these issues. In this case the relator, Jan Alf Assarsson, was ordered extradited to Sweden for trial on charges of arson, fraud, and attempted fraud. On the question of admissibility of evidence, the court pointed out that in an extradition case 18 U.S.C. § 3190 governs.[182] However, on the issue of allowing the admissibility of documents, the court noted that where the weight of evidence is at issue, it is a question for the extradition judge to assess based on the law and practice of the requested state. The court stated:

> Assarsson does not contest the authentication of the documents. We agree that, once certified under 18 U.S.C. Section 3190, the statement was properly received into evidence. See Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234, 240 (2d Cir. 1977); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d at 903 (certification of United States diplomatic officials is conclusive proof that the document is "properly and legally" authenticated and thus admissible).
>
> The objection to the evidence goes to its weight, not its admissibility. See Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 902 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884, (1973). As the court said in Peroff v. Hylton, 542 F.2d 1247, 1249 (4th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1062, (1977), another 177 See Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 563 (S.D.N.Y. 1973); In re Extradition of Santos, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, at *9–*13 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2011); In re Extradition of Morales, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48954 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 29, 2011). This can be particularly difficult in situations where courts are presented with a vast amount of evidence against the relator that would be difficult to explain. See In re Extradition of Redman, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81231 (C.D. Cal. July 25, 2011); In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008).

178 See, e.g., Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962) (stating that "voluminous" documentary evidence failed to establish probable cause that relator committed murder but successfully established probable cause with respect to financial crimes); Republic of France v. Moghadam, 617 F. Supp. 777 (N.D. Cal. 1985) (failing to establish probable cause where principal accuser had recanted testimony); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977) (establishing probable cause through documentary evidence and testimony of one witness that relator violated Canadian securities laws); United States v. Galanis, 429 F. Supp. 1215 (D. Conn. 1977) (finding probable cause that relator guilty of fraud, shown by means of "voluminous deposition evidence and attached documents"); In re Edmondson, 352 F. Supp. 22 (D. Minn. 1972) (finding certified copies of Canadian convictions established probable cause that relator engaged in criminal conduct). But see In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 140 (D.N.J. 1987) (holding governmental misconduct is not sufficient grounds for denying existence of probable cause); In re Extradition of Santos, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, at *57–*67 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2011) (holding recantation of evidence allegedly obtained by torture inadmissible in the extradition hearing); In re Extradition of Morales, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48954 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 29, 2011) (holding that credibility arguments regarding testimony of co-conspirators cannot be used to challenge the finding of probable cause).

179 See Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1962). See also Mirchandani v. United States, 836 F.2d 1223 (9th Cir. 1988) (affirming the district court's consideration of additional evidence on remand as dispositive of the extradition determination).

180 For cases where the relator raised challenges to the weight of the evidence, see United States v. Hidalgo, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18299 (D. Utah Feb. 24, 2011) (rejecting relator's arguments regarding weight of evidence).

181 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999).

182 Assarsson, 635 F. 2d at 1238.

> case involving Sweden "[i]t may be that on the full trial Peroff may be able to submit substantial proof that another rather than he was the perpetrator of the fraud, but that is a matter for exploration during the trial in Sweden and not for extensive evidentiary inquiry during the extradition hearing."[183]

The relator in Assarsson also contested the sufficiency of the evidence adduced against him. The court did not address this issue completely, noting that although its decision did not constitute a final judgment on the guilt or innocence of the accused, a determination of the sufficiency of evidence needed to establish probable cause did fall within the scope of habeas corpus review. The court turned to state law, stating:

> Reference to state law in cases dealing with extradition proceedings for the definition of substantive crimes results from the historical association of criminal prosecution with the states. Long before the criminal provisions of the United States Code reached their present detail, the Supreme Court considered the dependency on state criminal law for international extradition. Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 58–51, 23 S. Ct. 781, 785–786, 47 L. Ed. 948 (1903).[184]

As stated above, the mere fact that evidence is summarized or based on unsigned depositions is irrelevant. In Manta v. Chertoff, the Ninth Circuit concluded that a Greek extradition request was not insufficient because the prosecutor's investigation report summarized witness statements or did not include signed depositions from several witnesses.[185]

It is important to remember that the evidentiary standard in a Hearing is not the same as in a regular trial, and that almost all evidence is admissible in order to establish probable cause. Hearsay statements made by the relator to his/her family, the relator's admissions during transport by law enforcement officials, or statements by other witnesses have all been used to establish the relator's identity.[186] Immigration documents, including visa applications, have been used to support a finding of probable cause of the relator's identity.[187] In In re Extradition of Pelletier the court used the relator's drivers license and passport to establish his identity by comparing the passport photograph against the relator who was present in court,[188] and the mailing address in the documents against the one given in his prior sworn statements.[189] In other circumstances, a relator was identified based on numerous photographic identification documents and witness identifications even though no witnesses were able to identify the relator in a photographic lineup.[190] However, the documents submitted to establish identity need not include a photograph of the relator, fingerprints, DNA, or other physical evidence.[191] In one case, closed circuit television footage was used

---

183 Id. at 1249.

184 Id.

185 Manta v. Chertoff, 518 F.3d 1134, 1146–1147 (9th Cir. 2008) (footnote omitted).

186 In re Extradition of Lingad, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27224, at *11–*12 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 2007); In re Extradition of Szepietowski, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4658, at *33–*37 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2009).

187 In re Extradition of Lingad, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 27224, at *4–*6 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 2007).

188 In re Extradition of Pelletier, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44979, at *4 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 12, 2010).

189 Id. at *5–*7. See also In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757, at *14–*18 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008); In re Extradition of Szepietowski, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4658, at *32–*33 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2009).

190 In re Medina, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11546, at *10–*14 (E.D.N.Y. 2009).

191 In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97893, at *25–*27 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 3, 2008) (finding probable cause regarding relator's identity based on an authenticated foreign verdict, foreign birth certificate, foreign certificate of citizenship, and Interpol arrest warrant). Although fingerprints are not necessary, they have been submitted along with expert testimony and successfully resulted in a relator's extradition. See In re Extradition of Lingad, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27224, at *7–*8 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 2007). See also In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757, at *17 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008) (relying, in part, on the complaint against the relator, the sworn testimony of a U.S. marshal, and an extradition packet to establish proof of the relator's identity).

to establish the relator's identity, even though the relator's identity was not at issue in the particular case.[192] In one case videotaped witness statements were used to support a finding of probable cause, as the relator wore a distinctive necklace, and the court reasoned that " 'there is no per se rule that specifies which identification procedures are "competent" for probable cause purposes.' "[193] In other circumstances, visas stamped into passports have been used as proof of the relator's presence in a given location at the time of the alleged offense.[194]

However, where there are clearly prejudicial aspects to the identification, the court will consider the admissibility of the evidence. For instance, in In re Extradition of Mazur a photographic lineup was determined to prejudice the relator as he was purposefully made to stand out from the other individuals, and therefore the court ruled that the identification undermined the government's attempt to show probable cause.[195]

5.2.3. Jurisprudential Approaches to the Sufficiency of Evidence

As was pointed out in Section 4, federal decisions lack uniformity on whether to apply state or federal evidentiary standards of probable cause or what precisely these standards are.

In Fernandez v. Phillips[196] the Supreme Court required that competent legal evidence be presented so as to reasonably warrant the conclusion that the relator (here petitioner) committed the offense for which he is sought and not simply that he is accused or suspected of doing so.[197] Uncertainty and conflict exist, however, among the circuits and districts concerning precise standards. For example, in Greci v. Birknes[198] Sindona v. Grant,[199] and Gusikoff v. United States[200] the courts stated that the probable cause standard must be satisfied in accordance with the law of the requested state, which in these cases were federal standards as defined by federal legislation. Some federal courts, however, have construed this standard as requiring that the evidence be sufficient to show reasonable grounds to believe the accused guilty.[201] In those cases the weight and credibility of the evidence was apparently to be considered as a matter wholly within the court's discretion. Other courts have, however, required that the evidence be "competent,"[202] or even that the evidence be 192 In re Extradition of Joseph, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41848 (S.D. Cal. June 6, 2007).

193 In re Extradition of Bradshaw to Canada, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4663, at *4–*9 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 21, 2010).

194 In re Extradition of Cifuentes, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142064, at *10–*11 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 29, 2010).

195 In re Extradition of Mazur, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52551, at *74–*76 (N.D. Il. July 20, 2007) (the other men in the lineup bore little resemblance to the relator, and the Polish authorities asked the relator to wear a red jacket over his business shirt to make him appear less formal as opposed to the other individuals in the lineup who were dressed in dark colors.)

196 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925). See also United States v. Bogue, 1998 WL 966070 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997).

197 See Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922); Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511, 517 (1916); McNamara v. Henkel, 226 U.S. 520, 524 (1913); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. July 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998).

198 Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976).

199 Sindona v. Grant, 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

200 Gusikoff v. United States, 620 F.2d 459 (5th Cir. 1980).

201 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980). See also Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1971); Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679 (5th Cir. 1969); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

202 Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1368 (9th Cir. 1978). See also Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

both "competent and sufficient."[203] Finally, some courts have interpreted probable cause in a manner suggesting that the requested state make a "prima facie showing."[204] None of the major cases permitted the relator to confront the witnesses against him/her.[205]

Notwithstanding the higher evidentiary standard enunciated in some cases, the underlying policy that extradition treaties are to be liberally construed so as to give effect to the intention of the contracting parties has been upheld consistently.[206] It is clear that the showing of proof amounting to a prima facie case does not entail the additional requirement of making other forms of evidence admissible. Thus, the admissibility of evidence of an alibi, or of a defense such as insanity, or of newly discovered exonerating evidence, continues to remain discretionary, though it is usually excluded.[207] Likewise, the right of courts to bar evidence that merely contradicts probable cause or that presents a different version of events remains discretionary, though it is usually excluded.[208] Finally, the requirement that explanatory evidence tending to rebut or obliterate probable cause be admissible remains valid.[209]

The disparity among the circuits and districts concerning the proper interpretation and application of probable cause evidentiary standards means that contradictory and inequitable results are obtained in substantially similar circumstances. For instance, in United States v. Advic the federal district court for South Dakota noted that "There is a split of authority regarding the admissibility of recantations. In some instances, evidence of torture and/or recantation is a relevant inquiry. That is because 'what tends to obliterate probable cause may be considered by the extradition court but not what merely contradicts it.' "[210] Nevertheless, the Advic court determined that "the torture/recantation evidence presented by Mr. Avdic does not obliterate probable cause. The evidence he presented merely contradicts the evidence contained in the Verdict . . . "[211] Ultimately, relators accused in some jurisdictions will be afforded the opportunity to challenge the weight and credibility of the evidence, while relators in other jurisdictions will not.

---

203 Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 563 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

204 Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1976); In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

205 See Bingham v. Bradley, 241 U.S. 511, 517 (1916).

206 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 298 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

207 See, e.g., Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099 (4th Cir. 1977).

208 See Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252, 1259 (N.D. Ga. 1977); In re Extradition of Morales, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48954 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 29, 2011) (holding that credibility arguments regarding testimony of co-conspirators cannot be used to challenge the finding of probable cause).

209 See Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also United States v. Samuels, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9616 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2009); In re Extradition of Berri, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77857 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2008); In re Extradition of Ben-Dak, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29460 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 11, 2008); In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88757, at *26 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008); In re Extradition of Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 47096, at *22–*24 (D. S. Dakota Jun. 28, 2007); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Sabatier v. Dambrowski, 453 F. Supp. 1250 (D.R.I. 1978).

210 See In re Extradition of Avdic, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47096, at *23–*24 (D.S.D. June 28, 2007).

211 Id.

5.2.3.1. The Application of State or Federal Evidentiary Standards regarding a Probable Cause Determination

More recent case law displays some confusion in determining what evidentiary standards to apply. In the 1973 case of In re Shapiro[212] the federal district court for the Southern District of New York found that a state's own evidentiary standards are to be applied to determine the sufficiency of probable cause. In Shapiro all of the formal requirements for the admission of evidence were satisfied because it was taken in a manner acceptable under New York standards and under the treaty's requirements[213] with respect to the question of whether the evidence makes a prima facie case for probable cause.[214]

In Shapiro the relator, an alleged fugitive from the State of Israel, had been charged with the crimes of conspiracy to defraud, fraud, use of fraudulent documents, forgery, deceit, theft, and false entry.[215] Article V of the United States and Israel extradition treaty requires that evidence be found sufficient according to the laws of the place where the fugitive shall be found to justify committal for trial.[216] The court applied state standards, stating:

> Clearly in framing the treaty the United States Government was unwilling to commit any State to the proposition that the kind of evidence acceptable in a demanding country to invoke a request for extradition might be any kind acceptable to the foreign country. To the contrary the requirement of the treaty is that a State's own evidentiary standards must ground the foreign proceedings in order to be recognized as sufficient for an extradition response. That protection would avoid demands based on notions of evidence inconsistent with a State's due process standards.[217]

The Shapiro court also noted that:

> In an international extradition proceeding, the United States acting in behalf of the demanding country was not required by a treaty provision adopting local standards of sufficiency to present necessary evidence in the same manner in which a hearing on a felony complaint would be conducted in a state court.[218]

In the 1977 case of O'Brien v. Rozman,[219] applying the same approach used in Shapiro, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the sufficiency of evidence necessary to sustain a charge was to be determined by the relevant provision of the treaty for extradition. The relevant treaty in O'Brien, the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842,[220] provided in Article X:

> It is agreed that the United States and Her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their Ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other: Provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense had there been committed.[221]

---

212 In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. 641 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

213 Convention of Extradition between the United States and Israel, art. V, 14 U.S.T. 1707, 1709, T.I.A.S. No. 5476 (entered into force Dec. 5, 1963).

214 In re Shapiro, 352 F. Supp. at 644.

215 Id. at 642.

216 Id. at 647.

217 Id.

218 Id. at 641.

219 O'Brien v. Rozman, 554 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1977). See also Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252, 1256–1257 (N.D. Ga. 1977).

220 8 Stat. 572, T.S. No. 119, 12 Bevans 82.

221 Id. at art. X (emphasis added).

This provision served to establish that the quantum of evidence of criminality sufficient to satisfy apprehension and retention of the relator for trial was to be determined not by Canadian law,[222] as the relator contended, but by laws of the state within which the relator was found.[223] The court ruled against the relator, stating:

> [B]y the very terms of the Treaty, it is apparent that the quantum of evidence of criminality sufficient to justify apprehension and retention of the appellant for trial is to be determined not by Canadian law, In re McPhun, 30 F. 57, 58 (S.D.N.Y. 1887); In re Herskovitz, 136 F. 713 (N.D. Ohio 1901), but by the laws of the state within the United States where the appellant was found. Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205, 217, 24 S. Ct. 657, 48 L. Ed. 938 (1904); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973).[224]

Contrary to Shapiro and O'Brien, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui[225] applied national standards.[226] The court also pointed out that the relator could not rely on the theory that state law sets the standard by which the sufficiency of competent evidence can be determined.[227] The court approved this holding in Shapiro v. Ferrandina.[228]

In 1976, the Fifth Circuit in Greci v. Birknes[229] interpreted the relevant treaty to find that, as in the Sakaguchi case, the sufficiency of evidence was to be determined by national or federal standards. The relator in Greci, a naturalized citizen of the United States, was charged by the Italian prosecutor of Siracusa, Italy, and a formal request for her extradition was made under the 1868 Convention between the United States and Italy,[230] but no action was taken until further documentation was submitted by the Italian authorities two years later. A warrant was then issued, based not on the 1868 Convention but on a new Treaty of Extradition between the United States and Italy (the 1973 treaty), which was signed on January 18, 1973. At the Hearing the magistrate determined that there was sufficient evidence to establish probable cause.[231] The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals addressed the issue of whether the 1973 treaty imposed higher standards of evidentiary competence than did 18 U.S.C. § 3190, and subsequently whether state or federal law governs the standard of proof in extradition proceedings under the treaty. Article V of the 1973 treaty provided:

> Extradition shall be granted only if the evidence can be found sufficient, according to the laws of the requested Party…to justify his committal for trial if the offense of which he is accused had been committed in its territory.…[232]

---

222 The relator was accused of murder in Canada. The Canadian government formerly requested his return to Canada for trial by warrant pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3184. O'Brien, 554 F.2d at 781.

223 O'Brien, 554 F.2d at 782.

224 Id. at 783. See also Shapiro v. Secretary of State, 499 F.2d 527 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (cited in United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974), as authority for holding that the law of the place where a fugitive is found is the state law).

225 Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726 (9th Cir. 1975).

226 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 3184, 3190 (1994 & Supp. 1999); Extradition Treaty between the United States and Japan, arts. II, V, T.I.A.S. No. 9625 (entered into force Mar. 26, 1980).

227 Sakaguchi, 520 F.2d at 728.

228 Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973).

229 Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976).

230 15 Stat. 629, as amended by 16 Stat. 767, 24 Stat. 1001, 61 Stat. 3687 (entered into force Apr. 14, 1946).

231 Greci, 527 F.2d at 957. But see Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986). See also In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Sept. 4, 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990).

232 26 U.S.T. 493, 496, T.I.A.S. No. 8052.

The Greci court interpreted the article to find that federal standards would apply, stating:

> Treaties on extradition have commonly been interpreted as adopting state standards governing the sufficiency of the evidence to justify committal for trial, on the ground that most extraditable offenses were known only to state law. See, e.g., Pettit v. Walshe, 194 U.S. 205, 217, 24 S. Ct. 657, 48 L. Ed. 938 (1904). However, the cases to this effect were not decided under the treaty language now before us and the circumstances surrounding adopting of the present language indicate that it was adopted in order to replace the traditional state standard with a federal one.
>
> The original version of Article V of the 1973 treaty provided that sufficiency would be determined according to the "laws of the place where the person sought shall be found," language similar to that in the 1868 Convention. In the 1970 negotiating session, the Italian delegation insisted that this be changed to "laws of the requesting Party." Both delegations appear to have been aware of cases construing the discarded language to refer to state law, e.g., Pettit v. Walshe, supra; Shapiro v. Ferrandina, supra; both appear to have contemplated that the change would ensure that this construction not be carried forward and that uniform federal law be applied. Both this history and the import of the language itself lead us to conclude that the magistrate was right to have invoked the federal probable cause standard in deciding whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant extradition.[233]

A similar result occurred in the Seventh Circuit in 1981 in Abu-Eain v. Wilkes.[234] In Abu-Eain the relator was accused by the State of Israel of setting off a bomb in the Israeli City of Tiberias on May 14, 1979, killing two boys and injuring more than thirty people. Israel formally requested the relator's extradition from the United States. Subsequently, the relator was found extraditable by the magistrate in the Northern District of Illinois. The relator sought a writ of habeas corpus, contending, inter alia, that the evidence failed to establish probable cause to believe that he committed the crime charged. The court held that the applicable treaty provision required a finding of probable cause pursuant to federal laws, stating:

> The Extradition Treaty between the United States and Israel became effective in 1963. 14 U.S.T. 1707. Article II of that Treaty provides, inter alia, for extradition of persons accused of murder and infliction of grievous bodily harm, as well as attempts to commit those crimes. Article V of the Treaty provides that a person may be extradited only if the evidence is "found sufficient, according to the laws of the place where the person sought shall be found . . . to justify his committal for trial if the offense of which he is accused had been committed in that place . . . " This form of treaty provision has been held to require a finding of probable cause under federal law. Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973).[235]

In a 2010 the Third Circuit, in Harshbarger v. Regan, concluded that under the United States–Canada extradition treaty the proper standard for establishing probable cause is federal statute and not state law.[236]

Thus, although recent federal cases are split as to what standard is to be applied to determine the sufficiency of evidence needed to show probable cause, all cases have found that probable cause is required under federal law. The question about evidentiary standards remains, however.

---

233 Greci, 527 F.2d at 998–999.

234 Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776 (9th Cir. 1986). See also Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000); In re Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Sept. 4, 1998); Crudo v. Ramon, 106 F.3d 407 (9th Cir. 1997); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990); In re Contrearas, 800 F. Supp. 1462 (S.D. Tex. 1992); Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028 (S.D.N.Y. 1990).

235 Abu-Eain, 641 F.2d at 507.

236 Harshbarger v. Regan, 599 F.3d 290, 293–294 (3d Cir. 2010). A similar result was reached with regard to the United States–Mexico extradition treaty, where the court reasoned that federal law applied. See In re Extradition of Hernandez, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 88757, at *18–20 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2008).

In In re Sindona,[237] the court framed the distinction between contradictory evidence and explanatory evidence, and cited the established authority for the proposition that a Hearing should not be transformed into a full trial on the merits:

> The distinction between "contradictory evidence" and "explanatory evidence" is difficult to articulate. However, the purpose behind the rule is reasonably clear. In admitting "explanatory evidence," the intention is to afford an accused person the opportunity to present reasonable clear-cut proof which would be of limited scope and having some reasonable chance of negating a showing of probable cause. The scope of this evidence is restricted to what is appropriate to a Hearing. The decisions are emphatic that the extraditee cannot be allowed to turn the Hearing into a full trial on the merits. The Supreme Court has twice cited with approval a district court case which aptly summarizes the relevant considerations. The Supreme Court decisions are Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 316, 42 S. Ct. 469, 66 L. Ed. 956 (1922), and Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 462, 33 S. Ct. 945, 57 L. Ed. 1274 (1913). The district court opinion is In re Wadge, 15 F. 864, 866 (S.D.N.Y 1883), in which the court dealt with the argument of an extraditee that he should be given an extensive Hearing in the extradition proceedings:
>
> > If this were recognized as the legal right of the accused in extradition proceedings, it would give him the option of insisting upon a full Hearing and trial of his case here; and that might compel the demanding government to produce all its evidence here, both direct and rebutting, in order to meet the defense thus gathered from every quarter. The result would be that the foreign government though entitled by the terms of the treaty to the extradition of the accused for the purpose of a trial where the crime was committed, would be compelled to go into a full trial on the merits in a foreign country, under all the disadvantages of such a situation, and could not obtain extradition until after it had procured a conviction of the accused upon a full and substantial trial here. This would be in plain contravention of the intent and meaning of the extradition treaties.[238]

It remains, however, within the discretion of the court to determine the extent that the respondent may offer explanatory proof.[239]

5.2.3.2. Finding of Lack of Probable Cause

As is described above, the jurisprudence of U.S. courts tends to be restrictive of relators' claims that probable cause is lacking or that evidence is insufficient. United States courts are mindful of the fact that Hearings should not be turned into mini-trials of the person sought, and that procedures and technicalities should not prevent the fulfillment of extradition treaty obligations so long as the treaty and statutory requirements are satisfied. This includes some judicial discretion with respect to probable cause and evidence. United States courts have also been mindful of potential abuses, excesses, and questionable conduct, whether by the requesting state or the U.S. government, and have on many occasions denied extradition, including on evidentiary grounds. A few of these recent cases are described below. Most are, however, discussed contextually under other headings in this chapter.

---

237 In re Sindona, 450 F. Supp. 672 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), aff'd sub nom. Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

238 Sindona, 450 F. Supp. at 685.

239 Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978); United States ex rel. Petrushansky v. Marasco, 325 F.2d 562, 567 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 952 (1964). See also Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). See also Garza v. United States,No. 05-40112, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 12006 (5th Cir. 2006) (refusing evidence showing that the eyewitness of the relator's crime was unable to identify him, holding that the evidence was contradictory). See also Rios v. United States, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26699 (D. Minn. Feb. 24, 2011) (refusing to allow relator to introduce recantation evidence as it attacked the reliability of the government's evidence in an attempt to contradict it, and such evidence was more appropriate for a trial court to resolve).

In United States v. Ramiro Fernandez-Morris and Regina Fernandez-Morris[240] the district court denied extradition, inter alia, for lack of probable cause and held:

> The court must now determine pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3184 whether the evidence provided by the Bolivian government in support of its application for extradition is "sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention." In order for an extradition to be proper, there must be: (1) criminal charges pending in another state; (2) the charges must be included in the treaty as extraditable offenses; and (3) there must be probable cause to believe that a crime was committed and that the persons before the Court committed it. See United States v. Barr, 619 F. Supp. 1968, 1070 (E.D. Pa 1985). In making these determinations, the credibility and weight of the evidence are exclusively within the discretion of the Magistrate Judge. Noel v. United States, 12 F. Supp. 2d 1300, 1303 (M.D. Fla. 1998) (citing United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549, 553 (8th Cir. 1984); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1192 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 989 (1972)), aff'd, 180 F.3d 274 (11th Cir. Apr. 28, 1999) (Table, No. 98-3551). "The extradition hearing is not a trial on the merits to determine guilt or innocence, but serves as a means of ensuring that probable cause exists to believe the person whose surrender is sought has committed the crime for which his extradition is requested." Castro Bobadilla v. Reno, 826 F. Supp. 1428 (S.D. Fla. 1993), aff'd, 28 F.3d 116 (11th Cir. 1994). [The purpose [of the extradition hearing] is to inquire into the presence of probable cause to believe that there has been a violation of one or more of the criminal laws of the extraditing country, that the alleged conduct, if committed in the United States, would have been a violation of our criminal law, and that the extradited individual is the one sought by the foreign nation for trial on the charge of violation of its criminal laws.][241]

In In re Lehming,[242] the district court of Delaware found no probable cause because the crime charged by the requested state did not show the existence of intent, and characterized the issue as falling within double criminality.[243] The court relied on Giordenello v. United States,[244] a Supreme Court case applicable to U.S. criminal cases. The court in Lehming, however, erred in holding that when an extradition request contains multiple criminal charges, each of the crimes charged need not necessarily meet the probable cause requirement of § 3184. The court took this position on the untenable basis that the extradition treaty in question did not specify the probable cause requirements.[245] This position is contradictory to the requirement of § 3184 and to the purpose of the treaty's probable cause requirement. Clearly, a treaty does not have to specify such detail. More significant, however, if probable cause is lacking as to one of the charges it cannot be introduced in the extradition order, and the requesting state is based on the principle of specialty barred from prosecuting the relator on this charge, as discussed in Chapter VII, Section 6.

The problem of probable cause in financial crimes frequently turns on the question of intent—namely, fraudulent intent. This is particularly significant because certain unethical business practices do not necessarily rise to the level of criminal intent.[246] This was the case in In re Extradition of Huerta, where the court denied extradition because "The United States [had] not produced any evidence of deceit or misrepresentation . . . "[247] In that case, the federal district

---

240 United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

241 Id. at 1361–1362.

242 In re Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del., 1996).

243 United States v. Garcia, 37 F.3d 1359 (9th Cir. 1994).

244 Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480, 78 S. Ct. 1245 (1958).

245 Lehming, 951 F. Supp. at 513.

246 Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358, citing United States v. Brown, 79 F.3d 1550, 1562 (11th Cir. 1996). See also United States v. Kreimer, 609 F.2d. 126, 128 (5th Cir. 1980); United States v. D'Amato, 39 F.3d 1249, 1261 (2d Cir. 1994).

247 In re Extradition of Huerta, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135423 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 22, 2010).

court for the Southern District of Texas held that the evidence could "at most" establish a breach of contract, which was insufficient to establish "any evidence of deceit or misrepresentation" as would be required.[248] Similarly, in In re Extradition of Stern the district court concluded on one of the two fraud allegations that the evidence "though compelling at a civil trial for breach of contract, hardly gives rise to probable cause for a criminal fraud charge."[249] It is also the case that in financial crimes, a number of distinct crimes are alleged. In such circumstances, the extradition magistrate hearing the case may properly find probable cause in one of the alleged instances but not in another.[250]

It should be noted, however, that as the Ninth Circuit has held that "accusations are not evidence."[251] Therefore, courts have denied probable cause where all of the evidence submitted by the requesting state constituted accusations without any source materials in support.[252] Similarly, where the evidence only suggests suspicious activities, a finding of probable cause may be not be made.[253]

Mere affiliation or association with "some rather shady characters," as in criminal cases, is in itself insufficient to establish probable cause, especially where the evidence is "riddled with admitted lies and is so inconsistent as to be rendered wholly unreliable."[254]

Finally, it should be noted that the requesting state may supplement the record with evidence in support of probable cause if it is allowed to do so by the relevant treaty.[255]

5.2.3.3. The Explanatory/Exculpatory Evidence Dichotomy and the Rule of Non-Contradiction

Evidence presented by a relator is, as stated above, limited to explanatory evidence[256] and does not include exculpatory or contradictory evidence, except insofar as it reveals the fabricated or false nature of the evidence and the absence of probable cause. But the distinguishing line between explanatory and exculpatory evidence is not always clear, nor is it easy to establish. The extent to which explanatory evidence is allowed is largely within the discretion of the court. The extradition magistrate must make such a determination on the basis of the evidence presented by the government in order to reach a decision that meets the requirements of § 3184. Otherwise, the magistrate would simply be rubber-stamping what the government presents.[257]

---

248 Id.

249 In re Extradition of Stern, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79486, at *10–*11 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2007).

250 Id. at *3-*4, *8-*11 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2007).

251 Man-Seok Choe v. Torres, 525 F.3d 733, 738 (9th Cir. Cal. 2008).

252 In re Extradition of Lanzani, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14044 at *16, *20–*28 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 18, 2011).

253 In re Extradition of Ben-Dak, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29460, at *16–*20, *38–*46 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 11, 2008).

254 In re Extradition of Mazur, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52551, at *83–85 (N.D. Ill. July 20, 2007).

255 In re Extradition of Berri, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77857, at *13–*14 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2008).

256 See inter alia, Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d. 1369 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 932 (1978); Cheng Na-Yuet v. Hueston, 734 F. Supp. 988 (S.D. Fla. 1990), aff'd, 932 F.2d 977 (11th Cir. 1991); United States v. Hidalgo, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18299 (D. Utah Feb. 24, 2011); In re Extradition of Salazar, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74370 (S.D. Cal. July 23, 2010); In re Extradition of Pelletier, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44979 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 12, 2010); United States v. Samuels, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9616 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2009); Bolanos v. Mukasey, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87991 (D.N.J. Sept. 24, 2009).

257 In re Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505, 517 (D. Del., 1996) citing Wellington v. South Dakota, 413 F. Supp. 151, 154 (D.S.D. 1976).

Probable cause requires proof sufficient to allow the extradition magistrate to justify the holding of the requested person to answer for a criminal charge in the requested state.[258] The Third Circuit has held that "the probable cause standard applicable in extradition proceedings is identical to that used by courts in federal preliminary hearings."[259] In United States v. Linson,[260] the District Court of Guam held:

> Normally, during a Hearing a magistrate need only "determine whether there is 'any' evidence sufficient to establish probable cause" that the fugitive committed the offense charged. United States ex rel: Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 510 F.2d 726, 730–731 (9th Cir. 1975) (citing Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312, 45 S. Ct. 541, 542, 69 L. Ed. 970 (1925)). This limited standard has been held to be analogous to a magistrate's role, under United States Law, in determining whether or not to hold a defendant to answer to a charged offense. Emami v. United States District Court for the Northern District of California, 834 F.2d 1444, 1447 (9th Cir. 1978).
>
> And a fugitive's grounds for opposition to an extradition request are severely circumscribed. Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1368 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 932, 58 L. Ed. 2d 327, 99 S. Ct. 323 (1978). He may not introduce evidence which conflicts with the evidence submitted on behalf of the demanding state, Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 315–17, 66 L. Ed. 956, 42 S.Ct. 469 (1922); establishes an alibi, Abu Eain v. Adams, 529 F.Supp. 685 (N.D. Ill.); sets up an insanity defense, Hooker v. Klein; or impeaches the credibility of the demanding country's witnesses, In re Locatelli, 468 F.Supp. 568 (S.D.N.Y. 1979). He is limited to introducing explanatory evidence.
>
> But, the Ninth Circuit in Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 2207, n. 7 stated that "We have never determined the issue of whether recantation evidence is admissible in an extradition hearing." In Mainero, the Magistrate judge considered the proffered recantation evidence. Generally, evidence that explains away or completely obliterates probable cause (emphasis added) is the only evidence admissible at a Hearing, whereas evidence that merely controverts the existence of probable cause, or raises a defense, is not admissible. See Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 457-58, 33 S. Ct. 945, 57 L. Ed. 1274 (1913). Courts are split on whether recantation evidence is admissible under this rule. Compare [Abu] Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 511–12 (7th Cir. 1981), holding that the magistrate judge did not err in refusing to admit recanting statements because they constituted contradictory evidence, with In the Matter of Extradition of Contreras, 800 F. Supp. 1462, 1464, 1469 (S.D. Texas 1992), admitting recantation testimony, reasoning that if the only evidence of probable cause were confessions that were sufficiently recanted, the existence of probable cause would be negated. Following the lead of Mainero and Contreras, this Court holds that the recantations in the case at bar will be considered. This Court finds that the recantations are not just contradictory evidence but evidence that completely obliterates probable cause. Limiting the Court's consideration merely to a determination whether the Sakaguchi, supra standard is met would be a grave injustice in this case.
>
> The Court believes the evidence presented was insufficient to satisfy the standard for probable cause for the following reasons: .. .
>
> The District Court's function in a Hearing is not to act as a rubber stamp to an extradition request but to ensure that our judicial standard of probable cause is met by the Requesting Nation. Moreover, it is quite clear that the Philippine Government has a responsibility under the Extradition Treaty to

---

258 Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913). See also Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d. 679 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 398 U.S 903 (1970); Republic of France v. Moghadam, 617 F. Supp. 777 (N.D. Cal. 1985).

259 Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191, 199 (3d Cir. 1997) (relying on Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), which also holds that federal and not state standards are controlling). See also United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976). See also In re Extradition of Bolanos, 594 F. Supp. 2d 515, 519 (D.N.J. 2009); In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97893, at *25 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 3, 2008).

260 United States v. Linson, 88 F. Supp. 2d 1123 (D.C. Guam 2000).

> supply evidence of probable cause to this Court prior to this Court approving the extradition request. Extradition Treaty with the Philippines, Nov. 13, 1994, U.S.–Philippines, art. VII para. 3, U.S. Treaty Doc. 104-16. Based on the information available to this Court, it appears that the Philippine Government had these recantations prior to seeking a warrant but did not include the recanted statements along with the original witness statements.
>
> After careful review of the evidence, the Court DENIES the Philippine government's request. Considering the probable cause threshold that needs to be satisfied and the totality of the evidence presented, the Court holds that the Philippine government failed to provide the United States and the Court with sufficient evidence which would establish probable cause to charge Valentin Linson with the crime of murder.[261]

The limited ability of a relator to introduce evidence may serve the interest of preventing a Hearing from becoming a mini-trial with exculpatory evidence being presented to defeat guilt as much as to defeat extradition. However, the limited ability of a relator to introduce evidence can have unjust results, particularly in cases involving the application of the political offense exception.[262]

In Barapind v. Entomoto[263] the relator was a Sikh separatist who was tortured for his activities in advocating for a separate homeland for the Sikh people[264] before fleeing to the United States. The relator was eventually extradited to India based on unsigned and undated affidavits and photographs.[265] The court determined that the information that was subsequently supplied by Barapind "did not obliterate India's showing of probable cause" and "constituted conflicting evidence, the credibility of which could not be assessed without a trial."[266]

The distinction between "conflicting evidence" and that which "obliterates" the government's evidence becomes blurred where the factual background is highly politicized and the actors are not engaged in common criminal activity. The existence of self-interest on the part of the relator in contradicting the government in a common criminal activity is greater than it is in the context of a political dissident, particularly where there is a history of government repression. Where such repression has been shown to exist, the presumption of fairness usually accorded to the foreign government is not as easily maintained, particularly where the government has been biased against an unpopular social group for purely political reasons.[267]

It has been suggested that in such cases the extradition court engage in a "Franks hearing"[268] to test the veracity of affidavits used to establish probable cause. In effect, this would allow the relator to show that the affiant "knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth" included false statements in the affidavit used to obtain the arrest warrant, and that false statement was necessary to find probable cause.[269] If the relator could show by the 261 Id. at 1126, 1128 (emphasis added). See also Orellana v. United States, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000), related proceeding at 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 751 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 29, 2001); United States v. Artt, 158 F.3d 462 (9th Cir. 1999); In re Extradition of Neto, 1999 WL 627426 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Powell v. United States, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Maguna-Celaya v. Haro, 19 F. Supp. 2d 1337 (S.D. Fla. 1998).

---

262 See Hansdeep Singh, Bringing Fairness to Extradition Hearings: Proposing a Revised Evidentiary Bar for Political Dissidents, 38 Cal. W. Int'l J. 177 (2007). See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

263 Barapind v. Entomoto, 400 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2005).

264 Singh, supra note 262, at 178 (2007).

265 Id. at 189.

266 Barapind, 400 F.3d at 749–750.

267 Id. at 202–203.

268 Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978).

269 Id. at 211.

"preponderance of the evidence" that the materials were false, they would be set aside, and absent other evidence, probable cause would fail to support the charge.[270] Thus, the relator would have to specify which portions of a given affidavit were false, provide reliable witness statements in support of the relator's claim, and show that the false statements were not the result of negligence or good faith mistakes.[271]

The advantage of a Franks hearing is that it would only go to the question of probable cause, as opposed to guilt or innocence of the relator, and thus not entangle the extradition court in the merits of the relator's case.[272] It should be noted that the Franks case arose in the context of a Fourth Amendment violation, so applying it to a Hearing would come into conflict with the non-application of constitutional protections to Hearings, as discussed above. However, as a magistrate is given the task of determining whether there is competent evidence in support of probable cause, the relator should be afforded an opportunity to challenge the competence of the evidence where the relator can show a real likelihood of falsification or duress regarding the evidence submitted. Allowing a relator to be extradited while turning a blind eye to abuses on the part of the foreign government threatens the integrity of the judicial system in the United States as well as the international systems through which extradition occurs.

5.2.4. Evidence on Remand

The remand of cases from the circuit to the district court allows the district court to reexamine the evidence and also consider new evidence. Consideration of new evidence within the scope of the original charge is permissible. Furthermore, doing so does not violate double jeopardy.[273]

5.2.5. Waiver of Extradition Hearing

A relator may decide to waive his/her right to a Hearing for a variety of reasons. These may include: (1) a desire to avoid imprisonment in the United States, especially as bail is unlikely for many relators; (2) a belief that the requesting government cannot prove its case and therefore that it is desirable to reach trial as soon as possible and dispose of the matter; (3) the practical need to have funds unfrozen so that the relator may provide for his/her family; or (4) any other number of reasons specific to a given situation. Some extradition treaties contain explicit provisions for the waiver of Hearings.[274]

---

270 Id. at 212.

271 Id.

272 Id. at 212.

273 See Mirchandani v. United States, 836 F.2d 1223 (9th Cir. 1988).

274 See Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 15, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16 ("If the person sought irrevocably agrees in writing to extradition after personally being advised by the competent authority of his right to formal extradition proceedings and the protection afforded by them, the Requested State may grant extradition without formal extradition proceedings"). See also Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 11, entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (applying in absence of a germane provision in an applicable bilateral treaty between the United States and an EU member state); Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 17, entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23; Extradition Treaty with Cyprus, art. 17, entered into force Sept. 14, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-16; Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 20, entered into force Jan. 1, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 17, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 17, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 18, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 15, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. XIII, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XVII, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023; Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. XV, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18.

However, where a relator waives his/her right to a Hearing, the relator may also waive the right to subsequently challenge the existence of probable cause.[275] This can be difficult for a relator seeking to have his/her record of the U.S. arrest expunged following an acquittal in the requesting state. This situation arose in In re Extradition of Gordon,[276] where the relator waived his right to a Hearing and was subsequently acquitted of the charges in the United Kingdom. His petition for expungement of the U.S. proceedings was denied because the court could only exercise jurisdiction over a petition for expungement where "the 'predicate for the expunction is a challenge to the validity of either the arrest or the conviction.' "[277] Because the relator was not convicted, he could only challenge his arrest. However, his waiver of the Hearing included a waiver to challenge probable cause for his arrest, and therefore the court lacked jurisdiction to hear the relator's later petition for expungement.[278]

6. Conclusion

The jurisprudence of U.S. courts has been consistent since 1848 when the first Extradition Act was passed.[279] The reason may well be that "probable cause" hearings in extradition are similar to those in criminal cases. Magistrate and federal district court judges deal with such hearings in criminal cases on a daily basis. They certainly know how to determine probable cause, evaluate evidence, and apply the standard of the "ordinary reasonable person in like circumstances." The fact that they are not constrained by rules of evidence in Hearings is balanced by their ability to enquire into "probable cause" in Hearings. The evidence must be sufficient and credible, and when it is documentary, the documents must be duly authenticated. Because § 3184 requires a showing of probable cause, the courts have never had to adjudicate whether the Fourth Amendment applies in its own right to Hearings. But surely there is nothing in the history of the Fourth Amendment that limits its application of this or any other form or process in which a person's freedom in the United States or at the hands of U.S. agents outside the United States is at stake.[280] The extradition judge has discretion, and short of an abuse of discretion, the habeas judge will not reverse.[281] But a habeas judge and the circuit court can remand a case to the extradition judge for a new "probable cause" hearing, or for reconsideration of some evidentiary aspects or for consideration of new evidentiary matters not deemed waived or otherwise pertinent to due process under the Fifth Amendment.[282]

275 See In re Extradition of Gordon, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123040, at *9 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 19, 2010).

276 Id. at *1, *5–*9.

277 Id. at *5.

278 Id. at *9.

279 See Ch. II.

280 The latter issue arises in the context of extraterritorial application of the Constitution. See United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 529 (1990).

281 See Ch. XI.

282 Id.

Chapter XI

The Review Process and Executive Discretion

Contents

1. The Review Process

1.1. Introduction

An extradition order is not a final order within the meaning of Title 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Thus, there is no direct appeal from the decision of the judicial officer conducting the extradition proceedings.[1] There is, however, a limited form of review available by means of habeas corpus.[2]

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is presented to the federal district court following a grant of extradition. However, the decision of the judge or magistrate in extradition proceedings need not be final before the accused can seek such extraordinary relief. Habeas corpus may be sought at any stage of the extradition proceedings.[3] The relator can also seek review before the circuit court of appeals from a denial of habeas corpus by the district court, and if that is denied, he/she can petition the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari.

During a habeas corpus proceeding, the federal district court will only consider matters relating to jurisdiction, the existence of a valid treaty of extradition, whether the accused is actually the person whose extradition is sought, whether there is "probable cause"—both to believe he/she is the person sought and that the evidence presented is sufficient to convince a reasonable person that there are reasonable grounds to believe that he/she should be brought to trial, and finally that there are no grounds under the treaty or U.S. law that would preclude his/her extradition.[4] Violations of "due process" can always be raised as grounds for habeas corpus relief.[5] A petition for review, whether before the district, circuit, or Supreme Court, is limited to these areas of review.

---

1 See Kastnerova v. United States, 365 F.3d 980, 984 (11th Cir. 2004); Joseph v. Hoover, 254 F. Supp. 2d 595 (D. Virgin Islands 2003). See also Afanasjev v. Hurlburt, 418 F.3d 1159 (11th Cir. 2005) (review is not meant to be a rehearing of the magistrate's finding, but it limited to determining whether there was a treaty, probable cause). See also Cohen v. Benov, 374 F. Supp. 2d 850 (C.D. Cal. 2005); Haxhiaj v. Hackman, 528 F.3d 282, 285 (4th Cir. 2008) (holding that "the extradition statute does not allow the fugitive to seek direct review of an extradition certification"); Germany v. United States, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65676 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 5, 2007) ("An order certifying a request for extradition cannot be reviewed on direct appeal because '[e]xtradition order do not . . . constitute "final decisions of a district court" appealable as of right . . . '" Id. at *11.); Diaz-Medina v. United States, No. 4:02-CV-665-Y, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2154 (N.D. Tex. 2003); United States v. Allen, 613 F.2d 1248 (3d Cir. 1980).

2 See generally Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F. Supp. 2d 651 (E.D. Pa. 2005); Zelenovic v. O'Malley, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92632, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 7, 2010) ("Extradition rulings are not directly appealable and may only be reviewed by way of petition for a write of habeas corpus.")

3 Cf. Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289 (1902); In re Kelley, 25 F. 268 (C.C.D. Minn. 1885).

4 Hoxha, 371 F. Supp. 2d. 651. See Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Because a certification of extraditability is not a final order, no direct appeal from the decision will lie and review is available only by way of a petition of habeas corpus."); Gallina v. Fraser, 177 F. Supp. 856, 867 (D. Conn. 1959), aff'd, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851 (1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F. 3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1990). But see Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028, 1049 (S.D.N.Y 1990).

5 See In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F. 3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (S.D. Cal. 1998); McMaster v. United States, 9 F. 3d 47 (8th Cir. 1993); In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204 (1st Cir. 1989). In Manzi, the court noted that "serious due process" violations could justify habeas corpus relief beyond the usual scope: "[i]n considering Manzi's claims, this court recognizes that serious due process concerns may merit review beyond the narrow scope of inquiry in extradition proceedings." 888 F.2d at 206.

United States federal district courts may screen a habeas petition to determine if the relator is entitled to relief on the face of the document.[6] A habeas action can be rejected if it appears that the relator is using the procedure as a means of circumventing the restrictions set out in § 2255.[7]

It is interesting to note that even though extradition processes are docketed under civil matters, they are deemed sui generis for evidentiary purposes, and the rules of criminal evidence are not applicable to them per se, review by habeas corpus is very much the same as in criminal cases.

Case law and statutes clearly define the narrow scope of habeas corpus review, including the validity of provisional arrest, denial of bail, double jeopardy, and specialty, which have been raised by interlocutory appeal as well as by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.[8] Constitutional issues can always be raised.

The relator may also choose to institute an action for declaratory judgment to contest extradition. The Fifth Circuit ruled in Wacker v. Bisson that such a review was permissible, but that the scope of review would be the same as that in a habeas corpus proceeding.[9] A relator may also choose to file a writ of mandamus to challenge a court's jurisdiction in certain circumstances, such as where the relator contests the court's personal jurisdiction where there is no extradition treaty between the United States and the requested state.[10]

The issue of whether an extradition order can be appealed is well settled, yet occasionally it is raised again in one form or another. In Sidali v. INS[11] the court reaffirmed this well established rule:

> Extradition orders do not constitute final decisions of a district court which are appealable as of right under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. A person who is to be extradited, however, may obtain review of an order of extradition by seeking a writ of habeas corpus, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364, 369, 40 S. Ct. 347, 349, 64 L.Ed. 616 (1920); Bozilov v. Seifert, 983 F.2d 140, 142 (9th Cir. 1993); Spatola v. United States, 925 F.2d 615, 617 (2d Cir. 1991). The scope of habeas corpus review of a magistrate judge's order of extradition is quite narrow, however-narrower, in fact, than in the habeas proceedings traditionally provided for American convictions. Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1101 (5th Cir. 1980); Shapiro

---

6 Cuevas v. Grondolsky, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3239, at *6–*8 (D. Mass. Jan. 11, 2011) ("Under Rule 4(b) of the Rules Governing § 2254 Proceedings, the Court is required to examine a petition, and if it 'plainly appears from the face of the motion . . . that the movant is not entitled to relief in the district court,' the court 'shall make an order for its summary dismissal.' ").

7 Id. at *8–*11.

8 See Pfeifer v. United States Bureau of Prisons, 615 F.2d 873 (9th Cir. 1980) (seeking release through a habeas corpus proceeding from a federal penitentiary, where relator was serving the remainder of a sentence imposed originally by Mexican officials in a Mexican court for a Mexican crime); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977) (grounding jurisdiction upon the federal habeas corpus statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2241). The court in Pfeifer found the relator was not entitled to habeas corpus relief as "the United States may constitutionally take custody of Americans tried and convicted in foreign countries under procedures that do not comport with the Bill of Rights." 615 F.2d at 297, citing 28 U.S.C. § 2256 (Supp. 1978). See also United States v. Saccoccia, 18 F.3d 795 (9th Cir. 1994) (raising issues on interlocutory appeal of double jeopardy and specialty that were denied on the grounds that these issues can be raised in the course of the appellate process after trial of the defendant who was extradited from Switzerland).

9 Wacker v. Bisson, 370 F.2d 552, 604–606 (5th Cir. 1967). See also United States v. Williams, 480 F. Supp. 482 (D. Mass. 1979). See also infra Sec. 1.4.

10 In re Hijazi, 589 F.3d 401 (7th Cir. 2009). For a discussion of the case, see Ch. X, Sec. 2.

11 Sidali v. INS, 914 F. Supp. 1104 (D.C.N.Y. 1996), reversed on other grounds 107 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 1997) (basic principles stated above remain).

> v. Ferrandina, 378 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973); Spatola v. United States, 741 F. Supp. 362, 369. The district court's review is limited to whether: (1) the magistrate judge had jurisdiction; (2) the offense charged is within the treaty; and (3) probable cause exists to find the accused guilty. Yapp v. Reno, 26 F.3d 1562, 1465 (11th Cir. 1994); Bozilov, 983 F.2d at 142; Spatola, 925 F.2d at 617.[12]

This case was unique because Sidali had been tried twice in Turkey and found innocent of the charges. Nevertheless, Turkey sought his surrender, first by extradition, then by disguised extradition through deportation.[13]

Bail decisions are, however, final decisions within the meaning of Title 28 U.S.C. § 1291. This right to appeal applies to the petitioner and to the government. In United States v. Kirby, Brennan and Artt[14] the Ninth Circuit held:

> Generally, when the United States appeals to a circuit court from a grant of bail by a magistrate or district court to a potential extraditee, the circuit court simply exercises jurisdiction without explicitly discussing its authority to do so. For example, this circuit in Matter of Extradition of Smyth, 976 F.2d 1535 (9th Cir. 1992), reversed the district court's grant of bail to Smyth, also an escapee from a Northern Ireland prison, without discussing its jurisdiction. Similarly, the First Circuit, in both United States v. Kin-Hong, 83 F.3d 523 (1st Cir. 1996), and United States v. Williams, 611 F.2d 914 (1st Cir. 1979), reversed a district court's grant of bail pending extradition without discussing its jurisdiction. The Second Circuit, in a habeas case where the government appealed from a district court judgment, affirmed a grant of bail by the district court, following a magistrate's issuance of a certificate of extraditability. Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914, 920 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.W. 971, 102 S. Ct. 519, 70 L. Ed. 2d 389 (1981). The Second Circuit, like the other circuits, did not explicitly discuss its jurisdiction. We recognize the circuit court's authority to hear such appeals, and have supplied a reasoned basis in support of jurisdiction.
>
> Appellees cite two cases in which courts have ruled that they lacked jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a bail ruling in an extradition case. In re Extradition of Ghandtchi, 697 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1983), vacated as moot, 705 F.2d 1315 (11th Cir. 1983); In the Matter of the Requested Extradition of Krickemeyer, 518 F. Supp. 388 (S.D. Fla. 1981). Neither case is controlling precedent in this circuit. Moreover, both cases are readily distinguishable from the cases before us, because they held only that a district court lacks jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a magistrate's bail ruling in an extradition case; neither case decided whether a circuit court has jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a district court's bail ruling in an extradition case.[15]

A review by means of habeas corpus before the federal district court can be made irrespective of whether the judicial decision to grant extradition was made by a U.S. magistrate or a federal district judge. It is to be noted, however, that if it is the latter who made the extradition decision, the habeas corpus review could be before the same judge, an anomalous and questionable principle, or before another federal district judge, which in fact places one judge of the same rank and judicial power in the position of a reviewing judge. As discussed below, the scope of review is limited.[16]

---

12 Id. at 1109.

13 See Ch. IV.

14 United States v. Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1997).

15 Id. at 861 (footnotes omitted).

16 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); United States v. Bogue, 1998 WL 966070 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 13, 1998); United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997) (regarding the secretary of state's discretion under § 3186); In re Extradition of Howard, 791 F. Supp. 31, 34 (D. Mass. 1992); In re Extradition of McMullen, 769 F. Supp. 1278, 1281–1282 (S.D.N.Y. 1991); Hoi-Pong v. Noreiga, 677 F. Supp. 1153 (S.D. Fla. 1988). In Howard the court noted that the possibility of racial bias in a trial upon extradition to Great Britain would not provide valid grounds for habeas corpus relief from

1.2. Scope of Habeas Corpus Review

No appeal lies from a grant of extradition. However, the relator may challenge the lawfulness of the order and the legality of his/her detention by means of applying for a writ of habeas corpus. The U.S. Supreme Court, as early as 1896, declared:

> By repeated decisions of this court it is settled that a writ of habeas corpus cannot perform the office of a writ of error, and that, in extradition proceedings, if the committing magistrate has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the accused, and the offense charged is within the terms of the treaty of extradition, and the magistrate, in arriving at a decision to hold the accused, has before him competent legal evidence on which to exercise his judgment as to whether the facts are sufficient to establish the criminality of the accused for the purposes of extradition, such decision cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus.... Whether an extraditable crime has been committed is a question of mixed law and fact, but chiefly of fact, and the judgment of the magistrate, rendered in good faith on legal evidence that the accused is guilty of the act charged, and that it constitutes an extraditable crime, cannot be reviewed on the weight of the evidence, and is final for the purposes of the preliminary examination, unless palpably erroneous in law.[17]

Further defining the limits of habeas corpus, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in Fernandez v. Phillips stated:

> That writ as has been said very often cannot take the place of a writ of error. It is not a means for rehearing what the magistrate already has decided. The alleged fugitive from justice has had his hearing and habeas corpus is available only to inquire whether the magistrate had jurisdiction, whether the offense charged is within the treaty and, by a somewhat liberal extension, whether there was any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty.[18] extradition. The district court would only review the magistrate's decision on a clearly erroneous standard when determining whether extradition would violate the terms of the United States–Great Britain extradition treaty. As such, habeas corpus relief was denied. See infra Sec. 1.2.

---

17 Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502, 508–509 (1896) (emphasis added). See also Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903), where the Court stated:

> The writ of habeas corpus cannot perform the office of a writ of error, but the court issuing the writ may inquire into the jurisdiction of the committing magistrate in extradition proceedings, Ornelas v. Ruiz, 181 U.S. 502; Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270; and it was on the ground of want of jurisdiction that the writ was applied for in this instance before the commissioner had entered upon the examination; as also on the ground that petitioner should have been admitted to bail.
>
> The contention is that the complaint and warrant did not charge an extraditable offense within the meaning of the extradition treaties between the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, because the offense was not criminal at common law, or by acts of Congress, or by the preponderance of the statutes of the states.
>
> Treaties must receive a fair interpretation according to the intention of the contracting parties, and so as to carry out their manifest purpose. The ordinary technicalities of criminal proceedings are applicable to proceedings in extradition only to a limited extent. Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181; Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U.S. 424.

Id. at 57. An extradition hearing is not a full trial. Its purposes are to determine probable cause that there has been a violation of one of the criminal laws of the requesting state and that the alleged conduct also constitutes a crime in the United States and is listed in the extradition treaty. Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099, 1249 (4th Cir. 1977). See also Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956, 958 (1st Cir. 1976); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 889 (1973).

18 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312 (1925).

Justification for the requirement that the relator be charged with an offense in accordance with the terms of the treaty can be found in Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker.[19] There the Court stated:

> It cannot be doubted that the power to provide for extradition is a national power; it pertains to the national government and not to the states. . . . But, albeit a national power, it is not confided to the executive in the absence of a treaty or legislative provision. At the very beginning, Mr. Jefferson, as Secretary of State, advised the President: "The laws of the United States, like those of England, receive every fugitive, and no authority has been given to their executives to deliver them up." As stated by John Bassett Moore in his treatise on extradition—summarizing the precedents—"the general opinion has been, and practice has been in accord with it, that in the absence of a conventional or legislative provision, there is no authority vested in any department of the government to seize a fugitive criminal and surrender him to a foreign power." Counsel for the petitioner do not challenge the soundness of this general opinion and practice. It rests upon the fundamental consideration that the Constitution creates no executive prerogative to dispose of the liberty of the individual. Proceedings against him must be authorized by law.[20]

This ruling sets forth the principle that no obligation to extradite exists apart from what is specified by treaty. It follows that such an obligation does not arise unless the relator is charged with an offense in accordance with the terms of the treaty.

The requirement that the relator be charged with an offense in accordance with the terms of the treaty is also expressed in other contexts relating to extradition. In Collins v. Loisel[21] the U.S. Supreme Court stated that:

> It is immaterial that the acts in question constitute the crime of theft and fraud in Canada and the crime of larceny in New York State. It is enough if the particular acts charged are criminal in both jurisdictions.[22]

In Factor v. Laubenheimer[23] the Supreme Court implicitly adopted the same principle:

> The surrender of a fugitive, duly charged in the country from which he has fled with a non-political offense and one generally recognized as criminal at the place of asylum, involves no

---

19 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936).

20 Valentine, 299 U.S. at 8–9. See also In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980), where the court points out that:

> Courts have frequently addressed claims that the offense charged is not within the treaty because of some condition imposed by the treaty. E.g. Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d at 847 (dual criminality); see also Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.3d 504 (7th Cir. 1981) (whether "political offense" limitation is reviewable on habeas corpus).

Assarsson, 635 F.2d at 1243. For habeas review of the sufficiency of evidence, see Simmons v. Braun, 627 F.2d 635 (2d Cir. 1980); In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000). See In re Factor's Extradition, 75 F.2d 10 (7th Cir. 1934). See also Gusikoff v. United States, 620 F.2d 459 (5th Cir. 1980); Freedman v. United States, 437 F. Supp. 1252 (N.D. Ga. 1977).

21 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309 (1922). See also In re Howard, 791 F. Supp. 31, 33 (D. Mass. 1992), aff'd, 996 F.2d 1320 (1st Cir. 1993).

22 Collins, 259 U.S. at 312. See also In re Extradition of Orellana, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10380 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 26, 2000); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Extradition of Valdez-Mainero, 3 F. Supp. 2d (S.D. Cal. 1998); Bozilov v. Seifert, 967 F.2d 353 (9th Cir. 1992).

23 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

> impairment of any legitimate public or private interest. . . . It has been the policy of our own government, as of others in entering into extradition treaties, to name as treaty offenses only those generally recognized as criminal by the laws in force within its own territory.[24]

The Factor case also stands for the principle that U.S. law is the applicable law in determining whether the relator has been properly charged. In the Collins case the Supreme Court applied the law of the United States, the requested state, to determine whether there was "competent legal evidence" to "justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed in the forum state."[25]

Similarly, questions of competency of a person to stand trial are determined primarily by the substantive law of the requesting state.[26]

The unarticulated premise of the requirement that the relator be charged with an offense under the treaty is that he/she has in fact been so charged by the requesting state. Whether this has occurred is determined by the law of the requesting state by reference to that of the requested state.

---

24 Factor, 290 U.S. at 298–301.

25 Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 315 (1922). In the case of Valencia v. Limbs, 655 F.2d 195 (9th Cir. 1981), the circuit court, in examining what is "competent legal evidence," held as it did in Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978), and in keeping with Collins, that the matter of determining the competency of the legal evidence was to be left to the trial judge and is not reviewable on habeas corpus. The court relied on Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364 (1920), and on 28 U.S.C. § 2241, as well as other Supreme Court cases dealing with the scope of habeas corpus review. Nevertheless, the U.S. Supreme Court in Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979), held that the sufficiency of the evidence in a state criminal conviction was reviewable by habeas corpus. The court in Valencia refused to extend the Jackson ruling to extradition cases, stating:

> The scope of habeas review of a Magistrate's extradition order is traditionally limited to an examination of the following factors: (1) the jurisdiction of the extradition judge to conduct extradition proceedings; (2) the jurisdiction of the extradition court over the fugitive; (3) the force and effect of the extradition treaty; (4) the character of the crime charged and whether it falls within the terms of the treaty; (5) whether there was competent legal evidence to support a finding of extraditability. See, e.g., Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312, 45 S. Ct. 541, 542, 69 L. Ed. 970 (1925); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336 at 1340 (9th Cir. 1981); Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d at 1368. It is generally for the Magistrate to determine if the evidence establishes probable cause to believe that the fugitive committed the crime for which he stands accused. Review of the evidence before the Magistrate has been limited to a determination that there was competent evidence supporting the finding of extraditability. Fernandez v. Phillips, supra, 268 U.S. at 312, 45 S. Ct. at 542; United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726, 730 (9th Cir. 1975). Appellant suggests that this has recently and radically been changed by the decision in Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 99 S. Ct. 2781, 61 L. Ed. 2d 560 (1979).

Valencia, 655 F.2d at 197. But see Fernandez v. Phillips, in which the court states:

> Habeas corpus is available only to inquire whether the magistrate had jurisdiction, whether the offense charged is within the treaty, and . . . whether there was any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty.

Fernandez, 268 U.S. at 312, 45 S. Ct. at 542. See also In re Extradition of Manzi, 888 F.2d 204, 205 (1st Cir. 1989); Romeo v. Roache, 820 F.2d 540, 542–543 (1st Cir. 1987); Cheng v. Hueston, 690 F. Supp. 1008, 1010–1011 (S.D. Fla. 1988); 931 F.2d 169, 171 (1st Cir. 1991).

26 See Romeo, 820 F.2d at 544 (citing Charlton v. Kelly for the proposition that "competency was a matter to be determined by the jurisdiction trying the offense and not by the extraditing jurisdiction." Yet, the court left the door open to critical analysis of the competency of the witness in some situations by noting that a "more severe condition" might warrant such a review. Id.).

The scope of an appellate review of the district court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus is de novo.[27] The First Circuit stated in United States v. Baez that:

> A district court's interpretation of an extradition agreement and application of the principle of speciality involve questions of law, and we therefore review them de novo. United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754, 767 (1st Cir.1995).[28]

In Lui-Kin Hong, the First Circuit similarly held:

> While it is true that, as a general matter, federal courts of appeals do not rule on issues not decided in the district court . . . we do have discretion to address issues not reached by the district court when the question is essentially legal and the record is complete.[29]

It is well-established in the United States that the scope of a habeas corpus petition to review a magistrate's extradition order (or that of a judge sitting as a magistrate in an extradition hearing pursuant to Title 18 § 3184 or similar hearing) under a given treaty includes:

1. Whether the court had jurisdiction;
2. Whether there is a treaty in effect;
3. Whether the person sought is the person before the court;[30]
4. Whether the offense charged is extraditable under the treaty;
5. Whether the offense charged satisfies the requirement of double criminality;[31]
6. Whether there is sufficient probable cause to believe the relator has committed the offense for which he/she is sought;[32]
7. Whether the evidence presented was competent and sufficient to show probable cause;[33]

---

27 Norton v. Spencer, 351 F.3d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 2003).

28 United States v. Baez, 349 F.3d 90, 92 (1st Cir. 2003), per curiam, citing United States v. Saccocia, 54 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995), cert. denied (1996). See also United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997).

29 Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d at 116.

30 Manta v. Chertoff, 518 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2008) ("At an extradition hearing, the court is required to determine whether the party before the court is the party names in the extradition complaint. Whether the person before the court is the accused is part of the magistrate judge's probable cause analysis. On habeas, we uphold a magistrate judge's finding that there is probable cause to believe the accused committed the crime charged if there is any competent evidence in the record to support it." at 1143.); Zelenovic v. O'Malley, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92632 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 7, 2010) (The district court went through an extensive analysis of the facts to establish that there was probable cause to believe that Zelenovic had indeed committed the murder in question. Id. at *12–15.).

31 Manta, 518 F.3d 1134 ("Dual criminality exists if the 'essential character' of the acts criminalized by the laws of each country are the same and the laws are 'substantially analogous.' " Id. at 1141.); Blakeney v. United States, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9513 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 31, 2011) ("Under United States law, for a charged offense to be extraditable, it must be 'an offense that is either listed or defined as such by the applicable treaty' and the alleged conduct underlying the charges must satisfy 'dual criminality,' i.e. it must be criminal in both jurisdictions." Blakeney, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9513, at *17).

32 Manta, 518 F.3d at 1145–1146; Blakeney, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9513; Zelenovic v. O'Malley, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92632 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 7, 2010); Rios v. United States, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26699 (D. Minn. Feb. 24, 2011) ("While an extradition hearing is not a trial on the merits, it serves 'as a means of ensuring that probable cause exists to believe the person whose surrender is sought has committed the crime for which his extradition is requested.' " Rios, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26699 at *2.).

33 Rios, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 26699 ("The Court finds that competent legal evidence before [the] Magistrate Judge . . . warranted the conclusion that 'there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty' and supported the finding of Petitioner's extraditability." Id. at *7.); Bolanos v. Mukasey, 2009 U.S.

8. Whether any treaty rights inuring to the benefit of the relator bar his/her extradition;

9. Whether all the procedural requirements of the treaty and the applicable statute are satisfied;[34] and

10. Whether any constitutional right of the relator has been infringed.

The jurisprudence of the United States has been consistent as to the recognition of these grounds as being within the scope of the review.[35] For instance, the Ninth Circuit has rejected

---

Dist. LEXIS 87991 (D.N.J. Sept. 24, 2009) ("The standard for finding probable cause in an extradition hearing is the same as in federal criminal preliminary hearings: whether there is 'evidence that would support a reasonable belief that [the defendant] was guilty of the crime charged.' " Bolanos, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87991 at *6.); Aquino v. Plousis, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109381 (D.N.J. Oct. 14, 2010) (opinion not for publication); Smith v. Regan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98108 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 22, 2009) (also discussing sufficiency of authentication under §3190) ("The Court reiterates that the evidence, at this stage, need not prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt . . . Here, the magistrate judge properly found sufficient evidence to make a probable cause determination that Smith was guilty of the offense charged." Smith, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98108, at *8–11.); Germany v. United States, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65676 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 5, 2007) ("Where a defendant was convicted in absentia, the conviction is merely a charge and an independent determination of probable cause in order to extradite must be made." Germany, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65676, at *20–21).

34 See Salazar v. Venables, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91956 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2010) (grant of amparo in Mexico defeated requirement of arrest warrant and probable cause).

35 Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902); Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901); Austin v. Healey, 5 F.3d 598 (2d Cir. 1993); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, aff'd 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990); In re Burt, 737 F.2d 1477 (7th Cir. 1984). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340 (4th Cir. 1983); In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981); Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980); Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856, reh'g denied, 449 U.S. 1027 (1980); In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1973); Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 602 (5th Cir. 1965); Gill v. Imundi, 747 F. Supp. 1028, 1049 (S.D.N.Y 1990); In re Extradition of Suarez-Mason, 694 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Cal. 1988). See also In re Application of D'Amico, 185 F. Supp. 925 (D. Conn. 1960), appeal dismissed sub nom.; United States ex rel. D'Amico v. Bishopp, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir. 1961); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1102 (5th Cir. 1980); Gusikoff v. United States, 620 F.2d 459, 461 (5th Cir. 1980); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 847 (1st Cir. 1980); Garcia-Guillern v. United States, 450 F.2d 1189, 1191 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 989 (1972). The district court stated in D'Amico that:

> Habeas corpus in extradition proceedings is limited in scope. It does not afford a rehearing of what the Commissioner has already decided. The alleged fugitive has had his hearing before the Commissioner and "habeas corpus is available only to inquire whether the magistrate had jurisdiction, whether the offense charged is within the treaty, and by a somewhat liberal extension, whether there was any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty." Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311, 312, 45 S. Ct. 541, 542, 69 L. Ed. 970. See also Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 8 S. Ct. 1240, 32 L. Ed. 234; Re Luis Oreiza y Cortes, 136 U.S. 330, 10 S. Ct. 1031, 34 L. Ed. 464; Bryant v. United States, 167 U.S. 104, 105, 17 S. Ct. 744, 42 L. Ed. 94; Elias v. Ramirez, 215 U.S. 398, 406, 30 S. Ct. 131, 4 L. Ed. 253.

D'Amico, 185 F. Supp. at 927. The court of appeals affirmed the action of the district court stating "habeas corpus is not a rigid and inflexible proceeding in which the court must either order release of the prisoner outright or direct his return to custody." The appellate court in D'Amico concluded that:

> [T]he district court, after a careful study of the record, has determined that an essential finding has not been made and that the case should be remanded to the Commissioner to supply the defect. Such action is entirely within the power given the court by 28 U.S.C. § 2243, and we think Collins v. Miller, . . . 252 U.S. 364, 40 S. Ct. 347, 64 L. Ed. 616, requires us to hold such orders nonappealable.

a procedural challenge to an extradition order where the relator claimed that she was entitled to an expectation of finality with respect to the extradition complaint in her case.[36]

Although habeas corpus review is fairly liberal, failure to raise an argument before the extradition judge, for example insufficiency of probable cause, when the argument was known to the relator, constitutes a waiver of the issue, and the relator is estopped from raising a waived issue after the extradition hearing.[37]

In a recent case, Andersen v. Smith, the relator attempted to challenge his continued detention following the expiration of the period of time within which the United States was required to present the requesting state's formal extradition request following the relator's provisional arrest. In that case the relator was taken into custody on June 15, 2011, pursuant to a request for his arrest by Danish authorities.[38] Under the United States–Denmark treaty, the government was

---

D'Amico, 286 F.2d at 323. See also Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679, 685 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 903 (1969) (stating that a hearing held pursuant to a statute requiring an automatic hearing in most U.S. extraditions to foreign countries is in the nature of a preliminary hearing).

When the issues are not among these points, the extradition judge can find them outside of the scope of review. See Castaneda v. United States, No. 04-1332 ADM/JSM, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103 (D. Minn. 2005); McMaster v. United States, 9 F.3d 47 (8th Cir. 1993) (noting that failure to immediately extradite a defendant to Canada to face three murder charges did not constitute a breach of the government's duty to follow through on an extradition request or constitute civil rights violations; accordingly, habeas corpus was not valid grounds for relief).

In Cheng v. Hueston, 690 F. Supp. 1008 (S.D. Fla. 1988), the district court clarified the test for reconsideration of a probable cause determination based on new evidence:

> The court in D'Amico was extremely persuaded by the proffered evidence because it created a "grave doubt" as to the sufficiency of the underlying facts which formed the basis of the finding of probable cause. In contrast, the court in Peroff found substantial evidence to support extradition even after considering the newly discovered evidence. Central to the court's inquiry in each case was the type of evidence presented and its impact on the probable cause determination. Hence, a workable rule can be gleaned from those cases and used to evaluate newly discovered evidence in the context of extradition proceedings. Thus, a habeas petitioner must be afforded the opportunity of a rehearing when he proffers specific newly discovered explanatory evidence, previously unavailable through the exercise of reasonable diligence, and that evidence casts substantial doubt on the determination of probable cause.

Cheng, 690 F. Supp. at 1011. See also Harshbarger v. Regan, 599 F.3d 290, 293–294 (3d Cir. 2010) (holding that hearsay evidence is admissible in establishing probable cause for the purposes of extradition); Lingad v. Napolitano, 313 Fed. Appx. 72 (9th Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion); Haxhiaj v. Hackman, 528 F.3d 282 (4th Cir. 2008); Polikarpovas v. Stolic, 256 Fed. Appx. 127 (9th Cir. 2007) (unpublished opinion); Medelius-Rodriguez v. United States, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 24137 (4th Cir. Oct. 15, 2007); In re Pena-Bencosme, 341 Fed. Appx. 681 (2d Cir. 2009) (unpublished opinion), stating:

> Review of a decision in an extradition hearing by means of a petition from a writ of habeas corpus "is limited and should not be converted into a de novo review of the evidence." Instead, a court adjudicating such a petition may consider only "whether the [judge conducting the extradition hearing] had jurisdiction, whether the offense charged is within the treaty and, by a somewhat liberal extension, whether there was any evidence warranting the finding that there was reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty." Given the limited nature of this review as well as the underlying requirement that a requesting country establish only probable cause, the existence of evidence contradicting or calling into question the requesting state's primary evidence ordinarily has no import as it does not vitiate or obliterate probable cause but merely "pose[s] a conflict of credibility" that generally "should properly await trial in [the requesting country]."

Pena-Bencosme, 341 Fed. Appx. at 683 (internal quotations omitted).

36 Lingad, 313 Fed. Appx. 72 (because the relator's petition "does not challenge the extradition on any of [the recognized grounds] . . . the district court did not err in denying her habeas petition." Id. at 72.).

37 DeSilva v. DiLeonardi,181 F.3d 865 (7th Cir. 1999); Peretz v. United States, 501 U.S. 923 (1991).

38 Andersen v. Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83398, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 29, 2011).

required to make a formal request for the relator's extradition within thirty days of his arrest, but the treaty allows for an extension in Article 12 as follows:

> A person arrested upon such an application may be set at liberty upon the expiration of thirty days from the date of his arrest if a request for his extradition accompanied by the documents specified in Article 11 shall not have been received. The requesting State may request, specifying the reasons therefor, an extension of the period of detention for a period not to exceed thirty days, and the appropriate judicial authority of the requested State shall have the authority to extend the period of detention. The release from custody pursuant to this provision shall not prevent the institution of proceedings with a view to extraditing the person sought if the request is subsequently received.[39]

The magistrate judge granted the United States one extension until July 27, 2011, and then another extension to August 14, 2011, after the United States failed to present a formal extradition request by the first extension deadline.[40] The relator argued that the magistrate's second extension of time was unauthorized, as the treaty only contemplated "an extension" meaning one extension, and as such he was entitled to release from custody.[41] The court rejected this argument, reasoning that treaties are to be interpreted liberally to give effect to the parties' intent to promote extradition, and that because the total amount of time granted by the extensions was less than thirty days, the relator had not shown a violation of the treaty provision.[42] Furthermore, as Article 12 allowed for up to sixty days, and the relator was unable to show that he was being detained for more than sixty days following his arrest, he failed to show a violation of a treaty or law of the United States, and was therefore not entitled to habeas relief.[43]

Almost all cases dealing with the subject find a way to excuse the government's failure to comply with statutory or treaty requirements. It is as if the courts view these time limits as ministerial guidelines that the government can overlook with relative impunity. Yet nothing in treaty or statutory interpretation allows such elasticity.

1.3. Characteristics of Habeas Corpus Review

Habeas corpus is a de novo proceeding, and evidence can be presented by the government or the relator in writing or by open-court testimony. The habeas judge can reconsider old evidence or hear new evidence, or remand to the magistrate for an evidentiary hearing. On rare occasions, the judge who rules on the extradition pursuant to a § 3184 hearing also presides over the habeas proceedings. Because habeas is an extraordinary legal remedy to challenge the detention of a person, the government, usually the party detaining the relator, cannot present such a petition. However, because the habeas proceedings involve questions of law and facts, the government can seek an appellate review of the order granting the petition. Once the order is entered the relator must be released and cannot be held pending any review remedy pursued by the government. The relator can file for a review with the court of appeals of the order denying the petition and obtain an order to stay extradition pending the appellate review. Habeas proceedings do not foreclose others such as mandamus.[44]

---

39 Treaty of Extradition Between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Denmark, U.S.–Den., art. 12, June 22, 1972, 25 U.S.T. 1293.

40 Andersen, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 83398, at *3.

41 Id. at *4, *12.

42 Id. at *12.

43 Id.

44 See Ch. XI, Sec. 1.6.

1.4. Habeas Corpus and the Rule of Non-Inquiry[45]

Habeas corpus proceedings have been held not to be a valid means of inquiry into the treatment the relator is anticipated to receive in the requesting state. This is generally known as the rule of non-inquiry.[46]

In Neely v. Henkel[47] the relator contended that amendments to the extradition statutes were unconstitutional as they did not assure the accused's rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution upon surrender to the requesting state. In his petition, Neely specifically identified the constitutional prohibitions against bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court held that:

> These provisions have no relation to the crimes committed without the jurisdiction of the United States against the laws of a foreign country. In connection with the above proposition we are reminded of the fact that the appellant is a citizen of the United States. But such citizenship does not . . . entitle him to demand, of right, a trial in any other mode than that allowed to its own people by the country whose laws he has violated and from whose justice he has fled.[48]

Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that a U.S. citizen who "commits a crime in a foreign country . . . cannot complain if required to submit to such modes of trial and to such punishment as the laws of that country may prescribe for its own people."[49]

The "rule of non-inquiry" is brought into sharp focus in the line of cases dealing with convictions in absentia. In these cases, the United States followed the general practice of international law that convictions in absentia are not conclusive of the individual's guilt, but are regarded as equivalent to indictments or formal charges against the individual sought to be extradited.[50] A careful reading of the decisions applying the rule of non-inquiry in such cases reveals that although the courts prefer not to inquire into the treatment to be received by the relator upon surrender or the quality of justice he/she is expected to receive, there is nonetheless in some instances a finding of non-extraditability on "other grounds." Three such cases are particularly revealing.

The first case, Ex parte Fudera,[51] involved a conviction in absentia of a fugitive who had been found guilty and sentenced for the crime of murder by the Italian courts. The district court, on a writ of habeas corpus, chose to pass over the question of the propriety of the in absentia criminal prosecution and sentencing. The court instead rejected the Italian government's evidence of guilt on the grounds that it was based on "pure hearsay," and released the relator on the grounds of insufficient evidence.

The second case, Ex parte LaMantia,[52] similarly involved a murder conviction by an Italian tribunal. This time the fugitive alleged that the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution had been violated as he had been denied the right of confrontation and cross examination. The federal district court held that these protections "did not apply to persons extradited for trial

---

45 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

46 See also Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674 (2008) ("Petitioners contend that these general principles are trumped in their cases because their transfer to Iraqi custody is likely to result in torture. . . . Such allegations are of course a matter of serious concern, but in the present context that concern is to be addressed by the political branches, not the judiciary." at 700.).

47 Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

48 Neely, 180 U.S. at 122–123.

49 Id. at 123.

50 See generally Ch. VIII.

51 Ex parte Fudera, 162 F. 591 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1908).

52 Ex parte LaMantia, 206 F. 330 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1913).

under treaties with foreign countries whose laws may be entirely different."[53] However, again the fugitive was ordered released and extradition refused for insufficiency of evidence presented by the Italian government.

In the third case, the federal district court in In re Mylonas,[54] consistent with prior authority, ruled that the relator's conviction in absentia did not preclude extradition, even though the fugitive, who had been convicted of embezzlement, was not represented by counsel and had no one appear for him. Again, however, the court found grounds upon which it ordered the accused discharged from custody, namely, that under Article V of the 1931 Treaty of Extradition with Greece, the Greek government's long-delayed effort to take the accused into custody exempted Mylonas from extradition "due to lapse of time or other lawful cause."[55]

Thus, in the above cases, U.S. courts recognized the limited nature of habeas corpus and the rule of non-inquiry, and yet freed the relators and denied extradition upon other grounds. Notwithstanding these cases, U.S. law and recognized practice allows extradition based on in absentia convictions.

Two opinions, however, voiced disenchantment with the established rule of non-inquiry. The first instance arose in Argento v. Horn,[56] where the Sixth Circuit felt constrained to submit to precedent on this question but expressed its doubts. Argento, the relator, had been convicted in absentia by Italian courts for the crime of murder. The murder occurred in 1921 and Argento was convicted in 1931. It was not until the 1950s, however, that the Italian government initiated proceedings for his extradition. The circuit court stated:

> The appellant has apparently been a law-abiding person during the thirty years that he has been in this country. To enter a judgment that will result in sending him back to life imprisonment in Italy, upon the basis of the record before the Commissioner, does not sit easily with the members of a United States court, sensible of the great Constitutional immunities. . . . [H]owever, we conceive it our obligation to do so.[57]

Despite the general rule of non-inquiry, courts may inquire into conditions in the requesting state in cases where the relator is likely to encounter such treatment in the requesting state that is deemed significantly offensive to the minimum standards of justice, treatment of the individual, and preservation of basic human rights as perceived by the requested state.[58]

In the second of these cases, Gallina v. Fraser,[59] the Second Circuit bowed to precedent and followed the rule of non-inquiry, but indicated that the rule might be rejected in certain circumstances. In that case, Gallina had been tried and convicted in absentia by the Italian courts for the crime of robbery. Gallina petitioned the federal district court for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that if extradited to Italy, he would be imprisoned without retrial and without an opportunity to face his accusers or conduct any defense. Judge Sterry Waterman stated:

> We have discovered no case authorizing a federal court in a habeas corpus proceeding challenging extradition from the United States to a foreign nation, to inquire into the procedures which await

---

53 Id. at 332.

54 In re Mylonas, 187 F. Supp. 716 (N.D. Ala. 1960).

55 Id. at 716.

56 Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir. 1957).

57 Id. at 263–264.

58 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8 and Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

59 Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960). See also In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1999).

> the relator upon extradition . . . 'Nevertheless, we confess to some disquiet at this result. We can imagine situations when the relator, upon extradition, would be subject to procedures or punishment too antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency as to require reexamination of the principle set out above.'[60]

These concerns were mitigated in this case, however, as Gallina had been represented by counsel at his trial, and was tried along with his alleged associates who were present before the Italian court and were also convicted.

United States courts have so far refused to undertake a factual inquiry into the individual's prospective treatment by the requesting state, but should Judge Waterman's views prevail in the future courts might refuse to surrender the fugitive to a state with an oppressive or arbitrary judicial system. In such a case, the alternative must be to prosecute the relator in the United States. In some ways a contrasting position is taken by the courts in refusing to examine or review a foreign extradition decision whereby surrender to the United States is secured.[61]

In Sindona v. Grant[62] the circuit court was faced with the contention that the relator would be subjected to risk of murder or injury at the hands of political factions should he be returned to the requesting state. In its ruling, the court did not explicitly apply the rule of non-inquiry, but found that the issue fell within the purview of the executive branch:

> Appellant also argues that apart from the protections of the Treaty and the U.N. Convention, his extradition should be denied because return to Italy would subject him to risk of murder or injury at the hands of political enemies on the left. The undated photographs incorporated in the Sindona main brief indicate that a slogan "a morte Sindona" may have commanded a considerable following among Italian demonstrators. However, the degree of risk to Sindona's life from extradition is an issue that properly falls within the exclusive purview of the executive branch. See Peroff v. Hylton, 542 F.2d 1247, 1249 (4th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1062, 97 S. Ct. 787, 50 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1977) (executive may deny extradition request but requesting country has primary responsibility for protecting against assassination). As Judge Wisdom has observed:
>
> > Review by habeas corpus . . . tests only the legality of the extradition proceedings; the question of the wisdom of extradition remains for the executive branch to decide.
>
> Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 602, 606 (5th Cir. 1965). Sindona counters that our decision in Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 851, 81 S. Ct. 97, 5 L. Ed. 2d 74 (1960), requires the extraditing magistrate to consider whether the circumstances awaiting a fugitive upon extradition would be so egregious as to offend the court's "sense of decency." We find no such rule in Gallina. That decision denied habeas corpus on the strength of established authority holding that the federal courts may not "inquire into the procedures which await the relator upon extradition," 278 F.2d at 78. The fact that Gallina also added the caveat that some situations were imaginable in which a federal court might wish to reexamine the principle of exclusive executive discretion, Id. at 79, falls well short of a command to so do here. In any event, it is apparent that Judge Griesa thoroughly examined the affidavits and exhibits relevant to Sindona's claim. If Gallina alone may not have required this much, it follows a fortiori that there was no obligation to hold an evidentiary hearing.[63]

---

60 Gallina, 278 F. 2d at 78–79 (emphasis added) (internal citations omitted).

61 McGann v. U.S. Board of Parole, 488 F.2d 39, 40 (3d Cir. 1973) (following Johnson v. Browne, 205 U.S. 309 (1907)).

62 Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980). See also In re Locatelli, 468 F. Supp. 568 (S.D.N.Y. 1979) (holding that the political offense exception was determined by the motives of the actor and the nature of the act, not by reference to the motives of those who would handle the prosecution of the common crime after its occurrence).

63 Sindona, 619 F.2d at 174–175. See also Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 1046 (1963).

After his extradition to Italy, Sindona was killed in his prison cell, allegedly by members of organized crime who feared what he might say to the authorities. Ironically, his claims were valid, and the court's lofty words, far removed from reality.

The district court in Pfeifer v. United States Bureau of Prisons[64] also remained firm in its refusal to consider the constitutionality of Mexican proceedings that took place prior to the relator's transfer to the United States to serve out the balance of a sentence imposed by a Mexican court. Although the relator's transfer in Pfeifer was not made pursuant to a treaty of extradition,[65] the case affirmed the stance of U.S. courts concerning non-inquiry into matters taking place outside of the jurisdiction of the deciding court, especially where there has been no involvement of any American court in the relevant foreign proceedings. But in these transfer-of-prisoners cases, the policy is different from other cases where the relator is being removed from the United States, as opposed to being brought back to the United States.

The Eleventh Circuit has also refused to apply a "humanitarian exception" because of the rule of non-inquiry.[66] Several circuits have slightly opened the door for judicial consideration of evidence relating to a relator's treatment in the requesting state, though no circuit has yet denied extradition on humanitarian grounds.[67]

The U.S. Constitution, however, does not impose on foreign governments the obligation to act pursuant to U.S. standards of speedy trial, and violation of U.S. standards of speedy trial are not grounds for habeas relief unless they violate international human rights law treaty provisions.[68]

In conclusion:

1. There is no appeal from an extradition order;
2. Review is by habeas corpus;
3. Habeas proceedings are de novo, and include issues of law and fact;
4. Issues deemed waived at the extradition hearing cannot be raised on habeas;
5. The habeas court will consider only certain grounds;[69]
6. Due process violations can always be raised;
7. The habeas petitioner whose petition was denied can appeal by right to the circuit court;

---

64 Pfeifer v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 615 F.2d 873 (9th Cir. 1980). See also Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856, reh'g denied, 449 U.S. 1027 (1980).

65 Transfer was made pursuant to the Treaty with Mexico on the Execution of Penal Sentences of 1976, 28 U.S.T. 7399, T.I.A.S. No. 8718. See Ch. VIII, Sec. 8 on the Rule of Non-Inquiry. But see also infra Sec. 2 on "prosecutorial misconduct."

66 Hurtado v. United States, 401 Fed. Appx. 453, 456–457 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion) (noting that the Eleventh and Second Circuits have distanced themselves from the possibility suggested in Gallina that the rule of non-inquiry should be displaced under certain circumstances where the relator's potential treatment would be "antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency.").

67 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

68 Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817, 105 S. Ct. 85 (1984); United States v. Bogue, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20133 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 11, 1998). The Bogue case involved a conviction in absentia in France where the court found that there was sufficient evidence of probable cause. Consequently, the constitutional rights of the relator were not violated on the petition for a writ of habeas corpus filed subsequent to the determination of extraditability. Bogue, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16784, citing Gonveia v. Voker, 800 F. Supp. 241 (E.D. Pa. 1992); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 1997).

69 See infra Sec. 2.

8. A petitioner whose appeal to the circuit was denied can file for a rehearing en banc, and ultimately file a petition for a writ of certiorari before the U.S. Supreme Court;[70]

9. A petition for habeas before the district or circuit court does not stay the extradition order. A stay order is necessary at each stage; and

10. The government can only appeal a habeas order on questions of law.[71]

1.5. Appeal by the Government

It should be stated at the outset that there is no right of appeal by the government in extradition hearings. In ruling against the government's right of appeal, the Second Circuit in In re Mackin[72] stated:

> Discussion of the appealability of orders granting or denying requests for extradition must go back as far as In re Metzger, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 176, 12 L. Ed. 104 (1847)—a case decided just prior to enactment of the predecessor of the present extradition statute and which doubtless led to that statute's adoption, see notes 6 & 8, infra. Although the extradition treaty with France there at issue, 8 Stat. 580 (1848), unlike the Webster–Ashburton Treaty of the previous year with Great Britain, made no provision that the person whose extradition had been requested should be brought before a judge or magistrate "to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered," President Polk and Secretary of State Buchanan elected to submit the French Government's extradition request to Judge Betts of the District Court for the Southern District of New York, who, after a hearing, committed Metzger to custody to await the order of the President, see In re Metzger, 17 Fed. Cas. 232 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1847). Although the Supreme Court thought that in seeking a hearing before a judicial officer the executive had acted "very properly, as we suppose," 46 U.S. (5 How.) at 188–89, it concluded that the case "was heard and decided by the district judge at his chambers, and not in court," id. at 191. In that role the district judge was exercising "a special authority, and the law has made no provision for revision of his judgment. It cannot be brought before the District or Circuit Court; consequently it cannot, in the nature of an appeal, be brought before this court." Id. at 191–92. Since the Supreme Court thus had no appellate jurisdiction, under the most famous of constitutional decisions it likewise could not issue a writ of habeas corpus on Metzger's behalf. Thus the doctrine of unappealability of extradition decisions by judges and magistrates was born.
>
> The prime purpose of the 1848 statute, 9 Stat. 302, which followed immediately on the Metzger decision, was to provide additional judicial officers to handle extradition requests. Nothing on the face of the statute or in its legislative history shows an intention to alter the Supreme Court's ruling with request to appealability.
>
> That question arose in In re Kaine, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 103, 120, 14 L. Ed. 345 (1852). Kaine was charged by the British Government with a murder in Ireland, apparently in a case having political overtones. Id. at 114–15. The request for extradition was made by the British Consul in New York and heard by a United States commissioner who ordered Kaine to be committed. The Circuit Court declined to issue habeas corpus, and Kaine sought to bring these rulings before the Supreme Court in a number of ways. Justice Curtis, concurring in a careful opinion, concluded that the Commissioner's action was unreviewable on appeal for the reason that, like the judge

---

70 Such a petition can be made pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2101, and is the same as for any petition for writ of certiorari applied for by reason of a denial of the writ of habeas corpus by the circuit court of appeals in any federal matter. Because a petition for writ of certiorari is not a matter of right, petitioner should, after the decisions of the court of appeals affirming the extraditability of the relator, file for a stay of execution in accordance with Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 38(a). In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981).

71 See supra Sec. 1.4.

72 Mackin, 668 F.2d 122.

in Metzger and despite the 1848 statute, he was not exercising "any part of the judicial power of the United States," id. at 119; that the refusal of the Circuit Judge to issue a writ of habeas corpus could not be reviewed since it was not the cause of Kaine's commitment; and that the Supreme Court could not issue the writ on its own account since this would be a prohibited exercise of original jurisdiction.

The decision in Kaine that the Act of August 12, 1848, was not intended to alter the holding in Metzger regarding the nonappealability of decisions granting extradition was recognized in a 1853 opinion of Attorney General Cushing to Secretary of State Marcy. The Attorney General stated, "Nor can appeal be taken from the decision of Mr. Justice Edmonds to any other court, so as to revise that decision. The judge or magistrate in the case acts by special authority under the act of Congress; no appeal is given from his decision by the act; and he does not exercise any part of what is, technically considered, the judicial power of the United States." 6 Op. Atty. Gen. 91, 96 (1853). Not longer thereafter, the common understanding with respect to the appealability of orders denying extradition requests was reflected in another opinion rendered by the Office of the Attorney General to Secretary of State Seward in 1863, 10 Op. Atty. Gen. 501, 506. This stated unequivocally, in response to an objection by a foreign government to a district judge's denial of extradition:

> In cases of this kind, the judge or magistrate acts under special authority conferred by treaties and acts of Congress; and though his action be in form and effect judicial, it is yet not an exercise of any part of what is technically considered the judicial power of the United States. No appeal from his decision is given by the law under which he acts, and therefore no right of appeal exists. Ex parte Metzger, 46 U.S. (5 How.), 176 [12 L. Ed. 104]; U.S. v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.), 40–48 [14 L. Ed. 42; In re Kane [sic], 55 U.S. (14 How.)], 103, 119 [14 L. Ed. 345,] (Curtis, J.) The decision of Judge Leavitt is thus beyond the reach of correction either by executive or judicial power and suggested that the foreign government submit a new request. Further evidence of the nonappealability of orders granting extradition can be found in a Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the nation's extradition laws. S. Rep. No. 82, 47th Cong., 1st Sess. (1882).
>
> The Government suggests that the basis for the nonappealability of extradition orders was altered by the creation of the courts of appeals by the Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 826, since these courts are not subject to the constitutional limitations confining them to appellate jurisdiction which played a part in the Metzger decision and in Justice Curtis' opinion in Kaine. This, however, relates to the ability of the courts of appeals to exercise original jurisdiction over petitions for writs of habeas corpus, and not to the appealability of decisions under Section 3184. It is thus not surprising that courts at every level have continued to state that decisions, even when made by district courts, denying or granting requests for extradition are not appealable under 28 U.S.C. Section 1291.[73]…To quote from the most notable example, Justice Brandeis said in Collins v. Miller, supra, 252 U.S. at 369, 40 S. Ct. at 349, that "the proceeding before a committing magistrate in international extradition is > not subject to correction by appeal." Although none of the cases cited above squarely holds that an order denying a request for extradition is not appealable, these statements are not merely dicta, as the Government argues. Along with their statements as to the nonappealability of orders granting or denying extradition requests, courts have made clear that the extraditee in cases of grant and the requesting party in cases of denial have alternative, albeit less effective, avenues of relief. The extraditee may seek a writ of habeas corpus, the denial or grant of which is appealable, see note 8, supra, and the requesting party may refile the extradition request. Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426, 43 S. Ct. 618, 67 L. Ed. 1062 (1923); Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d at 1365–66; In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963); Ex parte Schorer, 195 F. 334 (E.D. Wis. 1912). Both these remedies are inconsistent with the notion that the original orders were appealable. If the grant of a request were appealable, habeas corpus would not lie since that writ cannot be used as a substitute for an appeal. Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 477, 96 S. Ct. 3037, 3044, 49 L. Ed. 2d 1067 n.10 (1976); Sunal v. Large, 332 U.S. 174, 178–79, 67 S. Ct. 1588, 1590–91, 91 L. Ed. 1982 (1947). If denial of a request were appealable, a second request would ordinarily be defeated by the principle of res judicata. See Hooker v. Klein, supra, 573 F.2d at 1367–68.

73 Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364, 369, 40 S. Ct. 347, 349, 64 L. Ed. 616 (1920); Caplan v. Vokes, 649 F.2d 1336, 1340 (9th Cir. 1981); Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 508 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, [454] U.S. [894], 102 S. Ct. 390, 70 L. Ed. 2d 208 (1981); Antunes v. Vance, 640 F.2d 3, 4 n.3 (4 Cir. 1981); In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237, 1240 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, [451] U.S. [938], 101 S. Ct. 2017, 68 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1981); Gusikoff v. United States, 620 F.2d 459, 461 (5th Cir. 1980); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843, 847 (1st Cir. 1980); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1364 (9th Cir.), cert, denied, 439 U.S. 932 (1978); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536 F.2d 478, 482 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976); Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956, 958 (1st Cir. 1976); United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726, 729–730 (9th Cir. 1975); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884 (1973); Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679, 685 (5th Cir. 1969); Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 602, 607 (5th Cir. 1965); Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 290 F.2d 106, 107 (5th Cir. 1961).

Despite the Government's argument in this case, the general belief with respect to the unappealability of extradition orders has been very recently shared by the Department of Justice and the Department of State. On September 19, 1981, Senator Thurmond, along with several colleagues, introduced "a bill developed over the past 2 years in close cooperation with the Department of Justice and the Department of State to modernize the extradition laws of the United States." 127 Cong. Rec. S9952. Among many other features, the proposed Extradition Act of 1981 confines to the Attorney General the right to file a complaint charging that a person is extraditable to a foreign country, Section 3192(a), provides that this may be done only in a United States district court, id., directs that the court certify to the Secretary of State its findings with respect to extraditability, Section 3194(e), provides for appeals of such findings to the appropriate United States court of appeals, Section 3195(a), and limits the extraditee's rights to seek review by other means, Section 3195(c). Secretary of State Haig expressed the particular pleasure of the Department over several provisions of the bill, including one which for the first time permit[s] appeal from a district court's decision on an extradition request (section 3195), 127 Cong. Rec. S9953. A legal memorandum accompanying the proposed Bill stated in unequivocal terms, 127 Cong. Rec. S9957:

> Under present Federal law, there is no direct appeal from a judicial officer's finding in an extradition hearing. A person found extraditable may only seek collateral review of the finding, usually through an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The foreign government that is dissatisfied with the results of the hearing must institute a new request for extradition. The lack of direct appeal in extradition matters adds undesirable delay, expense, and complication to a process which should be simple and expeditious. [footnotes omitted]

At a hearing held on October 14, 1981, before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Michael Abbell, Director, Office of International Affairs, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, praised the bill because, among other things:

> It permits both a fugitive and the United States, on behalf of the requesting country, to directly appeal adverse decisions by a extradition court. Under present law a fugitive can only attack an adverse decision through habeas corpus, and the only option available to the United States on behalf of a requesting country, is to refile the extradition complaint.

Daniel W. McGovern, Deputy Legal Adviser of the Department of State, said:

> Under the present law there is no direct appeal from a judicial officer's finding in an extradition proceeding. A person found extraditable may only seek collateral review of the finding, usually through an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The foreign government that is dissatisfied with the results of the hearing must institute a new request for extradition. The lack of direct appeal in extradition matters adds undesirable delay, expense and complication > to a process which should be simple and expeditious. Section 3195 [of the proposed bill] remedies this defect in current procedure by permitting either party in an extradition case to appeal directly to the appropriate United States court of appeals from a judge or magistrate's decision.

It is true, of course, that efforts by the Government to resolve an ambiguity, in legislation in its favor should not preclude it from arguing, if the efforts have not yet succeeded, that the legislation should be construed in the manner which it asked Congress to make clear. Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 47 S. Ct. 445, 452, 94 L. Ed. 616 (1950); United States v. Southwestern Cable Co., 392 U.S. 157, 169–70, 88 S. Ct. 1994, 2000–2001, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1001 (1968); Sands, 2A Sutherland Statutory Construction section 49.10 at 261 (1973). But here the executive branch did not tell Congress that the law was uncertain and would benefit from clarification; it said flatly that the law was the exact opposite from what it contends in this case and that the law needed to be changed. Beyond this, and apart from the massive authority we have cited, what the Government told Congress was right and what it argues to us is wrong.

The only conceivable basis for appellate jurisdiction over orders granting or denying extradition is section 1291 to Title 28 which authorizes appeals to the courts of appeals from "final decisions of the district courts of the United States." In contrast, § 3184 proceedings are to be conducted by "any justice or judge of the United States, or any magistrate authorized to do so by courts of the United States or any judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any State." Decisions have noted the difference between Section 3184's references to "judges," "justices," and "magistrates" and Section 1291's reference to "district courts." Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 290 F.2d 106, 107 (5th Cir. 1961); Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 414 U.S. 884, 94 S. Ct. 204, 38 L. Ed. 2d 133 (1973). Even when the decision to grant or deny is by a district judge, this still is not a decision of a district court within 28 U.S.C. Section 1291. See Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, supra, 290 F.2d at 107. Although the distinction was criticized by the dissenting judge in that case, it goes back to the Supreme Court's 1847 decision in In re Metzger, supra, and we approved of it in Shapiro v. Ferrandina, supra, 478 F.2d at 901 & n.3. It is even clearer that the decision of a magistrate is not a final decision of a district court; when Congress has desired to permit an appeal from a decision of a magistrate directly to a court of appeals, it has said so. 28 U.S.C. Section 636(c)(3). There is still greater difficulty in considering the decision of a state judge to be a final decision of a district court. Yet it would be curious if such decisions were nonappealable whereas the decision of a United States judge or magistrate was.

There are similar problems in reading 28 U.S.C. Section 1291 to include the decision of a judge of a court of appeals or a justice of the Supreme Court. It is instructive, in this regard, to examine the statutory provisions applicable to writs of habeas corpus, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241–55. Section 2241 provides, inter alia, that writs of habeas corpus may be granted by "any circuit judge." Evidently fearing that, without more, the action of a circuit judge would not be reviewable, Congress provided in Section 2253 for an appeal from the decision of a circuit judge pursuant to Section 2241: "In a habeas corpus proceeding before a circuit or district judge, the final order shall be subject to review, on appeal, by the court of appeals for the circuit where the proceeding is had." Congress' failure to adopt a similar statutory provision with respect to an extradition order of a circuit judge under 18 U.S.C. § 3184 is evidence that it did not intend such a decision to be appealable to a court of appeals. Yet the Government has suggested no rational basis for a state of the law wherein an extradition decision of a United States district judge or magistrate would be appealable but that of a United States circuit judge would not be. When we add these considerations to the historical background of 18 U.S.C. § 3184 and the many decisions we have cited, we think it clear that no appeal lies under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 from the Magistrate's decision here.[74]

It should also be noted that the government cannot use indirect methods to achieve what it cannot do directly. Thus, it cannot seek a declaratory judgment or mandamus as a means of 74 Jimenez, 290 F.2d at 125–130 (citations omitted).

appeal.[75] So long as extradition orders are deemed non-final orders they shall not be appealable unless a statutory provision provides for appeal.[76] However, the government may seek a motion for reconsideration in certain prescribed situations, but the grounds for relief are generally limited to the presentation of controlling precedent or for information overlooked by the court. The motion for reconsideration cannot be used to reargue the issues presented at the time the original motion was resolved.[77] The motion may not act as a substitute for an appeal.[78]

1.6. Injunctive Relief: Declaratory Judgment, and Mandamus, and Stay of Extradition

Injunctive relief can be applied for at any stage of extradition proceedings, but it has also been resorted to following the conclusion of the extradition hearing.[79] Thus, it can be sought at the pre-hearing stage as well.[80] Both declaratory judgments and mandamus are not generally considered appropriate in extradition proceedings, though it is not clear why this should be so.[81] In Wacker v. Bisson,[82] however, the court found that the relator may become a plaintiff in a declaratory judgment action and also seek a coercive decree.[83] In Wacker the court also found that the same limitations that apply to review of extradition proceedings by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus apply to actions for declaratory judgments reviewing extradition.[84] The Second Circuit, in United States v. Doherty,[85] reiterated its position in 75 See United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1986). See also infra Sec. 1.6.

---

76 Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364 (1920); United States v. Bishopp, 286 F.2d 320 (2d Cir 1961). But see Bishopp, 286 F.2d at 323–324 (Medina, J., concurring). The 1985 United States–United Kingdom Supplemental Extradition is the only exception to the non-applicability of extradition orders. Article 3(a) provides for a right to appeal within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291. See Extradition of Howard, 996 F. 2d 1320 (5th Cir. 1993).

77 Skaftourous v. United States, 759 F. Supp. 2d 354 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) (denying government's motion for reconsideration after the relator's successful challenge regarding improper service of the arrest warrant and running of the statute of limitations).

78 Id. at 362.

79 See Ch. X.

80 See Ch. IX.

81 For a related discussion of the right to an interlocutory appeal, see Ch. IX.

82 Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 602 (5th Cir. 1965).

83 28 U.S.C. § 2201 (1988); Fed. R. Civ. P. 57. See also In re Calmar, Inc., 854 F.2d 461 (Fed. Cir. 1988) ("Mandamus may be employed in exceptional circumstances to correct a clear abuse of discretion or usurpation of power by a trial court. Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamus Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 108 S. Ct. 1133, 1143, 99 L. Ed. 2d 296 (1988); Mississippi Chem. Corp. v. Swift Agricultural Chem. Corp., 717 F.2d 1374, 1379 (Fed. Cir. 1983).") Mandamus is also appropriate to vacate a judgment. See United States v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for the Cent. Dist. of Cal., 858 F.2d 534 (9th Cir. 1988). See also All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651 (2000).

84 Wacker, 348 F.2d at 606 n.8 (citing Fernandez v. Phillips, 268 U.S. 311 (1925); Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364 (1920); Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902)). In Casey v. Dep't of State, 980 F.2d 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1992), the court entertained an appeal from the U.S.District Court for the District of Columbia, which dismissed an action in the nature of a declaratory judgment challenging the Department of State's attempt to extradite one Lionel James Casey. The circuit court affirmed the district court's decision "on the alternative ground that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the dispute." Id. at 1472. There is nothing to indicate that the circuit court found the bases of the action inappropriate.

85 United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1986).

Mackin[86] by holding that the government cannot use declaratory judgments as a means of appeal on a question of fact. However, the court appropriately found that the government (or the relator) may seek a declaratory judgment on a question of law in the course of the proceedings.[87]

Similarly, a writ of mandamus cannot be used as a means of review, or as a substitute or supplement to habeas corpus. However, it is an appropriate remedy in extradition cases where there has been a clear usurpation of power or abuse of discretion.[88] Thus, both special remedies can be used, as well as interlocutory appeals during any stage of the processing. These are appealable orders.

Because extradition proceedings are a judicial determination with a narrow scope, and because extradition is part of the power of the president to conduct foreign affairs—subject to the advice and consent of the Senate on the ratification of extradition treaties—there is no injunctive judicial remedy for the relator against the executive.[89] Thus a relator cannot seek a mandamus or injunction ordering the government to act or to refrain from acting within the scope of its direction.[90] There are no decisions concerning abuse of such discretion.

In 1981 the Second Circuit ruled in Mackin[91] that the government did not have a right to mandamus, stating:

> The Government's alternative petition for mandamus under 28 U.S.C. Section 1651 encounters, as an initial obstacle, the argument that issuance of the writ is not "necessary or appropriate in aid" of our jurisdiction since the Magistrate's decision is unappealable and we thus have no jurisdiction to aid. The Government replies in part that if we were to issue the writ and require the Magistrate to grant extradition, such a grant would almost certainly become the subject of a habeas corpus proceeding in the district court and its order in such a proceeding would be reviewable here under 28 U.S.C. Section 2253. Compare Ex parte United States, 287 U.S. 241, 53 S. Ct. 129, 77 L. Ed. 283 (1932) (Supreme Court has power to grant mandamus requiring a district court to issue a bench warrant for the arrest of an indicted defendant since a conviction would be reviewable by a court of appeals and, on certiorari, by the Supreme Court.)
>
> We have considered somewhat similar questions in United States v. Dooling, 2d Cir., 406 F.2d 192, 197, cert. denied, 395 U.S. 911, 89 S. Ct. 1744, 23 L. Ed. 2d 224 (1969) and United States v. Weinstein, 2d Cir., 452 F.2d 704, 708–13 (1971), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 917, 92 S. Ct. 1766, 32 L. Ed. 2d 116 (1972). In Dooling we issued a writ to compel a district judge to sentence convicted defendants rather than to pursue a course, indicated by him, of dismissing the indictment upon grounds which were in part considered and rejected without leave to renew before

86 In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981).

87 Doherty, 786 F.2d at 499–500.

88 See Allen v. Schultz, 713 F.2d 105 (5th Cir. 1983); In re Extradition of Ghandtchi, 697 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1983). See also In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996).

89 See Shapiro v. Secretary of State, 499 F.2d 527 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Wacker v. Bisson, 370 F.2d 552 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 387 U.S. 936 (1967). But see United States v. Doherty, 615 F. Supp. 755, 760 (S.D.N.Y. 1985).

90 Shapiro, 499 F.2d 527. See In re Calmar, Inc., 854 F.2d 461 (Fed. Cir. 1988) (stating district court's abuse of discretion or usurpation of judicial power warranted writ of mandamus). The Ninth Circuit has recognized five factors as determinative of its decision to grant a writ of mandamus:

> (1) The party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to attain the relief he or she so desires, (2) The petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way not correctable on appeal, . . . (3) The district court's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law. (4) The district court's order is an oft-repeated error, or manifests a persistent disregard of the federal rules. (5) The district court's order raises new and important problems, or issues of law of first impression.

United States v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for the Cent. Dist. Cal., 858 F.2d 534, 537 (9th Cir. 1988).

91 In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981).

> trial by another district judge. We considered it not to be a fatal obstacle to issuance of the writ that the Government might not have been able to appeal if the judge had proceeded as he had intended, 406 F.2d at 198. In Weinstein we issued mandamus requiring a district judge to vacate an order dismissing an indictment after having entered a judgment of conviction although the Government could not have appealed under then existing law and the defendant obviously would not. We concluded "that the phrase 'in aid of their respective jurisdictions' should not be read so as to prohibit [courts of appeals] . . . from vacating orders, in actions generally subject to their supervision, that were beyond the power of the lower court to make, even though in the particular case there was no frustration of an appeal." 452 F.2d at 711. Quite recently the Third Circuit has upheld its power to issue a writ of mandamus to consider whether the District Court of the Virgin Islands lacked, as it thought, legal authority to convene an investigatory grand jury although no case arising from action of the putative grand jury was or, in the nature of things, could be before the court. United States v. Christian, 3rd Cir., 660 F.2d 892. We thus assume, at least arguendo, that mandamus could issue here if other tests with respect to that extraordinary remedy were met.
>
> We have discussed the standards governing issuance of the writ in a number of recent cases, e.g., American Warehousing, Ltd. v. Transamerica Insurance Co., 380 F.2d 277, 280–82 (2d Cir. 1967); Investment Properties International, Ltd. v. IOS, Ltd., 459 F.2d 705, 707 (2d Cir. 1972); Kaufman v. Edelstein, 539 F.2d 811, 816–19 (2d Cir. 1976); National Super Spuds, Inc., v. New York Mercantile Exchange, 591 F.2d 174, 181 (2d Cir. 1979); and In re Attorney General of the United States, 596 F.2d 58 (2d Cir. 1979). While some of these cases granted the writ and others denied it, all the opinions agree that mandamus is reserved for "exceptional cases," whatever that may mean, and, more informatively, that "the touchstones are usurpation of power, clear abuse of discretion and the presence of an issue of first impression." American Express Warehousing, supra, 380 F.2d at 283.
>
> The only issue here raised by the government which might qualify under these standards is its claim that the Magistrate exceeded her jurisdiction by deciding whether the offenses for which Mackin's extradition was sought came within Article V(1)(c)(i) of the Treaty rather than deferring that decision to the executive branch. If she was correct in rejecting that contention, the case would not be appropriate for mandamus since there was nothing any more "extraordinary" in her decisions as to conditions in Northern Ireland in 1978 or as to the nexus between the offenses and what she found those conditions to be than there would be in any extradition case where the political offense exception was advanced and, whether right or wrong, she clearly did not abuse her discretion in deciding as she did.[92]

In In re Extradition of Logan the relator, who had been sought for extradition to Switzerland, sought a writ of mandamus. The original extradition request was withdrawn, but Logan wanted to be extradited even though Switzerland was no longer interested in his surrender from the United States. One can only assume that Logan's eagerness to be surrendered to Switzerland was an attempt to seek prosecution in a more favorable venue, as he was already imprisoned in the United States. However, the issue of mandamus raised the question of whether the decision to extradite is one that can be compelled by mandamus, because it is ultimately a discretionary decision with the executive branch of government.[93]

Injunctive relief may, however, be an appropriate remedy in some cases, such as when an extradition warrant fails to conform in its substance to the findings of a court otherwise authorizing extradition. Such relief may be had, as it would be necessary to enforce the rule of specialty, which requires conformity of the warrant to the findings of the court. There is, however, no decision on point; but the government cannot be enjoined from seeking extradition.[94]

---

92 Id. at 130–132 (citations omitted).

93 In re Extradition of Logan, 97 Misc. No. 1, page 14 (RLE), 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183 (2001); Lo Duca v. United States, 943 F.3d 1100 (2d. Cir. 1996).

94 Casey v. Dep't of State, 299 U.S. App. D.C. 29, 980 F.2d 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1992).

Relators have filed various motions seeking a stay of their extradition. In In re Extradition of Wepplo the court granted the relator's motion to refrain from ruling on a Mexican extradition request pending outcome of his amparo action in Mexico.[95] This appears to be a case of first impression in U.S. federal courts, in which a stay was requested pending resolution of legal action in the requesting state.[96] The court considered the following factors:

1. whether the stay applicant has made a strong showing that he is likely to succeed on the merits;

2. whether the applicant will be irreparably injured absent a stay;

3. whether issuance of the stay will substantially injure the other parties interested in the proceedings; and

4. where the public interest lies.[97]

The government objected to the stay but not to the above-mentioned factors, and did not directly address any of them.[98]

In its analysis the court reasoned that the first two factors weighed in favor of the relator, who argued that he would succeed on the amparo and be irreparably harmed as his extradition would moot his amparo action and subject him to trial based on an allegedly unconstitutional arrest warrant.[99] The court reasoned that issuance of the stay would not prejudice either the United States or Mexico, as a delay of 180 days pending resolution of the amparo was slight compared to the nearly three-year delay in the Mexican government's making the extradition request.[100] Last, the court reasoned that the public interest lay in staying the extradition pending the resolution of the amparo action, as the relator was also a U.S. citizen who should not have to remain in a Mexican prison when the charges could be resolved through the amparo action.[101]

Although the rule of non-inquiry remains present in the background of such an action, the court indirectly dealt with this issue by stating that the relator "is challenging the adequacy of his arrest warrant in Mexico, and is not asking the Court to review the city of Veracruz's compliance with its own criminal procedure or Mexican constitutional law, as was the issue in the case cited by the government."[102]

However, in a similar situation, a Peruvian relator's writ of prohibition, seeking a stay of the extradition process pending resolution of his habeas petition was denied where the court summarily affirmed the district court and magistrate judge's certification of extraditability.[103]

---

95 In re Extradition of Wepplo, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34493 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 7, 2010).

96 Id. at *3.

97 Id. at *3–*4.

98 Id. at *4, *6.

99 Id. at *7–*8.

100 Id. at *8.

101 Id. at *9.

102 Id. at *9–*10.

103 Medelius-Rodriguez v. Strickland, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 24173 (4th Cir. Oct. 15, 2007). The court upheld the district court and magistrate judge's findings that probable cause existed, that the offenses charged fell within the treaty, that the political offense exception did not apply, and that the extradition would not violate the relator's constitutional rights. Id. at *3–*4.

1.6.1. The Declaratory Relief Judgment Act's Application to Extradition

As stated above, declaratory judgments are seldom resorted to in extradition proceedings. Some exceptional cases may, however, warrant them. The primary purpose of such a judgment under 28 U.S.C. § 2201 et seq. is to determine or declare a right not already declared or established in law, whether with respect to treaty interpretation, statutory law, or judicial interpretation of a statute. It is also the means by which to establish or have declared rights that have been improperly adjudicated. A declaratory judgment may also grant relief when the court has jurisdiction.

As most of these legal issues can be determined consensually in the course of extradition proceedings, whether at the extradition hearing or by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, there is seldom the need to resort to the more extraordinary means of seeking a declaratory judgment. The government, in the case of United States v. Doherty,[104] sought review by means of a declaratory judgment of a district court's denial of extradition. In Doherty the Second Circuit held:

> The Government does not suggest that in adopting the DJA [Declaratory Judgment Act] Congress had even remotely in mind the small corner of the law governing procedures in extradition—a recondite subject with which only a handful of members could have been familiar and about which even that handful were surely not thinking at the time. It is true enough that, as the Government urges, words used by Congress have been properly held to cover situations that its members had not considered. But it does not follow that because the words of a statute have sufficient generality to include a particular subject, courts must jump to the conclusion that Congress meant to cover it. What we must decide is whether Congress, had it reflected in 1934 on the problem here presented, would have wished the DJA to upset the remedial balance with respect to acts of extradition magistrates that had been achieved over more than seventy-five years and was to continue for fifty more.
>
> We find no sufficient reason to think that it would have and, as we shall see, many reasons to think that it would not. The existing law on extradition procedure had been quite recently restated by the Supreme Court in Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426, 43 S. Ct. 618, 67 L. Ed. 1062 (1923), and we have been pointed to no contemporaneous congressional expression of dissatisfaction with it. Of course, we cannot know, but it seems much more likely to us that if Congress had thought about the matter in 1934 it would have decided to leave extradition procedures as they were and would have wished, if events should later prove a change to be desirable, to have this take the form of a comprehensive revision of the kind we have seen introduced in Congress in the past five years. In a brief filed only a week before the present case was argued, the Government urged in support of an extradition request before a magistrate in the Eastern District of Virginia that "[i]nternational extradition proceedings conducted pursuant to Title 18, United States Code, Section 3181, et seq. and the applicable treaty. . .are sui generis, and are controlled by a self-contained body of law. The uniqueness of the body of law dealing with international extradition can not be overemphasized." Government's Brief at 2, In re Gordon, Magistrate's Docket No. 85-46-S (E.D. Va. Nov. 27, 1985).[9] So it was when the DJA was adopted and so, we think, Congress would have desired it to remain thereafter unless and until Congress spoke directly to the point.

---

[9] The proposition that extradition proceedings are sui generis finds ample support in the case law. See, e.g., Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 508-09 (7 Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894, 102 S. Ct. 390, 70 L. Ed.2d 208 (1981); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1367–68 (9 Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 932, 99 S.Ct. 323, 58 L. Ed. 2d 327 (1978); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 536

104 United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1986).

F.2d 478, 482 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833, 97 S. Ct. 997, 50 L. Ed. 2d 98 (1976); First Nat'l City Bank v. Aristeguieta, 287 F.2d 219, 223 (2d Cir. 1960), vacated as moot, 375 U.S. 49, 84 S. Ct. 144, 11 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1963); In re Vandervelpen, 14 Blatch. 137, 139 (S.D.N.Y. 1877). To take only two examples, the Federal Rules of Evidence and of Criminal Procedure do not apply in extradition hearings, F.E.D. 1101(d)(3); F.R.Cr.P. 54(b)(5), and the extraditee's grounds for opposing the request for extradition are severely limited, see, e.g., Collins v. Loisel, 259 U.S. 309, 315–17, 42 S. Ct. 469, 471–72, 66 L. Ed. 2d 956 (1922); Hooker, 573 F.2d at 1368. The Government contends that simply because extradition proceedings are sui generis is not a sufficient reason to hold Judge Sprizzo's decision unreviewable under the DJA. This is to miss the point. That extradition law is and always has been considered sui generis merely suggests that Congress would not have wished a broad, all-purpose remedial statute like the DJA to work the radical changes in extradition procedures that the Government here purposes.

The use to which the Government would put the DJA does not fit comfortably within its purpose or within the language of § 3184. The purpose of the DJA has been expressed a variety of ways: "Essentially, a declaratory relief action brings an issue before the court that otherwise might need to await a coercive action brought by the declaratory relief defendant," Mobil Oil Corp. v. City of Long Beach, 772 F.2d 534, 539 (9th Cir. 1985); the fundamental purpose of the DJA is to " 'avoid accrual of avoidable damages to one not certain of his rights and to afford him an early adjudication without waiting until his adversary should see fit to begin suit, after damage has accrued'," Luckenbach Steamship Co. v. United States, 312 F.2d 545, 548 (2d Cir. 1963) (quoting E. Edelmann & Co. v. Triple-A Specialty Co., 88 F.2d 852, 854 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 300 U.S. 680, 57 S. Ct. 673, 81 L. Ed. 884 (1937)); the primary purpose of the DJA is to have a declaration of rights not already determined, not to determine whether rights already adjudicated were adjudicated properly, Hurley v. Lindsay, 207 F.2d 410, 411 (4th Cir. 1953); the declaratory judgment procedure "creates a means by which rights and obligations may be adjudicated in cases involving an actual controversy that has not reached the stage at which either party may seek a coercive remedy, or in which the party entitled to such a remedy fails to sue for it," Wright, The Law of Federal Courts § 100 at 671 (4th Ed. 1983); the declaratory judgment procedure "enable[s] a party who is challenged, threatened or endangered in the enjoyment of what he claims to be his rights, to initiate the proceedings against his tormentor and remove the cloud by an authoritative determination of the plaintiff's legal right, privilege and immunity and the defendant's absence of right, and disability," Borchard, Declaratory Judgments 280 (2d ed. 1941). See generally id. at 277–92 (listing purposes of declaratory judgments).

None of these formulations fits what the Government is seeking here. To be sure, the Government has sought to veil the true nature of the present action by characterizing it as an attempt to secure a "review" of Judge Sprizzo's decision and asking that the declaratory judgment court, if it reads the political offense exception more narrowly than Judge Sprizzo did, should itself issue the certificate that §3184 makes a necessary precondition to extradition. However, since the plain language of § 3184 forbids the latter, the utmost that the declaratory judgment court could do would be to define the political offense exception in a manner that would have preclusive effect when the Government went before another extradition magistrate. It is that later proceeding, not Judge Sprizzo's ruling, at which the present action is truly aimed.

None of the formulations cited above suggest that the DJA was intended to enable the Government, here acting as the prosecution in proceedings that the Supreme Court and we have referred to as being of a criminal nature, see Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 187, 23 S. Ct. 98, 101, 47 L. Ed. 130 (1902); Rice v. Ames, 180 U.S. 371, 374, 21 S. Ct. 406, 407, 45 L. Ed. 577 (1901); First National City Bank v. Aristeguieta, 287 F.2d 219, 226 n.7 (1960), vacated at moot, 375 U.S. 49, 84 S. Ct. 144, 11 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1963), to arm itself with a favorable ruling on the law before starting a new proceeding. The Government has no need of declaratory relief to head off a threatened suit by Doherty that would impose a detriment on it; on the contrary, it is the Government that wants to impose the detriment on Doherty. It seeks to use declaratory judgment as a sword rather than a shield. Having tried and failed to obtain a certificate for Judge Sprizzo, it fears that it may lose when it tries again before another extradition magistrate and seeks insurance in the form of a declaration of law by a district court and ultimately by this court or even the Supreme Court. As Justice Jackson remarked, "the declaratory judgment procedure will not be used to pre-empt and prejudge issues that are committed for initial decision to an administrative body or special tribunal any more than it will be used as a substitute for statutory methods of review." Public Service Commission v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 246, 73 S. Ct. 236, 241, 97 L. Ed. 291 (1952). The Government has not cited, and we have not been able to find, a single case in which a declaratory judgment was used in a manner resembling that which the Government proposes here.

Against all these considerations, the Government relies on Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 602 (5th Cir. 1965), in which a divided court of appeals held that an extraditee could secure review of the grant of certificate by an action for a declaratory judgment. The Government argues that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. It also relies on cases in which the courts have sustained use of the DJA for attacks on administrative action.

Wacker, awaiting extradition to Canada for violations of its securities laws, had already brought two unsuccessful petitions for habeas corpus, from the results of which he had not appealed. He then brought what Judge Wisdom called an "off-beat declaratory judgment action attacking the validity of an unappealable extradition order." 348 F.2d at 604. Judge Wisdom added that "[s]ince Wacker is in custody," as extraditees inevitably are since § 3184 Proceedings begin with an arrest, "he might just as well have cast the action in the form of an application for habeas corpus." Id. But evidently tired of habeas, Wacker sued the Consul General of Canada in New Orleans under the DJA, advancing "all possible, and some impossible, reasons for the invalidity of the extradition." Id. If Wacker thought that by doing this he would achieve a broader scope of review than in habeas, he failed; the majority held that "the scope of review of an extradition hearing should be the same whether the extraditee chooses habeas corpus or declaratory judgment." Id. (footnote omitted). Nevertheless, the majority held that the action for a declaratory judgment would lie. Judge Rives dissented, making the commonsensical observation:

> The majority holds that the scope of review in a declaratory judgment action is the same as in a habeas corpus proceeding. The point of holding that the Declaratory Judgment Act has opened a backdoor to review of an extradition order escapes me when the front door provided by the Great Writ grants access to the same court of justice and provides the same scope of relief.

Id.

As Judge Haight noted below, "Ultimately Wacker's procedural victory availed him nothing." 615 F. Supp. at 759 n. 4. The Wacker majority also recognized this, remarking that "[u]nfortunately for Wacker, he is no better off in a declaratory judgment action than in his habeas corpus proceedings. . . Indeed, he may be worse off." 348 F.2d at 610. The court directed that > [i]f the district court should conclude that Wacker has had a full and fair hearing in the two habeas proceedings on those issues in this case which are serious, there is no necessity for holding any additional evidentiary hearing.

Id. at 611.[105]

. . .

Fn. 14. In Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 903, 90 S. Ct. 1688, 26 L. Ed. 2d 61 (1970), where the challenge to extradition was by habeas corpus, the court mentioned in a footnote, citing Wacker, that review could also have been had by declaratory judgement. Id. at 685 n. 17.[106]

105 Id. at 497–501. (citations omitted, except n.9.).

106 Id. at 501.

In rejecting the government's claim, the Second Circuit did not foreclose resorting to the Declaratory Judgment Act (DJA) where appropriate. For example, such a case could arise when prosecution in the federal or state courts violates the principle of "specialty"[107] and the relator is denied the right to argue the issue, or to have the charges conform to the extradition order issued by the original requested state. One can imagine a situation where state prosecution is to commence on charges not included in the extradition order. Another situation could arise when the original requested state places a condition on extradition (such as non-applicability of the death penalty) and the U.S. government accepts the limitation, but the prosecuting state proceeds along a track used only for death penalty cases. One can also imagine a situation where a "protest" is filed by the original requested state after the extradition order has been issued because the state discovers that it was induced by the U.S. government to believe certain facts that it later discovers not to be true. Whether such a "protest" after the fact can be viewed as a limiting condition that would have the same effect as if it had been issued ab initio is still a question of first impression that has not yet been adjudicated before a U.S. court. Last, there may be questions of law that may have been improperly or insufficiently raised by the relator at the hearing or habeas levels, and that may best be decided as questions of law under the DJA, even though habeas can always be resorted to but obviously with much greater limitations. One such case could well be the United States v. Badalamenti,[108] the highly publicized "Pizza Connection" case, where "specialty" was at issue with respect to Gaetano Badalamenti, who was extradited from Spain, and received short shrift treatment at the trial and on habeas review.

Resort to the DJA presents the danger that the government or the relator can use it as an alternative means to adjudicate legal issues contextually within the extradition proceedings as the court in Doherty held. Sometimes, however, the interests of justice and judicial economy may be better served by resorting to these means. Exceptional situations may sometimes need extraordinary means to redress or prevent a wrong.

2. Prosecutorial Misconduct as Grounds for Review of the Proceedings

Prosecutorial misconduct is treated the same way in extradition proceedings as it is in criminal cases, even though extradition is deemed sui generis.[109] When a prosecutor engages in misconduct that results in an unfair result, trial reversal of a conviction may be warranted.[110] In In re Singh a district court found that "[a]bsent some showing of personal bias or prejudice against the defendants, recusal was unwarranted,"[111] based on the clear evidence that the prosecutor had "manufactured threats to herself and the Court."[112] Accordingly, the misconduct of the prosecutor afforded the defendants expanded discovery rights of the affidavits used by the prosecutor to establish probable cause.[113]

Note that, as in the context of general criminal law, the right of a defendant to the reversal of a conviction on the grounds of prosecutorial misconduct is circumscribed by the general requirement that a showing is made of serious prejudice that calls into question the validity of the verdict. It seems clear that if the probable cause determination in extradition proceedings can be proven independently of the tainted evidence, the determination will be deemed valid.

---

107 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

108 United States v. Badalamenti, 614 F. Supp 194 (S.D.N.Y. 1985).

109 See, e.g., In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 140, 147 (D. N.J. 1988) (focusing on the severity of any constitutional violations to determine whether the misconduct had biased the judicial officer).

110 United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 505–506 (1983).

111 Singh, 123 F.R.D. at 140.

112 Id. at 142.

113 Id. at 165.

The range of possible prosecutorial misconduct varies significantly. It includes misrepresentations or concealment of certain facts, suppression of exculpatory evidence, nondisclosure of questions of law and fact that may inure to the benefit of the relator, or the presentation of prejudicial and inflammatory material designed to unduly influence the court.

In United States v. Abello-Silva[114] two issues of prosecutorial misconduct arose. The first related to the prosecution's suppression of evidence that was favorable to the relator, and that had to be disclosed as required by Brady v. Maryland.[115] The disclosure of exculpatory evidence must, however, be determined on the basis of its materiality as well.[116] In such cases, the circuit court may review de novo the trial court's decision as to both the exculpatory nature of the evidence that was concealed and its materiality.[117] The court in Abello-Silva, in reliance upon United States v. Bagley,[118] found that the exculpatory evidence was material only if there is reasonable probability that had the evidence been disclosed to the defense the result in the proceedings would have been different. A "reasonable probability" is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome.

The second issue of prosecutorial misconduct in United States v. Abello-Silva involved inflammatory and prejudicial statements, which were alleged to have denied the accused the right to a fair trial.[119] The court in Abello-Silva, in reliance upon other cases, evaluated the record to determine whether improper references of an inflammatory and prejudicial nature were "harmless beyond a reasonable doubt."[120] The court denied the claim. It should be noted, however, that extradition hearings are before a judge, and unlike criminal cases before a jury the level of impropriety must be very serious with respect to prejudicial statements, as the perceived risk of tainting a judge is lower than with a jury.

This is not the case with concealment of evidence or misrepresentation of facts, as the Sixth Circuit held in Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky.[121] During the course of years of litigation in Demjanjuk, the relator was denaturalized and extradited to Israel on the basis of an erroneous identification about which the U.S. government apparently knew. The court held:

> If Moscowitz did not read the reports, knowing he planned to introduce the video deposition at the trial, this failure constituted "reckless disregard for the truth."
>
> . . . OSI was not a large office. We can find no excuse for such casual treatment of information that could cast doubt on the validity of important testimony. Moscowitz was present at the first session with Horn, but testified that he looked away during the actual identification, leaving that to the investigator and historian. He did this, he said, in order to avoid the possibility 114 United States v. Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d 1168 (10th Cir. 1991).

115 Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

116 See United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 682 (1984). See also United States v. Siriprechapong, 181 F.R.D. 416 (N.D. Cal. 1998); United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976); United States v. Buchannan, 891 F.2d 1436 (10th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1088 (1990).

117 Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d at 1180. See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000).

118 United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 682 (1984); United States v. Peltier, 800 F.2d 772 (8th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 822 (1987); United States v. Peltier, 609 F. Supp. 1143 (D. N.D. 1985). See also In re Singh, 123 F.R.D. 108 (D. N.J. 1988). In the supplemental opinion of September 11, 1987 in Singh, the court seemed to raise the question about the applicability of Brady v. United States and relied on Merino v. United States Marshal, 362 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 997 (1964); however, the district court's decision is not persuasive as to the Brady right in light of Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

119 See Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b); United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1 (1985).

120 Abello-Silva, 948 F.2d at 1182. See also Gallo-Chamorro v. United States, 233 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2000).

121 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

> of being called as a witness at the denaturalization trial when the deposition to be taken a few months later would be introduced. Not having witnessed the identification himself, we can find no reasonable explanation in this immense record for his failure to read and acknowledge the importance of the contemporaneous reports of the trained investigator and historian, nor can we understand how Sinai determined that two reports addressed to him should be routed to Moscowitz without even reading them.[122]

It should be noted that the Supreme Court of Israel acquitted Demjanjuk of the charges for which he was extradited and allowed his return to the United States. Had he not been acquitted or had the requested state refused to allow him to return to the United States, the basis of the prosecutorial misconduct would have had to have been enforced by the executive branch. Whether such a decision invalidating the extradition order would have been sufficient to compel the executive branch to seek and obtain the return of the former relator has never been determined in the United States.

Another case of prosecutorial misconduct was decided by the Seventh Circuit in Lindstrom v. Graber,[123] where U.S. marshals, at the direction of an Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA), surrendered the relator to Norwegian agents at Chicago's O'Hare Airport even though a judge of the Seventh Circuit had issued a stay of execution of the extradition order. This shocking behavior by an AUSA led the Seventh Circuit to issue a formal notice of disciplinary proceeding pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Practice 46(c). Petitioner's appeal and stay were, however, deemed as being moot as the petitioner had already been removed to Norway. This decision was followed by another learned opinion of Chief Judge Richard Posner, joined by Circuit Judges Richard Cudahy and Diane Wood in In re Attorney Lori E. Lightfoot,[124] wherein the Court held:

> Defined by the Supreme Court as "conduct contrary to professional standards that shows an unfitness to discharge continuing obligations to clients or the courts, or conduct inimical to the administration of justice," In re Snyder, 472 U.S. 634, 645, 86 L. Ed. 2d 504, 105 S. Ct. 2873 (1985), conduct unbecoming within the meaning of Rule 46(c) has generally been understood to involve significant elements of aggravation, such as deliberately misleading the court or displaying egregious misjudgment. Cleveland Hair Clinic v. Puig, 200 F.3d, 1063, 1069–70 (7th Cir. 2000); Mays v. Chicago Sun-Times, 865 F.2d 134, 140 (7th Cir. 1989); In re Jafree, 759 F.2d 604 (7th Cir. 1984) (per curiam); Braley v. Campbell, 832 F.2d 1504, 1508–10 and n. 5 (10th

---

122 Id. at 352. In Wang v. Reno, 81 F.3d. 808 (9th Cir.1995) the circuit court recalled the following prosecutorial misconduct cases:

> Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338, 355 (6th Cir.1993), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 914, 115 S. Ct. 295, 130 L. Ed. 2d 205 (1994) (prosecuting attorneys engaged in prosecutorial misconduct when they recklessly disregarded their obligation to provide information specifically requested by detainee, thereby endangering detainee's defense). See also United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315, 1324 (9th Cir.1993) ("It's the easiest thing in the world for people trained in the adversarial ethic to think a prosecutor's job is simply to win.") (citing instances of prosecutorial misconduct). In so doing, the government failed in its duty to "win fairly, staying well within the rules" and, more importantly, to "serve truth and justice first." *Kojaya*n, 8 F.3d at 1323. The district court found that the government, in this case, strayed from its responsibility "to vindicate the right of people as expressed in the laws and give those accused of crime a fair trial."

Id. Thus,

> [i]n a situation like this, the judiciary—especially the court before which the primary misbehavior took place—may exercise its supervisory power to make it clear that the misconduct was serious, that the government's unwillingness to own up to it was more serious still and that steps must be taken to avoid a recurrence of this chain of events. Kojayan, 8 F. 3d at 1325.

Wang, 81 F.3d. at 821.

123 Lindstrom v. Graber, 203 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2000).

124 In re Lightfoot, 217 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2000).

Cir. 1987) (en banc); In re Bithoney, 486 F.2d 319, 322-34, 325 (1st Cir. 1973). Granted, negligence has been deemed sufficient in a number of cases. E.g., In re Hendrix, 986 F.2d 195, 201 (7th Cir. 1993); DCD Programs, Ltd. v. Leighton, 846 F. 2d 526 (9th Cir. 1988) (per curiam). But these are cases involving misrepresentations, omissions, or failures of inquiry, rather than poor judgment in applying legal principles to facts; and without circumstances of aggravation, poor judgment is not professional misconduct. We didn't find circumstances of aggravation in Safford and Toledo's advice, and so we didn't institute disciplinary proceedings against either of those lawyers.

The motion filed by attorney Lightfoot, a motion that she prepared (albeit with advice from Safford) and signed, presents a more troublesome issue. The trouble lies in the fact that the motion was misleading. It is one thing for a lawyer to advocate an unreasonable position to a court; usually the court can prevent any serious harm to anyone just by rejecting the position. It is another thing for a lawyer to defeat an opposing party's claims by misleading the court, whether by a misrepresentation or by a pregnant omission. That is misconduct, In re Cook, 49 F.3d 263 (7th Cir. 1995); Pearson v. First NH Mortgage Corp., 200 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 1999); United States v. Shaffer Equipment Co., 11 F.3d 450, 453–61 (4th Cir. 1993); Malautea v. Suzuki Motor Co., 987 F.2d 1536, 1540–41, 1544–46 (11th Cir. 1993), and that is what happened here. To the extent, unilluminated by the record, that Safford was (as Lightfoot argues) complicit in Lightfoot's violation of the duty of candor, the fact that Safford is Lightfoot's superior would not get Lightfoot off the hook. Reliance on a superior's orders is a defense to a charge of misconduct only when reasonable, In re Howes, 1997 NMSC 24, 940 P.2d 159, 164–65, 123 N.M. 311 (N. Mex. 1997) (per curiam); ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 5.2, comment [2] (1995), and it is not reasonable to believe that one is authorized to mislead a court. People v. Casey, 948 P.2d 1014, 1016–17 (Colo. 1997) (per curiam).[125]

Anyone reading this motion would suppose that the government understood the stay to be a prohibition against Lindstrom's being removed from the United States. Otherwise there would be no reason to offer his imminent departure as a reason not for vacating the stay as moot, but for lifting it so that he could be removed on schedule. The implication was that unless the stay was lifted the Norwegians could not carry off Lindstrom on the 5:00 p.m. flight. If the stay did not have that effect and thus was going to become moot in 20 minutes (if it wasn't moot already), there would be no reason to request time for a further response should the motion be denied. Yet the motion made that request. The motion thus created a thoroughly false impression of the government's position, an impression that could not but cause Judge Rovner to believe that unless she vacated the stay Lindstrom would remain in the United States until the merits of his appeal could be considered. The impression was false because we know that the Justice Department was proceeding on the premise that the stay which Judge Rovner had issued did not stay the removal of Lindstrom from the United States—the stay had no effect, was moot, would not prevent the 5:00 p.m. departure. Had Judge Rovner received timely notice that her stay was being so interpreted by the officials to whom it was directed, she would no doubt have issued a further order making clear that the stay was a stay of removal and not merely of some metaphysical act of "extradition" that had occurred hours before in the basement of the federal courthouse. Had Lightfoot's motion informed the court that unless it took further action Lindstrom would be on his way to Norway within minutes, Judge Rovner might have issued an order directly to the airline, and the order might have been timely; for the motion was filed at 4:40, and the plane didn't take off until 5:45. Of course, it would have been much better had Lightfoot informed the court of the Justice Department's interpretation of the stat [sic] much earlier; for remember that she learned before 3:00 p.m. that the stay had been issued.

For a government lawyer to file with a court a misleading statement the effect of which is to moot a petition for habeas corpus is professional misconduct. Lightfoot's motion was bound to

125 Id. at 916–917.

> lull Judge Rovner into thinking that the stay had had the intended effect of preventing Lindstrom's appeal from becoming moot.[126]
>
> We are troubled, finally, by the U.S. Attorney's request that we "depublish" our previous decision. Even if we agreed with him, as we do not, that attorney Lightfoot should not be disciplined, he has presented no reasons for supposing that our decision contained any error. We did not say that Lightfoot had engaged in conduct unbecoming a member of the bar, but only that there was a sufficient likelihood of this to require a disciplinary proceeding; and nothing in the U.S. Attorney's submission suggests that this "probable cause" finding was erroneous. The request to vacate our decision, which we of course deny, suggests to us that the U.S. Attorney still does not appreciate the gravity of the situation demonstrated by the uncontested facts, which reveal that the Justice Department's failure to equip its attorneys with the necessary expertise to opine on difficult issues relating to extradition precipitated the filing of a misleading motion by the Department that caused this court to lose jurisdiction over an appeal by a person who claims that he had been ordered extradited in violation of law.[127]

The Ninth Circuit recently dealt with the issue of misrepresentations by U.S. officials to foreign officials in United States v. Struckman.[128] Struckman was a U.S. citizen who fled to Panama to avoid charges of tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the United States.[129] United States and Panamanian authorities chose to remove Struckman from Panama via a process of disguised extradition through visa revocations and denials rather than formal extradition proceedings.[130] The regional security officer at the U.S. embassy in Panama City, without a factual basis for the claims, told Panamanian officials that Struckman was attempting to perpetrate the same fraud in Panama he successfully perpetrated in the United States.[131] When notified by Panamanian National Police that they had captured someone matching Struckman's description, the same regional security officer told the police that Struckman had been sentenced in the United States, even though Struckman had never been tried on the charges.[132]

The court entertained a challenge to personal jurisdiction under the exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine for the U.S. engaging in " 'misconduct of the most shocking and outrageous kind' to obtain his presence."[133] In its analysis under the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, the Ninth Circuit stated:

> We are not prepared to say that blatant lies to a foreign government that induce the foreign government to transfer a defendant to the United States when it otherwise would not could never amount to conduct so shocking and outrageous as to violate due process and require dismissal of pending criminal proceedings in the United States.[134]

Nevertheless, the Ninth Circuit declined to apply the government misconduct exception, reasoning that the Panamanian government did not rely on the embassy official's misrepresentations to remove Struckman, and accordingly Struckman was unable to show prejudice from the misstatements.[135] The court did find the "lies told . . . to Panamanian officials . . . troubling," but reviewed the facts in the light most favorable to the government and found no violation of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine.[136]

---

126 Id. at 917–918.

127 Id. at 919.

128 United States v. Struckman, 611 F.3d 560 (9th Cir. 2010).

129 Id. at 564.

130 Id. at 565–566.

131 Id. at 566.

132 Id.

133 Id. at 571, 573.

134 Id. at 574.

135 Id.

136 Id.

It is unclear what relief may be available to a relator subject to an extradition based on prosecutorial misconduct. The Fourth Circuit considered whether a relator could pursue a Bivens action for malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment based on an alleged "wrongful extradition."[137] In Snider v. Lee, the relator was extradited to South Korea based on the relator's confessions that the relator alleged were coerced.[138] The relator confessed to having murdered a fellow American exchange student in South Korea after meeting with FBI agents who told her, among other things, that there were cases where foreign nationals who killed Korean citizens received light sentences, and that the investigation showed that she murdered the American exchange student.[139] The relator signed a written statement specifically noting that she had not been promised anything or threatened by the FBI agents.[140] The relator first claimed that her confession was coerced at the extradition hearing, and stated that she had not retracted it because she was unaware that retraction was an option.[141] The relator was ultimately extradited to South Korea, in large part, based on her confession.[142]

The relator was ultimately acquitted and released from Korean custody approximately four years after the extradition hearing, after which she commenced her Bivens action.[143] At issue on appeal was whether the FBI agent accused of coercing her confession was protected from the civil damage action by qualified immunity. Under Bivens a government official has qualified immunity where either "the facts do not make out a violation of a constitutional right or if the right was not clearly established at the time."[144] Of all the relator's claims in her Bivens action, only the claim for malicious prosecution was not time barred.[145] Although the court expressed reservation as to the existence of a constitutional right to be free from "malicious prosecution," it posited that "if there is such a right, the plaintiff must demonstrate both an unreasonable seizure and a favorable termination of the criminal proceeding flowing from the seizure."[146] The court reasoned that the relevant criminal proceeding was the extradition hearing rather than the criminal proceedings in Korea, as the Supreme Court stated in United States v. Balsys that, "criminal prosecution by a foreign government was nonetheless not subject to U.S. constitutional guarantees."[147] As the extradition hearing resulted in the relator's extradition, she could not establish malicious prosecution because the prosecution was vindicated, and the FBI agent was entitled to qualified immunity as the facts did not make out a constitutional right.[148]

The concurring opinion by Judge Frederick Stamp illustrates some of the questionable conclusions reached by the majority opinion. Judge Stamp reasoned that:

> the majority opinion states that Snider was seized by United States law enforcement officials pursuant to an arrest warrant issued on the basis of the Korean government's extradition request. In the majority's view, the sole purpose of the arrest was to hold an extradition hearing. This 137 Snider v. Seung Lee, 584 F.3d 193 (4th Cir. 2009).

138 Id. at 195.

139 Id. at 196–197.

140 Id. at 197.

141 Id.

142 Id.

143 Id. at 198.

144 Id.

145 The relator attempted to argue that the government's conduct "violated her rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to be free from unreasonable seizures (including false arrest and false imprisonment), coercion leading to her confessions, the failure of government officials to intervene in the face of wrongful conduct, denial of counsel, and malicious prosecution (alleged as 'wrongful extradition')." Id. at 198.

146 Id. at 199.

147 Id. at 199–201.

148 Id. at 201.

seems to me an overly narrow characterization of the reasons underlying Snider's seizure. Certainly, Snider was arrested and ordered to appear before a magistrate judge for an extradition hearing, but the extradition hearing was merely a means of prosecuting the broader criminal action against Snider. Thus, I believe the purpose of Snider's seizure was to determine whether the criminal prosecution should proceed by ascertaining whether Snider was extraditable. In other words, the purpose of the arrest was to advance the prosecution toward its termination (be it favorable or unfavorable). At the conclusion of the extradition hearing, the proceedings against Snider did not end. She was detained, extradited to Korea, tried, and ultimately acquitted. Therefore, it seems to me that the extradition hearing was simply one aspect of the broader purpose of Snider's arrest—that is, the prosecution of the murder charge against her.

Where a criminal prosecution terminates in favor of a defendant who, as a result of the criminal proceedings, has suffered a deprivation of liberty without probable cause, a Fourth Amendment "malicious prosecution" cause of action will lie. As noted above, a favorable termination can occur in one of many ways. For example, had the magistrate judge concluded that Snider was not extraditable for lack of probable cause, the proceedings would have terminated in her favor. However, acquittal is also a favorable termination. Snider was acquitted. That her acquittal was effected under the authority of the Korean government is not as significant as the fact that the criminal proceedings terminated in her favor.

Also, the majority's opinion does not seem to me to acknowledge the circumscribed purpose of an extradition hearing and the limited ability of a defendant to challenge the evidence presented against him or her in such a proceeding. The following excerpt from a concurring opinion in Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588, 608–609 (4th Cir. 2007), is instructive:

> The extradition hearing, of course, "is not . . . in the nature of a final trial by which the prisoner could be convicted or acquitted of the crime charged against him." LoDuca [v. United States, 93 F.3d 1110, 1104 (2d Cir. 1996)] (quoting Benson v. McMahon, 127 U.S. 457, 463 (1888)). Stated differently, the hearing is "not designed as a full trial" but as a means of "inquir[ing] into the presence of probable cause to believe that there has been a violation of one or more of the criminal laws of the extraditing country." Per-off v. Hylton, 542 F.2d 1247, 1249 (4th Cir.1976); see Eain [v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 508 (7th Cir. 1981)] ("It is fundamental that the person whose extradition is sought is not entitled to a full trial at the magistrate's probable cause hearing . . . . That is the task of the . . . courts of the other country.").
>
> Although the extradition statute does not mention "probable cause" and instead directs the extradition court to determine whether there is "evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention," 18 U.S.C.A. § 3184, courts have uniformly interpreted the statutory language to require a finding of "probable cause." See Vo [v. Benov, 447 F.3d 1235, 1237 (9th Cir. 2006)]; Sidali [v. INS, 107 F.3d 191, 195 (3d Cir. 1997)]. Thus, "[t]he probable cause standard applicable to an extradition hearing is the same as the standard used in federal preliminary hearings," meaning that the magistrate judge's role is merely "to determine whether there is competent evidence to justify holding the accused to await trial." Hoxha [v. Levi, 465 F.3d 554, 561 (3d Cir. 2006)] (internal quotation marks omitted). In that vein, the evidence considered by the magistrate as part of an extradition hearing "need not meet the standards for admissibility at trial" and "may be based upon hearsay in whole or in part." [United States v.] Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d [103,] 120 [(1st Cir. 1997)] (internal quotation marks omitted).
>
> Not only are the admissibility standards relaxed, but the alleged fugitive's ability to challenge the government's evidence or to submit evidence of his own at the extradition hearing is also significantly limited. For example, the fugitive has no right to crossexamine witnesses, see Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1406-07 (9th Cir. 1988), or to introduce "contradictory evidence" that conflicts with the government's probable cause evidence, see Hoxha, 465 F.3d at 561. By contrast, "explanatory evidence" relating to the underlying charges is admissible. See Koskotas v. Roche, 931 F.2d 169, 175 (1st Cir. 1991).

> If the extradition judge concludes that there is, in fact, probable cause, he "is required to certify the individual as extraditable to the Secretary of State." Vo, 447 F.3d at 1237 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588, 608–609 (4th Cir. 2007) (Traxler, J., concurring) (emphasis added; footnote omitted). As the concurring opinion in Ordinola observes, the purpose of an extradition hearing is merely to make a probable cause determination, not to conduct a trial on the merits of the criminal charges. Accordingly, the procedural safeguards attending a criminal trial are absent from an extradition hearing. Consequently, evidence which might be excluded at trial, including hearsay evidence, is admissible at the extradition hearing; the accused is prohibited from challenging the government's evidence and from submitting evidence on his or her own behalf; and the accused has no right to cross-examine witnesses. These conditions set a high bar for obtaining a favorable termination at the extradition stage of proceedings. In a case such as this one, where the evidence supporting probable cause was obtained in the United States by United States federal officials, it seems unreasonable to limit the favorable termination element of a malicious prosecution claim to a favorable result in the extradition hearing, particularly in light of the narrow purpose of such a hearing and the limited ability of the accused to challenge the evidence presented against him or her at that proceeding.

I would also note that, for purposes of a malicious prosecution claim, the prosecution was arguably initiated in the United States. Although formal charges were brought in Korea, the interrogation yielding the allegedly false confession to establish probable cause may properly be considered to have initiated prosecution because it resulted in the issuance of an arrest warrant and, consequently, Snider's arrest in this country. See Reed v. City of Chicago, 77 F.3d 1049, 1053 (7th Cir. 1996) (finding that a wrongful arrest could conceivably constitute the first step towards a malicious prosecution claim). Because the criminal proceedings could be deemed to have been initiated in the United States, I believe that it should be recognized that Snider's acquittal was a favorable termination of the criminal proceedings against her, even though the termination occurred in Korea.

Finally, the majority opinion contends that the protections afforded to criminal defendants by the United States Constitution do not apply to prosecutions in foreign jurisdictions. As support, the majority opinion cites United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666, 672–74 (1998). There, Aloyzas Balsys ("Balsys"), a resident alien in deportation proceedings, refused to answer questions about his activities in certain foreign countries during World War II because his answers could potentially subject him to criminal prosecutions by those foreign governments. As grounds for his refusal to answer, Balsys invoked the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. On appeal, the United States Supreme Court framed the issue as "whether a criminal prosecution by a foreign government not subject to our constitutional guarantees presents a 'criminal case' for purposes of the privilege against self-incrimination." Id. at 672 (emphasis added). The answer, in short, was that it did not. The Court held that a person who fears criminal prosecution only by a foreign government may not invoke the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination because the sovereign seeking to compel the self-incriminating statements is not the same sovereign that may use the self-incriminating statements in a subsequent criminal prosecution. Id. at 673–74.

The circumstances in Balsys, I believe, are inapposite to Snider's case, but the majority's statement of the proposition of law for which Balsys stands also extends more broadly than that case holds. First, the constitutional privilege that Balsys sought to invoke—the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination—was not designed to provide protection in the civil proceedings in which Balsys was then involved, but rather as protection in a possible subsequent criminal action. Here, the constitutional guarantee at issue—the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure—was designed to provide protection in the very proceedings in which that right was allegedly violated. Moreover, although the Korean government is the sovereign that brought the criminal charges against Snider, it is a United States federal agent who initiated the prosecution in the United States by obtaining the allegedly coerced confession which served > as the basis of probable cause for the Korean government's criminal action against Snider to proceed. It is difficult for me to conclude that Balsys means that the Fourth Amendment protection to be free from unreasonable seizure without probable cause does not extend to a United States citizen whose seizure resulted from a coerced confession obtained by a United States federal agent on United States soil merely because a foreign sovereign, not the United States, pursued the criminal action.[149]

Despite engaging in a more thorough analysis of the constitutional dimension of the case and nature of a malicious prosecution action, Judge Stamp nevertheless concluded that the FBI agent was protected by qualified immunity because he did not conceal or misrepresent the facts presented, or bring undue pressure on the intermediary to overbear its judgment.[150] According to Judge Stamp, the FBI agent was entitled to qualified immunity as there was no allegation that he "made false or misleading statements to the prosecutors or the magistrate judge or that [the FBI agent] other-wise brought undue influence to bear on their independent judgment."[151]

Although the Fourth Circuit is not inclined to entertain Bivens actions related to the coercion of confessions resulting in a foreign prosecution and acquittal, it is unclear whether such an action would be sustainable if the relator was not found extraditable at the extradition hearing, in effect had the relator not been extradited to South Korea. Further, neither the majority nor the concurrence focused on the purpose of a Bivens action, namely preventing government officials from engaging in constitutional violations. The majority opinion focused its ruling on the question of a cognizable constitutional violation, and strained not to find one. The concurrence noted the strained nature of the majority's decision, but then ignored the majority's standard for qualified immunity based on the nonexistence of a constitutional violation, focusing instead on the closed circle of government agents interacting with each other. It is hard to claim that the FBI agent's introduction of a potentially coerced statement did not violate the relator's constitutional rights. This is something that would have been appropriate to determine at a trial on the merits as opposed to being placed beyond review by a finding of qualified immunity.

3. Standing and the Firewall between U.S. Judicial Proceedings and Foreign Legal Proceedings

An extension of the rule of non-inquiry[152] precludes a relator from raising before a U.S. court anything pertaining to administrative or legal proceedings occurring in the courts of another state where a U.S. extradition request is pending. The converse is equally true in that the rule of non-inquiry, as applied by a requested a state, would bar its judiciary from examining any claims pertaining to, for example, the validity of an extradition request made by the United States when it is a requesting state. As a result there is a legal firewall between the administrative proceedings of a requesting state and the judicial proceedings of a requested state. Thus, for example, if a

---

149 Id. at 202–206 (Stamp, J. concurring) (footnotes omitted).

150 Judge Frederick Stamp applied the following rule regarding qualified immunity:

> A law enforcement officer who presents all relevant probable cause evidence to a prosecutor, a magistrate, or other intermediary is insulated from a malicious prosecution claim where such intermediary makes an independent decision to pursue prosecution or issue a warrant, thereby breaking the causal chain between the officer's conduct and the prosecution unless the officer concealed or misrepresented facts or brought such undue pressure to bear on the intermediary that the intermediary's independent judgment was overborne. See Rhodes v. Smithers, 939 F. Supp. 1256, 1274 (S.D. W. Va. 1995) (collecting cases), aff'd, 91 F.3d 132 (4th Cir. 1996); see also Taylor v. Meacham, 82 F.3d 1556, 1564 (10th Cir. 1996); Reed v. City of Chicago, 77 F.3d 1049, 1053 (7th Cir. 1996).

Id. at 206.

151 Id.

152 See supra Sec. 1.4.

requesting state seeks the extradition of a person on a certain legal basis that is not permissible under the laws of that state, that claim may be barred by the judiciary of the requested state, much as it would be if the situation was reversed and the United States was the requested state.

This situation arose in the extradition request by the United States to Guatemala for its former president, Alfonso Portillo, who was indicted by the Southern District of New York for a number of crimes relating to money laundering. The U.S. request was based on the U.N. Convention against Corruption,[153] which contains provisions in Articles 23 and 44 that permit state-parties to extradite individuals on the basis of the Convention instead of bilateral treaties. In addition, the Convention provides that the bilateral treaties of state-parties are to be automatically amended to include the crimes contained in the Convention as of its entry into effect in the respective states. The United States relied on the Convention's extradition provisions as a basis for its extradition request to Guatemala, even though the United States and Guatemala did not include the crime of corruption and related crimes, such as money laundering, in their bilateral extradition treaties. The United States ratified the Convention with the reservation that Articles 23 and 44 would not apply. Article 23 of the convention concerns the criminalization of the laundering of the proceeds of crimes, while Article 44 calls for the agreement of extradition treaties.

The United States–Guatemala extradition treaty of 1903, as amended by the bilateral extradition treaty of 1940, does not contain money laundering as an extraditable offense, and therefore the question arose as to whether this was an extraditable offense in accordance with the indictment and subsequent issuance of a warrant for Portillo's arrest. The U.S. extradition request relied on the Convention as if it were applicable under U.S. law, and presumably as if the Convention were a self-executing treaty and applicable not only under U.S. law, but also automatically amending the 1940 bilateral treaty.[154] Portillo's counsel claimed it was not, but that issue could not be adjudicated before Guatemalan courts as the issue had to do with U.S. law. At the same time, Portillo did not have access to a judicial remedy before U.S. courts other than by filing a habeas petition before the court that had issued the arrest warrant on the basis of which the United States filed its extradition request with Guatemala.[155] Portillo was at the time in custody in Guatemala pursuant to the extradition request filed by the United States.

Concerning the issue of standing, Judge Patterson, in an unpublished opinion filed on May 10, 2012, held that Portillo had "not met his burden to establish that the United States is exercising constructive custody over him. Thus, this Court does not have jurisdiction to hear Petitioner's writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241."[156] With respect to Portillo's claim that the U.S. extradition request was misrepresented to the government of Guatemala, Judge Patterson stated that, contrary to Portillo's petition that the U.S. government had falsely sought extradition from Guatemala despite the non-applicability of the provisions of the Corruption Convention due to a U.S. reservation, the United States' "request accurately summarized the applicable treaties and laws authorizing extradition." In holding so, Judge Patterson rejected Portillo's argument that the reservation of the United States to the provision of the Corruption Convention concerning extradition nullified the extradition obligations arising out of Articles 23 and 44 of the Convention.[157]

---

153 United Nations Convention against Corruption, Oct. 31, 2003, 2349 UNTS 41.

154 See Ch. II on self-executing treaties.

155 Portillo then filed such a petition, which though denied on the basis of lack of standing, went into the merits of the argument. The case is on appeal before the Second Circuit as of January 2013.

156 Portillo v. Bharara, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67224, *17 (S.D.N.Y. May 10, 2012).

157 Opinion pages 10–14.

As stated above, Judge Patterson, having found that petitioner Portillo had no standing, nevertheless addressed the substantive issues raised and disposed of them without giving Portillo the opportunity to present evidence or to be afforded the right to have a hearing on the matter. This approach is probably unique in that it holds the petitioner does not have standing, while at the same time addressing the substantive issue raised by the petitioner without an evidentiary hearing. Presumably, however, Judge Patterson's unarticulated premise for ruling on the merits of the issue may have been his reliance on the fact that Portillo's claim raised questions about the integrity of the legal process (the claim of governmental misconduct) on which Portillo's extradition was also based.[158]

The Portillo case is in part about standing, but also in part about how U.S. courts address issues that are usually circumscribed to being raised in the requesting state or the requested state exclusively but not by means of having either one of the two states consider legal issues pertaining to the other state's jurisdiction. In the Portillo case it would be difficult for the Guatemalan courts to consider the legal issues pertaining to U.S. law as they relate to the applicability of national laws, and treaty requirements and their application, as Guatemalan courts do not have the legal qualifications to rule on the laws of another state. Furthermore, such a ruling would violate the sovereign prerogatives of the United States. The same would also apply to U.S. courts, if they were to be presented with issues pertaining to the legal validity of an extradition request under the law of the requested state. States must defer to one another when it comes to the application of their respective laws under the rule of non-inquiry, except where they violate international laws. This is precisely what the rule or non-inquiry is designed to do. Thus, for all practical purposes a legal firewall exists between U.S. legal proceedings and those taking place in a requested state, and vice-versa, except for extraordinary issues that violate international law and the public policy of each of the respective states.

4. Issues of Standing

Even though habeas corpus is the only remedy available in extradition proceedings, it is also only available to those inside the United States who are sought by a foreign government, unless they are constructively held elsewhere pursuant to U.S. authority. A person sought by the United States, and whose extradition proceedings are pending in another state, may not avail him-/herself of judicial remedies in the United States, whether they are in the nature of a habeas corpus or a writ of mandamus. The principle bar to accessing this extraordinary judicial remedy is the petitioner's lack of standing because the petitioner is outside the United States, and therefore outside the jurisdiction of the court before which the petition is presented. The standing argument is well-established in the jurisprudence of the United States, and is on its face justifiable in that a person who is not before the court because he/she is a fugitive cannot avail him-/herself of the court's remedial powers. However, if a person is held outside the jurisdiction of the court pursuant to an order of that court (such as when the court has issued an arrest warrant that is the basis for the detention of that person in another jurisdiction) the person may have standing on the basis of the court's constructive custody. Under that theory, if a person is held in a jurisdiction other than the one that issued a court order for his/her detention, he/she may be deemed to be in the constructive custody of the court or its officers provided that the officers of the court have access to the person and/or the court itself has the ability to issue orders pertaining to his/her custody or his/her movements. This would include, for example, access to such a person held abroad by federal agents or U.S. prosecutors. Another reason could well be to insure against a person being held outside the jurisdiction of a given court precisely for the purpose of denying the person in question access to a judicial remedy before the said court.

158 The matter is presently on appeal before the Second Circuit as of September 2012.

The standing question has been deemed jurisdictional by U.S. courts even though it is by nature procedural because the substance of the question is whether the individual should be physically within the territorial boundaries of the judicial district in which a given court is sitting. If a person is physically held outside the jurisdictional boundaries of the court pursuant to an order issued by the said court, that person is constructively within the court's jurisdiction. Thus, if U.S. agents hold a person, particularly a U.S. citizen, outside the court's jurisdiction, including on foreign territory, for example individuals held by U.S. armed forces in places such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Somalia, Colombia, or others where U.S. forces operate, the individual is within the jurisdiction of the court.[159]

This problem arose in Munaf v. Geren,[160] where two dual citizens (United States and Iraq) were held at separate times and kept in custody in separate military bases in Iraq by the U.S. military.[161] On the military base in question, as well as on other bases in Iraq, the United States enjoyed exclusive jurisdiction.[162] A habeas petition was filed in the U.S. District Court of the District of Colombia, and the case eventually went to the Supreme Court, which held that, notwithstanding the existence of an extradition treaty between the United States and Iraq, the United States had no obligation to adhere to the conditions of the treaty when the persons in question were on Iraqi territory even though they were held by U.S. forces in an area exclusively under U.S. military jurisdiction.[163]

---

159 Irrespective of the international legality and form of these military detentions, unless there is a SOFA agreement regulating the custody and surrender of persons by and from U.S. forces, the U.S. court should have jurisdiction. See Ch. II, Sec. 4.6.1 for an analysis of SOFA agreements.

160 Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674, 684 (2008).

161 Id.

162 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Status of U.S. Forces in Iraq from 2003–2008, 11 Chi. J. Int'l L. 1 (2011).

163 In Muaf the court concluded that:

> The Executive Branch may, of course, decline to surrender a detainee for many reasons, including humanitarian ones. Petitioners here allege only the possibility of mistreatment in a prison facility; this is not a more extreme case in which the Executive has determined that a detainee is likely to be tortured but decides to transfer him anyway. Indeed, the Solicitor General states that it is the policy of the United States not to transfer an individual in circumstances where torture is likely to result. In these cases the United States explains that, although it remains concerned about torture among some sectors of the Iraqi Government, the State Department has determined that the Justice Ministry—the department that would have authority over Munaf and Omar—as well as its prison and detention facilities have " 'generally met internationally accepted standards for basic prisoner needs.' " The Solicitor General explains that such determinations are based on "the Executive's assessment of the foreign country's legal system and . . . the Executive['s] . . . ability to obtain foreign assurances it considers reliable."
>
> The Judiciary is not suited to second-guess such determinations—determinations that would require federal courts to pass judgment on foreign justice systems and undermine the Government's ability to speak with one voice in this area. In contrast, the political branches are well situated to consider sensitive foreign policy issues, such as whether there is a serious prospect of torture at the hands of an ally, and what to do about it if there is. As Judge Brown noted, "we need not assume the political branches are oblivious to these concerns. Indeed, the other branches possess significant diplomatic tools and leverage the judiciary lacks."

Munaf, 553 U.S. at 702 (internal citations omitted). Chief Justice John Roberts, writing for the court, continued:

> this is not an extradition case, but one involving the transfer to a sovereign's authority of an individual captured and already detained in that sovereign's territory. In the extradition context, when a "fugitive criminal" is found within the United States, " 'there is no authority vested in any department of the governmentto seize [him] and surrender him to a foreign power,' " in the absence of a pertinent constitutional or legislative provision. But Omar and Munaf voluntarily traveled to Iraq

The question of challenging government conduct is a persistent problem for targets of executive action, whether in the context of extradition or in criminal matters. Conventionally, in order for an individual to petition the courts, he/she must appear before the court. That option is not available, however, in cases such as Portillo, where the relator could neither petition Guatemalan courts to challenge the U.S. indictment due to the rule of non-inquiry or challenge the charges in the United States as he was in custody in Guatemala and effectively unavailable to appear in court without being extradited and brought before a U.S. court, the exact action he was trying to resist.

More recent cases arise out of the "war on terror." One particularly egregious example is where individuals cannot appear before a court because they are the subjects of extraordinary rendition, and possibly kept in secret detention for extended periods without the protection of the law. In other cases, detainees are denied access to justice on the basis of their designation by the executive as an enemy combatant, as with the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. In others, because of the nature of the conduct threatened by the executive, namely killing the individual, it would be impossible for the targeted individual to actually appear in court without risking exposure to the threatened harm.

In order to understand the difficulties with litigating to preserve fundamental rights it is necessary to step back and consider the legal issues that continually bar litigants from asserting their rights and challenge unlawful conduct by the government. Although the circumstances of each case identified above give rise to particular defenses, the most common response by the government is to challenge the standing of the petitioner to challenge the governmental policy.

Standing is the recognition conferred upon an individual to litigate an issue. It is, as such, a procedural threshold the petitioner needs to overcome and does not require an analysis of the merits of the issue itself.[164] As the Supreme Court enunciated in Warth v. Seldin, "the question of standing is whether the litigant is entitled to have the court decide the merits of the dispute or of particular issues."[165] The question of standing serves as a powerful counterpoint to the review functions of the judiciary when sitting in judgment of a coequal branch of government, and accordingly the Supreme Court has successively limited the courts' jurisdiction to those cases that directly and immediately impact the petitioner's fundamental rights and where judicial action would suitably redress the alleged violation.[166] Where the target of government action is unavailable for various reasons, there is limited recourse through the next-friend doctrine, discussed below, which only provides very limited rights to third parties to vindicate the rights of the unavailable person.

The classic early formulation of the doctrine of standing was articulated in the 1923 case of Frothingham v. Mellon, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the judiciary could not entertain challenges to certain government policies, namely federal taxation, because of the separation-of-powers doctrine.[167] In Frothingham the Supreme Court reasoned that:

> The functions of government under our system are apportioned. To the legislative department has been committed the duty of making laws; to the executive, the duty of executing them; and

---

> and are being held there. They are therefore subject to the territorial jurisdiction of that sovereign, not of the United States. Moreover, as we have explained, the petitioners are being held by the United States, acting as part of MNF–I, at the request of and on behalf of the Iraqi Government. It would be more than odd if the Government had no authority to transfer them to the very sovereign on whose behalf, and within whose territory, they are being detained.

Munaf, 553 U.S. at 704 (internal citations omitted).

164 Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 480 (1923).

165 Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975).

166 Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–561 (1992).

167 Frothingham, 262 U.S. 447.

> to the judiciary the duty of interpreting and applying them in cases properly brought before the courts. The general rule is that neither department may invade the province of the other, and neither may control, direct or restrain the action of the other. We are not now speaking of the merely ministerial duties of officials. We have no power per se to review and annul acts of Congress on the ground that they are unconstitutional. That question may be considered only when the justification for some direct injury suffered or threatened, presenting a justiciable issue, is made to rest upon such an act. Then the power exercised is that of ascertaining and declaring the law applicable to the controversy. It amounts to little more than the negative power to disregard an unconstitutional enactment, which otherwise would stand in the way of the enforcement of a legal right. The party who invokes the power must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid, but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally. If a case for preventive relief be presented, the court enjoins, in effect, not the execution of the statute, but the acts of the official, the statute notwithstanding. Here, the parties plaintiff have no such case. Looking through forms of words to the substance of their complaint, it is merely that officials of the executive department of the government are executing and will execute an act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional, and this we are asked to prevent. To do so would be not to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which plainly we do not possess.[168]

Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that "We have reached the conclusion that the case must be disposed of for want of jurisdiction without considering the merits of the constitutional questions."[169] While Frothingham dealt with a challenge to the Congress's authority to levy taxes, the principle of judicial deference to the legislative and executive branches was forcefully delineated in the decision, laying the groundwork for modern standing jurisprudence.

It is clear that the jurisdiction of the judiciary is limited by the Constitution to "cases and controversies" and the Supreme Court on the basis of the Frothingham decision has slowly shaped "the doctrine of standing . . . to identify those disputes which are appropriately resolved through the judicial process."[170] The unfortunate consequences of this increasingly restrictive interpretation are evident in the Lujan decision considered below, and the eventual treatment of Portillo and "enemy combatants."

In Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, a three-part test was outlined by the Supreme Court to determine "the irreducible constitutional minimum of standing," namely:

> First, the plaintiff must have suffered an "injury in fact"—an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, and (b) "actual or imminent, not 'conjectural' or 'hypothetical.'" Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of—the injury has to be "fairly . . . trace[able] to the challenged action of the defendant, and not . . . th[e] result [of] the independent action of some third party not before the court." Third, it must be "likely," as opposed to merely "speculative," that the injury will be "redressed by a favorable decision."[171]

These three requirements fit together to form a complex and interlocking barrier against the intrusion of litigants on governmental interests, irrespective of and sometimes in opposition to the merits. This is because it is difficult for a plaintiff to assert a claim that meets the requirements in more complex cases, which are paradoxically also the cases in greatest need of resolution because of the fundamental issues at stake.

---

168 Id. at 488–489 (internal citation omitted).

169 Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 480 (emphasis added).

170 Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 154–155 (1990).

171 Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. at 560–561.

The difficulty faced by litigants is heightened by the requirement in the first prong of the Lujan factors that the alleged harm be "concrete and particularized." Although the requirement serves to ensure that the plaintiff has suffered personal harm—both to make certain that judicial decisions remain cases in controversy and not advisory opinions arising out of "generalized grievances," but also in order to ensure that only those best placed to litigate important social issues do so[172]—it has the clear effect of weeding out other possible plaintiffs with a significant interest in addressing a particular issue and the capacity to effectively litigate the case. As a practical matter, standing doctrine has limited litigation in complex cases to a small set of cases where individuals can come before the court and prove a very personal and significant deleterious effect.

Standing is also, because of the nature of the claims at stake—whether criminal, international, social, or environmental—prone to political manipulation by the courts. It is worth noting that the progressive limitation of standing has occurred under conservative courts. Justice John Marshall Harlan II, hardly a liberal, commented that "[C]onstitutional standing [is] . . . a word game played by secret rules."[173] These secret rules function in the modern context to shield the government from litigation that would expose its unlawful conduct, and equally protect the judiciary from having to take a principled position in opposition to the executive and legislative branches.

As mentioned above, there is a limited exception to the orthodox standing requirement, namely the doctrine of the "next friend." The next friend doctrine arose out of habeas corpus cases in which the petitioner was unavailable; the doctrine allowed " 'next friends' to appear in court on behalf of detained prisoners who are unable, usually because of mental incompetence or inaccessibility, to seek relief themselves."[174] The next friend does not him-/herself replace the person whose interests are at stake, but rather "pursues the cause on behalf of the detained person, who remains the real party in interest."[175] Next friend standing is, as the Supreme Court explained in Whitmore, not automatic, but rather requires a showing of a "significant relationship with the real party in interest" and bears the burden of "clearly . . . establishing the propriety of his status, and thereby justify the jurisdiction of the court."[176] Accordingly, the Supreme Court in Whitmore laid out a two-part test for next friend standing, writing that

> First, a "next friend" must provide an adequate explanation—such as inaccessibility, mental incompetence, or other disability—why the real party in interest cannot appear on his own behalf to prosecute the action. Second, the "next friend" must be truly dedicated to the best interests of the person on whose behalf he seeks to litigate . . .[177]

These requirements have become the "firmly rooted prerequisites" to standing for a next friend and constitute a significant barrier to standing. As a practical matter, the courts actively guard

---

172 Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 (1975). In Warth the Supreme Court clearly detailed two requirements for standing:

> First, the Court has held that when the asserted harm is a "generalized grievance" shared in substantially equal measure by all or a large class of citizens, that harm alone normally does not warrant exercise of jurisdiction. Second, even when the plaintiff has alleged injury sufficient to meet the "case or controversy" requirement, this Court has held that the plaintiff generally must assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties.

173 Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 129 (1968) (Harlan, J., dissenting) (describing majority opinion), cited in Steven L. Winter, The Metaphor of Standing and the Problem of Self-Governance, 40 Stan. L.R. 1371, 1372 (1988).

174 Whitmore, 495 U.S. at 162.

175 Id. at 163.

176 Id. at 164.

177 Id. at 163.

against standing for next friends, especially in controversial issues. Since 2001, however, there have been a number of prominent cases allowing for "next friend" standing.

In the case of Rumsfeld v. Padilla, a U.S. citizen, Jose Padilla, was arrested after returning to the United States from abroad on a warrant for being a material witness in connection with the attacks of September 11, 2001. On the basis of an executive order Padilla was declared an "enemy combatant" and removed from a federal prison to a military facility.[178] The Second Circuit granted Padilla's lawyer standing as his next friend, as Padilla had been denied contact with anyone except for military personnel for eighteen months and was denied effective access to the courts, thereafter proceeding to the merits of the case.[179] The Supreme Court did not reverse the Second Circuit finding that Padilla's lawyer qualified as a next friend, but in a dubious decision vacated the lower court's decision on the basis that Padilla's lawyers had improperly identified Donald Rumsfeld, the Secretary of Defense, as the respondent in the habeas corpus petition rather than the commander of the military brig in which Padilla was being held, and that the Southern District of New York, where the petition was filed, did not have jurisdiction over the matter because the brig in question was located in South Carolina.[180] Although the Supreme Court's decision did not affect the next-friend finding, it is significant insofar as it provides a startling example of the lengths to which the judiciary will go to avoid an analysis of the merits that do not favor the government in a particularly difficult case involving the illegal detention of a U.S. citizen in violation of his constitutionally protected rights. One year after the Supreme Court ruling, Padilla was indicted in a civilian court and eventually found guilty and sentenced to sixteen years' imprisonment.

In another, somewhat similar case, the government detained Yaser Hamdi, a U.S. citizen captured in Afghanistan, where he is alleged to have fought against U.S. forces. Hamdi was subsequently removed to Guantanamo Bay before being moved to a military brig in South Carolina. After Hamdi was captured he was held without access to his attorneys and family for several months, during which time his father filed a habeas corpus petition as his son's next friend. Hamdi's father was granted standing as next friend by the district court, a decision that was reversed on appeal. The Supreme Court did not consider the next-friend doctrine significantly before considering the merits, with a plurality eventually holding that the indefinite detention of a U.S. citizen without due process protections violated Hamdi's constitutionally protected rights.[181]

Perhaps the most difficult recent case involved a U.S. citizen named Anwar Al-Aulaqi, who was alleged to have been a Yemen-based member of Al-Qaeda. While in Yemen Al-Aulaqi made numerous inflammatory and strident critiques of the United States, some of which gave justification to violence against U.S. civilians. These comments soon landed him on a target list for killing by U.S. drones operating in the area. It should be noted that Al-Aulaqi was never charged with a crime and no judicial authorization was given for his killing. Indeed, it is unclear that his statements, no matter how inflammatory, could constitute criminal conduct or fall afoul of the First Amendment protection of free speech.

After the determination was made to kill Al-Aulaqi, his father filed suit in the U.S. District Court of the District of Colombia seeking to enjoin the federal government from targeting and killing his son. Al-Aulaqi's father made three arguments,

> First . . . that the United States's alleged policy of authorizing the targeted killing of U.S. citizens, including his son, outside of armed conflict, and "in circumstances in which they do not present concrete, specific, and imminent threats to life or physical safety, and where there are means 178 Padilla v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 426 (2004).

179 Padilla v. Rumsfeld, 352 F.3d 695, 700–703 (2d Cir. 2003), rev'd and remanded on other grounds, 542 U.S. 426 (2004).

180 Padilla, 542 U.S. 426.

181 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004).

> other than lethal force that could reasonably be employed to neutralize any such threat," violates Anwar Al-Aulaqi's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. Second, plaintiff argues that this targeted killing policy violates Anwar Al-Aulaqi's Fifth Amendment right not to be deprived of life without due process of law. Third, plaintiff alleges that the failure to disclose the criteria by which U.S. citizens like Anwar Al-Aulaqi are selected for targeted killing violates those citizens' rights to notice under the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause.[182]

Al-Aulaqi's father sought to gain standing to litigate these issues as "next friend" on the basis that Al-Aulaqi himself was absent and unable to represent himself in court precisely because of the decision made by President Obama to kill him as an enemy combatant. As the petitioner noted, in order for Al-Aulaqi to litigate the issue he would be forced to "surrender" to U.S. forces, thereby affirming the underlying charge that he is an enemy combatant, which goes precisely to the merits of the case.[183] The Al-Aulaqi case presents a conundrum: he could not fight President Obama's decision without surrendering himself and potentially being disappeared for some period of time, during which time he could still be killed, thereby raising a host of other questions about his due process rights. As is clear from the Padilla case, even if U.S. citizens are eventually tried before civilian courts, they can be disappeared for some period.

It should also be noted that Al-Aulaqi's father could not litigate the issue himself as, in the words of the district court, he had "no constitutionally protected interest in maintaining a relationship with his adult child."[184] Accordingly, > no court has held that a parent possesses a constitutionally protected liberty interest in maintaining a relationship with his adult child free from indirect government interference. Rather, all circuits to address the issue "have expressly declined to find a violation of the familial liberty interest" where state action has only an incidental effect on the parent's relationship with his adult child, and "was not aimed specifically at interfering with the relationship."[185]

Although the district court in Al-Aulaqi admitted that the case was complex and posed serious questions, including the legal inconsistency of requiring warrants to wiretap U.S. citizens abroad but not for killing U.S. citizens due to an executive decision, it held that "Before reaching the merits of plaintiff's claims, then, this Court must decide whether plaintiff is the proper person to bring the constitutional and statutory challenges he asserts, and whether plaintiff's challenges, as framed, state claims within the ambit of the Judiciary to resolve."[186]

The court's decision turned largely on the question of whether Al-Aulaqi was truly unavailable. Turning first to the petitioner's claim that requiring Al-Aulaqi to surrender goes to the merits, the court held that:

> Anwar Al-Aulaqi can access the U.S. judicial system by presenting himself in a peaceful manner implies no judgment as to Anwar Al-Aulaqi's status as a potential terrorist. All U.S. citizens may avail themselves of the U.S. judicial system if they present themselves peacefully, and no U.S. citizen may simultaneously avail himself of the U.S. judicial system and evade U.S. law enforcement authorities. Anwar Al-Aulaqi is thus faced with the same choice presented to all U.S. citizens.[187]

The crucial distinction that the court failed to make in this case is that Al-Aulaqi was not a being sought by "law enforcement authorities" but rather by silent aerial drones commanded 182 Al-Aulaqi v. Obama, 727 F. Supp. 2d 1, 14–15 (D.D.C. 2012).

183 Id. at 18.

184 Id. at 33.

185 Id.

186 Id. at 33.

187 Id. at 18–19

by the military, which intend to kill him, and not effectuate arrest as might a police force. The court's suggestion that he could petition U.S. courts telephonically[188] seems equally unlikely, as communicating at length with the United States would likely lead the U.S. military to discover his location.

The court went to great lengths to prove that Al-Aulaqi was available, arguing that it cannot be said that he "is he being held incommunicado against his will," and further that "To the extent that Anwar Al-Aulaqi is currently incommunicado, that is the result of his own choice."[189] The court concluded that Al-Aulaqi's statements and conduct precluded a finding of unavailability, thus fundamentally damaging his father's next-friend claim, and ultimately that even potential future detention, a la Hamdi and Padilla, is not enough to trigger unavailability at present. The court continued:

> Because Anwar Al-Aulaqi has not yet been detained, it is impossible to determine whether the nature of any such hypothetical detention would be more similar to that in Padilla and Hamdi, or to the Guantanamo Bay cases in which detainees have been found capable of bringing suit on their own behalf. Regardless, the mere prospect of future detention is insufficient to warrant a finding that Anwar Al-Aulaqi currently lacks access to the courts.[190]

The court also concluded that it was impossible to determine whether Al-Aulaqi's father was, indeed, acting in his son's best interests on the basis that Al-Aulaqi himself had not availed himself of the protection of the courts and that he had not expressed any interest in doing so, moreover expressing the desire for the government to "come look for me."[191] Ultimately, the court determined that:

> Anwar Al-Aulaqi has neither filed suit on his own behalf nor expressed any desire to do so. Moreover, all available evidence as to Anwar Al-Aulaqi's "intentions and preferences" suggests that if consulted, he would have no desire to use the U.S. judicial system as a means of preventing his alleged targeting by the United States. To allow plaintiff to sue as his son's "next friend" under these circumstances would risk "allow[ing] the adjudication of rights which parties not before the Court may not wish to assert." Because plaintiff cannot show that Anwar Al-Aulaqi lacks access to the courts and that he is acting in Anwar Al-Aulaqi's best interests, plaintiff lacks standing to bring constitutional claims as his son's "next friend."[192]

Eventually Al-Aulaqi was killed in a U.S. drone strike in September 2011.[193]

5. Excessive Delays in Judicial Review

It is beyond doubt that an extradition Hearing is not a mini-trial on the guilt or innocence of the person being sought for surrender. However, as a matter of concern for the rights of a person sought for extradition, as well as to ensure the integrity of the judicial processes of the requesting state, a number of judicial procedures and guarantees have been established by states in accordance with their laws and constitutional requirements. As discussed in Chapter X, the United States requires a number of such formalities, as well as a Hearing during which "probable cause" must be established by the government, all of which is subject to a habeas corpus review at the district court level and petition for review for the denial of the habeas corpus claim, as discussed above.

188 Id. at 19, n.4.

189 Id. at 20–21

190 Id. at 22

191 Id. at 6.

192 Id. at 27–28.

193 Mark Mazzetti, Eric Schmitt & Robert F. Worth, Two-Year Manhunt Led to Killing of Awlaki in Yemen, N.Y. Times, Sept. 30, 2011, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2011/10/01/world/middleeast/anwar-al-awlaki-is-killed-in-yemen.html?pagewanted=all.

Assuming that proper procedures have been followed and substantive rights properly addressed by the judiciary, it is understandably unconscionable that extradition processes can go on for years. This is sometimes due to the fact that the requesting state does not sufficiently cooperate with the United States, by failing to produce the required evidence to make the probable cause finding, by failing to respond to certain administrative and judicial queries, or because of delays or weaknesses in the assurances from the requesting state.[194] That, combined with the relator's ability to secure high caliber counsel who have the ability to raise technical legal issues, can result in substantial delays, especially when the government finds it difficult to address such issues without additional preparation time.

Two prominent examples of such delays are In re Assarsson[195] (decided in the Seventh Circuit, as distinguished from the same case in the Eighth Circuit[196]), and Caltagirone v. Grant,[197] both of which required more than four years before they were finally resolved. In Assarsson the litigation resulted in the relator's extradition to Sweden, and in Caltagirone it resulted in the dismissal of Italy's request due to the subsequent dismissal of the original court ruling for fraudulent bankruptcy.

Delays can also be extensive in extradition cases from European countries to the United States. Extradition from European countries, which are bound by the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) and its additional protocols, often result in delays as relators can proceed before the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) after having exhausted state remedies in the requested state. Frequently, petitions filed before the ECtHR are based on Articles 3 and 6 of the ECHR, which deal with the treatment of offenders. Increasingly cases dealing with extradition to the United States go to the ECtHR due to the potential application of the death penalty, excessive periods of imprisonment, or inhuman conditions of imprisonment.[198] In particular, the latter of these involves extensive periods of solitary confinement and other physical abuses.

On occasion the question arises as to whether assurances offered by the United States to the requested state are sufficient to satisfy that state's obligations under Articles 3 and 6, particularly because experience with the enforcement of these assurances has not always been satisfactory.[199] But never before have there been extradition cases that have involved periods of time ranging from eight to fourteen years, as was recently the case concerning the extradition of five individuals from the United Kingdom to the United States to face various terror-related charges, including most notably an Egyptian-born cleric named Abu Hamza, whose final extradition order was issued by the Queen's Bench Division on May 10, 2012.[200] The five had fought the extradition request by the United States on the basis that the request lacked a sufficient basis to satisfy the requirement of prima facie probable cause, which was required by the Extradition Act of 1989,[201] which was subsequently superseded by the Extradition Act of 2003.[202] The five also argued that the United States would place them in solitary confinement for years, in violation of Articles 3 and 6 of the ECHR, and in 2008 the five petitioned the ECtHR after the

194 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

195 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980). See also Ch. II, Sec. 5.4.3.

196 In re Assarsson, 687 F.2d 1157 (8th Cir. 1982).

197 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980).

198 See Ch. II, Sec. 6.3. Ch. VII, Sec. 6.11 and Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

199 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

200 Abu Hamza et al v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, [2012] EWHC 2736 (admin).

201 Extradition Act, 1989, c. 33 (U.K.).

202 Extradition Act, 2001, c. 41 (U.K.).

case took its full course in the United Kingdom,[203] but the Court rejected their claims in April 2012.[204] Abu Hamza was ultimately extradited on October 6, 2012.[205]

With regards to the concerns of the petitioners, the United States gave assurances that it would neither seek nor apply the death penalty and made representations about U.S. federal prison facilities and programs, all to relieve the concerns of both the United Kingdom and the ECtHR. Irrespective of the merits of these claims and any issues that were raised by the five relators, it is clear that the time involved in reaching a final extradition determination of between eight and fourteen years was unconscionable.

Delays of this sort make extradition unworkable and lead governments to bypass valid judicial processes by following questionable and sometimes illegal methods, including abduction.[206] It is therefore essential to ensure that proper judicial processes are followed, both with respect to their duration and their scope, in order to prevent some countries from resorting to these procedures.

6. Executive Discretion[207]

6.1. General Considerations

Executive discretion is practiced in three different ways. The first is when the government chooses not to proceed with an extradition request, whether for a valid technical reason, such as when it concludes that the information supplied by the requesting state is insufficient, the evidence fails to rise to the level of probable cause, or the request does not satisfy some treaty or statutory requirement, or alternatively for undisclosed political reasons. The second is when the government refuses to carry out the surrender of an individual found extraditable by a judicial determination. The third is when the United States refrains from making an extradition request to another state, or when it unilaterally suspends its extradition practices with another state with which it has an extradition treaty. All three categories may involve valid legal concerns, but also on occasion involve political considerations. These decisions are not judicially reviewable because, pursuant to the Constitution, Article II issues are exclusively within the province of the president.

It should be noted that extradition requests received by the United States can be presented by the requesting state's diplomatic representative to the United States, usually the ambassador, to the Department of State or to the Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs, if the bilateral treaty permits it. It can also be made by the ministry of foreign affairs of the requesting state to the U.S. ambassador in the requesting state, who then transmits the request to the Department of State. A request received by the Department of State is then transmitted to the Department of Justice, which further transmits it to the United States Attorney in whose district the request person is believed to be located.[208] Notwithstanding the ways in which an extradition request is submitted to the United States, executive discretion as described herein is exercised by the secretary of state on behalf of the president.

The power of the president, which is delegated to the secretary of state in matters of extradition, is derived from the Constitution, which authorizes the president to conduct foreign 203 Abu Hamza et al. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, [2012] EWHC 2736 (admin), ¶ 124.

204 Case of Babar Ahmad and Others v. The United Kingdom (app. nos. 24027/07, 11949/08, 36742/08, 66911/09 and 67354/09), Apr. 10, 2012.

205 Abu Hamza Among Five Terror Suspects Extradited to US, BBC, Oct. 6, 2012, available at http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-19853903.

206 See Ch. V.

207 See also Ch. IX, Secs. 1 and 3.

208 See Ch. IV, Sec. 1.

affairs. Thus, a decision to grant extradition after a judicial determination has certified that the relator is extraditable, but subject to certain conditions established by the executive, is entirely within the president's discretion and is not reviewable. Similarly, a decision not to extradite when a judicial determination has certified a person as extraditable is also within the president's unreviewable discretion. The files pertaining to the exercise of such executive discretion are covered by presidential executive privilege,[209] and are neither judicially reviewable nor available to anyone unless the president waives this privilege. No other branch of government can compel the president to exercise executive discretion or to enforce any conditions placed on the extradition.

The executive thus operates at both ends of the extradition process. Initially, it is at the requisition stage; then, after an extradition order is made by the judiciary, the executive can refuse to surrender a relator. Prior to 1871 the function of the secretary of state upon receiving the magistrate's certification was considered purely ministerial. Once the secretary satisfied himself as to the regularity of the proceedings before the magistrate, his duty was to issue the warrant. Thus, in effect, the sole power to commit for extradition or to discharge was vested in the extradition magistrate.[210]

Executive discretion was first exercised in 1871, when the secretary of state surrendered only four out of seven persons awaiting extradition to Great Britain on charges of piracy and assault with intent to commit murder. No reason for the refusal to surrender the other three prisoners was given.[211] The first judicial recognition of this discretion came in In re Stupp,[212] where it was found that the secretary of state had the power to refuse the surrender of the relator. Stupp's extradition to Prussia had been certified to the secretary by the magistrate, although Prussia's jurisdiction over the offense was not territorial but was based on Stupp's Prussian nationality. The secretary refused to issue the warrant on the advice of the Attorney General that the extradition treaty applied only when the alleged offense had occurred within the territory of the requesting country.

On March 19, 1970, the president issued Executive Order No. 11517, whereby the president, pursuant to 3 U.S.C. § 301, designated the secretary of state to issue and sign extradition warrants and to return persons deemed extraditable by the United States. The extent of the secretary of state's discretion is not clear, as both statutes and court judgments are silent as to its limits. Usually, the treaty obligation to extradite is absolute, but the extradition statute might 209 In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1997); Archibal Cox, Executive Privilege, 122 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1383, 1395–1405 (1974). See generally Raoul Berger, Executive Privilege: A Constitutional Myth (1974); Adam C. Breckenridge, The Executive Privilege: Presidential Control over Information (1974); Daniel H. Hoffman, Governmental Secrecy and the Founding Fathers: A Study in Constitutional Controls (1981); Mark J. Rozell, Executive Privilege: The Dilemma of Secrecy and Democratic Accountability (1994).

---

210 In Lobue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D. D.C. 1995) a declaratory judgment was sought in the D.C. district court concerning a case where jurisdiction was in the Northern District of Illinois. The D.C. Circuit vacated the district court's judgment and remanded the case. Lobue v. Christopher, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). See also In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000). The circuit court reviewed several cases on declaratory judgments and the jurisdictional boundaries between such relief and habeas corpus relief in extradition and immigration cases. See Shaughnessey v. Pedriero, 349 U.S. 48 (1955); Brownell v. We Shung, 352 U.S. 180 (1956); Fernandez-Rogue v. Smith, 734 F.2d 576 (11th Cir. 1984); United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1988); cf. Wacker v. Bisson, 348 F.2d 606 (5th Cir. 1965).

211 John B. Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition 363 (Boston, Boston Book Co., 1891).

212 In re Stupp, 23 F. Cas. 296 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1875).

be interpreted to grant the secretary discretion to refuse surrender based on his/her interpretation of the treaty obligation.[213]

Although extradition treaties are considered self-executing, it could be argued that the extradition statute supersedes inconsistent procedural requirements of prior treaties under the rule that procedural treaty provisions and statutes are both equivalent legislation having equal authority.[214] The debate from "the early days of the Republic" centered on this constitutional question.[215] The president conducts foreign affairs, and because the delivery or receipt of a request is to or from another sovereign, it is within the constitutional province of the executive branch. Similarly, the actual delivery of the relator and the conditions of his/her delivery to a foreign sovereign are also within the province of the executive branch as a matter of "foreign affairs" as defined in the Constitution. The executive branch has discretion in surrendering a relator found extraditable, the conditions of his/her surrender, and, to some extent, subsequent treatment.[216] In Koskotas v. Roche the district court outlined the secretary of state's authority, stating that:

> It is not the business of courts to inquire into the motives of a requesting country—a matter which is in the executive's realm of foreign affairs. "[I]t is clear that the Secretary of State has sole discretion to determine whether a request for extradition should be denied because it is a subterfuge made for the purpose of punishing the accused for a political crime." Quinn, 783 F.2d at 789.... Thus, although Koskotas is free to raise Greece's allegedly illicit motives and the physical threat to his life with the Secretary of State, the courts are not the proper forum for consideration of those matters.[217]

United States extradition treaties generally provide that the requesting state must present to the magistrate sufficient evidence of the accused's guilt as would justify the apprehension and commitment of the accused for trial according to the laws of the requested state. It is on this question that the secretary of state's discretion can rely. Even if the extradition magistrate determines that the evidence is sufficient, the secretary can reach a contrary conclusion for different reasons, usually political or humanitarian, and accordingly refuse to extradite the individual. The secretary may also exercise his/her discretion in the refusal to extradite U.S. citizens to a requesting state that refuses to extradite its nationals at the request of the United States.[218] Other grounds of executive discretion include the refusal to extradite for crimes deemed "political offenses" by the secretary, or the deferment of extradition while the relator is undergoing prosecution or is imprisoned in the United States.[219] Finally, because of the rule of non-inquiry, the secretary may use discretion for humanitarian purposes that the judiciary can not.

---

213 See Ch. II.

214 Note, Executive Discretion in Extradition, 62 Colum. L. Rev. 1313, 1316 (1962) [hereinafter Note, Executive Discretion]. See also Tracey Hughes, Extradition Reform: The Role of the Judiciary in Protecting the Rights of a Requested Individual, 9 B.C. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 293, 298–299 (1986).

215 Wacker v. Bisson, 370 F.2d 552 (5th Cir. 1965).

216 See Fong Yue v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893) (relying on a speech made by Chief Justice John Marshall in Congress before his appointment to the Supreme Court). See also Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990). In Ahmad, the court noted that human rights concerns for the treatment of the relator-defendant can justify the executive's denial of an extradition request. Id. See also S. Treaty Doc. No. 100-20, 100th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1988) (stating risk of torture justifies denial of extradition request). See also Koskotas v. Roche, 740 F. Supp. 904, 920 n.29 (D. Mass. 1990).

217 Koskotas, 740 F. Supp. at 916 (emphasis added).

218 See 1976 Digest, Ch. 3, § 85 at 118.

219 Id. See also In re United States (Allen v. Schultz), 713 F.2d 105 (5th Cir. 1983); Moore, supra note 213, at 366.

Despite its discretionary power, the executive has seldom refused to surrender U.S. citizens, and only then when discretion to refuse surrender of nationals was expressly granted by the applicable treaty.[220]

The secretary of state may exercise executive discretion based on technical, humanitarian, or political grounds. Technical grounds can be invoked, for example, as in the case of Abu Eain v. Wilkes,[221] where the almost exclusive basis for probable cause was a confession by a young Palestinian in prison in Israel who subsequently recanted his confession and claimed he had made it under coercion. The confession was also in Hebrew, and it was established before an Israeli court that the prisoner spoke no Hebrew. But because of the wide latitude of judges to admit or deny evidence,[222] the affidavit in which the relator recanted the confession was held inadmissible. In addition, a number of affidavits were presented on behalf of the relator showing that at the time of the crime he was three hours' distance by car away from the scene of the alleged crime—an alibi defense. But that evidence was not admissible, on the grounds that it was exculpatory and not clarifying.[223] Thus, the finding of "probable cause"[224] was predicated on a very questionable confession made under questionable circumstances, and the evidence rebutting the confession was held inadmissible.[225] In this case, the secretary of state had every reason to use executive discretion on the basis of the record and refuse to extradite the nineteen–year-old. However, because the case was so politicized, the secretary decided otherwise and effectuated the extradition.[226]

Political grounds are those most obvious,[227] as are humanitarian considerations.[228] The latter could be based on the same grounds stated in Articles 32 and 33 of the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (amending the 1951 Refugee Convention),[229] the text of which has been embodied in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA)[230] through the enactment of the 1980 Refugee Act.[231] The reason executive discretion is properly applicable in this context is that the issue of political asylum cannot be raised in the context of extradition proceedings, as it is deemed within the province of the executive branch, whereas processes under the INA are deemed administrative matters. The executive can also examine the possible motives behind a request for extradition and consider the fairness of the process awaiting the relator upon his/her return to the requesting state.

The secretary of state can also consider other factors. For example, in Geisser v. United States[232] the Department of Justice made a plea bargain agreement with the relator in order to obtain

---

220 See Note, Executive Discretion, supra note 216, at 1328.

221 Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981).

222 S*ee* Ch. X, Sec. 5.

223 See Ch. X, Sec. 5 on admissibility of evidence.

224 Abu Eain, 641 F.2d at 511.

225 Id. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 (2000); Fed. R. Evid. 1101(d)(3); Fed. R. Crim. P. 54(b).

226 A petition was filed, but the secretary of state did not exercise "executive discretion." However, he attached as a condition to the extradition warrant that a U.S. legal observer sit in on all proceedings to ensure that the relator would have a fair trial. See infra Sec. 3.2.

227 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 on the political offense exception.

228 The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099 (4th Cir. 1977) stated that: "A denial of extradition by the Executive may be appropriate when strong humanitarian grounds are present, but such grounds exist only when it appears that, if extradited, the individual will be persecuted, not prosecuted, or subjected to grave injustice." Id. at 1249. See also Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

229 19 U.S.T. 6223, T.I.A.S. No. 6577.

230 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101–1537 (2011). See Ch. III, Secs. 2 and 5.

231 Pub. L. No. 96-212, 94 Stat. 103 (1981). See also Ch. III, Sec. 5.

232 Geisser v. United States, 513 F.2d 862 (5th Cir. 1975).

vital evidence leading to the conviction of major figures in an international heroin importing conspiracy. In exchange for the information, which the relator could supply, the Department of Justice assured the relator that she would not be deported to Switzerland where she was wanted on a charge of fratricide. At the same time, there was an outstanding warrant and a certificate to the secretary of state for the relator's deportation to Switzerland. Ancillary extradition procedures were brought against the relator by the Swiss government, and an order certifying to the secretary of state her extraditability was granted without the court having any apparent awareness that the relator was involved in a plea bargain with the government. The relator kept her end of the bargain and supplied important information to the government, then began serving her considerably shortened sentence in the United States. Within two years the Swiss inquired into the situation, and the relator was told by the U.S. government that its promise could not be kept and that she would be deported to Switzerland. Much agitated, the relator escaped from the West Virginia prison where she was being held but was eventually recaptured. The court of appeals invoked principles akin to primary jurisdiction as a means to find out what the secretary of state proposed to do.[233] The court vacated and remanded the district court's decision granting extraditability on a technical ground.[234]

Geisser clearly shows that it is necessary for the two branches of government to be aware of what the other is doing in order to avoid such conflicts. But the failings in these cases, rare as they are, rest with the executive branch. In this case, Switzerland may have become the aggrieved party due to a possible executive–political resolution, leading to the embarrassment of the United States.[235]

Purely political decisions involving executive discretion are few and far between. They also go unreported and unnoticed. One case, which is still classified in State Department files, arose in 1968 when executive discretion was granted for a Canadian fugitive who was held extraditable. The relator was reported as the former treasurer of a labor union who had embezzled significant funds from the organization. He was also reported by the media to have contributed $100,000 to the Humphrey for President Campaign; Humphrey was vice-president at the time. The secretary of state exercised executive discretion and refused to extradite the individual, although no reason for the decision was disclosed. Because the file is still classified the full facts are not known, and the information stated above may not be accurate, though surely the classification of this file after exercise of executive discretion is at the least very suspicious.

A question arises as to whether "executive discretion" is a political judgment to be made by the executive branch within the exclusive scope of presidential powers, separate and apart from a judicial determination made with respect to extraditability, or whether it infringes upon judicial determination. Section 3184 uses the term "review" in reference to the secretary of state's post-judicial determination of whether to surrender a person found judicially extraditable. In Ornelas v. Ruiz[236] the Supreme Court held that "the magistrate is to certify his findings on the testimony to the Secretary of State, that the case may be reviewed by the executive department of the government."[237] Quite clearly, such a role by the executive branch violates the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers insofar as it appears to allow the secretary of state to "review" judicial decisions.[238] There is no presidential power that can subject decisions of

233 Id. at 869.

234 Id. at 893.

235 In another matter where the government determined that the defense of "double jeopardy" applied, it denied France's request before going to a hearing. Marian L. Nash, Extradition: U.S –France, 1978 Digest, Ch. 3, § 5, at 410–411; United States Dep't of State File No. P78 0080-1043.

236 Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502 (1896).

237 Id. at 508 (emphasis added).

238 See In re Heilbronn, 11 F. Cas 1025, 1031 (S.D.N.Y. 1854) (No. 6, 323) and In re Stupp, 23 F. Cas. 281 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1873) (No. 13, 562).

Article III Courts to the executive branch. As the Supreme Court held in Plant v. Spendthrift Farm Inc., "Congress cannot vest review of the decisions of Article III Courts in officials of the Executive Branch."[239]

In Lobue v. Christopher the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held the extradition statute to be unconstitutional.[240] The issue in Lobue was not whether the president or his designee, the secretary of state, can exercise executive discretion within the bounds of the treaty and applicable U.S. law, but whether the president or his/her designee, the secretary of state, has the power to "review" a judicial finding that conclusively interprets the law with respect to a given extradition case.

The powers of the president to conduct foreign affairs are separate and apart from the power of the judiciary to determine the extraditability of the requested person. The president, or whomever he/she may delegate in the executive branch, may exercise executive discretion in denying or conditioning a person's surrender so long as the exercise of that power remains within the confines of treaty obligations and relevant U.S. law. It would logically follow from District Court Judge Royce Lamberth's opinion in Lobue that an Article III judge's determination, subject to habeas corpus review, should be considered final and conclusive, and thus presumably binding on the government, but he does not go that far. At present the U.S. government, on behalf of a requesting state, can continuously present new requests for extradition. Judge Lamberth, in Lobue, found the practice of allowing the government to bring multiple extradition requests after the judiciary ruled against extradition to be particularly troublesome. He held:

> The government's contention that extradition judges decisions are final and binding upon the parties is insupportable… [Since] There appears to be no legal limit on the number of times extradition proceedings may be brought against the same individual on the same charges. See Collins, 262 U.S. at 429–430. ("Protection against unjustifiable vexation and harassment incident to repeated arrests for the same alleged crime must ordinarily be sought, not constituitional limitations or treaty provisions, but in a high sense of responsibility on the part of the public officials charged with duties in this connection.") Certainly a prisoner who found himself facing trial in a foreign country following multiple extradition proceedings in this country would dispute the government's contention that the original magistrate's determination of non-extraditability was "binding."[241] The Circuit Court vacated the district Court's judgment on grounds of lack of jurisdiction.[242]

It is clear that the secretary of state's decision is a final decision.[243] Nevertheless, under the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act (FARR Act), the secretary of state's decision

---

239 Plant v. Spendthrift Farm Inc., 115 S. Ct. 1147, 1453 (1995).

240 Lobue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995). The order holding that section unconstitutional was vacated by the D.C. Circuit, April 30, 1996; 82 F. 3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996) Cherry v. Warden, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14828 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 11, 1995); Carreno v. Johnson, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14167 (S.D. Fla. Sep. 22, 1995); In re Extradition of Sutton, 905 F. Supp. 631 (E.D. Mo. Oct. 30, 1995).

241 Lobue, 893 F. Supp at 71. On the non-applicability of res judicata, see inter alia,United States v. Doherty, 186 F. 2d 91 (2d Cir. 1986) and Hooker v. Klein, 573 F. 2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978). See also In re Extradition of Massieu, 897 F. Supp. 176 (D. N.J. 1995); Massieu v. Reno, 915 F. Supp. 681 (D. N.J. 1996), rev'd & remanded 91 F.3d 416 (3d Cir. 1996). See also Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 951 F. Supp. 908 (D. Ariz. 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Seguy v. United States, 329 F. Supp.2d 871 (S.D. Tex. 2004), 329 F. Supp. 2d 880 (S.D. Tex. 2004), habeas corpus denied 329 F. Supp. 883, 889 (S.D. Tex. 2004).

242 Lobue v. Christopher, 82 F. 3d 1081 (D.C. Cir 1996).

243 Lopez Smith v. Hood, 1121 F.3d 1323 (9th Cir. 1997). See also Demjunjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d. 571, 584 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986); Emami v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 834 F.2d. 1444 (9th Cir. 1987); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167, 176 (2d Cir. 1980).

in enforcing the Convention against Torture is subject to review under the Administrative Procedure Act.[244]

A recent example of the complications attaching to executive discretion in extradition cases arises out of a Bolivian extradition request for its former president, Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada, who stands accused of genocide and crimes against humanity for the killing of 67 and injuring of 400 indigenous peoples during confrontations between Bolivian forces and indigenous communities during the so-called "Gas Wars."[245] President Sánchez de Lozada resigned during the conflict and moved to the United States, where he has lived since.[246]

Criminal charges were brought against President Sánchez de Lozada in 2007 and confirmed by the Bolivian Supreme Court in 2007, setting the way for the extradition request.[247] In November 2008, a full five years after the incidents, and nearly two years after the indictment, Bolivia sought the extradition of President Sánchez de Lozada along with Carlos Sánchez Berzaín and Jorge Berindoague, his ministers of defense and energy, from the United States.[248] The Bolivian extradition request was made on the basis of the 1995 treaty between the two countries.[249] It should be noted that in the intervening years Bolivia has prosecuted a number of government and military officials over the killings,[250] marking a significant change in policy after the election of Evo Morales in 2006, especially after the new government was able to force the disclosure of evidence from the Bolivian military.[251]

The United States did not respond to the Bolivian extradition request until September 2012, when U.S. officials communicated to their Bolivian counterparts that the extradition request for President Sánchez de Lozada had been denied. Although it is unclear from the public materials on the matter, there is no evidence that the matter was submitted to a U.S. Attorney, and it appears that the Department of State did not submit the request to the DOJ, on the basis of executive discretion.[252] Although the extradition cases are not forthcoming, civil suits are proceeding against President Sánchez de Lozada under the Alien Tort Statute and the Torture Victim Protection Act.[253]

As stated above, it is understandable that the U.S. government may, and even should, exercise some level of discretion before forwarding the request to the U.S. Attorney who would ultimately have the responsibility of proceeding with the case at the judicial level. But it is clear that this type of discretion can also be used for political purposes. With respect to a former head of state such as Sánchez de Lozada, who was known to have been very closely allied with the United States, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the Office of Legal Advisor in the Department of State found the request to be insufficient and that it failed to meet U.S. standards on 244 See discussion of this issue in Ch. VII, Sec. 8 on the Rule of Non-Inquiry.

---

245 Larry Rohter, Bolivian President Remains Defiant as Protests Intensify, N.Y. Times, Oct. 14, 2003; Larry Rohter, Bolivia's Poor Proclaim Abiding Distrust of Globalization, N.Y. Times, Oct. 17, 2003.

246 Larry Rohter, Bolivian Leader Resigns and His Vice President Steps In, N.Y. Times, Oct. 18, 2003.

247 Jean Friedman-Rudovsky, Bolivia Calls Ex-President to Court, Time, Feb. 6, 2007.

248 Safiya Boucaud, Bolivia Officials Request Extradition of Ex-president from US, Jurist, Nov. 12, 2008, at http://jurist.org/paperchase/2008/11/bolivia-officials-request-extradition.php; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012: Bolivia, at http://www.hrw.org/world-report-2012/bolivia (last visited Aug. 23, 2013).

249 Extradition Treaty with Bolivia, June 27, 1995, U.S.–Bol., KAV 4192, SDoc 104-22.

250 Carlos Quiroga,Bolivia Says Washington Won't Extradite Former Leader, Reuters, Sept. 7, 2012.

251 Amnesty International, Bolivia: Former Officials Convicted over Massacre, Aug. 31, 2008, at https://www.amnesty.org/en/for-media/press-releases/bolivia-former-officials-convicted-over-massacre-2011-08-31.

252 Quiroga,supra note 252.

253 For an overview of the case, see Center for Constitutional Rights, Mamani, et al.v. Sánchez de Lozada/Mamani, et al.v. Sánchez Berzain, http://ccrjustice.org/ourcases/current-cases/mamani-v-sanchez (last visited Aug. 23, 2013).

what is likely to be political grounds. It is also possible that an objective review of the documentation supporting the request, including the charges, could have justified the exercise of discretion in rejecting the Bolivian request, but it seems likely that the United States did not wish to extradite President Sánchez de Lozada and seized upon any basis to avoid having to do so.

What is important to note is that the requesting state does not have any formal recourse when the executive discretion is invoked, leaving it without any formal channels of appeal. The requesting state can retain private counsel and file an extradition request as if it were a private action directly to the relevant court.[254] The requesting state can also attempt to cure the alleged deficiencies with the extradition request, which is not a violation of double jeopardy, but the unwillingness of the U.S. government to agree to the request in the first instance renders it unlikely that the requesting state will do so even after the defects have been remedied.

The converse to the above policy is also true, as the Department of State can exercise its gatekeeper function by electing not to initiate an extradition request transmitted to it by a given state. It can do so either for valid legal or technical reasons, or simply based on its political judgment.

Foreign states have also exercised their executive discretion in refusing to surrender individuals sought for prosecution on political and humanitarian grounds. Perhaps the most important recent example of this is the Pinochet case in the United Kingdom. Augusto Pinochet, the former military dictator of Chile, was arrested in London in October 1998 after a Spanish investigating judge issued an indictment for torture, murder, and enforced disappearances.[255] After a lengthy judicial process, Pinochet was deemed extraditable by the House of Lords for acts of torture that were carried out in Chile during his rule.[256] Despite this ruling, the British Home Secretary, Jack Straw, exercised his discretion and denied the extradition on humanitarian grounds, arguing that Pinochet's declining health rendered him unfit for trial. The decision by Straw to deny Pinochet's extradition was controversial, however, as the findings of the British medical doctors was not as unequivocal as Straw had indicated,[257] and there were doubts by observers over the legitimacy of Straw's determination and over the lack of transparency surrounding the issue.[258] Several groups filed claims before the British High Court,[259] and the Belgian government threatened to take the matter before the International Court of Justice.[260] Ultimately, Pinochet returned to Chile, apparently in good health,[261] where he was eventually deemed fit for trial and indicted on several occasions[262] but died before he could ultimately face trial.

---

254 See Ch. IX, Sec. 1.

255 Pinochet Arrested in London, BBC, Oct. 17, 1998, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/europe/195413.stm.

256 See Ch. VI, Sec. 7.3.7.

257 Antony Barnett, Pinochet: Straw May Have Misled MPs, Guardian, Jan. 15, 2000, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2000/jan/16/pinochet.chile.

258 U.K. Ruling on Pinochet Praised: Straw Urged to Forego Appeal, Human Rights Watch (Feb. 16, 2000), http://www.hrw.org/news/2000/02/15/uk-ruling-pinochet-praised.

259 Jamie Wilson & Ian Black, Amnesty Goes to Court on Pinochet, Guardian, Jan. 25, 2000, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2000/jan/25/pinochet.chile.

260 Belgium Begins Pinochet Challenge, BBC, Jan. 25, 2000, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/politics/618166.stm.

261 Alex Bellos & Jonathan Franklin, Pinochet Receives a Hero's Welcome on His Return, Guardian, Mar. 3, 2000, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2000/mar/04/pinochet.chile1. See also GonzaloCNI, Llegada del General Pinochet (EN VIVO) (XV), YouTube (Feb. 19, 2007), http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gHReUalWqDw.

262 Pinochet "Fit Enough" for Trial, BBC, Jan. 16, 2001, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/americas/1120357.stm; Pinochet Arrest Ordered, BBC, Jan. 30, 2001, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/

More recently, the Biritsh Home Secretary Theresa May exercised her discretion and refused on humanitarian grounds to extradite Gary McKinnon to the United States.[263] McKinnon had hacked into Department of Defense and NASA computers looking for evidence of UFOs.[264] McKinnon, however, suffered from Asperger's syndrome and serious depression, and was considered a suicide risk, which prompted the Home Secretary's decision to deny the extradition on humanitarian grounds.[265] Home Secretary May explained that:

> Mr. McKinnon is accused of serious crimes . . . But there is also no doubt that he is seriously ill. He has Asperger syndrome, and suffers from depressive illness. The legal question before me is now whether the extent of that illness is sufficient to preclude extradition . . . . After careful consideration of all of the relevant material, I have concluded that Mr. McKinnon's extradition would give rise to such a high risk of him ending his life that a decision to extradite would be incompatible with Mr. McKinnon's human rights.[266]

The United States registered its "disappointment" with the decision to deny McKinnon's extradition.[267]

Executive discretion is obviously controversial when it is invoked in certain circumstances and not others. The United Kingdom invoked executive discretion in the Pinochet and McKinnon cases. However, in other situations it has not. For instance, much has been made of the extradition of several Muslims to the United States for computer crimes related to the hosting of Islamicist websites that were hosted on U.S.-based servers. One of the deported individuals also suffers from Asperger's syndrome, as does McKinnon, but no real justification was given for the disparate handling of the situation.[268]

The exercise of executive discretion has also come under criticism by the Ecuadoran government, which accuses the United Kingdom of a double standard for ordering the extradition of Julian Assange, the Wikileaks founder, while simultaneously having denied the extradition of Pinochet. Although Assange was not physically ill as Pinochet was alleged to have been, the selective exercise of discretion is problematic.[269] americas/1142887.stm; Larry Rohter, Chilean Judge Says Pinochet Is Fit for Trial, N.Y. Times, Dec. 14, 2004, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2004/12/14/international/americas/14chile.html; Pascale Bonnefoy, Pinochet Suffers Severe Heart Attack—Americas—International Herald Tribune, N.Y. Times, Nov. 3, 2006, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2006/12/03/world/americas/03iht-pinochet.3763061.html.

---

263 Alan Travis & Owen Bowcott, Gary McKinnon Will Not Be Extradited to US, Theresa May Announces, Guardian, Oct. 16, 2012, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2012/oct/16/gary-mckinnon-not-extradited-may.

264 Id.

265 Id.

266 Alan Cowell & John F. Burns, Britain Refuses to Extradite Computer Hacker Sought in U.S., N.Y. Times, Oct. 16, 2012, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2012/10/17/world/europe/britain-refuses-to-extradite-computer-hacker-sought-in-us.html?_r=0.

267 Id.

268 Gary McKinnon: A Case of Double Standards?, Guardian, Oct. 17, 2012, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/blog/2012/oct/17/gary-mckinnon-case-double-standards; Victoria Brittain, Condemned by the Abu Hamza Stereotype, Guardian, Oct. 4, 2012, available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/2012/oct/04/condemned-abu-hamza-stereotype; Jerome Taylor, Talha Ahsan: Behind Bars for Six Years without Charge and a Family Losing Faith in the Rule of Law, Independent, Sept. 6, 2012, available at http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/talha-ahsan-behind-bars-for-six-years-without-charge-and-a-family-losing-faith-in-the-rule-of-law-8113730.html.

269 Phil Vinter, Ecuador President Says UK Has No Right to Lecture over Assange . . . after Its Failure to Extradite Pinochet a Decade Ago, Daily Mail, Aug. 23, 2012, available at http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2192566/Ecuador-president-says-UK-right-lecture-Julian-Assange.html.

6.2. Conditional Extradition: A Corollary of Executive Discretion

As a corollary to executive discretion, the secretary of state can impose conditions on the surrender of the relator. Such conditions could specifically relate to the principle of specialty,[270] or constitute an extension thereof. An example could be the requirement that the relator be tried before an ordinary tribunal and not by a special or exceptional jurisdiction (e.g., a military tribunal or such tribunals that a state may establish in connection with national security). Other conditions could refer to the return of the relator upon termination of the legal proceedings against him/her in the requesting state, or conditions on the execution of sentences (such as his/her return to the United States for such purposes under the provisions of a treaty on the execution of sentences), or limitations on the type of penalty to be imposed (in some requested states that do not permit the death penalty, the requesting state may be asked to commit itself not to apply that sanction). The relator may petition the secretary of state to place certain conditions on his/her surrender to ensure a fair trial and due process.[271]

Probably the most detailed conditional extradition in contemporary practice is the case of Abu Eain v. Wilkes, which is discussed above.[272] On December 12, 1981 the Department of State issued a "memorandum of decision" in the case of the request by the State of Israel for the extradition of Abu Eain, which it attached to the Department of State's commitment form of the same date. The secretary of state, responding to the concerns raised by the relator, obtained assurances from the government of Israel and stated in the above-mentioned memorandum:

> Concern has been expressed by Abu Eain that he would not receive a fair trial if extradited to Israel. That concern appears to be based in large part on an assumption that he would be tried in a military court for security reasons.
>
> We are now satisfied that this assumption is without basis. We have been formally assured by the Government of Israel that the crimes charged against Abu Eain—murder, attempted murder and causing bodily harm with aggravated intent—are common criminal charges which will be tried in an ordinary civilian court; that the conditions of Abu Eain's confinement pending trial and the place of his detention will be the same as in the case of any other civilian detainee accused of similar crimes; that he will be entitled to a speedy, public trial and to counsel of his choice; that he will be entitled to confidential interviews with his attorney on any workday during regular hours; that he will be entitled to weekly visits with family members and other persons; that normal rules of criminal procedure and evidence will prevail; and that the burden will be on the prosecution to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. If convicted, Abu Eain would have the right to appeal the decision to the Israeli Supreme Court. Finally, the charges against Abu Eain do not subject him to the possibility of the death penalty. Abu Eain has stated that if he "could be assured of a just trial in an open system, he would have nothing to fear." I believe he has those assurances.[273]

The United States has seldom attached conditions to extradition. One would assume that because of the United States' professed attachment to the Rule of Law that it would attach conditions to extradition with respect to a number of foreign states. But unlike states that do not extradite for the death penalty and that attach such conditions to extradition toward the United States, the converse is not true as the United States retains the death penalty.[274] The

---

270 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

271 See supra Secs. 1 and 2.

272 Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

273 Abu Eain, 641 F. 2d at 504.

274 Although the United States would presumably not oppose the extradition of individuals to states retaining the death penalty, it could do so if it deems the manner in which the execution is applied to constitute torture and other forms of inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment, or a form of cruel same is true for extensive periods of incarceration, which the United States also maintains. Consequently there is not very much jurisprudence in the United States on conditional surrender, nor is there much of a diplomatic practice by the Department of State in that area.[275]

One is tempted to conclude, particularly in light of the unlawful and questionable practices of the United States, as evidenced by the practices of kidnapping to secure jurisdiction,[276] "extraordinary rendition,"[277] the failure to respect assurances,[278] and the failure to adhere to the Rule of Specialty[279] that the United States has no interest in the fate of persons it surrenders to other countries. This also explains why the United States has little patience with states that do impose conditions on extradition or request assurances and insist on the application of specialty. In fact, when compared to all European Union states as well as all Latin American states, the United States is unique in the number of cases involving its avoidance or evasion of enforcing conditions attached to extradition from a foreign surrendering state.

and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. If that were the case it could attach a condition concerning the non-applicability of the death penalty if it considers other factors relating to the criminal charges, particularly when the crime for which extradition was granted does not carry the death penalty in the United States.

275 The United States does not even attach conditions with respect to countries that are known or believed to engage in torture, even though the United States is a party to the Convention against Torture.

276 See Ch. V, Sec. 1.

277 See Ch. V, Sec. 4. Also considering that the United States practiced under the Bush administration what it euphemistically called "extraordinary rendition," which entails the kidnapping of persons in foreign countries and their surrender outside any legal process to states that will torture them.

278 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

279 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

Chapter XII

Surrender and Miscellaneous Matters

Contents

1. Surrender of a Person Held Extraditable to a Requesting State[1]

As stated in Chapter I, rendition refers to the process of surrendering a person from one state to another or to an international tribunal, provided it is done in accordance with the legal and

---

1 For examples of treaty provisions on surrender, see Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 11(3), entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16 ("If the extradition has been granted, surrender of the person sought shall take place within such time as may be prescribed by the laws of the Requested State. The competent authorities of the Contracting Parties shall agree on the time and place of the surrender of the person sought. If, however, that person is not removed from the territory of the Requested State within the prescribed time, that person may be set at liberty and the Requested State may subsequently refuse extradition for the same offense"); Bulgarian Extradition Treaty, art. 12, entered into force May 21, 2009, S. TREATY DOC. 110-12; Argentine Extradition Treaty, art. 12, entered into force June 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866; Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 14(2) –(4), entered into force Jan.1, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-50, TIAS 12916; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 13, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 13, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. XI, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 11, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. IX, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 12, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XIII, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023.

Some treaties also provide for the return of a relator to the requested state upon conclusion of criminal proceedings where the relator faces charges or is serving a criminal sentence in the requested state. See administrative requirements of the surrendering state. Rendition is therefore a synonym for extradition. If the rendition bypasses extradition or other legal processes, it is legally questionable although practiced by some states. This form of rendition is still subject to international and regional human rights law norms, however. "Extraordinary rendition" is a term used since 2001 to describe the kidnapping and transfer of individuals by the United States for purposes of interrogation and torture, which is illegal under both international and U.S. law.[2] What this chapter addresses are the modalities by which a state physically or materially transfers a person held in custody to another state that sought and obtained the person's extradition. Some treaties provide for all or some of the modalities of transferring custody or surrendering a person; others provide for it in their national laws.

Title 18 U.S.C. § 3196 provides for the manner in which the secretary of state shall effectuate the surrender of an individual found extraditable after such a judicial determination has been made under § 3194 and appeal under § 3195, or other review proceedings have been completed. The secretary of state has the discretionary power not to surrender an individual otherwise found extraditable or to place conditions on his/her extradition. These conditions may relate to what the relator can be tried for,[3] limits on the penalty, or guarantees at the trial. Section 3196 also clearly states that a U.S. citizen may be surrendered even though the treaty does not specifically authorize such surrender.

Surrender is by the secretary of state through his/her designated agents, who are usually U.S. marshals. The relator is surrendered to an agent of the foreign government in accordance with modalities that the secretary of state determines. However, the surrendering process is not as formal as it appears. In some cases, the U.S. agents will accompany the surrendered person to the surrendering state and transfer custody of the relator in that country. In most cases federal agents, usually U.S. marshals, simply take the relator from the federal detention facility to an airport where he/she is delivered to awaiting foreign law enforcement agents. The relator is then handed off and taken aboard a commercial airliner in the custody of government agents from the requesting state, while the U.S. marshals wait for the airplane's door to be closed and the plane to push off from the gate. As the relator is handed over to foreign law enforcement agents while still on U.S. territory, the question arises as to whether such handing over of a person on U.S. territory is constitutional. Even if the handover is constitutionally valid, U.S. courts continue to have jurisdiction over the relator while he/she is on U.S. territory even if he/she is in the effective custody of foreign agents with the consent of the government.

Because of the informality of this process, it is not uncommon for Assistant United States Attorneys (AUSAs) to urge U.S. marshals to carry out the transfer of a relator within a matter of hours from the time the extradition order was entered. This is done to avoid giving the relator's counsel the time to seek a stay or other judicial orders that would prevent the relator's surrender. Relators are particularly vulnerable to such rapid transfers when defense counsel files a petition for a writ of habeas corpus,[4] but fails to get a stay of execution of the extradition order. As the extradition order is unappealable, it can be carried out at any time after issuance of the Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 9, entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (when preexisting agreement between EU member state and United States lacks similar provision, allowing requested state to surrender the relator with the understanding that he/she will be kept in custody and returned under circumstances and conditions agreed upon by the two states); Peruvian Extradition Treaty, art. X(2), entered into force Aug. 25, 2003, S. TREATY DOC. 107-6; Second Protocol Amending Extradition Treaty with Canada, art. 1, entered into force Apr. 30, 2003, S. TREATY DOC. 107-11 (adding art. 7 bis to earlier treaty); Protocol Amending Extradition Treaty with Mexico, art. 1, entered into force May 25, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 105-46, TIAS 12897 (adding art. 15(2)–(3) to earlier treaty).

---

2 See Ch. V. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010).

3 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

4 See Ch. XI.

order. Habeas corpus is an extraordinary remedy,[5] but the filing of a petition is not equivalent to the issuance of the writ.

For instance, in one case the denial of the petition was handed down by a district court judge of the Southern District of New York a few minutes before 5:00 p.m. on a Friday. At 6:20 p.m., the notice of review of the denial was filed with the Second Circuit, along with a motion for stay of execution. By about 9:00 p.m. when a judge was available to grant the motion for stay, the relator had been taken from New York's Metropolitan Detention Center to Kennedy Airport and was on his way to the requested state. The government acted within the letter of the law, though not within its spirit.

Sometimes, however, as it once occurred in Chicago, an AUSA purposefully evaded a judicial stay. In that case, a U.S. circuit judge issued a stay, which the AUSA evaded by claiming lack of knowledge while ordering U.S. marshals to deliver the relator to foreign agents awaiting at O'Hare airport.[6] The AUSA was later ordered by a panel of three circuit judges to be disciplined.[7] This is the first instance, to the best of this writer's knowledge, in which an AUSA was disciplined for improper conduct in extradition proceedings.[8]

Disciplinary proceedings against offending government lawyers and law enforcement agents are both necessary and proper means to insure that the law is respected. But it does not provide a remedy to the relator who has been delivered to a requested state while his/her habeas corpus petition in the United States is dismissed as moot.

1.1. Concurrent Extradition Requests[9]

The extradition statute does not address the question of how the United States will deal with multiple extradition requests, also referred to as concurrent requests. Concurrent requests are those that are received from two or more states for the same person. Such requests may or may not be related to the same set of facts or crimes. Very likely concurrent requests would be for the same set of facts or crimes, and that is the reason for having more than one state make a request for the same person. This is usually the case with respect to major drug traffickers or persons who engage in ongoing criminal activity of a financial or economic nature that spans

---

5 See Ch. XI.

6 Lindstrom v. Graber, 203 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2000).

7 In re Lightfoot, 217 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2000).

8 Not even the egregious conduct of the Department of Justice Special Investigations office lawyers in the Demjanjuk case resulted in disciplinary proceedings. But they did resign their posts. See Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993).

9 For examples of treaty provisions regarding concurrent extradition requests, see Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 10, entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109- 14 (when the United States or an EU member state receives competing extradition request from the other state and a third country, the requested state shall consider "all relevant factors" when determining which request to honor, including but not limited to "(a) whether the requests were made pursuant to treaty; (b) the places where each of the offenses were committed; (c) the respective interests of the requesting States; (d) the seriousness of the offenses; (e) the nationality of the victim; (f) the possibility of any subsequent extradition between the requesting States; and (g) the chronological order in which the requests were received from the requesting States"); Extradition Treaty with Trinidad and Tobago, art. 12, entered into force Nov. 29, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-21; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 13, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 15, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. XIII, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18; Extradition Treaty with the Uruguay, art. 14, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. X, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 14, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3.

multiple states. Alternatively, it could involve a single event that produces multiple victims, thus prompting different states to seek the extradition of the perpetrator.[10]

A number of bilateral treaties contain specific provisions on the subject of concurrent requests, but most do not. Where a situation arises and the applicable bilateral treaty does not have a provision, the court will resort to customary international law, which will determine priority usually of the basis of jurisdictional theory underlying the competing requests.[11] Customary international law gives precedence to the territorial jurisdiction theory, though the nationality theory may prevail, depending on the nature of the harm done to the victims, or the policy interests of the state of nationality in prosecuting its own nationals.

It is also not unusual for competing extradition claims to be made, particularly by the state of nationality of the person sought by another state whenever political considerations are at stake.[12]

In United States v. Adamov[13] both the United States and Russia, Adamov's country of nationality, requested his extradition from Switzerland. Switzerland eventually granted Adamov's extradition to Russia by a decision of the Swiss Supreme Court on December 22, 2005. The judgement emphasized the priority of the country of nationality in concurrent jurisdiction requests, which in this case was also where the acts sustaining the crimes charged by the United States took place. Unrelated to the issue of concurrent jurisdiction, which had been decided by the Swiss Supreme Court, the United States did not, however, request his extradition from Russia, but an indictment against him was pending in the Western District of Pennsylvania. In an astute procedural move, Adamov waived his appearance in Pennsylvania, thereby allowing the case against him to proceed while he was in custody in Russia. Adamov's goal was to make sure that he would not appear before a U.S. court in connection with a program funded by the United States to improve safety at Russian nuclear facilities. The U.S. indictment charged Adamov, the former Russian Minister of Energy, and other Russian officials with embezzling funds provided by the United States for improvements to nuclear safety.[14] Adamov was tried by a Russian court and sentenced to five-and-a-half years in a penal colony for abuse of office and fraud, but released two months later when a Russian court suspended his sentence.[15]

2. Dissolution of the Extradition Order and Release of the Relator for Failure to Surrender

Section 3188 provides that if the relator has not been surrendered "within two calendar months" from the date of receipt by the secretary of state of the certified copy of the transcript of the 10 For example, in the Pan-Am 103 explosion over Lockerbie, Scotland, both the United States and the United Kingdom sought the extradition of two Libyan citizens from Libya for the commission of the said crime. The matter ultimately went before the International Court of Justice because of the lack of clarity as to whether the duty to prosecute, in this case by the country of origin, Libya, or the duty to extradite, in this case to the United States or United Kingdom. See Ch. I, Sec. 3 (duty to extradite or prosecute).

11 See Ch. VI.

12 Thus, for a period of time between the 1960s and 1980s, the government of Colombia would frequently make a competing extradition request to that of the United States with respect to Colombian nationals who were highly placed in that country's drug cartel.

13 United States v. Adamov, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35408 (W.D. Penn. 2006).

14 Id.

15 Charles Digges, Former Russian Atomic Minister Adamov Sentenced tTo 5 ½ Years in Penal Colony for Fraud and Abuse of Office, Bellona, Feb. 20, 2008, available at http://www.bellona.org/articles/articles_2008/Adamov_sentenced (last visited Sept. 24, 2012); Aleksei Sokovnin, Yevgeny Adamov's Sentence Suspended, Kommersant, Apr. 18, 2008, available at http://dlib.eastview.com/browse/doc/20450033 (last visited Sept. 24, 2012).

proceedings, he/she is entitled to be released by order of a U.S. judge. This statutory time limit does not begin to run until there has been final adjudication of the extradition request.[16] In Duran v. United States the court held that the two–calendar-months' limit laid down in § 3188 begins to run after the final adjudication and certification of extradition.[17]

The language of § 3188 is surprisingly imprecise, even though similar time-marking provisions in the U.S. Code state the exact number of days that constitute the statutory limitation. As a consequence of the "two calendar months" statutory language, courts have calculated the period differently and frequently stretch the number of days beyond the sixty days' benchmark in order to accommodate the government. This practice is permitted under the statutory language, which states that "unless sufficient cause is shown to such judge why such discharge ought not to be ordered." The government, therefore, can show cause why the two– calendar-months' period should be extended.

In In re Barrett[18] the Sixth Circuit considered, first, when the two–calendar-month statutory limitation began to run, and second, whether the relator's filing of a petition for writ of habeas corpus tolled the running of the two calendar months.[19] On the first issue, the court held that the limitation began to run when the magistrate signed the certificate of extradition and order of commitment on January 11, 1978, not on December 15, 1977, as the relator argued, when the relator was first arrested at the request of Canadian authorities. On the second issue, the Sixth Circuit held that the statutory language of "two calendar months" is not "of a mandatory nature," but rather, allows for judicial discretion.[20] Thus, the court held that the district judge did not abuse her statutory discretion by refusing to release the relator from custody, even though the Canadian authorities did not actually take custody of the relator until March 13, 1978, which was two days beyond the two–calendar-months' statutory limitation.[21] In doing so, the Sixth Circuit reasoned that: (1) the delay had not prejudiced the relator; (2) the record did not contain a demand by the relator for a speedy trial; (3) the charge against the relator was serious: "attempted murder and wounding"; (4) the statute did not terminate the requesting state's indictment or bar subsequent refiling of the extradition request; and (5) the relator himself occasioned much of the delay by his petition for writ of habeas corpus.[22]

The statute's "sufficient cause" exception is frequently based on logistical difficulties or material problems in effectuating the transfer of custody from the United States to the requesting state.

Another basis, namely prosecution for criminal charges in the United States, may be sufficient cause for the United States to delay surrender of the relator to the requesting state.[23] In 16 See Liberto v. Emery, 724 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1983) (holding that the two calendar months under § 3188 begins to run after the final adjudication).

---

17 Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622, 627 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

18 In re Barrett, 590 F.2d 624, 625 (6th Cir. 1978).

19 Id.

20 Id. at 626.

21 Id.

22 Id.

23 Hababou v. Albright, 82 F. Supp. 2d 347, 350 (D.N.J. 2000). For treaty provisions allowing surrender to be delayed for completion of a trial or service of a criminal sentence, see Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. XII, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18 ("If the extradition request is granted in the case of a person who is being prosecuted or is serving a sentence in the territory of the Requested State for a different offence, the Requesting State shall, unless its laws otherwise provide, defer the surrender of the person sought until the conclusion of the proceedings against that person or the full execution of any punishment that may be or may have been imposed"); Extradition Treaty with Sri Lanka, art. 13(2), entered into force Jan. 12, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-34; French Extradition Treaty, art. 16(2), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105-13; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 14, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art.

Hababou v. Albright the relator's extradition was certified on April 1, 1999, but on June 18, 1999 he was indicted on twenty-three counts of securities fraud.[24] In response to the relator's August 5, 1999 petition for writ of habeas corpus, the District Court of New Jersey stated that the "United States has demonstrated sufficient cause to delay surrender of petitioner to France for the reason that the United States has a strong interest in prosecuting the complex domestic charges pending against the petitioner."[25]

Similarly, in United States v. Nolan the government deferred the relator's surrender to Costa Rica until the conclusion of U.S. proceedings or full execution of the U.S. sentence imposed at the conclusion of proceedings.[26] The relator's extradition was certified on August 31, 2009, but on October 20, 2009 he was indicted on five counts related to his making and possessing prohibited objects designed to facilitate his escape from the facility where he was detained.[27] The relator argued in his petition for writ of habeas corpus that he faced indefinite custody, in violation of his due process rights.[28] The court reasoned that "the Government's decision to defer Nolan's surrender is allowed under the Extradition Treaty with Costa Rica" and accordingly "does not fault the Government's election to defer surrender as contemplated under the Treaty."[29]

"Sufficient cause" also encompasses delays attributable to pendency of action by the relator. In Jimenez v. United States District Court the relator was committed to government custody on June 16, 1961.[30] After pursuing numerous legal remedies over the next two years, the relator's § 3188 claim came before Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, in chambers, who held that:

> [T]he delays resulted from petitioner's pursuit of legal remedies, not from the dilatory actions of either party to the extradition treaty. The common sense reading of §3188 is that where . . . the accused has instituted and pursued review of his extradition order, the two-month period runs from the time his claims are finally adjudicated, not from the time of the original commitment order he has been challenging.[31]

Thus, the relator cannot him-/herself create delay to defeat the extradition.

Delay in certification does not automatically toll the statute. For example, the Fifth Circuit held in In re United States (Allen v. Schultz[32] that the government's delay in surrendering the

---

12, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 14, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. XI, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 13, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XIV, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023.

24 Hababou, 82 F. Supp. at 348–349.

25 Id. at 350.

26 United States v. Nolan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111299 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 1, 2009).

27 Id. at *1, *4

28 Id. at *4.

29 Id. at *4–*5. The court also referred to Hababou where that court found "sufficient cause to delay surrender where the governing treaty permitted a delay in surrendering until final adjudication of domestic matters." Id. at *5.

30 Jimenez v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 84 S. Ct. 14, 15 (1963) (Goldberg, J., in chambers).

31 Id. at 18. See Beukes v. Pizzi, 888 F. Supp. 465, 469–470 (D.N.Y. 1995). The relator claimed he had been "held in custody pending extradition for 108 days, in excess of the 60 days (or extensions for good cause)" as permitted by § 3188. Id. at 469. Relying on Jimenez, the court held that "any delay in effecting extradition that is attributable to proceedings commenced [by the relator] are (sic) plainly 'sufficient cause' within the meaning of § 3188," and denied the relator's petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Id. at 469–470.

32 In re United States (Allen v. Schultz), 713 F.2d 105, 110 (5th Cir. 1983).

relator to Canadian custody was not the result of government inaction.[33] Rather, the district court "applied its discretion on the basis of misapprehension about the law," because it mistakenly thought it was the government's responsibility to compile the record and send it to the secretary of state for certification.[34] In fact, this duty fell upon the extraditing magistrate.[35] Hence, the delay in certification did not result from government inaction; the government could not deliver the relator to Canadian custody without certification from the secretary of state, who could not certify the relator's extradition without action by the district court.[36] However, the court seemed to have mistakenly understood that the delay in certification was not sufficient cause under § 3188, whereas "sufficient cause" tolls the "two calendar months" period.[37]

At times the ambiguity in the statutory provisions serves a political purpose, such as in the Abu Marzook case.[38] In Abu Marzook the government of Israel failed to take custody within sixty days of the date of the extradition order, and the U.S. government delayed the relator's release for four days under the guise of conducting a deportation hearing, as he was a permanent resident of the United States.[39]

Whenever the delay in surrender is occasioned by reluctance of the requesting state to take custody of the relator, bad faith, or the desire to punish the relator either by the requesting or the requested state, or if it causes harm to the relator, the release should be ordered after the passage of "two calendar months," or sixty days from the date of certification.[40] It should be noted that whether or not the "two calendar months" or the period during which the relator was held in custody during the extradition proceedings qualifies for credit toward a sentence depends on the law of the requesting state.

3. Renewability of Extradition Request[41]

An extradition request that has been denied can be renewed even if there is no new evidence presented in support of the second request. There is no double jeopardy prohibition against such a renewed request, nor is a finding of non-extraditability res judicata as to a second proceeding.[42]

---

33 Id. at 109.

34 Id.

35 Id.

36 Id. at 109–110.

37 In reaching this conclusion, the Fifth Circuit also noted a key requirement of § 3188, which charges the relator with notifying the secretary of state of the intent to file a petition for writ of habeas corpus under § 3188. Id. at 110. In the instant case, affidavits submitted to the Fifth Circuit indicated that the secretary of state did not receive first notice of the relator's intent until more than one week after the district court granted the writ. Id.

38 Marzook v. Christopher, Case No. 96-2841 (2d Cir. 1996).

39 Abu Marzook eventually relinquished his permanent resident status in order to have the right to voluntary departure to Jordan, which had accepted him. Nonetheless, the United States pushed through a deportation order and instead of allowing him to fly a Jordanian commercial aircraft out of New York, flew him to Jordan on an FBI plane, in shackles and cuffs and wearing prison garb, as a form of punishment. Id.

40 See In re Dawson, 101 F. 253 (C.C.N.Y. 1900) (holding that there was not sufficient cause for delayed arrival of officer for requesting state and stating that relator "[had] been imprisoned long enough, awaiting the leisurely movements" of the requesting authorities"). See also McElvy v. Civiletti, 523 F. Supp. 42 (S.D. Fla. 1981) (stating that "where the delay is caused by the requesting nation, a petitioner ought not wallow in jail. He is entitled to immediate release at the conclusion of the two-calendar month period.").

41 See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

42 See Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 932 (1978). See also Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426 (1923); Artukovic v. Rison, 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal. 1986), aff'd, 784

Nevertheless, findings of fact made by one judge cannot be overturned by another judge of the same jurisdiction without the submission of new facts to support a different finding. Were this otherwise federal judges of the same level would be able to sit as appellate judges when reviewing each others' decisions under the guise of renewability.

The rationale for the non-applicability of double jeopardy or res judicata does not derive from statutory authority, but from the determination that extradition is not criminal or civil, but a sui generis judicial category. Presumably this should not authorize the government, acting on behalf of a requesting state, from re-presenting extradition requests for the same person on the basis of the same evidence after a judicial determination of non-extraditability has been made at a hearing under § 3184.[43] But that would imply that the government should have only a single bite at the apple. However, in the absence of a right to appeal, that would be unduly restrictive. A particular prohibition should, however, exist against the government's vexatious acts in bringing multiple requests without new grounds or new evidence, as this violates the integrity of the judicial process that is protected by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. As stated in Chapter XI, Judge Royce Lamberth of the Federal District for the D.C. District held in Lobue v. Christopher:

> The government's contention that extradition judges decisions are final and binding upon the parties is insupportable. . . . [Since] There appears to be no legal limit on the number of times extradition proceedings may be brought against the same individual on the same charges. See Collins, 262 U.S. at 429–430. ("Protection against unjustifiable vexation and harassment incident to repeated arrests for the same alleged crime must ordinarily be sought, not constitutional limitations or treaty provisions, but in a high sense of responsibility on the part of the public officials charged with duties in this connection.") Certainly a prisoner who found himself facing trial in a foreign country following multiple extradition proceedings in this country would dispute the government's contention that the original magistrate's determination of non-extraditability was "binding."[44]

There are many cases that raise the subject of renewed complaints brought by the government, but they have usually been on the basis of new evidence presented by the requested state or on new circumstances. Only one case stands out in the annals of extradition as the most egregious abuse of the questionable practice, namely that of Mario Ruiz Massieu, who was requested by Mexico for alleged intimidation and obstruction of justice.

In Massieu the government presented four complaints in succession, and each one was rejected by the District Court of New Jersey. Four separate judicial proceedings were held before two separate magistrates, and each resulted in a ruling of non-extraditability on the grounds that

---

F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986) (stating prior holding of applicability of political offense exception not bar to subsequent extradition based on separate request), aff'd, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717 (S.D.N.Y. 1963); Ex parte Schorer, 197 F. 67 (C.C.E.D. Wis. 1912); In re Kelly, 26 F. 852 (C.C.D. Minn. 1886).

43 See Artukovic, 628 F. Supp. 1370; United States v. Doherty, 186 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1986). In this case, Artukovic, who was sought by Yugoslavia in 1950, was found non-extraditable in 1954 on grounds that the crimes he committed were of a "political character." Yet Artukovic, as Minister of Interior of the Ustashi Croation government, working with Nazi Germany and its occupation forces, had been alleged in an indictment to have committed the murder of 250,600 civilians. Artukovic v. Boyle, 140 F. Supp. 245, 247 (S.D. Cal. 1956), on remand from 211 F.2d. 565 (9th Cir. 1954), cert. denied, 348 U.S. 818 (1954), appealed from 107 F. Supp. 11 (S.D. Cal. 1952); aff'd sub nom. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), vacated and remanded, 355 U.S. 393 (1958), on remand, United States ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959) (holding lack of probable cause), overruled by Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959)(ruling competence is not relevant or necessary in extradition proceedings). See also Hooker v. Klein, 473 F.2d 1360 (9th Cir. 1978).

44 See Ch. XI.

the complaints failed to establish "probable cause" as required by § 3184. The government, through the Attorney General and the secretary of state, also tried to influence the judicial determination in a blatantly obvious manner. When these attempts were noted in one of the judicial determinations,[45] the government resorted to an abuse of power and abuse of discretion in trying to get Massieu deported, even though he had a valid visa to the United States. The Immigration and Naturalization Service, which was at the time under the Department of Justice,[46] seemed to have already been instructed by Attorney General Janet Reno to deport Massieu to Mexico, irrespective of the requirements of the law. It was indeed a shocking abuse of power by the country's chief law enforcement official. Massieu was, as a result, unlawfully held deportable, and he appealed to the federal district court.[47] At that hearing, the government alleged the untenable proposition that the relevant deportation statute, Title 8, § 241(a)(4)(C)(i), granted the secretary of state "unfettered" discretion in deciding whether an alien whose presence or activities in the United States has seriously adverse consequences on the foreign policy of the United States. Yet, that section of the statute does not give the secretary of state such claimed "unfettered discretion," nor is it constitutionally possible for Congress to fully and completely delegate its legislative powers to the executive branch. As a result, the federal district court held that section of the statute unconstitutional.[48]

Because of the most unusual nature of the case, the federal district court's Opinion and Statement of Facts are quoted extensively:

> Plaintiff, Mario Ruiz Massieu, seeks a permanent injunction enjoining the deportation proceeding instituted against him pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C)(i) and a declaration that the statute, which has not previously been construed in any reported judicial opinion, is unconstitutional. That statute, by its express terms, confers upon a single individual, the Secretary of State, the unfettered and unreviewable discretion to deport any alien lawfully within the United States, not for identified reasons relating to his or her conduct in the United States or elsewhere but, rather, because that person's mere presence here would impact in some unexplained way on the foreign policy interests of the United States. Thus, the statute represents a breathtaking departure both from well established legislative precedent which commands deportation based on adjudications of defined impermissible conduct by the alien in the United States, and from well established precedent with respect to extradition which commands extradition based on

---

45 See In re Extradition of Massieu, 897 F. Supp. 176 (D.N.J. 1995) and Massieu v. Reno, No. Civ. A. 96-104 (MTB), 915 F. Supp. 681 (D.N.J. 1996). It should be noted that after the second hearing the United States Attorney of the District of New Jersey displayed commendable integrity and ethics by withdrawing from the case, which was then taken over by attorneys from the Department of Justice.

46 In 2003 the Immigration and Naturalization Service was renamed United States Citizenship and Immigrations Enforcement, and brought under the umbrella of the Department of Homeland Security.

47 See Chs. III and IV.

48 See Massieu v. Reno, where district Court Judge Maryanne Barry held:

> "Foreign policy" cannot serve as the talisman behind which Congress may abdicate its responsibility to pass only sufficiently clear and definite laws when those laws may be enforced against the individual. See Shahla v INS, 749 U.S. 561, 563 n.2 (9th Cir. 1984) ("the judicial branch may examine whether the political branches have used a foreign policy crisis as an excuse for treating aliens arbitrarily"). Although the executive's discretionary authority over foreign affairs is well established, Congress cannot empower the executive to employ that authority against the individual except through constitutional means. See Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 9 ("the Constitution creates no executive prerogative to dispose of the liberty of the individual. Proceedings against him must be authorized by law. There is no executive discretion to surrender him to a foreign government, unless that discretion is governed by law"). If the Constitution was adopted to protect individuals against anything, it was the abuses made possible through just this type of unbounded executive authority.
>
> Massieu, 915 F. Supp. at 702 (footnote omitted).

adjudications of probable cause to believe that the alien has engaged in defined impermissible conduct elsewhere.

Make no mistake about it. This case is about the Constitution of the United States and the panoply of protections that document provides to the citizens of this country and those non-citizens who are here legally and, thus, here as our guests. And make no mistake about this: Mr. Ruiz Massieu entered this country legally and is not alleged to have committed any act within this country which requires his deportation. Nor, on the state of this record, can it be said that there exists probable cause to believe that Mr. Ruiz Massieu has committed any act outside of this country which warrants his extradition, for the government has failed in four separate proceedings before two Magistrate Judges to establish probable cause. Deportation of Mr. Ruiz Massieu is sought merely because he is here and the Secretary of State and Mexico have decided that he should go back.

The issue before the court is not whether plaintiff has the right to remain in this country beyond the period for which he was lawfully admitted; indeed, as a "non-immigrant visitor" he had only a limited right to remain here but the right to then go on his way to wherever he wished to go. The issue, rather, is whether an alien who is in this country legally can, merely because he is here, have his liberty restrained and be forcibly removed to a specific country in the unfettered discretion of the Secretary of State and without any meaningful opportunity to be heard. The answer is a ringing "no."

The facts of this case read more like a best-selling novel than a typical deportation proceeding. Mario Ruiz Massieu, a citizen of Mexico, is a member of one of Mexico's most influential and politically active families, and, in recent years, has occupied several positions at the upper-most echelons of the Mexican government. For much of the past twenty years, Mr. Ruiz Massieu lived an academic life both as a professor and director of the National University of Mexico. During that time, he authored a number of books on topics such as education, history, law and politics. In 1993, however, Mr. Ruiz Massieu was thrust into the vanguard of Mexican politics as a member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party ("the PRI"), Mexico's only established ruling party. He was appointed Deputy Attorney General in 1993, Under Secretary for the Department of Government in 1994, and Deputy Attorney General, again, in May of 1994.

On September 28, 1994, Mr. Ruiz Massieu's brother, Jose Francisco Ruiz Massieu-Secretary General of the PRI and an outspoken critic of the Mexican political system—was assassinated. Within hours, Mario Ruiz Massieu, as Deputy Attorney General, began an investigation into his brother's murder. In the ensuing weeks, fourteen people were apprehended and indicted as part of a conspiracy uncovered through Mr. Ruiz Massieu's investigatory efforts. Many of the arrested conspirators named Manual Munoz Rocha, a PRI official, as the architect of the conspiracy. Mr. Munoz Rocha, however, was shielded by official immunity, and could not be interviewed by the Attorney General's office in connection with the case. Mr. Ruiz Massieu requested that President Carlos Salinas de Gortari waive Rocha's immunity, a request that the PRI vigorously opposed. Eventually, the immunity was waived, but not before Mr. Munoz Rocha had disappeared. He was never interviewed or arrested, and remains unaccounted for to this day.

Fifty-seven days after his brother's assassination, Mr. Ruiz Massieu resigned as Deputy Attorney General and withdrew his membership in the PRI. In a dramatic and widely publicized speech on November 23, 1994, Mr. Ruiz Massieu announced that he was resigning from both his office and his party because of the PRI's continuous efforts to frustrate his investigation into his brother's murder. Specifically, he alleged that the PRI was obstructing his search for the persons who might have ordered former Deputy Munoz Rocha to act—persons whom Mr. Ruiz Massieu alleged to be very high-ranking members of the PRI.

In February of 1995, Mr. Ruiz Massieu published a book elaborating on the themes of his resignation address entitled Accuse: Denuncia De Un Crimen Politico ("I Accuse: Denunciation of a Political Crime"). Immediately, Mexican authorities alleged that Mr. Ruiz Massieu committed the crimes of intimidation, concealment and "against the administration of justice" (a crime analogous to obstruction of justice in this country) in connection with the investigation of his brother's assassination. Contemporaneously, Mr. Ruiz Massieu claimed that he and his family began to receive both death and kidnapping threats. On March 2, 1995, he appeared for an official interrogation before Mexican authorities concerning the allegations of his criminal activity committed while in office. (See 1/11/96 Bond Memorandum, Fleming Aff. Exh. K.)

Later that same day, Mr. Ruiz Massieu and his family lawfully entered the United States as non-immigrant visitors at Houston, Texas, where they have owned a home since October of 1994. After remaining at their Houston home for the night, the family boarded a plane en route to Spain. When the plane touched down at Newark Airport on March 3, 1995, Mr. Ruiz Massieu was arrested by United States Customs officials, pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 5316, on a charge of reporting only approximately $18,000 of the $44,322 in his possession. The charge was never pursued and was subsequently dismissed at the government's request.

On March 5, 1995, two days after his arrest in Newark, a Mexican court issued an arrest warrant for Mr. Ruiz Massieu charging him with intimidation, concealment, and "against the administration of justice." The following day, at Mexico's request, the United States presented a complaint for Mr. Ruiz Massieu's provisional arrest and sought his extradition to face the charges set forth in the Mexican arrest warrant. On June 9, 1995, a Mexican court consolidated the allegations into a single charge of "against the administration of Justice."

On June 13, 1995, the first extradition proceeding began before Magistrate Judge Ronald J. Hedges. After lengthy hearings at which both the government and Mr. Ruiz Massieu presented documentary evidence and oral testimony, Magistrate Judge Hedges declined to issue a certificate of extraditability. In so doing, he determined that the government had failed to demonstrate even probable cause to believe that Mr. Ruiz Massieu committed the crimes charged. (Tr. of 6/22/95 at 79, Fleming Aff. Exh. A).

Significantly, Magistrate Judge Hedges also found that many of the statements submitted by the government were "incredible and unreliable," id. and might have been altered to remove certain recantations and exculpatory statements. In addition, he found, and the government did not deny, that multiple statements were procured by torture inflicted by the Mexican authorities, including the inculpatory testimony of one of the government's primary affiants. Id. at 73, 79.

The government had lost its case, but not its will. On June 20, 1995, two days before Magistrate Judge Hedges issued his initial opinion, Mexico filed its second request for extradition based on newly filed charges of embezzlement. (Complaint # 6082G-01 filed June 20, 1995). The charges focused on the $9,000,000 in the Houston bank account and 2,500,000 pesos allegedly disbursed without adequate documentation while Mr. Ruiz Massieu was in office. (Opinion of 9/25/95, Fleming Aff. Exh. B.) In an opinion filed September 25, 1995, Magistrate Judge Hedges again declined to issue a certificate of extraditability on the ground that the government had failed to demonstrate probable cause, or present any evidence whatsoever, that the funds had been illegally obtained or disbursed. Id.

Undeterred, on August 31, 1995, the government refiled its initial request for extradition based on the charge of "against the administration of Justice." (Complaint 195-0612G-01 filed August 31, 1995.) Although the government produced nine new statements allegedly incriminating Mr. Ruiz Massieu, Magistrate Judge Hedges remained unpersuaded. By letter opinion dated November 13, 1995, the court again ruled that there was no probable cause to believe that Mr. Ruiz Massieu committed the acts alleged, and dismissed the complaint. (Fleming Aff. Exh. C)

On October 10, 1995, the government instituted yet a fourth extradition proceeding by refiling its prior application based on the previously rejected embezzlement charges. This time, the application was heard before Magistrate Judge Stanley R. Chesler. Both Mr. Massieu and the government admitted new documentary evidence and presented live testimony. Near the end of the hearings, the government produced evidence which "clearly establish(ed)" that 800,000 of the alleged 2.5 million pesos embezzled were not, in fact, proceeds of the alleged embezzlement.

(Transcript of 12/22/95 at 13, Fleming Aff. Exh. D.) Thereafter, the United States Attorney's Office for the District of New Jersey withdrew from further representation of the Mexican government.

With the United States Attorney's Office out of the case, the United States Department of Justice stepped in and continued to press for Mr. Ruiz Massieu's extradition on the embezzlement charges. Like Magistrate Judge Hedges before him, Magistrate Judge Chesler issued a lengthy opinion denying the certification of extraditability. (Transcript of 12/22/95 at 22, Fleming Aff. Exh. D.) Focusing on the government's paucity of evidence, Magistrate Judge Chesler state that "the bottom line is that the government's efforts to establish an inference of criminality on the basis of unexplained wealth fails because it does not rise to the level where any nexus between those funds and the funds which Mr. Massieu is alleged to have embezzled has been established." Id. at 13–14. On January 11, 1996, a Mexican court dismissed the embezzlement charges.

With that, the government seemingly accepted defeat as to Mr. Ruiz Massieu's extraditability. It was then, however, that this case took a turn toward the truly Kafkaesque. On December 22, 1995, immediately after Magistrate Judge Chesler issued his opinion, Mr. Ruiz Massieu was taken into custody by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (the "INS") pursuant to a previously unserved and unannounced detainer dated September 29, 1995. In addition, he was served with an INS Order to Show Cause and Notice of Hearing. The notice advised Mr. Ruiz Massieu that he was ordered to show cause as to why he should not be deported because, [t]he Secretary of State has made a determination that, pursuant to Section 241(a)(4)(C) of the Immigration and Nationality [sic] Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C), there is reasonable ground to believe your presence or activities in United States would have potentially seriously adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States, (Fleming Aff. Exh. H.) No further explanation of the ground for Mr. Ruiz Massieu's alleged deportability was tendered.

Sometime after notice was served on Mr. Ruiz Massieu, the INS produced on October 2, 1995 letter addressed to Attorney General Janet Reno from Secretary of State Warren Christopher. (Fleming Aff. Exh. I.) The letter urged the Attorney General to effect Mr. Ruiz Massieu's "expeditious deportation" "to Mexico" based on the Secretary's conclusion that Mr. Ruiz Massieu's presence in the United States will have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. Id. The letter referenced the "serious allegations" that are pending in Mexico against Mr. Ruiz Massieu and the recent strides that both governments have taken in "our ability to cooperate and confront criminality on both sides of the border." Id. At bottom, the Secretary's request was premised on the proposition that "[o]ur inability to return to Mexico Mr. Ruiz Massieu—a case the Mexican Presidency has told us is of the highest importance—would jeopardize our ability to work with Mexico on law enforcement matters. It might also cause a potentially chilling effect on other issues our two governments are addressing." Id.

The relevant deportation statute, § 241(a)(4)(C)(i) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act ("INA"), provides simply that "[a]n alien whose presence or activities in the United States the Secretary of State has reasonable ground to believe would have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States is deportable." 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C)(i). Because an indication of the Secretary of State's belief is all that the statute by its terms requires, the October 2, 1995 letter, alone, comprised (and remains) the universe of evidence that the INS has offered to support its charge of Mr. Ruiz Massieu's deportability. A master calendar proceeding, the first stage of deportation hearings held pursuant to section 242 of the INA, was scheduled to begin on January 19, 1996. On January 17, 1996, however, Mr. Ruiz Massieu filed a complaint in this court requested that the deportation proceedings be preliminarily and permanently enjoined, and that section 241(a)(4)(C) of the INA be declared unconstitutional.

The complaint contains three core constitutional claims: (1) the deportation proceeding evidences selective enforcement in retaliation for Mr. Ruiz Massieu's exercise of his First Amendment right to criticize the Mexican political system; (2) the deportation proceeding represents a "de facto" extradition and is an attempt to overrule, albeit indirectly, four federal court decisions, in violation of the > separation of powers; and (3) section 241(a)(4)(C)(i) of the INA is unconstitutionally vague, in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The United States Department of Justice, on behalf of all defendants, has responded that section 241(a)(4)(C)(i) withstands constitutional attack both facially and as applied to Mr. Ruiz Massieu. In addition, it has taken the position that this court lacks jurisdiction to hear the case on the grounds that (1) what is at issue is a nonjusticiable political question; (2) Mr. Ruiz Massieu has failed to exhaust his administrative remedies under the INA; and (3) the doctrine of constitutional avoidance counsels against this court reaching the ultimate issues presented in Mr. Ruiz Massieu's complaint.

>
> On January 18, 1996, this court held a hearing on Mr. Ruiz Massieu's motion for a temporary restraining order. At that hearing, this court stayed the deportation proceedings—a stay that remains in force—so that the parties could have adequate time to brief the complex issues raised, and so that this court could consider the issue of its jurisdiction as well as the issues the parties had raised. Having carefully reviewed the parties' submissions, and having held a further hearing, it is clear that the court has jurisdiction and has jurisdiction to decide, as it now does, that § 241(a)(4)(C)(i) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C)(i), is void for vagueness; deprives Mr. Ruiz Massieu, and any other alien similarly situated, of the due process right to a meaningful opportunity to be heard; and is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The remainder of this opinion will be limited strictly to a discussion of jurisdiction and to these three bases for concluding that the statute cannot pass constitutional muster.[49]

In other words, the U.S. government, acting on behalf of a foreign government, can take multiple bites at the apple, and in each case have the same requested person held in custody without bail, save for "exceptional circumstances."[50] In the end, this process of attrition is likely to result in the relator's waiver of extradition, as he/she will often give in and submit voluntarily to surrender, thereby allowing the government to achieve indirectly what it could not achieve otherwise through judicial proceedings.

4. Transit Extradition

The United States does not have transit extradition treaties or specific legislation on point, but on occasion transit extradition provisions are included in extradition treaties.[51] The situation exists whenever a person is on U.S. territory while being transferred from one country to another. In this context, the United States is neither a requesting nor a requested state, and has no involvement in the proceedings. However, if the individual held in custody by foreign agents transits through the United States, there must be some legal authority under which he/she is being detained while on U.S. territory. If this legal authority is absent, the individual in question is detained without legal authority and can file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus requesting his/her release. The government can enter into an ad hoc executive agreement with a foreign state to allow for the transit of detained individuals, and pursuant thereto obtain a warrant from a federal district court. The warrant would be akin to a temporary detention order, but it would have to commit the detainee to the custody of U.S. marshals, as no foreign agent could be given such authority. An analogy can be drawn to interstate rendition where agents of one state are authorized to have custody of a fugitive between the requisitioned state and the requisitioning state. Among the requirements for transit extradition under some of the

---

49 Id. at 686–690.

50 See Ch. IX, Sec. 13.

51 See generally, Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 17, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17 ("(1) Either Contracting State may authorize transportation through its territory of a person surrendered to the other State by a third State. A request for transit shall be made through the diplomatic channel and shall contain a description of the person being transported and a brief statement extradition treaties is that of "double criminality,"[52] but it does not appear to be a conditio sine qua non.[53]

5. Costs

Costs pertaining to extradition are usually borne by the requesting state, but treaties regulate this issue. Section 3195 provides that transportation costs, presumably those of the relator and witnesses, subsistence expenses of the same, and translation costs incurred by the U.S. government with respect to an extradition request shall be borne by the requesting government unless the secretary of state, who has unreviewable discretion, directs otherwise, in which case costs are borne by the United States.

All other costs, such as witnesses and documentation requested by the relator, are borne by him/her.

6. Receipt by the United States of a Person from a Foreign State

Section 3193 provides for the authority of the Attorney General to appoint an agent to receive custody from a foreign government of a person accused of a federal, state, or local offense. Although it would appear that this provision relates to the receipt of a person held extraditable to the United States pursuant to a treaty of extradition and a formal process, it is not so specified. Consequently this provision may appear simply to allow the Attorney General to receive custody of an individual, irrespective of whether it is within or outside the framework of extradition. Presumably the courts, in interpreting this provision, will be guided by the title of the Act and interpret it as meaning that it is receipt of custody of a person held extraditable to the United States. In addition, however, the provision specifically authorizes receipt of custody of a person accused of a federal, state, or local offense on condition that the person shall be returned to the foreign state upon determination of the criminal proceedings held against him/her in the United States, a procedure long advocated by this writer.[54] The purpose here is of the facts of the case. (2) No authorization is required where air transportation is used and no landing is scheduled on the territory of the Contracting State. If an unscheduled landing occurs on the territory of the other Contracting State, transit shall be subject to paragraph (1) of this Article. That Contracting State shall detain the person to be transported until the request for transit is received and the transit is effected, so long as the request is received within 96 hours of the unscheduled landing"). See also Extradition Agreement with the European Union, art. 12(1)–(2), entered into force Feb. 1, 2010, S. TREATY DOC. 109-14 (authorizing transit of fugitive through territory of EU member state or United States in the absence of governing provision in an existing bilateral agreement between an EU member state and the United States); Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, art. 19, entered into force Apr. 26, 2007, S. TREATY DOC. 108-23; Argentine Extradition Treaty, art. 18, entered into force June 15, 2000, S. TREATY DOC. 105-18, TIAS 12866; Korean Extradition Treaty, art. 17, entered into force Dec. 20, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 106-2, TIAS 12962; Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 19, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 18, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 19, entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. XV, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 17, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16; Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 17, entered into force Apr. 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XIX, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023.

---

52 See Ch. VII, Secs. 2.

53 See Treaty between the United States and Great Britain Concerning Reciprocal Rights for United States and Canada in the Conveyance of Prisoners and Wrecking and Salvage, 35 Stat. 2035, t.s. No. 502 (1908); 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 1078–1080 (1963). Article I of the treaty provides that an officer conveying a prisoner through the United States has the right to "keep such person in his custody, and in case of escape [may] recapture him" provided the offense is authorized by extradition treaty.

54 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, 74 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 277 (1980).

clearly to allow a person who is in the custody of a foreign government to be brought to the United States for trial and to be returned to the foreign government for his/her detention there, thereby avoiding the need to await his/her release from detention by that government before commencing criminal proceedings against him/her in the United States. This will assist prosecutions in the United States that might otherwise become stale if the individual is permitted to await determination of his/her sentence in the foreign state before his/her return to the United States to face criminal charges. Regrettably, there is no reverse provision that permits the extradition of a person from the United States to a foreign government for the same purpose, though nothing under § 3193 precludes the conditional surrender of a person to a requesting state after an order of extraditability for purposes limited to his/her trial in that country and for his/her return thereafter to the United States for the execution of his/her sentence.

Although not falling under § 3193, a case arose where a relator was extradited to Italy where he was tried and sentenced. In Venetucci v. United States Department of State the relator was transferred to the United States eleven years later at his request after he agreed that "any legal proceeding challenging his conviction or sentence by the Italian sovereign would be brought in Italy."[55] Instead of challenging his sentence directly, the relator challenged the Department of State's ability to consent to his Italian trial on additional charges without first conducting an extradition hearing on those additional charges.[56] The relator requested an order canceling the consent and voiding his life sentence, thereby requiring his release from prison.[57] The district court concluded that under U.S. law, it was divested of subject matter jurisdiction over this suit and dismissed the complaint.[58]

Finally, it should be noted that there are some treaty provisions that permit the transfer of evidence even if the fugitive becomes unavailable for extradition.[59]

---

55 Venetucci v. U.S. Dep't of State, 593 F.Supp. 2d 12 (D.D.C. 2008).

56 Id. at 12–13.

57 Id. at 13.

58 Id. at 14. The relevant U.S. statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3244, states as follows:

> When a treaty is in effect between the United States and a foreign country providing for the transfer of convicted offenders—(1) the country in which the offender was convicted shall have exclusive jurisdiction and competence over proceedings seeking to challenge, modify, or set aside convictions or sentences handed down by a court of such country.

59 See generally clauses providing that:

> All articles, instruments, objects of value, documents, and other evidence relating to the offense may be seized and, upon granting of extradition, surrendered to the requesting State. The property mentioned in this Article may be surrendered even when extradition cannot be granted or effected due to the death, disappearance, or escape of the person sought. The rights of third parties in such property shall be duly respected.

Costa Rican Extradition Treaty, art. 18, entered into force Oct. 11, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-17. See also Bulgarian Extradition Treaty, art. 15, entered into force May 21, 2009, S. TREATY DOC. 110-12; South African Extradition Treaty, art.16, entered into force June 25, 2001, S. TREATY DOC. 106-24; Extradition Treaty with Trinidad and Tobago, art. 13, entered into force Nov. 29, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105-21; Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 15, entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104-3; Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 16(1), entered into force Mar. 18, 1997, S. TREATY DOC. 104-5; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 16, entered into force Sept. 22, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 102-17; Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. XIV, entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104-22; Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 16, entered into force April 11, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3197; Italian Extradition Treaty, art. XVIII, entered into force Sept. 24, 1984, 35 U.S.T. 3023; Jamaican Extradition Treaty, art. XVI, entered into force July 7, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-18; Extradition Treaty with Thailand, art. 16, entered into force May 17, 1991, S. TREATY DOC. 98-16. See also Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 17, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, Mar. 17, 2010, available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (last visited Sept. 16, 2011).

Appendix I

Multilateral Conventions Containing Provisions on Extradition

A. Prohibition against War

1. Treaty of Peace Between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany [Treaty of Versailles], June 28, 1919, T.S. No. 4, 11 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 323, entered into force January 10, 1920.

Article 227	(duty to prosecute and hand over Kaiser)
Article 228	(duty to prosecute and hand over alleged war criminals)

2. Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis [London Charter], August 8, 1945, 59 Stat. 1544, 82 U.N.T.S. 279, 3 Bevans 1238, entered into force August 8, 1945; (with respect to the United States) August 8, 1945.

Article 6, 14, 15	(right to prosecute war criminals)
Article 3 (agreement)	(duty to cooperate in investigation and prosecution of alleged war criminals)

3. Charter of the International Military Tribunal: Far East, January 19, 1946, T.I.A.S. No. 1589, 4 Bevans 20.

Article 1	(duty to prosecute major war criminals in the Far East)

B. Prohibition of Certain Means and Methods in the Conduct of War (Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict)

1. Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armies in the Field (Second Red Cross Convention), July 6, 1906, 35 Stat. 1885, T.S. No. 464, 2 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 620.

Articles 27, 28	(duty to criminalize)

2. Convention for the Adaptation to Maritime Warfare of the Principles of the Geneva Convention, (Hague, X), October 18, 1907, 36 Stat. 2371, T.S. No. 543, 3 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 630.

Article 21	(duty to criminalize)

3. Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick of Armies in the Field, July 27,1929, 47 Stat. 2074, T.S. No. 847, 118 L.N.T.S. 303

Articles 29, 30	(duty to criminalize)

4. Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in the Armed Forces in the Field, August 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3114, T.I.A.S. No. 3362, 75 U.N.T.S. 31 [Geneva Convention I]

Article 49 (duty to search for and prosecute)

5. Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, August 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3217, T.I.A.S. No. 3363, 75 U.N.T.S. 85 [Geneva Convention II]

Article 50 (duty to search for and prosecute)

6. Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, August 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, T.I.A.S. No. 3364, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 [Geneva Convention III]

Article 129 (duty to search for and prosecute)

7. Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, August 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3516, T.I.A.S. No. 3365, 75 U.N.T.S. 287 [Geneva Convention IV]

Article 146 (duty to search for and prosecute)

8. Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts of June 8, 1977 [1977 Protocol I], opened for signature December 12, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144 (1977) Annex I, referenced in 16 I.L.M. 1391, entered into force December 17, 1978.

Article 88 (duty to cooperate with other states in prosecution and extradition)

9. Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts [1977 Protocol II], opened for signature December 12, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144 (1977) Annex II, referenced in 16 I.L.M. 1391, entered into force December 17, 1978.

Article 6 (prosecution and punishment of criminal offenses related to the armed conflict)

10. Convention for the Prohibition of the Development, Production, and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, April 10, 1972, 26 U.S.T. 583, 1015 U.N.T.S. 163, 11 I.L.M. 309, entered into force March 26, 1975; (with respect to the United States) March 26, 1975

Articles IV, IX (duty to prohibit and prevent)

C. Prohibition of Emplacement of Weapons in Certain Areas

1. Treaty Banning Nuclear Weapon Tests in the Atmosphere, in Outer Space, and Under Water, August 5, 1963, 14 U.S.T. 1313, 480 U.N.T.S. 43, 2 I.L.M. 883, entered into force October 10, 1963.

Article I (duty to prevent and prohibit)

D. Prohibition against Genocide

1. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, December 9, 1948, 78 U.N.T.S. 277, 28 I.L.M. 763, entered into force January 12, 1951; (with respect to the United States) February 23, 1989.

Article I	(recognition as international crime; duty to prevent and punish)
Article IV	(duty to criminalize)
Article IV	(duty to punish)
Article VII	(duty to extradite; duty not to apply political offense exception)

2. Statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, May 25, 1993, S.C. Res. 827, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., at 1-2, U.N. Doc. S/RES/827 (1993), 32 I.L.M. 1159.

Article 29	(state cooperation in surrendering or transferring an accused individual to the tribunal)

3. Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, November 8, 1994, S.C. Res. 955, U.N. SCOR, 49th Sess., 3453rd mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994), 33 I.L.M. 1598.

Article 28	(state cooperation in surrendering or transferring an accused individual to the tribunal)

4. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 3 (entered into force July 1, 2002).

Article 89	(surrender of persons to the Court)
Article 90	(competing requests for surrender of persons)

E. Prohibition against Apartheid

1. International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, opened for signature November 30, 1973, U.N.G.A. Res. 3068 (WWVIII), U.N. GAOR 28th Sess., Supp. No. 30, at 75, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1973), 13 I.L.M. 50, 1015 U.N.T.S. 243, entered into force July 18, 1976; (with respect to the United States) October 21, 1994.

Article IV	(duty to suppress and criminalize)
Article IV	(duty to prosecute)
Article XI	(duty to extradite; duty not to apply political offense exception)

F. Prohibition against Torture

1. Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, December 7, 1984, G.A. Res. 39/46 Annex, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1984/72, Annex (1984), reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984)

Article VII	(duty to prosecute)
Article VIII	(duty to extradite)

2. Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture, December 9, 1985, AG/Res. 783 (XV-0/85), O.A.S. General Assembly, 15th Sess. IEA/Ser.P. AG/Doc. 22023/85 rev. 1 at 46-54 (1986), O.A.S. Treaty Series, No. 67, 25 I.L.M. 519, entered into force February 28, 1987.

Article I	(duty to prevent and punish)
Article XI	(duty to extradite)

G. Prohibition against Slavery and Slave-Related Practices

1. Treaty for the Suppression of the African Slave Trade [Treaty of London], December 20, 1841, 2 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 1) 392, entered into force December 20, 1841.

Article X	(duty to prosecute and punish)

2. Treaty between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the Suppression of the African Slave Trade, April 7, 1862, U.S.–U.K., 12 Stat. 1225 [Treaty of Washington]; Supplemented by Additional Article, February 27, 1863, 13 Stat. 645. Modified by Additional Convention, June 3, 1870, 16 Stat. 777

Article II	(duty to prosecute)
Article IX	(duty to "transfer")

3. Convention Relative to the Slave Trade and Importation into Africa of Firearms, Ammunition, and Spirituous Liquors [General Act of Brussels], July 2, 1890, 27 Stat. 886, 17 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2d) 345, entered into force August 31, 1891; (with respect to the United States) April 2, 1892.

Article V	(duty to punish, prosecute, and return)

4. International Convention for the Suppression of White Slave Traffic, May 4, 1910, 7 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 252, entered into force August 8, 1912.

Articles 1, 2	(duty to punish)
Article 3	(duty to criminalize)
Article 5	(duty to extradite)
Articles 4, 6	(duty to cooperate in prosecution)

5. Protocol Amending the International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, signed at Paris on May 18, 1904, and the International Convention for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, signed at Paris on May 4, 1910, May 4, 1949, 2 U.S.T. 1997, 30 U.N.T.S. 23, protocol entered into force May 4, 1949, annex in respect of agreement of 1904 entered into force June 21, 1951, annex in respect of agreement of 1910 entered into force August 14, 1951; protocol entered into force (with respect to the United States) August 14, 1950, annex in respect of agreement of 1904 entered into force (with respect to the United States) June 21, 1951, annex in respect of agreement of 1910 entered into force (with respect to the United States) August 14, 1951.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

6. Annex to the Protocol Amending the Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, May 18, 1904, and the International Convention for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, May 4, 1910, May 4, 1949.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

7. International Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women and Children, September 30, 1921, 9 L.N.T.S. 415, 1 Hudson 609, entered into force March 9, 1927; (with respect to the United States) March 21, 1929.

Article 2	(duty to prosecute)
Article 3	(duty to punish)
Article 4	(duty to extradite)

8. Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, concluded at Geneva on September 30, 1921, and the Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women of Full Age, concluded at Geneva on October 11, 1933, November 12, 1947, 53 U.N.T.S. 13, entered into force November 12, 1947.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

9. Annex to the Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, concluded at Geneva on September 30, 1921, and the Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women of Full Age, concluded at Geneva on October 11, 1933.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

10. Slavery Convention, September 25, 1926, 46 Stat. 2183, 60 L.N.T.S. 253, 19 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3) 303, entered into force March 9, 1927; (with respect to the United States) March 21, 1929.

Article 2	(duty to prevent and suppress)
Article 4	(duty to criminalize)
Article 6	(duty to punish)

11. Protocol Amending the Slavery Convention, September 25, 1926, December 7, 1953, 7 U.S.T. 479, 182 U.N.T.S. 51, entered into force December 7, 1953; entered into force (with respect to the United States) March 16, 1956.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

12. Annex to the Protocol Amending the Slavery Convention, September 25, 1926.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

13. Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour [Forced Labour Convention, 1930], June 28, 1930, 39 L.N.T.S. 55, 5 Hudson 609, entered into force May 1, 1932.

Article 1	(duty to suppress)
Article 25	(duty to prosecute and punish)

14. International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women of Full Age, October 11, 1933, 150 L.N.T.S. 431, 6 Hudson 469, entered into force August 24, 1934.

Article 1	(duty to punish)
Article 2	(duty to criminalize)
Article 3	(duty to cooperate in suppression)

15. Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, opened for signature March 21, 1950, 96 U.N.T.S. 271, entered into force July 25, 1951.

Articles 1, 2, 3, 4	(duty to punish)
Article 6	(duty to criminalize)
Article 8	(duty to extradite)
Article 9	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)

16. Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery, September 7, 1956, 18 U.S.T. 3201, 266 U.N.T.S. 3, entered into force April 10, 1957; (with respect to the United States) December 6, 1967.

Article 1	(duty to abolish)
Articles 3, 5, 6	(duty to criminalize and punish)
Article 8	(duty to cooperate in prosecution)

17. Convention (No. 105) Concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour, June 25, 1957, 320 U.N.T.S. 291, entered into force January 17, 1959.

Article 1	(duty to suppress)

18. Convention on the High Seas [Geneva Convention on the Law of the Sea], April 29, 1958, 13 U.S.T. 2312, T.I.A.S. No. 5200, 450 U.N.T.S. 82, entered into force September 30, 1962.

Article 13	(duty to prevent and punish)

19. Convention on the Law of the Sea [Montego Bay Convention], opened for signature December 10, 1982, 516 U.N.T.S. 205, 21 I.L.M. 1261, entered into force November 16, 1994.

Article 99	(duty to prevent and punish)

20. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, January 8, 2001, G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/25. (See also listing for Organized Crime.)

Article 5	(duty to criminalize)

H. Prohibition against Piracy

1. The Nyon Arrangement, September 14, 1937, 181 L.N.T.S. 135, 34 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3) 666, entered into force September 14, 1937.

Article 1	(duty to extradite)
Article 2	(exceptions to the obligation to extradite)
Articles 3, 4	(refusal of extradition)
Article 9	(request for extradition by more than one state)

2. Agreement Supplementary to the Nyon Arrangement, September 17, 1937, 181 L.N.T.S. 149, 34 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3) 676, entered into force September 17, 1937.

3. Convention on the High Seas [Geneva Convention on the Law of the Sea], April 29, 1958, 1 U.S.T. 2312, T.I.A.S. No. 5200, 450 U.N.T.S. 82, entered into force September 30, 1962.

Article 13	(duty to punish)

4. Convention on the Law of the Sea [Montego Bay Convention], opened for signature December 10, 1982, 516 U.N.T.S. 205, 21 I.L.M. 1261, entered into force November 16, 1994.

Article 100	(duty to cooperate to repress piracy)

I. Prohibition against Aircraft Hijacking and Unlawful Acts against International Air Safety

1. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft [Hague Hijacking Convention], December 16, 1970, 22 U.S.T. 1641, 860 U.N.T.S. 105, 10 I.L.M. 133, entered into force October 14, 1971.

Article II	(duty to punish)
Article VII	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)
Article VIII	(duty to extradite)
Article X	(duty to cooperate in prosecution)

2. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation [Montreal Hijacking Convention], September 23, 1971, 24 U.S.T. 564, 974 U.N.T.S. 177, 10 I.L.M. 1151, entered into force January 26, 1973.

Article 3	(duty to punish)
Article 7	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)
Article 8	(duty to extradite)
Article 11	(duty to cooperate in prosecution)

3. Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation, adopted by the International Civil Aviation Organization, February 24, 1988, S. Treaty Documents 100-19, 27 I.L.M. 627 (1988).

Article 3	(duty to punish if not extradited)

J. Protection of the Safety of Persons

1. Convention to Prevent and Punish the Acts of Terrorism Taking the Form of Crimes Against Persons and Related Extortion That Are of International Significance (Inter-American), signed February 2, 1971, O.A.S. Doc. A6/Doc.88 rev.1, corr.1, 27 U.S.T. 3949, T.I.A.S. No. 8413, 10 I.L.M. 255, entered into force (with respect to the United States) October 20, 1976.

Article 1	(duty to prevent and punish)
Articles 3, 7	(duty to extradite)
Article 5	(duty to prosecute if not extradite)
Article 8	(duty to criminalize)

2. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents [New York Convention], opened for signature December 14, 1973, U.N.G.A. Res. 3166 (XXVIII), 28 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 30), at 146, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1974), 28 U.S.T. 1975, 1035 U.N.T.S. 167, T.I.A.S. 8532, 13 I.L.M. 41, entered into force February 20, 1977.

Article 4	(duty to prevent)
Article 6	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 7	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)
Article 8	(duty to extradite)

3. International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, December 17, 1979, U.N.G.A. Res. 34/146 (XXXIV), 34 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 46), at 245, U.N.Doc. A/34/46 (1979), TIAS No. 11081, 18 I.L.M. 1456, entered into force June 3, 1983; entered into force with respect to the United States January 6, 1985.

Article 2	(duty to punish)
Article 7	(duty to prosecute)
Article 8	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)
Articles 9, 10	(duty to extradite)

K. Prohibition against the Unlawful Use of the Mails and Internet

1. Treaty on the Creation of a Universal Postal Union, October 9, 1874, 1 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2d) 651.

Article 11	(duty to prohibit)

2. Universal Postal Union Convention, May 26, 1906, 35 Stat. 1639, 1 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 355

Article XVI	(duty to prohibit)
Article XVIII	(duty to criminalize)

3. Universal Postal Union Convention (Berne Convention), July 11, 1952, 4 U.S.T. 1118, T.I.A.S. No. 2800, 169 U.N.T.S. 3.

Article 59	(duty to prohibit)

4. Agreement Concerning Insured Letters and Boxes, July 11, 1952, 170 U.N.T.S. 3.

Article 5	(duty to prohibit)

5. Council of Europe, Convention on Cybercrime, ETS No. 185, November 23, 2001, United States signed on November 23, 2001.

Article 24	(duty to extradite)

6. Council of Europe, Protocol on the Criminalization of Acts of a Racist and Xenophobic Nature Committed Through Computer Systems, ETS No. 189, signed January 28, 2003 [Protocol to Cybercrime Convention].

L. General Conventions against Terrorism

1. Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism, November 16, 1937, 19 League of Nations O.J. 23 (1938).

Articles 2, 3	(duty to criminalize)
Article 8	(duty to extradite)
Articles 9, 10, 11	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)

2. Organization of American States, Convention to Prevent and Punish Acts of Terrorism Taking the Form of Crimes Against Persons and Related Extortion that are of International Significance, February 2, 1971, O.A.S. Doc. A/6/Doc. 88 rev.1, corr.1, 27 U.S.T. 3949, 10 I.L.M. 255.

Articles 3, 7	(duty to extradite)

Article 5	(duty to prosecute)

3. Council of Europe, European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, January 27, 1977, E.T.S. No. 90, 15 I.L.M. 1272, entered into force August 4, 1978.

Articles 1, 2	(duty not to apply political offense exception)
Articles 3, 4	(duty to extradite)
Article 5	(no duty to extradite if based on discrimination)
Article 6	(duty to establish jurisdiction)
Article 7	(duty to prosecute)

4. The South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation: Convention on Suppression of Terrorism, November 4, 1987, reprinted in U.N. Doc. A/51/136.

Articles 1, 2	(duty not to apply political offense exception)
Article 3	(duty to extradite)
Article 4	(duty to prosecute)
Article 6	(duty to ensure presence for purposes of extradition or prosecution)

5. The League of Arab States, The Council of Arab Interior and Justice Ministers, The Arab Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Issued by the Councils of Arab Ministers of Interior Justice, April 22, 1998

Articles 3, 5, 8	(duty to extradite)
Articles 6, 7	(exceptions to extradition)
Articles 13, 14, 15, 16	(duty to prosecute)

6. The Commonwealth of Independent States, Treaty on Cooperation among the States Members of the Commonwealth of Independent States in Combating Terrorism, June 4, 1999.

7. Organization of African Unity, Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism, OAU Doc. AHG/Dec. 132 (XXXV), July 14, 1999.

Articles 8, 9	(duty to extradite)

8. Organization of the Islamic Conference, Convention of the Organization of the Islamic Conference on Combating International Terrorism, October 11, 2000, reprinted in U.N.Doc. A/54/637.

Article 5	(duty to extradite)
Articles 6, 7	(exceptions to extradition)
Article 15	(duty to prosecute)

9. Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism, June 3, 2002, AG/Res. 1840 (XXXII-O/02), O.A.S. No. A-66, entered into force July 10, 2003, U.S. ratification on November 15, 2005.

Article 1	(duty to prevent, punish, and eliminate)
Articles 7, 8	(duty to cooperate)
Article 9	(mutual legal assistance)

10. Draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism, October 14, 2005, A/C.6/60/L.6; see also Report of the Ad Hoc Committee, U.N. Doc No. 37 A/57/37, 6th session January 28–February 1, 2002.

Articles 8	(duty to prohibit)
Article 10, 11	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Articles 13, 14, 15	(extradition and mutual legal assistance)

M. Protection of Civil and Commercial Maritime Navigation and Non-Military Sea-Based Platforms

1. Convention on the High Seas, April 29, 1958, U.N. Doc. A/Conf/13/L.52-55 & 56 & 58; 450 U.N.T.S. 11; 13 U.S.T. 2312.

Articles 13, 14	(duty to prevent and punish)

2. Convention on Law of the Sea, December 10, 1982, U.N. Doc. A/Conf.62-121 & Corr.1-8; 1833 U.N.T.S. 3; 21 I.L.M. 1261.

Article 107	(duty to prevent and punish)

3. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation (SUA), March 10, 1988, IMO. Doc. Sua/Con/15, 27 I.L.M. 668.

Article 11	(duty to extradite)
Article 12	(mutual legal assistance)

4. Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf (SUA Protocol), March 10, 1988, IMO. Doc. Sua/Con/16/Rev.1; 27 I.L.M. 685.

Article 11	(duty to extradite)
Article 12	(mutual legal assistance)

5. International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, Doc. ONU A/Res/52/164, December 15, 1997.

Articles 6, 8	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 7	(duty to extradite)
Articles 10–12	(assistance in extradition)

6. Amended Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation (2005 SUA Protocol), adopted October 14, 2005.

Article 11bis	(duty to extradite and mutual legal assistance)
Article 12bis	(duty to assist in criminal proceedings)

N. Protection of Civil Aviation and Safety of Aircrafts

1. Convention on Offences and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, September 14, 1963, U.N. Doc. A/C.6/418/Corr.1, Annex II; 704 U.N.T.S. 219; 20 U.S.T. 2941; 2 I.L.M. 1042 [Tokyo Hijacking Convention].

Article 15	(duty to extradite)
Article 16	(duty to prosecute)

2. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircrafts, December 16, 1970, U.N. Doc. A/C.6/418/Corr. 1, Annex II, 860 U.N.T.S. 105, 22 U.S.T. 1641, 10 I.L.M. 133 [Hague Hijacking Convention].

Articles 6, 7	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 8	(extradition)

3. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, September 23, 1971, U.N. Doc. A/C.6/418/Corr.2, Annex III, 974 U.N.T.S. 177, 24 U.S.T. 564, 10 I.L.M. 1151 [Montreal Hijacking Convention].

Articles 6, 7	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 8	(extradition)

4. Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving Civil Aviation, February 24, 1988, ICAO Doc. 9518; 27 I.L.M. 627 [Montreal Protocol].

O. Protection of the Safety of Persons

1. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents, December 14, 1973, U.N. Doc. A/Res/3166; 1035 U.N.T.S. 167; 28 U.S.T. 1975; 13 I.L.M. 41 [Diplomat Convention], entered into force February 20, 1977; (with respect to the United States) February 20, 1977.

Article 7	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Articles 6, 8	(extradition)

2. Convention to Prevent and Punish the Acts of Terrorism Taking the Form of Crimes Against Persons and Related Extortion That Are of International Significance (Inter-American), signed February 2, 1971, O.A.S. Doc. A6/Doc. 88 rev.1, corr. 1, 10 I.L.M. 255, entered into force with respect to each State Party to the Convention on the date of deposit of its ratification or act of accession; (with respect to the United States) October 20, 1976.

Article 3	(extradition)
Article 5	(duty to prosecute if not extradited)
Article 8	(duty to extradite)

3. Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, December 17, 1979, U.N. Doc. A/Res/34/146; 1316 U.N.T.S. 205; 18 I.L.M. 1456 [Hostage-Taking Convention].

Article 8	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Articles 6, 9	(extradition)

4. Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, opened for signature December 15, 1994, February 17, 1995, U.N. Doc. A/Res/49/59.

Article 13	(duty to extradite or prosecute)
Article 14	(duty to prosecute)
Article 15	(duty to extradite)

5. Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons, 33 I.L.M.1429 (1994), entered into force March 28, 1996.

Articles 4, 6	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 5	(duty to extradite)

P. Protection against the Use and Manufacture of Explosives and Bombs

1. Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection, March 1, 1991, U.N. Doc. S/22393/Corr. 1, 30 I.L.M. 721.

Article 3	(duty to prohibit and prevent)

2. Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, January 9, 1998, U.N. Doc. A/Res/52/164.

Articles 7, 8	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Articles 6, 9, 11, 12	(extradition)
Article 10	(mutual legal assistance)

3. Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and Other Related Materials, entered into force July 1, 1998, O.A.S. Doc. A-63, United States signed November 14, 1997.

Article 19	(duty to extradite)

Q. Preventing the Use of Weapons of Mass Destruction

1. Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, April 10, 1972, U.N. Doc. A/Res/2826, 1015 U.N.T.S. 163, 26 U.S.T. 583, 11 I.L.M. 309 [BWC Convention].

Article 3	(duty to prohibit and prevent)

2. Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, March 3, 1980, IAEA Doc. C/225; 1456 U.N.T.S.101; 18 I.L.M. 1419.

Articles 9, 10	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Articles 8, 11	(extradition)

3. Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction, January 13, 1993, U.N. Doc. A/Res/47/39; 1974 U.N.T.S. 3; 32 I.L.M. 800 [CWC Convention].

Articles 1	(duty to assist)

4. International Convention on the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, signed April 13, 2005, U.N. Doc. A/Res/59/290.

Article 5	(duty to punish)
Article 7	(duty to prosecute)
Articles 9, 11	(duty to prosecute or extradite)

R. Preventing Means of Financing Certain Forms of Terrorism

1. Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism, Dec. 9, 1999, U.N. Doc. A/54/109, entered into force April 10, 2002.

Article 10	(duty to prosecute or extradite)
Article 11	(duty to extradite)
Article 15	(no duty to extradite if based on discrimination)

S. Prohibition against Counterfeiting

1. International Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, April 20, 1929, 112 L.N.T.S. 371.

Article 3 (duty to punish)

Articles 8, 9 (duty to prosecute if not extradited)

2. Protocol to the International Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, April 20, 1929, 112 L.N.T.S. 389, entered into force February 22, 1931.

3. Optional Protocol to the International Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, April 20, 1929, 112 L.N.T.S. 395.

Article 1 (duty to extradite)

T. Protection of National and Archaeological Treasures

1. Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict, May 14, 1954, 249 U.N.T.S. 240.

Article 28 (duty to prosecute)

2. Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property, November 14, 1970, 823 U.N.T.S. 231, 10 I.L.M. 289 [UNESCO Cultural Property Convention].

Article 8 (duty to penalize)

3. Second Protocol to the Hague Convention of 1954 for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict, opened for signature March 26, 1999, [hereinafter Protocol II to the 1954 Hague Convention], entered into force March 9, 2004.

Article 17 (duty to prosecute)

Article 18 (duty to extradite)

Article 19 (duty to give mutual legal assistance)

4. Convention on the Protection of the Archeological, Historical, and Artistic Heritage of the American Nations, O.A.S.T.S. No. 47, June 16, 1976, [Convention of San Salvador]

Article 14 (duty to extradite)

U. Protection of International Means of Communication

1. Convention for the Protection of Submarine Cables, March 14, 1884, 24 Stat. 989, T.S. No. 380, 11 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2d) 281.

Article II (duty to punish)

Article XII (duty to criminalize)

2. Convention on the High Seas [Geneva Convention on the Law of the Sea], April 29, 1958, 13 U.S.T. 2312, T.I.A.S. No. 5200, 450 U.N.T.S. 82, 52 Am. J. Int'l L. 842 (1958), entered into force September 30, 1962; (with respect to the United States) September 30, 1962.

Article 27 (duty to punish)

3. Convention on the Law of the Sea [Montego Bay Convention], opened for signature December 10, 1982, 516 U.N.T.S. 205, 21 I.L.M. 1261, entered into force November 16, 1994.

Article 113 (duty to criminalize)

V. Prohibition of International Traffic in Obscene Publications

1. International Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of and Traffic in Obscene Publications, September 12, 1923, 27 L.N.T.S. 213, 7 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3d) 266, amended by Protocol, November 12, 1947, 46 U.N.T.S. 169.

Article 1	(duty to prosecute and punish)
Article 4	(duty to criminalize)
Article 6	(duty to cooperate in suppression)

2. Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of, and Traffic in, Obscene Publications, concluded at Geneva on September 12, 1923, November 12, 1947, 46 U.N.T.S. 169, protocol entered into force November 12, 1947, amendments in annex entered into force February 2, 1950.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

3. Annex to the Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of, and Traffic in, Obscene Publications, concluded at Geneva, September 12, 1923.

(Regarding the United Nations continuing duties and functions of the League of Nations)

W. Prohibition against Bribery and Corruption

1. Draft International Agreement on Illicit Payments, U.N. Doc. E/1979/104 (May 25, 1979), reprinted in 18 I.L.M. 1025 (1979).

Article III.1(i)	(duty to criminalize)
Article III.1(ii)	(duty to prohibit)
Article III.1(iii)	(duty to prosecute)
Article III.1(iv)	(duty to punish)
Article III.5	(duty to prosecute)
Article III.11	(duty to extradite)

2. Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, 37 I.L.M. 1, entered into force February 15, 1999.

Article 9	(mutual legal assistance)
Article 10	(duty to extradite)

3. United Nations Convention Against Corruption, U.N. Doc. A/58/422, entered into force December 14, 2005; (United States signed December 9, 2005).

Article 43	(international cooperation)
Article 44	(duty to extradite)
Article 46	(mutual legal assistance)
Article 48	(law enforcement cooperation)

4. Inter-American Convention Against Corruption, O.A.S. Doc. B-58, entered into force March 29, 1996, Sen. Treaty Doc. 105-39.

Article 13	(duty to extradite)

5. Criminal Law Convention on the European Council on Corruption and Additional Protocol, entered into force July 1, 2006, CETS No. 173, 191.

Articles 2-15	(duty to criminalize)
Article 27	(duty to extradite or prosecute)

X. Mercenarism

1. International Convention Against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries, December 4, 1989, 29 I.L.M. 91 (1990), opened for signature until December 31, 1990, U.N. G.A. Res. 44/34, U.N. Doc. A/RES/44/34 (1989), 29 I.L.M. 89 (entered into force October 20, 2001).

Article 12	(duty to prosecute)
Article 15	(duty to extradite)

Y. Prohibition against Narcotic Drugs

1. Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, Mar. 30, 1961, 18 U.S.T. 1407, 520 U.N.T.S. 204 (entered into force December 13, 1964); (with respect to the United States June. 24, 1967)

Article 36	(duty to punish, prosecute, extradite)

2. Protocol Amending the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, March 25, 1972, 26 U.S.T. 1439, 976 U.N.T.S. 3 (entered into force August 8, 1975).

3. Convention on Psychotropic Substances, February 21, 1971, 32 U.S.T. 543, 1019 U.N.T.S. 175, reprinted in 10 I.L.M. 261 (entered into force August 16, 1976); (with respect to the United States July 15, 1980).

Article 22	(extradition, duty to punish)

4. United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, opened for signature December 20, 1988, 28 I.L.M. 493 (1989) (entered into force November 11, 1990).

Article 6	(duty to extradite)
Article 7	(duty to give mutual legal assistance)

Z. Prohibition against Organized Crime

1. United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 25, annex I, U.N. GAOR, 55th Sess., Supp. No. 49, at 44, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (Vol. I) (2001), entered into force September 29, 2003; United States Senate Doc. 108-16, signed by the United States on December 13, 2000.

Article 11	(duty to prosecute)
Article 13	(duty to give international cooperation)
Article 16	(duty to extradite)
Article 18	(duty to give mutual legal assistance)

2. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 25, annex II, U.N. GAOR, 55th Sess., Supp. No. 49, at 60, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (Vol. I) (2001), entered into force September 9, 2003.

Article 9	(duty to prevent and combat)

3. Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. res. 55/25, annex III, 55 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49) at 65, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (Vol. I) (2001), entered into force January 28, 2004.

Articles 10, 11, 15 (duty to prevent)

4. Protocol Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Their Parts and Components and Ammunition, supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 55/255, annex, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/255 (May 31, 2001), entered into force July 3, 2005.

Article 5 (duty to criminalize)

AA. Other

1. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 2187 U.N.T.S. 3, entered into force July 1, 2002.

BB. General Assembly Resolutions

1. Question of the punishment of war criminals and of persons who have committed crimes against humanity, G.A. Res. 3074, U.N. GAOR, 28th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/RES/26/2840 (1971).

2. Principles of International cooperation in the detection, arrest, extradition and punishment of persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, G.A.Res. 3074, U.N.GAOR, 28th Sess., U.N.Doc. A/RES/28/3074 (1973).

3. Model Treaty on Extradition, G.A. res. 45/116, annex, 45 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49A) at 212, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (1990).

4. Use of mercenaries as a means of violating human rights and impeding the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination, G.A. Res. 62/145, at ¶ 10, U.N. Doc. 62/145 (March 4, 2008).

5. Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, G.A. Res. 62/148, at ¶¶ 7, 12, U.N. Doc. A/RES/62/148 (March 4, 2008).

6. Technical Assistance for implementing the international conventions and protocols related to terrorism, G.A. Res. 62/172, at ¶3, U.N. Doc. A/RES/62/172 (March 20, 2008).

7. Strengthening the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, in particular its technical cooperation capacity, G.A. Res. 62/175, at ¶3, U.N. Doc. A/RES/62/175 (March 20, 2008).

8. International cooperation against the world drug problem, G.A. Res. 62/176, at ¶ 28, U.N. Doc. A/RES/62/176 (March 17, 2008).

9. Criminal Accountability of United Nations officials and experts on mission, G.A. Res. 63/119, at ¶5, U.N. Doc. A/RES/63/119 (January 15, 2009).

10. Use of mercenaries as a means of violating human rights and impeding the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination, G.A. Res. 63/164, at ¶ 10, U.N. Doc. 63/164 (February 13, 2009).

11. Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, G.A. Res. 63/166, at ¶¶ 15, 17, U.N. Doc. A/RES/63/166 (February 19, 2009).

12. International cooperation against the world drug problem, G.A. Res. 63/197, at ¶ 29, U.N. Doc. A/RES/63/197 (March 6, 2009).

13. Return or restitution of cultural property to the countries of origin, G.A. Res. 64/78, at ¶21, U.N. Doc. A/RES/64/78 (February 11, 2010).

14. Criminal Accountability of United Nations officials and experts on mission, G.A. Res. 64/110, at ¶5, U.N. Doc. A/RES/64/110 (January 15, 2010).

15. Use of mercenaries as a means of violating human rights and impeding the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination, G.A. Res. 64/175, at ¶ 10, U.N. Doc. 64/151 (March 26, 2010).

16. Technical Assistance for implementing the international conventions and protocols related to terrorism, G.A. Res. 64/177, at ¶3, U.N. Doc. A/RES/64/177 (March 24, 2010).

17. Strengthening the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, in particular its technical cooperation capacity, G.A. Res. 64/179, at preamble, U.N. Doc. A/RES/64/179 (March 26, 2010).

18. United Nations Global Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons, G.A. Res. 64/293, at ¶52, U.N. Doc. A/RES/64/293 (August 12, 2010).

19. Criminal Accountability of United Nations officials and experts on mission, G.A. Res. 65/20, at ¶5, U.N. Doc. A/RES/65/20 (January 10, 2011).

CC. Security Council Resolutions

1. Security Council Resolution 1373, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1373, September 28, 2001 [international cooperation to combat threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts].

2. Security Council Resolution 1540, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1540, April 28, 2004 [proliferation and delivery of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons].

3. Security Council Resolution 1624, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1624, September 14, 2005 [Threats to international peace and security (Security Council Summit 2005)].

4. Security Council Resolution 1887, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1887, September 24, 2009 [Maintenance of international peace and security: nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament].

5. Security Council Resolution 1963, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1963, December 20, 2010 [Threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts].

 Note—The United States–European Union Extradition Agreement is not included here, but in Appendix II, because it is a bilateral agreement.

Appendix II

Regional Multilateral Conventions

African Union[1]

Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism, July 14, 1999[2]

Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption, July 11, 2003[3]

Association of South East Asian Nations[4]

ASEAN Convention on Counter Terrorism, Jan. 13, 2007[5]

Benelux Countries[6]

Treaty Between the Kingdom of Belgium, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and the Kingdom of the Netherlands Concerning Extradition and Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, June 27, 1962, 616 U.N.T.S. 120[7]

---

1 The African Union was formerly known as the Organisation of African unity. It is made up of fifty-three states, namely: Algeria, Angola, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Cabo Verde, The Central African Republic, Chad, the Comoros, the Republic of the Congo, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea Biassau, Guinea, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Nigeria, Rwanda, Western Sahara, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, South Africa, the Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Togo, Tunesia, Uganda, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

2 The Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism is available at http://treaties.un.org/doc/db/Terrorism/OAU-english.pdf.

3 The Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption is available at http://www.africa-union.org/official_documents/Treaties_%20Conventions_%20Protocols/Convention%20on%20Combating%20Corruption.pdf.

4 The Association of Southeast Asian Nations is made up of ten states, namely: Brunei Darussalam, Burma (Myanmar), Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, and Vietnam.

5 The ASEAN Convention on Counter Terrorism is available at http://www.asean.org/news/item/asean-convention-on-counter-terrorism. It was signed by Brunei Darussalam, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, and Vietnam.

6 The Benelux countries are Belgium, Luxembourg, and The Netherlands.

7 All three Benelux members have signed and ratified the Treaty.

Commonwealth of Nations[8]

Scheme Relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders within the Commonwealth, 1966[9]

Commonwealth Scheme for Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, as amended in 1990[10]

Scheme for Transfer of Convicted Offenders within the Commonwealth, Aug. 1986[11]

Harare Scheme Relating to Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters within the Commonwealth, Apr. 1990, as amended Nov. 2002 and Oct. 2005[12]

Framework for Commonwealth Principles on Promoting Good Governance and Combating Corruption, Nov. 1999[13]

The London Scheme for Extradition within the Commonwealth, Nov. 2002[14]

8 The Commonwealth of Nations is made of up fifty-four states, overwhelmingly former British colonies, namely: Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Botswana, Brunei, Cameroon, Canada, Cyprus, Dominica, The Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Guyana, India, Jamaica, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Malawi, Malasia, Maldives, Malta, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Nauru, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Swaziland, Tanzania, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tuvalu, Uganda, the United Kingdom, Vanuatu, and Zambia. The Commonwealth does not maintain a treaty series; the treaties are stored on the Commonwealth's website, with links provided below.

9 The Scheme Relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders within the Commonwealth is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/%7B717FA6D4-0DDF-4D10-853E-D250F3AE65D0%7D_London_Amendments.pdf.

10 The Commonwealth Scheme for Rendition of Fugitive Offenders is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/%7B717FA6D4-0DDF-4D10-853E-D250F3AE65D0%7D_London_Amendments.pdf.

11 The Scheme for Transfer of Convicted Offenders within the Commonwealth is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{BF5E0493-DE14-43D6-A5E8-7641447B2CB1}_convicted_criminals.pdf.

12 The Harare Scheme Relating to Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters within the Commonwealth is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/2C167ECF-0FDE-481B-B552-E9BA23857CE3_HARARESCHEMERELATINGTOMUTUALASSISTANCE2005.pdf.

13 The Framework for Commonwealth Principles on Promoting Good Governance and Combating Corruption is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{C628DA6C-4D83-4C5B-B6E8-FBA05F1188C6}_framework1.pdf.

14 The London Scheme for Extradition within the Commonwealth is available at http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/%7B56F55E5D-1882-4421-9CC1-71634DF17331%7D_London_Scheme.pdf

Council of Europe[15]

European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 12, 1957, E.T.S. 24[16]

Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Oct. 15, 1975, E.T.S. 86[17]

Second Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Mar. 17, 1978, E.T.S. 98[18]

15 The Council of Europe was established in 1949 by ten states to promote "common and democratic principles based on the European Convention on Human Rights and other reference texts on the protection of individuals." At present it is composed of forty-seven states, namely: Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lichtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Lacedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. The Council of Europe adopted the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in 1950. The European Court of Human Rights was first established in 1959 and assumed sole responsibility for the enforcement of the ECHR in 1998. The Council of Europe should not be confused with the European Union or its constituent bodies, including the European Council, the European Commission, the European Parliament, or the European Court of Justice. The twenty-seven member states of the European Union are members of the Council of Europe. Iceland, Norway, and Switzerland are members of the Council of Europe but not the European Union. Belarus is the only European state not to be a member of either the Council of Europe or the European Union.

Council of Europe treaties are open to members of the Council of Europe and select invited states who are determined on an ad hoc basis. In addition, a number of states have official observer status with the Council of Europe, namely Canada, the Holy See, Israel, Japan, Mexico, and the United States. Council of Europe treaties are found either in the European Treaty Series or the Council of Europe Treaty Series. All treaties since 2004 are found in the Council of Europe Treaty Series (i.e., C.E.T.S.), while treaties from 1949 to 2003 are found in the European Treaty Series (i.e., E.T.S.). The Council of Europe Treaty Series can be found at: http://www.conventions.coe.int/Treaty/Commun/ListeTraites.asp?CM=8&CL=ENG.

16 The European Convention on Extradition has been ratified by all forty-seven member states of the Council of Europe, as well as Israel, South Korea, and South Africa.

17 The Additional Protocol has been ratified or acceded to by thirty-nine states, namely: Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Georgia, Hungary, Iceland, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and the Ukraine.

Greece has signed but not ratified the Additional Protocol. Nine states have not signed or acceded to the Additional Protocol, namely: Austria, Finland, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, San Marino, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

18 The Second Additional Protocol has been ratified or acceded to by forty-two states, namely: Albania, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Georgia, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey Ukraine, and the United Kingdom, as well as South Korea and South Africa.

Greece has signed but not ratified the Second Additional Protocol. Five states have not signed or acceded to the Second Additional Protocol, namely: Andorra, France, Ireland, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, and Serbia.

Third Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Nov. 10, 2010, C.E.T.S. 209[19]

Fourth Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Sept. 20, 2012, C.E.T.S. 212 (not yet in force)[20]

European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Jan. 27, 1977, E.T.S. 090[21]

Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS)[22]

Economic Community of West African States Convention on Extradition, Aug. 6, 1994, A/P.1/8/94[23]

European Union[24]

Convention on Simplified Extradition Procedure between the Member States of the European Union, Mar. 30, 1995, OJ C 078

Convention Relating to Extradition between Member States of the European Union, June 23, 1996, OJ C 313

Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement, Sept. 22, 2000, OJ L 239

19 The Third Additional Protocol has been ratified or acceded to by nine states, namely: Albania, the Czech Republic, Latvia, the Netherlands, and Serbia. Nineteen states have signed, but not ratified the Third Additional Protocol, namely: Austria, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Finland, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovenia, Sweden, and The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

20 The Fourth Additional Protocol has been signed by nine states, namely: Albania, Armenia, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Luxembourg, Poland, Romania, Serbia, Slovenia, Sweden, and Ukraine. None of these states have ratified the Fourth Additional Protocol.

21 The European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism has been ratified by or acceded to forty-six states, namely: Albania, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Macedonia, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Andorra has signed but not ratified the Convention.

22 The Economic Community of West African States is composed of fifteen states, namely: Benin, Burkina Faso, Cabo Verde, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, and Togo. The Community does not keep a published treaty series on its website.

23 The Economic Community of West African States Convention on Extradition was signed by sixteen states, namely: Benin, Burkina Faso, Cabo Verde, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, and Togo. The treaty is not published on the Community's website and no ratification information is available.

24 The European Union is made up of twenty-seven states, namely: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherland, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.

Council Framework Decision of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, June 13, 2002, 2002/584/JHA, OJ L190/1[25]

Latin American Countries

Montevideo Convention on Extradition, Dec. 26, 1933, 49 Stat. 3111[26]

League of Arab States[27]

Arab League Extradition Agreement, League of Arab States Treaty Series 27-32, reprinted in 8 Rev. Egyptienne de Droit Int'l 328-32 (1952)[28]

Arab Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism, Apr. 22, 1998[29]

Nordic States

The Nordic Arrest Warrant, Jan. 24, 2006, Council of Europe Doc. 5573/06[30]

Organisation of Islamic Cooperation

Convention of the Organization of the Islamic Conference on Combating International Terrorism, Sept. 25, 1999, Annex to Resolution no. 59/26-P[31]

25 The Framework Decision on European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States was adopted by the European Council on June 13, 2002. Under Article 34(2)(b) of the Treaty on European Union, the Council shall "adopt framework decisions for the purpose of approximation of the laws and regulations of the Member States. Framework decisions shall be binding upon the Member States as to the result to be achieved but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods. They shall not entail direct effect." Framework Decisions deal with matters of criminal law.

26 The Montevideo Convention on Extradition was signed by Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

27 The League of Arab States is made up of twenty-two member states, namely: Algeria, Bahrain, Comoros, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Palestine, Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates, and Yemen. Syria's membership was supended in November 2011, but its seat was taken by the Syrian National Coalition in April 2013.

28 The Arab League Extradition Agreement was originally singed by Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, and Syria.

29 The Arab Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism is available at http://www.refworld.org/docid/3de5e4984.html.

30 The Nordic Arrest Warrant was Adopted by the Council of the European Union based on the negotiations of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden. It is available at http://www.asser.nl/upload/eurowarrant-webroot/documents/cms_eaw_id1056_1_CouncilDoc.5573.06.pdf.

31 The Organisation of Islamic Cooperation was formerly known as the Organization of the Islamic Conference. It is made up of fifty-seven member states, namely: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Brunei-Darussalam, Burkina-Faso, Cameroon, Chad, The Comoros, Côte D'Ivoire, Egypt, Gabon, The Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Libya, Malaysia, The Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Mozambique, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, The Sudan, Suriname, Syria, Tajikistan, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Uganda, The United Arab Emirates, Uzbekistan, and Yemen.

Organization of American States[32]

Inter-American Convention on Extradition, Feb. 25, 1981, O.A.S. Doc. B-47[33]

Inter-American Convention Against Corruption, Mar. 29, 1996, O.A.S. Doc. B-58[34]

Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism, June 3, 2003, AG/Res. 1840 (XXXII-O/02), O.A.S. No. A-66.[35]

South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC)[36]

Regional Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Nov. 4, 1987[37]

Southern African Development Community (SADC)[38]

Southern African Development Community Protocol on Extradition, Oct. 3, 2002[39]

---

32 The Organization of American States is made up of thirty-five states, namely: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, The Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rice, Cuba, Dominica, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, St. Kitts & Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago, the United States, Uruguay, and Venezuela. The Inter-American Treaty Series is available at http://www.oas.org/DIL/treaties.htm.

33 The Inter-American Convention on Extradition has been ratified or acceded to by six states, namely: Antigua and Barbuda, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Panama, St. Lucia, and Venezuala. The Convention has been signed, but not ratified, by ten states, namely: Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Nicaragua, Paraguay, and Uruguay.

34 The Inter-American Convention Against Corruption has been ratified or acceded to by thirty-three states, namely: Antigua & Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominica, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ecuador, El Salvador, Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, St. Kitts & Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago, the United States, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Barbados has signed, but not ratified, the Convention.

35 The Inter-American Convention Against Corruption has been ratified or acceded to by twenty-four states, namely: Antigua & Barbuda, Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominica, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Trinidad & Tobago, United States, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Ten countries have signed, but not ratified, the Convention, namely: Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Haiti, Jamaica, St. Kitts & Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, and Suriname.

36 The South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation is made up of Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, the Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka.

37 The Regional Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism is available at http://treaties.un.org/doc/db/Terrorism/Conv18-english.pdf. It was signed by Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, the Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka.

38 The Southern African Development Community is made up of fifteen states, namely Angola, Botswana, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Lesotho, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, the Seychelles, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. Madagascar's membership has been suspended since a 2009 coup d'état. The Community does not maintain a treaty series, but its treaties can be found at: http://www.sadc.int/documents-publications/protocols/.

39 The Southern African Development Community Protocol on Extradition was signed by Angola, Botswana, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, the Seychelles, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. Madagascar did not sign the treaty. The treaty is available on the Community's website at: http://www.sadc.int/files/3513/5292/8371/Protocol_on_Extradiction.pdf.

Appendix III

Bilateral Extradition Treaties of the United States[1]

Abbreviations

EU Bilateral	Bilateral treaty between the United States of America and European Union member states, pursuant to Article 3(2) of the Agreement on extradition between the European Union and the United States of America, signed June 25, 2003.
KAV	Treaties entered into by the United States since 1950 that have not yet been published in Treaties and other International Agreements Series (TIAS); Current Treaty Index, Supplement to United States Treaty Index 1776–1990 Consolidation, ed. Igor I. Kavass (2005); A Guide to the United States Treaties in Force, ed. Igor I. Kavass, 2005.
LNTS	League of Nations Treaty Series containing treaties agreed to between 1920 and 1946.
SDoc	Senate Treaty Document Number.
St. Dept.	State Department Document Number.
Stat.	United States Statutes at Large.
TIAS	Treaties and other International Agreements Series, issued singly in pamphlets issued by the Department of State beginning in 1946.
UNTS	United Nations Treaty Series containing treaties agreed to after 1946.
UST	United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (volumes published on a calendar-year basis beginning January 1, 1950).
*	Signifies Ratification of the Rome Statute of the ICC.
[a]	Signifies "Article 98" agreement precluding extradition to the ICC.
Pending	Awaiting advice and consent of the U.S. Senate.

1 Treaties are collected in 18 U.S.C. § 3181. In addition, the Department of State collects treaties to which the Unites States is a state party in Treaties in Force, which was last released in January 2012. See http://www.state.gov/s/l/treaty/tif/index.htm. Treaties are also collected in Treaties and other International Acts Series (TIAS), which is available at http://www.state.gov/s/l/treaty/tias/index.htm. Finally, before being collected in the Treaties in Force or TIAS, treaties are individually noted in monthly "Treaty Actions," which are available at http://www.state.gov/s/l/treaty/c3428.htm.

The United States currently has bilateral extradition treaties with the following countries:

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Albania*[a]	March 1, 1933	November 14, 1935	49 Stat. 3313, TS 902, 5 Bevans 22, 16 LNTS 195
Antigua and Barbuda* [a]	June 3, 1996	July 1, 1999	KAV 6898; SDoc 105-19
Argentina*	June 10, 1997	June 15, 2000	KAV 5018, SDoc 105-18, TIAS 12866, 2159 UNTS 129
Australia* Protocol	May 14, 1974 September 4, 1990	May 8, 1976 December 21, 1992	27UST 957, TIAS 8234 SDoc 105-27; 1736 UNTS 344
Austria* EU Bilateral	January 8, 1998 July 20, 2005	January 1, 2000 February 1, 2010	KAV 5244, SDoc 105-50, TIAS 12916 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Bahamas	March 9, 1990	September 22, 1994	KAV 3171, SDoc 105-20
Barbados*	February 28, 1996	March 3, 2000	KAV 5019, SDoc 105-20
Belgium* EU Bilateral	April 27, 1987 December 16, 2004	September 1, 1997 February 1, 2010	KAV 106, SDoc 104-7, 2093 UNTS 263 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Belize*[a]	March 30, 2000	March 27, 2001	KAV 5974, SDoc 106-38 TIAS 13089
Bolivia*	June 27, 1995	November 21, 1996	KAV 4192, SDoc 104-22
Brazil* Additional Protocol	January 13, 1961 June 18, 1962	December 17, 1964 December 17, 1964	15UST 2093, TIAS 5691, 532 UNTS 177 15UST 2112, TIAS 5691, 532 UNTS 198
Bulgaria*	September 19, 2007	May 21, 2009	KAV 8082, SDoc 110-12
Burma	December 22, 1931[2]	November 1, 1941	47Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Canada* Ex. of Notes Supplementary Supplementary	December 3, 1971 June 28 and July 9, 1974 January 11, 1988 January 12, 2001	March 22, 1976 March 22, 1976 November 26, 1991 April 30, 2003	27UST 983, TIAS 8237 27 UST 1017, TIAS 8237, KAV 237, SDoc 101-17, 27 UST 983 KAV 6252, SDoc 107-11 1853 UNTS 407

2 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Burma after independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Chile*	April 17, 1900	June 26, 1902	32 Stat. 1850, TS 407, 6 Bevans 543
Colombia*[a][3]	September 14, 1979	March 4, 1982	KAV 338, SDoc 97-8
Congo, Republic of*[a] Supplementary Supplementary	January 6, 1909[4] January 15, 1929[5] April 23, 1936[6]	July 27, 1911 May 19, 1929 September 24, 1936	37 Stat. 1526 46 Stat. 2276 50 Stat. 1117
Costa Rica*	December 4, 1982	October 11, 1991	KAV 363, SDoc 98-17
Cuba Supplementary Additional Treaty	April 6, 1904 December 6, 1904 January 14, 1926	March 2, 1905 March 2, 1905 June 18, 1926	33 Stat. 2265 33 Stat. 2273 44 Stat. 2392, TS 737, 6 Bevans 1136, 61 LNTS 363
Cyprus* EU Bilateral	June 17, 1996 January 20, 2006	September 14, 1999 February 1, 2010	KAV 5016, SDoc 105-16 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Czech Republic[7]* Supplementary EU Bilateral	July 2, 1925 April 29, 1935 May 16, 2006	March 29, 1926 August 28, 1935 February 1, 2010	44 Stat. 2367 49 Stat. 3253 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Denmark* EU Bilateral	June 22, 1972 June 23, 2005	July 31, 1974 February 1, 2010	25 UST 1293, TIAS 7864 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Dominica*[a]	October 10, 1996	May 25, 2000	KAV 5869, SDoc 105-19
Dominican Republic*[a]	June 19, 1909	August 2, 1910	36 Stat. 2468, TS 550, 7 Bevans 200
Ecuador* Supplementary	June 28, 1872 September 22, 1939	November 12, 1873 May 29, 1941	18 Stat. 199, TS 79, 7 Bevans 321 55 Stat. 1196, TS 972, 7 Bevans 346

3 The Supreme Court of Colombia declared the treaty unconstitutional in December 1986 and June 1987. See 27 ILM 492 (1988). In September 1989, the Colombian government extradited Eduardo Martinez Romero to the United States. The extradition was carried out by executive order of the president and outside any extradition treaty between the United States and Colombia. (Kavass, Vol. III, p. 489)

4 Treaty concluded between the United States and France, but remains in force with respect to the Congo after independence.

5 Treaty concluded between the United States and France, but remains in force with respect to the Congo after independence.

6 Treaty concluded between the United States and France, but remains in force with respect to the Congo after independence.

7 Czechoslovakia split into the independent Czech Republic and Slovak Republic at midnight on December 31, 1991. The Czech and Slovak Republics have independent extradition agreements with the United States, which entered into force in 2010. The existing extradition treaties of 1926 and 1935 between the United States and Czechoslovakia may apply to the Czech and Slovak Republics under the doctrine of state succession. The status of the extradition treaties between the United States and Czechoslovakia is under review by the Department of State.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Egypt[a]	August 11, 1874[8]	April 22, 1875	19 Stat. 572, TS 270, 10 Bevans 642
El Salvador*[a]	April 18, 1911	July 10, 1911	37 Stat. 1516, TS 560, 7 Bevans 507
Estonia*	February 8, 2006	April 7, 2009	KAV 7642, SDoc 109-16
European Union (EU)[9]	June 25, 2003	February 1, 2010	KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Fiji*[a] Ex. of Notes Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931[10] July 14, 1972 August 17, 1973	June 24, 1935 August 17, 1973 August 17, 1973	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 24 UST 1965 TIAS 7707
Finland* EU Bilateral	June 11, 1976 December 16, 2004	May 11, 1980 February 1, 2010	31 UST 944, TIAS 9626, 1203 UNTS 165 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
France* EU Bilateral	April 23, 1996 September 30, 2004	February 1, 2002 February 1, 2010	KAV 4920, SDoc 105-13, 2179 UNTS 341 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Gambia*[a]	December 22, 1931[11]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Germany* Supplementary EU Bilateral	June 20, 1978 Oct. 21, 1986 April 18, 2006	August 29, 1980 March 11, 1993 February 1, 2010	32 UST 1485, TIAS 9785, 1220 UNTS 269 KAV 705, 1909 UNTS 441 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Ghana*[a]	December 22, 1931[12]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 842, 163 LNTS 59

8 Treaty with the Ottoman Empire; Superseded on August 18, 1932 by treaty between the United States and Turkey signed on August 6, 1923 (TS 872).

9 Upon entry into force of the EU-U.S. Extradition Agreement on February 1, 2010, the twenty-five bilateral agreements between the United States and EU member states also entered into force.

10 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Fiji after independence.

11 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Gambia after independence.

12 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Ghana after independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Greece* Supplementary EU Bilateral	May 6, 1931 September 2, 1937 January 18, 2006	November 1, 1932 September 2, 1937 February 1, 2010	47 Stat. 2185, TS 855, 8 Bevans 353, 138 LNTS 293 51 Stat. 357, EAS 114, 8 Bevans 366, 185 LNTS 408 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Grenada*[a]	May 30, 1996	September 14, 1999	KAV 5870, SDoc 105-19
Guatemala* Supplementary	February 27, 1903 February 20, 1940	August 15, 1903 March 13, 1941	33 Stat. 2147, TS 425, 8 Bevans 482 55 Stat. 1097, TS 963, 8 Bevans 528
Guyana*[a]	December 22, 1931[13]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Haiti[a]	August 9, 1904	June 28, 1905	34 Stat. 2858, TS 447, 8 Bevans 653
Honduras*[a] Supplementary	January 15, 1909 February 21, 1927	July 10, 1912 June 5, 1928	37 Stat. 1616, TS 569, 8 Bevans 892 45 Stat. 2489, TS 761, 8 Bevans 903, 85 LNTS 491
Hong Kong (China)	December 20, 1996	January 21, 1998	KAV 4912, SDoc 105-3
Hungary* EU Bilateral	December 1, 1994 November 15, 2005	March 18, 1997 February 1, 2010	KAV 4252, SDoc 104-5 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Iceland* Supplementary	January 6, 1902[14] November 6, 1905[15]	May 16, 1902 February 19, 1906	32 Stat. 1096, TS 405, 7 Bevans 38 34 Stat. 2887, TS 449, 7 Bevans 43
India[a]	June 25, 1997	July 21, 1999	KAV 5025, SDoc 105-30, TIAS 12873
Iraq	June 7, 1934	April 23, 1936	49 Stat. 3380, TS 907, 9 Bevans 1, 170 LNTS 267
Ireland* EU Bilateral	July 13, 1983 July 14, 2005	December 15, 1984 February 1, 2010	TIAS 10813 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14

13 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Guyana after independence.

14 Treaty concluded between the United States and Denmark, but remains in force with respect to Iceland.

15 Treaty concluded between the United States and Denmark, but remains in force with respect to Iceland.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Israel[a] Explanatory Protocol	December 10, 1962 April 11, 1967 July 6, 2005	December 5, 1963 April 11, 1967 January 10, 2007	14 UST 1707, TIAS 5476, 484 UNTS 283 18 UST 382, TIAS 6246 S.Doc 109-3
Italy*[16] EU Bilateral	October 13, 1983 May 3, 2006	September 24, 1984 February 1, 2010	35 UST 3023, TIAS 10837, 1590 UNTS 161 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Jamaica	June 14, 1983	July 7, 1991	KAV 1026, SDoc 98-31
Japan*	March 3, 1978	March 26, 1980	31 UST 892, TIAS 9625, 1203 UNTS 225
Jordan*	March 28, 1995	July 29, 1995	KAV 4209, SDoc 104-3
Kenya*[a] Ex of Notes	December 22, 1931[17] August 19, 1965	June 24, 1935 August 19, 1965	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 16 UST 1866, TIAS 5916, 574 UNTS 153
Kiribati[a]	June 8, 1972[18]	January 21, 1977	28 UST 227, TIAS 8468
Korea, Republic of South*	June 9, 1998	December 20, 1999	KAV 5485, SDoc 106-2, TIAS 12962
Latvia* EU Bilateral	December 7, 2005	March 1, 1924 March 29, 1935 April 15, 2009	43 Stat. 1738 49 Stat. 3131 KAV 7641, SDoc 109-15
Lesotho*[a]	December 22, 1931[19]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Liberia*[a]	November 1, 1937	November 21, 1939	54 Stat. 1733, TS 955, 9 Bevans 589, 201 LNTS 151
Liechtenstein*	May 20, 1936	June 28, 1937	50 Stat. 1337, TS 915, 9 Bevans 648, 183 LNTS 181

16 The Italian Constitutional Court declared in July 1996 that Treaty to be unconstitutional due to the possible imposition of the death penalty in the United States. Italy's Constitution prohibits the imposition of the death penalty. (See Chapter VIII).

17 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Kenya after independence.

18 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Kiribati after independence.

19 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Lesotho after independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Lithuania* EU Bilateral	October 23, 2001 June 15, 2005	March 31, 2003 February 1, 2010	KAV 6246, SDoc 107-4, TIAS 13166 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Luxembourg* EU Bilateral	October 1, 1996 February 1, 2005	February 1, 2002 February 1, 2010	KAV 4917, SDoc 105-10, TIAS 12804 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Malawi*[a] Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931[20] April 4, 1967	June 24, 1935 April 4, 1967	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 18 UST 1822, TIAS 9656, 692 UNTS 191
Malaysia	August 3, 1995	June 2, 1997	KAV 4581, SDoc 104-26
Malta*	May 18, 2006	July 1, 2009	KAV 7643, SDoc 109-17 47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Mauritius*[a]	December 22, 1931[21]	June 24, 1935	31 UST 5059, TIAS 9656 TIAS 12897, SDoc 105-46
Mexico* Protocol	May 4, 1978 November 13, 1997	January 25, 1980 May 21, 2001	KAV 6519, St. Dpt. 04-152
Micronesia[a]	May 14, 2003	June 25, 2004	54 Stat. 1780, TS 959, 9 Bevans 1272, 202 LNTS 61
Monaco	February 15, 1939	March 28, 1940	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Nauru*[a]	December 22, 1931[22]	August 30, 1935	35 UST 1334, TIAS 10733 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Netherlands[23]* EU Bilateral	June 24, 1980 September 29, 2004	September 15, 1983 February 1, 2010	22 UST 1, TIAS 7035, 791 UNTS 253
New Zealand*	January 12, 1970	December 8, 1970	735 Stat. 1869, TS 462, 10 Bevans 356
Nicaragua[a]	March 1, 1905	July 14, 1907	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59

20 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Malawi after independence.

21 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Mauritius after independence.

22 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Nauru after independence.

23 Applies to Aruba and the Netherlands Antilles.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Nigeria*[a]	December 22, 1931[24]	June 24, 1935	31 UST 5619, TIAS 9679, 1220 UNTS 221
Norway*	June 9, 1977	March 7, 1980	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Pakistan[a]	December 22, 1931[25]	June 24, 1935	Executive agreement concluded pursuant to section 175 of the amended Compact of Free Association, P.L. 99-239, Title II
Palau[26a]		Oct. 1, 1994	34 Stat. 2851, TS 445, 10 Bevans 673
Panama*[a]	May 25, 1904	May 8, 1905	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 KAV 1557
Papua New Guinea[a]	December 22, 1931[27] February 23, 1988	August 30, 1935 February 23, 1988	KAV 5486, SDoc 106-4, TIAS 12995
Paraguay*	November 9, 1998	March 9, 2001	KAV 6248, SDoc 107-6
Peru*	July 26, 2001	August 25, 2003	KAV 4336, SDoc 104-16, 1994 UNTS 279
Philippines*[a]	November 13, 1994	November 22, 1996	KAV 4921, SDoc 105-14 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Poland* EU Bilateral	July 10, 1996 June 9, 2006	September 17, 1999 February 1, 2010	35 Stat. 2071, TS 512, 11 Bevans 314 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Portugal* EU Bilateral	May 7, 1908 July 14, 2005	November 14, 1908 February 1, 2010	KAV 8081, SDoc 110-11
Romania*	September 10, 2007	May 8, 2009	KAV 5872, SDoc 105-19, TIAS 12805
St. Kitts and Nevis*[a]	September 18, 1996	February 23, 2000	KAV 5871, SDoc 105-19

24 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Nigeria after independence.

25 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Pakistan after its independence.

26 Although the only official listing of this extradition agreement is an executive order, which is not technically a treaty as it does not require the advice and consent of the Senate, at least one extradition has taken place under it. See In re Extradition of Lin, 915 F. Supp. 206, 207 (D. Guam 1995); P.L. 99-239, 99 Stat. 1770 (1986); H.Rep. 99-188 (Pt. I) 192 (1985).

27 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Papua New Guinea after its independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
St. Lucia*	April 18, 1996	February 2, 2000	KAV 5873, SDoc 105-19
St. Vincent and the Grenadines*	August 15, 1996	September 8, 1999	35 Stat. 1971, TS 495, 11 Bevans 440 49 Stat. 3198, TS 891, 11 Bevans 446, 161 LNTS 149
San Marino* Supplementary	January 10, 1906 October 10, 1934	July 8, 1908 June 28, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Seychelles*[a]	December 22, 1931[28]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Sierra Leone*[a]	December 22, 1931[29]	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122,, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 20 UST 2764, TIAS 6744, 723 UNTS 201
Singapore[a] Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931 June 10, 1969	June 24, 1935 June 10, 1969	44 Stat. 2367 49 Stat. 3253 SDoc 109-14
Slovak Republic[30]* Supplementary EU Bilateral	July 2, 1925 April 29, 1935 February 6, 2006	March 29, 1926 August 28, 1935 February 1, 2010	KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Slovenia*[a][31] EU Bilateral	October 17, 2005	February 1, 2010	28 UST 227, TIAS 8468
Solomon Islands[a]	June 8, 1972[32]	January 21, 1977	KAV 5720, SDoc 106-24, TIAS 13060

28 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to the Seychelles after its independence.

29 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Sierra Leone after independence.

30 Czechoslovakia split into the independent Czech Republic and Slovak Republic at midnight on December 31, 1991. The Czech and Slovak Republics have independent extradition agreements with the United States, which entered into force in 2010. The existing extradition treaties of 1926 and 1935 between the United States and Czechoslovakia may apply to the Czech and Slovak Republics under the doctrine of state succession. The status of the extradition treaties between the United States and Czechoslovakia is under review by the Department of State.

31 See footnote to the Treaty with Yugoslavia for more information.

32 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to the Solomon Islands after its independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
South Africa*	September 16, 1999	June 25, 2001	22 UST 737, TIAS 7136, 796 UNTS 245 29 UST 2283, TIAS 8938 KAV 1846 KAV 4922 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Spain* Supplementary Supplementary Supplementary EU Bilateral	May 29, 1970 January 25, 1975 February 9, 1988 March 12, 1996 December 17, 2004	June 16, 1971 June 2, 1978 July 2, 1993 July 25, 1999 February 1, 2010	KAV 5729, TIAS 13066
Sri Lanka[a]	September 30, 1999	January 12, 2001	26 Stat. 1481, TS 256, 10 Bevans 47 33 Stat. 2257, TS 436, 10 Bevans 53
Suriname* Extension	June 2, 1887[33] January 18, 1904[34]	July 11, 1889 August 28, 1904	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 21 UST 1930, TIAS 6934, 756 UNTS 103
Swaziland[a] Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931[35] July 28, 1970	June 24, 1935 July 28, 1970	14 UST 1845, TIAS 5496, 494 UNTS 141 35 UST 2501, TIAS 10812 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
Sweden* Supplementary EU Bilateral	October 24, 1961 March 14, 1983 December 16, 2004	December 3, 1963 September 24, 1984 February 1, 2010	KAV 2829, SDoc 104-9
Switzerland*	November 14, 1990	September 10, 1997	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 16 UST 2066, TIAS 5946

33 Treaty concluded between the United States and the Netherlands, but remains in force with respect to Suriname after its independence.

34 Treaty concluded between the United States and the Netherlands, but remains in force with respect to Suriname after its independence.

35 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Swaziland after its independence.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Tanzania* Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931[36] December 6, 1965	June 24, 1935 December 6, 1965	KAV 1940, SDoc 98-16
Thailand[a]	December 14, 1983	May 17, 1991	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59 28 UST 5290, TIAS 8628, 1087 UNTS 281
Tonga Ex. of Notes	December 22, 1931[37] April 13, 1977	August 1, 1966 April 13, 1977	KAV 5020
Trinidad and Tobago*	March 4, 1996	November 29, 1999	32 UST 3111, TIAS 9891
Turkey	June 7, 1979	January 1, 1981	28 UST 227, TIAS 8468 32 UST 1310/TIAS 9770
Tuvalu[a]	June 8, 1972[38] April 25, 1980[39]	January 21, 1977 April 25, 1980	SDoc 108-23 KAV 7088, SDoc 109-14
United Kingdom[40]* EU Bilateral	March 31, 2003 December 16, 2004	April 26, 2007 February 1, 2010	35 UST 3197, TIAS 10850
Uruguay*	April 6, 1973	April 11, 1984	43 Stat. 1698, TS 675, 12 Bevans 1128, 49 LNTS 435
Venezuela*	January 21, 1922	April 14, 1923	32 Stat. 1890, TS 406, 12 Bevans 1238

36 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Tanzania after its independence.

37 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Tonga after its independence.

38 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Tuvalu after independence.

39 This document is listed in the United States Code, but is not listed in the Department of State's list of Treaties in Force.

40 Applies to all U.K. territories including the Channel Islands, Isle of Man, Bermuda, British Indian Ocean Territory, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Falkland Islands and Dependencies, Gibralter, Montserrat, Pitcairn, Henderson, Ducie and Oeno Islands, Angilla, St. Helena and Dependencies, Sovereign Base Areas of Akrotiri and Dhekelia in the Island of Cyprus, and Turks and Caicos Islands.

Country	Date signed	Entered into Force	Citation
Yugoslavia[41]	October 25, 1901	June 12, 1902	47 Stat. 2122, TS 849, 12 Bevans 482, 163 LNTS 59
Zambia*[a]	December 22, 1931[42]	June 24, 1935	KAV 5198, SDoc 105-33
Zimbabwe	July 25, 1997	April 26, 2000

41 The former Republic of Yugoslavia began to dissolve in 1991, resulting in the creation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia, Kosovo, the Republic of Macedonia, Montenegro, the Republic of Serbia, and the Republic of Slovenia. Slovenia entered into an extradition treaty with the United States in 2010. The successor states to the Republic of Yugoslavia may be bound by the 1902 treaty of extradition between the United States and the Kingdom of Serbia, which applied to the former Republic of Yugoslavia and its above listed successor states under the doctrine of state succession. The status of the extradition treaty between the United States and Yugoslavia is under review by the Department of State.

42 Treaty concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, but remains in force with respect to Zambia after independence.

Appendix IV

Countries with Which the United States Has No Bilateral Extradition Treaty

Afghanistan
Algeria
Andorra
Angola
Armenia
Azerbaijan
Bahrain
Bangladesh
Belarus
Benin
Bhutan
Bosnia and Herzegovina*
Botswana
Brunei
Burkina Faso
Burundi
Cambodia
Cameroon
Côte D'Ivoire (Ivory Coast)
Central African Republic
Chad
China
Comoros Democratic Republic of the Congo
Côte D'Ivoire (Ivory Coast)
Cook Islands
Croatia*
Djibouti
Equatorial Guinea
Eritrea
Ethiopia
Gabon
Georgia
Guinea
Guinea-Bissau
Indonesia
Iran
Kazakhstan
North Korea
Kosovo*
Kuwait
Kyrgyzstan
Laos
Lebanon
Libya
Macedoniaa
Madagascar
Maldives
Mali
Marshall Islands
Mauritania
Micronesia
Moldova
Mongolia
Montenegro*
Morocco
Mozambique
Namibia
Nepal
Niger
Oman
Qatar
Russian Federation
Rwanda
Samoa
São Tomé and Príncipe
Saudi Arabia
Senegal
Serbia*
Somalia
Sudan
South Sudan
Syrian Arab Republic

Taiwan	Turkmenistan	Vanuatu
Tajikistan	Uganda	Vatican City
Timor-Leste	Ukraine	Vietnam
Togo	United Arab Emirates	Yemen
Tunisia	Uzbekistan

* The former Republic of Yugoslavia began to dissolve in 1991, resulting in the creation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia, Kosovo, the Republic of Macedonia, Montenegro, the Republic of Serbia, and the Republic of Slovenia. Slovenia entered into an extradition treaty with the United States in 2010. The successor states to the Republic of Yugoslavia may be bound by the 1902 treaty of extradition between the United States and the Kingdom of Serbia, which applied to the former Republic of Yugoslavia and its above-listed successor states under the doctrine of state succession. The status of the extradition treaty between the United States and Yugoslavia is under review by the Department of State. Various federal district courts have recognized several of the above-listed countries as successor states, see, e.g., Arambasic v. Ashcroft, 403 F. Supp. 2d 951 (D.S.D. 2005) (Croatia); Sacirbey v. Guccione, 2006 WL 2585561 (No. 05 Cv. 2949(BSJ)(FM)) (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2006) (Bosnia and Herzegovina), overruled on other grounds by 589 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 2009), Zelenovic v. O'Malley, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92632 (N.D. Il. 2010) (Serbia).

Appendix V

Countries with Which the United States Has Signed an "Article 98" Agreement Not to Surrender Its Citizens to the International Criminal Court

Afghanistan
Albania
Algeria
Angola
Antigua and Barbuda
Armenia
Azerbaijan
Bangladesh
Belize
Benin
Bhutan
Bosnia and Herzegovina
Botswana
Brunei
Burkina Faso
Burundi
Cambodia
Cameroon
Cape Verde
Central African Republic
Chad
Colombia
Comoros
Democratic Republic of the Congo
Republic of Congo
Côte D'Ivoire (Ivory Coast)
Djibouti
Dominica
Dominican Republic
Egypt
El Salvador
Equatorial Guinea
Eritrea
Fiji
Gabon
Gambia
Georgia
Ghana
Grenada
Guinea
Guinea-Bissau
Guyana
Haiti
Honduras
India
Israel
Kazakhstan
Kiribati
Laos
Lesotho
Liberia Macedonia
Madagascar
Malawi
Maldives
Marshall Islands
Mauritania
Mauritius
Micronesia
Mongolia
Montenegro
Morocco
Mozambique
Nauru
Nepal
Nicaragua
Nigeria
Oman
Pakistan
Palau Panama
Papua New Guinea
Philippines
Rwanda

St. Kitts and Nevis
São Tomé and Príncipe
Senegal
Seychelles
Sierra Leone
Singapore
Solomon Islands
Sri Lanka
Swaziland
Tajikistan
Thailand
Timor-Leste (East Timor)
Togo
Tonga
Tunisia
Turkmenistan
Tuvalu
Uganda
United Arab Emirates
Uzbekistan
Yemen
Zambia

Appendix VI

United States Legislation Applicable to Extradition

TITLE 18—CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURES
CHAPTER 209—EXTRADITION[1]

Sec.

Amendments

1996 - Pub. L. 104-294, title VI, Sec. 601(f)(9), (10), Oct. 11, 1996, 110 Stat. 3500, inserted comma after "District" in item 3182 and after "Territory" in item 3183.

1990 - Pub. L. 101-623, Sec. 11(b), Nov. 21, 1990, 104 Stat. 3356, added item 3196.

---

1 18 U.S.C. § 209 (2012) (http://uscode.house.gov/download/pls/18C209.txt).

SECTION 3181. SCOPE AND LIMITATION OF CHAPTER

(a) The provisions of this chapter relating to the surrender of persons who have committed crimes in foreign countries shall continue in force only during the existence of any treaty of extradition with such foreign government.

(b) The provisions of this chapter shall be construed to permit, in the exercise of comity, the surrender of persons, other than citizens, nationals, or permanent residents of the United States, who have committed crimes of violence against nationals of the United States in foreign countries without regard to the existence of any treaty of extradition with such foreign government if the Attorney General certifies, in writing, that -

(1) evidence has been presented by the foreign government that indicates that had the offenses been committed in the United States, they would constitute crimes of violence as defined under section 16 of this title; and

(2) the offenses charged are not of a political nature.

(c) As used in this section, the term "national of the United States" has the meaning given such term in section 101(a)(22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(22)).

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822; Pub. L. 104-132, title IV, Sec. 443(a), Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1280.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 658 (R.S. Sec. 5274).

Minor changes were made in phraseology.

Amendments

1996 - Pub. L. 104-132 designated existing provisions as subsec. (a) and added subsecs. (b) and (c).

Extradition Treaties Interpretation

Pub. L. 105-323, title II, Oct. 30, 1998, 112 Stat. 3033, provided that:

"SEC. 201. SHORT TITLE.

"This title may be cited as the 'Extradition Treaties Interpretation Act of 1998.'

"SEC. 202. FINDINGS.

"Congress finds that -

"(1) each year, several hundred children are kidnapped by a parent in violation of law, court order, or legally binding agreement and brought to, or taken from, the United States;

"(2) until the mid-1970's, parental abduction generally was not considered a criminal offense in the United States;

"(3) since the mid-1970's, United States criminal law has evolved such that parental abduction is now a criminal offense in each of the 50 States and the District of Columbia;

"(4) in enacting the International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act of 1993 (Public Law 103-173; 107 Stat. 1998; 18 U.S.C. 1204), Congress recognized the need to combat parental abduction by making the act of international parental kidnapping a Federal criminal offense;

"(5) many of the extradition treaties to which the United States is a party specifically list the offenses that are extraditable and use the word 'kidnapping,' but it has been the practice of the United States not to consider the term to include parental abduction because these treaties were negotiated by the United States prior to the development in United States criminal law described in paragraphs (3) and (4);

"(6) the more modern extradition treaties to which the United States is a party contain dual criminality provisions, which provide for extradition where both parties make the offense a felony, and therefore it is the practice of the United States to consider such treaties to include parental abduction if the other foreign state party also considers the act of parental abduction to be a criminal offense; and

"(7) this circumstance has resulted in a disparity in United States extradition law which should be rectified to better protect the interests of children and their parents.

"SEC. 203. INTERPRETATION OF EXTRADITION TREATIES.

"For purposes of any extradition treaty to which the United States is a party, Congress authorizes the interpretation of the terms 'kidnaping' and 'kidnapping' to include parental kidnapping."

Judicial Assistance to International Tribunal for Yugoslavia and International Tribunal for Rwanda

Pub. L. 104-106, div. A, title XIII, Sec. 1342, Feb. 10, 1996, 110 Stat. 486, as amended by Pub. L. 111-117, div. F, title VII, Sec. 7034(t), Dec. 16, 2009, 123 Stat. 3364, provided that:

"(a) Surrender of Persons. –

"(1) Application of united states extradition laws.—Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), the provisions of chapter 209 of title 18, United States Code, relating to the extradition of persons to a foreign country pursuant to a treaty or convention for extradition between the United States and a foreign government, shall apply in the same manner and extent to the surrender of persons, including United States citizens, to –

"(A) the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia, pursuant to the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia; and

"(B) the International Tribunal for Rwanda, pursuant to the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

"(2) Evidence on hearings.—For purposes of applying section 3190 of title 18, United States Code, in accordance with paragraph (1), the certification referred to in that section may be made by the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign countries where the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia or the International Tribunal for Rwanda may be permanently or temporarily situated.

"(3) Payment of fees and costs. –

"(A) The provisions of the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia and of the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall apply in lieu of the provisions of section 3195 of title 18, United States Code, with respect to the payment of expenses arising from the surrender by the United States of a person to the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia or the International Tribunal for Rwanda, respectively, or from any proceedings in the United States relating to such surrender.

"(B) The authority of subparagraph (A) may be exercised only to the extent and in the amounts provided in advance in appropriations Acts.

"(4) Nonapplicability of the federal rules.—The Federal Rules of Evidence [set out in the Appendix to Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure] and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure [set out in the Appendix to this title] do not apply to proceedings for the surrender of persons to the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia or the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

"(b) Assistance to Foreign and International Tribunals and to Litigants Before Such Tribunals.—[Amended section 1782 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.]

"(c) Definitions.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) International tribunal for yugoslavia.—The term 'International Tribunal for Yugoslavia' means the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, as established by United Nations Security Council Resolution 827 of May 25, 1993.

"(2) International tribunal for rwanda.—The term 'International Tribunal for Rwanda' means the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States, as established by United Nations Security Council Resolution 955 of November 8, 1994.

"(3) Agreement between the united states and the international tribunal for yugoslavia.—The term 'Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia' means the Agreement on Surrender of Persons Between the Government of the United States and the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Law in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, signed at The Hague, October 5, 1994, as amended.

"(4) Agreement between the united states and the international tribunal for rwanda.—The term 'Agreement between the United States and the International Tribunal for Rwanda' means the Agreement on Surrender of Persons Between the Government of the United States and the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States, signed at The Hague, January 24, 1995."

Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance Treaties and Model Comprehensive Antidrug Laws

Pub. L. 100-690, title IV, Sec. 4605, Nov. 18, 1988, 102 Stat. 4290, which directed greater emphasis on updating of extradition treaties and on negotiating mutual legal assistance treaties with major drug producing and drug-transit countries, and called for development of model treaties and anti-narcotics legislation, was repealed by Pub. L. 102-583, Sec. 6(e)(1), Nov. 2, 1992, 106 Stat. 4933.

Pub. L. 100-204, title VIII, Sec. 803, Dec. 22, 1987, 101 Stat. 1397, provided that: "The Secretary of State shall ensure that the Country Plan for the United States diplomatic mission in each major illicit drug producing country and in each major drug-transit country (as those terms are defined in section 481(i) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 [22 U.S.C. 2291(i)]) includes, as an objective to be pursued by the mission –

"(1) negotiating an updated extradition treaty which ensures that drug traffickers can be extradited to the United States, or

"(2) if an existing treaty provides for such extradition, taking such steps as may be necessary to ensure that the treaty is effectively implemented."

Pub. L. 99-93, title I, Sec. 133, Aug. 16, 1985, 99 Stat. 420, provided that: "The Secretary of State, with the assistance of the National Drug Enforcement Policy Board, shall increase United States efforts to negotiate updated extradition treaties relating to narcotics offenses with each major drug-producing country, particularly those in Latin America."

Extradition Agreements

The United States currently has bilateral extradition agreements with the following countries:

Country	Date signed	Entered into force	Citation
Albania	Mar. 1, 1933	Nov. 14, 1935	49 Stat. 3313.
Antigua and Barbuda	June 3, 1996	July 1, 1999	TIAS.
Argentina	June 10, 1997	June 15, 2000	TIAS 12866.
Australia	Dec. 22, 1931	Aug. 30, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	May 14, 1974	May 8, 1976	27 UST 957.
	Sept. 4, 1990	Dec. 21, 1992	1736 UNTS 344.
Austria	Jan. 8, 1998	Jan. 1, 2000	TIAS 12916.
	July 20, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Bahamas	Mar. 9, 1990	Sept. 22, 1994	TIAS.
Barbados	Feb. 28, 1996	Mar. 3, 2000	TIAS.
Belgium	Apr. 27, 1987	Sept. 1, 1997	TIAS.
	Dec. 16, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
Belize	Mar. 30, 2000	Mar. 27, 2001	TIAS.
Bolivia	June 27, 1995	Nov. 21, 1996	TIAS.
Brazil	Jan. 13, 1961	Dec. 17, 1964	15 UST 2093.
	June 18, 1962	Dec. 17, 1964	15 UST 2112.
Bulgaria	Mar. 19, 1924	June 24, 1924	43 Stat. 1886.
	June 8, 1934	Aug. 15, 1935	49 Stat. 3250.
	Sept. 19, 2007	May 21, 2009
Burma	Dec. 22, 1931	Nov. 1, 1941	47 Stat. 2122.
Canada	Dec. 3, 1971	Mar. 22, 1976	27 UST 983.
	June 28, July	Mar. 22, 1976	27 UST 1017.
	July 9, 1974	Mar. 22, 1976	27 UST 1017.
	Jan. 11, 1988	Nov. 26, 1991	TIAS.
	Jan. 12, 2001	Apr. 30, 2003
Chile	Apr. 17, 1900	June 26, 1902	32 Stat. 1850.
Colombia	Sept. 14, 1979	Mar. 4, 1982	TIAS.
Congo (Brazzaville)	Jan. 6, 1909	July 27, 1911	37 Stat. 1526.
	Jan. 15, 1929	May 19, 1929	46 Stat. 2276.
	Apr. 23, 1936	Sept. 24, 1936	50 Stat. 1117.
Costa Rica	Dec. 4, 1982	Oct. 11, 1991	TIAS.
Cuba	Apr. 6, 1904	Mar. 2, 1905	33 Stat. 2265.
	Dec. 6, 1904	Mar. 2, 1905	33 Stat. 2273.
	Jan. 14, 1926	June 18, 1926	44 Stat. 2392.
Cyprus	June 17, 1996	Sept. 14, 1999	TIAS.

Country	Date signed	Entered into force	Citation
		Jan. 20, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Czech Republic (!1)	July 2, 1925	Mar. 29, 1926	44 Stat. 2367.
	Apr. 29, 1935	Aug. 28, 1935	49 Stat. 3253.
	May 16, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Denmark	June 22, 1972	July 31, 1974	25 UST 1293.
	June 23, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Dominica	Oct. 10, 1996	May 25, 2000	TIAS.
Dominican Republic	June 19, 1909	Aug. 2, 1910	36 Stat. 2468.
Ecuador	June 28, 1872	Nov. 12, 1873	18 Stat. 199.
	Sept. 22, 1939	May 29, 1941	55 Stat. 1196.
Egypt	Aug. 11, 1874	Apr. 22, 1875	19 Stat. 572.
El Salvador	Apr. 18, 1911	July 10, 1911	37 Stat. 1516.
Estonia	Nov. 8, 1923	Nov. 15, 1924	43 Stat. 1849.
	Oct. 10, 1934	May 7, 1935	49 Stat. 3190.
	Feb. 8, 2006	Apr. 7, 2009
European Union	June 25, 2003	Feb. 1, 2010
Fiji	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	July 14, 1972	Aug. 17, 1973	24 UST 1965.
Finland	June 11, 1976	May 11, 1980	31 UST 944.
	Dec. 16, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
France	Apr. 23, 1996	Feb. 1, 2002	TIAS.
		Sept. 30, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
Gambia	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Germany	June 20, 1978	Aug. 29, 1980	32 UST 1485.
	Oct. 21, 1986	Mar. 11, 1993	TIAS.
	Apr. 18, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Ghana	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Greece	May 6, 1931	Nov. 1, 1932	47 Stat. 2185.
	Sept. 2, 1937	Sept. 2, 1937	51 Stat. 357.
	Jan. 18, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Grenada	May 30, 1996	Sept. 14, 1999	TIAS.
Guatemala	Feb. 27, 1903	Aug. 15, 1903	33 Stat. 2147.
	Feb. 20, 1940	Mar. 13, 1941	55 Stat. 1097.
Guyana	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Haiti	Aug. 9, 1904	June 28, 1905	34 Stat. 2858.
Honduras	Jan. 15, 1909	July 10, 1912	37 Stat. 1616.
	Feb. 21, 1927	June 5, 1928	45 Stat. 2489.
Hong Kong	Dec. 20, 1996	Jan. 21, 1998	TIAS.

Country	Date signed	Entered into force	Citation
Hungary	Dec. 1, 1994	Mar. 18, 1997	TIAS.
	Nov. 15, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Iceland	Jan. 6, 1902	May 16, 1902	32 Stat. 1096.
	Nov. 6, 1905	Feb. 19, 1906	34 Stat. 2887.
India	June 25, 1997	July 21, 1999	TIAS 12873.
Iraq	June 7, 1934	Apr. 23, 1936	49 Stat. 3380.
Ireland	July 13, 1983	Dec. 15, 1984	TIAS 10813.
	July 14, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Israel	Dec. 10, 1962	Dec. 5, 1963	14 UST 1707. (!2)
	July 6, 2005	Jan. 10, 2007
Italy	Oct. 13, 1983	Sept. 24, 1984	35 UST 3023.
	May 3, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Jamaica	June 14, 1983	July 7, 1991	TIAS.
Japan	Mar. 3, 1978	Mar. 26, 1980	31 UST 892.
Jordan	Mar. 28, 1995	July 29, 1995	TIAS.
Kenya	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	May 14, Aug.	Aug. 19, 1965	16 UST 1866.
Kiribati	June 8, 1972	Jan. 21, 1977	28 UST 227.
Latvia	Oct. 16, 1923	Mar. 1, 1924	43 Stat. 1738.
	Oct. 10, 1934	Mar. 29, 1935	49 Stat. 3131.
	Dec. 7, 2005	Apr. 15, 2009
Lesotho	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Liberia	Nov. 1, 1937	Nov. 21, 1939	54 Stat. 1733.
Liechtenstein	May 20, 1936	June 28, 1937	50 Stat. 1337.
Lithuania	Oct. 23, 2001	Mar. 31, 2003	TIAS 13166.
	June 15, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Luxembourg	Oct. 1, 1996	Feb. 1, 2002	TIAS 12804.
	Feb. 1, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Malawi	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	Dec. 17, 1966	Apr. 4, 1967	18 UST 1822.
Malaysia	Aug. 3, 1995	June 2, 1997	TIAS.
Malta	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	May 18, 2006	July 1, 2009
Marshall Islands	Apr. 30, 2003	May 1, 2004
Mauritius	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Mexico	May 4, 1978	Jan. 25, 1980	31 UST 5059.
	Nov. 13, 1997	May 21, 2001	TIAS 12897.
Micronesia, Federated States of	May 14, 2003	June 25, 2004

Country	Date signed	Entered into force	Citation
Monaco	Feb. 15, 1939	Mar. 28, 1940	54 Stat. 1780.
Nauru	Dec. 22, 1931	Aug. 30, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Netherlands	June 24, 1980	Sept. 15, 1983	35 UST 1334.
	Sept. 29, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
New Zealand	Jan. 12, 1970	Dec. 8, 1970	22 UST 1.
Nicaragua	Mar. 1, 1905	July 14, 1907	35 Stat. 1869.
Nigeria	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Norway	June 9, 1977	Mar. 7, 1980	31 UST 5619.
Pakistan	Dec. 22, 1931	Mar. 9, 1942	47 Stat. 2122.
Panama	May 25, 1904	May 8, 1905	34 Stat. 2851.
Papua New Guinea	Dec. 22, 1931	Aug. 30, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	Feb. 2, 23, 1988	Feb. 23, 1988	TIAS.
Paraguay	Nov. 9, 1998	Mar. 9, 2001	TIAS 12995.
Peru	July 26, 2001	Aug. 25, 2003
Philippines	Nov. 13, 1994	Nov. 22, 1996	TIAS.
Poland	July 10, 1996	Sept. 17, 1999	TIAS.
	June 9, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Portugal	May 7, 1908	Nov. 14, 1908	35 Stat. 2071.
	July 14, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Romania	July 23, 1924	Apr. 7, 1925	44 Stat. 2020.
	Nov. 10, 1936	July 27, 1937	50 Stat. 1349.
	Sept. 10, 2007	May 8, 2009
Saint Kitts and Nevis	Sept. 18, 1996	Feb. 23, 2000	TIAS 12805.
Saint Lucia	Apr. 18, 1996	Feb. 2, 2000	TIAS.
Saint Vincent and the Grenadines	Aug. 15, 1996	Sept. 8, 1999	TIAS.
San Marino	Jan. 10, 1906	July 8, 1908	35 Stat. 1971.
	Oct. 10, 1934	June 28, 1935	49 Stat. 3198.
Seychelles	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Sierra Leone	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Singapore	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	Apr. 23, June	June 10, 1969	20 UST 2764.
Slovakia (!1)	July 2, 1925	Mar. 29, 1926	44 Stat. 2367.
	Apr. 29, 1935	Aug. 28, 1935	49 Stat. 3253.
	Feb. 6, 2006	Feb. 1, 2010
Slovenia (!1)	Oct. 17, 2005	Feb. 1, 2010
Solomon Islands	June 8, 1972	Jan. 21, 1977	28 UST 277.
South Africa	Sept. 16, 1999	June 25, 2001	TIAS.
South Korea	June 9, 1998	Dec. 20, 1999	TIAS 12962.

Country	Date signed	Entered into force	Citation
Spain	May 29, 1970	June 16, 1971	22 UST 737.
	Jan. 25, 1975	June 2, 1978	29 UST 2283.
	Feb. 9, 1988	July 2, 1993	TIAS.
	Mar. 12, 1996	July 25, 1999	TIAS.
	Dec. 17, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
Sri Lanka	Sept. 30, 1999	Jan. 12, 2001	TIAS.
Suriname	June 2, 1887	July 11, 1889	26 Stat. 1481.
	Jan. 18, 1904	Aug. 28, 1904	33 Stat. 2257.
Swaziland	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	May 13, July	July 28, 1970	21 UST 1930.
Sweden	Oct. 24, 1961	Dec. 3, 1963	14 UST 1845.
	Mar. 14, 1983	Sept. 24, 1984	35 UST 2501.
	Dec. 16, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
Switzerland	Nov. 14, 1990	Sept. 10, 1997	TIAS.
Tanzania	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
	Nov. 30, Dec.	Dec. 6, 1965	16 UST 2066.
Thailand	Dec. 14, 1983	May 17, 1991	TIAS.
Tonga	Dec. 22, 1931	Aug. 1, 1966	47 Stat. 2122.
	Mar. 14, Apr.	Apr. 13, 1977	28 UST 5290.
Trinidad and Tobago	Mar. 4, 1996	Nov. 29, 1999	TIAS.
Turkey	June 7, 1979	Jan. 1, 1981	32 UST 3111.
Tuvalu	June 8, 1972	Jan. 21, 1977	28 UST 227.
		Apr. 25, 1980	32 UST 1310.
United Kingdom	Mar. 31, 2003	Apr. 26, 2007
	Dec. 16, 2004	Feb. 1, 2010
Uruguay	Apr. 6, 1973	Apr. 11, 1984	35 UST 3197.
Venezuela	Jan. 21, 1922	Apr. 14, 1923	43 Stat. 1698.
Yugoslavia (!1)	Oct. 25, 1901	June 12, 1902	32 Stat. 1890.
Zambia	Dec. 22, 1931	June 24, 1935	47 Stat. 2122.
Zimbabwe	July 25, 1997	Apr. 26, 2000

(!1) Status of agreements with successor states of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia is under review; inquire of the Treaty Office of the United States Department of State.

(!2) Typographical error corrected by diplomatic notes exchanged Apr. 4 and 11, 1967. See 18 UST 382, 383.

Convention on Extradition

The United States is a party to the Multilateral Convention on Extradition signed at Montevideo on Dec. 26, 1933, entered into force for the United States on Jan. 25, 1935. 49 Stat. 3111. Other states which have become parties: Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama.

Sec. 3182. FUGITIVES FROM STATE OR TERRITORY TO STATE, DISTRICT, OR TERRITORY

Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State, District, or Territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory, charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the State or Territory from whence the person so charged has fled, the executive authority of the State, District, or Territory to which such person has fled shall cause him to be arrested and secured, and notify the executive authority making such demand, or the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and shall cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear. If no such agent appears within thirty days from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822; Pub. L. 104-294, title VI, Sec. 601(f)(9), Oct. 11, 1996, 110 Stat. 3500.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 662 (R.S. Sec. 5278). Last sentence as to costs and expenses to be paid by the demanding authority was incorporated in section 3195 of this title.

Word "District" was inserted twice to make section equally applicable to fugitives found in the District of Columbia.

"Thirty days" was substituted for "six months" since, in view of modern conditions, the smaller time is ample for the demanding authority to act.

Minor changes were made in phraseology.

Amendments

1996 - Pub. L. 104-294 inserted comma after "District" in section catchline and in two places in text.

Sec. 3183. FUGITIVES FROM STATE, TERRITORY, OR POSSESSION INTO EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES

Whenever the executive authority of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States demands any American citizen or national as a fugitive from justice who has fled to a country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of the demanding jurisdiction, charging the fugitive so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other offense, certified as authentic by the Governor or chief magistrate of such demanding jurisdiction, or other person authorized to act, the officer or representative of the United States vested with judicial authority to whom the demand has been made shall cause such fugitive to be arrested and secured, and notify the executive authorities making such demand, or the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and shall cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear.

If no such agent shall appear within three months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged.

The agent who receives the fugitive into his custody shall be empowered to transport him to the jurisdiction from which he has fled.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822; Pub. L. 107-273, div. B, title IV, Sec. 4004(d), Nov. 2, 2002, 116 Stat. 1812.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 662c (Mar. 22, 1934, ch. 73, Sec. 2, 48 Stat. 455).

Said section 662c was incorporated in this section and sections 752 and 3195 of this title.

Provision as to costs or expenses to be paid by the demanding authority were incorporated in section 3196 of this title.

Reference to the Philippine Islands was deleted as obsolete in view of the independence of the Commonwealth of the Philippines effective July 4, 1946.

The attention of Congress is directed to the probability that this section may be of little, if any, possible use in view of present world conditions.

Minor changes were made in phraseology.

Amendments

2002 - Pub. L. 107-273 struck out "or the Panama Canal Zone," after "possession of the United States" in first par.

Sec. 3184. FUGITIVES FROM FOREIGN COUNTRY TO UNITED STATES

Whenever there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the United States and any foreign government, or in cases arising under section 3181(b), any justice or judge of the United States, or any magistrate judge authorized so to do by a court of the United States, or any judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any State, may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person found within his jurisdiction, with having committed within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention, or provided for under section 3181(b), issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such justice, judge, or magistrate judge, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. Such complaint may be filed before and such warrant may be issued by a judge or magistrate judge of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia if the whereabouts within the United States of the person charged are not known or, if there is reason to believe the person will shortly enter the United States. If, on such hearing, he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, or under section 3181(b), he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of State, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the treaty or convention; and he shall issue his warrant for the commitment of the person so charged to the proper jail, there to remain until such surrender shall be made.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822; Pub. L. 90-578, title III, Sec. 301(a)(3), Oct. 17, 1968, 82 Stat. 1115; Pub. L. 100-690, title VII, Sec. 7087, Nov. 18, 1988, 102 Stat. 4409; Pub. L. 101-647, title XVI, Sec. 1605, Nov. 29, 1990, 104 Stat. 4843; Pub. L. 101-650, title III, Sec. 321, Dec. 1, 1990, 104 Stat. 5117; Pub. L. 104-132, title IV, Sec. 443(b), Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1281.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 651 (R.S. Sec. 5270; June 6, 1900, ch. 793, 31 Stat. 656).

Minor changes of phraseology were made.

Amendments

1996 - Pub. L. 104-132, in first sentence, inserted "or in cases arising under section 3181(b)," after "United States and any foreign government," and "or provided for under section 3181(b)," after "treaty or convention," and in third sentence, inserted "or under section 3181(b)," after "treaty or convention,."

1990 - Pub. L. 101-647 inserted "or, if there is reason to believe the person will shortly enter the United States" after "are not known" in second sentence.

1988 - Pub. L. 100-690 inserted after first sentence "Such complaint may be filed before and such warrant may be issued by a judge or magistrate of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia if the whereabouts within the United States of the person charged are not known."

1968 - Pub. L. 90-578 substituted "magistrate" for "commissioner" in two places.

Change of Name

Words "magistrate judge" substituted for "magistrate" wherever appearing in text pursuant to section 321 of Pub. L. 101-650, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Effective Date of 1968 Amendment

Amendment by Pub. L. 90-578 effective Oct. 17, 1968, except when a later effective date is applicable, which is the earlier of date when implementation of amendment by appointment of magistrates [now United States magistrate judges] and assumption of office takes place or third anniversary of enactment of Pub. L. 90-578 on Oct. 17, 1968, see section 403 of Pub. L. 90-578, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Sec. 3185. FUGITIVES FROM COUNTRY UNDER CONTROL OF UNITED STATES INTO THE UNITED STATES

Whenever any foreign country or territory, or any part thereof, is occupied by or under the control of the United States, any person who, having violated the criminal laws in force therein by the commission of any of the offenses enumerated below, departs or flees from justice therein to the United States, shall, when found therein, be liable to arrest and detention by the authorities of the United States, and on the written request or requisition of the military governor or other chief executive officer in control of such foreign country or territory shall be returned and surrendered as hereinafter provided to such authorities for trial under the laws in force in the place where such offense was committed.

(1) Murder and assault with intent to commit murder;

(2) Counterfeiting or altering money, or uttering or bringing into circulation counterfeit or altered money;

(3) Counterfeiting certificates or coupons of public indebtedness, bank notes, or other instruments of public credit, and the utterance or circulation of the same;

(4) Forgery or altering and uttering what is forged or altered;

(5) Embezzlement or criminal malversation of the public funds, committed by public officers, employees, or depositaries;

(6) Larceny or embezzlement of an amount not less than $100 in value;

(7) Robbery;

(8) Burglary, defined to be the breaking and entering by nighttime into the house of another person with intent to commit a felony therein;

(9) Breaking and entering the house or building of another, whether in the day or nighttime, with the intent to commit a felony therein;

(10) Entering, or breaking and entering the offices of the Government and public authorities, or the offices of banks, banking houses, savings banks, trust companies, insurance or other companies, with the intent to commit a felony therein;

(11) Perjury or the subornation of perjury;

(12) A felony under chapter 109A of this title;

(13) Arson;

(14) Piracy by the law of nations;

(15) Murder, assault with intent to kill, and manslaughter, committed on the high seas, on board a ship owned by or in control of citizens or residents of such foreign country or territory and not under the flag of the United States, or of some other government;

(16) Malicious destruction of or attempt to destroy railways, trams, vessels, bridges, dwellings, public edifices, or other buildings, when the act endangers human life.

This chapter, so far as applicable, shall govern proceedings authorized by this section. Such proceedings shall be had before a judge of the courts of the United States only, who shall hold such person on evidence establishing probable cause that he is guilty of the offense charged.

No return or surrender shall be made of any person charged with the commission of any offense of a political nature.

If so held, such person shall be returned and surrendered to the authorities in control of such foreign country or territory on the order of the Secretary of State of the United States, and such authorities shall secure to such a person a fair and impartial trial.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 823; May 24, 1949, ch. 139, Sec. 49, 63 Stat. 96; Pub. L. 99-646, Sec. 87(c)(6), Nov. 10, 1986, 100 Stat. 3623; Pub. L. 99-654, Sec. 3(a)(6), Nov. 14, 1986, 100 Stat. 3663.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

1948 ACT

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 652 (R.S. Sec. 5270; June 6, 1900, ch. 793, 31 Stat. 656).

Reference to territory of the United States and the District of Columbia was omitted as covered by definitive section 5 of this title.

Changes were made in phraseology and arrangement.

1949 ACT

This section [section 49] corrects typographical errors in section 3185 of title 18, U.S.C., by transferring to subdivision (3) the words, "indebtedness, bank notes, or other instruments of public," from subdivision (2) of such section where they had been erroneously included.

Amendments

1986 - Par. (12). Pub. L. 99-646 and Pub. L. 99-654 amended par. (12) identically, substituting "A felony under chapter 109A of this title" for "Rape."

1949 - Pars. (2), (3). Act May 24, 1949, transferred "indebtedness, bank notes, or other instruments of public" from par. (2) to par. (3).

Effective Date of 1986 Amendments

Amendments by Pub. L. 99-646 and Pub. L. 99-654 effective, respectively, 30 days after Nov. 10, 1986, and 30 days after Nov. 14, 1986, see section 87(e) of Pub. L. 99-646 and section 4 of Pub. L. 99-654, set out as an Effective Date note under section 2241 of this title.

Sec. 3186. SECRETARY OF STATE TO SURRENDER FUGITIVE

The Secretary of State may order the person committed under sections 3184 or 3185 of this title to be delivered to any authorized agent of such foreign government, to be tried for the offense of which charged.

Such agent may hold such person in custody, and take him to the territory of such foreign government, pursuant to such treaty.

A person so accused who escapes may be retaken in the same manner as any person accused of any offense.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 824.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 653 (R.S. Sec. 5272).

Changes were made in phraseology and surplusage was deleted.

Sec. 3187. PROVISIONAL ARREST AND DETENTION WITHIN EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION

The provisional arrest and detention of a fugitive, under sections 3042 and 3183 of this title, in advance of the presentation of formal proofs, may be obtained by telegraph upon the request of the authority competent to request the surrender of such fugitive addressed to the authority competent to grant such surrender. Such request shall be accompanied by an express statement that a warrant for the fugitive's arrest has been issued within the jurisdiction of the authority making such request charging the fugitive with the commission of the crime for which his extradition is sought to be obtained.

No person shall be held in custody under telegraphic request by virtue of this section for more than ninety days.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 824.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 662d (Mar. 22, 1934, ch. 73, Sec. 3, 48 Stat. 455).

Provision for expense to be borne by the demanding authority is incorporated in section 3195 of this title.

Changes were made in phraseology and arrangement.

Sec. 3188. TIME OF COMMITMENT PENDING EXTRADITION

Whenever any person who is committed for rendition to a foreign government to remain until delivered up in pursuance of a requisition, is not so delivered up and conveyed out of the United States within two calendar months after such commitment, over and above the time actually required to convey the prisoner from the jail to which he was committed, by the readiest way, out of the United States, any judge of the United States, or of any State, upon application made to him by or on behalf of the person so committed, and upon proof made to him that reasonable notice of the intention to make such application has been given to the Secretary of State, may order the person so committed to be discharged out of custody, unless sufficient cause is shown to such judge why such discharge ought not to be ordered.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 824.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 654 (R.S. Sec. 5273).

Changes in phraseology only were made.

Sec. 3189. PLACE AND CHARACTER OF HEARING

Hearings in cases of extradition under treaty stipulation or convention shall be held on land, publicly, and in a room or office easily accessible to the public.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 824.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 657 (Aug. 3, 1882, ch. 378, Sec. 1, 22 Stat. 215).

First word "All" was omitted as unnecessary.

Sec. 3190. EVIDENCE ON HEARING

Depositions, warrants, or other papers or copies thereof offered in evidence upon the hearing of any extradition case shall be received and admitted as evidence on such hearing for all the purposes of such hearing if they shall be properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped, and the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign country shall be proof that the same, so offered, are authenticated in the manner required.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 824.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 655 (R.S. Sec. 5271; Aug. 3, 1882, ch. 378, Sec. 5, 22 Stat. 216).

Unnecessary words were deleted.

Sec. 3191. WITNESSES FOR INDIGENT FUGITIVES

On the hearing of any case under a claim of extradition by a foreign government, upon affidavit being filed by the person charged setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense, that he cannot safely go to trial without them, what he expects to prove by each of them, and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the judge or magistrate judge hearing the matter may order that such witnesses be subpenaed; and the costs incurred by the process, and the fees of witnesses, shall be paid in the same manner as in the case of witnesses subpenaed in behalf of the United States.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 825; Pub. L. 90-578, title III, Sec. 301(a)(3), Oct. 17, 1968, 82 Stat. 1115; Pub. L. 101-650, title III, Sec. 321, Dec. 1, 1990, 104 Stat. 5117.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 656 (Aug. 3, 1882, ch. 378, Sec. 3, 22 Stat. 215).

Words "that similar" after "manner" were omitted as unnecessary.

Amendments

1968 - Pub. L. 90-578 substituted "magistrate" for "commissioner."

Change of Name

Words "magistrate judge" substituted for "magistrate" in text pursuant to section 321 of Pub. L. 101-650, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Effective Date of 1968 Amendment

Amendment by Pub. L. 90-578 effective Oct. 17, 1968, except when a later effective date is applicable, which is the earlier of date when implementation of amendment by appointment of magistrates [now United States magistrate judges] and assumption of office takes place or third anniversary of enactment of Pub. L. 90-578 on Oct. 17, 1968, see section 403 of Pub. L. 90-578, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Sec. 3192. PROTECTION OF ACCUSED

Whenever any person is delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any offense of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safekeeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence, until the final conclusion of his trial for the offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter, and may employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe-keeping and protection of the accused.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 825.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 659 (R.S. Sec. 5275).

Words "crimes or" before "offenses" were omitted as unnecessary.

Sec. 3193. RECEIVING AGENT'S AUTHORITY OVER OFFENDERS

A duly appointed agent to receive, in behalf of the United States, the delivery, by a foreign government, of any person accused of crime committed within the United States, and to convey him to the place of his trial, shall have all the powers of a marshal of the United States, in the several districts through which it may be necessary for him to pass with such prisoner, so far as such power is requisite for the prisoner's safe-keeping.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 825.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 660 (R.S. Sec. 5276).

Words "jurisdiction of the" were omitted in view of the definition of United States in section 5 of this title.

Minor changes only were made in phraseology.

Ex. Ord. No. 11517. Issuance And Signature By Secretary Of State Of Warrants Appointing Agents To Return Fugitives From Justice Extradited To United States

Ex. Ord. No. 11517, Mar. 19, 1970, 35 F.R. 4937, provided:

WHEREAS the President of the United States, under section 3192 of Title 18, United States Code, has been granted the power to take all necessary measures for the transportation, safekeeping and security against lawless violence of any person delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States for return to the United States for trial for any offense of which he is duly accused; and

WHEREAS fugitives from justice in the United States whose extradition from abroad has been requested by the Government of the United States and granted by a foreign government are to be returned in the custody of duly appointed agents in accordance with the provisions of section 3193 of Title 18, United States Code; and

WHEREAS such duly appointed agents under the provisions of the law mentioned above, being authorized to receive delivery of the fugitive in behalf of the United States and to convey him to the place of his trial, are given the powers of a marshal of the United States in the several districts of the United States through which it may be necessary for them to pass with such prisoner, so far as such power is requisite for the prisoner's safekeeping; and

WHEREAS such warrants serve as a certification to the foreign government delivering the fugitives to any other foreign country through which such agents may pass, and to authorities in the United States of the powers therein conferred upon the agents; and

WHEREAS it is desirable by delegation of functions heretofore performed by the President to simplify and thereby expedite the issuance of such warrants to agents in the interests of the prompt return of fugitives to the United States:

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me by section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States, it is ordered as follows:

Section 1. The Secretary of State is hereby designated and empowered to issue and sign all warrants appointing agents to receive, in behalf of the United States, the delivery in extradition by a foreign government of any person accused of a crime committed within the United States, and to convey such person to the place of his trial.

Sec. 2. Agents appointed in accordance with section 1 of this order shall have all the powers conferred in respect of such agents by applicable treaties of the United States and by section 3193 of Title 18, United States Code, or by any other provisions of United States law.

Sec. 3. Executive Order No. 10347, April 18, 1952, as amended by Executive Order No. 11354, May 23, 1967, is further amended by deleting numbered paragraph 4 and renumbering paragraphs 5 and 6 as paragraphs 4 and 5, respectively.

Richard Nixon.

Sec. 3194. TRANSPORTATION OF FUGITIVE BY RECEIVING AGENT

Any agent appointed as provided in section 3182 of this title who receives the fugitive into his custody is empowered to transport him to the State or Territory from which he has fled.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 825.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Sec. 663 (R.S. Sec. 5279).

Last sentence of said section 663, relating to rescue of such fugitive, was omitted as covered by section 752 of this title, the punishment provision of which is based on later statutes. (See reviser's note under that section.)

Minor changes were made in phraseology.

Sec. 3195. PAYMENT OF FEES AND COSTS

All costs or expenses incurred in any extradition proceeding in apprehending, securing, and transmitting a fugitive shall be paid by the demanding authority.

All witness fees and costs of every nature in cases of international extradition, including the fees of the magistrate judge, shall be certified by the judge or magistrate judge before whom the hearing shall take place to the Secretary of State of the United States, and the same shall be paid out of appropriations to defray the expenses of the judiciary or the Department of Justice as the case may be.

The Attorney General shall certify to the Secretary of State the amounts to be paid to the United States on account of said fees and costs in extradition cases by the foreign government requesting the extradition, and the Secretary of State shall cause said amounts to be collected and transmitted to the Attorney General for deposit in the Treasury of the United States.

CREDIT(S)

(June 25, 1948, ch. 645, 62 Stat. 825; Pub. L. 90-578, title III, Sec. 301(a)(3), Oct. 17, 1968, 82 Stat. 1115; Pub. L. 101-650, title III, Sec. 321, Dec. 1, 1990, 104 Stat. 5117.)

HISTORICAL AND REVISION NOTES

Based on title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., Secs. 662, 662c, 662d, 668 (R.S. Sec. 5278; Aug. 3, 1882, ch. 378, Sec. 4, 22 Stat. 216; June 28, 1902, ch. 1301, Sec. 1, 32 Stat. 475; Mar. 22, 1934, ch. 73, Secs. 2, 3, 48 Stat. 455).

First paragraph of this section consolidates provisions as to costs and expenses from said sections 662, 662c, and 662d.

Minor changes were made in phraseology and surplusage was omitted.

Remaining provisions of said sections 662, 662c, and 662d of title 18, U.S.C., 1940 ed., are incorporated in sections 752, 3182, 3183, and 3187 of this title.

The words "or the Department of Justice as the case may be" were added at the end of the second paragraph in conformity with the appropriation acts of recent years. See for example act July 5, 1946, ch. 541, title II, 60 Stat. 460.

Amendments

1968 - Pub. L. 90-578 substituted "magistrate" for "commissioner" in two places.

Change of Name

Words "magistrate judge" substituted for "magistrate" wherever appearing in text pursuant to section 321 of Pub. L. 101-650, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Effective Date of 1968 Amendment

Amendment by Pub. L. 90-578 effective Oct. 17, 1968, except when a later effective date is applicable, which is the earlier of a date when implementation of amendment by appointment of magistrates [now United States magistrate judges] and assumption of office takes place or third anniversary of enactment of Pub. L. 90-578 on Oct. 17, 1968, see section 403 of Pub. L. 90-578, set out as a note under section 631 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

Sec. 3196. EXTRADITION OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

If the applicable treaty or convention does not obligate the United States to extradite its citizens to a foreign country, the Secretary of State may, nevertheless, order the surrender to that country of a United States citizen whose extradition has been requested by that country if the other requirements of that treaty or convention are met.

CREDIT(S)

(Added Pub. L. 101-623, Sec. 11(a), Nov. 21, 1990, 104 Stat. 3356.)

Appendix VII

United States Attorneys' Manual, Chapter 15[1]

9-15.000 INTERNATIONAL EXTRADITION AND RELATED MATTERS

1 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/15mcrm.htm#9-15.100

9-15.100 DEFINITION AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES

International extradition is the formal process by which a person found in one country is surrendered to another country for trial or punishment. The process is regulated by treaty and conducted between the Federal Government of the United States and the government of a foreign country. It differs considerably from interstate rendition, commonly referred to as interstate extradition, mandated by the Constitution, Art. 4, Sec. 2.

Generally under United States law (18 U.S.C. § 3184), extradition may be granted only pursuant to a treaty. However, some countries grant extradition without a treaty. However, every such country requires an offer of reciprocity when extradition is accorded in the absence of a treaty. Further, the 1996 amendments to 18 U.S.C. 3181 and 3184 permit the United States to extradite, without regard to the existence of a treaty, persons (other than citizens, nationals or permanent residents of the United States), who have committed crimes of violence against nationals of the United States in foreign countries. A list of countries with which the United States has an extradition treaty relationship can be found in the Federal Criminal Code and Rules, following 18 U.S.C. § 3181, but consult the Criminal Division's Office of International Affairs (OIA) to verify the accuracy of the information. See the Criminal Resource Manual at 535 for the text of § 3184, and at 536 for links to some of the extradition treaties the United States has negotiated.

Because the law of extradition varies from country to country and is subject to foreign policy considerations, prosecutors should consult OIA for advice on any matter relating to extradition before taking any action in such a case, especially before contacting any foreign official.

See the Criminal Resource Manual at 601, for a discussion of the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3184.

9-15.200 PROCEDURES FOR REQUESTING EXTRADITION FROM ABROAD

See the Criminal Resource Manual at 602.

9-15.210 ROLE OF THE OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The Office of International Affairs (OIA) provides information and advice to Federal and State prosecutors about the procedure for requesting extradition from abroad. OIA also advises and provides support to Federal prosecutors handling foreign extradition requests for fugitives found in the United States.

Every formal request for international extradition based on Federal criminal charges must be reviewed and approved by OIA. At the request of the Department of State, formal requests based on State charges are also reviewed by OIA before submission to the Department of State.

Acting either directly or through the Department of State, OIA initiates all requests for provisional arrest of fugitives pursuant to extradition treaties. Neither prosecutors nor agents are permitted to contact their foreign counterparts to request the arrest of a fugitive for extradition. Unauthorized requests cause serious diplomatic difficulties and may subject the requester to financial liability or other sanctions.

Every extradition treaty is negotiated separately, and each contains different provisions. Experience with one treaty is not a guide to all others. Therefore, after reviewing this section of the United States Attorneys' Manual, the first step in any extradition case should be to contact OIA. Attorneys in OIA will advise prosecutors about the potential for extradition in a given case and the steps to be followed.

9-15.220 DETERMINATION OF EXTRADITABILITY

See the Criminal Resource Manual at 603.

9-15.225 PROCEDURE WHEN FUGITIVE IS NON-EXTRADITABLE

If the fugitive is not extraditable, other steps may be available to return him or her to the United States or to restrict his or her ability to live and travel overseas. See USAM 9-15.600 et seq. These steps, if taken, should likewise be documented.

Courts may require the government to request the extradition of a fugitive as soon as his or her location becomes known, unless the effort would be useless. If the decision is made to not seek extradition in a particular case, the prosecutor and the Office of International Affairs (OIA) will make a record to document why extradition was not possible in the event of a subsequent Speedy Trial challenge.

[cited in USAM 9-15.600; Criminal Resource Manual 602]

9-15.230 REQUEST FOR PROVISIONAL ARREST

Every extradition treaty to which the United States is a party requires a formal request for extradition, supported by appropriate documents. Because the time involved in preparing a formal request can be lengthy, most treaties allow for the provisional arrest of fugitives in urgent cases. Once the United States requests provisional arrest pursuant to the treaty, the fugitive will be arrested and detained (or, in some countries, released on bail) as soon as he or she is located. Thereafter, the United States must submit a formal request for extradition, supported by all necessary documents, duly certified, authenticated and translated into the language of the country where the fugitive was arrested, within a specified time (from 30 days to three months, depending on the treaty). See USAM 9-15.240. Failure to follow through on an extradition request by submitting the requisite documents after a provisional arrest has been made will resu lt in release of the fugitive, strains on diplomatic relations, and possible liability for the prosecutor.

The Office of International Affairs (OIA) determines whether the facts meet the requirement of urgency under the terms of the applicable treaty. If they do, OIA requests provisional arrest; if not, the prosecutor assembles the documents for a formal request. The latter method is favored when the defendant is unlikely to flee because the time pressures generated by a request for provisional arrest often result in errors that can damage the case. If provisional arrest is necessary because of the risk of flight, the prosecutor should complete the form for requesting provisional arrest and forward it, along with a copy of the charging document and arrest warrant, to OIA by fax (see the Criminal Resource Manual at 604); alternatively, this exchange of forms and completed requests between the United States Attorney and OIA can be made by Email. State prosecutors who request provisional arrest must also certify that the necessary documents will be submitted on time and that all expenses, including the cost of transportation by United States Marshals, will be covered.

Prosecutors should complete the form in any case in which it appears that provisional arrest may be necessary. Once it is completed, it may be emailed directly to the Office of International Affairs (OIA) attorney or team responsible for the country in which the fugitive has been found or emailed to the general OIA email address, CRM03(OIAINBOX), and OIA's docketing unit will forward it to the appropriate attorney in OIA. The form may also be faxed to OIA at (202) 514-0080. A copy of the charging document and warrant should be faxed to OIA.

The form was created with both Federal and State cases in mind. Thus, Assistant United States Attorneys are free to print the form and give it to state and local prosecutors working on extradition cases. State prosecutors should fax the form to OIA at (202) 514-0080.

[cited in USAM 9-15.700]

9-15.240 DOCUMENTS REQUIRED IN SUPPORT OF REQUEST FOR EXTRADITION

The request for extradition is made by diplomatic note prepared by the Department of State and transmitted to the foreign government through diplomatic channels. It must be accompanied by the documents specified in the treaty. The Office of International Affairs (OIA) will advise the prosecutor of the documentary requirements, but it is the responsibility of the prosecutor to prepare and assemble them and forward the original and four copies to OIA in time to be reviewed, authenticated, translated, and sent through the Department of State to the foreign government by the deadline.

OIA will provide samples of the documents required in support of the request for extradition. Although every treaty varies, all generally require:

- An affidavit from the prosecutor explaining the facts of the case. See Criminal Resource Manual at 605.
- Copies of the statutes alleged to have been violated and the statute of limitations. See Criminal Resource Manual at 607.
- If the fugitive has not been convicted, certified copies of the arrest warrant and complaint or indictment. See Criminal Resource Manual at 606.
- *Evidence, in the form of affidavits or grand jury transcripts, establishing that the crime was committed, including sufficient evidence (*i.e.,photograph, fingerprints, and affidavit of identifying witness) to establish the defendant's identity (CAVEAT: The use of grand jury transcripts or trial transcripts should, if at all possible, be avoided). See Criminal Resource Manual at 608.
- If the fugitive has been convicted, a certified copy of the order of judgment and committal establishing the conviction, an affidavit stating the sentence was not or was only partially served and the amount of time remaining to be served, and evidence concerning identity. See Criminal Resource Manual at 609.

Prosecutors should be aware that there are few workable defenses to extradition, although appeals and delays are common. Fugitives, however, may be able to contest extradition on the basis of minor inconsistencies resulting from clerical or typographical errors. Although these can be remedied eventually, they take time to untangle. Therefore, pay careful attention to detail in preparing the documents.

[cited in USAM 9-15.230]

9-15.250 PROCEDURE AFTER ASSEMBLING DOCUMENTS

After assembling the documents required in support of extradition, the prosecutor must review them carefully to ensure that all dates and charges mentioned in the affidavit and accompanying exhibits are consistent.

Unless told that the foreign country will require a different number of copies of the documents, the prosecutor should forward the original and four copies of the entire package to Office of International Affairs (OIA).

Attorneys in OIA review the package for completeness and send a copy to the Department of State for translation, which can take three weeks even for common languages. The cost of translation will be billed to the district requesting extradition. OIA secures the required certifications on the original and transmits it to the Department of State.

9-15.300 PROCEDURE IN THE FOREIGN COUNTRY

The Department of State will send the extradition documents and the translation to the American Embassy in the foreign country, which will present them under cover of a diplomatic note formally requesting extradition to the appropriate agency of the foreign government, usually the foreign ministry. The request and supporting documents are then forwarded to the court or other body responsible for determining whether the requirements of the treaty and the country's domestic law have been met.

In general, the foreign government's decision on our extradition request is based on the request itself and any evidence presented by the fugitive. Because the American prosecutor will not have the opportunity to appear before the foreign court, the written submission, particularly the prosecutor's affidavit, must be as persuasive as possible. This is particularly essential when the charges are based on statutes unique to United States law, such as RICO or CCE.

Though factual defenses to extradition are limited, the fugitive may delay a decision through procedural challenges. The determination of extraditability is often subject to review or appeal. Prediction of the time required to return an individual to the United States is difficult and depends on the circumstances of the individual case and the practice of the foreign country involved.

9-15.400 RETURN OF THE FUGITIVE

Once the foreign authorities notify the American Embassy that the fugitive is ready to be surrendered, the Office of International Affairs (OIA) will inform the prosecutor and arrange with the United States Marshals Service for agents to escort the fugitive to the United States. United States Marshals must provide the escort even in a State case. However, in rare cases arrangements are sometimes made for State or other federal law enforcement agents to accompany the U.S. Marshals. If the fugitive is an alien, OIA will ask the INS to issue a "parole letter" authorizing the alien to enter the country.

9-15.500 POST-EXTRADITION CONSIDERATIONS: LIMITATIONS ON FURTHER PROSECUTION

Every extradition treaty limits extradition to certain offenses. As a corollary, all extradition treaties restrict prosecution or punishment of the fugitive to the offense for which extradition was granted unless (1) the offense was committed after the fugitive's extradition or (2) the fugitive remains in the jurisdiction after expiration of a "reasonable time" (generally specified in the extradition treaty itself) following completion of his punishment. This limitation is referred to as the Rule of Specialty. Prosecutors who wish to proceed against an extradited person on charges other than those for which extradition was granted must contact the Office of International Affairs (OIA) for guidance regarding the availability of a waiver of the Rule by the sending State.

*Frequently, defendants who have been extradited to the United States attempt to dismiss or limit the government's case against them by invoking the Rule of Specialty. There is a split in the courts on whether the defendant has standing to raise specialty: some courts hold that only a party to the Treaty (*i.e.,the sending State) may complain about an alleged violation of the specialty provision, other courts allow the defendant to raise the issue on his own behalf, and other courts take a middle position and allow the defendant to raise the issue if it is likely that the sending State would complain as well. Whenever a defendant raises a specialty claim, the prosecutor should contact OIA for assistance in responding.

Defendants also occasionally make other substantive or procedural challenges to their extradition. It is impossible to anticipate all the creative challenges that may be devised; if a returned defendant challenges his extradition, you should contact OIA.

9-15.600 ALTERNATIVES TO EXTRADITION

A fugitive may be non-extraditable for any number of reasons, including but not limited to instances where he or she is a national of the country of refuge, the crime is not an extraditable offense, the statute of limitations has run in the foreign country, or extradition was requested and denied. (If, after discussing the case with the Office of International Affairs (OIA), the prosecutor concludes that the fugitive is not extraditable, that conclusion and the reasons should be documented. See USAM 9-15.225.)

There may be available alternatives that will result either in the return of the fugitive or limitations on his or her ability to live or travel overseas. OIA will advise the prosecutor concerning the availability of these methods. These alternative methods are discussed in USAM 9-15.610- 650.

[cited in USAM 9-15.225]

9-15.610 DEPORTATIONS, EXPULSIONS OR OTHER EXTRAORDINARY RENDTIONS

If the fugitive is not a national or lawful resident of the country in which he or she is located, the Office of International Affairs (OIA), through the Department of State or other channels, may ask that country to deport or expel the fugitive.

In United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992), the Supreme Court ruled that a court has jurisdiction to try a criminal defendant even if the defendant was abducted from a foreign country against his or her will by United States agents. Though this decision reaffirmed the long-standing proposition that personal jurisdiction is not affected by claims of abuse in the process by which the defendant is brought before the court, it sparked concerns about potential abuse of foreign sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Due to the sensitivity of abducting defendants from a foreign country, prosecutors may not take steps to secure custody over persons outside the United States (by government agents or the use of private persons, like bounty hunters or private investigators) by means of Alvarez-Machain type renditions without advance approval by the Department of Justice. Prosecutors must notify the Office of International Affairs before they undertake any such operation. If a prosecutor anticipates the return of a defendant, with the cooperation of the sending State and by a means other than an Alvarez-Machain type rendition, and that the defendant may claim that his return was illegal, the prosecutor should consult with OIA before such return. See Criminal Resource Manual at 610, for further discussion of the law on this issue.

[cited in USAM 9-15.600]

9-15.620 EXTRADITION FROM A THIRD COUNTRY

If the fugitive travels outside the country from which he or she is not extraditable, it may be possible to request his or her extradition from another country. This method is often used for fugitives who are citizens in their country of refuge. Some countries, however, will not permit extradition if the defendant has been lured into their territory. Such ruses may also cause foreign relations problems with both the countries from which and to which the lure takes place. Prosecutors must notify the Office of International Affairs before pursuing any scenario involving an undercover or other operation to lure a fugitive into a country for law enforcement purposes (extradition, deportation, prosecution).

[cited in USAM 9-15.635]

9-15.630 LURES

A lure involves using a subterfuge to entice a criminal defendant to leave a foreign country so that he or she can be arrested in the United States, in international waters or airspace, or in a third country for subsequent extradition, expulsion, or deportation to the United States. Lures can be complicated schemes or they can be as simple as inviting a fugitive by telephone to a party in the United States.

As noted above, some countries will not extradite a person to the United States if the person's presence in that country was obtained through the use of a lure or other ruse. In addition, some countries may view a lure of a person from its territory as an infringement on its sovereignty. Consequently, a prosecutor must consult with the Office of International Affairs before undertaking a lure to the United States or a third country.

9-15.635 INTERPOL RED NOTICES

An Interpol Red Notice is the closest instrument to an international arrest warrant in use today. Please be aware that if a Red Notice is issued, the prosecutor's office is obligated to do whatever work is required to produce the necessary extradition documents within the time limits prescribed by the controlling extradition treaty whenever and wherever the fugitive is arrested. Further, the prosecutor's office is obliged to pay the expenses pursuant to the controlling treaty.

Interpol Red Notices are useful when the fugitive's location or the third country to which he or she may travel (see USAM 9-15.620), is unknown. For additional information about Interpol Red Notices, see the Criminal Resource Manual at 611.

9-15.640 REVOCATION OF UNITED STATES PASSPORTS

The Department of State may revoke the passport of a person who is the subject of an outstanding federal warrant. Revocation of the passport can result in loss of the fugitive's lawful residence status, which may lead to his or her deportation. If the fugitive is wanted on state charges only, it will be necessary to obtain a warrant on a UFAP complaint because the Department of State is only authorized to revoke the passports of persons named in Federal warrants.

9-15.650 FOREIGN PROSECUTION

If the fugitive has taken refuge in the country of which he or she is a national, and is thereby not extraditable, it may be possible to ask that country to prosecute the individual for the crime that was committed in the United States. This can be an expensive and time consuming process and in some countries domestic prosecution is limited to certain specified offenses. In addition, a request for domestic prosecution in a particular case may conflict with U.S. law enforcement efforts to change the "non-extradition of nationals" law or policy in the foreign country. Whether this option is available or appropriate should be discussed with OIA.

[cited in USAM 9-15.600]

9-15.700 FOREIGN EXTRADITION REQUESTS

Foreign requests for extradition of fugitives from the United States are ordinarily submitted by the embassy of the country making the request to the Department of State, which reviews and forwards them to the Criminal Division's Office of International Affairs (OIA). The requests are of two types: formal requisitions supported by all documents required under the applicable treaty, or requests for provisional arrest. (Requests for provisional arrest may be received directly by the Department of Justice if the treaty permits. See USAM 9-15.230 for an explanation of provisional arrest.)

When OIA received a foreign extradition request, in summary, the following occurs:

1. OIA reviews both types of requests for sufficiency and forwards appropriate ones to the district.
2. The Assistant United States Attorney assigned to the case obtains a warrant and the fugitive is arrested and brought before the magistrate judge or the district judge.
3. The government opposes bond in extradition cases.

4. A hearing under 18 U.S.C. § 3184 is scheduled to determine whether the fugitive is extraditable. If the court finds the fugitive to be extraditable, it enters an order of extraditability and certifies the record to the Secretary of State, who decides whether to surrender the fugitive to the requesting government. In some cases a fugitive may waive the hearing process.

5. OIA notifies the foreign government and arranges for the transfer of the fugitive to the agents appointed by the requesting country to receive him or her. Although the order following the extradition hearing is not appealable (by either the fugitive or the government), the fugitive may petition for a writ of habeas corpus as soon as the order is issued. The district court's decision on the writ is subject to appeal, and the extradition may be stayed if the court so orders.

See Criminal Resource Manual at 612, for a more detailed discussion of foreign extradition requests.

9-15.800 PLEA AGREEMENTS AND RELATED MATTERS: PROHIBITION

Persons who are cooperating with a prosecutor may try to include a "no extradition" clause in their plea agreements. Such agreements, whether formal or informal, may be given effect by the courts. If a foreign country subsequently requests the person's extradition, the United States faces the unpleasant dilemma of breaching its solemn word either to the person involved or to its treaty partner. Petition of Geisser, 627 F.2d 745 (5th Cir. 1980), describes the enormous practical problems of resolving such a dilemma. Related matters involve agreements with potential witnesses to prevent or delay their deportation.

Prosecutors may not agree either formally or informally to prevent or delay extradition or deportation unless they submit a written request for authorization, and receive an express written approval from the Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division. Requests should be submitted to the Office of International Affairs after endorsement by the head of the section or office responsible for supervising the case.

[cited in USAM 9-16.020; USAM 9-73.510]

CRIMINAL RESOURCE MANUAL

Relevant Provisions

535 International Extradition—Text of 18 U.S.C. § 3184[2]

Note: See Appendix V, "U.S. Legislation Applicable to Extradition"

536 Treaty List3

Included herein are some of the extradition treaties the United States has negotiated. Consult with the Office of International Affairs (OIA) concerning treaties with other countries as well as the currency of these treaties. [under construction]

[cited in USAM 9-15.100]

Note: See Appendix II, "Bilateral Extradition Treaties of the United States"

601 Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3184[4]

In LoBue v. Christopher 839 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995) two plaintiffs filed a civil action in the District of Columbia seeking an injunction against their surrender and a declaratory judgment that 18 U.S.C. § 3184 is unconstitutional. The purported constitutional flaw lay in the ability of the Secretary of State to decline to surrender a fugitive whom the extradition judge had certified extraditable. The assignment of discretion to the Secretary of State, they argued, intruded on separation of powers and violated the Appointments Clause of the Constitution.

The district court agreed. It declared the statute unconstitutional and certified as a class all fugitives facing extradition and enjoined the surrender—though not any extradition proceedings—of any class member.

On the government's emergency application, the court of appeals stayed the class-wide injunction. Thereafter, it vacated the district court's declaratory judgment on jurisdictional grounds. The court of appeals held that a fugitive facing extradition in another district (in this case the N.D. of Ill.) could challenge the lawfulness of this extradition by way of a habeas petition in that district and not in a separate lawsuit against the Secretary of State in the District of Columbia. See LoBue v. Christopher, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). While the constitutional issue is still being argued by persons facing extradition, no decision adopts the rationale urged by the plaintiffs in that case. To the contrary, every extradition and habeas court since LoBue has rejected the argument. See, e.g., In re Extradition of Abu Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565, (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Sutton v. Kimbrough, 905 F. Supp. 631 (E.D.MO. 1995); Matter of Extradition of Lang, 905 F. Supp. 1385 (C.D. Cal. 1995).

As those courts have variously noted, the extradition scheme is functionally equivalent to all other preliminary criminal proceedings. The extradition judge's certification that an extradition is supported by probable cause and is otherwise lawful is no different than a judge's issuance of a search or arrest warrant or a finding of probable cause at a preliminary hearing. In all these instances a judge makes a finding on legality and the Executive Branch thereafter exercises its discretion to determine whether to proceed to search, arrest, or prosecute. Courts have also noted that this executive discretion can only be exercised to a fugitive's benefit if the extraditing judge declines to certify extraditability. The government cannot proceed on that request.

2 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00535.htm

3 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00536.htm

4 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00601.htm

The issue is not finally resolved, so it is possible that another judge in some future case may adopt the rationale of the district court in LoBue. However, the arguments in opposition to LoBue are compelling and have thus far persuaded every judge since LoBue to reject the LoBue analysis. If a LoBue motion is made in your extradition case, please inform the Office of International Affairs immediately.

[cited in USAM 9-15.100]

602 Procedures For Requesting Extradition From Abroad[5]

Extradition involves four basic steps:

- contacting OIA;
- making a preliminary determination of extraditability;
- deciding whether to ask for provisional arrest; and
- submitting the required documents in support of the formal request for extradition.

These steps are described more fully in the following sections.

Some courts have held that the Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment or the Speedy Trial Act require the government to make a diligent good-faith effort to bring the defendant to trial promptly; in the context of extradition, this means that the government is obligated to seek the extradition of a fugitive as soon as his or her location becomes known unless the effort would be useless. E.g. United States v. Blanco, 861 F.2d 773 (2d Cir. 1988), cert. Denied, 489 U.S. 1019 (1989); United States v. Pomeroy, 822 F.2d 718 (8th Cir. 1987); United States v. Walton, 814 F.2d 376 (7th Cir. 1987). Consequently, the prosecutor should contact the Office of International Affairs as soon as the whereabouts of a fugitive or the target of an investigation is known. See also USAM 9-15.225.

603 Determination of Extraditability[6]

The following factors are relevant to determining whether an individual is extraditable in a given case. Please be prepared to discuss these questions before telephoning the Office of International Affairs (OIA):

A. Location: The country in which the fugitive is believed to be located, and his or her address there, if known. As noted above, generally extradition is not available unless there is a treaty in force between the United States and the country where the fugitive is located.

B. Citizenship: The citizenship of the fugitive, including in particular whether he or she is a dual citizen. Many countries will not extradite their own citizens.

C. Offense Charged: The crime with which the fugitive has been charged or of which he or she has been convicted. Some extradition treaties limit extradition to offenses specified in the treaty. The more recent treaties allow extradition in any case where the conduct is criminal and punishable as a felony in both countries. In either event, OIA must know the offense to determine whether an individual is extraditable.

D. Docket Information: The name of the court in which the criminal proceeding is pending or was concluded, the docket number of the case, and the name of the judge or magistrate who signed the warrant or judgment of conviction.

---

5 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00602.htm

6 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00603.htm

E. Current Status of Case: Whether and when a warrant was issued, an indictment returned, a complaint filed, or the defendant was convicted.

F. Facts of Offense: The facts of the case in brief, i.e., who did what to whom, when, and where. The date of the offense is needed because many treaties bar extradition in cases where the foreign statute of limitations has run. The place of the offense is also essential since some treaties exclude extradition in cases where the United States asserts extraterritorial jurisdiction.

G. Potential for Trial or Retrial: If the fugitive has not been convicted, confirmation that the case is triable, i.e., that all necessary witnesses and evidence are still available and that the substantial costs involved in completing an extradition request are justified by the nature of the case.

H. Time constraints in the preparation of Extradition documents: Affiant's unavailability, difficulties in gathering supporting documentation, and complexity of the extradition case may be a factor in determining whether to proceed first as an urgent provisional arrest or a formal, fully documented extradition request. In a provisional arrest situation, a treaty deadline may make it impossible to prepare the necessary documentation and have it translated in time.

[cited in USAM 9-15.220]

604 Form—Request for Provisional Arrest[7]

International Extradition

Request for Provisional Arrest

A. Name of fugitive:

B. Case caption (if the fugitive is not the principal defendant in the case):

C. Date discussed with OIA and name of OIA contact:

D. Prosecutor responsible for this request (name, telephone number, fax number, E-mail address):

E. Case agent (name, agency, telephone number, pager number and fax number):

F. Name, telephone number, and fax number of State extradition official who authorized payment of all expenses required to complete extradition (State requests only):

G. List all charges for which extradition will be sought (name and statutory citation):

H. Warrant information (name of court (district and division), docket number, name of judge or magistrate who signed the warrant, date of warrant):

I. Description of fugitive:

aliases:

date of birth:

place of birth:

citizen of:

passport number/date and place of issue:

other identity documents:

height:

7 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00604.htm

weight:

hair:

eyes:

other identifying features:

J. Location of fugitive (full address and/or telephone number; names and addresses of associates, etc.) and any contact in the foreign country aware of fugitives's location (Name, title, telephone and pager number).

K. Facts of case. [Using a narrative style, provide sufficient information, including date and place of offense, to establish probable cause that a crime was committed and that the fugitive committed it. Choose simple, descriptive language that you might use in an affidavit in support of a warrant application, not the formal or statutory language of a formal charging document. Continue on a separate sheet if necessary.]

L. Prosecutor's certification. [A statement by the prosecutor acknowledging that if the fugitive is arrested it will be necessary for extradition documents to be prepared according to the terms of the relevant treaty. Further, the prosecutor must also certify that those documents will be prepared and sent to OIA according to the schedule set by the OIA attorney.]

[cited in USAM 9-15.230]

605 Prosecutor's Affidavit

The form of the prosecutor's affidavit depends on the country to which it is submitted and on whether the fugitive is sought for trial or just to complete a sentence. The Office of International Affairs (OIA) will provide guidance on format. The prosecutor should keep the following instructions in mind when drafting the prosecutor's affidavit.

Generally the affidavit should be captioned as a formal pleading with the name of the court and the style of the case. It should explain the facts of the case and its procedural history and identify the remaining documents submitted in support of the request, which are attached to the affidavit as exhibits. Because it is explanatory, the affidavit must be drafted in simple, straightforward language, avoiding technical legal terms that will be unfamiliar to the foreign court or agency that will decide on the fugitive's extraditability. The prosecutor must set out with particular clarity the underlying criminal conduct, particularly since some United States statutory crimes (like mail fraud, RICO, and Travel Act violations) contain elements unique to United States law. The prosecutor must also avoid jargon in the affidavit that might present translation difficulties.

The affidavit should begin with a description of the prosecutor's background. For requests directed to common law countries, this information should suffice to qualify the affiant as an expert on Federal criminal law, or the law of the State, if applicable.

Next, the affidavit should set out the procedural history of the case, including in particular the name of the court, the date of the complaint or indictment, the docket number of the case, the date of the warrant, and the name of the judge or magistrate. The complaint and/or indictment and the arrest warrant should be referred to as exhibits, and certified copies should be attached if the fugitive has not been convicted.

The affidavit should cite by name and code section the statutes alleged to have been violated and the applicable statute of limitations. The affidavit should declare that the statutes were in effect at the time charges were brought and still in full force and effect. The prosecutor should aver that neither prosecution nor punishment is barred by the statute of limitations. The text of the statutes may be incorporated in the body of the affidavit or attached as exhibits. If attached, they should be referred to in the affidavit.

The affidavit should describe the facts of the case succinctly and plainly. If the fugitive has not been convicted, affidavits of the investigator or witnesses establishing the commission of the crime and the fugitive's identity should be mentioned and attached to the affidavit as exhibits. A photograph and/or fingerprints will be needed to prove identity. If the fugitive has been convicted, the affidavit should recite that fact, explain why the sentence has not been served, and set out the sentence time remains to be served. Attach the exhibits described in this Manual at 609.

The affidavit should be executed before a judge or magistrate. Execution of the affidavit before a judicial officer is helpful because, especially in civil law countries, magistrates prepare extradition requests. Courts in civil law countries, being unfamiliar with United States procedures, are not used to seeing extradition requests that lack the signature of a judge or magistrate. Moreover, the original signature of a judge or magistrate is needed to certify the documents properly.

[cited in Criminal Resource Manual 506; Criminal Resource Manual 609; USAM 9-15.240]

606 Copies of Warrant and Complaint and/or Indictment[8]

If the fugitive has not been convicted, obtain certified copies of the arrest warrant and the complaint and/or indictment, and attach them to the prosecutor's affidavit as exhibits. For some countries, a certificate of exemplification (three signatures: clerk, judge, clerk) may be required.

If the fugitive has jumped bond or escaped before conviction, include certified copies of the warrant for bond jumping or escape and for the underlying offense. The prosecutor's affidavit should recite that the issuance of the bond jumping/escape warrant serves to bring the fugitive before the court on both the named charge and the underlying offense. Note that most older extradition treaties do not include bond jumping or escape as extraditable offenses. In such cases, it will not be possible to try the fugitive for those offenses.

In civil law countries, the warrant is the charging document. Warrants therefore have greater procedural significance in those countries than in the United States. For example, civil law courts often grant extradition only for the crimes listed in the warrant, not those in the indictment. This creates serious problems in United States extradition cases because warrants are usually prepared in the clerk's office, which routinely lists only one or two of the offenses in the indictment.

A related problem involves signature of the warrant by the clerk pursuant to the court's order. Given the significance of warrants in civil law countries, they are always signed by judges or magistrates. Even though extradition treaties do not require that warrants be signed by a judge or magistrate in order to be valid, problems have arisen in the past when the United States has submitted warrants signed by clerks.

Consequently, if the warrant does not list all the crimes in the indictment, or if it is not signed by a judge or magistrate, the prosecutor may need to have it amended. If the clerk's office will not permit amendment, move for the issuance of a new warrant containing the requisite information and signatures. Doing so will necessitate an additional paragraph in the prosecutor's affidavit explaining any discrepancies between the dates of the complaint, indictment, first warrant, and second warrant. A similar explanation should be included whenever two or more warrants have been issued because of superseding indictments or for any other reason.

[cited in Criminal Resource Manual 609; USAM 9-15.240]

8 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00606.htm

607 Statutes[9]

The text of all statutes alleged to have been violated, including the penalty provision, and the pertinent statute of limitations should be typed out in full either in the body of the prosecutor's affidavit or as exhibits to the prosecutor's affidavit. If attached as an exhibit, each statute should be typed on a separate page. If the text of the pertinent statute is unusually long or convoluted, contact the Office of International Affairs regarding the possibility of reduction. It is usually not necessary to also include the applicable provisions of the Sentencing Guidelines.

[cited in Criminal Resource Manual 609; USAM 9-15.240]

608 Affidavits Establishing the Crime and the Fugitive's Identity[10]

A. Affidavits. If the fugitive has not been convicted, it will be necessary to provide affidavits establishing the commission of the crime and the identity of the fugitive as the author of the crime. (If the fugitive has been convicted, see this Manual at 609. To satisfy this requirement, the prosecutor should prepare affidavits for signature by investigators, witnesses, co-conspirators or experts that, taken together, establish that each crime for which extradition is sought (1) was committed (2) by the fugitive. Affidavits should be prepared with formal captions showing the name of the court and the style of the case. Each affiant should state clearly and concisely the relevant facts, avoiding hearsay if possible.

Some common law countries have amended their domestic laws to make the requirements for extraditions somewhat less burdensome. However, in the United Kingdom, Canada, and most other common law countries, the documents in support of extradition must establish a prima facie case. A prima facie case is established when the evidence submitted to the foreign magistrate would, if standing alone, justify a properly instructed jury in returning a verdict of guilty. Further, those countries, the United Kingdom, Canada, and other common law countries, do not accept hearsay in affidavits submitted in support of requests for extradition.

The witnesses' affidavits do not necessarily have to be executed in the district where extradition is requested. Consult with the Office of International Affairs regarding the foreign law governing how the affidavit is to be executed. For instance, in some countries, the affidavits may be executed before a notary public rather than a judge or magistrate but a certificate of the notary's authority may be required.

Civil law countries are not as strict, but require factual support for every element of the crime which generally must meet a probable cause standard. For instance, hearsay is admissible in civil law countries, but is not accorded the same weight as first-hand knowledge.

B. Grand Jury Transcripts. A second, less-preferred means of establishing the crime involves attaching copies of grand jury transcripts to the prosecutor's affidavit. This method causes problems because some countries refuse to accept grand jury transcripts or may require an affidavit by the witness adopting them as true in the present time; they tend to be less concise than affidavits (resulting in higher translation costs); they are not accorded the same weight as affidavits in some countries; and, you must first obtain a disclosure order under Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(e).

C. Identity. One of the few successful defenses in extradition cases is mistaken identity. Prosecutors must establish that the person whose extradition is sought is the one who is accused or was convicted. Do so with an affidavit from an identifying witness, together with a photo of the fugitive. Use a single picture affixed to a plain sheet of paper with rivets or partially covered by the seal of the court. The picture, initialed and dated by the identifying witness, should be attached to the witness's affidavit as an exhibit. The affidavit should refer to the exhibit and to the fact that it was initialed and dated by the witness. (Do not attach a photospread if you can avoid it; if you feel the need to show a photospread to the identifying witness to avoid later charges of a tainted identification (see Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)), you can do so and then attach the selected photo to the affidavit. Similarly, do not have the witness recount in the affidavit that he or she selected the photo of the accused from a photospread. The use of photospreads invites needless argument before the foreign court.)

9 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00607.htm

10 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00608.htm

[cited in Criminal Resource Manual 609; USAM 9-15.240]

609 Evidence of Conviction[11]

For fugitives who have been convicted and either escaped or otherwise failed to complete their sentences, extradition treaties dispense with the requirement of establishing the crime through affidavits. Instead, the treaties require proof of conviction. In United States practice, conviction means a finding of guilt (i.e., a jury verdict or finding of fact by the judge) and imposition of sentence. If the defendant fled after the verdict but before sentencing, he or she has not been convicted, and the prosecutor must supply the affidavits described in this Manual at 608, unless the treaty specifically equates conviction with a finding of guilt.

The conviction may be proved by a certified copy of the Judgment and Commitment Order or the equivalent state form. Proof that the fugitive is unlawfully at large may take the form of an affidavit from the warden of the institution from which the fugitive escaped, or from the marshal if the fugitive failed to surrender after sentencing. The time remaining to be served (not counting reductions for good behavior) must be stated.

The facts and procedural history of the case must be explained fully and clearly in the prosecutor's affidavit, particularly if the defendant was sentenced in absentia. Evidence of the fugitive's identity as described in this Manual at 608, must be attached to the prosecutor's affidavit, together with the statutes under which the fugitive was convicted. See this Manual at 607. Most civil law countries have a statute of limitations on the time for execution of a sentence. The prosecutor's affidavit should therefore include an express statement that execution of the sentence is not barred by any statute of limitations under United States law.

If the fugitive has been charged with escape, check with the Office of International Affairs to see whether escape is an extraditable offense in the country of refuge. If not, the warrant for the charge of escape may be unnecessary because the fugitive cannot be tried for that offense. If it is an extraditable offense, the prosecutor must proceed on that charge as for an offense for which the fugitive has not been convicted. See this Manual at 605 and 606.

[cited in Criminal Resource Manual 605; Criminal Resource Manual 608; USAM 9-15.240]

610 Deportations, Expulsions, or other Extraordinary Renditions[12]

Fugitives deported to the United States or otherwise returned under other than a formal order of extradition often claim that they were kidnapped (by United States or foreign agents) and returned illegally. The courts generally dispose of those arguments under the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, holding that a defendant in a Federal criminal trial may not successfully challenge the District Court's jurisdiction over his person on the grounds that his presence before the Court was unlawfully secured. Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952). See, e.g., United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995); United States v. Mitchell, 957 F.2d 465 (7th Cir. 1992); United States v. Matta, 937 F.2d 567 (11th Cir. 1991); United States v. Pelaez, 930 F.2d 520 (6th Cir. 1991); United States v. Riviere, 924 F.2d 1289 (3d Cir. 1991); United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1988); United States v. Porter, 909 F.2d 789 (4th Cir. 1990); United States v. Winter, 509 F.2d 975 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 825 (1975); United States v. Postal, 589 F.2d 862, 873 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 832 (1979). One court found an exception to the general doctrine, declaring that a court could refuse to exercise its jurisdiction if the person's presence had been secured by conduct shocking to the conscience of the court. United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974). No court has followed Toscanino, however, see Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255, 262-263 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 878 (1990); United States v. Darby, 744 F.2d 1508, 1530 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1100 (1985); and the Second Circuit itself in a subsequent decision limited the exception to situations of extreme misconduct. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001 (1975).

11 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00609.htm

12 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00610.htm

[cited in USAM 9-15.610]

611 Interpol Red Notices[13]

An Interpol Red Notice is the closest instrument to an international arrest warrant in use today. Interpol (the International Criminal Police Organization) circulates notices to member countries listing persons who are wanted for extradition. The names of persons listed in the notices are placed on lookout lists (e.g., NCIC or its foreign counterpart). When a person whose name is listed comes to the attention of the police abroad, the country that sought the listing is notified through Interpol and can request either his provisional arrest (if there is urgency) or can file a formal request for extradition.

Please be aware that if a Red Notice is issued, the prosecutor's office is obligated to do whatever work is required to produce the necessary extradition documents within the time limits prescribed by the controlling extradition treaty whenever and wherever the fugitive is arrested. Further, the prosecutor's office is obliged to pay the expenses pursuant to the controlling treaty. Those expenses, which can be quite high, will typically include the costs of translating the extradition documents and may include the costs of hiring local counsel to represent the United States. Further, these obligations, which remain until the fugitive is arrested or the Red Notice is withdrawn, may result in prosecutors who have succeeded the Assistant United States Attorney who originally requested the Red Notice having to prepare the documents and arrange for payment of hefty fees years after the fugitive originally fled from the United States. Therefore, it is important for prosecutors to make certain that the case is significant enough to warrant placing their offices under such a burden in deciding whether or not to request issuance of a Red Notice.

[cited in USAM 9-15.635]

612 Role of the Department of State in Foreign Extradition Requests[14]

All extradition treaties currently in force require foreign requests for extradition to be submitted through diplomatic channels, usually from the country's embassy in Washington to the Department of State. Many treaties also require that requests for provisional arrest be submitted through diplomatic channels, although some permit provisional arrest requests to be sent directly to the Department of Justice. The Department of State reviews foreign extradition demands to identify any potential foreign policy problems and to ensure that there is a treaty in force between the United States and the country making the request, that the crime or crimes are extraditable offenses, and that the supporting documents are properly certified in accordance with 18 U.S.C. § 3190. If the request is in proper order, an attorney in the State Department's Office of the Legal Adviser prepares a certificate attesting to the existence of the treaty, etc., and forwards it with the original request to the Office of International Affairs.

13 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00611.htm

14 http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00612.htm

Appendix VIII

Content Analysis of Bilateral Extradition Treaties

To: Professor Bassiouni

From: Andrew Sidea

Date: 10/21/2011

Re: Statistical Analysis of U.S. Bilateral Extradition Treaty Provisions: Defenses to Extradition

---

There are 175 U.S. bilateral extradition treaty provisions currently in force, including supplementary protocols/notes or explanatory protocols/notes. The following is a statistical analysis of the number of treaty provisions regarding various defenses to extradition. Where only a few countries allow for certain defenses, those countries are specified.

1. Treaty as Jurisdiction or Legal Basis for Extradition

Sixteen of the supplementary protocols/notes or explanatory protocols/notes do not address this point. Otherwise, every treaty has such a provision, generally as the first provision setting forth the obligation to extradite under the treaty. A total of 125 of these treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 70 percent of the various bilateral agreements) also have provisions regarding the scope and application of the treaty.

2. Double Criminality Provision

Sixty-nine of these treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 39 percent of the various bilateral agreements) have provisions requiring the crime to be punishable under the laws of both countries.

3. Definition of Extraditable Offenses

Fifty-nine of these treaties, supplementary protocols/notes or explanatory protocols/notes (over 33 percent of the various bilateral agreements) use a list to define extraditable offenses. Of these fifty-nine, seven of the supplementary protocols/notes or explanatory protocols/notes amend the bilateral treaties that had used a list to define extraditable offenses to the categorical approach. These countries are in large part European Union member states for whom the EU–U.S. extradition agreement requires this change.

Forty-nine of the countries with whom the United States has a bilateral extradition treaty follow a categorical approach, defining extraditable offenses as crimes in both countries punishable by a certain period of time.

Australia, Brazil, Hong Kong (China), Israel, Spain, and Uruguay follow a combination of the list and categorical methods for defining extraditable offenses.

4. Rule of Non-Inquiry

None of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes sets forth the rule of non-inquiry.

5. Guilty Pleas

None of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes contains provisions specifically regarding guilty pleas, although various provisions exist regarding simplified extradition and consent or waiver of the extradition hearing.

6. Specialty

A total of 119 of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (68 percent of the various bilateral agreements) set forth the principle of specialty that governs extradition requests. Every country with whom the United States has a bilateral extradition treaty has a provision regarding specialty.

7. Political Offense (Political Crimes)

A total of 120 of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes provide for this exception. Every country with whom the United States has a bilateral extradition treaty has a provision regarding political crimes.

8. Political Offense (Politically Motivated Request)

Albania, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Congo, Cuba, the Czech Republic, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, European Union, Fiji, Finland, France, Gambia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iraq, Israel, Italy, Japan, Kenya, Kiribati, Latvia, Lesotho, Liberia, Liechtenstein, Malawi, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Mexico, Micronesia, Monaco, Nauru, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paupa New Guinea, Portugal, San Marino, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, the Slovak Republic, Slovenia, the Solomon Islands, Spain, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Tonga, Tuvalu, Uruguay, Venezuela, the former Yugoslavia, and Zambia do not have provisions regarding politically motivated requests.

Forty-seven of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 26 percent of the various bilateral agreements) provide for this exception.

9. Offenses of a Military Character

Albania, Australia, Burma, Canada, Chile, Congo, Cuba, the Czech Republic, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, European Union, Fiji, France, Gambia, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iraq, Israel, Japan, Kenya, Kiribati, Latvia, Lesotho, Liberia, Liechtenstein, Malawi, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Micronesia, Monaco, Nauru, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Paupa New Guinea, the Philippines, Portugal, San Marino, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, the Slovak Republic, Slovenia, the Solomon Islands, Suriname, Swaziland, Tanzania, Tonga, Tuvalu, the United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, the former Yugoslavia, and Zambia do not have provisions regarding offenses of a military character.

Fifty-two of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 29 percent of the various bilateral agreements) provide for this exception.

10. Offenses of a Fiscal Character

Only Germany, India, Luxembourg, Poland, and Switzerland have specific provisions in their extradition treaties with the United States regarding offenses of a fiscal character. The Republic of South Korea has a provision discussing these offenses but not labeling them as "Offenses of a Fiscal Character."

11. Exclusion of Nationals

There are ninety-two provisions in treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 52 percent of the various bilateral agreements) on this point. Of these, forty-three place some restriction on this point, ranging from not allowing nationality as a basis for denying the extradition request to providing for the submittal of the case for prosecuting in the requested state if the request is denied on grounds of nationality.

Burma, Canada, Ecuador, the European Union, Fiji, Gambia, Ghana, Guyana, Ireland, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Nauru, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paupa New Guinea, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, the Solomon Islands, Swaziland, Tanzania, Tonga, Tuvalu, and Zambia have no provision either allowing or disallowing nationality as a basis for refusal of an extradition request.

12. Double Jeopardy

Ninety-two of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 52 percent of the various bilateral agreements) have a provision on this point.

Albania, Chile, Cuba, the Czech Republic, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, the European Union, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hong Kong (China), Iceland, Iraq, Latvia, Liberia, Liechtenstein, Nicaragua, Panama, Portugal, San Marino, Slovak Republic, Slovenia, Venezuela, and the former Yugoslavia do not have a provision on double jeopardy in their U.S. bilateral extradition treaties.

13. Statute of Limitations

One hundred of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes or explanatory protocols/notes (over 57 percent of the various bilateral agreements) have provisions regarding the application of a statute of limitations to an extradition request.

Of these, eleven specifically provide that the requesting state's statute of limitation applies, seven specifically provide that the requested state's statute of limitation applies, forty-one provide that either state's statute of limitations may apply, Venezuela provides that the statute of limitation of the state in which the crime was committed applies, and the others specify generally that lapse of time may bar an extradition request.

Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Barbados, Belize, and Spain have provisions stating that no statute of limitations applies under their U.S. bilateral extradition treaties.

Bolivia, Ecuador, Egypt, the European Union,France, Haiti, Hong Kong (China), Ireland, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Monaco, Paraguay, and Zimbabwe do not have any provision either specifically allowing or disallowing refusal of extradition requests based on statutes of limitations in their U.S. bilateral extradition treaties.

14. Other Defenses

There are a number of other defenses, each of which is discussed below:

a. Age of the Offender (Minor)Canada, Finland, Spain, and Uruguay's U.S. bilateral extradition treaties contain provisions allowing for refusal of extradition based on the offender's age.

b. Death PenaltySixty-four of the treaties, supplementary protocols/notes, or explanatory protocols/notes (over 36 percent of the various bilateral agreements) contain provisions allowing for refusal of extradition where the death penalty is a possible sentence. Many of these provisions also discuss assurances that the death penalty will not be imposed as a prerequisite to a requested state's granting the extradition request.

c. Life ImprisonmentVenezuela's U.S. bilateral extradition treaty contains provisions allowing for refusal of extradition where life imprisonment is a possible sentence.

d. Convictions in Absentia and Due ProcessAustria, Malta, and Switzerland's U.S. bilateral extradition treaties contain provisions allowing for refusal of extradition based on in absentia convictions unless certain due process concerns have been met.

e. No Trials by Extraordinary CourtsBrazil, Germany, Peru, and Sweden's U.S. bilateral extradition treaties contain provisions allowing for refusal of extradition where the relator may be tried by an extraordinary court.

f. Amnesty or Pardon Specified as a Bar to ExtraditionTurkey and the United Kingdom have provisions regarding amnesty or pardon as a bar to extradition in their U.S. bilateral extradition treaties.

g. Humanitarian GroundsBelgium, Brazil (illness deferring surrender), Denmark, Finland, Hong Kong (China), Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden's U.S. bilateral extradition treaties contain provisions allowing for refusal of extradition for humanitarian grounds or considerations.

h. Other Grounds in the Requested State's LawsNorway has this provision in its U.S. bilateral extradition treaty.

i. Crime Is or Will Be Submitted for Prosecution in Requested StateTurkey has this provision in its U.S. bilateral extradition treaty for this provision.

Table of Cases

Table of Authorities

Books

Michael Abbell & Bruno A. Ristaw, International Judicial Assistance, vols. 4, 5 (1990)

Aeschylus, The Suppliant Maidens (H. Weir Smyth trans., 1973)

Bernabe Africa, Political Offenses in Extradition (1927)

Shana Alexander, The Pizza Connection, Lawyers, Money, Drugs (1988)

American Law Institute Model Penal Code (Official Text 1962)

R.P. Anand, Origin and Development of the Law of the Sea (1983)

Annals of Congress (1800)

1 Annuair de l'Institute de Droit International (1874–1883) (1928)

Asilo Politico Biblioteca de Publicaciones Officials de la Facultad de Derecho Ciencias Sociales de la Universidad de la Republica (1961)

Association Internationale de Droit Pénal, Actes du Pre-Congres International de Siracusa (1969)

Association Internationale de Droit Pénal, Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1993)

Balthazar Ayala, De Ivre er Officiis Bellicis et Desciplina Militari (J.P. Bote trans., 1912)

Balthazar Ayala, Three Books, on the Law of War, and on the Duties Connected with War, and on Military Discipline (John Pawley Bate trans., 1912) (1597)

Gilbert Azibert, Code de Procèdure Pénal 2000 (12th ed. LITEC 2000)

Robert Badinter, et. al, Death Penalty—Beyond Abolition (2004)

Kevin Bales, Modern Slavery: The Secret World of 27 Million People (2009)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application (2011)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law (2d rev. ed., 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes: The Law of Public Order (1969)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Draft Statute: International Criminal Tribunal (1992)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalilzation of Torture in the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsilbe? (2010)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Crimes: Digest/Index of International Criminal Law Conventions – 1815–1985 (2 vols., 1986)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law (3 vols., 2d rev. ed., 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law: A Draft International Criminal Code (1981)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law Conventions and Their Penal Provisions (1997)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order (1974)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Terrorism and Political Crimes (1973)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents (1972–2001) (2001)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2003)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law: Second Revised Edition (2d ed. 2013)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Law of Dissent and Riots (1971)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1996)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis and Integrated Text, Vols I–II (2005)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Manual on International Humanitarian law and Arms Control Agreements (2000)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (1994)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sharīca and Islamic Criminal Law in Time of Peace and War (forthcoming 2013)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law (1977)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Extradite or Prosecute in International Law (1995)

Cesare Beccaria-Bonesana, An Essay on Crimes and Punishment (Academic Reprints ed. 1953) (1819)

Satyadeva Bedi, Extradition: A Treatise on the Laws Relevant to the Fugitive Offenders and with the Commonwealth Countries (2002)

Satya D. Bedi, Extradition in International Law and Practice (1968)

Samuel F. Bemis, Jay's Treaty: A Study in Commerce and Diplomacy (2d ed. 1962)

Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislations (Wilfrid Harriman ed., 1948)

Harold Berman, Soviet Criminal Law and Procedure (1966)

André Billot, Traité de l'Extradition (1874)

Henry C. Biron & Kenneth E. Chalmers, The Law and Practice of Extradition (1903)

William W. Bishop, International Law (1962)

Black's Law Dictionary (5th ed. 1979)

William Blackstone, Commentaries (1769)

Christopher L. Blakesley, Terrorism, Drugs, International Law, and the Protection of Human Liberty: A Comparative Study of International Law, Its Nature, Role, and Impact in Matters of Terrorism, Drug Trafficking, War and Extradition (1991)

Pedro Blandino, La Extradicion en America (1994)

Pedro Blandino, Manual de Extradicion (1999)

Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la Republique (1606)

Blanca P. Borgoñon, Aspectos Procesales de la Extradicion en Derecho Español (1984)

Gary Botting, Extradition between Canada and the United States (2005)

Pierre Bouzat & Jean Pinatel, Traité de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie (2d rev. ed. 1970)

Arnold C. Brackman, The Other Nuremberg: The Untold Story of the Tokyo War Crimes Trials (1987)

James L. Brierly, The Law of Nations (1955)

Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (5th ed. 1998)

Ian Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility (1983)

Thomas Bullfinch, Mythology (1978)

J. Herman Burgers & Hans Danelius, The U.N. Convention Against Torture (1988)

William M. Bush, Antarctica and International Documents (1988)

Hays Butler, Universal Jurisdiction: A Compilation of Documents (3 vols. 2000)

Trafficking in Humans: Social, Cultural and Political Dimensions (Sally Cameron & Edward Newman eds., 2008)

Barry E. Carter & Phillip R. Trimble, International Law (1991)

B.E. Charters, The Law and Practice of Extradition (1903)

Bin Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals (2d ed. 1987)

Noam Chomsky, Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance (2003)

Robin Rolf Churchill & Alan Vaughan Low, The Law of the Sea (1983)

Cicero, Contra Verres II (L.H.G. Greenwood trans., 1953)

Cicero, De Officil (L.H.G. Greenwood trans., 1953)

Cicero, De Re Publica (C.W. Keyes trans., 1928)

Alan W. Clarke & Laurelyn Whitt, The Bitter Fruit of American Justice: International and Domestic Resistance to the Death Penalty 31–49 (2007)

Edward Clarke, A Treatise upon the Law of Extradition (4th ed. 1903)

G. Clark & L. Sohn, World Peace through World Law (1960)

The Code of International Armed Conflict Vols. 1, 2 (Howard S. Levie ed., 1986)

Codice Penale: Annotato con la Giurisprudenza (and commentary) (S. Beltrani, F. Caringella & R. Marino eds., 1996)

The Collected Papers of John Bassett Moore (1944)

Commentary on the Additional Protocols of June 8, 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949 (Yves Sandoz et al., eds., 1987)

Cooperacion Interamericana en Los Procidimentos Penales (L. Kos-Rabcewicz-Zubkowski ed., 1983)

La Cooperation Pénale Internationale par Voie d'Extradition au Maroc (1986)

Constitutions of the Countries of the World (Gisberth H. Flanz & Albert P. Blaustein eds., 1991)

Corps Universal Diplomatique de Droit des Gens (J. Dumont ed., 1726)

Council of Europe, European Convention on Extradition and Protocols to the Said Convention—Council of Europe Treaty Series No. 24, 86, 98, 209, 212 (2012)

Edward S. Corwin, The Constitution & What it Means Today (14th ed. 1948)

Edward S. Corwin, The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law (1957)

Edward S. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers (4th ed. 1957)

Council of Europe, Explanatory Report on the European Convention on Extradition (1969)

The Criminal Justice System of the U.S.S.R. (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Veleri M. Savitski eds., 1979)

The Révé David, Les Grandes Systémes de Droit Contemporaries (5th ed. 1973)

K.C. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise (1978)

Aloysius de Mello, A Manual of the Law of Extradition and Fugitive Offenders Applicable to the Eastern Dependencies of the British Empire (2d ed. 1933)

Eileen Denza, Diplomatic Law: A Commentary on the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (2d ed. 1998)

Frédéric Desportes & Francis Le Gunehec, Le Nouveau Droit Pénal General (4th ed. 1997)

Anthony M. DeStefano, The War on Human Trafficking: U.S. Policy Assessed (2007)

G. Do Kounil et. al., Internationales Strafrecht (1981)

Yoram Dinstein, The Defense of "Obedience to Superior Orders" in International Law (1965)

Diritto Penale Internazionale (Consiglio Superiore Della Magistratura 1979)

J. Donovan, Strangers on a Bridge: The Case of Colonel Abel (1964)

Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Introduction a l'Etude du Droit Pénal International (1922)

Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Les Principles Modernes du Droit Pénal International (1928)

Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Traité Elémentaire de Droit Criminal et de Legislation Pénal Comparee (3d ed. 1943)

Pieter N. Drost, The Crime of State: Genocide (2 vols. 1951)

Pieter N. Drost, The Crime of State: Penal Protection for Fundamental Freedoms of Persons & Peoples (1959)

Barry Hart Dubner, The Law of International Sea Piracy (1980)

Clyde Eagleton, International Government (3d ed. 1957)

Clyde Eagleton, The Responsibility of States in International Law (1929)

Elman Edel, Der Vertrag Zwischen Ramses II. Von Ägytpen und Hattušili III. Von Hatti (1997)

Albert A. Ehrenzweig, A Treatise on the Conflict of Laws (1962)

Charles Egan, The Law of Extradition Comprising the Treatise Now in Force between England and France and England and America (1846)

D. Eisenberg et. al., The Mossad (1978)

T.O. Ellis, The Modern Law of Treaties (1974)

Albin Eser et. al., Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (1993)

Estradizione e Spacio Giuridico Europeo (Consiglio Superiore Della Magistratura, 1981)

European Court of Human Rights, Annual Report 151 (2011)

European Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters: The Council of Europe's Legal Instruments (Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 2d ed. 1991)

Alona E. Evans & J. Murphy, Legal Aspects of International Terrorism (1978)

R. Falk & S. Mendlovitz, Strategy of World Order: 1 Toward a Theory of Prevention, 2 International Law, 3 The United National, 4 Disarmament and Economic Development (1966)

James Farrer, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislations (Wilfrid Harriman ed., 1948)

James A. Farrer, Crimes and Punishments (1880)

L. Paul Fauchilee, Traité de Droit International Public (1926)

M. Faustin-Helie, Treatise de l'Instruction Criminelle (n.d. circa 1850)

Christian Favre, Marc Pellet & Patrick Stoudmann, Code Penal Annote (1997)

J.E.S. Fawcett, Outer Space: New Challenges to Law and Policy (1984)

Charles G. Fenwick, Cases on International Law (2d ed. 1935)

Benjamin B. Ferencz, Defining International Aggression (2 vols. 1975)

Benjamin B. Ferencz, An International Criminal Court: A Step towards World Peace (1980)

Paolo Fiorelli, La Tortura Giudiziaris nel Diritto Commune (vols. 1, 2 1953–1954)

G. Flanz & A. Blaustein, Constitutions of the Countries of the World (1970)

Alwyn V. Freeman, The International Responsibility of States for Denial of Justice (1938)

French Code de Procédure Pénal (1994)

Linda S. Frey & Marsha L. Frey, The History of Diplomatic Immunity (1999)

Robert Friedlander, Terrorism: Documents of International and Local Control (vols. 1–6 1981)

Manuel Garcia-Mora, International Law and Asylum as a Human Right (1956)

The Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, Commentaries on the Third Geneva Conventions Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Times of War (Jean Pictet ed., 1958)

Gentili, De Ivre Bellicis Libri Tres (J.C. Rolfe trans., 1933) (1612)

Gentili, De Jure Belli (1612), reprinted in Classics of International Law (1933)

Frederick W. Gibbs, Extradition Treatise (1866)

Joseph P. Giffin, Perspectives on the Extraterritorial Application of U.S. Anti-Trust and Other Laws (1979)

Geoff Gilbert, Aspects of Extradition Law (1999)

Geoff Gilbert, Transnational Fugitive Offenders in International Law: Extradition and Other Mechanisms (1998)

Stefan Glaser, Droit International Pénal Conventionel (vol. 1 1977, vol. 2 1978)

Stefan Glaser, Infraction Internationale (1957)

Stefan Glaser, Introduction a l'Etude de Droit Internatioanl Pénal (1954)

Carlos Cezon Gonzalez & Juan Jose Lopez Ortega, Derecho Extradicional (2003)

Guy Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law (2d ed., 1996)

C. Gordon & H. Rosenfield, Immigration Law and Procedure (1980)

Stephen Gorove, Studies in Space Law: Its Challenges and Prospects (1977)

Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Emergent International Law Relating to Refugees: Past, Present, Future (1985)

Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Status of Refugees in International Law (1966)

Joseph P. Griffin, Perspectives on the Extraterritorial Application of U.S. Anti-Trust and Other Laws (1979)

Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli Ac Pacis (1625)

Hugo Grotius, Mare Liberum (R. Magoffin trans., 1916)

Hugo Grotius, Mare Liberum Sive de Jure, Quod Batavis Competit ad Indicana Commercia (1609)

Heinrich Grutzner, Auslieferungsverbot und Asylrecht (1954)

Heinrich Grutzner, Internationalen Rechtshilfeverkehr im Strafsachen (1955)

G. Hackworth, Digest of International Law (1944)

H. Hall, International Law (6th ed. 1909)

William E. Hall, A Treatise on International Law (8th ed. 1924)

Friedrick von Haltzendorf, Volkerrecht (1885)

H.L.A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968)

V.E. Hartley-Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure (1980)

Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (1972)

Louis Henkin, International Law (2d ed. 1980)

Louis Henkin, Treaty Interpretation (1972)

Marc Henzelin, Le Principe de L'Universalité en Droit Pénal International (2000)

Rosalyn Higgins, Problems and Process: International Law and How We Use It (1994)

Homer, The Iliad (A.T. Murray trans., 1971)

Homer, The Odyssey (A.T. Murray trans., 1960)

Andre de Hoogh, Obligations Erga Omnes and International Crimes (1996)

Manley O. Hudson, International Legislation (1937)

Manley O. Hudson, The Permanent Court of International Justice (1943)

Manley O. Hudson, World Court Reports (1935)

André Huet &Renée Koering-Joulin, Le Droit Pénal International (1994)

Human Rights: A Compilation of International Instruments (U.N. Pub. 1978)

Willard H. Humbert, The Pardoning Power of the President (1941)

Charles Hyde, Digest of International Law (1922)

Charles Hyde, International Law Chiefly as Interpreted and Applied by the United States (2d ed. 1945)

Michael Ignatieff, American Exceptionalism and Human Rights (2005)

Robert Jackson, The Nuremberg Case (1947, 2d prtg. 1971)

Immigration Law and Procedure (Ellen Gittel Gordon & Charles Gordon, eds. 1995)

Immigration & Naturalization Service Annual Report (1962)

International Humanitarian Law and Arms Control Agreements (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2000)

International Labour Organization, ILO Global Estimate of Forced Labour 13 (2012)

International Law Association, Air Law, Crimes in Aircraft (New York University Conference 1958)

International Law Association, Report of the 34th Conference (1926)

International Law of State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1983)

Robert H. Jackson, The Nürnberg Case (2d. prtg. 1971) (1947)

Wilfred C. Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind (1958)

Hans-Heinrich Jescheck, Die Verantwortlichkeit der Staatsorgane Nach Volkerstrafrect (1952)

Philip C. Jessup, Transnational Law (1956)

Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition (1995)

E. Kamenka & A. Ehr-Soon Tay, Human Rights (1978)

Yale Kamiser et al., Cases, Comments and Questions on Modern Criminal Procedure (1974)

Ivan Kavass & Adolf Sprudzs, Extradition Laws and Treaties: United States (2 vols. 1979; Supp. 1989)

H. Kelsen, Principles of International Law (R.W. Tucker ed., 2d ed. 1966)

Said Hussein Youssef Khadr, Extradition Law & Practice in Egypt & Other Arab States (1977)

Otto Kircheimer, Gegenwartsprobleme der Asylgewahrung (1959)

Geert-Jan Alexander Knoops, Prosecution and Defense of Peacekeepers under International Criminal Law (2004)

Geert-Jan Alexander Knoops, Surrender to International Crimnial Courts: Contemporary Practice and Procedures (2002)

Julian B. Knowles, Blackstone's Guide to the Extradition Act of 2003 (2005)

Joachim Kohler, Internationales Strafrecht (1917)

Steven Kull, Feeling Betrayed: The Roots of Muslim Anger at America (2011)

Ira J. Kurzban, Immigration Law Sourcebook (7th ed. 2001)

Ira J. Kurzban, Kurzban's Immigration Law Sourcebook: A Comprehensive Outline and Reference Tool (12th ed. 2010)

Luis Kutner, The Human Right to Individual Freedom (1970)

Luis Kutner, World Habeas Corpus (1962)

J. Jean LaFerriere, L'Evolution Recente du Droit Français de L'Extradition, Chronique Administrative Française (1978)

Gerard V. LaForest, Extradition to and from Canada (2d ed. 1977)

Otto Lagodny, Die Rechtsstellung des Auszuliefernden in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (1987)

Otto Lagodny, Die Rechtsstellung des Auszuliefernden in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (1998)

John H. Langbein, Torture and the Law of Proof (1977)

P. Lanza, L'Estradizion (1910)

Hersch Lauterpacht, International Law and Human Rights (1950)

The Laws of Armed Conflict, Vols. 1–2 (Dietrich Schindler & Jiri Toman eds., 1981)

The Laws of Armed Conflicts (Dietrich Schindler & Jiri Toman eds., 1988)

The Law of War: A Documentary History, Vols. 1, 2 (Leon Friedman ed., 1972)

S. Houston Lay, The Law Relating to Activities of Man in Space (1970)

Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Terrorism (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988)

Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law & Policy (1992)

George LeVasseur, Juris Classeur de Droit International (1965)

Nino Levi, Diritto Penale Internazionale (1949)

Howard S. Levie, The Code of International Armed Conflict (2 vols. 1986)

George C. Lewis, On Foreign Jurisdiction and the Extradition of Criminals (1859)

Richard B. Lillich, International Human Rights (1991)

Richard B. Lillich & Frank C. Newman, International Human Rights: Problems of Law and Policy (1979)

Robert Linke et al., Internationales Strafrecht (1981)

Jean Claude Lombois, Le Droit Pénal International (2d ed. 1979)

Tiziana T. Lupacchini, L'Estradizione Dall'Estero per L'Italia (1989)

G.F. de Martens, Nouveau Recueil de Traites (Gottingue, Dieterich 1842)

Charles McCormick, Handbook on Evidence (4th ed. 1992)

Myres McDougal et al., Human Rights and World Public Order (1980)

Myres McDougal et al., The Interpretation of Agreements and World Public Order (1967)

Myres McDougal et. al., The Interpretation of International Agreements and World Public Order (1994)

Myres McDougal et al., The World Constitutive Process of Authoritative Decision (1967)

Myres McDougal et al., Law and Public Order in Space (1963)

Myres McDougal & Florentine P. Feliciano, Law and Minimum World Public Order (1961)

Myres McDougal & M. Reisman, International Law in Contemporary Perspective (1981)

Arnold D. McNair, International Law Opinions (1956)

Arnold D. McNair, The Law of Treaties (1961)

Farhad Malekian, The System of International Law (1987)

William M. Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols and Agreements between the United States of America and Other Powers (1910)

Maria R. Marchetti, La Convenzione Europea di Extradizione (1990)

Yves Mayand, Code Pénal; Nouveau Code Penal, Ancien Code Penal (87th ed. Dalloz 2000)

H. Meijers et al., Schengen (1991)

Friedrich Meili, Barolus Als Haupt der Ersten Schule des Internationalen Strafrechts: Ein Historiches Bild (1908)

Friedrich Meili, Lehrbuch Des Internationalen Strafrechts und Strafprozessrechts (1910)

Aloysius de Mello, A Manual of the Law of Extradition and Fugitive Offenders Applicable to the Eastern Dependencies of the British Empire (2d ed. 1933)

A. Mellor, La Torture Au XX Siecle (1961)

Roger Merle & André Vitu, Traité de Droit Criminel (2d ed. 1973)

John G. Merrills, The Development of International Law by the European Court of Human Rights (1988)

Richard H. Minear, Victor's Justice: The Tokyo War Crimes Trial (1971)

John B. Moore, Digest of International Law (1901)

John B. Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition (1891)

Moore's Federal Practice (2d ed. 1993)

Virginia Morris & Michael P. Scharf, An Insider's Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: A Documentary History and Analysis (2 vols. 1995)

Virginia Morris & Michael P. Scharf, The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (2 vols. 1998)

Gerhard O. Mueller & Edward M. Wise, International Criminal Law (1965)

Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Frieda Adler, Outlaws of the Ocean (1985)

Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni, The European Conventions on Inter-State Cooperation in Penal Matters (2d rev. ed. 1993)

Ekkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni, European Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters—The Council of Europe's Legal Instruments (1987)

John Murphy, Punishing International Terrorists: The Legal Framework for Policy Initiatives (1985)

The Natural Law Reader (Brendan F. Brown ed., 1960)

Manfred Nowak, U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (1993)

Arthur Nussbaum, A Concise History of the Law of Nations (1954)

Daniel Patrick O'Connell, International Law (1965)

Daniel Patrick O'Connell, The International Law of the Sea (Ivan A. Shearer ed., 1984)

Daniel Patrick O'Connell, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law (1967)

Dietrich Oehler, Internationales Strafrecht (1973)

Open Societies Institute, Globalizing Torture: CIA Secret Detention and Extraordinary Rendition (2013)

Oppenheim's International Law (Robert Jennings & Arthur Watts eds., 9th ed. 1992)

Lhassa Oppenheim, International Law (Hersch Lauterpacht ed., 8th ed. 1955)

David H. Ott, Public International Law in the Modern World (1987)

Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States (1909)

Pierre A. Papadatos, The Eichmann Trial (1964)

Pierre A. Papadatos, Le Délit Politique (1954)

P. Papathanassion, L'Extradition en Matiere Politique (1954)

Nicoletta Parisi, Extradizione e Diritti Dell'Uomo: Fra Diritto Internazionale Convenzionale e Generale (1993)

C. Parry, British Digest of International Law (1965)

Jordan J. Paust, M. Cherif Bassiouni & Michael Scharf et al., International Criminal Law: Cases and Materials (2d ed. 2000)

Vespasian Pella, La Codification du Droit Penal International (1928)

Coleman Phillipson, The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome (1911)

Coleman Phillipson, Three Criminal Reformers: Beccaria, Bentham and Romilly (1923)

Francis T. Piggott, Extradition: A Treatise on the Law Relating to Fugitive Offenders (1910)

Horacio Daniel Piombo, Tratado de la Extradicion; Internacional e Interna (1998)

Simon Planas-Suarez, Estudio Juridico y Politico el Asilo Diplomatico: Sobre este Execrable uso Latino Americano Destructor de la Soberania Nacional de la Cordialidad Internacional (1953)

Dominique Poncet, La Protection de L'Accuse par la Convention Européene des Droits de L'Homme (1977)

Dominique Poncet & Phillip Neyroud, L'Extradition et L'Asile Politique en Suisse (1976)

Post Conflict Justice (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed. 2002)

The Princeton Principles on Universal Jurisdiction (2001)

The James Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (1992)

C. Herman Pritchett, The American Constitution (1959)

Prosecuting Heads of State (Ellen L. Lutz & Catilin Reiger eds., 2009)

The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1994)

Samuel Puffendorf, The Elements of Universal Jurisprudence (W. Oldfather trans., 1931)

Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights (2001)

Roberto Quadri, Diritto Penal Internationale (1944)

L. Quintana, Derecho de Asilo (1952)

Maurizio Ragazzi, The Concept of International Obligations Erga Omnes (1997)

Steven Ratner & Jason Abrams, Accountability for Human Rights Atrocities in International Law: Beyond the Nuremberg Legacy (2001)

Adolf Frank Reel, The Case of General Yamashita (1949)

Report of the European Committee on Crime Prevention, Council of Europe (1990)

Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of the Fifty-Third Session, Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts (2001)

Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (1985)

Resolution of the International Congress of Comparative Law (The Hague, 1932)

Restatement on Foreign Relations of the United States (1918)

Restatement (Second) on Foreign Relations of the United States (1965)

Restatement (Third) The Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1987)

Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised Draft No. 1, 1980)

Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised Draft No. 2, May 1981)

Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised Draft No. 3, May 27, 1982)

Antonio Q. Ripoles, Derecho de Asilo (1952)

Antonio Q. Ripoles, Tratado de Derecho Penal Internacional e Internacional Penal (2 vols. 1955–1957)

Rivista Italiana de Diritto e Procedura Penale (1981)

Arthur H. Robertson, Human Rights in Europe (1993)

Nigel Rodley, The Treatment of Prisoners under International Law (1987)

Bernard V.A. Röling, The Tokyo Trials and Beyond: Reflections of a Peacemonger (Antonio Cassese ed., 1993)

C. Neale Ronning, Diplomatic Asylum, Legal Norms and Political Reality in Latin America Relations (1965)

Alfred P. Rubin, The Law of Piracy (2d ed. 1998)

Enslaved: True Stories of Modern Day Slavery (Jesse Sage & Liora Kasten eds., 2006)

Francesco Salerno, Diritti Dell'uomo, Estradizione Ed Espulsione: Atti Del Convegno Di Studio Organizzato Dall'Universita Di Ferrara per Salutare Giovanni Battagliani, 29–30 Ottobre 1999 (2003)

William A. Schabas, The Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (1993)

William A. Schabas, Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (2002)

William A. Schabas, Genocide in International Law: The Crime of Crimes (2000)

Dietrich Schindler & Jiri Toman, The Laws of Armed Conflict (1981)

Wolfgang Schomburg & Otto Lagodny, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (1998)

Wolfgang Schomburg & Otto Lagodny, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (5d. ed, 2012)

Jan Schreiber, The Ultimate Weapon (1978)

Hans Schultz, Das Schweizerische Auslieferungrecht (1953)

Bart de Schutter, Bibliography on International Criminal Law (1972)

Bart de Schutter, La Belgique et le Droit International Pénal (1975)

Klaus Schwaighofer, Auslieferung und Internationales Strafrecht (1988)

George Schwarzenberger, International Law (3d ed. 1957)

L. Scott, Hague Court Reports (1916)

Charles de Secondat Montesquieu, De L'Esprit des Lois, Oeuvres Complétes (Roger Caillois ed., 1951)

Secretaria de Relaciones Exteriores, Limits to National Jurisdiction: Documents and Judicial Resolutions on the Alvarez-Machain Case (1993)

J. Seldon, Mare Clausum (M. Nedham Trans. 1972)

J. Seldon, Mare Clausum Seu de Domino Maris (1635)

Eileen Servidio-Delabre, Le Role de la Chambre D'Accusation et la Nature de sons avis en Matiere D'Extradition Passive (1993)

William Shakespeare, The Tragedy of Romeo and Juliet, in The Riverside Shakespeare (1974)

Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law (1971)

Yoram Sheftel, Defending Ivan the Terrible: The Conspiracy to Convict John Demjanjuk (1996)

S. Prakash Sinha, Asylum and International Law (1971)

E. Benjamin Skinner, A Crime so Monstrous: Face-to-Face with Modern-Day Slavery (2008)

Loius Sohn & Thomas Buergenthal, International Protection of Human Rights (1973)

Armando Spataro, Ne Valeva la Pena: Storie di Terrorismi e Mafie, di Segreti di Stato e di Giustizia Offesa (2010)

Samuel P. Stafford, Clemency: Legal Authority, Procedure and Structure (1977)

Gaston Stefani et al., Procédure Pénal (15th ed. 1993)

Eric Stein & Peter Hay, Law and Institutions in the Atlantic Area (1968)

J. F. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England (1863)

Julius Stone, Aggression and World Order (1958)

The Strategy of World Order (Richard A. Falk & Saul H. Mendlovitz eds., 1966)

Michael Stuckey, The High Court of Star Chamber (1998)

H. Taubenfeld, The Law Relating to Activities of Man in Space (1970)

Thucydides, The Peloponnesian War (C.M. Smith trans., 1969)

The Tokyo War Crimes Trials: An International Symposium (C. Hosoya et al. eds., 1986)

The Tokyo War Crimes Trial: The Complete Transcripts of the Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (22 vols. and 5 supp. vols.; R. John Pritchard & Sonia M. Zaide eds., 1981)

1 Traité de Droit International Public (1926)

Maurice Travers, Le Droit Pénal International (1921)

Maurice Travers, Le Droit Pénal Internatioanl et sa Mise en Oeuvre en Temps de Paix et en Temps de Guerre (5 vols. 1920–1922)

Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal (1947)

A Treatise on International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 2 vols. 1973)

Stefan Trechsel, Human Rights in Criminal Proceedings (2005)

Otto Triffterer, Dogmatische Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung des Materiellen Volderstrafrechts Seit Nuremberg (1966)

Jan Triska & Robert M. Slusser, The Theory, Law, and Policy of Soviet Treaties (1962)

Travers Twiss, Law of Nations (1884)

United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, Global Reports on Trafficking in Persons (2009)

United States Army Field Manual (1956)

United States Department of Justice, Criminal Division, Procedure for Requesting International Extradition (1985)

United States Department of Justice Manual (1989)

United States Department of Justice, United States Attorney's Manual (2000)

United States Department of Justice, Labor and State, Interagency Task Force on Immigration Policy: A Staff Report (1979)

United States Department of State, Digest of U.S. Practice in International Law (1975)

Giuliano Vassalli, La Giustizia Penale Internationale (1995)

Emerich de Vattel, Le Droit des Gens (1758)

E. de Vattel, The Law of Nations (C. Fenwick trans., 1916)

Gert Vermeulen, Tom Vander Beken, Laurens Van Puyenbroeck & Sara Van Malderen, Availability of Law Enforcement Information in the European Union: Between Mutual Recognition and Equivalent Right of Access (2005)

Pietro Verri, Osservazioni Sulla Tortura (1947)

Manuel Vieira, Derecho de Asilo Diplomatico (1962)

Charles de Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public International Law (P. Corbett trans., 1957)

Theo Vögler, Auslieferungsrecht und Grundgesetz (1969)

Theo Vögler & Peter Wilkitzki, Gesetz Über Die Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (IRG) Kommentar (1992)

George Waillez, l'Infraction Politique en Droit Positif Belge (1970)

J. Wasserman, Immigration Law and Practice (3d ed. 1979)

Lloyd L. Weinreb, Natural Law and Justice (1987)

P. Weis, Nationality and Statelessness in International Law (1956)

Henry Wheaton, Elements of International Law (C. Phillipson ed., 5th ed. 1916)

Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law (1963)

Christine Van Den Wijngaert, Criminal Procedure Systems in the European Community (1993)

Christine Van Den Wijngaert, The Political Offence Exception to Extradition (1980)

Paul Anselm von Feuerbach, Lehrbuch des Gemeinen in Deutschland Gültigen Peinlichen Rechts (1801)

Arthur Taylor Von Mehren & Donald Theodore Trautman, The Law on Multistate Problems: Cases and Materials on Conflict of Laws (1965)

G. Williams, Digest of International Law (1968)

Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure (2d ed. 1982)

Barbara M. Yarnold, International Fugitives: A New Role for the International Court of Justice (1991)

Periodicals

Abraham Abramovsky, A Critical Evaluation of American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Policy, 1980 Wis. L. Rev. 25

Abraham Abramovsky, Extraterritorial Abductions: America's "Catch & Snatch" Policy Run Amok, 31 Va. J. Int'l L.J. 151 (1991)

Abraham Abramovsky & Jonathan I. Edelstein, The Post-Schengen Israeli Extradition Law: Has It Solved the Extradition Problems between Israel and the United States or Has It Merely Shifted the Battleground? 35 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1 (Jan. 2002)

Abraham Abramovsky & Steven J. Eagle, A Critical Evaluation of the Mexican–American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Treaty, 64 Iowa L. Rev. 275 (1979)

Abraham Abramovsky & Steven J. Eagle, U.S. Policy in Apprehending Alleged Offenders Abroad: Extradition, Abduction or Irregular Rendition?, 57 Or. L. Rev. 51 (1977)

Accused Serb War Criminal Loses Australia Extradition Appeal, Reuters, Sept. 30, 2011

The African Charter on Human & People's Rights, June 17, 1981, in Basic Documents on Human Rights 55 (Ian Brownlie ed., 3d ed. 1992)

Susie Alerge & Marisa Leaf, Mutual Recognition in European Judicial Cooperation: A Step Too Far Too Soon? Case Study—the European Arrest Warrant, 10 Eur. L.J. 200–217 (Mar. 2004)

Johannes van Aggelan, The Bush Administration's War on Terror: The Consequences of Unlawful Preemption and the Legal Duty to Protect the Human Rights of its Victims, 42 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 21, 73–75 (2009)

Emily Alpert, Saudi Arabia's Punishment by Paralysis Condemned as "Grotesque," L.A. Times, Apr. 4, 2013

The Alien and the Constitution, 20 U. Chi. L. Rev. (1953)

Albert W. Alschuler, The Trial Judge's Role in Plea Bargaining, Part I, 76 Colum. L. Rev. 1059 (1976)

American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, reprinted in 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 133 (Supp. 1949)

Amnesty International, Bolivia: Former Officials Convicted over Massacre, Aug. 31, 2008

Ennio Amodio & Oreste Dominioni, L'Estradizione e il Problema de ne bis in idem, in Anno X-N.2 Rivista del Diritto Matrimoniale e Dello Stato Delle Persone 363 (1968)

A. Andries, C. Van den Wyngaert, E. David, & J. Verhaegen, Commentaire de la loi du 16 juin 1993 relative à la repression des violations graves de droit international humanitaire, 1994 Revue de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie 1133 (1994)

Anthony G. Amsterdam, Speedy Criminal Trial: Rights and Remedies, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 525 (1975)

R.P. Anand, Origin & Development of the Law & the Sea, in Annuair de L'Institute de Droit International (1874–1883) 733 (1928)

Meredith Angelson, Note: Beyond the Myth of "Good Faith": Torture Evidence in International Extradition Hearings, 41 N.Y.U. J. Int'l. L. & Pol'y 603, 633–634 (2009)

Joao M. de Araujo, Extradicao—Alguns Aspectos Fundamentais, 326 Revista Forens 61 (1993)

Donna E. Arzt, The Lockerbie "Extradition by Analogy" Agreement: "Exceptional Measure" or Template for Transnational Criminal Justice?, 18 Am. U. Int'l L. Rev. 163 (2002)

John Assadi & Craig Donovan, Immigration and Nationality, 34 Int'l Lawyer 646 (1999)

Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkav, between France and Great Britain, The Hague Court (1916), reprinted in 5 Am. J. Int'l L. 520 (1911)

David Babinski, Note, Trade—The Export Administration Act of 1979, 4 Suffolk Transnat'l L.J. 361 (1980)

Jennifer L. Balint, The Place of Law in Addressing International Regime Conflicts, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 103 (1996)

A. Baltatzis, La Non-extradition Des Nationaux, 13 Rev. Hellenique De Droit Int'l 190 (1960)

Theodore L. Banks, International Activities and Crime Considerations under United States Antitrust Laws, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 51 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

Bruce A. Barenblat, Note, Torture as a Violation of the Law of Nations: An Analysis of 28 I.S.C. Section 1350—Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980), 16 Tex. Int'l L. J. 117 (1981)

Antony Barnett, Pinochet: Straw May Have Misled MPs, Guardian, Jan. 15, 2000

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Accountability for Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Other Serious Violations of Human Rights, in Post-Conflict Justice (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2001)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 17 (1977)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Combating Impunity for International Crimes, 71 U. Colo. L. Rev. 409 (1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Comprehensive Strategic Approach on International Cooperation for the Prevention, Control and Suppression of International and Transnational Criminality, 15 Nova L. Rev. 353 (1991)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: The Need for a Specialized Convention, 31 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 457 (1994)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Crime of Kidnapping and Hostage Taking, in I International Criminal Law 475 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed., 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Criminal Justice System of the U.S.S.R. and the People's Republic of China, 11 Revista de Derecho Puertorriqueno 168 (1971)

M. Cherif Bassiounu, A Critical Study of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, 5 Crim. L. Forum 279 (1994)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Death as a Penalty in the Shari'a, in The Death Penalty: Condemned 65 (International Commission of Jurists, 2000)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Definition of Aggression in International Law: The Crime against Peace, in 1 Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise 159

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Draft Statute International Criminal Tribunal, 9 Nouvelles Études Pénales 35 (1992)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Effective National & International Action against Organized Crime & Terrorist Criminal Activities, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 9 (1990)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enforcing Human Rights through International Criminal Law and through an International Criminal Tribunal, in Human Rights: An Agenda for the Next Century 347 (Louis Henkin & John Lawrence Hargrove eds., 1994)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement as an International Crime, 23 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 445 (1991)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement: Slavery, Slave-Related Practices, and Trafficking in Persons for Sexual Exploitation, in 1 International Criminal Law 535 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d ed. 2008)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extradition Reform Legislation in the United States: 1981–1983, 17 Akron L. Rev. 495 (1984)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extraterritorial Criminal Jurisdiction, Globe (Illinois State Bar Association Newsletter), vol. 6.1, at 1 (1970)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Former Yugoslavia: Investigating Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Establishing an International Criminal Tribunal, 18 Fordham Int'l L.J. 1191 (1995)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, From Versailles to Rwanda in Seventy-Five Years: The Need to Establish a Permanent International Criminal Court, 10 Harv. Hum. Rts. J. 11 (1997)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Functional Approach to "General Principles of International Law," 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 768 (1990)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Principles of International Law, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 768 (1990)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Report on the Juridical Status of the Requested State Denying Extradition, in Proceedings of the XIth International Congress of Comparative Law (1982)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The History of the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, 11 Nouvelles Études Pénales 1 (Ass'n Int'l de Droit Pénal 1993)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice: Identifying International Procedural Protections and Equivalent Protections in National Constitutions, 3 Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L. 235 (1993)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Human Rights Program: The Veneer of Civilization Thickens, 21 DePaul L. Rev. 271 (1971)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Ideologically Motivated Offenses and the Political Offense Exception in Extradition—A Proposed Juridical Standard for an Unruly Problem, 19 DePaul L. Rev. 217 (1970)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2006)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Control of Terrorism: Some Policy Proposals, 37 Int'l Rev. Crim. Pol'y 44 (1981)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Crimes: Jus Cogens and Obligatio Ergo Omnes, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 9–28 (1996)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Court Ratification and National Implementing Legislation, 71 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 1-2 (2000)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order: A Conceptual Evaluation, in Aktuelle Probleme des Internationale Strafrecht 10–15 (Paul Gunter-Poltz & Dietrich Oehler eds., 1971)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: A Summary of the Contemporary American Practice and a Proposal, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 494 (1968), reprinted in 15 Wayne L. Rev. 733 (1969)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition in American Practice and World Public Order, 36 Tenn. L. Rev. 1 (1968)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Law and the Holocaust, 9 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 201 (1979)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The International Narcotics Control System—A Proposal, 46 St. John's L. Rev. 713 (1972)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, 74 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 277 (1980)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Islam: Concept, Law and World Habeas Corpus, 1 Rut-Cam. L. Rev. 163 (1965)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Status of U.S. Forces in Iraq from 2003–2008, 11 Chicago J. Int'l L. 1 (2010)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Need for International Accountability, III International Criminal Law 3–30 (1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Observations on the Structure of the (Zutphen) Consolidated Text, 13 bis Nouvelles Études Pénales 5, 15 (1998)

M. Cherif Bassiouni et al., La peine de mort aux Etats-Unis de la question en 1972, 1973 Rev. de Science Criminelle et de Droit Pénal Comparé 23 (1973)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Penal Characteristics of Conventional International Criminal Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 27 (1983)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Perennial Conflict between International Criminal Justice and Realpolitik, 22 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 541 (2006)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 249 (1978)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Other Countries, in II International Criminal Law 239 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed., 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Policy Considerations on Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters, in Principles and Procedures for Transnational Criminal Law (Albin Eser & Otto Lagodny eds., 1992)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Political Offense Exception in Extradition Law and Practice, in International Terrorism and Political Crimes 398 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1975)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The "Political Offense Exception" Revisited: Extradition between the U.S. and U.K.—A Choice between Friendly Cooperation among Allies and Sound Law and Policy, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (1987)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Practitioner's Perspective on Prisoner Transfer, 4 J. Crim. Def. 127 (1978)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Prolegomenon to Terror Violence, 12 Creighton L. Rev. 745 (1979)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Protection of Diplomats under Islamic Law, 74 Am. J. Int'l L. 609 (1980)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Rapport des Etats-Unis d'Amerique sur les Problemes Actuels de l'Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 494 (1968)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Rationale for International Crimes, in M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Recent Supreme Court Decisions Strengthen Illinois Law Enforcement, 2 Ill. Contemp. Leg. Ed. 111 (1964)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Reflections on the Ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by the United States Senate, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 1169 (1993)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Reforming International Extradition: Lessons of the Past for a Radical New Approach, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 389 (Summer 2003)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Revisiting the Architecture of Crimes against Humanity, in Forging a Convention for Crimes Against Humanity 43 (Leila N. Sadat ed., 2011)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Searching for Peace and Achieving Justice: The Need for Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 9 (1996)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Slavery, Genocide and Racial Discrimination, in 1 Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise 522 (1973)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sources and Content of International Criminal Law: A Theoretical Framework, I International Criminal Law 3 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Speech, Religious Discrimination and Blasphemy, 1989 Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 432-35 (1989)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Terrorism, Law Enforcement and the Mass Media: Perspectives, Problems, Proposals, 72 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1 (1981)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Theory of International Criminal Law, in Bassiouni ICL (1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Time Has Come for an International Criminal Court, 1 Ind. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 1 (1991)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Transfer of Prisoners: Policies and Practices of the United States, II International Criminal Law (1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The United Nations Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 784 (1994)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Unlawful Seizures and Irregular Rendition Devices as Alternatives to Extradition, 7 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 25 (1973)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Practice, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. 81 (2001)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited: The International Court of Justice Decision in Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), 12 Palestine Y.B. Int'l L. 27–48 (2002-03)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, 12 Palestine Y.B. Int'l L. 27 (2005)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, The War Power and the Law of War: Theory and Realism, 18 DePaul L. Rev. 188 (1968)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, World Public Order and Extradition: A Conceptual Evaluation, in Aktuelle Probleme Das Internationalen Strafrechts 10 (D. Oehler & P.G. Potz eds., 1970)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, World War I: The War to End All Wars, and the Birth of a Handicapped International Criminal Justice System, 33 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (2002)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Gamal M. Badr, The Sahri'ah: Sources, Interpretation and Rule-Making, 1 UCLA J. Islamic & Near E.L. 135 (Spring 2002)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Christopher L. Blakesley, The Need for an International Criminal Court in the New International World Order, 25 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 151 (1992)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law & Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 17 (1977)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, The Crime of Torture, in International Criminal Law 363 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed., 1999)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, Final Report on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court for the Implementation of the Apartheid Convention and Other Relevant International Instruments, 9 Hofstra L. Rev. 523 (1981)

M. Cherif Bassiouni et al., La Peine de Mort aux Etats-Unis—L'Etat de la Question en 1972, 1973 Revue de Science Criminelle et de Droit Pénal Compare 1

M. Cherif Bassiouni et al., The Protection of Human Rights in Criminal Proceedings under National Constitution and International Instruments, 4 Nouvelles Études Pénales (Assn. Int'l de Droit Pénal, 1982)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Eliot A. Landau, Presidential Discretion in Foreign Trade and Its Effects on East–West Trade, 14 Wayne L. Rev. 494 (1968)

M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Resolution, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 856 (1968)

Richard R. Baxter, Criminal Jurisdiction in the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, 7 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 72 (1958)

Richard R. Baxter, Extraterritorial Application of Domestic Law, 1 U.B.C.L. Rev. 333 (1960)

Belgium Begins Pinochet Challenge, BBC, Jan. 25, 2000

Bob Bear, quoted in Ruth Jamieson & Kierran McEvoy, State Crime by Proxy & Juridical Othering, 45 Brit. J. Criminology 504, 516 (2005)

Cesare Beccaria, Dei Delitti e Delle Pene (1764) (J.A. Farrer trans.), in Crimes and Punishments (1880)

T. Vander Beken, Freedom, Security and Justice in the European Union. A Plea for Alternative Views on Harmonisation, in Harmonisation and Harmonising Measures in Criminal Law (A. Klip and H. van der Wilt eds., 2002)

Peter H. F. Bekker, Advisory Jurisdiction-Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations—Immunity form Legal Process of Expert on Mission Appointed by U.N. Commission on Human Rights—Effect of U.N. Secretary—General's Assertion of Immunity—Procedural Priority to be Accorded Assertion of Immunity in Municipal Courts, 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 913 (1999)

Alex Bellos & Jonathan Franklin, Pinochet Receives a Hero's Welcome on His Return, Guardian, Mar. 3, 2000

Louis René Beres, Genocide and Genocide-Like Crimes, in 1 International Criminal Law 271 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Steven A. Bernholz et al., International Extradition in Drug Cases, 10 N.C.J. Int'l L. & Comm'l Reg. 353 (1985)

Fiona Beveridge, The Lockerbie Affair, 41 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 907 (1992)

A. Biannchi, Immunity versus Human Rights: The Pinochet Case, 10 Eur. J. Int'l L. 249 (1999)

Remigus Bierzaneck, War Crimes: History and Definition, in 3 International Criminal Law 29 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Russell Bikoff, Extradition and the U.N. Convention Against Torture: Mironescu v. Costner, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 256–262 (Jul. 2007)

Richard B. Bilder, The Canadian Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act: New Stresses on the Law of the Sea, 69 Mich. L. Rev. 1 (1970)

Richard B. Bilder, Control of Criminal Conduct in Antarctica, 52 Va. L. Rev. 231 (1966)

Christopher L. Blakesley, A Conceptual Framework for Extradition and Jurisdiction over Extraterritorial Crimes, 1984 Utah L. Rev. 685

Christopher L. Blakesley, The Evisceration of the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. Pol'y 109 (1986)

Christopher L. Blakesley, Extradition between France and the United States: An Exercise in Comparative and International Law, 13 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 653 (1980)

Christopher Blakesley, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, in International Criminal Law 33–105 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999)

Christopher L. Blakesley, Introduction: Traditional Bases of Jurisdiction over Extraterritorial Crime and A Hybrid Approach, in 2 International Criminal Law 3 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Christopher L. Blakesley, The Practice of Extradition from Antiquity to Modern France and the United States: A Brief History, 4 B.C. Int'l Comp. L. Rev. 39 (1981)

Christopher L. Blakesley & Dan E. Stigall, The Myopia of U.S. v. Martinelli: Extraterritorial Jurisdiction in the 21st Century, 39 Geo. Wash. Int'l L. Rev. 1 (2007)

Samuel A. Bleicher, The Legal Significance of Re-citation of General Assembly Resolutions, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 444 (1969)

Matthew Bloom, Note: A Comparative Analysis of the United States's Response to Extradition Requests from China, 33 Yale J. Int'l L. 177 (2008)

Jeffery M. Blum & Ralph G. Steinhardt, Federal Jurisdiciton over International Human Rights Claims: The Alien Tort Claims Act after Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 22 Harv. Int'l L. J. 53 (1981)

Ralph Blumenthal, Aquitted in "Pizza Connection" Trial, Man Remains in Prison, N.Y. Times, July 28, 1988

Roman Boed, The Effect of a Domestic Amnesty on the Ability of Foreign States to Prosecute Alleged Perpetrators of Serious Human Rights Violations, 33 Cornell Int'l L.J. 297 (2000)

Bolivia Expels Fugitive Nazi Barbie, Chi. Trib., Feb. 5, 1983

Michael Bohlander, Referring an Indictment from the ICTY and ICTR to Another Court-Rule 11BIS and the Consequences for the Law of Extradition, 55 I.C.L.Q. 219 (Jan. 2006)

Pascale Bonnefoy, Pinochet Suffers Severe Heart Attack—Americas—International Herald Tribune, N.Y. Times, Nov. 3, 2006

Edwin M. Borchard, The Factor Extradition Case, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 742 (1934)

Jed Borod, US Senate Holds Second Hearing on Controversial UK Extradition Treaty, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 345 (Sept. 2006)

Trevor Bormann, Background: Captain Dragan's Legal Fight, Australian Broad. Corp. News, May 27, 2011

Bosnian War Crimes Court Jails First Woman, Reuters, Apr. 30, 2012

Safiya Boucaud, Bolivia Officials Request Extradition of Ex-president from US, Jurist, Nov. 12, 2008

Barbara Merry Boudreaux, Benitez v. Garcia: An Extradition Arrangement Lost in Translation, 15 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 661 (2007)

D.W. Bowett, Jurisdiction: Changing Patterns of Authority over Activities and Resources, 1982 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 1

Robert P. Boyle & Roy Pulsifer, The Tokyo Convention on Offenses and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, 30 J. Air & Com. J. 305 (1964)

Michael P. Bracken, Comment: The Proper Interplay of the Voluntary Departure and Motion to Reopen Provisions of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 57 Cath. U. L. Rev. 511 (Winter 2008)

Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 816 (1997)

Margaret I. Branick, Extradition and the Conflict in Northern Ireland: The Past, Present, and Future of an Intractable Problem, 25 Hastings Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 169 (Spring 2002)

Charles Breitel, Controls in Criminal Law Enforcement, 27 U. Chi. L. Rev. 427 (1960)

Stephan Breitenmoser & Gunter E. Wilms, Human Rights v. Extradition: The Soering Case, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (1990)

Susan W. Brenner & Anthony C. Crescenzi, State-Sponsored Crime: The Futility of the Economic Espionage Act, 28 Hous. J. Int'l. L. 389 (Spring 2006)

William J. Brennan Jr., International Due Process and the Law, 48 Va. L. Rev. 1258 (1962)

Victoria Brittain, Condemned by the Abu Hamza stereotype, Guardian, Oct. 4, 2012

Stephan Broder, "Ivan the Terrible" Case Isn't Open and Shut, Israelis Admit, Chi. Trib., Sept. 28, 1986

Reed Brody & Michael Ratner, The Pinochet Papers: The Case of Augusto Pinochet in Spain and Britain, Hum. Rts. Watch 2001

Brendan F. Brown, Extradition and the Natural Law, 16 N.Y.L.F. 578 (1970)

Elizabeth G. Brown, Jurisdiction of United States Courts over Crimes in Aircraft, 15 Stan. L. Rev. 45 (1962)

Aimee J. Buckland, Offending Officials: Former Government Actors and the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 94 Calif. L. Rev. 423 (Mar. 2006)

Elizabeth Burleson, Juvenile Execution Terrorist Extradition, and the Supreme Court Discretion to Consider International Death Penalty Jurisprudence, 68 Alb. L. Rev. 909 (2005)

Steven J. Burton, New Stresses on the Antarctica Treaty: Toward International Legal Institutions Governing Antarctica Resources, 65 Va. L. Rev. 421 (1979)

"Butcher of Lyon" Awaits Trial, Chi. Trib., 1983

Jillian Button, Spirited Away (Into a Legal Black Hole?): The Challenge of Invoking State Responsibility for Extraordinary Rendition, 19 Fla. J. Int'l L. 531, 537 (2007)

Amie Cafarelli, Case Comment: Extradition Law, 33 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 377, 387 (2010)

R. Caillemer, Asylia, in Dictionaire des Antiquites Grecques et Romaines d'Apres les Textes et Les Documents 505 (1877)

Charles Cantrell, The Political Offense Exception in International Extradition: A Comparison of the United States, Great Britain and Republic of Ireland, 60 Marq. L. Rev. 777 (1977)

Thomas E. Carbonneau, Extradition and Transnational Terrorism: A Comment on the Recent Extradition of Klauss Croissant from France to West Germany, 12 Int'l L. 813 (1978)

Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Political Offense Exception as Applied in French Cases Dealing with the Extradition of Terrorists, 1983 Mich. Y.B. Int'l Legal Studies 209

Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition and Transnational Terrorists: Old Doctrine Reformulated and New Norms Created, 1 Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 1 (1977)

Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Provisional Arrest & Subsequent Release of Abou Daoud by French Authorities, 17 Va. J. Int'l L. 495 (1977)

Michael H. Cardozo, When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution? 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 127 (1961)

Kenneth S. Carlston, World Order and International Law, 20 J. Legal Ed. 127 (1967)

Scott Carlson & Bruce Zagaris, International Cooperation in Criminal Matters: Western Europe's International Approach to International Crime, 15 Nova L. Rev. 551 (1991)

Case Dismissed against Muira after Jail Suicide, AP Worldstream, Oct. 15, 2008

Douglass Cassel, Lessons from the Americas: Guidelines for International Response to Amnesties for Atrocities, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 197 (1996)

J.G. Castel & Sharon Williams, The Extradition of Canadian Citizens, and Sections I & 6(I) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1987 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 263

Chad's Habre Willing to Appear before International Tribunal, AFP, July 14, 2011

Jonathon F. Cheatwood, Recent Development: Constitutional Law—"Good Faith" Exception to the Exclusionary Rule for Warrantless Searches Made by United States Agents Who Reasonably Rely on Assertions by Foreign Police That a Search Is Valid, 21 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 631 (1988)

Herbert B. Chermside, Jr., Annotation, Jurisdiction of Federal Court to Try Criminal Defendant Who Alleges That He was Brought within United States Jurisdiction Illegally or as a Result of Fraud or Mistake, 28 A.L.R. 685 Fed (1976)

Chad Confirms Former President Habre's Conviction, Agence France Presse, Aug. 19, 2008

C.J. Chivers, Russians Plant Flag on the Arctic Seabed, N.Y. Times, Aug. 3, 2007

Chileans Order Peru's Ex-Chief Home for Trial, N.Y. Times, Sept. 22, 2007, at A1

David A. Clanton, Comment, Extradition: Concurrent Jurisdiction and the Uncertainty of Prosecution in the Requested Nation, 14 Wayne L. Rev. 1181 (1968)

Alan W. Clarke, Terrorism, Extradition, and the Death Penalty, 29 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 783 (2003)

Alan W. Clarke et al., Does the Rest of the World Matter? Sovereignty, International Human Rights Law and the American Death Penalty, 30 Queen's L.J. 260, 273–274 (2004)

Roger S. Clark, Apartheid, in I International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni, 2d rev. ed., 1999)

Richard Cohen, Comment, Self-Executing Agreements: A Separation of Powers Problem, 24 Buffalo L. Rev. 137 (1974)

Robert A. Cohen, Note, United States Exclusion and Deportation of Nazi War Criminals: The Acts of October 30, 1978, 13 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. Pol. 101 (1980)

James R. Coker, The Status of Visiting Military Forces in Europe: NATO-SOFA a Comparison, in 2 Bassiouni & Nanda, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 115 (1973)

C.F. David Cole, No Clear Statement: An Argument for Preserving Judicial Review of Removal Decisions, 12 Geo. Immigr. L.J. 429 (1998)

Adam Collicelli, Note: Affording Discretion to Immigration Judges: A Comparison of Removal Proceedings in the United States and Canada, 32 B.C. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 115 (Winter 2009)

Comment, A Comparative Analysis of the U.S. Extradition Treaties with Mexico and South America, 4 Cal. W.L. Rev. 315 (1968)

Comment, Immigration Law and the Refugee: A Recommendation to Harmonize the Statutes with the Treaties, 6 Cal. W. Int'l L. J. 129 (1975)

Comment, International Due Process and the Law, 48 Va. L. Rev. 1258 (1962)

Comment, International Jurisdiction: Horizontal and Vertical Conceptions of Legal Order, 32 Temp. L.Q. 295 (1959)

Comment, Observations on the Practice of Territorial Asylum in the U.S., 56 Am. J. Int'l L. 148 (1962)

Comment, Self Executing Agreements: A Separation of Powers Problem, 24 Buffalo L. Rev. 137 (1974)

Conesco, L'extradition dans les Traites d'Assistance Juridiques Conclus par l'Etat Socialiste Roumaine avec les Autres Etats Socialistes d'Europe, 9 Revue Roumaine des Sciences Sociales 279 (1965)

Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law: International Human Right: U.S. Task Force Report on Interrogations and Transfers, 103 A.J.I.L. 760 (Oct. 2009)

Astrid Reisinger Coracini, The International Criminal Court's Exercise of Jurisdiction over the Crime of Aggression—at Last…in Reach…Over Some, 2 Goettingen J. Int'l L. 745 (2010)

Declan Costello, International Terrorism and the Development of the Principle of Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, 10 J. Int'l L. & Econ. 483 (1975)

John Dugard & Christine Van den Wijngaert, Reconciling Extradition with Human Rights, 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 198 (1998)

Court Advances Extradition of Fujimori, Chi. Trib., May 31, 2002, at sec. 1, p. 6

Court Backs Algerian extradition, BBC World News, June 25, 2009

Alan Cowell & John F. Burns, Britain Refuses to Extradite Computer Hacker Sought in U.S., N.Y. Times, Oct. 16, 2012

Willard B. Cowles, Trials of War Criminals (Non-Nuremberg), 42 Am. J. Int'l L. 299 (1948)

Williard B. Cowles, Universality of Jurisdiction over War Crimes, 33 Cal. L. Rev. 177 (1945)

Gail Diane Cox, Drug War's Big Showcase Falls Apart, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 1, 1993

John Crewdson, Report: CIA May Have Had "Secret Prisons" in Europe, Chi. Trib., June 8, 2006

John Crewdson, CIA Targeted "More than 10" in Italy for Kidnap, Agent Says, Chi. Trib., July 31, 2006

Carolyn A. D'Amore, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain and the Alien Tort Statute: How Wide Has the Door to Human Rights Litigation Been Left Open?, 39 Akron L. Rev. 593 (2006)

G. Dean, Profili di un Indagine Sul Ne Bis In Idem Extradizionale, 1998 Rivista di Diritto Procedurale 58 (1998)

Charles H. Dearborn III, The Domestic Legal Effect of Declarations That Treaty Provisions Are Not Self-Executing, 57 Tex. L. Rev. 233 (1979)

Ashley S. Deeks, Avoiding Transfers to Torture, Council on Foreign Relations Council Special Report No. 35, 4–9 (June 2008)

Zsuzanna Deen-Racsmány, The Nationality of the Offender and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 95 Am. J. Int'l L. 606 (2001)

Zsuzanna Deen-Racsmány, A New Passport to Impunity? Non-Extradition of Naturalized Citizens versus Criminal Justice, 2 J. Int'l Crim. Just. 761 (Sept. 2004)

Zsuzanna Deen-Racsmány, The European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender of Nationals Revisited: The Lessons of Constitutional Challenges, 14 Eur. J. Crim. L. & Crim. Just. 271 (2006)

Lora L. Deere, Political Offenses in the Law and Practice of Extradition, 27 Am. J. Int'l L. 247 (1933)

Saeed Kamali Dehghan, Iranian Woman Blinded by Acid Attack Pardons Assailant as He Faces Same fate, Guardian, July 31, 2011

Daniel Derby, Duties and Powers Respecting Foreign Crimes, 30 Am. J. Comp. L. 523 (Supp. 1982)

Daniel Derby, Torture, in I International Criminal Law: Crimes (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed., 1999)

Marten M. Dernis, Haitian Immigrants: Political Refugees or Economic Escapees?, 31 U. Miami L. Rev. 27 (1976)

Developments Recent in the Law, Immigration and Nationality, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 643 (1953)

Henry P. DeVries & Jose R. Novas, Territorial Asylum in the Americas-Latin American Law and Practice of Extradition, 5 Inter-Am. L. Rev. 61 (1963)

Lucien L. Dhooge, The Political Question Doctrine and Corporate Complicity in Extraordinary Rendition, 21 Temp. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 311, 314–315 (2007)

Leticia Diaz & Barry Dubner, Foreign Fishing Piracy vs. Somalia Piracy—Does Wrong Equal Wrong?, 14 Barry L. Rev. 73 (2010)

Leticia Diaz & Barry Dubner, On the Evolution of the Law of Sea Piracy: How Property Trumped Human Rights, The Environment and the Sovereign Right of States in the Areas of the Creation and Enforcement of Jurisdiction, 13 Barry L. Rev. 175 (2009)

Edwin D. Dickinson, Jurisdiction following Seizure or Arrest in Violation of International Law, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 231 (1934)

Yoram Dinstein, The Defense of "Obedience to Superior Orders," in International Law (1965)

Charles Digges, Former Russian Atomic Minister Adamov Sentenced to 5 ½ Years in Penal Colony for Fraud and Abuse of Office, Bellona, Feb. 20, 2008

Momtaz Djamchid, The High Seas, in 1 Handbook on the New Law of the Sea 385 (René-Jean Dupuy & Daniel Vignes eds., 1991)

Philip Dorling, US Calls Assange "Enemy of State," Sydney Morning Herald, Sept. 27, 2012

Draft Articles on State Responsibility, 1984 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 259

G.I.A.D. Draper, Grotius' Place in the Development of Legal Ideas about War, in Grotius and International Relations

Clyde Eagleton, Some Questions as to the Place of the Individual in International Law of the Future, 37 Am. J. Int'l L. 642 (1943)

Abra Edwards, Cornejo-Barreto Revisited: The Availability of a Writ of Habeas Corpus to Provide Relief from Extradition under the Torture Convention, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 889 (Spring 2003)

The Effect of Illegal Abductions by Law Enforcement Officials on Personal Jurisdiction, 35 Md. L. Rev. 147 (1975)

John W. Egan, The Future of Criminal Jurisdiction over the Deployed American Soldier: Four Major Trends in Bilateral U.S. Status of Forces Agreements, 20 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 291 (2006)

Omer Y. Elagab, The Hague as the Seat of the Lockerbie Trial: Some Constraints, 34 Int'l Law 289 (2000)

Mark S. Ellis, Purging the Past: The Current State of Lustration Laws in the Former Communist Bloc, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 181 (1996)

William Empson, The Application of Criminal Law to Acts Committed Outside the Jurisdiction, 6 Am. Crim. L. Q. 32 (1967)

Valerie Epps, The Development of the Conceptual Framework Supporting International Extradition, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 369 (Summer 2003)

Valerie Epps, The European Convention, in 2 International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 1992)

Valerie Epps, The Validity of the Political Offender Exception in Extradition Treaties in Anglo-American Jurisprudence, 20 Harv. Int'l L. J. 61 (1979)

Richard J. Erickson, Soviet Theory of the Legal Nature of Customary International Law, 7 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 148 (1975)

Wade Estey, Note, The Five Bases of Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and the Failure of the Presumption against Extraterritoriality, 21 Hastings Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 177 (1997)

European Committee on Crime Problems, Explanatory Report on the European Convention on Extradition (Council of Europe, 1969)

Alona E. Evans, Acquisition of Custody over the International Fugitive Offender Alternative to Extradition: A Survey of United States Practice, 40 Brit. Y.B. Int'l 77 (1964)

Alona E. Evans, Aircraft Hijacking: Its Causes and Cure, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 695 (1969)

Alona E. Evans, The Apprehension and Prosecution of Offenders, in Legal Aspects of International Terrorism 493 (Alona E. Evans & J. Murphy eds., 1978)

Alona E. Evans, Extradition and Rendition: Problems of Choice, in International Aspects of Criminal Law: Enforcing United States Law in the World Community 1 (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981)

Alona E. Evans, Legal Bases of Extradition in the United States, 16 N.Y.L.F. 525 (1970)

Alona E. Evans, Observations on the Practice of Territorial Asylum in the United States, 56 Am. J. Int'l L. 148 (1962)

Alona E. Evans, Political Refugees and the United States Immigration Laws: A Case Note, 62 Am. J. Int'l L. 921 (1968)

Alona E. Evans, Political Refugees and the United States Immigration Laws: Further Developments, 66 Am. J. Int'l L. 571 (1972)

Alona E. Evans, The Political Refugee in United States Immigration Law and Practice, 3 Int'l Law 204 (1969)

Alona E. Evans, Reflections upon the Political Offense in International Practice, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 1 (1963)

Alona E. Evans, Reflections upon the Political Offenses in the Law of Extradition and Asylum, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 1 (1963)

Jack Ewing and Alan Cowell, Demjanjuk Convicted for Role in Nazi Death Camp, N.Y. Times May 12, 2011

Ex-Nazi Fedorenko Executed, Chi. Trib., July 28, 1987

Extradition: Hijacking, 1975 Digest§ 5

Extradition: Procedure: Standard for Evidence, 1976 Digest `5

Extradition: Provisional Arrest, 1977 Digest `6

Extraterritorial Jurisdiction & Jurisdiction following Forcible Abduction: A New Israeli Precedent in International Law, 72 Mich. L. Rev. 1087 (1974)

FACTBOX: Italy Convicts 23 Americans in CIA Rendition Case, Reuters, Nov. 4, 2009

Jean Friedman-Rudovsky, Bolivia Calls Ex-President to Court, Time, Feb. 6, 2007

Charles Fairman, Ker v. Illinois Revisited, 47 Am. J. Int'l L. 678 (1953)

Richard A. Falk, International Jurisdiction: Horizontal and Vertical Conceptions of Legal Order, 32 Temp. L.Q. 295 (1959)

Kenneth R. Feinberg, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and Proposed Federal Criminal Code, 72 J. Crim. L. 385 (1981)

S.Z. Feller, Concurrent Criminal Jurisdiction in the International Sphere, 16 Isr. L. Rev. 40 (1981)

S.Z. Feller, Jurisdiction over Offenses with a Foreign Element, in 2 Bassiouni & Nanada, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 5 (1973)

S.Z. Feller, The Scope of Reciprocity in Extradition, 10 Isr. L. Rev. 427 (1975)

Massimo Fichera, The European Arrest Warrant and the Sovereign State: A Marriage of Convenience?, 15 Eur. L. J. 70, 71 (Jan. 2009)

Louis G. Fields, Bringing Terrorists to Justice—The Shifting Sands of the Political Offense Exception, in International Aspects of Criminal Law: Enforcing United States Law in the World Community 15 (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981)

D. Cameron Findlay, Abducting Terrorists Overseas for Trial in the United States: Issues of International & Domestic Law, 23 Tex. Int'l L. J. 1 (1988)

James Finsten, Extradition of Execution? Policy Constraints in the United States' War on Terror, 77 S. Cal. L. Rev. 835 (May 2004)

Keith R. Fisher, In Rem Alternatives to Extradition for Money Laundering, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 409 (Summer 2003)

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, The Territorial Principle in Penal Law: An Attempted Justification, 1 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 29 (1970)

Former Chad Dictator Habre "Must Face Prosecution," AFP, July 12, 2011

Joshua T. Fougere, Let's Try This Again: Reassessing the Right to Bail in Cases of International Extradition, 42 Colum. J.L. & Soc. Probs. 177 (2008)

France to Retry Gestapo Murderer, Chi. Trib., 1983

Thomas M. Franck, To Define and Punish Piracies; The Lessons of the Santa Maria: A Comment, 36 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 839 (1961)

Thomas M. Franck, Editorial Comment, The "Powers of Appreciation": Who Is the Ultimate Guardian of UN Legality?, 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 519 (1992)

Thomas M. Franck, An International Lawyer Looks at the Bartkus Rule, 34 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1096 (1959)

Thomas M. Franck, Legitimacy in the International System, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 705 (1988)

Ira L. Frank, Effect of the 1967 United Nations Protocol on the Status of Refugees in the United States, 11 Int'l Law 291 (1977)

Stephen Franklin & Ken Armstrong, Secret Evidence Bill Raises Concerns, Chi. Trib., Sept. 30, 2001

Niels W. Frenzen, National Security and Procedural Fairness: Secret Evidence and the Immigration Laws, 76 No.45 Interpreter Releases 1677 (1999)

Robert A. Friedlander, The Crime of Hijacking, in 1 International Criminal Law 455 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Linda Friedman Ramirez & Nicole Mariani, U.S. Magistrate Denies Extradition to Ireland for Role in Assisted Suicide, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 88–89 (Mar. 2008)

Linda Friedman Ramirez, District Court Finds Violation of Dual Criminality in Case of Extradition from India, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 435–436 (Nov. 2008)

Fujimori 25 Year Sentence Upheld by Peru Supreme Court, BBC (Jan. 3, 2010)

Wolfgang Friedmann, The Uses of "General Principles" in the Development of International Law, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 279 (1963)

Novella Gallantini, Evoluzione del Principio del Ne Bis In Idem Europeo Tra Norme Convenzionale E Norme Interne Di Attrazione, 12 Diritto Penale E Processo 1567 (2005)

David L. Gappa, European Court of Human Rights—Extradition—Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Soering Case, 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Ser. A) (1989), 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 463 (1990)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Columbian-Peruvian Asylum Case and the Doctrine of Human Rights, 37 Va. L. Rev. 927 (1951)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Crimes against Humanity and the Principle of Nonextradition of Political Offenders, 62 Mich. L. Rev. 927 (1964)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over Fugitives Brought from a Foreign Country by Force or Fraud: A Comparative Study, 32 Ind. L. J. 427 (1957)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Nature of Political Offenses: A Knotty Problem of Extradition Law, 48 Va. L. Rev. 1226 (1962)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Present Status of Political Offenses in the Law of Extradition and Asylum, 14 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 371 (1953)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Treason, Sedition and Espionage as Political Offenses under the Law of Extradition, 26 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 65 (1964)

Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, War Crimes and the Principle of Nonextradition of Political Offenders, 9 Wayne L. Rev. 269 (1963)

Lech Gardocki, The Socialist System—Judicial Assistance and Mutual Cooperation in Penal Matters, in II International Criminal Law 133 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Robert J. Gareis & Paul McCarthy, Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and Related Statutes, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 193 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

James W. Garner, Comment, Non-Extradition of American Citizens—The Neidecker Case, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 480 (1936)

James W. Garner, Punishment of Offenders against the Laws & Customs of War, 14 Am. J. Int'l L. 70 (1920)

Jeffrey B. Gaynes, Note, Bringing the Terrorist to Justice: A Domestic Law Approach, 11 Cornell Int'l L. J. 71 (1978)

B.J. George, Jr., Diplomatic and Consular Immunity, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 395 (Ved P. Nanda & Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

B.J. George, Jr., Extraterritorial Application of Penal Legislation, 64 Mich. L. Rev. 609 (1965–1966)

B.J. George, Jr., Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 25 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988)

B.J. George, Jr., Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

B.J. George, Jr., Jurisdictional Bases for Criminal Legislation and Its Enforcement, 1983 Mich. Y.B. Int'l Legal Stud. 3

Jonathan George, Toward a More Principled Approach to the Principle of Specialty, 12 Cornell Int'l L. J. 309 (1979)

Peter Germer, Interpretation of Plurilingual Treaties: A Study of Article 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 11 Harv. Int'l L.J. 400, 413 (1970)

Alberto Giacomelli, Communication, in Actes du Pre-Congres International de Syracuse 301 (Ass'n Int'l de Droit Pénal 1969)

Mark Gibney, Policing the World: The Long Reach of U.S. Law & the Short Arm of the Constitution, 6 Conn. J. Int'l L. 103 (1990)

Geoffrey S. Gilbert, Terrorism and the Political Offense Exception Reappraised, 34 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 695 (1985)

Daniel Givelber, Innocence Abroad: The Extradition Cases and the Future of Capital Litigation, 81 Or. L. Rev. 161 (Spring 2002)

Martin E. Gold, Non-Extradition for Political Offenses: The Communist Perspective, 11 Harv. Int'l L. J. 191 (1970)

Heinrich Grutzner, Staatspolitik und der Kriminal-Politik im Auslieferungsrecht, 68 Zeitschripft fur die Gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 501(1956)

Guy Goodwin-Gill, Non-Refoulement and the New Asylum Seekers, 26 Va. J. Int'l L. 897 (1986)

Stephen Gorove, International Protection of Astronauts and Space Objects, 20 DePaul L. Rev. 597 (1970)

Stephen Gorove, Interpreting Article II of the Outer Space Treaty, 37 Fordham L. Rev. 349 (1969)

Régis de Gouttes, Variations sur l'Espace Judicaire Pénal Européen, in Recueil Dalloz Sirey (1990)

Régis de Gouttes, Vers un Espace Judicaire Pénal Européen?, in Recueil Dalloz Sirey (1991)

Vera Gowland-Debbas, The Relationship between the International Court of Justice and the Security Council in the Light of the Lockerbie Case, 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 643 (1994)

Bernhard Graefrath, Leave to the Court What Belongs to the Court: The Libyan Case, 4 European J. Int'l L. 184 (1993)

Jean Graven, L'Extradition des Auteurs des Crimes de Guerre et de Crimes Contre l'Humanite, 24 Annals de Droit Int'l Medical 7 (1973)

Leslie C. Green, Extradition v. Asylum for Aerial Hijackers, 10 Isr. L. Rev. 207 (1975)

Leslie C. Green, Political Offenses, War Crimes and Extradition, 11 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 329 (1962)

Leslie C. Green, Recent Practice in the Law of Extradition, 6 Current Legal Probs. 274 (1953)

R.B. Greenburgh, Recent Developments in the Law of Diplomatic Asylum, 41 Transactions of the Grotius Soc'y 103 (1955)

Robet Gregg, The European Tendency toward Non-Extradition to the United States in Capital Cases: Trends, Assurances, and Breaches of Duty, 10 Miami Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 113 (Fall 2002)

Mary Jo Grotenroth, INTERPOL's Role in International Law Enforcement, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 375 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988)

Heinrich Grutzner, Rapports: Allemagne, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 379 (1968)

Heinrich Grutzner, Staatspolitik und der Kriminal Politik in Auslieforungsrecht, Zeitschrift fur die Gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft, 1956 Tome 68

S.N. Guha-Roy, Is the Law of Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens a Part of Universal International Law?, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 863 (1961)

Elspeth Guild, Crime and the EU's Constitutional Future in an Area of Freedom, Security, and Justice, 10 Eur. L. J. 218–234 (Mar. 2004)

Glenn C. Guritzley, Note, Securities—Transnational Application of the Anti-Fraud Provisions of the Federal Securities Laws Expanded—SEC v. Kasser, 548 F.2d 109 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 938 (1977), 8 Seton Hall L. Rev. 795 (1978)

David L. Hacking, Increasing Extraterritorial Impact of U.S. Laws: A Cause for Concern amongst Friends of America, 1 Nw. J. Int'l L. & Bus. 1 (1979)

Jonathan O. Hafen, Comment, International Extradition: Issues Arising under the Dual Criminality Requirement, 1992 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 191 (1992)

Peter Haggenmacher, Grotius and Gentili: A Reassessment of Thomas E. Holland's Inaugural Lecture, in Hugo Grotius and International Relations (1992)

Kay Hailbronner, Molding a New Human Rights Agenda, 8 Wash. Q. 183 (1985)

Melvina Halberstam, Terrorism on the High Seas: The Achille Lauro Piracy and the I.M.O. Convention on Maritime Safety, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 269 (1988)

Edvard Hambro, New Trends in the Law of Extradition and Asylum, 5 West Pol. Q. 11 (1952)

William M. Hannay, An Analysis of the U.S.–U.K. Supplementary Extradition Treaty: Limiting the Political Offense Exception, 21 Int'l Law 925 (1987)

William M. Hannay, International Terrorism and the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 18 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 381 (1979)

William M. Hannay, Legislative Reform of U.S. Extradition Statutes: Plugging the Terrorist's Loophole, 13 Denv. J. Int'l & Pol'y 53 (1983)

Hurst Hannum, Speech, Religious Discrimination and Blasphemy, Proceedings of the American Society of International Law (1989)

Mark Hansen, Extradition Reopened: Justice Denies It Withheld Evidence about Ivan the Terrible, A.B.A. J., Sept. 1992

Christopher T. Hansen, Note, Behind the Paper Curtain: Asylum Policy versus Asylum Practice, 7 N.Y.U. Rev. Law & Soc. Change 107 (1978)

Kenneth J. Harris & Robert Kushen, Surrender of Fugitives of the War Crimes Crimes Tribunals for Yugoslavia and Rwanda: Squaring International Legal Obligations with the U.S. Constitution, 7 Crim. L. Forum 561 (1996)

Harvard Draft Convention on Jurisdiction 29 Am. J. Int'l L. Supp. 435 (1935)

Harvard Draft Research in International Law, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 117 (1935)

Harvard Law Review, Recent Case: Political Question Doctrine—Ninth Circuit Holds That Whether the President May Conclude a Treaty with Hong Kong Does Not Constitute a Political Quesiton—Wang v. Mathis, 416 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2005), 119 Harv. L. Rev. 2300 (May 2006)

Harvard Research in International Law, Draft Convention on Extradition, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 21 (Supp. 1935)

Harvard Research in International Law, Extradition, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 108 (Supp. 1935)

Harvard Research in International Law: Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 443 (Supp. 1935)

Harvard Research in International Law, Who May Interpret Treaties, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 973 (Supp. 1935)

Harvard Research in International Law, Responsibility of States, 23 Am. J. Int'l L. 131 (Spec. Supp. 1929)

Robert Harvie & Hamar Foster, Shocks and Balances: United States v. Burns, Fine-Tuning Canadian Extradition Law and the Future of the Death Penalty, 40 Gonz. L. Rev. 293 (2004–2005)

Priscilla B. Hayner, International Guidelines for the Creation and Operation of Truth Commissions: A Preliminary Proposal, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 173 (1996)

Catherine Heard, Fair Trials International's Policy Paper: A Brief Review of U.S.–U.K. Extradition under the Extradition Act of 2003 from a Human Rights Perspective, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 2–7 (Jan. 2009)

Catherine Heard, The New European Extradition System—A Critical Review, 25 Int'l L. Enforcement Rep. 399 (Oct. 2009)

Louis Henkin, The Treaty Makers and the Law Makers: The Law of the Land and Foreign Relations, 107 U. Pa. L. Rev. 903 (1959)

Marc Henzelin, L'Immunité pénale des chefs d'Etat en Matiére Financiére: Vers Une Exception pour les actes de pillage de resources et de corruption?, 12 Revue Suisse De Droit international et de Droit Européen 179 (2002)

Donald H.J. Hermann, Extraterritorial Criminal Jurisdiction in Securities Laws Regulations, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 79 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

Francis J. Higgins, Procedural Aspects of Antiboycott Laws and Regulations, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 169 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

Rishi Hingoraney, International Extradition of Mexican Narcotics Traffickers: Prospects and Pitfalls for the New Millenium, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 331 (2002)

Arthur I. Hirsch & David Otis Fuller, Aircraft Piracy and Extradition, 16 N.Y.L.F. 392 (1970)

William J.A. Hobson, A Canadian Perspective on the Political Offense Exception in Relation to War Crimes, 62 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal 339 (1991)

Manley O. Hudson, The Factor Case and Double Criminality in Extradition, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 274 (1934)

Manley O. Hudson, The Seventh Year of the Permanent Court of International Justice, 22 Am. J. Int'l L. 1 (1929)

Donna Hughes, Combating Sex Trafficking: A Perpetrator-Focused Approach, 6 U. St. Thomas L.J. 28 (2008–2009)

Tracey Hughes, Comment, Extradition Reform: The Role of the Judiciary in Protecting the Rights of a Requested Individual, 9 B.C. Int'l & Comp. Rev. 293 (1986)

Human Rights Watch: Belgium: Universal Jurisdiction Law Repealed (Aug. 2, 2003)

Human Rights Watch, Empty Promises: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture, Apr. 2004

Human Rights Watch, Q&A: The Case of Hissène Habré before the Extraordinary African Chambers in Senegal (Sept. 12, 2012)

Human Rights Watch, Still at Risk: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture, 17 Hum. Rts. Watch, Apr. 2005

Hunting Nazis: Trying Task for Immigration Service, Nat. L.J., Nov. 6, 1978

Charles C. Hyde, The Extradition Case of Samuel Insull, Sr., in relation to Greece, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 301 (1934)

International Abduction of Criminal Defendants: Overreaching by the Long Arm of the Law, 47 U. Colo. L. Rev. 489 (1976)

International Law Association, Air Law, Crimes in Aircraft (New York University Conference 1958)

International Law Commission, Draft Articles on State Responsibility, 1965 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 173

International Law Commission, Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, reprinted in 11 Nouvelles Études Pénales (Ass'n Int'l de Droit Pénal 1993)

International Law Commission, Draft Declaration on Rights and Duties of States, reprinted in 44 Am. J. Int'l L. 8 (Supp. 1950)

International Law—Re-Extradition of Extradited Prisoner—Withdrawal of Asylum for Limited Purpose, 35 Colum. L. Rev. 295 (1935)

International Procedures for the Apprehension & Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, 1980 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 277

Roberto Iraola, Statutes of Limitations and International Extradition, 2010 Mich. St. L. Rev. 103, 117–118 (2010)

Roberto Iraola, The Doctrine of Specialty and Federal Criminal Prosecutions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 89 (2008)

Dave Itzkoff, Polanski Is Free after Swiss Reject U.S. Extradition Request, N.Y. Times, July 12, 2010

Phillip E. Jacob, International Extradition: Implications of the Eisler Case, 59 Yale L.J. 622 (1950)

Niklas Jakobsson & Andreas Kotsadam, The Law and Economics of International Sex Slavery: Prostitution Laws and Trafficking for Sexual Exploitation, 35 Europ. J.L & Econ. 87 (2013)

Murali Jasti, Extraditing Terrorists Hits a Death Penalty Kibosh, 22 Wis. Int'l L. J. 163 (Winter 2004)

R.Y. Jennings, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and the United States Antitrust Laws, 33 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 146 (1957)

Phillip C. Jessup, The Conquering March of an Idea, Address before the 72nd Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association (Sept. 6, 1949), reprinted in 432 Dep't St. Bull. (1949)

Phillip C. Jessup, The Doctrine of Erie Railroad v. Tompkins Applied to International Law, 33 Am. J. Int'l L. 740 (1929)

Phillip C. Jessup, The Subjects of a Modern Law of Nations, 45 Mich. L. Rev. 383 (1947)

M. Jimeno-Bulnes, The Enforcement of the European Arrest Warrant: A Comparison between Spain and the UK, Eur. J. Crime, Crim. L. & Crim. Justice 263 (2007)

M. Jimeno-Bulnes, After September 11th: The Fight against Terrorism in National and European Law Substantive and Procedural Rules: Some Examples, 10 Eur. L.J. 235 (2004)

M. Jimeno-Bulnes, European Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters, 9 Eur. L.J. 614–630 (Dec. 2003)

D.H.N. Johnson, The Draft Code of Offenses against the Peace and Security of Mankind, 4 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 445 (1955)

David Johnston, Doubt Cast on Identification of Man as Nazi Guard "Ivan," N.Y.Times, July 1, 1993

Robert J. Jossen, Dealing with the Lawyer's Responsibilities under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002: Ethical Dilemmas and Practical Considerations, ALI-ABA Course Study Materials (2008)

Christopher C. Joyner, Arresting Impunity: The Case for Universal Jurisdiction in Bringing War Criminals to Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 153 (1996)

Christopher C. Joyner & Wayne P. Rothbaum, Libya and the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie: What Lessons for International Extradition Law?, 14 Mich. J. Int'l L. 222 (1993)

Christopher C. Joyner, International Extradition and Global Terrorism: Bringing International Criminals to Justice, 25 Loy. L. A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 493 (Summer 2003)

Judge Says U.S. Was Told It Held Wrong Doctor in Agent's Killing, N.Y. Times, Dec. 17, 1992

Mark J. Kadish, Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations: The International Court of Justice in Mexico v. United States (Avena) Speaks Emphatically to the Supreme Court of the United States about the Fundamental Nature of the Right to Consul, 36 Geo. J. Int'l L. 1 (Fall 2004)

Terry Richard Kane, Prosecuting International Terrorists in United States Court: Gaining the Jurisdictional Threshold, 12 Yale J. Int'l L. 294 (1987)

John Kaplan, The Prosecutorial Discretion—A Comment, 60 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1174 (1965)

Mark Kappelhoff, Federal Prosecutions of Human Trafficking Cases: Striking a Blow against Modern Day Slavery, 6 U. St. Thomas L.J. 9 (2008–2009)

J.G. Kastel & Sharon A. Williams, The Extradition of Canadian Citizens and §1 and 6(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 25 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 263 (1987)

Reed R. Kathrein, Criminal Enforcement of the Export Administration Act, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice & Procedure 141 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

Nicholas deBelleville Katzenbach, Conflicts on an Unruly Horse: Reciprocal Claims and Tolerances in Interstate and International Law, 65 Yale L.J. 1087 (1956)

Michael Kaufman, Note: Detention, Due Process, and the Right to Counsel in Removal Proceedings, 4 Stan. J. C.R. & C.L. 113, 114, 124 (2008)

Michael J. Kelley, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare and the Death Penalty Extradition Prohibition, 10 Int'l Legal Theory 53 (Fall 2004)

Michael J. Kelley, Cheating Justice by Cheating Death: The Doctrinal Collision for Prosecuting Foreign Terrorists—Passage of Aut Dedere Aut Judicare into Customary Law & Refusal to Extradite Based on the Death Penalty, 20 Ariz. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 491 (Fall 2003)

David M. Kennedy et al., The Extradition of Mohammed Hamadei, 31 Harv. Int'l L. J. 5 (1990)

Robert F. Kennedy, Note, Libya v. United States: The International Court of Justice and the Power of Judicial Review, 33 Va. J. Int'l L. 899 (1993)

Douglas Kesh, Note, The Capture of Manuel Antonio Noriega: A Legal Analysis, 4 Touro J. Transnat'l L. 251 (1993)

John G. Kester, Some Myths of United States Extradition Law, 76 Geo. L. J. 1441 (1988)

Won Kidane, The Terrorism Bar to Asylum in Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, and the United States: Transporting Best Practices, 33 Fordham Int'l L.J. 300 (2010)

Kathryn F. King, The Death Penalty, Extradition and the War against Terrorism: U.S. Responses to European Opinion about Capital Punishment, 9 Buff. Hum. Rts. L. Rev. 161 (2003)

Frederic L. Kirgis, The Indictment in Senegal of the Former Chad Head of State, ASIL Insights (Feb. 2000)

David Kirgis, Interpreting 18 U.S.C. sec. 2331 under U.S. & International Law, 27 Harv. J. Legis. 579 (1990)

Louis Klarevas, The Surrender of Alleged War Criminals to International Tribunals: Examining the Constitutionality of Extradition via Congressional–Executive Agreement, 8 U.C.L.A. J. Int'l & For. Aff. 77 (Spring–Summer 2003)

Fannie J. Klein & Daniel Wilkes, United Nations Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court: An American Evaluation, in International Criminal Law 513 (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., 1965)

Elzbieta Klimowicz, Article 15 of the Torture Convention: Enforcement in U.S. Extradition Proceedings, 15 Geo. Imm. L.J. 183 (Fall 2000)

A. Klip, European Integration and Harmonisation and Criminal Law, in European Integration & L. (D.M. Curtin et al. eds. 2006)

Sumner J. Koch, Note, In re Flanagan: Grand Jury Secrecy and Fear of Foreign Incrimination, 17 Cornell Int'l L. J. 357 (1984)

René Koering-Joulin, De Quelques Aspects Judicaires des Affaire des Autonomiste Basques Espagnols, Rev. Fr. Droit Adm. 165 (1985)

Gary Komarow, Individual Responsibility under International Law: The Nuremburg Principle in Domestic Legal Systems, 29 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 21 (1980)

Marek St. Korowicz, The Problems of the International Personality of Individuals, 50 Am. J. Int'l L. 533 (1956)

Claus Kreb & Leonie von Holtzendorf, The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression, 8 J. Int'l Crim. Justice 1179 (2010)

Frank E. Krenz, The Refugee as a Subject of International Law, 15 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 90 (1966)

Neil J. Kritz, Coming to Terms with Atrocities: A Review of Accountability Mechanisms for Mass Violations of Human Rights, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 127 (1996)

Josef L. Kunz, The United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 316 (1949)

Rodrigo Labardini, Life Imprisonment and Extradition: Historical Development, International Context and the Current Situation in Mexico and the United States, 11 Sw. J.L. & Trade Am. 1 (Winter 2005)

Stephan Landsman, Alternative Responses to Serious Human Rights Abuses: Of Prosecution and Truth Commissions, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 81 (1996)

S. Langdon & Allen H. Gardiner, The Treaty of Alliance between Hattusili, King of the Hittites, and the Pharaohs Ramses II of Egypt, 6 J. Egyptian Archeology 179 (1920)

Hersch Lauterpacht, The Contemporary Practice of the Untied Kingdom in the Field of International Law: Survey and Comment, 7 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 515 (1958)

Hersch Lauterpacht, The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes, 1946 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 58

Hersch Lauterpacht, The Prosecution and Punishment of War Crimes, 1944 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 58

Hersch Lauterpacht, The Subjects of the Law of Nations, 63 L.Q. Rev. 438 (1947)

Hersch Lauterpacht, The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 25 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 354 (1948)

League of Arab Treaties Series, 8 Rev. Egyptienne de Droit Int'l 328–332 (1952)

Virginia Leary, Speech, Religious Discrimination and Blasphemy, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law (1989)

Robert A. Leflar, Conflict of Laws: Choice of Law in Criminal Cases, 25 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 44 (1974)

Raphael Lemkin, Genocide as a Crime under International Law, 41 Am. J. Int'l L. 145 (1947)

James M. Lenihan, Soering's Case: Waiting for Godot—Cruel and Unusual Punishment?, 4 Pace Y.B. Int'l L. 157 (1992)

James J. Lenoir, The Effect of War on Bilateral Treaties with Special Reference to Reciprocal Inheritance Treaty Provisions, 34 Geo. L.J. 129 (1946)

Les Problems Actuels de l'Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 375 (1968)

Les Problèmes de l'Extradition, 41 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 12 (1970)

David C. Levenson, Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon Rejects Turkish Man's Claims of Violation of United States–Turkey Extradition Treaty, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 360–363 (Sept. 2009)

Kenneth E. Levitt, International Extradition, The Principle of Speciality and Effective Treaty Enforcement, 76 Minn. L. Rev. 1017 (1992)

Eric Lieberman & Michael Krinsky, Political Asylum and Due Process of Law: The Case of the Haitian Refugees, 33 Nat'l L. Guild Prac. 102 (1976)

Richard B. Lillich, The Role of Domestic Courts in Promoting International Human Rights Norms, 24 N.Y. L. Sch. L. Rev. 153 (1978)

Richard B. Lillich & John M. Paxman, State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens Occasioned by Terrorist Activities, 26 Am. U. L. Rev. 217 (1977)

Matthew Lippman, Genocide, in I International Criminal Law: Crimes 589 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 2d rev. ed. 1999)

Oliver J. Lissitzyn, The Meaning of the Term Denial of Justice in International Law, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 632 (1936)

Robin Lööf, Shooting from the Hip: Proposed Minimum Rights in Criminal Proceedings throughout the EU, 12 Eur. L.J. 421–430 (May 2006)

Vaughn Lowe, Lockerbie–Changing the Rules during the Game, Cambridge L.J. 408 (1992)

Andreas F. Lowenfeld, U.S. Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution & International Law, Continued, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 444 (1990)

Steven Lubet, Extradition Reform: Executive Discretion and Judicial Participation in the Extradition of Political Terrorists, 15 Cornell Int'l L J. 247 (1982)

Steven Lubet & Morris Czackes, The Role of the American Judiciary in the Extradition of Political Terrorists, 71 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 193 (1980)

Helen C. Lucus, Comment, The Adjudication of Violations of International Law under the Alien Tort Claims Act: Allowing Alien Plaintiffs Their Day in Federal Court, 36 DePaul L. Rev. 231 (1987)

Mary F. Lyle, Note, The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977: Problems of Extraterritorial Application, 12 Vand J. Transnat'l L. 689 (1979)

Vanessa Maaskamp, Extradition and Life Imprisonment, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 741 (Summer 2003)

Rachael MacKenzie, Case Comment: International Law—Limiting the Political Offense Exception to Extradition Treaties to Crimes Objectively Political—Ordinola v. Hackman, 478 F.3d 588 (4th Cir. 2007), 31 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 711 (2008)

Glen W. MacTaggart, Determining the Extraditability of Fugitives, 51 Fed. L. 27 (Feb. 2004)

Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, The REAL ID Act—The Real Winners, New York L.J. (June 27, 2005)

Marcella D. Malik, Comment, Unraveling the Gordian Knot: The United States Law of International Extradition and the Political Offense Exception, 3 Fordham Int'l L.F. 141 (1980)

Christopher D. Man, Extradition and Article III: A Historical Examination of the "Judicial Power of the United States," 10 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 37 (Spring 2002)

Catherine V. Mannick, Note, Antitrust: British Restrictions on Enforcement of Foreign Judgments, 21 Harv. Int'l L.J. 727 (1980)

Marika Maris & Erika Singer, Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, 43 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 575 (Spring 2006)

Joseph A. Marovitch, Note, Continental Grain (Australia) Ply. Ltd. v. Pacific Oilseeds, Inc.: An Unjustifiable Expansion of Subject Matter Jurisdiction in a Transnational Securities Fraud Case, 2 N.W. J. Int'l L. & Bus. 264 (1980)

David Matas, Prosecution in Canada for Crimes against Humanity, 11 N.Y. L. Sch. J. Int'l & Comp. L. (1990)

Gjermund Mathisen, Nordic Cooperation and the European Arrest Warrant: Intra-Nordic Extradition, the Nordic Arrest Warrant and Beyond, 79 N.J.I.L. 1 (2010)

Jane Mayer, Outsourcing Torture: The Secret History of America's "Extraordinary Rendition" Program, new Yorker, Feb. 14, 2005

Philip Mayer, Rwanda and Burundi to Sign Extradition Treaty, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 14–15 (Jan. 2010)

Mark Mazzetti, Eric Schmitt & Robert F. Worth, Two-Year Manhunt Led to Killing of Awlaki in Yemen, N.Y. Times, Sept. 30, 2011

Eleanor C. McDonell, Extradition: Procedure, 1976 Digest, ch. 3

Myres McDougal et al., The World Constitutive Process of Authoritative Decision, 19 J. Legal Ed. 253 (1967)

Michael McGarry, Note: A Statute in Particularly Serious Need of Reinterpretation: The Particularly Serious Crime Exception to Withholding of Removal, 51 B.C. L. Rev. 209 (2010)

Gerald P. McGinley, The Achille Lauro Affair—Implications for International Law, 52 Tenn. L. Rev. 691 (1985)

Gerald P. McGinley, The Achille Lauro Case: A Case Study in Crisis Law, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 323 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988)

Gerald P. McGinley, The I.C.J.'s Decision in the Lockerbie Cases, 22 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 577 (1992)

Arnold D. McNair, Extradition and Extraterritorial Asylum, 1951 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 172

Kyle M. Medley, The Widening of the Atlantic: Extradition Practices between the United States and Europe, 68 Brook L. Rev. 1213 (Summer 2003)

Juan E. Mendez & Salvador Tinajero-Esquivel, The Cavalo Case: A New Test for Universal Jurisdiction, 8(3) Hum. Rts. Brief 8 (Spring 2001)

Saul Mendlovitz & Merav Datan, Judge Weeramantry's Grotian Quest, 7 Transnat'l L. & Contemp. Probs. 401 (1997)

Mercier, Rapport, Annuaire de l'Institute de Droit International 87 (1933)

Theodore Meron, International Criminalization of Internal Atrocities, 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 554 (1995)

Theodor Meron, International Responsibility of States for Unauthorized Acts of Their Officials, 1957 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 85

Meyer, You Can Run But You Can't Hide (At Least Not in Tijuana), San Diego Reader, Dec. 4, 1986, at 1

Model Treaty on Extradition, arts. 3 & 4, Dec. 14, 1990, 30 I.L.M. 1407, reprinted in Bert Swart, Refusal of Extradition and the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition, 1992 Netherlands Y.B. Int'l L. 175

James W. Moeller, United States Treatment of Alleged Nazi War Criminals: International Law, Immigration Law and the Need for International Cooperation, 25 Va. J. Int'l L. 793 (1985)

T.E. Molner, Recent Development, Extradition: Limitation of the Political Offense Exception, 27 Harv. Int'l L. J. 266 (1986)

Felice Morgenstern, Extraterritorial Asylum, 25 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 236 (1958)

Felice Morgenstern, Diplomatic Asylum, 67 L.Q. Rev. 362 (1951)

Felice Morgenstern, Jurisdiction in Seizures Effected in Violation of International Law, 1952 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 265

Felice Morgenstern, The Right of Asylum, 1949 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 327

Madeline H. Morris, International Guidelines against Impunity:Facilitating Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 29 (1996)

Coen Mulder & Bert Swart, Sub-regional Arrangements: The Benelux and Nordic Countries, II International Criminal Law 393 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed. 1999)

Ekkehart Müller-Rappard, The European Response to International Terrorism, in Legal Response to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 385 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988)

Gerhard O.W. Mueller, The United Nations Draft Code of Offenses Against the Peace and Security of Mankind: An American Evaluation, in International Criminal Law (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., (1965)

David Mueller, Comment: Unsafe Haven: Could Article 3 of the U.N. Convention Against Torture Prevent the Extradition of Terrorist Suspects to U.S. Custody?, 28 Penn. St. Int'l. L. Rev. 549, 551–553 (2010)

Fritz Munch, State Responsibility in International Criminal Law, in 1 Bassiouni & Nanda, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 143 (1973)

Peter S. Munoz, The Right of an Illegal Alien to Maintain a Civil Action, 63 Cal. L. Rev. 762 (1975)

Cornelius F. Murphy, The Grotian Vision of World Order, 76 Am. J. Int'l L. 477 (1982)

John F. Murphy, International Crimes, in 2 United Nations Legal Order 993 (Oscar Schachter & Christopher C. Joyner eds., 1995)

Sean D. Murphy (ed.), "Continuance of Extradition Treaty with Czech Republic," in Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 98 Am. J. Int'l L. 850 (Oct. 2004)

Sean D. Murphy (ed.), "New U.S/EU and U.S./UK Extradition Treaties," in Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 98 Am. J. Int'l L. 850 (Oct. 2004)

Michael A. Musmanno, The Objections in Limine to the Eichmann Trial, 35 Temp. L.Q. 1 (1961)

Seth Mydans, Abduction Gone Awry; Mexican Doctor Is Cleared in Killing of U.S. Drug Agent, N.Y. Times, Dec. 20, 1992

Greg Myre, Vanunu, Disdaining Israel, Is Freed to Chants vs. Cheers, N.Y. Times, Apr. 22, 2004

Ved Nanda, Speech, Religious Discrimination and Blasphemy, Proceedings of the American Society of International Law (1989)

Ved P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni, Slavery and Slave Trade: Steps Toward Its Eradication, 12 Santa Clara L. Rev. 424 (1972)

Ved P. Nanda, Human Rights and Sovereign and Individual Immunity (Sovereign Immunity, Act of State Immunity and Diplomatic Immunity): Some Reflections, ILSA J. Int'l & Comp. L. 467 (1999)

Nazi Sympathizer in France Gunned Down; Victim Persecuted Thousands of Jews, Chi. Trib., 1993

Robert G. Neumann, Neutral States and the Extradition of War Criminals, 45 Am. J. Int'l L. 495 (1951)

Moumine Ngarmbassa, Habre Death Sentence Won't Alter Senegal Case—Chad, Reuters Africa, Aug. 19, 2008

Munaf Acquitted of Kidnapping Charges in Iraq: The Iraqi-American Is Still Sought by Interpol to Serve a 10-Year Prison Term in Romania, for His Involvement in the Abduction of Three Journalists in 2005, Nine O'Clock, Mar. 18, 2011

Kenneth B. Noble, U.S. Deports Man Condemned to Die in Soviet Union, N.Y.Times, Apr. 21, 1987

Jennifer Norako, Comment: Accuracy or Fairness?: The Meaning of Habeas Corpus after Boumediene v. Bush and Its Implications on Alien Removal Orders, 58 Am. U. L. Rev. 1611, 1622–1624 (2009)

William J. Norton, United States' Obligations under Status of Forces Agreements: A New Method of Extradition, 5 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 1 (1975)

Note, American Courts and Modern Terrorism: The Politics of Extradition, 13 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. 617 (1951)

Note, The Applicability of the Exclusionary Rule in Federal Court to Evidence Seized and Confessions Obtained in Foreign Countries, 16 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 495 (1977)

Note, The Constitutional Rights of Non-Resident Aliens Prosecuted in the United States, 3 Fordham Int'l L. Rev. 221 (1980)

Note, Constitutional Restraint on the Expulsion and Exclusion of Aliens, 37 Minn. L. Rev. (1953)

Note, Coriolan v. Immigration and Naturalization Service: A Closer Look at Immigration Law and the Political Refugee, 6 Syracuse J. Int'l L. & Com. 133 (1978)

Note, Kidnapping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 502 (1935)

Note, The Long Arm of Federal Courts: Domestic Jurisdiction on the High Seas, 37 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 269 (1980)

Note, Misrepresentation and Materiality in Immigration Law—Scouring the Melting Pot, 48 Fordham L. Rev. 471 (1980)

Note, The New Extradition Treaties of the United States, 59 Am. J. Int'l L. 351 (1965)

Note, Pirates & Smugglers: Analysis of the Use of Abductions to Bring Drug Traffickers to Trial, 32 Va. J. Int'l L. 233 (1991)

Note, Political Asylum in the United States: A Failure of Human Rights Policy, 9 Rut.-Cam. L. J. 133 (1977)

Note, The Right to the Judicial Review of Deportation Orders under the Administrative Procedure Act, 62 Yale L.J. 1000 (1953)

Note, Settlement of the Jacob Kidnapping Case, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 123 (1936)

Note, Transborder Abductions by American Bounty Hunters—The Jaffe Case and a New Understanding between the United States and Canada, 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 489 (1990)

Note, Transnational Legal Problems of Refugees, 1982 Mich. Y.B. Int'l L.

Note, Treaties—Mexican–American Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences—Custody of a Prisoner under the Mexican–American Treaty Iis Unlawful When Consent to the Transfer Is Coerced: Velez v. Nelson, 475 F. Supp. 865 (D. Conn. 1979), 3 Fordham Int'l L. Rev. 107 (1979–1980)

Note, United States Extradition Procedures, 16 N.Y.U. F. 420 (1970)

Note, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez: The Supreme Court's Efforts to Halt the Trade in Illegal Drugs, 15 N.C. J. Int'l & Com. Reg. 511 (1990)

Note, When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution?, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 127 (1961)

Paul O'Higgins, Disguised Extradition: The Soblen Case, 27 Mod. L. Rev. 521 (1964)

Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition and Rendition in the United Kingdom, 6 Brit. Dig. Int'l L. 444 (1965)

Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition in British Practice 1174–1794, 13 Ind. Y. B. Int'l Aff. 80 (1964)

Paul O'Higgins, Unlawful Seizure and Irregular Extradition, 36 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 279 (1960)

Amy Oliver, The US Single Mother Who Was Actually a War Criminal: Killer Becomes First Woman to Be Convicted of Bosnian War Crimes, Daily Mail, May 1, 2012

Jeffrey M. Olson, Gauging an Adequate Probable Cause Standard for Provisional Arrest in Light of Parretti v. United States, 48 Cath. U.L. Rev. 161 (1998)

Opinion of the European Committee on Crime Problems, Committee of Experts on the Operation of European Conventions on Co-Operation in Criminal Matters on "Disguised Extradition i.e. Surrender by Other Means, Some Ideas to Start a Discussion," PC-OC (2011) 09 rev, May 16, 2011

Diane F. Orentlicher, Addressing Gross Human Rights Abuses: Punishments and Victim Compensation, in Human Rights: An Agenda for the Next Century 425 (Louis Henkin & John Lawrence Hargrove eds., 1994)

Diane F. Orentlicher, Settling Counts: The Duty to Prosecute Human Rights Violations of a Prior Regime, 100 Yale L. Rev. 2537 (1991)

Christopher Osakwe, Due Process of Law under Contemporary Soviet Criminal Procedure, 50 Tulane L. Rev. 266 (1976)

Robert Osgood & Nathy Dunleavy, UK–US Extradition for Antitrust Offenses, 19 SPG Int'l L. Practicum 35 (Spring 2006)

Antonio Pagliaro, La Nozione di Reato Politico Agli Effeti dell'Estradizione, 26 Rivista Italiana di Diritto e Procedura Penale 807 (1983)

Andrew J. Parmenter, Death by Non-Inquiry: The Ninth Circuit Permits the Extradition of a U.S. Citizen Facing the Death Penalty for a Non-Violent Drug Offense [Prasoprat v. Benov, 421 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2005)], 45 Washburn L.J. 657, 670 (2006)

John T. Parry, International Extradition, the Rule of Non-Inquiry, and the Problem of Sovereignty, 90 B.U. L. Rev. 1973 (2010)

John T. Parry, No Appeal: The U.S.–U.K. Supplementary Extradition Treaty's Effort to Create Federal Jurisdiciton, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 543 (Summer 2003)

John T. Parry, The Lost History of International Extradition Litigation, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 93 (Fall 2002)

David Passius, Tax Crime and Extraterritorial Discovery, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice & Procedure 105 (Ved. P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987)

Jordon J. Paust, After Alvarez-Machain: Abduction Standing, Denials of Justice & Unaddressed Human Rights Claims, 67 St. John's L. Rev. 551 (1993)

Jordan J. Paust, Congress and Genocide: They're Not Going to Get Away with It, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 90 (1989)

Jordon J. Paust, Constitutional Limitations on Extraterritorial Federal Power: Persons, Property, Due Process & the Seizure of Evidence Abroad, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice & Procedure 449 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved. P. Nanda eds., 1987)

Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law and Human Rights Treaties Are Law of the United States, 20 Mich. J. Int'l L. 301 (1999)

Jordon J. Paust, Customary International Law: Its Nature, Sources & Status of Law of the United States, 12 Mich. J. Int'l L. 59 (1990)

Jordon J. Paust, Rediscovering the Relationship between Congressional Power and International: Exceptions to the Last in Time Rule and the Primacy of Custom, 28 Va. J. Int'l L. 393 (1988)

Jordan J. Paust, Self-Executing Treaties, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 760 (1988)

Jordon J. Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Mexican and Canadian Prisoners by the United States Government, 12 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 67 (1979)

Jordon J. Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Prisoners by the United States under the Exchange of Prisoners Treaties, in International Aspects of Criminal Law 204 (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981)

Michael P. Peck, Recent Decision, Extradition—Double Provision of Extradition Treaty Applies Even Where Crime Committed before Ratification, 11 Vand. J. Trans. L. 833 (1978)

Mary Margaret Penrose, It's Good to be the King!: Prosecuting Heads of State and Former Heads of States under International Law, 39 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 193–200 (2000)

Alastair Percival, War Criminal Trials and a Race against Time, Press Association Limited Press Association Newsfile, 1991

Roland Perkins, The Territorial Principle on Criminal Law, 22 Hastings L.J. 1155 (1971)

Didier Pfirter, The Position of Switzerland with Respect to the ICC Statute and in Particular the Elements of Crimes, 32 Cornell Int'l L.J. 499 (1999)

Donat Pharand, Freedom of the Seas in the Arctic Ocean, 19 U. Toronto L.J. 210 (1969)

Pinochet Arrested in London, BBC, Oct. 17, 1998

Pinochet Arrest Ordered, BBC, Jan. 30, 2001

The Pinochet Case: How Victims Can Pursue Human Rights Criminals Abroad, Human Rights Watch Update, Sept. 2000

Pinochet "Fit Enough" for Trial, BBC, Jan. 16, 2001

Jack Pirozzolo, The States Can Wait: The Immediate Appealability of Orders Denying Eleventh Amendment Immunity, 59 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1617 (1992)

Mario Pisani, Delitto Politico Estradizione, Diritto D'Asulo, 24 Estratto da Diritto Internazionale 213 (1970)

M. Pisani, Il Ne Bis In Idem Internazionale E Il Processo Penale Italiano, in Studi Di Diritto Processuale Civile In Onore Di G. Tarzia 553 (2005)

M. Pisani, Le Principe Ne Bis In Idem Au Niveua International et la Procédure Pénal Italienne, Revue Internationale de Droit Penal 1017 (2002)

Gian Domenico Pisapia, Brevi Note in Tema di Estradizione per I Delitti di Genocidio, 9 Rivista del Diritto Matrimoniale e Dello Stato Delle Persone 1 (1967)

Michael Plachta, (Non)-Extradition of Nationals: A Neverending Story, 13 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 77 (1999)

Michael Plachta, European Court of Justice Rules on the European Arrest Warrant, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 487 (Dec. 2009)

Michael Plachta, Improving Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters: Contribution from G8 Countries, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 841–843 (Aug. 2011)

Michael Plachta, Polish Parliament Amends Constitution to Accommodate European Arrest Warrant, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 48–53 (Feb. 2007)

Michael Plachta, Simplified Extradition: A Proposal for the Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 Council of Europe Convention, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 272–275 (July 2010)

Michael Plachta, Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 831–835 (Aug. 2011)

Richard Plender, Admission of Refugees: Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, 15 San Diego L. Rev. 45 (1977)

Dominique Poncet & Paul Gully-Hart, The European Model of Extradition, in 2 International Criminal Law 461 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Dominique Poncet & Paul Gully-Hart, Extradition: The European Approach, in 2 International Criminal Law 277 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed. 1999)

Roscoe Pound, Toward a New Jus Gentium, in Ideological Differences and World Order (F.S.C. Northrup, ed., 1949)

Elisabetta Povoledo, High Court in Italy Backs Convictions for Rendition, N.Y. Times, Sept. 19, 2012

Ann Powers, Justice Denied? The Adjudication of Extradition Applications, 37 Tex. Int'l L.J. 277 (Spring 2002)

Richard K. Preston, Asylum Adjudication: Do State Department Advisory Opinions Violate Refugees' Rights and U.S. International Objections?, 45 Md. L. Rev. 91 (1986)

Lawrence Preuss, Kidnapping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 502 (1935)

Lawrence Preuss, Settlement of the Jacobi Kidnapping Case, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 123 (1936)

Kenneth R. Propp, Agreements on Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance between the United States of America and the European Union, 43 ILM 747 (2004)

Hu Quian & Chen Qiang, China's Extradition Law of 2000, 2 Chinese J. Int'l L. 647 (2002)

Carlos Quiroga, Bolivia Says Washington Won't Extradite Former Leader, Reuters, Sep. 7, 2012

Kenneth Randall, Federal Jurisdiction over International Law Claims: Further Inquiries into the Alien Tort Statute and a Recommendation, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 473 (1986)

Kenneth Randall, Federal Jurisdiction over International Law Claims: Inquiries into Alien Tort Statute, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 1 (1985)

Kenneth Randall, Universal Jurisdiction under International Law, 66 Tex. L. Rev. 785 (1988)

Rasema Handanovic's Plea Bargain Agreed, Balkan Transitional Justice, Mar. 13, 2012

Stewart E. Rauner, Note, Antitrust Law: Extraterritoriality—Mannington Mills, Inc. v. Congoleum Corp., 595 F.2d 1287 (3d Cir. 1979), 20 Harv. Int'l L. J. 667 (1979)

Recent Case, Eleventh Circuit Holds That "Rule of Specialty" Applies only When Provided by Treaty: United States v. Valencia-Trujillo, 123 Harv. L. Rev. 572, 578 (2009)

Recent Development, Extradition: Limitation of the Political Offense Exception, 27 Harv. Int'l L.J. 266 (1986)

Reining in Impunity for International Crimes and Serious Violations of Fundamental Human Rights: Proceedings of the Siracusa Conference, 14 Nouvelles Études Pénales (1998)

W. Michael Reisman, The Constitutional Crisis in the United Nations, 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 83 (1993)

W. Michael Reisman, Legal Responses to Genocide and Other Massive Violations of Human Rights, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 75 (1996)

Rena Hozore Reiss, The Extradition of John Demjanjuk: War Crimes, Universality Jurisdiction, and the Political Offense Doctrine, 20 Cornell Int'l L.J. 281 (1987)

Remmelinck, Politieke Delicten, in Vrijheid en Recht 177 (1975)

Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 2 of the Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), U.N. Doc. S/25704 (May 31, 1993), at art. 9(2), reprinted in 32 I.L.M. 1163 (1993)

Research in International Law under the Auspices of the Faculty of the Harvard Law School, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 107 (Supp. 1935)

Resolution of the Third International Congress of Penal Law (Palermo 1933), 10 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 144 (1933)

Resolutions of the Xth International Penal Congress of Rome 1969, 40 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 299 (1969)

Robert C.F. Reuland, Note, Interference with Non-National Ships on the High Seas: Peacetime Exceptions to the Exclusivity Rule of Flag-State Jurisdiction, 22 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1161 (1989)

Reuters, Jamaican Coke Admits to Drug, Racketeering Charges, New York Times, Aug. 31, 2011

Thomas Speedy Rice & Renee Luke, U.S. Court, The Death Penalty, and the Doctrine of Specialty: Enforcement in the Heart of Darkness, 42 Santa Clara L. Rev. 1061 (2002)

Jay Richardson, Note, A Policy Approach to Subject Matter Jurisdiction in Transnational Securities Fraud Cases, 17 Willamette L. Rev. J. 263 (1980)

Ray Riggle, L'Affaire Abou Daoud: Some Problems of Extraditing an International Terrorist, 12 Int'l L. 333 (1978)

J. Ashley Roach, Countering Piracy off Somalia: International Law and International Institutions, 104 Am. J. Int'l L. 397 (2010)

Lawrence D. Roberts, Addressing the Problem of Orbital Space Debris: Combining International Regulatory and Liability Regimes, 15 B.C. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 51 (1992)

Maurice A. Roberts, The Grounds of Deportation, Statute of Limitations on Deportation, and Clarification of the Nature of Deportation, 57 Interpreter Releases 157 (1980)

Craig Roecks, Extradition, Human Rights, and the Death Penalty: When Nations Must Refuse to Extradite a Person Charged with a Capital Crime, 25 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 189 (1994)

David M. Rogers, International Law—Extradition and the Death Penalty—United States v. Bin Laden, 156 F.Supp. 2d 359 (S.D.N.Y. 2001), 26 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 223 (Winter 2002)

David M. Rogers, International Law—Extradition and the Political Offense Exception—In Re Extradition of Singh, 170 F. Supp. 2d 982 (E.D. Cal. 2001), 26 Suffolk Transnat'l L. Rev. 479 (Summer 2003)

O. John Rogge, State Succession, 16 N.Y.L.F. 378 (1970)

Naomi Roht-Arriaza, Combating Impunity: Some Thoughts on the Way Forward, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 93 (1996)

Naomi Roht-Arriaza, The Pinochet Precedent and Universal Jurisdiction, 35 New Eng. L. Rev. 311 (2001)

Larry Rohter, Bolivia's Poor Proclaim Abiding Distrust of Globalization, N.Y. Times, Oct. 17, 2003

Larry Rohter, Bolivian President Remains Defiant as Protests Intensify, N.Y. Times, Oct. 14, 2003

Larry Rohter, Bolivian Leader Resigns and His Vice President Steps In, N.Y. Times, Oct. 18, 2003

Larry Rohter, Chilean Judge Says Pinochet Is Fit for Trial, N.Y. Times, Dec. 14, 2004

Andre Rolin, Quelques Questions Relatives a l'Extradition, 1 Rec. Cours Acad. D. Int'l 197 (1925)

Thomas Rose, A Delicate Balance: Extradition, Sovereignty, and Individual Rights in the United States and Canada, 27 Yale J. Int'l L. 193 (Winter 2002)

Eli M. Rosenbaum, An Introduction to the Work of the Office of Special Investigations, 54 U.S. Attorneys' Bulletin 1 (Jan. 2006)

Charles Rousseau, Chronique des Faits Internationaux, 69 Rev. General de Droit Int'l Public 761 (1965)

Charles Rousseau, Preface to L. Bolesta-Koziebrodzki, Le Droit d'Asile

Alfred P. Rubin, Libya, Lockerbie and the Law, 4 Diplomacy & Statecraft 1 (1993)

Alfred P. Rubin, Viewpoints: U.N. Sanctions on Libya, 54 Int'l Practitioner's Notebook 18 (1992)

David Runtz, The Principle of Speciality: A Bifurcated Analysis of the Rights of the Accused, 29 Colum J. Transnat'l L. 407 (1991)

Angelo M. Russo, Note and Comment: The Development of Foreign Extradition Takes a Wrong Turn in Light of the Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine: Ninth Circuit Vacates the Requirement of Probable Cause for a Provisional Arrest in Parretti v. United States, 49 DePaul L. Rev. 1041 (2000)

A.N. Sack, Non-Enforcement of Foreign Revenue Laws in International Law and Practice, 81 U. Pa. L. Rev. 559 (1933)

Leila N. Sadat, Ghost Prisoners and Black Sites: Extraordinary Rendition under International Law, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 309 (2006)

Leila Sadat Wexler, The French Experience, in III International Criminal Law 273 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed. 1999)

Leila Sadat Wexler, The Interpretation of the Nuremberg Principles by the French Court of Cassation: From Touvier to Barbie and Back Again, 32 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 289 (1994)

Leila Sadat Wexler, Prosecutions for Crimes against Humanity in French Municipal Law; International Implications, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law (1997)

Leila Sadat Wexler, Reflections on the Trial of Vichy Collaborator Paul Touvier for Crimes against Humanity in France, 20 J.L. & Cos. Inquiry 191 (1995)

Eleni Sakeller, Acquisition of Jurisdiction over Criminal Defendants by Forcible Abduction: Strict Adherence to Ker-Frisbie Frustrates U.S. Foreign Policy and Obligations, 2 Am. Soc'y Int'l L. Students Int'l L.J. 1 (1978)

Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Reach of the Bill of Rights beyond the Terra Firma of the United States, 20 Va. J. Int'l L. 741 (1980)

Elwod Earl Sanders, Jr., In Search of an Alternative Remedy for Violations of Extradition Treaties, 34 Sw. U. L. Rev. 1 (2004)

Erik Sapin, Italy Convicts 23 Americans for Alleged Rendition of Terrorism Suspect, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 11–14 (Jan. 2010)

Lotika Sarkar, The Proper Law of Crime in International Law, reprinted in International Criminal Law 60 (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., 1965)

Charlie Savage, U.S. Prosecutors Study WikiLeaks Prosecution, NY Times, Dec. 7, 2010

William A. Schabas, Indirect Abolition: Capital Punishment's Role in Extradition Law and Practice, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 581 (Summer 2003)

C. Schachor-Landau, Extraterritorial Penal Jurisdiction and Extradition, 29 Int'l & Comp. L. Q. 274 (1980)

Jim Schachter, Long Arm of Law Bends the Rules, L.A. Times, July 17, 1986

Michael P. Scharf, The Letter of the Law: The Scope of the International Legal Obligation to Prosecute Human Rights Crimes, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 41 (1996)

Michael P. Scharf, Terrorism on Trial: The Lockerbie Criminal Proceedings, 6 ILSA J. Int'l & Comp. L. 355 (2000)

Sara C. Schoenwetter, Comment, United States v. Flores, 3 Brooklyn J. Int'l L. 293 (1977)

Gary W. Schons, United States v. Toscanino: An Assault on the Ker-Frisbie Rule, 12 San Diego L. Rev. 865 (1975)

Christopher Schreuer, Concurrent Jurisdiction of National and International Tribunals, 13 Houston L. Rev. 508 (1975)

G. Gregory Schuetz, Apprehending Terrorists Overseas under United States and International Law: A Case of the Fawaz Younis Arrest, 29 Harv. Int'l L. J. 499 (1988)

Hans Schultz, Rapport General Provisoir, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 785 (1968)

B. Schünemann, Alternative Project for a European Criminal Law and Procedure, Crim. L. Forum 227 (2007)

Julian Schutte, Transfer of Criminal Proceedings, II International Criminal Law 643 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d rev. ed. 1999)

Bart de Schutter, International Criminal Law in Evolution: Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Benelux Countries, 14 Neth. J. Int'l L. 382 (1967), reprinted in 2 Bassiouni & Nanda A Treatise on International Criminal Law 249 (1973)

Bart de Schutter, Competence of the National Judiciary Power in Case the Accused Has Been Unlawfully Brought within the National Frontiers, 1 Rev. Belge de Droit Int'le 88 (1965)

Egon Schwelb, The International Court of Justice and the Human Rights Clauses of the Charter, 66 Am. J. Int'l L. 337 (1972)

Austin W. Scott, Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over a Defendant Based upon Presence Secured by Force or Fraud, 37 Minn. L. Rev. 91 (1953)

Jill M. Sears, Confronting the "Culture of Impunity:" Immunity of Heads of State from Nuremberg to Ex Parte Pinochet, 32 German Ybk. Int'l L. 125 (1999)

M. K. Seesar, Procés-Verbal Sommaire du Colloque Préparatoire, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 855 (1968)

Self-Executing Executive Agreements: A Separation of Powers Problem, 24 Buffalo L. Rev. 137 (1974)

J. Semmelmen, Federal Courts, the Constitution, and the Rule of Non-Inquiry in International Extradition Proceedings, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 1198 (1991)

Ian Shapira, Italy's High Court Upholds Convictions of 23 Americans in Abu Omar rendition, Wash. Post, Sept. 19, 2012

Michael P. Shea, Expanding Judicial Scrutiny of Human Rights in Extradition Cases after Soering, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 85 (1992)

Jacques Semmelman, International Decision: Sacirbey v. Guccione: International Extradition—Treaty Interpretation—Requirement in Extradition Treaty That Accused Be Charged—Judicial Reorganization Affecting Validity of Extradition Request, 104 A.J.I.L. 641, 644–645 (2010)

Senegal Suspends Hissene Habre's Repatriation to Chad, BBC, July 10, 2011

Rachel G. Settlage, Affirmatively Denied: The Detrimental Effects of a Reduced Grant Rate for Affirmative Asylum Seekers, 27 B.U. Int'l. L.J. 61, 92 (2009)

Daniel J. Sharfstein, European Courts, American Rights: Extradition and Prison Conditions, 67 Brook. L. Rev. 719 (Spring 2002)

Daniel J. Sharfstein, Human Rights beyond the War on Terrorism: Extradition Defenses Based on Prison Conditions in the United States, 42 Santa Clara L. Rev. 1137 (2002)

Ivan A. Shearer, The Current Framework of International Extradition: A Brief Study of Regional Arrangements and Multilateral Treaties, in 2 Bassiouni & Nanda, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 326 (1973)

Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition without Treaty, 49 Austl. L. J. 116 (1975)

James A. Shellenberger & James A. Strazella, The Lesser Included Offense Doctrine and the Constitution: The Development of Due Process and Double Jeopardy Remedies, 79 Marq. L. Rev. 1 (1995)

Michael P. Simon, The Political Offense Exception: Recent Changes in Extradition Law Appertaining to the Northern Ireland Conflict, 1988 Ariz. J. Int'l L. & Comp. L. 244

Hansdeep Singh, Bringing Fairness to Extradition Hearings: Proposing a Revised Evidentiary Bar for Political Dissidents, 38 Cal. W. Int'l L. J. 177 (2007)

S. Prakash Sinha, An Anthropocentric View of Asylum in International Law, 10 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 78 (1971)

Gregory H. Siskind, REAL ID Act Becomes Law, 10 Bender's Imm. Bull. 1057 (June 15, 2005)

George P. Sloup, Peaceful Resolution of Outer Space Conflicts through the International Court of Justice: "The Line of Least Resistance," 20 DePaul L. Rev. 618 (1970)

Soblen Case Summarized, 5 Isr. Dig. 8 (1962)

Soering Commission Report, reprinted in 161 Eur. Ct. H.R. (Ser. A) (1989) & in 28 I.L.M. 1063

Abraham D. Sofaer, The Political Offense Exception and Terrorism, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. Pol'y 125 (1986)

Aleksei Sokovnin, Yevgeny Adamov's Sentence Suspended, Kommersant, Apr. 18, 2008

Christina E. Sorensen, Comment, Drug Trafficking on the High Seas: A Move toward Universal Jurisdiction under International Law, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 207 (1990)

Spain Rejects Peron Extradition, BBC News, Apr. 28, 2008

Joshua S. Spector, Extraditing Mexican Nationals in the Fight against International Narcotics Crimes, 31 Mich. J.L. Ref. 1007 (1998)

Major Ronald L. Spencer, Jr., State Supervision of Space Activity, 63 A.F.L. Rev. 75 (2009)

Hans W. Spiegel, Origin and Development of Denial of Justice, 32 Am. J. Int'l L. 63 (1938)

T. Sponsler, International Kidnappings, 5 Int'l L. 27 (1971)

T. Sponsler, The Universality Principle of Jurisdiction and the Treatened Trials of American Airmen, 15 Loy. L. Rev. 43 (1968)

State Territory & Territorial Jurisdiction, 78 Am. J. Int'l L. 207 (1984)

Maryann Stenberg, Australia: Trial Opens for Pensioner Accused of War Crimes, Age (Melbourne) 1933

Paul B. Stephen, Constitutional Limits on International Rendition of Criminal Suspects, 20 Va. J. Int'l L. 777 (1980)

Brigitte Stern, International Decision, Universal Jurisdiction over Crimes against Humanity under French Law, 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 525 (1999)

Kenneth S. Sternberg & David L. Skelding, Note, State Department Determinations of Political Offenses: Death Knell for the Political Offense Exception in Extradition Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 137 (1983)

Jacob W.F. Sunderberg, The Crime of Piracy, in 1 International Criminal Law 799 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d ed., 2008)

Leonard V.B. Sutton, Jurisdiction over Diplomatic Personnel and International Organizations' Personnel for Common Crimes and for Internationally Defined Crimes, in 2 Bassiouni & Nanda, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 97 (1973)

Bert Swart, Refusal of Extradition and the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition, 1992 Netherlands Y.B. Int'l L. 75.

Symposium, International Law and Extradition, 16 N.Y.L.F. (1970)

Symposium Issue, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 1 (1991)

Symposium Issue, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 1 (1968)

Symposium, The Ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 4 (1993)

David A. Tate, Draft Evasion and the Problem of Extradition, 32 Alb. L. Rev. 337 (1968)

George M. Taylor, Note, Extraterritorial Application of the Federal Securities Code: An Examination of the Role of International Law in American Courts, 11 Vand. J. Trans. L. 711 (1978)

Jerome Taylor, Talha Ahsan: Behind Bars for Six Years without Charge and a Family Losing Faith in the Rule of Law, Independent, Sept. 6, 2012

Telford Taylor, Large Questions in the Eichmann Case, N.Y. Times, 1961

Mara Theophila, "Moral Monsters" under the Bed: Holding Corporations Accountable for Violations of the Alien Tort Statute after Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 79 Fordham L. Rev. 2859 (2011)

Christian Tomuschat, The Lockerbie Case before the International Court of Justice, 48 Int'l L. Comm'n Jurists Rev. 38 (1992)

Alan Travis & Owen Bowcott, Gary McKinnon Will Not Be Extradited to US, Theresa May Announces, Guardian, Oct. 16, 2012

Tullio Treves, Piracy, Law of the Sea, and Use of Force: Developments off the Coast of Somalia, 20 Eur. J. Int. Law 399 (2009)

Robert W. Tucker, Has the Individual Become the Subject of International Law?, 43 Cinn. L. Rev. 341 (1965)

United Kingdom Case Note, Extradition—Double Criminality—Definition of Political Offenses—Speciality, 74 Am. J. Int'l L. 447 (1980)

U.K. Ruling on Pinochet Praised: Straw Urged to Forego Appeal, Human Rights Watch (Feb. 16, 2000)

U.S. Enforcement Updates, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. (August 2006)

U.S. v. Toscanino: An Assault on the Ker-Frisbie Rule, 12 San Diego L. Rev. 865 (1975)

H. Richard Uviller, Barker v. Wingo: Speedy Trial Gets a Fast Shuffle, 72 Colum. L. Rev. 1376 (1972)

Detlev F. Vagts, A Reply to "A Critical Evaluation of the Mexican–American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Treaty," 64 Iowa L. Rev. 325 (1979)

David Vaida, Recent Development, Treaties—Mexican–American Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences—Custody of a Prisoner under the Mexican–American Treaty Is Unlawful When Consent to the Transfer Is Coerced, Velez v. Nelson, 474 F.Supp. 865 (D.Conn. 1979), 3 Fordham Int'l L. J. 107 (1979–1980)

Rachel A. Van Cleare, The Role of United States Federal Courts in Extradition Matters: The Rule of Non-Inquiry, Preventative Detention, and Comparative Legal Analysis, 13 Temp. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 27 (1999)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, Applying the European Conventions on Human Rights to Extradition: Opening Pandora's Box?, 39 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 757 (1990)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, La Belgique et l'Exception pour Delits Politiques en Matière d'Extradition: Analyse Critique de la Pratique Judiciaire et Administrative, 59 Rev. de Droit Penal et de Criminologie 833 (1979)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition: Defining the Issues and Searching for a Feasible Alternative, 1983 Rev. Belge de Droit Int'l 745 (1983)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, Rethinking the Law of International Criminal Cooperation: The Restrictive Function of International Human Rights through Individual-Oriented Bars, in 33 Principles and Procedures for a New Transnational Criminal Law 496 (Albin Eser & Otto Lagodny eds., 1991)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Europeen: Vers une Fissure au sein du Conseil de l'Europe, 6 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie 511 (1981)

Christine Van den Wijngaert, War Crimes, Crimes against Humanity and Statutory Limitations, in 3 International Criminal Law 89 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1986)

Christine Van den Wyngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Européen: Vers une Fissure au sein du Conseil de l'Europe, 61 Rev. Int'le de Criminologie et de Police Technique 289 (1980)

Christine Van den Wyngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Européen: Face à l'Euro-Terrorism, et la Sauvegarde des Droits Fondementaux au Marché Commun 3 Rev. Int'le de Criminologie et de Police Technique 289 (1980)

Damien Vandermeersch, Compètence universelle et immunités en droit international humanitaire la situation belge, in Le Droit Pènal a l'epreuve de l'internationalisation 227 (Marc Henzelin & Robert Roth eds., 2002)

Manuel A. Vieira, L'Evolution Récente de L'Extradition Dans Le Continent Américain, in Recueil des Cours de l'Academie de Droit International 155 (1979)

Viennaeau, Time Running out on Nazi Hunter's Promise of Action, Toronto Star, 1993

Phil Vinter, Ecuador President Says UK Has No Right to Lecture over Assange. . . after Its Failure to Extradite Pinochet a Decade Ago, Daily Mail, Aug. 23, 2012

Pierre Vogelenzang, Note, Foreign Sovereign Compulsion in American Anti-Trust Law, 33 Stan. L. Rev. 131 (1980)

Theo Vögler, The Defense of Superior Orders in International Law, in 1 Bassiouni & Nanda, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 619 (1973)

John A. Vosburgh, Where Does Outer Space Begin?, 56 A.B.A. J. 134 (1970)

Christian F. Von Wolff, Jus Gentium Methodo Scientifica Per Tractatum, in Classics of International Law § 152 (Drake trans., 1934) (1764)

George K. Walker, The Interface of Criminal Jurisdiction and Actions under the United Nations Charter with Admiralty Law, 20 Tulane Mar. L.J. 217 (1996)

Melanie Wallace, Voiceless Victims: Sex Slavery and Trafficking of African Women in Western Europe, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 569 (2001–2002)

David P. Warner, Challenges to International Law Enfordement Cooperation for the United States in the Middle East and North Africa: Extradition and Its Alternatives, 50 Vill. L. Rev. 479 (2005)

Marian L. Wash, Extradition: U.S.–France, 1978 Digest ch. 3

Jack Wasserman, The Universal Ideal of Justice and Our Immigration Laws, 34 Notre Dame Law 1 (1958)

Geoffrey R. Watson, Offenders Abroad: The Case for Nationality-Based Criminal Jurisdiction, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 41 (1992)

Geoffrey R. Watson, The Passive Personality Principle, 28 Tex. Int'l L. J. 1 (1993)

Molly Watson, Comment: An Arctic Treaty: A Solution to the International Dispute over the Polar Region, 14 Ocean & Coastal L.J. 307 (2009)

Arthur Watts, The Legal Position in International Law of Heads of States, Heads of Government and Foreign Ministers, 27 Receuil De Cours de l'Académie de la Haye 9 (1994)

Paul Weis, The International Protection of Refugees, 48 Am. J. Int'l L. 193 (1954)

David Weissbrodt & Amy Bergquist, Extraordinary Rendition and the Humanitarian Law of War and Occupation, 47 Va. J. Int'l L. 295, 297–298 (2007)

David Weissbrodt & Amy Bergquist, Extraordinary Rendition: A Human Rights Analysis, 19 Harv. Hum. Rts. J. 123 (Spring 2006)

Matthias Wentzel, Extradition Involving the Possibility of the Death Penalty, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 335 (1991)

Mary Beth West, Mounting Tension and Melting Ice: Exploring the Legal and Political Future of the Arctic: Arctic Warming: Environmental, Human, and Security Implications, 42 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1081 (2009)

Peter Westen & David Westin, A Constitutional Law of Remedies for Broken Plea Bargains, 66 Cal. L. Rev. 471 (1978)

Michael J. Whidden, Unequal Justice: Arabs in America and United States Antiterrorism Legislation, 69 Fordham L. Rev. 2825 (2001)

Michael White, Gary McKinnon: A Case of Double Standards?, Guardian, Oct. 17, 2012

Krystyna Wiewiorowska, Some Problems of State Responsibility in Outer Space Law, 7 J. Space L. 23 (1979)

Leon Wildes, The Operational Instructions of the Immigration Service: Internal Guides or Binding Rules?, 17 San Diego L. Rev. 99 (1979)

Peter Wilkitski, Defences, Exceptions & Exemptions in theExtradition Law & Practice & the Criminal Policy of the Federal Republic of Germany (Excluding the "Political Offense" Defence), 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 281 (1991)

Paul Williams, Treaty Obligations of the Successor States of the Former Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia: Do They Continue in Force? 23 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 1 (1994)

Sharon A. Williams, The Double Criminality Rule and Extradition: A Comparative Analysis, 15 Nova L. Rev. 581 (1991)

Sharon A. Williams, Nationality, Double Jeopardy, Prescription & the Death Sentence as Bases for Refusing Extradition, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 259 (1991)

James R. Wilson, Note, Regulation of the Outer Space Environment through International Accord: The 1979 Moon Treaty, 2 Fordham Envtl. L. Rev. 173 (1991)

Jamie Wilson & Ian Black, Amnesty Goes to Court on Pinochet, Guardian, Jan. 25, 2000

Michael D. Wims, Re-Examining the Traditional Exceptions to Extradition, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 325 (1991)

Edward M. Wise, Book Review, 30 Am. J. Comp. L. 362 (1982)

Edward M. Wise, Extradition: The Hypothesis of a Civitas Maxima and the Maxim Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 109 (1991)

Edward M. Wise, Prolegomenon to the Principles of International Criminal Law, 16 N.Y.L.F. 562 (1970)

Edward M. Wise, Some Problems of Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 518 (1968), reprinted in 15 Wayne L. Rev. 709 (1969)

Robert K. Woetzel, The Eichmann Case in International Law, in International Criminal Law 354 (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., 1965)

Christian Wolff, Jus Gentium Methods Scientifica Per Tractatum, in Classics of International Law§ 152 (Drake trans., 1934)

H.D. Wolswijk, Locus Delicti and Criminal Jurisdiction, 46 Neth. Int'l L. Rev. 361 (1999)

William Thomas Worster, International Law and the Expulsion of Individuals with More than One Nationality, 14 UCLA J. Int'l L. & For. Aff. 423 (Fall, 2009)

J. Wouters & F. Naerts, Of Arrest Warrants, Terrorist Offences and Extradition Deals: An Appraisal of the EU's Main Criminal Law Measures against Terrorism after 11 September, Common Market L. Rev. 909 (2004)

Quincy Wright, The Legal Liability of the Kaiser, 13 Am. Pol Sci. Rev. 120 (1919)

Xe Congres International de Droit Penal, Les Problemes Actuels de L'Extradition, 41 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 12 (1970)

XVIIth International Congress of Penal Law, Minutes of the Congress and Resolutions, 75 Revue Internationale de Droit Penal 804 (2004)

Yugoslavia Upholds Nazi's Death Penalty, Chi. Trib., 1986

Bruce Zagaris, Accused Croatian War Criminal Loses Effort to Block Australian Extradition Hearing, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 54–55 (Feb. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Argentina Again Asks U.S. to Extradite Antonini, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 89–91 (Mar. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Brazil Unlikely to Extradite Military Officers to Italy for Operation Condor Crimes, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 91–93 (Mar. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, British Appellate Court Affirms Extradition of Radical Muslim Cleric to U.S., 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 314–315 (Aug. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, British Court Rules Algerian Business Mogul Khalifa Extraditable to Algeria, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 363–364 (Sept. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Canada Deports U.S. Military Deserter and U.S. Sentences Him to 15 Months, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 436–437 (Nov. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Canada No Longer a Haven for U.S. Military Deserters, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 399–401 (Oct. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Colomiba Extradites Paramilitary Leader to the U.S. on Drug Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 267–269 (July 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Controversy between U.S. and Brazil over Extradition for Alleged Murder, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 45–47 (Feb. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Court of Appeal Affirms and Overturns Extradition Request to Korea on Bribery Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 269–270 (July 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Cuba Deports American Fugitive Wanted for Sexual Crimes against a Minor, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 315–316 (Aug. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Delays Plague U.S. Extradition in Polish Contract Murder Case, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 263–264 (Jul. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Dominican Government Extradites Hatian Gang Leader for Murder of Consul, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 87–88 (Mar. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, Election of Panamanian Accused of Murdering U.S. Soldiers Clouds Prospects for Ratification of FTA, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 419–420 (Nov. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, English High Court Upholds Hacker's Extradition to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 133–134 (Apr. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, English High Court Upholds Hacker's Extradition to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 403–405 (Oct. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, European Commission Issues Report on Success of European Arrest Warrant, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 420–422 (Nov. 2007).

Bruce Zagaris, European Human Rights Court Halts Extradition of Croatian General, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 3 (Jan. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, European Prosecutors, Legislators Seek Accountability for U.S. Renditions, 23 Int'l. Enforcement L. Rep. 135–136 (Apr. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, The Expanding Extraterritorial Application of United States Export Law: Regulation of Foreign Translations and Criminal Prosecution of Foreign Nationals, in the April 4, 1994 publication by the District of Columbia Bar Association.

Bruce Zagaris, Extraditions between the U.S. and Mexico Increase Significantly, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 47–49 (Feb. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Extradition—Italian Justice Minister Defers Extradition of CIA Operatives, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. (June 2006)

Bruce Zagaris, Finland Denies Extradition to Rwanda of Genocide Suspect, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 142 (Apr. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Former Jamaican Police Commissioner Contradicts Prime Minister and Violence Breaks Out over Coke Extradition, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 309–311 (Aug. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, France Considers Extradition of Iranian for Alleged Dual Use Items, 26 Int'l. Enforcement L. Rep. 227–228 (June 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, France Extradites Former Bank Head to Austria, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 403–405 (Oct. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Freedom of Information Act Request Illumines Use of Deportation as Alternative to Extradition, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 344–345 (Sept. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, French Court Grants Extradition Request of Rwanda for Genocide Suspect, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 271 (Jul. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, German Arrest and Extradition of Rwandan Chief Protocol Officer to France Produces Diplomatic Tensions with Rwanda, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 1–2 (Jan. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Guyana Denies Extradition of Guyanese Drug Suspects to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 228–229 (June 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Indian Magistrate Issues Arrest Warrant for Former Union Carbide Head, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 405–406 (Oct. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Jamaican PM Approves Extradition after Admission of Hiring U.S. Lobbyist to Oppose U.S. Extradition of Coke, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 268–269 (Jul. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, Jamaican Prime Minister Will Allow Court to Decide U.S. Extradition Request, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 225–227 (June 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, Mexico Deports Ohio Executive Fugitive Convicted of Fraud, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 515–517 (Jan. 2011)

Bruce Zagaris, Mexico Extradites Benjamin Arellano Felix to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 101 (Mar. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, PRC Promotes Negotiation of Extradition Treaties, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 296–297 (Aug. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Russia Denies U.K. Request for Lugovoi Extradition, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 343–344 (Sept. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Rwanda Urges Governments and Interpol to Ignore Spanish Arrest Warrants, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 133–134 (Apr. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Rwandan Military Court Convicts Priest of Genocide in Absentia, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 20–21 (Jan. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Spain Arrests Isabel Perón on Argentine Extradition Warrant for Crimes against Humanity, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 87–88 (Mar. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, State Department Legal Adviser Says U.S. Will Not Extradite CIA Defendants to Italy, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 181–182 (May 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Swedish Supreme Court Finds Extraditable to Rwanda Genocide and Crimes against Humanity Suspect as Rwanda House Approves Law to Impose Solitary on Killers, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 317 (Aug. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Court Orders Bail for Polanski during His Fight against U.S. Extradition Request, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 49–50 (Feb. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Government Arrests Polanski on U.S. 1977 Sex Case, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 484, 485 (Dec. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Highest Court Affirms Extradition to Germany for Tax Evasion, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 277–278 (Jul. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, Switzerland Denies Rwandan Extradition Request of Former Minister on Genocide Charges, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 364–365 (Sept. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Thailand Denies U.S. Request to Extradite Russian Alleged Arms Smuggler, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 406–407 (Oct. 2009)

Bruce Zagaris, Trinidad Extradites Colombian to the U.S. on Money Laundering Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 266–267 (Jul. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, Trinidad Magistrate Orders Extradition of Three Suspects to U.S. in JFK Airport Terrorism Plot, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 375–376 (Oct. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, Uganda Agrees to Sign Extradition Treaty with Rwanda, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 212–213 (Jun. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, U.K. Court Rules Abu Hamza al-Masri Can Be Extradited to the U.S., 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 1–2 (Jan. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, U.K. National Wins Partial Victory in Resisting U.S. Extradition Request, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 175–176 (May 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Court Frees Alleged Anti-Castro Terrorist as CARICOM Calls for Prosecution, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 262–263 (Jul. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Extradites Noriega to France on Money laundering Charges, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 279–280 (Jul. 2010)

Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Magistrate Finds Lack of Probable Cause, Declines to Extradite Accused Murderer to Poland, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep 345–346 (Sept. 2007)

Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Surrenders to Costa Rica a Former Police Officer Wanted for Murder, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 134–135 (Apr. 2008)

Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Trial Court Denies Extradition Request on Murder Charges, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 512–514 (Jan. 2011)

Alfred de Zayas, Demjanjuk: Examining His Human Rights, Human Rights 28 (Winter 1994)

Alfred de Zayas, Human Rights Implications of the Demjanjuk Case, 31 Globe 3 (1994)

Aaron S.J. Zelinsky, Comment: Khouzam v. Chertoff: Torture, Removal, and the Rule of Noninquiry, 28 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 233 (2009)

Other Sources

Amnesty International, Universal Jurisdiction: 14 Principles on the Effective Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction

M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Report on the Judicial Status of the Requesting State Denying Extradition, XIth International Congress of Comparative Law, August 20–September 5, 1982

M. Cherif Bassiouni, United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty, Statement Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 99th Cong., 1st Sess., 276 (1985)

M. Cherif Bassiouni, Working Paper on International Norms & Standards in International Criminal Law, presented to the Meeting of the U.N. Committee of Experts Convening at the International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences (Siracusa, Jan. 1983)

Council of Europe, Explanatory Report on the European Convention on Extradition (1969)

Coupable de crimes de guerre et d'assassinat, le maire rwandais est condamné à la perpétuit, Le Temps, May 1, 1999.

Draft Charter on Human & People's Rights in the Arab World, 1987, in International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences, Draft Charter on Human and People's Rights in the Arab World (1987)

Department of State United States of America, Treaty Actions Feb. 2010

Draft Articles on State Responsibility, in International Law Commission's Report (U. N. Document 1994)

Draft Statute International Criminal Tribunal, 9 Nouvelles Études Pénales (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1992)

European Committee on Crime Problems, Legal Aspects of Extradition among European States (Council of Europe, 1970)

European Convention on the Transfer of Criminal Proceedings, ETS no. 73 (1972)

European Court of Human Rights Registrar, Applications from Alleged International Terrorists Detained in the UK Pending Extradition to the USA Partly Admissible, Press release 549 (July 08, 2010)

Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance Agreements with the European Union Bilateral Instruments with European Union Member States, Including Extradition Treaties with Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Malta, and Romania Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty with Malaysia Before the Sen. Comm. on Foreign Relations, 110th Cong. 12 (2008) (testimony of Susan Biniaz, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, attached to S. Exec. Doc. No. 110-12 (2008))

Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties, at 9–10 and accompanying footnotes, Congressional Research Service report for Congress 98-958, March 17, 2010.

Gonzalo CNI, Llegada del General Pinochet (EN VIVO) (XV), YouTube (Feb. 19, 2007),

Hearings on H.R. 5227 Before House Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni)

Hearings on H.R. 6046 Before the House Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni)

Hearings on S. 1639 and S. 1940 Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 20 (1981) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni)

Human Rights Committee, Special Rapporteur's Rule 92/97 Decision regarding Communication No. 1539/2006, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/96/D/1539/2006 UNCHR (Aug. 21, 2006)

Human Rights Watch, Habré documents, http://www.hrw.org/justice/habreInternational Court of Justice Unofficial Press Release, No. 2009/26, July 17, 2009

International Law Association, Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice, Final Report on the Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction in Respect of Gross Human Rights Offenses () (2000)

International Law Commission, Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Forty-Sixth Session, May 2–July 23, U.N. GAOR, 49th Sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/49/10 (1994)

International Law Commission, Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Forty-Fourth Session, May 4–July 24, 1992, U.N. GAOR, 47th Sess., Supp. No. 10, at 34, U.N. Doc. A/47/10 (1992)

International Law Commission, Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Thirty-Eighth Session, U.N. GAOR, 41st Sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/41/498 (1986)

International Law Commission, Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Thirty-First Session, May 14–Aug. 3, 1979, U.N. GAOR, 34th Sess., Supp. No. 10, at 239, U.N. Doc. A/34/10 (1992)

International Law Commission, Report of the International Law Commission, 1st Session, June 24, 1949, reprinted in 1949 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 287

Interpol, Fact Sheet: International Notices System, Doc. no. COM/FS/2012-01/GI-02

Hans-Peter Kaul, J. Dr. Jur. H.C., address, From Nuremberg to Kampala—Reflections on the Crime of Aggression, 10 (August 30, 2010)

Said Hussein Youssef Khadr, Extradition Law and Practice in Egypt and Other Arab States (unpublished doctoral dissertation, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, 1977

Matt McGrath, Gas Tanker Ob River Attempts First Winter Arctic Crossing, BBC, Nov. 26, 2012

Memorandum on the Applicable Law for the Prosecution of Persons Charged with War Crimes Against Humanity in Ethiopia: An Interpretive and Analytical Study of the Ethiopian Penal Code of 1957 and International Humanitarian Law (submitted to the Office of the Special Prosecutor for the Transnational Government of Ethiopia, Oct. 1994, by M. Cherif Bassiouni et al., on file with author)

Report on the United Nations Convention Against Corruption, Mr. Lugar's Report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, S-Exec. Rep. 109–18 at 8–9 (2006)

Tampere European Council, Presidency Conclusions (Oct. 15 and 16, 1999), conclusion 35

Transcript of Oral Evidence, House of Commons, Before the Home Affairs Committee, Extradition, Jan. 18, 2011, HC-644-ii (Statement of Ms. Gareth Pierce and Mr. Ashfaq Ahmad; Statement of Mr. Julian Knowles)

The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation with Great Britain (Jay's Treaty), Nov. 19, 1794, in William M. Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols and Agreements between the U.S. of America and Other Powers, 1776–1909 (1910)

United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime, Background of the United Nations Convention Against Corruption, available at http://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/treaties/CAC/

U.S. Extradition Request Denied in France for Alleged Iranian Military Parts Smuggler, Institute for Science and International Security, May 12, 2010

U.S.–Kuwaiti Defense Cooperation Agreement discussed in the Memorandum in Support of Defendant Ali Hijazi's Motion to Dismiss the Second Superseding Indictment in United States v. Hijazi, Case No. 05-40024, (C.D. Il, 2007) (on file with author)

United States Department of State London U.S. Embassy Press Release, UK/U.S. Extradition Treaty Ratified, April 26, 2007

Universal Jurisdiction in Europe: Criminal Prosecutions in Europe since 1990 for War Crimes, Crimes against Humanity, Torture and Genocide, Redress, June 1999

Subject Index

ABDUCTION (continued)

ABDUCTION (continued)

ASYLUM (continued)

ASYLUM (continued)

AUT DEDERE AUT JUDICARE (continued)

BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS (continued)

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY (CIA) (continued)

DENIAL OF EXTRADITION (Continued)

DENIAL OF EXTRADITION (Continued)

DENIAL OF EXTRADITION (continued)

DENIAL OF EXTRADITION (continued)

DEPORTATION (continued)

EXTRADITABLE OFFENSES (continued)

EXTRADITABLE OFFENSES (continued)

EXTRADITION (continued)

EXTRADITION (continued)

EXTRATERRITORIALITY (continued)

HUMAN RIGHTS (continued)

HUMAN RIGHTS (continued)

IMMIGRATION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

JURISDICTION (continued)

LEGAL BASES FOR EXTRADITION, UNITED STATES (continued)

LEGAL BASES FOR EXTRADITION, UNITED STATES (continued)

PIRACY (continued)

SLAVERY (continued)

TERRORISM (continued)

UNITED STATES EXTRADITION PROCEDURES (continued)

UNITED STATES EXTRADITION PROCEDURES (continued)

UNITED STATES EXTRADITION PROCEDURES (continued)

UNITED STATES EXTRADITION PROCEDURES (continued)

UNITED STATES EXTRADITION PROCEDURES (continued)

WOMEN (continued)