INTERNATIONAL EXTRADITION

United States Law and Practice

SIXTH EDITION

M. Cherif Bassiouni

OXFORD

International Extradition

INTERNATIONAL EXTRADITION

United States Law and Practice

Sixth Edition

M. CHERIF BASSIOUNI

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford. It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide.

Oxford New York
Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi Kuala Lumpur Madrid
Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto

With offices in Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece Guatemala Hungary
Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore South Korea Switzerland Thailand
Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and certain other countries.

Published in the United States of America by Oxford University Press
198 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Bassiouni, M. Cherif, 1937-
International extradition : United States law and practice / M. Cherif Bassiouni.—Sixth edition.
pages cm
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-19-991789-1 (hardback : alk. paper)
1. Extradition—United States. 2. Extradition. I. Title.
KF9635.B37 2014
345.73'052—dc23

2013020778

9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper

Note to Readers

This publication is designed to provide accurate and authoritative information in regard to the subject matter covered. It is based upon sources believed to be accurate and reliable and is intended to be current as of the time it was written. It is sold with the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering legal, accounting, or other professional services. If legal advice or other expert assistance is required, the services of a competent professional person should be sought. Also, to confirm that the information has not been affected or changed by recent developments, traditional legal research techniques should be used, including checking primary sources where appropriate.

(Based on the Declaration of Principles jointly adopted by a Committee of the American Bar Association and a Committee of Publishers and Associations.)

Table of Contents

Chapter II
Legal Bases for Extradition in the United States

Chapter III
Asylum and Extradition

Chapter IV
Disguised Extradition: The Use of Immigration Laws as Alternatives to Extradition

Chapter V
Abduction and Unlawful Seizure as Alternatives to Extradition

Chapter VI
Theories of Jurisdiction and Their Application

Chapter VII
Substantive Requirements: Dual Criminality, Extraditable Offenses, Specialty, and Non-Inquiry

Chapter VIII
Denial of Extradition: Defenses, Exceptions, Exemptions, and Exclusions

Chapter IX
Pretrial Proceedings

Chapter X
The Extradition Hearing

Chapter XI
The Review Process and Executive Discretion

Chapter XII
Surrender and Miscellaneous Matters

Appendices

Tables

Acknowledgments

This is to acknowledge with appreciation the research assistance of Douglass K. Hansen in connection with the sixth edition. He has researched, edited, proofed, and checked footnotes in connection with the new material added to this edition, and he has updated footnotes in connection with material contained in the fifth edition. John Bathke and Andrew Sidea have also done research in 2013 on new cases since the pervious edition, and Nancy Arnold proofread one chapter. Their assistance is acknowledged and appreciated.

M. Cherif Bassiouni

List of Abbreviations

AAADC	American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee
AEDPA	Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act
ASEAN	Association of Southeast Asian Nations
ASPA	American Service Members' Protection Act
ATCA	Alien Tort Claims Act
AU	African Union
AUSA	Assistant U.S. Attorney
BIA	Board of Immigration Appeals
BTS	Directorate of Bureau of Border and Transportation Security
CAT	Convention against Torture and All Forms of Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment
CCE	Continuing Criminal Enterprise
CIA	Central Intelligence Agency
CIL	Customary International Law
C.F.R.	Code of Federal Regulations
COE	Council of Europe
CTR	Cash Transaction Requirement
DEA	Drug Enforcement Administration
DHS	Department of Homeland Security
DJA	Declaratory Judgment Act
DOJ	Department of Justice
DRC	Democratic Republic of the Congo
EAC	East African Community
EAW	European Arrest Warrant
ECCC	Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia
ECHR	European Convention on Human Rights
ECtHR	European Court of Human Rights
ECOWAS	Economic Community of West African States
ECOFIN	European Council of Economic and Finance Ministers

EOIR	Executive Office for Immigration Review
EU	European Union
FARR	Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act
FBI	Federal Bureau of Investigation
FISA	Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act
FLN	Algerian Liberation Movement
FSIA	Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act
G.A.	General Assembly of the United Nations
HSA	Homeland Security Act
IACHR	Inter-American Convention on Human Rights
IACtHR	Inter-American Court of Human Rights
ICC	International Criminal Court
ICCPR	International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
ICE	United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement
ICJ	International Court of Justice
ICTR	International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
ICTY	International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia
IIRAIRA	Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act
ILO	International Labour Organization
IMT	International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg
IMTFE	International Military Tribunal for the Far East
INA	Immigration and Nationality Act
INS	Immigration and Naturalization Service (defunct)
IRA	Irish Republican Army
I.R.S.	Internal Revenue Service
FISA	Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act
MCC	New York Metropolitan Correctional Center
MLAT	Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty
MNF-I	Multinational Force-Iraq
NATO	North Atlantic Treaty Organization
NGO	Non-Governmental Organization
OAS	Organization of African States
OAU	Organization of African Unity
OIA	Office for International Affairs
OSI	Office of Special Investigations
PATRIOT Act	Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act

PCIJ	Permanent Court of International Justice
PIRA	Provisional Irish Republican Army
PFLP	Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine
PKK	Kurdistan Workers' Party
PLO	Palestine Liberation Organization
PRC	People's Republic of China
RICO	Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act
SAARC	South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation
SADC	South African Development Community
SC	Security Council
SCSL	Special Court for Sierra Leone
SEC	Securities and Exchange Commission
SOFA	Status of Force Agreement
STL	Special Tribunal for Lebanon
TVPA	Torture Victims Protection Act
U.C.M.J.	Uniform Code of Military Justice
UDHR	Universal Declaration of Human Rights
UK	United Kingdom
UN	United Nations
UNESCO	United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization
UNHCR	United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
UNODC	United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime
U.S.	United States of America
U.S.C.	United States Code
USCBP	United States Customs and Border Protection
USCIS	United States Citizenship and Immigration Services
USSR	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Introduction

The sixth edition of International Extradition: United States Law and Practice adds over 300 pages of new material to the fifth edition. The treaties, laws, and cases cited in the fifth edition have all been updated and new material has been added, including new comparative material dealing with the European Union and cases involving the United States decided by other countries, and reflected in major decisions of the high courts of the United Kingdom, Canada, France, South Africa, Australia, Israel, Italy, and Germany.

Despite several FOIA requests, this writer was unable to obtain information from the U.S. Department of State and Department of Justice regarding extradition requests and figures on the number of times the United States has been denied extradition requests or has denied the requests of other states. This lack of transparency on the number of requests made and received is, to say the least, strange. What bureaucratic reasons compelled these agencies to do so and why is purely speculative. Yet, such information would have been useful to those following the practice of extradition.

As with the prior editions, the sixth edition continues to expose certain questionable practices of the United States. Among these is the practice of ambiguous assurances given to foreign governments by the U.S. Department of State and Department of Justice and how those assurances are not always respected after a person's extradition to the United States is completed. It also includes the unlawful seizure of persons abroad, abuses of the immigration process in this country and in those requested states where the United States can exercise political influence over the executive branch of certain requested states, the violation of the principle of specialty in certain U.S. courts with support from the government, and certain practices of prosecutorial abuses in connection with variations of prosecutorial charges and the imposition of sentences. The purpose in all of that is not to embarrass the U.S. government, but to hopefully induce government officials to act in a manner that is more consistent with this country's adherence to the Rule of Law, which the United States rightly champions throughout the globe but sometimes fails to live up to at home. The knowledge of these practices is also useful to judges and practitioners in order to prevent their occurrence.

Earlier editions of International Extradition: United States Law and Practice have been cited both nationally and internationally. In total it has been cited four times by the U.S. Supreme Court, thirty times by U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals, and forty-five times by U.S. Federal District Courts. Internationally, it has been cited once by the International Court of Justice, once by the High Court of Australia, once by the Supreme Court of Canada, five times by the Supreme Court of Israel, once by the New Zealand Court of Appeals, four times by the Constitutional Court of the Republic of South Africa, once by the House of Lords of the United Kingdom, and once by the High Court of England and Wales.

This edition remains, as its preceding ones, the most comprehensive text on the subject of international extradition, as practiced in and by the United States, and in general about the international practice of extradition.

M. Cherif Bassiouni
Chicago,
June 2013

Chapter I

The Legal Framework of Extradition in International Law and Practice

Contents

1. Introduction

Extradition is a formal process by which a person is surrendered by one state to another based on a treaty, reciprocity, or comity, or on the basis of national legislation.[1] Most states require a treaty, whether bilateral or multilateral, and enabling national legislation. The participants in the extradition process are, therefore, the requesting and requested states and the individual who is the subject of the proceedings. The process and its participants have not changed much throughout the course of history, but the legal bases for it and the applicable state practices have. Internationally and regionally states have protected human rights by giving legal rights to individuals, entitling them to certain legal rights and placing limitations on the powers of the respective states.

Extradition is the means by which states cooperate in the prevention, control, and suppression of domestic and international criminality. In the age of globalization, in which individuals cross territorial boundaries or conduct business in multiple states at unprecedented rates, the obligation to extradite or prosecute has gained greater importance and acceptance. Moreover, as states across the globe provide accused persons similar guarantees of fair and impartial trials with due process of law, there is less reason for requested states to be concerned when extraditing an individual. Thus, historic grounds for denial of extradition are eroding, as are procedural and formal requirements embodied in the process. Nevertheless, state processes remain lengthy and cumbersome without necessarily enhancing due process of law.

2. Historical Background

Throughout its history, extradition has been a process consisting of several stages involving the executive and judicial branches of the respective states whereby one state surrenders to another a person sought as an accused criminal or a fugitive offender.

2.1. Introduction

Extradition originated in early non-Western civilizations such as the Egyptian, Chinese, Chaldean, and Assyro-Babylonian.[2] In the early days of the practice, the delivery of a requested person to the requesting sovereign was undertaken in solemn formulas and was performed with pomp and circumstance. Delivery of individuals to a requesting sovereign was usually based on pacts or treaties, but it also occurred on the basis of reciprocity and comity (as a matter of courtesy and goodwill between sovereigns). The delivered person was usually a subject of the requesting sovereign or that of another sovereign, but seldom was the delivered person a subject of the requested sovereign. Undertakings involving the rendition of fugitives were deemed

1 This process is sometimes also referred to as "rendition." Rendition refers to the process of surrendering a person from one state to another or to an international tribunal, provided it is done in accordance with the legal and administrative requirements of the surrendering state. Rendition is therefore a synonym for extradition. If the rendition bypasses extradition or other legal processes, it is legally questionable although practiced by some states. This form of rendition is still subject to international and regional human rights law norms. "Extraordinary rendition" is a term used since 2001 to describe the kidnapping and transfer of individuals by the United States for purposes of interrogation and torture, which is illegal under both international and U.S. law. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010).

2 For different national perspectives, see inter alia Wolfgang Schomburg, Otto Lagodny & Thomas Hackner, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (5th ed. 2012); Gary Botting, Canadian Extradition Law (2005); Julian B. Knowles, Blackstone's Guide to the Extradition Act of 2003 (2005); Mario Pisani, Franco Mosconi & Daniela Vigoni, Codice Delle Convenzioni Di Estradizione E Di Assistenza Giudiziaria in Materia Penale (2004); Carlos Cezon Gonzalez a feature of friendly relations between sovereigns, and sometimes such acts were performed spontaneously. Thus, rendition did not always derive from the process of extradition, but was more a gesture of friendship and cooperation between sovereigns. The individual in these early days of the practice was deemed an object and not a subject of the process. The power to deliver or not to deliver rested with the head of state or the legal authority representing the state as a whole, or their respective delegates.

Extradition and other forms of rendition have essentially been for the benefit of states, and individuals have no rights other than those provided by treaty, whether bilateral or multilateral. In time, the formal process of extradition became one of the modes of rendition of persons sought by friendly states and it gradually became a more formal legal process with some rights conferred upon the individual.[3] Since WWII, international and regional conventions on human rights have provided individuals with certain substantive and procedural rights.

& Juan Jose Lopez Ortega, Derecho Extradicional (2003); Karin Pale, Villkor For Utlamning (2003); Francesco Salerno, Diritti Dell'uomo, Estradizione Ed Espulsione: Atti Del Convegno Di Studio Organizzato Dall'Universita Di Ferrara per Salutare Giovanni Battaglini, 29–30 Ottobre 1999 (2003); Michael Abbell & Bruno A. Ristau, International Judicial Assistance (1990); Satya D. Bedi, Extradition in International Law and Practice (1968); André Billot, Traité De L'extradition (1874); Pedro Blandino, La Extradicion en America (1994); Sir Edward G. Clarke, A Treatise upon the Law of Extradition (London, Stevens and Haynes 1874) [hereinafter Clarke Treatise]; Cooperacion Interamericana en los Procedimientos Penales (Ludwik Kos-Rabzewicz-Zubkowski ed., 1983); La Coopération Pénale Internationale par voie d'Extradition au Maroc (1986); Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Introduction a l'Étude du Droit Pénal International(1922); Albin Eser et al., Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (1993); Geoff Gilbert, Transnational Fugitive Offenders in International Law: Extradition and Other Mechanisms (1998); V.E. Hartley-Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure (1980); Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition (1995); Gerald V. LaForest, Extradition to and from Canada (2d ed. 1977); Otto Lagodny, Die Rechtsstellung des Auszuliefernden in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (1987); Robert Linke et al., Internationales Strafrech (1981); Claude Lombois, Le Droit Penal International 536–634 (2d. ed. 1979); Tiziana Travisson Lupacchini, L'Estradizione Dall'Ester per L'Italia (1989); Maria Riccarda Marchetti, La Convenzione Europea di Estradizione (1990); John Bassett Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition (Boston, Boston Book Co. 1891); Nicoletta a Parisi, Estradizione e Diritti Dell'uomo (1993); Blanca Pastor Borgoñon, Aspectos Procesales de la Extradition en Derecho Español (1984); Horacio Daniel Piombo, Tratado de la Extradicion: Internationacional e Interna (1998); Dominique Poncet & Philippe Neyroud, L'Extradition et L'Asile Politique en Suisse (1976); Wolfgang Schomburg & Otto Lagodny, Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen (1998); Hans Schultz, Das Schweizerische Auslieferungsrect (1953); Klaus Schwaighofer, Auslieferung und Internationales Strafrecht (1988); Eileen Servidio-Delabre, Le Rose de la Chambre D'Accusation et la Nature de son avis en Matiere D'Extradition Passive (1993); Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law (1971); Theo Vögler, Auslieferungsrecht und Grundgesetz (1969); Theo Vögler & Peter Wilkitzki, Gesetz Über die Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsache (1992); 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law (1968); Joâ Marcello de Araujo, Extradicâo Alguns Aspectos Fundamentáis,in 326 Revista Forense 61 (1993); Manuel Adolfo Vieira, L'Evolution Récente de L'Extradition Dans Le Continent Américain,in Recueil des Cours de L'Académie de Droit International 155, 155 (1979); Christopher L. Blakesley, The Practice of Extradition from Antiquity to Modern France and the United States: A Brief History, 4 B.C. Int'l Comp. L. Rev. 39 (1981); Symposium Issue, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 1 (1991); Symposium Issue, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 3–4 (1968).

3 In contemporary practice, there is an increased resort to the surrender, delivery, or return of persons by one state to another in a variety of ways both legal (see Ch. II) and extralegal (see Ch. V).

The rendition of a person to a requesting state presupposes that the person in question is in the requested state, either because he/she seeks refuge there or because of other circumstances, thus giving the requested state personal jurisdiction over the person. The surrender of a person who has been granted the privilege of presence or refuge in the requested state was deemed an exceptional measure running against the traditions of asylum and hospitality of the requesting state. This gave rise to a speculation about the etymology of the term extradition (i.e., "extra-tradition"), which ultimately evolved into "extradition." A more commonly accepted explanation for the term "extradition" is the Latin extradere, which means forceful return of a person to his sovereign.[4]

Because extradition is between states, it is clear that there is a nexus between the interests of the respective states and the granting or denial of extradition. In fact, the whole history of extradition is a reflection of the political relations between the states requesting and granting extradition.[5] This explains why, whenever a state maintained a certain degree of formality in its relations with another state, extradition was bound in solemn formulas and treaties, but whenever relations between the interested states were politically close, other informal modes of rendition were used, manifesting friendly cooperation. This is also true of contemporary interstate relations as it was in the earliest recorded times, though there is a marked tendency to accept the notion of a commonly shared goal of combating criminality as an international duty, or civitas maxima.[6]

2.2. Historical Phases

The earliest recorded extradition case appears in what is commonly referred to as the Old Testament. It occurred in approximately 1350 BCE when one tribe refused to surrender a member accused of rape and manslaughter of a member of another tribe.[7]

The situation arose when a Levite and his concubine sojourned in the city of Gib'-e-ah, which was inhabited by the Benjamites. After the Levite found lodging, the owner of the house was approached by a group of men from the city, the sons of Be'-li-al, who sought to sodomize the Levite. The owner of the house protested against such wickedness, but the men would not be turned away. In an attempt to satiate their demands, the concubine was brought forth to the men. Throughout the night, the woman was repeatedly raped. In the morning, the concubine fell down at the threshold of the house and died. When the Levite found his concubine dead, he cut up her body into twelve pieces and sent them to the different tribes of Israel, asking them to consult together as to what should be done.

After a gathering of the assembly of Israel, men from the various tribes were sent throughout the tribe of Benjamin and declared, "Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of 4 2 M. Faustin Helie, Traité de L'Instruction Criminelle, ch. V (n.d. circa 1850) (asserting that the term "extradition" was not known in France before the Decret-Loi of February 19, 1791, and that prior thereto the term used was remittere, meaning delivery or restitution, which differs from the Latin etymological origin of tradere, which is the basis for extradere). See also Billot, supra note 2, at 34; Blakesley, supra note 2, at 39–42.

---

5 Christine Van den Wijngaert, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition: Defining the Issues and Searching for a Feasible Alternative, Revue Belge de Droit Int'le 745–746 (1983) (referring to earlier treaties contemplating the surrender of political offenders and not common criminals, as in the Treaty of 1174 between Henry II, King of England, and William, King of Scotland, and the Treaty of Paris of 1303 between the English and French kings). This history is described in Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition in British Practice 1174–1794, 1964 Ind. Y.B. Int'l Aff. 80.

6 See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Extradite or Prosecute in International Law (1995) [hereinafter Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare].

7 Judges 19–20.

Be'-li-al, which are in Gib'-e-ah, that we may put them to death, and put away evil from Israel." The Children of Benjamin, however, refused to turn over the perpetrators. As a result of this failure to extradite, Israel and Benjamin went to war. In the first two military encounters, Benjamin defeated Israel. In the third battle, however, Israel prepared an ambush and, after setting fire to the city of Gib'-e-ah, routed the Benjamites, resulting in the slaughter of 25,000 Benjamite soldiers.

The first recorded extradition treaty in the world was concluded in circa 1259 BCE. In one of the oldest documents in diplomatic history, Ramses II, Pharaoh of Egypt, signed a peace treaty with the Hittites after he defeated their attempted invasion of Egypt.[8] King Hattusili III signed it for the Hittites, and the document, written in hieroglyphics, is carved on the Temple of Ammon at Karnak and is also preserved on clay tablets in Akkodrain in the Hittite archives of Boghazkoi. The peace treaty expressly provided for the return of persons sought by each sovereign who had taken refuge on the other's territory. This ancient treaty is overlooked in classic European texts of international law, which only refer to the practices of ancient Greece and Rome.[9]

Surrendering persons sought by another state did not necessarily mean that the individual was a fugitive from justice charged with a common crime. In fact, from antiquity until the late eighteenth century, such persons were not sought for common crimes but rather for political reasons.[10] Sovereigns obliged one another by surrendering those persons who challenged them, offended them or simply displeased them. Thus, the stronger the relationship between the sovereigns, the greater their interest and concern for each other's welfare and the more intent they were on surrendering to one another those persons who had created the dangers or concerns to their respective welfares. Common criminals were the least sought-after species of offenders because their harmful conduct affected only commoners and not the sovereign or the public order.

The history of extradition can be divided into four periods: (1) ancient times to the seventeenth century CE—a period revealing an almost-exclusive concern for political and religious offenders;[11] (2) the eighteenth century until 1833—a period of treaty-making chiefly concerned with

---

8 Elman Edel, Der Vertrag Zwischen Ramses II. Von Ägypten und Hattušili III. Von Hatti (1997); Blakesley, supra note 2; S. Langdon & Allen H. Gardiner, The Treaty of Alliance between Hattusili, King of the Hittites, and the Pharaohs Ramses II of Egypt, 1 J. Egyptian Archaeology 179 (1920). See also Friedrick Von Haltzendorf, Volkerrecht 169 (1885); Elman Edel, Der Vertrag Zwischen Ramses II. Von Ägytpen und Hattušili III. von Hatti (1997). It is interesting to note that Ramses II, who had the treaty with the Hittites engraved on the temple of Karnak in Luxor, Egypt, referred to Hattusili as "Prince" of the Hittites as a way of diminishing his rank, but the original papyrus that contained the treaty referred to Hattusili as "King." For the full text of the treaty, see 6 J. Egyptian Archaeology 181 et seq. (1920). See also James Pritchard, Ancient near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 199–203 (1992). The Constitutional Court of South Africa has discussed the history of extradition. See President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v. Quagliani, and two similar cases, 2009 (2) SA 466 (CC) (S. Afr.).

9 See Coleman Phillipson, The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome 358–374 (1911).

10 See Helie, supra note 4. See also Clarke Treatise, supra note 2, at 18–22; Arthur Nussbaum, A Concise History of the Law of Nations 214, 215 (1954); Charles de Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public International Law 243 (1957); Paul O'Higgins, The History of Extradition and Rendition in the United Kingdom,in 6 Brit. Dig. Int'l L. 444 (1965) (showing two main extraditable offenses, "treason" and "rebellion," as nonpolitical, even though they are both deemed examples of political offenses par excellence).

11 See Andre de Mello, Manual of the Law of Extradition and Fugitive Offenders Applicable to the Eastern Dependencies of the British Empire (2d. ed. 1933) (dividing extradition history into the three first periods identified herein).

military offenders characterizing the condition of Europe during that period;[12] (3) 1833 to 1948—a period of collective concern for suppressing common criminality; and (4) post-1948 developments, which ushered in a greater concern for protecting the human rights of persons and revealed an awareness of the need to have international due process of law regulate international relations.

The historical development of the practice of extradition reveals that the surrender of fugitives, which originated with the need to preserve the internal order of the respective states, was not deemed to be a tool of international cooperation for the preservation of common societal interests. Hugo Grotius first articulated this latter concern in 1624 and it gained momentum between the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as part of the efforts of the international community to combat piracy.[13] Thus extradition, which at one time had manifested itself as a practice designed to preserve the personal interests of monarchs and the political and religious interests of states, gradually shifted to serve xenophobic and militaristic tendencies, before it finally evolved into an international means of cooperation in the suppression of criminality. This was due in part to philosophers of the Age of Enlightenment, such as Voltaire, Samuel Puffendorf, Emerich de Vattel, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau. In the eighteenth century Cesare Beccaria built on these theories and argued for the extradition of common criminals.[14]

In Europe, the history of international extradition did not parallel the practice in the older civilizations of the southern and eastern Mediterranean basin. Until the eighteenth century, the relatively new and independent sovereign states of Europe found no need for cooperative undertakings, particularly in view of an almost-constant state of suspicion or war between them. Consequently, asylum was generally granted to fugitives from justice of other states, and a sovereign could enforce the return of fugitives only by force of arms. As the threat of war was always looming, it did not add much as a disincentive to granting asylum. Extradition as an inducement to peaceful relations and friendly cooperation between states emerged between 1700 and 1800 in Europe,[15] and has continued to increase, particularly in since the start of the twentieth century. For instance, the member states of the Council of Europe are linked

---

12 See G.F. de Martens, Nouveau Recueil de Traités (Gottingue, Dieterich 1842). This observation is confirmed by an examination of eighteenth-century treaties between 1718 and 1830 compiled by de Martens, where, of the ninety-two treaties concluded during this period, twenty-eight deal exclusively with military deserters.

13 Hugo Grotius, de Jure Belli ac Pacis, ch. 21, § 5(1) (2d ed. Amsterdam 1631). This position was earlier taken by Jean Bodin. See 3 Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la République, ch. 6 (Paris 1577); Donnedieu de Vabres, supra note 2, at 230; 2 Emerich de Vattel, Le Droit des Gens, Ch. 6, § 76 (Londres 1758). Blakesley, although recognizing the existence of the practice from antiquity, challenges the assumption that it was part of a civitas maxima to combat common criminality, taking instead the position that it was more of an act of political accommodation between friendly sovereigns. Blakesley, supra note 2. This position was espoused by Billot when he was considering the practice essentially a "contract" between sovereigns. Billot, supra note 2, at 2. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, World Public Order and Extradition: A Conceptual Evaluation, in Aktuelle Problem das Internationalen Strafrechts 10 (D. Oehler & P.G. Potz eds., 1970); Edward M. Wise, Some Problems of Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 518 (1968), reprinted in 15 Wayne L. Rev. 709 (1969).

14 See James A. Farrer, Crimes and Punishments 193–194 (London, Chatto & Windus 1880) (discussing Beccaria); An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislations (Harriman ed., 1948) (regarding Bentham). See also Coleman Phillipson, Three Criminal Reformers: Beccaria, Bentham and Romilly (1923). It must be noted that Beccaria and Bentham never advocated giving asylum to common criminals.

15 See De Martens, supra note 12 (listing ninety-two treaties between 1718 and 1830).

by a multilateral convention, and the member states of the European Union (EU) have developed accelerated and simplified procedures to cooperation in penal matters.[16] With respect to the United States, a common United States–European Union extradition regime came into force in February 2010.[17]

Globalization has brought about increased mobility for persons across national borders, greater opportunities for transnational crimes, and significantly more concern over international crimes. Thus, extradition has become more important, and state practices have tended to reduce the formalities in order to enhance the practice's effectiveness. In a sense, we are witnessing a slight reversion back to the late 1800s where the interests of the state outweigh those of individuals.[18]

3. The Duty to Extradite: Aut Dedere Aut Judicare

3.1. Introduction

The early classical commentators on international law recognized the importance of extradition as a means to lawfully achieve the rendition of fugitive offenders. However, differences existed among them with respect to the rationale and modalities, especially whether a legal duty or moral obligation existed that required the requested state to surrender persons accused of crimes to the requesting state.[19] Hugo Grotius, the Dutch jurist, asserted in 1624 that the state of refuge was obligated either to return the accused to the requesting state or punish the accused under its own laws. He expressed this view with the maxim aut dedere aut punire, which is more appropriately phrased as aut dedere aut judicare in contemporary practice.[20] Grotius thus espoused the view that a civitas maxima existed for extradition, which was further expounded upon by the Italian jurist Beccaria in the eighteenth century. Emerich de Vattel, the Belgian jurist, argued in 1758 that international law imposed a definite legal duty on the state to extradite persons accused of serious crimes.[21] In 1672, a contrasting view was put forward by Puffendorf, the German jurist, who, in reference to Grotius, argued that the duty to extradite was only an imperfect obligation that required an explicit agreement in order to become fully binding under international law and thus to secure the reciprocal rights and duties of the contracting states.[22] Similarly, the French jurist Billot took the position that there was no duty to extradite save by contract or agreement between states.[23] The contemporary practice of states reflects the latter point of view with respect to common crimes, but international law

16 2 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law 309, 317, 327, 325 (2d ed. 1999).

17 See supra Sec. 4.2.

18 Interestingly, with the increase in common and international criminality, contemporary conceptions of extradition and their policy implications are reverting from considerations bearing on the human rights of the individual to the interests of states, as expressed in the concept that the practice is essentially a "contract" between sovereigns for their benefit. See Billot, supra note 2; Moore, supra note 2.

19 Shearer, supra note 2, at 23.

20 Grotius, supra note 13, at ch. 21, §§ 3, 4. See also Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6.

21 2 De Vattel, supra note 13, at ch. 6, §§ 76, 77. Grotius and de Vattel were supported by such diverse scholars as Heineccius, Burlamaqui, Rutherford, Schmelzing, and Kent. See Shearer, supra note 2, at 24; Henry Wheaton, Elements of International Law 188 (C. Phillipson ed., 5th ed. 1916).

22 2 Samuel S. Puffendorf, The Elements of Universal Jurisprudence, ch. 3, §§ 23, 24 (W. Oldfather trans., 1931) (1672). This view drew support from scholars such as Voet, de Martens, Kuber, Leyser, Kliut, Saalfeld, Schmaltz, Mittermaier, and Heffter. Shearer, supra note 2, at 24; Wheaton, supra note 21, at 188.

23 Billot, supra note 2, at 2–3. This did not mean, however, that a formal treaty was required, but rather an agreement between the interested states.

doctrine has long favored the position advocated by Beccaria, Grotius, and de Vattel with respect to what is now called jus cogens international crimes.[24]

The duty to extradite by virtue of a treaty, whether bilateral or multilateral, is the most common basis for the practice among states, though reciprocity, comity, and national legislation are also used as legal bases relied upon by a number of states. For example, the United States requires a treaty,[25] as does the United Kingdom[26] and most common law countries.[27] The practice in the civil law countries, by contrast, is not necessarily predicated on an extradition treaty. Instead, extradition may be granted on the basis of reciprocity or comity. For instance, in 1872, the French Minister of Justice issued a circulaire, which stated that reciprocity was a permissible basis for extradition absent a treaty, and that in such circumstances the practice was to be governed by the applicable rules of international law.[28] Thus, reciprocity made extradition a matter of discretion, and international law could fill the gap only if there existed no treaty or statute.[29]

Certain South American states occasionally recognize the legal duty to extradite in the absence of a treaty. For example, in 1953, the Supreme Court of Venezuela, relying upon the traditional approach of its courts, ordered the surrender of an American national to Panama even though no extradition treaty existed between these countries. The court expressly found that granting the request was "in conformity with the public law of nations [whereby] friendly states recognize a reciprocal obligation to surrender offenders who have taken refuge in their respective countries."[30] 24 A jus cogens crime is a violation of a peremptory norm of international law, such as torture or genocide, from which no derogation is permitted.

---

25 See Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936); Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933); United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886); Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. 540 (1840); 4 Hackworth Digest 11; 6 Whiteman Digest 732. See Ch. II. See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

26 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries 66, 67; Clarke Treatise, supra note 2; Hartley-Booth, supra note 2; 2 Arnold D. McNair, International Law Opinions 43 (1956). The Law Offices announced the following opinion in 1842 concerning The Creole, a case in which slaves rose up against a vessel owned by the United States, killed the ship's master and a passenger, and sought refuge in the Bahamas:

> It is the practice of some States to deliver up persons charged with Crimes who have taken refuge, or been found within their Dominions, on Demand of the Government of which the alleged Criminals are Subjects, but such practice does not universally, or ever generally prevail, nor is there any rule of the Law of Nations rendering it imperative on an Independent State to give up persons residing or taking refuge within its territory. The mutual surrender of criminals is indeed sometimes stipulated for by Treaty, but as there is not at present any subsisting Treaty to that effect with the United States of America, we think that Her Majesty' Government is not bound on the demand of the Government of the United States to deliver up the persons in question, or any of them, to that Government to be tried in the United States.

The Creole, 6 Brit. Dig. Int'l L. 456 (1965). See also An Act for Amending the Law Relating to the Extradition of Criminals, 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. ch. 52.

27 See Hartley-Booth, supra note 2, regarding the position of the United Kingdom and Laforest, supra note 2 (concerning the position of Canada). Canada also permits extradition without the need for a formal treaty. 322 R.S.C. pt. 11 (1952) (Can.). Australia until 1974 required a treaty. See Brown v. Lizars, 2 Commonwealth. L. Rev. 837 (1905) (Austl). But with the "Extradition (Foreign States) Act" (1974), reciprocity can be relied upon. See Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition without Treaty, 49 Austl. L. J. 116 (1975). India requires a treaty. See Babu Ram Saksena v. The State, 1950 S.C.R. 573 (India).

28 Billot, supra note 2, at 422–423; Circulaire (July 30, 1872).

29 Shearer, supra note 2, at 26.

30 Re Tribble, 20 I.L.R. 366 (Fed. Ct. 1953) (Venez.).

In 1924, a Brazilian court surrendered a Brazilian national to Great Britain in the absence of a treaty, although Brazil does not ordinarily do so. The court recognized the assurance that reciprocity was permitted under British law. That assurance, however, proved to be false.[31] Similarly, the law of Argentina provides for extradition in the absence of a treaty. Under the Argentine Code of Criminal Procedure, extradition is proper based on "the principle of reciprocity or the uniform practice of States." Although this statement fails to clarify the meaning of "the uniform practice of States," it may be read as adopting in such circumstances the applicable rules of international law in a manner similar to the French practice previously mentioned.[32]

Taken together, it can be said that extradition is not regarded by most states as a binding obligation in the absence of a treaty.[33] However, there is a growing trend to recognize the duty to prosecute or extradite with respect to jus cogens crimes.[34]

A number of multilateral conventions on international crimes require states to prosecute or extradite, in keeping with the maxim aut dedere aut judicare.[35] Even though these treaties constitute a basis for the duty to prosecute or extradite, the practice of states has hardly proven to be consistent. Nevertheless, opino juris on the matter has been quite strong. Thus, the duty to prosecute or extradite for international crimes should be deemed part of customary international law.[36] To date, however, the duty to prosecute or extradite for jus cogens international crimes, without a treaty obligation to do so, is still debated although several rulings of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) concerning the prosecution of Hissène Habré has shed some light on the matter.[37]

Political and military interests still impede extradition, however, and realpolitik certainly plays a role in the practice of extradition. For instance, in 2010, the German Administrative Court of Cologne dismissed an action by which Khaled El-Masri, plaintiff, sought to compel the German government to seek the extradition of thirteen CIA agents from the United States for allegedly kidnapping and transporting him to Macedonia for torture and interrogation.[38] The Court held that the German government was not obliged to seek extradition for "extraordinary rendition."[39] As explained by Dr. Peter Wilkitziki, the Cologne Administrative Court:

> . . . held the plaintiff legitimate in bringing an action the basis of Germany's obligation under international law, namely the duty to protect her citizens against illegal acts abroad, (in particular those implying grave breaches of the victim's basic rights), referring also to the plaintiff's potential role as "private accessory prosecutor." In so far the Court followed the government's reasoning that no victim has a constitutional right for certain investigatory measures to be performed, but on the other hand the victim must not be treated as a "mere object" of law enforcement.

---

31 In re Milton Gomes, 5 Ann. Dig. Pub. Int'l L. 280 (STF 1929) (Braz.).

32 Shearer, supra note 2, at 26.

33 See Harvard Draft Convention on Extradition, 29 Am. J. Int'l. L. 21, 30 (Supp. 1935).

34 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Need for International Accountability,in 3 International Criminal Law 3–30 (1999).

35 See Appendix I.

36 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Practice, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. (2001). The International Court of Justice weighed in on the matter in the situation of Hissène Habré, the former president of Chad who is currently in Senegal and the subject of an extradition request from Belgium. The ICJ ruled that Senegal was obligated to try Habré immediately or extradite him to Belgium to stand trial there. Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), 2012 I.C.J. ____ (July 20).

37 See supra Sec. 3.4.

38 Peter Wilkitziki, German Government Not Obliged to Seek Extradition of CIA Agents for "Extraordinary Rendtion, 9 J. Int'll Crim. Justice 1117–1127 (2011).

39 For a description of this practice, see Bassiouni, supra note 1, at 141.

> The action, however, came to be dismissed on the merits. The Court again referred to the argument that the governmental authorities exercise a broad margin of discretion when deciding on making requests or granting foreign requests for extradition and assistance in criminal matters. Such decisions will always have to take a number of factors into consideration such as the legitimate interest of the persons involved, fair trial guarantees and the state interest in foreign policy matters, including the interest in efficient reciprocal cooperation between law enforcement and intelligence agencies. When weighing up these interests the government enjoys ample but not unlimited space for opportunity and utility considerations. In the given case the Court, acknowledging the comprehensive decision-making process documented in the governmental files, held that the German authorities had not transgressed the limits of their margin of discretion. As the first sentence of Article 7, paragraph 1 of the US–German Extradition Treaty leaves it to the parties' discretion whether or not to grant extradition of own nationals (provided their law does not so preclude) the US authorities would have been free to refuse extradition, had the German government filed such a request. Moreover, as the US authorities had already declared that US security interests would not allow extradition of the suspects, a German request would (even though the US administration had meanwhile changed) not have had any chance of success and would have been of a merely symbolic character.[40]

Increasingly, international treaties and national laws require states to fulfill their obligations to extradite or prosecute for international crimes. This trend places an enhanced duty on states in their bilateral treaty obligations to exercise greater diligence in seeking to achieve extradition. Thus, perfunctory rejection of extradition without exercising due diligence or attempting to effectuate extradition is no longer acceptable in the contemporary context of interstate cooperation in penal matters. This is, however, what Germany did in the El-Masri case, evidencing the state-centric approach to extradition that weighs political considerations more heavily than human rights and accountability. Accordingly, states must seek better and more efficient ways to carry out, in good faith, their extradition obligations and to make better use of "assurances,"[41] if needed, to satisfy a requested state that needs to allay its concerns and thus help achieve extradition. The alternative is for the requested state to prosecute domestically, particularly when victims are likely to suffer injustice because impunity is the consequence of the failure to prosecute or extradite, but this supposes that the state has jurisdiction under domestic law and the ability to exercise it.[42]

3.2. The Emerging Rights of Victims

Concern for victims and their rights has increased at the international, regional, and national levels. Historically many national legal systems have provided victims with access to justice and even with participatory rights in criminal proceedings such as a partie civile in the French and Belgium codes of criminal procedure, or as a parte civile in the Italian code of criminal procedure.[43] In these and other European systems, a victim may be represented in criminal proceedings in order to ensure that all available evidence pertaining to the accused is presented in court, and as a way of ensuring the victims' right to compensation through civil damages arising out of a subsequent civil judgment.[44] The International Criminal Court (ICC) gives

---

40 Wilkitziki, supra note 38, at 1123

41 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

42 See Ch. VI.

43 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Victims Rights and Participation in ICC Proceedings and in Emerging Customary International Law, UCLA Online Forum, www.uclalawforum.com/reparations#Bassiouni (last visited Sept. 26, 2012); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Recognition of Victims' Rights, 6 Hum. Rts. L. Rev. 203 (2006).

44 Jonathan Doak, Victims' Rights: Human Rights and Criminal Justice: Reconceiving the Role of Third Parties (2008).

rights to victims to be represented in its proceedings, as do the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon.[45] In 2005, the UN General Assembly Resolution on Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law established the right of victims to access justice, but more important, the victims' right to hold the perpetrator of a crime accountable; these rights require the prosecution or extradition of alleged perpetrators.[46]

3.3. The Duty to Extradite for International Crimes under Conventional International Criminal Law

A number of conventions on international criminal law establish explicitly the duty to prosecute or extradite.[47] These multilateral conventions also establish that they can be relied upon by states that require a treaty for extradition, and they serve as a basis for states that do not require a treaty as a legal basis for extradition. Piracy is deemed the oldest international crime, and it is one upon which Grotius relied to establish his duty to extradite or punish, aut dedere aut punire.[48]

---

45 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, art. 68(3), July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90; International Criminal Court, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, U.N. Doc. PCNICC/2000/1/Add.1 (2000), Rule 85. See also T. Markus Funk, Victims' Rights and Advocacy at the International Criminal Court (2010); Bassiouni, supra note 43.

46 Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, G.A. Res. 60/147, Dec. 16, 2005, Article III, para. 4–5:

> In cases of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law constituting crimes under international law, States have the duty to investigate and, if there is sufficient evidence, the duty to submit to prosecution the person allegedly responsible for the violations and, if found guilty, the duty to punish her or him. Moreover, in these cases, States should, in accordance with international law, cooperate with one another and assist international judicial organs competent in the investigation and prosecution of these violations.
>
> To that end, where so provided in an applicable treaty or under other international law obligations, States shall incorporate or otherwise implement within their domestic law appropriate provisions for universal jurisdiction. Moreover, where it is so provided for in an applicable treaty or other international legal obligations, States should facilitate extradition or surrender offenders to other States and to appropriate international judicial bodies and provide judicial assistance and other forms of cooperation in the pursuit of international justice, including assistance to, and protection of, victims and witnesses, consistent with international human rights legal standards and subject to international legal requirements such as those relating to the prohibition of torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

47 At present there are 142 international criminal conventions containing extradition provisions. See Appendix I. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2d ed., 2012). For a compilation of international criminal law conventions, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law: Second Revised Edition (2d ed., 2013). See also Bassiouni, International Criminal Law Conventions and Their Penal Provisions (1997) [hereinafter Bassiouni, ICL Conventions]; Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6; M.Cherif Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Draft Code]. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Penal Characteristics of Conventional International Criminal Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 27 (1983).

48 Grotius, supra note 13, at ch. 21, § 5(1). It should be noted that Grotius was retained by the Dutch West Indies Company to prepare what today would be called a "brief" to establish the right of freedom of navigation on the high seas as a basis for the Company to fight off pirates who attacked its merchant

The expression aut dedere aut judicare is the modern adaptation of Grotius's maxim aut dedere aut punire, which can be translated as "either extradite or punish." Grotius contended that a general obligation to extradite or punish exists with respect to all offenses by which another state is particularly injured. The injured state has a natural right to exact punishment, and the state in which the offender seeks refuge should not interfere with the exercise of this right. Therefore, the requested state ordinarily must deliver a guilty individual to the requesting state for punishment; it is not rigidly bound to do so, however. It has an alternative—to punish the offender itself. But it is bound to do one or the other: either extradite or punish. By contrast, the modern shorthand maxim, aut dedere aut judicare, which was first coined by this writer, is used to refer to a formula included in certain treaties concerning certain international crimes (see Appendix 1). The maxim's adoption in an increasing number of multilateral treaties has given rise to the question of whether the principle aut dedere aut judicare can now be said to represent an emerging rule of customary law, particularly with respect to certain international crimes.[49] The importance of the aut dedere aut judicare concept is that by imposing this strict obligation, impunity is reduced and deterrence is reinforced because offenders are prosecuted.[50]

Historically, the duty to prosecute or extradite, as it emerged and developed in the writings of scholars, was not limited to certain international crimes. Indeed, it was advocated as a civitas maxima with respect to all common crimes that states recognized in their respective legal systems, because that was a way of preserving world public order.[51]

The duty to prosecute or extradite,[52] even in the writings of scholars, is an imperfect obligation with respect to non-international crimes as domestic crimes require either the existence of extradition treaties, national legislation, or both.[53] In the course of the evolution of fleet. See also Declan Costello, International Terrorism and the Development of the Principle of Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, 10 J. Int'l L. & Econ. 483 (1975).

---

49 Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6, at 1–23.

50 See generally, M. Cherif Bassiouni, Accountability for Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Other Serious Violations of Human Rights, in Post-Conflict Justice (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed. 2001). See supra notes 34 and 36. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Combating Impunity for International Crimes, 71 U. Colo. L. Rev. 409.

51 See Grotius, supra note 13, § 4(1). For a philosophical view, see 2 De Vattel, supra note 13, at ch. 4, §§ 76, 77; Cornelius F. Murphy, The Grotian Vision of World Order, 76 Am. J. Int'l L. 477 (1982); Christian F. Von Wolff, Jus Gentium Methodo Scientifica Per Tractatum, in Classics of International Law § 152 (Joseph H. Drake trans., 1934) (1764). Puffendorf, who relied on the work of Grotius, was more of a positivist on this question. See Puffendorf, supra note 22, at ch. 3, §§ 23–24. See generally, Christine Van Den Wijngaert, The Political Offence Exception to Extradition: The Delicate Problem of Balancing the Rights of the Individual and the International Public Order, 132–140 (1980); Daniel Derby, Duties and Powers Respecting Foreign Crimes, 30 Am. J. Comp. L., 523, 530 n.40 (Supp. 1982). For another perspective, see Valerie Epps, The Development of the Conceptual Framework Supporting International Extradition, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 369 (Summer 2003); Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6; Edward M. Wise, Extradition: The Hypothesis of a Civitas Maxima and the Maxim Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, 62 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 109 (1991). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Comprehensive Strategic Approach on International Cooperation for the Prevention, Control and Suppression of International and Transnational Criminality, 15 Nova L. Rev. 353 (1991); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Working Paper on International Norms and Standards in International Criminal Law, presented to the Meeting of the United Nations Committee of Experts convening at the International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences (Siracusa), Jan. 10–15, 1983, in connection with the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice in the Context of Development: Challenges for the Future (1982); Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, Milan, Aug. 26–Sept. 6, 1985, U.N. Doc. A/Conf./121/22/Rev. 1 (1986).

52 The duty is to prosecute or extradite is discussed in Sec. 3.

53 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6, at 1–23.

international criminal law, the duty can also be construed as imperfect because it emerged on an ad hoc basis in international criminal law conventions; some conventions do not even explicitly state the duty. But after consistent reaffirmation of the duty to prosecute or extradite in conventional international criminal law, as discussed above, it can be argued that this principle constitutes an emerging customary duty. The duty itself has not been expressed with sufficient specificity to indicate whether it is an alternative or a coexistent duty. Whatever doctrine there is on the subject, it is unclear whether the duty to prosecute or extradite is disjunctive or coexistent. As stated by this writer:

> Doctrine is unclear as to the meaning of "alternative" or "disjunctive" and "coexistent" obligations to extradite. The following distinction is suggested. If the duty to extradite or prosecute is an alternative or disjunctive one, then there is a primary obligation to extradite if relevant conditions are satisfied, and a secondary obligation to prosecute under national laws if extradition cannot be granted. Thus, the duty to prosecute when it arises under national law leaves the requesting state with no alternative recourse.
>
> If the duty to extradite or prosecute is coexistent rather than alternative or disjunctive, then the requested state can choose between extradition and prosecution at its discretion. As a result, the state may refuse to extradite the relator to one state, but later agree to extradite him or her to another state or to prosecute. In any event when a state elects to prosecute then discretion plays a broader role, and can be invoked without a breach of treaty or other international obligations.
>
> The doctrine usually expressed is that the international obligation to extradite or prosecute, if it exists, would be construed as a coexistent duty provided that national law permits it.
>
> There is a general doctrinal failure to consider states' international obligations deriving from treaties regarding international crimes, such as war crimes, slavery and slave-related practices, aircraft hijacking, and the kidnapping or taking as hostage of diplomats or civilians, etc. Almost all of the multilateral conventions regarding these international crimes specifically require signatory states to extradite or prosecute violators of the treaties' proscriptions: in other words, they place upon states the alternative duty aut dedere aut judicare. Thus, a signatory state to such conventions that refuses to extradite an alleged offender of one of these proscriptions, when the conventions constitute the legal basis for the extradition request, is under a positive duty to prosecute the individual. Failing this, the requested state is in violation of its obligations under the conventions.[54]
>
> The formula to prosecute or extradite is not usually well-developed in international criminal law conventions, as is evident from the textual language contained in Appendix 1. There are some occasional exceptions, but they confirm the rule. Furthermore, the formula fails to clarify whether prosecution comes first as a matter of right, or if that right is subject to certain unstated qualifications, just as extradition may also be subject to certain unstated qualifications. Is there an unarticulated premise that prosecution should be effective (i.e., not a sham), in the state of custody or in the requesting state?[55] Are the respective rights of the custodial state and the requesting state dependent upon a ranking of jurisdictional theories?[56] Recent multilateral conventions have not addressed these issues as the diplomats who draft them continue to 54 M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Report on the Juridicial Status of the Requested State Denying Extradition, in Proceedings of XIth International Congress of Comparative Law of 1982.

---

55 For a complete analysis, see Secs. 3.3 & 3.4 with regard to the duty to extradite for violations of conventions and jus cogens offenses. See also Christian Tomuschat, The Lockerbie Case before the International Court of Justice, 48 Int'l Comm'n Jurists Rev. 38 (1992). See European Convention on the Transfer of Criminal Proceedings, ETS no. 73 (1972); Donna E. Arzt, The Lockerbie "Extradition by Analogy" Agreement: "Exceptional Measure" or Template for Transnational Criminal Justice?, 18 Am. U. Int'l L. Rev. 163 (2002). See also Julian Schutte, Transfer of Criminal Proceedings,in 2 International Criminal Law 643 (1999).

56 See Ch. VI.

follow earlier textual language because such precedents offer the best opportunities for political agreement.[57]

3.4. The Duty to Extradite for Jus Cogens Violations

It follows from what is stated above with respect to a victims'-oriented approach, and from other aspects of international law values and policies that states have at least an inchoate obligation to prosecute or extradite for all international crimes, and specifically for jus cogens crimes. This is reflected in the ICJ's 2012 ruling in the Habré case.[58] A state's failure to carry out the duty to extradite or prosecute arising out of jus cogens crimes could subject a state to international responsibility pursuant to the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Conduct as developed under customary international law.[59]

The very same concept of a duty to extradite or prosecute for jus cogens crimes applies also as a bar for a state to surrender a person to another state if such an individual risks being subjected to a jus cogens crime. This is clearly contained in Article III paragraph 1 of the Convention against Torture and All Forms of Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), which states: "No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture."[60]

The relationship between jus cogens and foreign state immunity was ruled upon in the 2012 ICJ's case on Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening).[61] In it the Court held:

> The Court now turns to the second strand in Italy's argument, which emphasizes the jus cogens status of the rules which were violated by Germany during the period 1943–1945. This strand of the argument rests on the premise that there is a conflict between jus cogens rules forming part of the law of armed conflict and according immunity to Germany. Since jus cogens rules always prevail over any inconsistent rule of international law, whether contained in a treaty or in customary international law, so the argument runs, and since the rule which accords one State immunity before the courts of another does not have the status of jus cogens, the rule of immunity must give way.
>
> This argument therefore depends upon the existence of a conflict between a rule, or rules, of jus cogens, and the rule of customary law which requires one State to accord immunity to another. In the opinion of the Court, however, no such conflict exists. Assuming for this purpose that the rules of the law of armed conflict which prohibit the murder of civilians in occupied territory, the deportation of civilian inhabitants to slave labour and the deportation of prisoners of war to slave labour are rules of jus cogens, there is no conflict between those rules and the rules on State immunity. The two sets of rules address different matters. The rules of State immunity are procedural in character and are confined to determining whether or not the courts of one State may exercise jurisdiction in respect of another State. They do not bear upon the question whether or not the conduct in respect of which the proceedings are brought was lawful or unlawful. That is why the application of the contemporary law of State immunity to proceedings concerning events which occurred in 1943–1945 does not infringe the principle that law should not 57 For a critical approval of international criminal law treaties, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sources and Content of International Criminal Law: A Theoretical Framework,in I International Criminal Law 3 (1999).

58 See infra Sec. 3.4.

59 Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, GA Res. 56/83 (Jan. 28, 2008).

60 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, G.A. res. 39/46, U.N. Doc. A/39/51, Art. III para. 1.

61 Jurisdictonal Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece Intervening), 2012 I.C.J. ____ (Feb. 3).

be applied retrospectively to determine matters of legality and responsibility (as the Court has explained in paragraph 58 above). For the same reason, recognizing the immunity of a foreign State in accordance with customary international law does not amount to recognizing as lawful a situation created by the breach of a jus cogens rule, or rendering aid and assistance in maintaining that situation, and so cannot contravene the principle in Article 41 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility.

In the present case, the violation of the rules prohibiting murder, deportation and slave labour took place in the period 1943–1945. The illegality of these acts is openly acknowledged by all concerned. The application of rules of State immunity to determine whether or not the Italian courts have jurisdiction to hear claims arising out of those violations cannot involve any conflict with the rules which were violated. Nor is the argument strengthened by focusing upon the duty of the wrongdoing State to make reparation, rather than upon the original wrongful act. The duty to make reparation is a rule which exists independently of those rules which concern the means by which it is to be effected. The law of State immunity concerns only the latter; a decision that a foreign State is immune no more conflicts with the duty to make reparation than it does with the rule prohibiting the original wrongful act. Moreover, against the background of a century of practice in which almost every peace treaty or post-war settlement has involved either a decision not to require the payment of reparations or the use of lump sum settlements and set-offs, it is difficult to see that international law contains a rule requiring the payment of full compensation to each and every individual victim as a rule accepted by the international community of States as a whole as one from which no derogation is permitted.

To the extent that it is argued that no rule which is not of the status of jus cogens may be applied if to do so would hinder the enforcement of a jus cogens rule, even in the absence of a direct conflict, the Court sees no basis for such a proposition. A jus cogens rule is one from which no derogation is permitted but the rules which determine the scope and extent of jurisdiction and when that jurisdiction may be exercised do not derogate from those substantive rules which possess jus cogens status, nor is there anything inherent in the concept of jus cogens which would require their modification or would displace their application. The Court has taken that approach in two cases, notwithstanding that the effect was that a means by which a jus cogens rule might be enforced was rendered unavailable. In Armed Activities, it held that the fact that a rule has the status of jus cogens does not confer upon the Court a jurisdiction which it would not otherwise possess (Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (New Application: 2002), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2006, p. 6, paras. 64 and 125). In Arrest Warrant, the Court held, albeit without express reference to the concept of jus cogens, that the fact that a Minister for Foreign Affairs was accused of criminal violations of rules which undoubtedly possess the character of jus cogens did not deprive the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the entitlement which it possessed as a matter of customary international law to demand immunity on his behalf (Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2002, p. 3, paras. 58 and 78). The Court considers that the same reasoning is applicable to the application of the customary international law regarding the immunity of one State from proceedings in the courts of another.

In addition, this argument about the effect of jus cogens displacing the law of State immunity has been rejected by the national courts of the United Kingdom (Jones v. Saudi Arabia, House of Lords, [2007] 1 AC 270; ILR, Vol. 129, p. 629), Canada (Bouzari v. Islamic Republic of Iran, Court of Appeal of Ontario, DLR, 4th Series, Vol. 243, p. 406; ILR, Vol. 128, p. 586), Poland (Natoniewski, Supreme Court, Polish Yearbook of International Law, Vol. XXX, 2010, p. 299), Slovenia (case No. Up-13/99, Constitutional Court of Slovenia), New Zealand (Fang v. Jiang, High Court, [2007] NZAR p. 420; ILR, Vol. 141, p. 702), and Greece (Margellos, Special Supreme Court, ILR, Vol. 129, p. 525), as well as by the European Court of Human Rights in Al-Adsani v. United Kingdom and Kalogeropoulou and others v. Greece and Germany (which are discussed in paragraph 90 above), in each case after careful consideration. The Court does not consider the judgment of the French Cour de cassation of 9 March 2011 in La Réunion aérienne > v. Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (No. 09-14743, 9 March 2011, Bull. civ., March 2011, No. 49, p. 49) as supporting a different conclusion. The Cour de cassation in that case stated only that, even if a jus cogens norm could constitute a legitimate restriction on State immunity, such a restriction could not be justified on the facts of that case. It follows, therefore, that the judgments of the Italian courts which are the subject of the present proceedings are the only decisions of national courts to have accepted the reasoning on which this part of Italy's second argument is based. Moreover, none of the national legislation on State immunity considered in paragraphs 70-71 above, has limited immunity in cases where violations of jus cogens are alleged.[62]

It should be noted that in the Italy v. Germany case, the ICJ dealt with a procedural question, namely that of the applicability of foreign sovereign immunity under customary international law and not with the substantive issue of state obligations and state responsibility in connection with the duty to prosecute or extradite persons accused of committing jus cogens crimes. Had Italy proceeded against Germany before the ICJ instead of allowing a civil case to proceed before its domestic courts, the ICJ would have not been barred by the doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity as this doctrine is applicable to domestic legal proceedings and other proceedings involving an action by an individual against a state, save for some exceptions involving commercial litigation. Italy, however, argued that there should be two internationally recognized exceptions to the doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity: the first being with respect to jus cogens crimes and the second being when the national jurisdiction becomes the last resort available to a victim, particularly a victim of an international crime. The ICJ rejected both arguments.

The aut dedere aut judicare question was partially addressed by the ICJ in the Lockerbie and Habré cases. Although the Habré case affirmed the duty to prosecute, neither judgment satisfactorily resolved the question of jurisdictional priorities, which is clearly relevant to the duty to extradite or prosecute. The following analysis of the cases is taken from the second edition of Introduction to International Criminal Law.[63]

> In the Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal) case (the Habré case),[64] the ICJ affirmed its earlier position in the Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. United Kingdom and Libya v. United States of America) case (the Lockerbie case) regarding the duty of states when to extradite or prosecute.[65] The two cases resulted in similar holdings, in essence that the duty to prosecute "outweighs" the duty to extradite, even though both cases arose under different conventions, namely the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Lockerbie case,[66] and the 1984 CAT for the Habré case.[67] Neither case, however, addressed the implicit requirements of fairness and effectiveness discussed below.
>
> The Lockerbie and Habré cases turned on the interpretation of relevant provisions of the Montreal Convention and the CAT, respectively. Article 7 of the Montreal Convention declares that:
>
> > The Contracting State in the territory of which the alleged offender is found shall, if it does not extradite him, be obliged, without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence

62 Id. at para. 92–96.

63 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 47.

64 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), 2012 I.C.J. ____ (July 20).

65 Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.S. and U.K.), 1992 I.C.J. 3 (Apr. 14).

66 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, Sept. 23, 1971, 974 U.N.T.S. 177.

67 Convention against Torture, supra note 60.

> was committed in its territory, to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution.

Article 7(1) of the CAT provides that:

> The State Party in the territory under whose jurisdiction a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is found shall in the cases contemplated in article 5, if it does not extradite him, submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution.

Both Conventions use substantially the same language with the same syntactical construction, namely: if the state in which the alleged perpetrator does not extradite, then it must prosecute him/her. Under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, "A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose."[68] The ICJ, in both the Lockerbie and Habré judgments, reasonably concluded on the basis of the "ordinary meaning" of Article 7 of the Montreal Convention and Article 7(1) of the CAT that the duty to prosecute precedes that of extradition.

The ICJ's two rulings have their logic, as the requested state is likely to be the one where the crime occurred, or the state of nationality of the alleged perpetrator (as in the Lockerbie case) or the state in which the alleged perpetrator has sought asylum (as in the Habré case). In the Habré case, Belgium, the requesting state, claimed universal jurisdiction over the crimes under the CAT, but was neither the state in which the crimes occurred nor the state of nationality of the alleged perpetrator. Senegal did not satisfy these jurisdictional assumptions either, but it was the fact that it was the state which gave Habré asylum after his escape from Chad that gave it priority over extradition in the eyes of the ICJ.

Under Article 7 of the CAT all state parties have an obligation to prosecute, and it was therefore logical and reasonable for the ICJ to conclude that Senegal, the state of custody, had the duty to prosecute Habré, and failing that, to extradite him to Belgium. The Court interpreted extradition as being optional under the CAT, which underscored its secondary status in relation to the obligation to prosecute. In summarizing the duty to prosecute or extradite, the Court stated that:

> . . . if the State in whose territory the suspect is present has received a request for extradition in any of the cases envisaged in the provisions of the Convention, it can relieve itself of its obligation to prosecute by acceding to that request. It follows that the choice between extradition or submission for prosecution, pursuant to the Convention, does not mean that the two alternatives are to be given the same weight. Extradition is an option offered to the State by the Convention, whereas prosecution is an international obligation under the Convention, the violation of which is a wrongful act engaging the responsibility of the State.[69]

Unfortunately, in stating categorically that prosecution invariably outweighs extradition, the Court failed to take into account any jurisdictional priorities or state interests that a requesting state may have over the custodial state. This is particularly so where the requesting state is the territory on which the crime was committed or the state whose nationals were the victims of the crime, while the custodial state may have only the physical presence of the alleged perpetrator as a jurisdictional nexus.[70]

While both the Lockerbie and Habré cases dealt with the issue of prosecution or extradition, otherwise reflected in the maxim aut dedere aut judicare, both judgments relied on the respective applicable treaties, namely, the Montreal Convention and the CAT. The Court did not rely on, or supplement, its understanding of the respective provisions with developments in customary

---

68 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 31, May 23, 1969, 1155 UNTS 331.

69 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belg. v. Sen.), 2012 I.C.J. ____, ¶¶ 89–95 (July 20).

70 See Ch. VI.

international law. This omission is particularly significant since there have been developments in customary international law since the drafting of the 1971 Montreal Convention and the 1984 CAT which should have led the ICJ to an interpretation of the alternative duties to prosecute or extradite that includes the implicit requirements to provide an effective and fair trial. Satisfying these requirements is essential not only to achieving the object and purpose of the respective conventions to prevent and punish the underlying crimes, but also to respect the rights of the accused and the victims, a class that is increasingly recognized in international law.[71]

The right to a fair trial is well established in international human rights law. Fairness in judicial proceedings is required by Article 14(1) of the ICCPR,[72] as well as the ECHR and the ACHR. The courts established by the ECHR[73] and ACHR[74] have issued a number of decisions supporting the proposition that a person should not be extradited to a state where he/she is likely to be tortured or treated with discrimination, or where his/her fundamental procedural rights would be violated.

---

71 The rights of victims are detailed in the 2006 Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law. G.A. Res. 60/147, U.N. Doc. A/RES/60/147 (Mar. 21, 2006).

Similarly, Article 68(3) of the Rome Statute provides that:

> Where the personal interests of the victims are affected, the Court shall permit their views and concerns to be presented and considered at stages of the proceedings determined to be appropriate by the Court and in a manner which is not prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial. Such views and concerns may be presented by the legal representatives of the victims where the Court considers it appropriate, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45.

The Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia also provides for victim participation through "Civil Party" representation, with rights of audience and the power to question witnesses.

72 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966). Article 14 of the ICCPR states:

> 1. All persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. The press and the public may be excluded from all or part of a trial for reasons of morals, public order (ordre public) or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice; but any judgement rendered in a criminal case or in a suit at law shall be made public except where the interest of juvenile persons otherwise requires or the proceedings concern matrimonial disputes or the guardianship of children.
>
> 2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall have the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.
>
> 3. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, everyone shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:
>
> (a) To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him;
>
> (b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence and to communicate with counsel of his own choosing;
>
> (c) To be tried without undue delay;
>
> (d) To be tried in his presence, and to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing; to be informed, if he does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him in any such case if he does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

Admittedly, no ICL convention containing a provision on the duty to prosecute or extradite specifically includes such implicit conditions requiring effectiveness of the prosecution and fairness of the prosecution by both the requested and requesting states. Nevertheless, the ICJ failed to provide any guidance on the question of such implicit conditions in the Habré case even though the existence of these conditions is inferred on the basis of logic and sound legal judgment.

Logic and sound legal judgment dictate that at the very least effectiveness precludes sham prosecutions and extradition to states which are likely to engage in such proceedings. The effectiveness requirement can, for instance, be read into the willingness provision of Article 17 of the ICC Statute, which states:

> 1. Having regard to paragraph 10 of the Preamble and article 1, the Court shall determine that a case is inadmissible where:
>
> (a) The case is being investigated or prosecuted by a State which has jurisdiction over it, unless the State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution;
>
> (b) The case has been investigated by a State which has jurisdiction over it and the State has decided not to prosecute the person concerned, unless the decision resulted from the unwillingness or inability of the State genuinely to prosecute;
>
> (c) The person concerned has already been tried for conduct which is the subject of the complaint, and a trial by the Court is not permitted under article 20, paragraph 3;
>
> (d) The case is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court.
>
> 2. In order to determine unwillingness in a particular case, the Court shall consider, having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law, whether one or more of the following exist, as applicable:
>
> (a) The proceedings were or are being undertaken or the national decision was made for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court referred to in article 5;

> (e) To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;
>
> (f) To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court;
>
> (g) Not to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt.
>
> 4. In the case of juvenile persons, the procedure shall be such as will take account of their age and the desirability of promoting their rehabilitation.
>
> 5. Everyone convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed by a higher tribunal according to law.
>
> 6. When a person has by a final decision been convicted of a criminal offence and when subsequently his conviction has been reversed or he has been pardoned on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows conclusively that there has been a miscarriage of justice, the person who has suffered punishment as a result of such conviction shall be compensated according to law, unless it is proved that the non-disclosure of the unknown fact in time is wholly or partly attributable to him.
>
> 7. No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again for an offence for which he has already been finally convicted or acquitted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of each country.

73 Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 222.

74 American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123.

(b) There has been an unjustified delay in the proceedings which in the circumstances is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice;

(c) The proceedings were not or are not being conducted independently or impartially, and they were or are being conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice.

3. In order to determine inability in a particular case, the Court shall consider whether, due to a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of its national judicial system, the State is unable to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence and testimony or otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings.[75]

At the heart of Article 17 is an analysis of whether the national courts of the state seeking to remove jurisdiction from the ICC are "unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution." Such an analysis could be transposed onto extradition cases by requiring states to assess whether national courts in the requesting or requested state have the capacity, will and independence to effectively investigate and prosecute a particular case.

Surprisingly, the ICJ in the Habré case did not address the issue of effectiveness or fair trial, nor did it even refer to them, thus leaving open the question of when and how the duty to prosecute or extradite under either a treaty obligation—including under the Montreal Convention or the CAT—or under customary international law, is to be interpreted if the requesting or requested state is unable or unwilling to guarantee an effective or fair trial.

In the Habré case, the ICJ referred to Article 6 of the CAT,[76] which requires the investigation of torture allegations. The ICJ could have relied on this provision to consider investigation as a prelude to prosecution, and to consider that an effective and prompt investigation also extends to an effective and prompt prosecution. This was not the case, even though Senegal first indicted Habré in 2000. The ICJ could have reasonably considered that after 12 years, Senegal was not particularly diligent in the pursuit of investigation and prosecution of Habré, and that this would have a bearing on the future capacity to ensure an effective and fair prosecution. One must infer from the context of the case that the Court found it more practical for Senegal to pursue its prosecution, particularly since its government had indicated its willingness to do so than to order Habré's extradition to Belgium. Thus, Senegal's explanation for the delay in moving to the prosecutorial stage is the costly and complex nature of the case, but that this alone was not enough to justify removing the case to Belgium.

It should also be noted that the in the Habré case the Court concluded that "the prohibition of torture is part of customary international law and it has become a peremptory norm of international law (jus cogens)."[77] However, the Court went on to qualify this holding by stating that "the obligation to prosecute the alleged perpetrators of acts of torture under the Convention applies only to facts having occurred after its entry into force for the State concerned."[78] One would

---

75 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 17.

76 Article 6 of the Convention against Torture provides, in pertinent part:

1. Upon being satisfied, after an examination of information available to it, that the circumstances so warrant, any State Party in whose territory a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is present shall take him into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his presence. The custody and other legal measures shall be as provided in the law of that State but may be continued only for such time as is necessary to enable any criminal or extradition proceedings to be instituted.

2. Such State shall immediately make a preliminary inquiry into the facts.

Convention against Torture, supra note 60. See also Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belg. v. Sen.), 2012 I.C.J. ____¶¶ 78–88, 120 (July 20).

77 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belg. v. Sen.), 2012 I.C.J. ____ ¶ 99 (July 20).

78 Id. at ¶ 100.

> have expected the Court to be more progressive on this question, especially in light of the jus cogens status of the crime of torture.[79]

It should be noted that the ICJ did not reach a decision on the merits because the Security Council intervened and preempted it with a resolution ordering Libya to extradite those accused of the explosion on board Pan Am 103 at the time it was flying over Lockerbie, Scotland.[80] The fact that the Security Council decided to order extradition pursuant to the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation[81] underscores the existence of an international obligation to prosecute or extradite, and one can assume from the Security Council resolution that its decision to order extradition as opposed to opting for Libya's intention to prosecute underscores the two unstated conditions in the obligation to extradite or prosecute, namely that the prosecution should be fair and effective, and if any of these conditions are unsatisfied then extradition is the option. Conversely, if the request for extradition is to a state that is not likely to provide for a fair and effective trial, then the option would be for domestic prosecution or for prosecution before an international tribunal or another national tribunal, which can exercise jurisdiction and carry out fair and effective proceedings.

The combined evolution of conventional and customary international law evidences the partial existence of the duty to prosecute or extradite. It is certainly an emerging customary international law norm with respect to jus cogens crimes. Although this is evidenced in the practice of international tribunals such as the ICC,[82] International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia (ICTY),[83] International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR),[84] and the mixed model

---

79 With respect to attacks on civilian aircrafts, more commonly known as falling within the meaning of "terrorism," these crimes have also since then risen close to their recognition as jus cogens international crimes. M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: Applications to "Terrorism," in Crime, Procedure and Evidence in a Comparative and International Context: Essays in Honour of Mirjan Damaška 201 (Jon Jackson, Maximo Langer & Peter Tillers, eds. 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, "Terrorism": Reflections on Legitimacy and Policy Considerations, in Values & Violence: Intangible Aspects of Terrorism 216 (Wayne McCormack ed., 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Assessment of International Legal Modalities to Control International Terrorism, 31 Arab J. Legal & Judicial Sciences 17 (2005); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Terrorism: The Persistent Dilemma of Legitimacy, 36 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 299 (2004); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Control of International Terrorism: A Policy-Oriented Perspective, 43 Harv. Int'l L.J. 83 (2002); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Terrorism, in 1 International Criminal Law 765 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed. 1999); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Crimes: Jus Cogens and Obligatio Erga Omnes, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 63 (1996).

80 S.C. Res. 883, ¶ 16, U.N. Doc. S/Res/883 (Nov. 11, 1993). See also S.C. Res. 731, U.N. Doc. S/Res/731 (Jan. 21, 1992); S.C. Res. 748, U.N. Doc. S/Res/748 (Mar. 31, 1992); S.C. Res. 1192, U.N. Doc. S/Res/1192 (Aug. 27, 1998).

81 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, Jan. 26, 1973, 974 U.N.T.S. 178.

82 See Rome Statute of International Criminal Court, supra note 45.

83 Statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory for the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, S.C. Res. 827, U.N. Doc. S/RES/827 (May 25, 1993). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni & Peter Manikas, The Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1996); Virginia Morris & Michael P. Scharf, An insider's Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (1995).

84 Statute of International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States, Between January 1, 1994 and December 31, 1994, S.C. Res. 955, Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (Nov. 8, 1994). See also Virginia Morris & Michael P. Scharf, 1–2 The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (Transnational 1998); The International Tribunal for Rwanda: Facts, Cases, Documents (C. Sheltema & W. Van der Wolf eds., Nijmegen 1999).

tribunals (Sierra Leone, Kosovo, Timor Leste, Cambodia, and Bosnia Herzegovina),[85] there is only limited application of that doctrine in state practice in domestic jurisdictions.[86] The practice of states, the writings of the most distinguished publicists, and the jurisprudence of international tribunals evidence a consistent reinforcement of the duty to prosecute or extradite for jus cogens crimes notwithstanding the procedural barrier of the foreign sovereign immunity doctrine when used in connection to domestic proceedings. However, it should be noted that this doctrine applies only to the immunity of states and that is usually in connection with damages and other civil proceedings. It does not apply to the responsibility of individuals acting for and on behalf of the state when they commit jus cogens crimes.

Heads of states and senior ministers are no longer immune from prosecution except during the period in which they are in office as established by the ICJ in the case of Belgium v. Congo.[87] Conversely the ICC statute, which now has 122 state parties, contains an unqualified removal of heads of state immunity in Article 27, which states,

> This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.[88]

4. Extradition by Multilateral Regional Arrangements

There are a number of regional extradition arrangements that usually supplement the bilateral treaties of the parties thereto. But these multilateral treaties can be used as an independent basis for extradition. The state parties are usually part of a region in the geographic and political sense. A regional extradition arrangement can take the form of a convention that (1) replaces or supplements bilateral treaties, or (2) obligates the parties to enact national legislation in accordance with the provisions or requirements of the arrangement.

States enter into multilateral arrangements to secure the advantage of reducing or eliminating the divergent and uncertain characteristic of multiple bilateral treaties and diverse national legislation. Multilateral arrangements thus serve as a means to harmonize national systems. Regional arrangements contribute to the customary international law of extradition. The following is a brief description of the eight existing regional arrangements.[89]

---

85 See Agreement Between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (Jan. 16, 2002) 2178 U.N.T.S. 138; United Nations Interim Administrative Mission in Kosovo, S.C. Res. 1244 para 5 (June 10 1999), 38 I.L.M. 1451 (1999); Group of Experts for Cambodia, GA Res 52/135 (1998–1999); UN Transitional Administration in East Timor, S.C Res 1272 (1999) 39 I.L.M. 240 (2000); Statute for the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (May 30, 2007) S.C. Res. 1757; Law on the Court of Bosnia Herzegovinia (Nov. 12, 2000). See Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 47.

86 For national practice see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application 649–742 (2011).

87 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.), 2002 I.C.J. Rep. 3 (Feb. 14); J. Wouters, The Judgment of the International Court of Justice in the Arrest Warrant Case: Some Critical Remarks, 16 Leiden J. Int'l L. 253 (2003); S. Wirth, Immunity for Core Crimes? The ICJ's Judgement in the Congo v. Belgium Case," 13 E.J.I.L. 877 (2002).

88 Rome Statute, supra note 45, at art. 27.

89 See Ivan A. Shearer, The Current Framework of International Extradition: A Brief Study of Regional Arrangements and Multilateral Treaties, in 2 A Treatise on International Criminal Law 326 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 1973).

4.1. European Regimes

Europe has two legal regimes concerning extradition and other modalities of interstate cooperation in penal matters, those of the Council of Europe[90] and those of the European Union.[91]

The first regime of the Council of Europe is composed of a series of multilateral treaties, which began with the 1957 European Convention on Extradition[92] and its four additional protocols.[93] The first Additional Protocol deals with political offenses and more specifically, what is not to be considered part of the political offense exception.[94] The second Additional Protocol applies to fiscal matters, extends the applicability of the convention to "pecuniary sanctions," and includes as extraditable offenses violations of taxes, duties, and custom and exchange laws and regulations that contain criminal sanctions.[95] The third Additional Protocol develops simplified and accelerated extradition procedures subject to the consent of the person whose extradition is sought.[96] The fourth Additional Protocol addresses issues of lapse of time and proscription, the rule of specialty, re-extradition to third states, channels and means of communications between states, and interpretation of the European Convention and its Protocols in light of other international instruments, as well as declarations, reservations, and denunciations.[97]

The purpose of the European Extradition Convention is to foster uniformity among member states of the Council of Europe.[98] Following ratification by Norway, Sweden, and Turkey, the convention entered into force on April 18, 1960. By 2011, it had forty-seven European state parties and three non-European members.[99] It is noteworthy that nonmembers of the Council 90 Council of Europe, http://www.coe.int/ (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

91 European Union, http://europa.eu/ (last visited Sept. 25, 2012). Member states include: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.

92 European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 12, 1957, E.T.S. No.24.

93 First Additional Protocol, Oct. 15, 1975, C.E.T.S. No. 86 (thirty-nine states have ratified; one state has signed but not ratified); Second Additional Protocol, Mar. 17, 1978, C.E.T.S. No. 98 (forty-two states have ratified; one state has signed but not ratified); Third Additional Protocol, Oct. 11, 2010, Europe T.S. No. 209 (nineteen states have signed; four states have ratified); Fourth Additional Protocol, Sept. 20, 2012, C.E.T.S. No. 212 (twelve states have signed; no states have ratified). See also Council of Europe, European Convention on Extradition and Protocols to the Said Convention—Council of Europe Treaty Series No. 24, 86, 98, 209, 212 (2012). See generally, European Inter-State Co-operation in Criminal Matters, The Council or Europe's Legal Instruments (Eddkehart Müller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1991). Third Additional Protocol, July 7, 2010, Europe T.S. No. 209 (four states have ratified; nineteen states have signed but not ratified). See generally, Michael Plachta, Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 831–835 (Aug. 2011); Michael Plachta, Simplified Extradition: A Proposal for the Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 Council of Europe Convention, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 272–275 (July 2010).

94 Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Oct. 15, 1975, C.E.T.S. 86.

95 Second Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Mar. 17, 1978, C.E.T.S. 98.

96 Third Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Nov. 10, 2010, C.E.T.S. 209

97 Fourth Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition, Sept. 20, 2012, C.E.T.S. 212.

98 All Council of Europe members are party to the convention.

99 Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Non-member state parties include Israel, Korea and South Africa.

of Europe may accede to the convention, contingent upon the unanimous consent of the ratifying states. Finally, reservations are permissible under the convention, and some have in fact been made, but on the whole uniformity has been achieved.[100] The convention has served as a model for bilateral treaties concluded between European and other countries.

The Council of Europe's extradition regime also includes the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism,[101] which is designed essentially to remove the "political offense exception" from application to certain international crimes (e.g., hijacking and taking of hostages). The convention is, however, subject to reservations, such as those of Italy, which is required to deny extradition under its constitution and Article 8 of the 1931 Criminal Code, in the case of an offender who is politically motivated, irrespective of the crime committed.

The European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism entered into force on August 4, 1978, three months after the third member state had ratified it. It now has forty-six member states, with one additional state having signed but not ratified the convention.[102] The preamble of the convention notes "the growing concern caused by the increase of acts of terrorism" and states as its goal "to take effective measures to ensure that the perpetrators of such acts do not escape prosecution and punishment."[103] The convention relies on the principle of aut dedere aut judicare to achieve this objective. It lists offenses that have become the modus operandi of contemporary terrorists, such as air piracy, kidnapping, offenses using bombs or automatic firearms that endanger human life, and attacks on diplomatic personnel. It further stipulates that these acts may not be regarded as political offenses for the purpose of extradition.

The second of the legal regimes is that of the European Union, which as of 2013 has twenty-eight members. In contrast to multilateral treaties, the EU established what is tantamount to a supranational legal regime through the Commission's Framework Directives. On that basis, it established the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) through its Framework Decision on June 13, 2002.[104] This 100 See Shearer, supra note 89, at 330–331, 333.

---

101 Id.

102 Forty-six member states have ratified the convention: Albania, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, F.Y.R. Macedonia, Turkey, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom. Andorra has signed but not ratified the convention.

103 Id.

104 Council Framework Decision of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, July 18, 2002, 2002/584/JHA, OJ L190/1. See Robin Lööf, Shooting from the Hip: Proposed Minimum Rights in Criminal Proceedings throughout the EU, 12 Eur. L.J. 421–430 (May 2006); Susie Alegre & Marisa Leaf, Mutual Recognition in European Judicial Cooperation: A Step Too Far Too Soon? Case Study—the European Arrest Warrant, 10 Eur. L. J. 200–217 (Mar. 2004). See generally, Colin Warbrick, The European Response to Terrorism in an Age of Human Rights, 15 Eur. J. In'tl L. 989 (2004); Mar Jimeno-Bulnes, After September 11th: The Fight against Terrorism in National and European Law. Substantive and Procedural Rules: Some Examples, 10 Eur. L. J. 235–253 (2004); Elspeth Guild, Crime and the EU's Constitutional Future in an Area of Freedom, Security, and Justice, 10 Eur. L. J. 218–234 (Mar. 2004); Mar Jimeno-Bulnes, European Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters, 9 Eur. L. J. 614–630 (2003). Extradition has also occurred pursuant to the Schengen Agreement of 1985 between Switzerland and Germany for tax evasion. See Bruce Zagaris, Swiss Highest Court Affirms Extradition to Germany for Tax Evasion, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 277–278 (2010); The Schengen acquis—Convention implementing the Schengen Agreement of June 14, 1985 between the Governments of the States of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic on the gradual abolition of checks at their common borders, June 14, 1985 O.J. L 239. There were two other extradition agreements in 1995 and 1996 that built upon the 1957 European Extradition Convention, on simplified extradition procedures between member states (1995) and the regime provides for a European judicial space and quasi-automatic recognition of arrest warrants signed by any of the member states, requiring all member states to give it effect.[105] A number of European countries have had to develop national implementing legislation to give effect to these directives. Others, such as France and Germany, have limited the applicability of the EAW through their judiciary. The Courts of Appeals in France in several cases have limited the automatic recognition of the EAW, which were affirmed by the Cour de Cassation.[106] Germany's Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) held in 2006 that the EAW violates Germany's federal constitution, partially with respect to the extradition of German nationals, which is prohibited under the country's constitution (Grundgesetz).[107]

The purpose of the EAW is to create a new system of surrender between EU judicial authorities and to replace the former bilateral and multilateral extradition scheme. The EAW system is based on the principle of mutual recognition as opposed to that of mutual cooperation, which is the basis of the Council of Europe's multilateral treaty regime.[108] In the EU's 2005 Framework Decision, the EAW is defined as "a judicial decision issued by a Member States with a view to arrest and surrender by another Member State of a requested person, for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order."[109] The warrant can be issued for offenses that are punishable for a maximum of at least one year, or when a sentence has been passed or detention ordered for at least four months.[110]

Several major procedural changes between the EAW and the former extradition procedures were made in order to simplify and expedite the overall process. The procedures under an EAW other regarding extradition between European Union member states. Neither of these is yet in force. See Gjermund Mathisen, Nordic Cooperation and the European Arrest Warrant: Intra-Nordic Extradition, the Nordic Arrest Warrant and Beyond, 79 N.J.I.L. 1, 4–5 (2010).

---

105 This is similar to the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the U.S. Constitution, Article IV, Sec. 1. However, as applied, the Full Faith and Credit Clause required that one state obtain a judgment that recognized the judgment of the other state, whereas the EAW goes directly to the implementing judge in any EU country. For a discussion of proposals to improve mutual legal assistance in criminal matters from G8 countries, see generally, Michael Plachta, Improving Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters: Contribution from G8 Countries, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 841–843 (2011).

106 See La Cour De Cassation, Chambre Criminelle [Cass. Crim.] [Supreme Court of Appeal] Paris, Mar. 15, 2005, Bull. Crim., No. 1688 M. Cotte (Fr.).La Cour De Cassation, Chambre Criminelle [Cass. Crim.] [Supreme Court of Appeal] Paris, Feb. 1, 2005, Bull. Crim., No. 742 M. Cotte (Fr.); La Cour De Cassation, Chambre Criminelle [Cass. Crim.] [Supreme Court of Appeal] Paris, Aug. 5, 2004, Bull. Crim., No. 4630 M. Pibouleau (Fr.) (EAW procedures are not laws within the meaning of the criminal code and apply to acts committed after Nov. 1, 1993); La Cour De Cassation, Chambre Criminelle [Cass. Crim.] [Supreme Court of Appeal] Paris, Aug. 5, 2004, Bull. Crim.,No. 4540 M. Piboluleau (Fr.) (court cannot validly order surrender of French national subject to EAW for acts that are not a violation of French law); La Cour De Cassation, Chambre Criminelle [Cass. Crim.] [Supreme Court of Appeal] Paris, July 8, 2004, Bull. Crim., No. 4351 M. Cotte (Fr.) (commission of part of the acts on French territory justified refusal to surrender); Cour d'Appel de Pau [Court of Appeals of Pau], Chambre l'Instruction, Arret No. 238/2003, May 16, 2003 (refusal of extradition to Spain because of suspicion of torture by Spanish police).

107 Bundesverfassungsgericht [BVerfG] [Federal Constitutional Court] July 18, 2005, 2 BvR 2236/04, Absatz-Nr. (1–201) (F.R.G.), available at http://www.bverfg.de/entscheidungen/rs20050718_2bvr223604.html; Schomburg, Lagodny, & Hackner, supra note 2.

108 For a detailed analysis of the different mutual trust among EU member states regarding the EAW and Nordic States regarding the Nordic Arrest warrant, and for a discussion of the Intra-Nordic Extradition system as a possible inspiration for the EAW, see Gjermund Mathisen, Nordic Cooperation and the European Arrest Warrant: Intra-Nordic Extradition, the Nordic Arrest Warrant and Beyond, 79 N.J.I.L. 1, 10–24 (2010).

109 Council Framework Decision on EAW, supra note 100, at art. 1(1).

110 Id. at art. 2(1).

are much faster, as the state in which an individual has been arrested has to return the individual to the issuing state within ninety days of the arrest. Additionally, the dual criminality rule was abolished for thirty-two of the most serious offenses, allowing a surrender pursuant to an EAW without verification of the double criminality of the act, if the offense is punishable by a sentence of at least three years.[111] For other criminal acts, the double criminality rule applies and the surrender pursuant to the arrest warrant can be subject to the condition that the act constitutes an offense under the law of the executing member state.[112] One of the most significant changes is the removal of the political offense exception that exists in extradition treaties and customary international law.[113] Government ministers in the respective EU states no longer have the final decision to extradite or not. The execution of EAWs is a formal judicial process, subject to ensuring respect for fundamental rights, in accordance with the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights. Finally, countries can no longer refuse surrender of their own nationals without certain justifications; however, a country can request that a national serve his or her sentence in its territory. Grounds for refusal include ne bis in idem, if an offense is covered by an amnesty, if the prosecution of the offense is barred by prescription, or if the individual is a minor.[114]

The EAW replaces existing extradition treaties and agreements between EU states regarding extradition, including: the 1957 European Extradition Convention,[115] the 1978 European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism,[116] the 1990 Convention Implementing the 1985 Schengen Agreement,[117] the 1995 Convention on Simplified Extradition Procedure between the Member States of the European Union, and the 1996 Convention relating to Extradition between Member States of the European Union. Although the EAW replaces the above treaties, EU member states still can use bilateral and multilateral agreements for extradition with non-EU states. Denmark, Finland, and Sweden have stated that they will continue to apply uniform legislation in force between themselves.[118]

---

111 Id. at art. 2(2). The following offenses are included: participation in a criminal organization; terrorism; trafficking in human beings; sexual exploitation of children and child pornography; illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances; illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances; illicit trafficking in weapons, munitions, and explosives; corruption; fraud; laundering proceeds of crime; counterfeiting currency; computer-related crime; environmental crime; facilitation of unauthorized entry and residence; murder; grievous bodily injury; illicit trade in human organs and tissue; kidnapping; illegal restraint and hostage-taking; racism and xenophobia; organized or armed robbery; illicit trafficking in cultural goods; swindling; racketeering and extortion; counterfeiting and piracy of products; forgery of administrative documents and trafficking; forgery of means of payment; illicit trafficking in hormonal substances and other growth promoters; illicit trafficking in nuclear or radioactive materials; trafficking in stolen vehicles; rape; arson; crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court; unlawful seizure of aircrafts or ships; and sabotage.

112 Art. 2(4), Council Framework Decision on EAW, supra note 100.

113 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

114 [European] Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 5, 1950, E.T.S. 5, 213 U.N.T.S. 222, as amended by Protocols Nos 3, 5, and 8, which entered into force on Sept. 21, 1970, Dec. 20, 1971, and Jan. 1, 1990 respectively, Arts. 3, 4.

115 European Convention on Extradition, supra note 92.

116 European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Jan. 27, 1977, E.T.S. 090.

117 Schengen Agreement, supra note 100.

118 Statements provided for in Article 31(2) of Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedure between Member States, OJ L 246 (Sept. 29, 2003); Nordic Extradition Act (Denmark Act No 207 of February 3, 1960); Nordic Extradition Act (Finland 270/1960); Act concerning extradition to Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Norway for Criminal Offenses (Sweden 1959:254). With respect to the application of the European Arrest Warrant in Italy, which is based on a law adopted by the Italian Parliament to give effect to the warrant, there have been a number of decisions by the courts of appeal and by the Cort de Cassazione, which are discussed in Rivista Italiana di diritto e Procedura penale, Fasc. 2- Aprile-Giugnio 2006 at 761–776.

The EAW was the result of extensive political discussion and debate among various European states regarding the implementation, in the European system of criminal law, of mutual recognition and implementation of judicial decisions and pretrial orders.[119] The desire for a simpler and faster means of cooperation among EU members regarding extradition, particularly extradition of fugitives who had already been finally sentenced, was an announced goal in the 1999 Tampere European Council meeting.[120] However, this push for a streamlined method of mutual recognition and implementation of judicial decisions among EU states in the context of extradition was not made a top priority until after the terrorist attacks in the United States of September 11, 2001.[121] These attacks resulted in the inclusion of various offenses for which there was no common European definition in the list of extraditable offenses, and for practical reasons removed the double criminality requirement for these offenses.[122] This emphasis on a simplified means of cooperation among EU states has faced a few hurdles toward its full application and efficacy among those states, namely the establishment of mutual trust among EU states, the interrelation of the concepts of mutual recognition and harmonization of the varying legal systems among EU states, and the concept of state sovereignty and constitutionality of the EAW with respect to each EU state party's constitution.[123]

There is, as of the time of this writing, no broad, uniform convergence among the various EU states regarding substantive and procedural criminal law systems. Although there are certainly some basic examples of agreement among EU states, this agreement does not extend beyond certain basic concepts. Absent such a broad-based consensus, it is more difficult for one EU state, when presented with a judgment from another EU state, to trust that the appropriate judicial authority of that EU state, regarding the substantive and procedural criminal rights of a given individual, has considered the relevant principles and procedures of the EU state that has been presented with that judgment and a request to cooperate with its enforcement. This concern relates to the fundamental concept that has come to be known as "mutual trust."[124] Without a baseline confidence in the fairness of a given judicial system regarding the rights of an accused individual, mutual recognition of a judgment as between two sovereign states is less likely to occur. This is particularly true given a state's interest in protecting the rights of its nationals, evidenced by various EU states continuing to consider double criminality even in instances where such consideration is optional under the European Arrest Warrant's

---

119 Massimo Fichera, The European Arrest Warrant and the Sovereign State:A Marriage of Convenience?, 15 Eur. L. J. 70, 71 (2009) (hereinafter "Fichera EAW").

120 Tampere European Council, Presidency Conclusions (Oct. 15 and 16, 1999), conclusion 35, available at http://www.europarl.europa.eu/summits/tam_en.htm (last visited Sept. 8, 2011).

121 J. Wouters & F. Naerts, Of Arrest Warrants, Terrorist Offences and Extradition Deals: An ppraisal of the EU's Main Criminal Law Measures against Terrorism after 11 September, Common Market L. Rev. 909 (2004); M. Jimeno-Bulnes, After September 11th: The Fight against Terrorism in National and European Law Substantive and Procedural Rules: Some Examples, 10 Eur. L. J. 235 (2004). There were some discussions in the 2000 Programme on Mutual Recognition of adopting an arrest warrant. These discusisons included various modalities regarding the scope of the arrest warrants application; some delegations proposed that the arrest warrant apply to the most serious offenses listed in Article 29 of the Treaty of the European Union, others proposed absolute mutual recognition, and others an approximation modality based on a "minimum maximum" method. See Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 72.

122 Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 72.

123 For an early assessment of the implementation of the EAW, see Bruce Zagaris, European Commission Issues Report on Success of European Arrest Warrant, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 420–422 (2007).

124 See in this regard the Preamble to the 1996 Convention relating to Extradition between the Member States of the EU, [1996] OJ C313/12: "The High Contracting Parties…EXPRESSING their confidence in the structure and operation of their judicial systems and in the ability of all Member States to ensure a fair trial…."

Framework Decision.[125] One author has suggested that mutual trust may be fostered by reducing the number of crimes contained in Article 2(2) to those core crimes that EU member states would more easily find commonality among their various legal approaches to the definition of criminality.[126] Article 1(3) of the Framework Decision specifies that the fundamental rights in Article 6 of the Treaty of the European Union[127] will not be modified by the Framework Decision. The respect for human rights and state practice under the EAW will provide another source to test the mutual trust among EU states in the context of the surrender of nationals pursuant to an EAW. As mutual trust among EU states becomes more established, EU states will be more inclined to adopt mutual recognition of requests made pursuant to the EAW.

While the proper role of harmonization has been the subject of extensive debate, there is a synergistic relationship between harmonization and mutual recognition.[128] The potentially problematic nature of harmonization and mutual recognition is reduced if, as should be the case, these two concepts are analyzed as a matter of degree rather than as absolutes. That is to say, harmonization need not be equated to unification of various systematic approaches to a given issue, and mutual recognition need not be viewed as applying to each and every decision issued by a given governmental authority. Harmonization should be viewed, in the context of the EAW, as a means to provide approximation of rules on criminal matters to foster an environment of cooperation among EU states.[129] This approximation of rules should serve to ease concerns regarding the criminal processes of a given state and foster mutual trust among states, which would tend to promote mutual recognition of judgments among states. It remains to be seen whether this minimum level of harmonization will be sufficient to allow a functional 125 Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, Poland, and Ireland all continue to consider dual criminality in the context of the EAW. See Fichera, supra note 119, at 79–80. Article 2(2) of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision lists offenses that, if punishable in the issuing member state by a custodial sentence or detention of a maximum period of three years, need not be verified regarding double criminality. See Council Framework Decision of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, 2002/584/JHA, Art. 2(2), 2002 O.J. (L 190/1).

---

126 Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 80.

127 Article 6 states in its entirety:

> 1. The Union is founded on the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law, principles which are common to the Member States.
>
> 2. The Union shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law.
>
> 3. The Union shall respect the national identities of its Member States.
>
> 4. The Union shall provide itself with the means necessary to attain its objectives and carry through its policies.

Consolidated Versions of the Treaty on European Union and of the Treaty Establishing the European Community, Dec. 29, 2006, C 321 E/1.

128 For the debate regarding harmonization, see T. Vander Beken, Freedom, Security and Justice in the European Union. A Plea for Alternative Views on Harmonisation, in Harmonisation and Harmonising Measures in Criminal Law 95 (A. Klip & H. van der Wilt eds., 2002). A. Klip, European Integration and Harmonisation and Criminal Law, in European Integration and Law (D. M. Curtin et al. eds., 2006), 134. See contra mutual recognition, B. Schünemann, Alternative Project for a European Criminal Law and Procedure, Crim. L. Forum 227 (2007).

129 For a detailed discussion of this from a European perspective, see Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 73–77 (arguing that harmonization as approximation is supported by the text of the Treaty of the European Union as well and discussing the implications of the Lisbon Treaty in allowing the European Parliament and Council to establish rules defining criminal offenses and sanctions for serious cross-border crimes).

European Judicial System to develop, or whether disagreements among EU states will arise such that compromise between two competing systems cannot be reached and the efficient application of legal norms is hindered. It is possible, in such cases, for the affected state to rely on a "safeguard clause" to refer the situation to the European Council for a decision, during which time the procedure is suspended pending resolution by the European Council or other consensus is reached.[130] If consensus has not been reached, the mechanism of "enhanced cooperation" may apply to resolve the issue, but this mechanism requires at least nine countries to wish to adopt the directive notwithstanding opposition from one or more states.[131]

Although the EAW Framework Decision was unanimously approved by EU member states, certain issues concerning the constitutionality of national implementing legislation arose.[132] In Poland, Germany, and Cyprus, the court with authority to review the constitutionality of surrender of nationals pursuant to an EAW found that such surrender was prohibited.[133] These courts based their decisions on the tradition of prohibiting the surrender of nationals; each court also stressed its concerns regarding the lack of certainty of law in the application of the EAW in that particular circumstance. The Czech high court took a different approach to complaints based on similar concerns of non-surrender of nationals and uncertainty as to the law defining the offenses at issue by distinguishing between extradition and the EAW processes.[134] The Czech court noted that extradition was based on mutual distrust among states, whereas the EAW was based on mutual trust deriving from the high mobility of individuals among EU member states and interstate cooperation.[135] The European Court of Justice (ECJ) in Advocaten voor de Wereld was presented with a challenge to the preliminary ruling by the Belgian Constitutional Court.[136] The ECJ was called upon to resolve two issues: (1) whether the Framework Decision was an appropriate instrument or whether a Convention was required under the Treaty of the European Union; and (2) whether Article 2(2) of the Framework decision, removing the verification of double criminality, was compatible with the principles of legality and equality under the Treaty of the European Union. One set of policy concerns surrounding these issues was the fact that conventions had been traditionally used by states to foster cooperation and by virtue of involvement of national parliaments reflected a more democratic control of the issue of cooperation, and that Framework Decisions under one interpretation of the Treaty of the European Union could only be used to adopt minimum rules relating to the elements of crimes and penalties. The opposing policy concerns were the possibility that not all member states would ratify a convention on the EAW, rendering it ineffective, and the fact that the Framework Decision does not violate principles of legality as it merely provides a mechanism of assistance between member states and does not purport to grant the executing state the ability to review the merits of the case (meaning that the arrest and surrender procedure would not be punitive in nature).[137] With regard to the first issue, the Court found that the Council had discretion to choose between the Framework Decision and Convention in this case, and was not limited by the Treaty of the European Union in making this choice.[138] With regard to the second

130 See Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 77.

131 Id. at 77.

132 See generally, Zsuzsanna Deen-Racsmany, The European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender of Nationals Revisited: The Lessons of Constitutional Challenges, 14 Eur. J. Crim. L. & Crim. Just. 271 (2006).

133 See Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 82–83. For a detailed discussion of the Polish Parliament's constitutional amendment to accommodate the EAW, see Michael Plachta, Polish Parliament Amends Constitution to Accommodate European Arrest Warrant, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 48–53 (2007).

134 See Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 83–84.

135 Id.

136 Advocaten voor de Wereld v Leden van de Ministerraad, [2009] E.C.R. C-303/05; Michael Plachta, European Court of Justice Rules on the European Arrest Warrant, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 487 (2009).

137 Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 84–85.

138 Id. at 85.

issue, the Court found that the purpose of the Framework Decision was not to harmonize criminal offenses, but rather to remove the requirement of double criminality for those crimes serious enough to affect public order and safety.[139] However, this reasoning presumes the existence of mutual trust when in fact in a given case it is possible for the state executing the EAW to feel as though a foreign system is being imposed on it without regard to its substantive and procedural criminal provisions.[140]

Various European courts have considered the application of the EAW to their nationals. The United Kingdom has taken a formalistic approach to the EAW in determining what type of "conduct" was covered by the implementing act,[141] namely whether a separate certificate was required for the EAW to be valid,[142] and when habeas corpus is available to challenge an EAW.[143] The relationship between extradition and the EAW has also been considered by Spanish[144] and Belgian[145] courts. Italian courts have faced questions regarding the provision of additional grounds for refusal in the implementing statute.[146]

In a 2008 decision, the ECJ defined the terms "resident" and "staying" in regard to Article 4(6) of the EAW Framework Decision, which provides an optional ground for refusal to execute the EAW where the executing state, in accord with its domestic law, undertakes to execute the sentence or detention order issued by the requesting state.[147] The importance of residence for the purposes of Article 4(6)'s optional ground for refusal to execute an EAW regarding execution of a custodial sentence where the requested individual is staying in or a resident of the 139 Id. at 85.

140 Id. at 86.

141 Office of the King's Prosecutor, Brussels v Cando Armas and Another [2005] UKHL 67, [2006] AC 1. Mr Cando Armas, an Ecuadorian citizen, was sought by the Belgian authorities after conviction in absentia to five years' imprisonment for human trafficking, facilitation of unauthorized entry, and residence and forgery of administrative documents.

142 Dabas v High Court of Justice, Madrid [2007] UKHL 6, [2007] 2 AC 31.

143 Re Hilali [2007] EWHC 939 (Admin), [2007] 3 All ER 422.

144 See M. Jimeno-Bulnes, The Enforcement of the European Arrest Warrant: A Comparison between Spain and the UK, Eur. J. Crime, Crim. L. & Crim. Justice 263 (2007) (implementation in Spain); S.T.C., June 5, 2006, no. 177/2006 (Sala Segunda), Recurso de Amparo no 5933/2005.

145 On the case law in Belgium, see the Cour de Cassation website, available at http://www.cass.be. Cour de Cassation, Aug. 24, 2004, n. P.04.1211.N; Cour de Cassation, Dec. 8, 2004, n. P.04.1562.F; Cour de Cassation, Apr. 13, 2004, n. P.04.0513.N; Cour de Cassation, Feb. 1, 2006, n. P.06.0109.F; Cour de Cassation, June 8, 2004, n. P.04.0842.N; Cour de Cassation, Jan. 11, 2006, n. P.05.1544.F; Cour de Cassation, Oct. 18, 2006, n. P.06.1316.F; Cour de Cassation, Mar. 7, 2007, n. P.07.0259.F; Cour de Cassation, May 11, 2004, n. P.04.0660.N; Cour de Cassation, Sept. 21, 2005, n. P.05.1270.F; Cour de Cassation, Mar. 1, 2006, n. P.06.0280.F.

146 Cass., sez. VI penale, May 8, 2006, n.16542, (Cusini) (Italian citizen charged with fraud in Belgium released for Belgium's failure to transmit the relevant national provisions to the extraditing judicial authority); Cass., sez. un., Feb. 5, 2007, n.4614, (Ramoci) (length of pretrial detention); Cass., sez. feriale penale, Sept. 13–14, 2005, n.33642, (Hussain). The defendant in Hussain argued, inter alia, that he was being persecuted on one of the grounds mentioned by recital 12 of the Framework Decision (reproduced as grounds for refusal by the Italian law). The court replied that a violation of the fundamental rights of a person must be deduced from objective circumstances and the tradition of the requesting state excludes the existence thereof. See Fichera EAW, supra note 119, at 95.

147 Kozlowski [2008] E.C.R. C-66/08, ECR I-6041. The ECJ stated a "resident" was an individual who had established his actual place of residence in a member state, and a person as "staying" in a member state when the individual had acquired connections with the state similar to those of residence following a stable period of presence in that state. These "connections" are determined with reference to objective factors including the length, nature, and conditions of his presence and the family and economic connections with the executing member state.

executing member states, and that state undertakes to execute the sentence or order in accord with its domestic law, is illustrated by the Wolzenburg case.[148] Wolzenburg had been issued suspended custodial sentences by two German courts for various offenses, which were converted into one suspended custodial sentence in 2003 for a term of one year and nine months.[149] Wolzenburg entered the Netherlands in 2005, and the German court issued an order revoking the suspension of conditional sentence a month later.[150] After the German judicial authority issued an EAW for Wolzenburg, he attempted to register in the Netherlands as a citizen of the European Union.[151] Wolzenburg also refused to consent to his surrender to Germany, and a Dutch court found that the facts were punishable under Netherlands law without Wolzenburg losing his residency status in the Netherlands; the Dutch court did, however, refer the case to the ECJ for a preliminary ruling. The ECJ noted that the requested individual must have been a lawful resident for at least five years in the Netherlands for Article 4(6) to be available in the case of a custodial sentence where the Netherlands was the executing state.[152] The ECJ also ruled that the Dutch legislation at issue—which provided that the Netherlands may refuse to surrender its nationals or non-nationals who have been residents in the Netherlands for a continuous period of five years and possess a residence permit of indefinite duration—was not contrary to the principle of non-discrimination based on nationality as both comparable and different situations will be treated in accord with objectively justifiable reasoning based on the situation presented.[153] This five-year residency requirement ensured that execution of an EAW is refused only for persons with genuine prospects of a future in the requested state. The ECJ also issued a ruling regarding the "Principle of Specialty" and stated that if a surrendered person faces an offense other than that for which he or she was surrendered, consent must be requested and obtained pursuant to Article 27(4) of the EAW Framework Decision before a provision affecting that person's liberty may be executed.[154] However, the person may be prosecuted for the other offense prior to consent being obtained as long as no restriction on the person's liberty is applied during prosecution or following judgment.

More concerning than the interpretation of the EAW is the way in which surrender pursuant to the EAW has occurred in violation of various procedurally suspect grounds. EAWs have been issued on the basis of flawed evidence obtained by the mistreatment of witnesses.[155] EAWs have been issued for minor offenses, such as the possession of 100 Euros in counterfeit currency.[156] The concept of mutual trust under which EAWs operate can present flaws, especially given that "previous attempts to legislate at the EU level to require all member states to raise defense rights to a basic minimum consistent with Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights have failed."[157] The issue of a fair trial has arisen in the context of an EAW issued fifteen years after a UK citizen was tried in absentia and convicted on drug charges in France.[158]

---

148 Wolzenburg, [2009] E.C.R. C-123/08.

149 Michael Plachta, European Court of Justice Rules on the European Arrest Warrant, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 489 (Dec. 2009).

150 Id.

151 Id.

152 Id. at 491.

153 Id. at 492.

154 Leymann-Pustovarov, [2009] ECR C-388/08 PPU, I-000.

155 Catherine Heard, The New European Extradition System—A Critical Review, 25 Int'l L. Enforcement Rep. 398, 399 (2009) (discussing the case of Andrew Symeou who was served in 2008 with an EAW regarding the death of another UK youth in Greece in 2007).

156 Id. at 400.

157 Id. at 401.

158 Id. at 402. (discussing the case of Deborah Dark). The United Kingdom initially detained Rafik Abdelmourme Khalifa under an EAW issued by a French court for allegations of embezzlement, and the United Kingdom in 2009 found Khalifa extraditable to Algeria where he was convicted in absentia on

The EAW was conceived of as a system to replace formal extradition among EU member states toward the end of speeding up the delivery of suspects and convicted offenders. The implementation of the EAW has been flawed as uniformity across all member states has had to be balanced with the recognition of the differences among the various national criminal systems in these states. Although it is important to allow states a margin of freedom and discretion in recognition of national sovereignty, the wider this margin becomes the less effective the EAW will be as a tool to facilitate international criminal justice.

4.2. The United States–European Union Extradition Agreement[159]

In response to the attacks of September 11, 2001, the European Union and the United States have undertaken to increase cooperation in penal matters through a new agreement on extradition and mutual legal assistance entered into in 2003.[160] This is a unique type of agreement because it purports to be a multilateral agreement whereas in reality it is a bilateral one. Its contracting parties are the European Union as an organization and the United States. But the European Union assumes the undertaking of having its member states conform their bilateral treaties with the United States to the contents of the EU treaty. Nevertheless, each member state has to negotiate a separate agreement with the United States, which operates as an amending protocol to the existing bilateral treaties the United States has with several EU states. Further adding to the unique if not sui generis nature of the agreement, it cannot be used as a basis for extradition by the United States to the European Union because the European Union is a legal entity that does not have sovereign territory as do its member states. Moreover, the agreement is not for the extradition of EU personnel from the various buildings occupied by the European Union in Brussels, or wherever it may have offices in the territory of the member states. The extradition agreement is more like a framework agreement intended by the United States to gain political leverage with EU member states to negotiate protocols amending existing bilateral extradition treaties. Although this approach may have a valid political purpose, it nonetheless appears to be quite different from any known form of multilateral agreement as understood within the meaning of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and customary international law. There is also nothing under the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States that covers this type of agreement, which can best be described as a master-model agreement, whose only real purpose is to motivate the adoption of bilateral various charges and sentenced to life in prison in 2007. See Court Backs Algerian Extradition, BBC News, June 25, 2009, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/africa/8119610.stm, Kalifa's appeal is expected to involve the provisions of fair trial in the International Convention on Human Rights and trial in absentia. See Bruce Zagaris, British Court Rules Algerian Business Mogul Khalifa Extraditable to Algeria, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 363–364 (2009).

---

159 See also Ch. II. See also Sean Murphy, 2 United States Practice in International Law: 2002–2004 (2006); Sean D. Murphy (ed.), New U.S./EU and U.S./UK Extradition Treaties, in Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 98 Am. J. Int'l L. 850 (2004); Kyle M. Medley, The Widening of the Atlantic: Extradition Practices between the United States and Europe, 68 Brook L. Rev. 1213 (2003); Catherine Heard, Fair Trials International's Policy Paper: A Brief Review of U.S.–U.K. Extradition under the Extradition Act of 2003 from a Human Rights Perspective, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 2–7 (2009) (discussing disparity between U.S. and UK requests for extradition and human rights issues relating to the death penalty, dual criminality, abuse of process regarding plea bargains, and evidence obtained by torture as in the Abu Hamza case).

160 Agreements on Extradition and on Mutual Legal Assistance between the European Union and the United States of America, signed June 25, 2003, Council of Europe doc. 9153/03, CATS 28, USA 4. See also Council Decision of June 6, 2003 concerning the signature of the Agreements between the European Union and the United States of America on extradition and mutual legal assistance in Criminal Matters, 2003/516/EC, OJ L181 (July 19, 2003). See generally, Colin Warbrick, The European Response to Terrorism in an Age of Human Rights, 15 Eur. J. Int'l L. 989 (2004).

agreements that are in conformity with the EU agreement. What is perplexing is that with respect to the twenty-five bilateral treaties that the United States has negotiated with EU member states on the basis of the EU agreement, there are differences that reveal that EU member states did not consider themselves bound by each and every obligation contained in the United States–European Union agreement. In a most unusual practice, the George W. Bush administration classified the United States–European Union extradition treaty as "secret" when it sent it to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.[161] It is difficult to understand why the administration classified the treaty when a published version could be obtained from the EU website.[162] Currently, the full text is available on the Senate website.[163] This agreement entered into force on February 1, 2010, along with the individual bilateral agreements.[164]

The agreement removes the legislative and certification requirements and simplifies the documentation required in order to expedite the extradition process. By facilitating direct contact between the central authorities, it also improves the channels of transmission, especially for cases concerning provisional arrest. It further enlarges the number of extraditable offenses by allowing extradition for any offense that has a sentence of more than one year in prison, but excludes the death penalty. At the same time, EU member states still maintain their right to refuse extradition under the bilateral extradition treaty as the extradition agreement does not replace the bilateral treaties, but rather supplements them or only replaces some provisions. European Union member states can also stipulate that the death penalty will not be imposed in extradition cases, and require a fair trial by an impartial tribunal.

4.2.1. Implications of the European Arrest Warrant and the United States–European Union Extradition Agreement for Extraditions between the European Union and the United States

The push to streamline inter-European arrest and transfer of alleged criminals and the push to streamline extra-European extraditions, at least so far between the European Union and the United States, is indicative of an imminent transformation of the European system into a more federal system with laws regulated by a supranational legislative governing entity, although economic pressures since 2007 have placed great strain on the European Union. The EAW, as noted above, arose from a Council of Europe Framework Decision. The United States–European Union extradition agreement included a provision requiring the agreement to apply to existing and new EU member states, and that new EU member states modify any existing bilateral extradition treaty with the United States to bring it into compliance with the agreement.[165] The EAW directive, though controversial and the subject of debate regarding its conflict with national constitutions, was ultimately accepted by EU member states, some of which 161 On September 28, 2006, the treaty together with twenty-two supplemental bilateral treaties were received in the Senate, and sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and had their injunction of secrecy removed.

162 Website of the European Union Law, available at http://eur-lex.europa.eu/en/index.htm.

163 Thomas Website of Library of Congress, available at http://thomas.loc.gov/. There was an informative hearing on the EU–U.S. extradition treaty in 2008 that summarized the new features of the EU–U.S. extradition treaty. See Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance Agreements with the European Union Bilateral Instruments with European Union Member States, Including Extradition Treaties with Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Malta, and Romania Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty with Malaysia Before the Sen. Comm. on Foreign Relations, 110th Cong. 12 (2008) (testimony of Susan Biniaz, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, attached to S. Exec. Doc. No. 110-12 (2008)).

164 See Department of State United States of America, Treaty Actions Feb. 2010 at 3, available at: http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/147342.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

165 Agreement on Extradition between the European Union and the United States, Art. 3, July 19, 2003, S. Treaty Doc. 109-14.

modified their constitutions to accommodate the EAW directive. Thus, the proposition that an EU directive can supersede contradictory national laws appears settled, even though this principle is not yet explicit as countries that modified their constitutions did not explicitly recognize this binding nature of EU directives. The European Commission is like the locomotive pushing onward toward a Europe that is able to cooperate more efficiently in criminal matters. The price to be paid to ride this locomotive is the harmonization of member states' legal systems, inevitably leading to restructuring of the laws of criminal procedure to track a proposed standard legislation in the area of cooperation in criminal matters.

Perhaps the best indicator of this push to harmonization is the efficiency of the Nordic extradition system, including the Nordic Arrest Warrant, when compared to the Inter-European extradition system, including the EAW. Nordic legal systems are closely harmonized, so that principles such as double criminality would be less divisive or controversial than in the comparable European system.[166] A substantial objection to an extradition would be based on a state potentially acting contrary to its ordre public in certain circumstances were it to grant extradition, such as when the act was committed in the requested state and the act was not deemed a crime in the requested state.[167] Although an extradition system could provide for a territoriality ground for refusal of extradition (i.e., not requiring extradition for an act deemed not criminal by the requested state when it did not occur in the requesting state), it would be more desirable to achieve this through a positive as opposed to a negative means. That is to say, having both member states view the same conduct as either criminal or not would be a more desirable way to achieve cooperation in criminal matters than allowing the difference in opinion to remain and potentially create tension between the requesting and requested state. Similar arguments can be raised with regards to the need for proportionality in penalty thresholds or for provisions regarding extradition of accessories to crimes.[168] Fundamentally, the issues regarding mutual trust, double criminality, specialty (to a more limited extent),[169] and territoriality stem from differences in the legal systems of the requesting and requested states.

The function of the European Commission as a harmonizing entity should be distinguished from the harmonizing factor of the U.S. Supreme Court, although both have roles in a federal system. Although the Supreme Court may issue a decision telling a U.S. state that its law or ruling was incorrect, it does not purport to set forth a general standard for all states to follow. That is to say, the Supreme Court will not render an advisory opinion or an opinion on an abstract issue that may arise in the future. Rather, the Supreme Court will rule in a particular case involving a particular factual scenario. The European Commission, in contrast, drafts directives that specify the form a given EU member state's legislation or legal procedure must take with regard to the subject of the directive. Thus, the European Commission can engage in abstract review of a problem that has not arisen, and draft a directive to mitigate against the occurrence of that problem in the future. Further, the directive will operate as an amendment to existing contrary national laws of all member states.

The function of the European Commission as a harmonizing supranational legislature will be necessary to guard against abuses of the criminal process in the guise of efficient justice. For example, the ability of the United States to negotiate bilateral extradition agreements with individual EU member states, which differ from the United States–European Union extradition agreement, may have the practical effect of streamlining the extradition of relators from certain EU member states as compared to others. Further, the EAW has the practical effect 166 Gjermund Mathisen, Nordic Cooperation and the European Arrest Warrant: Intra-Nordic Extradition, the Nordic Arrest Warrant and Beyond, 79 N.J.I.L. 1, 24–27 (2010).

167 Id. at 25.

168 Id. at 27–29.

169 Id. at 29–32.

of expediting the transfer of relators between and among member states. This can have the unseemly result of the United States being aware of a wanted relator in EU member state A, but not pursuing extradition by that state and preferring to follow formal extradition proceedings with EU member state B with whom it has more favorable provisions in its bilateral extradition agreement, given the particular factual scenario under which the relator is sought. Before filing a formal extradition request with EU member state A, the United States could suggest that EU member state B submit a request for the relator from EU member state A pursuant to the EAW, presuming there would be a valid ground to make a request pursuant to the EAW. Within ninety days, the United States could submit a formal extradition request to EU member state B, using the time it knows it has pursuant to the EAW request to complete whatever extradition packet it would need to present. Thus, a relator sought by the United States could be deprived of certain additional protections or favorable terms contained in the EU member state A's bilateral agreement with the United States on no principled basis except convenience.

However, Article 3 of the United States–European Union extradition agreement specifies that Articles 4 (extraditable offenses) and 5 (transmission and authentication of evidence) will replace all existing bilateral extradition agreements with regard to their subjects; Articles 6 (transmission of requests for provisional arrest), 8 (supplemental information), 9 (temporary surrender), 11 (simplified extradition proceedings), 12 (transit), and 14 (sensitive information in a request) will be applied absent any other provisions in existing bilateral extradition agreements. As Articles 4 and 5 deal with the core issues of extradition (i.e. the acts and proof of the acts allegedly committed), it can provide some protection against extradition in violation of certain core substantive requirements. Another concern remains, however, in that the existence of separate agreements between the United States and the European Union, and between the United States and individual EU member states can allow for two bites at the apple. Thus, if the extradition fails under the United States–European Union agreement, the United States may try again under a separate bilateral agreement with a given EU member state. Further, under the principle of reciprocity, the same can be said of an EU member state requesting the extradition of a relator from the United States. This poses a problem for a relator, as facing detention under successive extradition requests, which could take months to resolve, may place undue stress on a relator to waive his or her rights to an extradition hearing in order to avoid the prospect of being imprisoned for an extended period of time awaiting transfer. Given the difficulty of challenging an extradition request, both financially and legally, this kind of pressure is not insignificant. However, there is little practice invoking the United States–European Union extradition agreement, and it remains to be seen whether the United States will continue to rely on bilateral agreements with individual EU member states as has been its traditional practice thus far.[170]

The concern among EU member states in developing systems of cooperation in criminal matters seems to involve a great concern that the criminally accused individual not escape justice. The Action Plan Implementing the Stockholm Programme summarizes this concern by stating as follows:

> Criminal law is a relatively novel area of EU action for which the Treaty of Lisbon sets a clear legal framework. A criminal justice strategy, fully respecting subsidiarity and coherence, should guide the EU's policy for the approximation of substantive and procedural criminal law. It should be pursued in close cooperation with European Parliament, national parliaments and the Council and acknowledge that focus will remain primarily on mutual recognition and the harmonisation of offences and sanctions will be pursued for selected cases.
>
> The administration of justice must not be impeded by unjustifiable differences between the Member States' judicial systems: criminals should not be able to avoid prosecution and prison > by crossing borders and exploiting differences between national legal systems. A solid common European procedural base is needed. A new and comprehensive system for obtaining evidence in cross-border cases and better exchange of information between Member States' authorities on offences committed are essential tools to developing a functioning area of freedom, security and justice. The Commission will prepare the establishment of a European Public Prosecutor's Office from Eurojust, with the responsibility to investigate, prosecute and bring to judgement offences against the Union's financial interests. In doing so, the Commission will further reflect on the cooperation with all the actors involved, including the European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF).

170 See Ch. II.

>
> …
>
> Essential to making real progress will be mutual trust. This requires the establishment of minimum standards (e.g. on procedural rights) as well as understanding of the different legal traditions and methods. A common European culture in this field, through training and Erasmus-style exchange programmes, as well as an European Law Institute, building upon existing structures and networks, can make a valuable contribution and will be actively encouraged.[171]

In a related context, the Institute for International Research on Criminal Policy (IRCP) at Ghent University has analyzed problems associated with the implementation of the 2008 EU Framework Decision regarding mutual recognition of judgments and transfer of prisoners.[172] This survey showed that between 20 percent and 25 percent of the respondents (judges, practitioners, advocates, and representatives from competent authorities designated to implement the Framework Decision) thought that important information, such as detention conditions in an executing state, was not relevant for the decision-making process under the Framework Decision.[173] Many of the recommendations made by this report involve centralization of information, standardization of minimum detention standards, and establishment of sentencing equivalency processes and standards.[174] These minimum standards designed to harmonize variances in practice among EU member states may be created in accord with Article 82 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, which provides as follows:

> 1. Judicial cooperation in criminal matters in the Union shall be based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions and shall include the approximation of the laws and regulations of the Member States in the areas referred to in paragraph 2 and in Article 83.
>
> The European Parliament and the Council, acting in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure, shall adopt measures to:
>
> (a) lay down rules and procedures for ensuring recognition throughout the Union of all forms of judgments and judicial decisions;
>
> (b) prevent and settle conflicts of jurisdiction between Member States;

---

171 Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions—Delivering an area of freedom, security and justice for Europe's citizens—Action Plan Implementing the Stockholm Programme, COM(2010) 171, Brussels 4/20/2010, available at http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2010:0171:FIN:en:HTML (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

172 Council framework decision on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to judgments in criminal matters imposing custodial sentences or measures involving deprivation of liberty for the purpose of their enforcement in the European Union, 2008 OJ L 327, p. 27.

173 Institute for International Research on Criminal Policy (IRCP), Cross-Border Execution of Judgments Involving Deprivation of Liberty in the EU: Overcoming Legal and Practical Problems through Flanking Measures, 40 IRCP Series 85 (2011).

174 Id. at 85–102.

> (c) support the training of the judiciary and judicial staff;
>
> (d) facilitate cooperation between judicial or equivalent authorities of the Member States in relation to proceedings in criminal matters and the enforcement of decisions.
>
> 2. To the extent necessary to facilitate mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions and police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters having a cross-border dimension, the European Parliament and the Council may, by means of directives adopted in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure, establish minimum rules. Such rules shall take into account the differences between the legal traditions and systems of the Member States.
>
> They shall concern:
>
> (a) mutual admissibility of evidence between Member States;
>
> (b) the rights of individuals in criminal procedure;
>
> (c) the rights of victims of crime;
>
> (d) any other specific aspects of criminal procedure which the Council has identified in advance by a decision; for the adoption of such a decision, the Council shall act unanimously after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament.[175]

The usefulness of such directives in the context of mutual cooperation in criminal matters, with reference to the transfer of prisoners between and among EU member states, is underscored by the fact that almost half of respondents to the IRCP survey stated that they felt that variations in sentence execution modalities and early and conditional release programs would make people reluctant to use the 2008 Framework Decision.[176] Over half of the respondents agreed that the European Union should introduce binding measures to harmonize these sentencing execution and early and conditional release modalities.[177] Thus, the consensus appears to be growing among EU member states for a more uniform approach in matters of criminal justice, at least in regards to intra-EU cooperation in criminal matters.

4.3. Arab League Extradition Agreement[178]

The Arab League Extradition Agreement replaces, supplements, or complements existing bilateral treaties.[179] It was approved by the Council of the League of Arab States on September 14, 1952. Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, and Syria became signatories, but only Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia subsequently ratified it. The agreement has, therefore, been in effect only among those three states since August 28, 1954.[180]

---

175 Consolidated Version of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, Art. 82, 2010 OJ C 83/47.

176 Institute for International Research on Criminal Policy (IRCP), Cross-border Execution of Judgments involving Deprivation of Liberty in the EU: Overcoming Legal and Practical Problems through Flanking Measures, 40 IRCP Series 94 (2011).

177 Id. at 102.

178 Dated Sept. 14, 1952, 1952 B.F.S.P. 159 at 606, League of Arab States Treaty Series 27–32, reprinted in 8 Rev. Egyptienne de Droit Int'l 328–332 (1952). See also Said Hussein Youssef Khadr, Extradition Law and Practice in Egypt and Other Arab States (1977).

179 For extradition in the Middle East and North Africa, see generally, David P. Warner, Challenges to International Law Enforcement Cooperation for the United States in the Middle East and North Africa: Extradition and Its Alternatives, 50 Vill. L. Rev. 479 (2005).

180 See Shearer, supra note 89, at 327. A supplementary agreement was concluded in 1983; see Geoff Gilbert, Transnational Fugitive offenders in International Law 35 (1998).

The 1998 Arab Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism[181] and the Convention of the Organization of the Islamic Conference on Combating International Terrorism[182] also contain provisions on extradition with the elimination of the political offense exception.

4.4. The Benelux Extradition Convention[183]

The Convention on Extradition and Judicial Assistance in Penal Matters was signed by Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands on June 27, 1962. In contrast to other multilateral arrangements, this convention is in certain respects more permissive. This may be explained in part by the closer economic relationships among these states, which have been almost entirely subsumed within the larger European Union.[184] Although the substantive provisions of this convention reflect to a certain extent the closer ties of the parties, most provisions follow the European Convention on Extradition.[185]

4.5. The Commonwealth Extradition Scheme[186]

The foundational extradition document for the Commonwealth of Nations is the Scheme Relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders within the Commonwealth, which was drafted at a meeting of Commonwealth Law Ministers in London in 1966, and was embodied in the Fugitive Offenders Act of 1967. The origin of Commonwealth cooperation, however, dates to 1843 when the Imperial Parliament enacted the first statute providing for the surrender of fugitives between British possessions.[187] In 1881, the Fugitive Offenders Act superseded this statute.[188] Many of the same features of the 1881 statute have been carried forward into the 1966 scheme despite the transformation of the British Empire into the Commonwealth of Nations.[189]

---

181 Arab Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism, Apr. 22, 1998, available at http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/3de5e4984.html (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

182 Annex to Resolution no. 59/26-P, signed at Ouagadougou on Sept. 25, 1999, available at http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/3de5e6646.html (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

183 1962 Tractatenblad van het Koninkrijk der Nederlanden No. 97. See also Coen Mulder & Bert Swart, Sub-Regional Arrangements: The Benelux and Nordic Countries, in, 3 International Criminal Law 389, supra note 34. See also Bart de Schutter, International Criminal Law in Evolution: Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Benelux Countries, 14 Neth. J. Int'l L. 382–410 (1967), reprinted in 2 A Treatise on International Criminal Law 249 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda, eds., 2 vols. 1973).

184 See Shearer, supra note 89, at 328.

185 See European Convention on Extradition, supra note 92. See generally, European Committee on Crime Problems, Legal Aspects of Extradition among European States (Council of Europe, 1970); Explanatory Report on the European Convention on Extradition (Council of Europe, 1969).

186 Scheme relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders within the Commonwealth, 1966, Cmnd 3008 at 1. See generally, Avrinder Sambei & John R.W.D. Jones, Extradition Law Handbook (2005);The Law of Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance (Clive Nicholls, Clare Montgomery & Julian Knowles eds., 2002); Satyadeva Bedi, Extradition: A Treatise on the Laws Relevant to the Fugitive Offenders within and with the Commonwealth Countries (2002); Hartley-Booth, supra note 2; Jones on Extradition, supra note 2, at 1–1059. See also the Fugitive Offenders Act of 1967.

187 See An Act for the Better Apprehension of Certain Offenders, 1843, 6 & 7 Vict. ch. 34; Shearer, supra note 89, at 328.

188 See Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. ch. 69; Shearer, supra note 89, at 328.

189 Extradition (Commonwealth Countries) Act, 1966, Cmnd 75. See also Fugitive Offenders Act, 1967, Cmnd 68 (Great Britain); Commonwealth Fugitive Criminals Act, 1967, Cmnd 54 (Malaysia); Shearer, supra note 89, at 329–330. The Australian Extradition (Commonwealth Countries) Act, 1966, part III, applies among Australia, the British Solomon Islands Protectorate, Fiji, the Gilbert and

The scheme was deemed to be more acceptable than a multilateral treaty because it was based on the reciprocal legislation approach. The 1967 Fugitive Offenders Act does not preclude member states from entering into bilateral treaties containing additional or alternative provisions. As former colonies of the British Empire developed their legal systems and entered into new multilateral and bilateral agreements, they also saw the need to revisit the 1966 Commonwealth Extradition Scheme.[190] Over the course of forty years, it is also evident that this approach, as well as the Fugitive Offenders Act of 1967, needed to be amended to reflect the needs of the Commonwealth states. At present there are fifty-four Commonwealth members.[191]

The latest developments in the Commonwealth system are the Scheme Relating to Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters [Harare Scheme];[192] the London Scheme for Extradition within the Commonwealth,[193] which has effectively replaced the 1966 scheme; the Commonwealth Scheme for Rendition of Fugitive Offenders;[194] the Scheme for Transfer of Convicted Offenders within the Commonwealth;[195] the Framework for Commonwealth Principles on Promoting Good Governance and Combating Corruption;[196] and the 2003 UK Extradition Act.[197]

Ellice Islands Colony, and New Zealand. Shearer, supra note 89, at 330. For the European Convention on Extradition and other conventions on inter-state cooperation in penal matters to which the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth members may be a party thereto, see generally, European Inter-State Co-operation in Criminal Matters: The Council of Europe's Legal Instruments (Ekkehart Müeller-Rappard & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 2d. ed. 1993). See also Dominique Poncet & Paul Gully-Hart, Extradition: The European Approach, in 2 International Criminal Law 461 (2d. ed. 1999).

190 A complete listing of Commonwealth countries' agreements, orders, and acts relating to extradition and rendition of fugitive offenders can be found on the Commonwealth website, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{FB427D7C-77DE-4CB8-8CCA-A132562F3DE5}_EXTRADITION_pt1.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

191 Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Cameroon, Canada, Cyprus, Dominica, Fiji Islands, the Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Guyana, India, Jamaica, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Malta, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Nauru, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Swaziland, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tuvalu, Uganda, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, and Zambia. Fiji is currently suspended from the Commonwealth due to the failure of the ruling military junta to hold elections.

192 Scheme Relating to Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters within the Commonwealth, Amended in April 1990, November 2002, October 2005, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/2C167ECF-0FDE-481B-B552-E9BA23857CE3_HARARESCHEMERELATINGTOMUTUALASSISTANCE2005.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

193 London Scheme for Extradition within the Commonwealth Incorporating the Amendments Agreed at Kingston in November of 2002, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{56F55E5D-1882-4421-9CC1-71634DF17331}_London_Scheme.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

194 Commonwealth Scheme for Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, Amended in 1990, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/%7B717FA6D4-0DDF-4D10-853E-D250F3AE65D0%7D_London_Amendments.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

195 Scheme for Transfer of Convicted Offenders within the Commonwealth, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{BF5E0493-DE14-43D6-A5E8-7641447B2CB1}_convicted_criminals.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

196 Framework for Commonwealth Principles on Promoting Good Governance and Combating Corruption, http://www.thecommonwealth.org/shared_asp_files/uploadedfiles/{C628DA6C-4D83-4C5B-B6E8-FBA05F1188C6}_framework1.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

197 2003 UK Extradition Act, available at http://www.opsi.gov.uk/acts/acts2003/20030041.htm.

4.6. The Inter-American Conventions

The Montevideo Convention of 1899, which was supported by five countries, was the first extradition arrangement among American states. It was followed by a convention signed by seventeen nations, including the original signatories to the 1899 Convention, in Mexico in 1902. In 1911, a conference in Bolivia received support from five states for a new convention. The Bustamante Code supplemented the preexisting Montevideo Convention, and was adopted in Havana in 1928 by the Sixth International Conference of American States. It was followed by the Second Montevideo Convention, concluded in 1933, which did not abrogate existing treaties in force between the parties, but was designed to enter into force immediately upon the lapse of prior treaties.

Further revisions were made in 1940 and 1957.[198] After a draft convention was proposed by the Organization of American States in 1973, the Inter-American Convention on Extradition was signed in 1981 and entered into force on March 3, 1982.[199] The Inter-American states also entered into the 2002 Convention Against Terrorism,[200] and the 196 Convention Against Corruption,[201] which both contain provisions on extradition.

4.7. The Nordic States System

The Nordic countries, consisting of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden, began developing a subregional extradition system in 1962, which evolved as a result of the influence of the EAW.[202] The Nordic countries rely on a Nordic Arrest Warrant and on their respective national legislation for extradition.[203] In 2005, the Nordic countries concluded a multilateral convention creating a Nordic Arrest Warrant that functionally mirrored the EAW, but with differences making the Nordic Arrest Warrant arguably more efficient and effective than the EAW.[204] The foundation of the Nordic system rests on mutual trust in each other and the national legal systems of each state.[205] More important, the Nordic countries rely on the fairness of their legal processes and on the integrity of their judicial systems to calm fears about the miscarriage of justice. This high level of mutuality of trust has led to a subregional cooperation system, which is not based on treaty obligations.[206] Instead it is based on a flexible cooperative approach of relying on the issuance of arrest warrants or criminal judgments to which the countries give the equivalent of what the U.S. Constitution requires for judgments and legal acts of the different states of the Union, namely "full faith and credit."[207] As a result of the above many of the conditions that are normally required in extradition proceedings are no longer necessary. This includes, for example, the principle of double criminality.[208] The Nordic 198 Organization of American States T.S. No. 36.

199 Inter-American Convention on Extradition, Feb. 25, 1981, O.A.S. Doc. B-47. Six countries have ratified the convention: Antigua and Barbuda, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Panama, St. Lucia, and Venezuela. Ten countries have signed the convention: Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Nicaragua, Paraguay, and Uruguay.

200 Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism, June 3, 2003, AG/Res. 1840 (XXXII-O/02), O.A.S. No. A-66.

201 Inter-American Convention Against Corruption, Mar. 29, 1996, O.A.S. Doc. B-58.

202 Gjermund Mathisen, Nordic Cooperation and the European Arrest Warrant: Intra-Nordic Examination, the Nordic Arrest Warrant and Beyond, 79 Nordic J. Int'l L. 1 (2010).

203 Id. at 17.

204 Id. at 16–24

205 Id. at 5–7.

206 Id. at 8.

207 U.S. Const. art. IV, §1

208 See Ch. VI, Sec. 2.

scheme allows for the extradition of each country's nationals to another Nordic state, and for all practical purposes eliminates such defenses as "the political offense exception."[209] Nevertheless, the defense of ne bis in idem still remains.[210]

The Nordic states that are part of this subregional system are also subject to the EAW.[211] Moreover these Nordic states are also members of the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, which with fifty state parties makes it the world's most widely ratified multilateral extradition treaty.[212] In addition, the Nordic states are parties to the 1995 European Union Convention on Simplified Extradition Procedure[213] and the 1996 European Union Convention on Extradition.[214]

4.8. African Union

No multilateral extradition treaty currently exists among the African states. In 1961, twelve of France's fourteen former Equatorial and West African colonies formed the Union Africaine et Malagache.[215] On September 12 of that year, these states signed a convention on judicial cooperation at Antananarivo. In 1963, the Organization of African States (OAS) was formed. In September 1999, the OAS issued the Sirte Declaration that established the African Union (AU), which is loosely modeled after the European Union.[216] Although there is no extradition treaty in the African system, the Organisation of African Unity Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism[217] and the AU Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption[218] both contain provisions on extradition and are patterned after the corresponding UN conventions.

Within Africa there are two subregional agreements: the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Convention on Extradition of 1994 and the South African Development Community (SADC) Protocol on Extradition of 2002.[219]

---

209 Mathisen, supra note 202, at 10. For a discussion on the "political offense exception" see Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.

210 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

211 Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, OJ L 190, 18.7.2002, p.1. For further discussion on the European Arrest Warrant, see Ch. II, Sec. 4.1 on European Regimes.

212 European Convention on Extradition, supra note 92, at 4.

213 Council Act of March 10, 1995 drawn up on the basis of Article K.3 of the Treaty on European Union, on simplified extradition procedure between the Member States of the European Union, Mar. 30, 1995, OJ C 78.

214 Council Act of September 27, 1996 drawn up on basis of Article K.3 of the Treaty on European Union relating to extradition between the Member States of the European Union, June 23, 1996, OJ C 313.

215 The original parties were Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo (Brazzaville), Dahomey, Gabon, Ivory Coast, Malagasy Republic, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal, and Upper Volta. See Shearer, supra note 89, at 333. Concerning other treaties of these countries, see Daniel P. O'Connell, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law 58–88 (1967).

216 Constitutive Act of the African Union, July 11, 2000, http://www.africa-union.org/root/au/aboutau/constitutive_act_en.htm (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

217 OAU Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism, July 14, 1999, http://www.africa-union.org/root/au/Documents/Treaties/Text/Algiers_convention%20on%20Terrorism.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

218 AU Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption, July 11, 2003, http://www.africa-union.org/official_documents/Treaties_%20Conventions_%20Protocols/Convention%20on%20Combating%20Corruption.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

219 Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Convention on Extradition, Aug. 6, 1994, http://www.iss.co.za/AF/RegOrg/unity_to_union/pdfs/ecowas/4ConExtradition.pdf (last visited Sept.

4.9. Asia

Although there is no regional extradition treaty in Asia,[220] the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Regional Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism of 1987 contains provisions on prosecution or extradition.[221]

5. Bilateral Treaty Practice

Since the late 1800s the number of bilateral and multilateral extradition treaties has been increasing.[222] In the post–WW II period, the increase in bilateral treaty practice has been unparalleled in history. The United States alone has over 150 extradition treaties in force.[223] The common law–based systems have traditionally relied on bilateral treaty practice, supplemented by national legislation to regulate the procedure.[224] Civil law–based systems rely essentially on national legislation as well as treaties, reciprocity, and comity.[225]

As the number of independent states increased after WWII, particularly in Africa, the Middle East, and Asia, the number of participants to the practice of extradition grew in equal measure. Unlike developed countries, which have increased their inter-state cooperation in penal matters, developing countries preferred to enter into bilateral treaties in order to emphasize their sovereignty. Furthermore, such treaties were preferred because, under the doctrine of state succession, these newly independent states were still bound by the treaties entered into by their former colonial rulers.[226]

Bilateral treaty practice in extradition is the most cumbersome form that can be relied upon, due to the lack of uniformity among treaties and the greater flexibility in treaty provisions. The United Nations has 192 member states; thus, assuming that each state entered into a bilateral treaty with the other states, there would be more than 35,000 extradition treaties in force among these states. Furthermore, all states would be constantly engaging in diplomatic negotiations to amend these treaties as international and national exigencies required, and then their national legislative processes would be engaged in the signature and ratification processes and, whenever required, in the development of new national legislation. In addition, treaties are subject to a variety of peculiarities such as the effect of war and state succession, and the severance of diplomatic relations. All these factors make that approach unmanageable.[227] Of course, uniformity can be enhanced by the adoption of regional multilateral 25, 2012); South African Development Community (SADC) Protocol on Extradition of 2002, Oct. 3, 2002, http://www.sadc.int/index/browse/page/148 (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

---

220 For a review of China's extradition law of 2000, see generally, Hu Qian & Chen Qiang, China's Extradition Law of 2000, 2 Chinese J. Int'l L. 647 (2002).

221 South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Regional Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Nov. 4, 1987, http://treaties.un.org/doc/db/Terrorism/Conv18-english.pdf (last visited Sept. 25, 2012), art. IV.

222 See supra Sec. 1.

223 See Ch. II.

224 See supra Sec. 2.

225 In 1996 the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network conducted a survey of extant bilateral extradition treaties. This writer knows of no subsequent complete listing of bilateral extradition treaties; available at http://www.uncjin.org/Laws/extradit/extindx.htm (last visited September 18, 2012).

226 See, e.g., O'Connell, supra note 215.

227 See Ch. II.

treaties, employing uniform or standard treaty provisions, and increasing the flexibility of such treaty provisions.[228]

A growing concern in bilateral treaty practice is the record of human rights abuses in a given country, which is illustrated by the difficulty facing the Chinese government's attempts to enter into extradition treaties with certain countries.[229]

6. Extradition without a Treaty

Extradition is regarded by states as a sovereign act. The view of most states is that the duty to extradite arises by virtue of a treaty or national legislation, or both. In the absence of an international duty, states can and do rely on reciprocity and comity, which are grounded in international principles of friendly cooperation among nations. Reciprocity could become binding under international law if it manifests the custom of a state as evidenced by its consistent practice. However, comity is not binding as it is an act of courtesy. A state's non-treaty may grant or request extradition on the basis of the national legislation that authorizes it[230] and provides the framework, substantive conditions, exceptions, and procedures inherent in it.[231] Thus, there are few general principles or rules that can be derived from practice based on reciprocity or comity, as that practice is subject to national legislation that varies from state to state. Ad hoc arrangements are occasionally entered into by states to suit their particular needs at certain times.[232]

Some states occasionally extradite upon a specific bilateral exchange of letters between their executive branches. Their modalities will depend on the constitutional and legislative requirements of the states in question. Other forms of rendition fall into the category of alternative forms of rendition as described in Chapters IV and V. Extradition to international criminal tribunals is also an increasing practice.[233]

---

228 See United Nations General Assembly's Model Treaty on Extradition, in M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards 459 (1994) [hereinafter Bassiouni Compendium].

229 See generally, Matthew Bloom, Note: A Comparative Analysis of the United States's Response to Extradition Requests from China, 33 Yale J. Int'l L. 177 (2008); Bruce Zagaris, PRC Promotes Negotiation of Extradition Treaties, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 296–297 (2007). See also Chs. VII and VIII.

230 For example, the French practice started with the Decret-Loi of February 19, 1791, followed by the Ministry of Justice Circulaire of July 30, 1872, and the law of March 10, 1927. See also Billot, supra note 2; Pierre Bouzat & Jean Pinatel, Traité de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie (2d rev. ed. 1970); Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Traité Elémentaire de Droit Criminal et de Législation Pénal Comparée (2d ed. 1943); Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Les Principles Modernes de Droit Pénal International 249 (1928); Jean Claude Lombois, Droit Pénal International 539 (2d ed. 1979); Roger Merle & André Vitu, Traité de Droit Criminal (2d ed. 1973). For another, which permits reciprocity by a common-law based system, see the Australian "Extradition (Foreign States) Act" of 1974. See Shearer, supra note 27.

231 National legislation serves the same purpose for states that rely on treaties, but, as in the case of the United States, national legislation is subject to treaties. See Ch. II. For other conditions and procedures, see also Chs. VI, VII, VIII, and IX.

232 The case in point is the rendition of one Chaim Levy who was surrendered by Egypt to the United States pursuant to an ad hoc arrangement based on an exchange of letters between the two governments. United States v. Levy, 947 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1991). See generally, Matthew Bloom, Note, A Comparative Analysis of the United States's Response to Extradition Requests from China, 33 Yale J. Int'l L. 177 (2008).

233 See infra Sec. 7.

7. Surrender to International Criminal Tribunals

7.1. ICTY and ICTR

The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY)[234] and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)[235] were both established by the Security Council pursuant to Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.[236] As a member of the United Nations, the United States is bound by the organization's Charter.[237] These two tribunals are sub-organs of the Security Council, and therefore the United States is bound by the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR. Article 32 of the Statute of the ICTY provides, in pertinent part, that: "[s]tates shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including, but not limited to…the surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal."[238] Article 28 of the Statute of the ICTR mirrors the requirements set forth in Article 32 of the Statute of the ICTY.[239]

In order to implement the two international surrender agreements that the United States had signed with the Yugoslavia and Rwanda tribunals,[240] Congress passed and the president signed 234 The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), S.C. Res. 808, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/808 (1993), annexed to Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of the U.N. Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), U.N. Doc. S/2-5704 & Add. 1 (1993). See also Michael Bohlander, Referring an Indictment from the ICTY and ICTR to Another Court—Rule 11BIS and the Consequences for the Law of Extradition, 55 Int'l Comp. L. Q. 219 (2006); Geert-Jan Alexander Knoops, Surrender to International Criminal Courts: Contemporary Practice and Procedures (2002); Bassiouni & Manikas, supra note 83; M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Critical Study of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, 5 Crim. L. Forum 279 (1994); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Former Yugoslavia: Investigating Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Establishing an International Criminal Tribunal, 18 Fordham Int'l L. J. 1191 (1995).

235 The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, S.C. Res. 955, U.N. SCOR, 49th Sess., 3453d mtg., Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994).

236 Article 39 provides that the "Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken…to maintain or restore international peace and security." "The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures." U.N. Charter art. 41.

237 The United States signed the United Nations Charter on June 26, 1945 and ratified it on August 8, 1945.

238 See also Louis Klarevas, The Surrender of Alleged War Criminals to International Tribunals: Examining the Constitutionality of Extradition via Congressional–Executive Agreement, 8 UCLA J. Int'l L. & Foreign Aff. 77 (Spring–Summer 2003).

239 Although surrender requests are made generally by the ICTY and ICTR and are de jure binding upon all countries, the practical effect is that of a request to an individual country. Therefore, for example, the ICTR made seventy-two surrender requests under its Article 28 powers, for individuals located in twenty-five individual countries, namely: Angola (one request), Benin (one request), Burkina Faso (one request), Cameroon (ten requests), Democratic Republic of the Congo (six requests), Denmark (one request), Germany (one request), Belgium (six requests), Gabon (one request), France (three requests), Ivory Coast (two requests), Kenya (fourteen requests), Mali (two requests), Namibia (one request), the Netherlands (two requests), Rwanda (one request), Senegal (one request), South Africa (one request), Switzerland (two requests), Tanzania (six requests), Togo (two requests), Uganda (two requests), United Kingdom (one request), United States (one request), and Zambia (three requests). Available at http://www.unictr.org/Cases/StatusofDetainees/tabid/202/Default.aspx (last viewed Sept. 18, 2012).

240 On October 5, 1994, the United States entered into with the Yugoslavia Tribunal an Agreement on Surrender of Persons. Similarly, on January 24, 1995, the United States entered into an agreement with the Rwandan Tribunal, named the Agreement on the Surrender of Persons Between the Government of the United States and the Tribunal (the "Surrender Agreement"). However, both agreements did not the National Defense Authorization Act, which provides for the surrender of persons found in the United States who are sought by either tribunal for prosecution.[241]

The constitutionality of the National Defense Authorization Act was challenged in the case of Ntakirutimana v. Reno. In that case Ntakirutimana challenged his surrender to the ICTR to face genocide charges. The Southern District Court of Texas held the Act unconstitutional, reasoning that "Congress has no independent authority to regulate extradition and that a treaty of extradition is required before extradition can occur."[242] Interestingly, and in response to the second request for Ntakirutimana's extradition, the Southern District Court of Texas held that "it is within the power of the Executive and Congress to surrender fugitives . . . under an executive agreement with congressional assent via implementing legislation."[243] Upholding Ntakirutimana's surrender to the ICTR, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals stated that "it is not unconstitutional to surrender Ntakirutimana . . . pursuant to the Executive–Congressional Agreement."[244] Therefore, even though an Article II treaty has not been established authorizing the extradition of an individual, he/she may be surrendered to either tribunal pursuant to the National Defense Authorization Act.

7.2. ICC

The International Criminal Court (ICC) entered into effect as of July 1, 2002 after sixty states ratified it.[245] The ICC is an international legal institution established by treaty for the investigation and prosecution of individuals who commit the most serious crimes of an international nature.[246] The ICC's exercise of jurisdiction is based on national legal authority, but it can exercise jurisdiction even without a state's consent, after the state has ratified the treaty.[247] Because the ICC was established by treaty, jurisdiction does not extend to nonstate parties, with the exception of the Security Council referral,[248] voluntary nonstate party referral,[249] or when a citizen of a nonstate party commits a crime within the Court's jurisdiction, on the territory of a state party, or against a state party's nationals.[250] enter into force until February 14, 1996, at which time the United States adopted the National Defense Authorization Act. National Defense Authorization Act, Pub. L. No. 104-106, § 1342, 110 Stat. 186, 486 (1996).

---

241 National Defense Authorization Act, supra note 240. See also Kenneth J. Harris & Robert Kushen, Surrender of Fugitives to the War Crimes Crimes Tribunals for Yugoslavia and Rwanda: Squaring International Legal Obligations with the U.S. Constitution, 7 Crim. L. Forum 561 (1996).

242 In re the Surrender of Ntakirutimana, 988 F. Supp. 1038, 1041 (S.D. Tex. 1997).

243 In re the Surrender of Ntakirutimana, 1998 WL 655708, *9–10 (S.D. Tex. 1998). See also Panayiota Alexandropoulos, Enforceability of Executive–Congressional Agreements in Lieu of an Article II Treaty for Purposes of Extradition: Elizaphan Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 45 Vill. L. Rev. 107 (2000).

244 Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419, 427 (5th Cir. 1999).

245 See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45. As of March 2012, 122 countries have ratified the Rome Statute. See http://www.icc-cpi.int/Menus/ASP/states+parties/. See also M.Cherif Bassiouni, 1 The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis, and Integrated Text 123 (2005) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Legislative History]; M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Court Ratification and National Implementing Legislation, 71 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal (2000); M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998).

246 Examples include Genocide (Art.6), crimes against humanity (Art. 7), and war crimes (Art. 8). See Bassiouni, Legislative History supra note 245, at 123.

247 Id. at 124–125.

248 Id. at 124, art. 13(b).

249 Id. at art. 12(3).

250 Id.

To distinguish between inter-state procedures and those involving states and international criminal tribunals, the term "surrender" is used instead of "extradition."[251] The ICC is not a substitute for national criminal justice systems, but is "complementary" to them, exercising the equivalent of a transfer of criminal proceedings.[252] Article 1 of the Rome Statute of the ICC states: "[the Court] shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions." The request for surrender is contained in Article 89:

> 1. The Court may transmit a request for the arrest and surrender of a person, together with the material supporting the request outlined in Article 91, to any State on the territory of which that person may be found and shall request the cooperation of that State in the arrest and surrender of such a person. States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part and the procedure under their national law, comply with requests for arrest and surrender.
>
> 2. Where the person sought for surrender brings a challenge before a national court on the basis of the principle of ne bis in idem as provided in Article 20, the requested State shall immediately consult with the Court to determine if there has been a relevant ruling on admissibility. If the case is admissible, the requested State shall proceed with the execution of the request. If an admissibility ruling is pending, the requested State may postpone the execution of the request for surrender of the person until the Court makes a determination on admissibility.[253]

As the ICC is complementary to national criminal justice, the Statute contains another Article that deals with competing requests of other States. Article 90 states:

> 1. A State Party which receives a request from the Court for the surrender of a person under article 89 shall, if it also receives a request from any other State for the extradition of the same person for the same conduct which forms the basis of the crime for which the Court seeks the person's surrender, notify the Court and the requesting State of that fact.
>
> 2. Where the requesting State is a State Party, the requested State shall give priority to the request from the Court if:
>
> > (a) The Court has, pursuant to article 18 or 19, made a determination that the case in respect of which surrender is sought is admissible and that determination takes into account the investigation or prosecution conducted by the requesting State in respect of its request for extradition; or
> >
> > (b) The Court makes the determination described in subparagraph (a) pursuant to the requested State's notification under paragraph 1.
>
> 3. Where a determination under paragraph 2 (a) has not been made, the requested State may, at its discretion, pending the determination of the Court under paragraph 2 (b), proceed to deal with the request for extradition from the requesting State but shall not extradite the person until the Court has determined that the case is inadmissible. The Court's determination shall be made on an expedited basis.
>
> 4. If the requesting State is a State not Party to this Statute the requested State, if it is not under an international obligation to extradite the person to the requesting State, shall give priority to the request for surrender from the Court, if the Court has determined that the case is admissible.
>
> 5. Where a case under paragraph 4 has not been determined to be admissible by the Court, the requested State may, at its discretion, proceed to deal with the request for extradition from the requesting State.
>
> 6. In cases where paragraph 4 applies except that the requested State is under an existing international obligation to extradite the person to the requesting State not Party to this Statute, the

---

251 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45.

252 Id., Articles 1, 17. See also Julian Schutte, Transfer of Criminal Proceedings: The European System, in 2 International Criminal Law 643 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999).

253 See Rome Statue of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 89.

requested State shall determine whether to surrender the person to the Court or extradite the person to the requesting State. In making its decision, the requested State shall consider all the relevant factors, including but not limited to:

(a) The respective dates of the requests;

(b) The interests of the requesting State including, where relevant, whether the crime was committed in its territory and the nationality of the victims and of the person sought; and

(c) The possibility of subsequent surrender between the Court and the requesting State.

7. Where a State Party which receives a request from the Court for the surrender of a person also receives a request from any State for the extradition of the same person for conduct other than that which constitutes the crime for which the Court seeks the person's surrender:

(a) The requested State shall, if it is not under an existing international obligation to extradite the person to the requesting State, give priority to the request from the Court;

(b) The requested State shall, if it is under an existing international obligation to extradite the person to the requesting State, determine whether to surrender the person to the Court or to extradite the person to the requesting State. In making its decision, the requested State shall consider all the relevant factors, including but not limited to those set out in paragraph 6, but shall give special consideration to the relative nature and gravity of the conduct in question.

Where pursuant to a notification under this article, the Court has determined a case to be inadmissible, and subsequently extradition to the requesting State is refused, the requested State shall notify the Court of this decision.[254]

The ICC Statute contains a series of rules governing the cooperation between the state parties and the Court. The rules, which are contained in Part 9 of the Statute, relate to the surrender of persons to the court, as well as the overall cooperation regime that governs this part of the relationship between the Court and the state parties.[255]

All state parties to the ICC have a general obligation to cooperate with the Court.[256] In addition, state parties are also required to provide procedures under their national laws for all forms of cooperation that are specified in Part 9 of the Statute.[257] The Court is able to seek cooperation from both state parties[258] and nonstate parties in certain circumstances.[259] A failure to cooperate with the court may result in the court's referral of the case to the Assembly of State Parties and/or the UN Security Council.[260]

---

254 Id. at art. 90.

255 Id. at art. 90 at Part 9.

256 Id. at art. 86. Article 86 of the Statute provides that: "States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Statute, cooperate fully with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court."

257 Id. at art. 88. See also Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 179 (noting that Articles 86 and 88 could be interpreted as being open-ended obligations, leaving no opportunity for a state party to rely on a least-effort basis by complying with the letter of the specific provisions.)

258 Forms of cooperation that the court may seek from state-parties include: assistance in identifying and locating various items, taking testimony, producing reports, questioning persons under investigation, serving documents, examining sites, temporarily transferring persons, executing searches and seizures, protecting victims and witnesses, and freezing or seizing proceeds or other property and instrumentalities of crimes. See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 93(1).

259 The ICC may request cooperation from a non–state-party on an ad hoc basis. In such circumstances, the court enters into an agreement with the non–state-party, whereby the non–state-party undertakes rights and responsibilities stemming from the agreement. See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 87(5).

260 Id. at art. 87(7).

With respect to the issue of cooperation in matters of arrest and surrender, Article 89 of the Statute authorizes the court to request the arrest and surrender of an individual from any state on the territory of which such person may be found.[261] State parties are obligated to comply with the ICC's request for arrest and surrender.[262] The Statute contains only five exceptions to the state's obligation to cooperate.[263] These are cases where:

1. A state is currently investigating or prosecuting the case,[264] unless the court determines, on the Prosecutor's motion, that the state is unable or unwilling to genuinely carry out its obligations under the treaty;[265]

2. The person sought by the court is demonstrated to have been investigated, prosecuted, and acquitted (or convicted) for conduct encompassing the Court's request;[266]

3. The UN Security Council requests a deferral of investigation or prosecution pursuant to Article 16;[267] and

4. A state denies a request for judicial assistance with regard to the disclosure of documents that may compromise its "national security interest."[268]

The fifth exception is in Article 98 of the ICC Statute. Pursuant to Article 98, the Court is required to refrain from seeking the surrender of an individual in cases where the request for surrender would conflict with international obligations involving diplomatic immunity or the property of the third state, under paragraph (1).[269] Pursuant to paragraph (2) of Article 98, the Court must also refrain from seeking the surrender of an individual from a state in cases where that individual is "sent" in some official capacity from another state to the state from which the Court is contemplating the surrender. The legislative history of the ICC indicates that the individuals protected from surrender in circumstances described in Article 98(2) are limited to those "sent" pursuant to Status of Forces Agreements (SOFA).[270]

---

261 Id. at art. 89(1).

262 Id. at art. 89(1).

263 Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 182.

264 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 17(1)(a).

265 Id. Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 182 (noting that this presupposes a showing of ineffectiveness or bad faith).

266 Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 182. This may be referred to as the ne bis in idem exception. For a discussion on ne bis in idem in the statute of the ICC, see Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 160–161.

267 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 16. See also Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 140–144 (noting that the Security Council's ability to suspend the ICC's jurisdiction is "predicated on the SC's powers under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.")

268 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at arts. 72, 93(4). See also Bassiouni, ICC Legislative History, supra note 245, at 182.

269 See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 45, at art. 98(1). Article 98 provides:

> 1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.
>
> 2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender.

270 See, e.g.,David Scheffer, Negotiator's Perspective on the International Criminal Court, 167 Mil. L. Rev. 1 (2001) (discussing the U.S. delegation's views on Article 98(2)). James Crawford SC et al., In the Matter of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and in the Matter of Bilateral Agreements Sought by

8. A Policy-Oriented Inquiry into the Values and Processes of Extradition

8.1. Public Policy Considerations

There are four categories of policy-oriented considerations that should be taken into account in extradition. They are:

1. law and public policy;
2. political factors;
3. human rights and humanitarian concerns; and
4. practical considerations.

Since WWII, the peoples of the world have become more conscious than ever of the need to ensure their collective security and to protect individual human rights. This is due in large part to the extraordinary technological advancements that have been made in communications, their effects on popular attitudes, and their ability to transform world public opinion into an instrument of compliance and sanction in the interactive processes of international relations. The Internet and the electronic media can transmit information around the globe in mere seconds, thereby transforming an event from a local issue into one of worldwide significance. The images of the globe sent from outer space and received almost instantaneously in various parts of the world are vivid reminders of the interdependence of planet Earth. After these images were first broadcast in the 1960s, it was never clearer to all of humankind that we were all part of and within the same Earth. The result was a gradual change in the world community's interaction that is still evolving our awareness of mutual interdependence. Nevertheless, conflicts between states are still rationalized in terms of sovereignty, national interests, and national security, while intervention by major world powers is limited to these powers' self-interest. Regrettably, humanitarian concerns have limited impact on the decision-making processes of most states, and thus whether such concerns are translated into specific domestic and international policies.[271]

The awareness among the peoples of the world that the individual is the ultimate bearer of the consequences of state action has brought about a reappraisal of the framework and structures of international law. Thus concepts of pluralistic democracy and enforcement of individual human rights are gradually acquiring a wider and more prominent position in the development of international values and standards[272] and their enforcement.[273] But to translate these values into a new world order strategy requires first a re-evaluation of the values underlying a world order strategy, which is still affected by the mindset of the Cold War era, particularly in the United States under Article 98(2) of the Statute: Joint Opinion, http://www.iccnow.org/documents/SandsCrawfordBIA14June03.pdf?PHPSESSID=467d1c77dbc82ba77f3ff69ba28085d7 (last visited Sept. 25, 2012); Cosmos Eubany, Justice for Some: U.S. Efforts under Article 98 to Escape the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, 27 Hastings Int'l & Conp. L. Rev. 103, 118 (2003) (stating that the term "sending state" is mostly used in SOFA agreements as "it is likely that the use of this term in Article 98(2) was a reference to a Status of Forces Agreements").

---

271 Myres S. McDougal et al., The World Constitutive Process of Authoritative Decision, 19 J. Legal Ed. 253 (1967).

272 See Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

273 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enforcing Human Rights through International Criminal Law and through an International Criminal Tribunal, in Human Rights: An Agenda for the Next Century 347 (Louis Henkin & John Lawrence Hargove eds., 1994). See also Diane F. Orentlicher, Addressing Gross Human Rights Abuses, Punishments and Victim Compensation, in Human Rights: An Agenda for the Next Century 425.

the United States.[274] To Professor Myres McDougal, whose views from over forty years ago are still relevant, a strategy of preserving world order is defined as the ability > to obtain in particular situations and in the aggregate flow of situations the outcome of a higher degree of conformity with the security goals of preservation, deterrence, restoration, rehabilitation and reconstruction (of all societies comprising the world community).[275]

A corollary to this approach, however, is the recognition that the individual is a subject and not merely an object of international law.[276] This implies that the individual has the legal capacity of being a recipient or beneficiary of rights and the subject of obligations conferred upon him or her by international law and enforceable at international, regional, and national levels with or without the intermediation of a state. Thus, modern international law should be perceived as the common law of humankind wherein the state, international organizations, nonstate actors, and individuals are deemed participants, and where the individual is given the recognition of a legal subject.[277]

Notwithstanding the qualified recognition of the individual as a subject of international law, he/she is not yet part of its legal constitutive framework. This is primarily due to the fact that the discipline has historically developed out of the need to regulate state and institutional relationships, rather than out of a need to regulate relations with individuals. However, the realization that individuals commit deeds that threaten the peace and security of humankind and that are violative of international criminal law challenges the assumption that only states are subjects of international law. Indeed, as stated by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, "crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced."[278]

The difficulty of fitting the individual into the framework of the discipline of international law, which only grudgingly gives him or her qualified recognition, has been apparent in the changing definition of international law. In fact, even the label describing the discipline is unsettled, as stated by this writer over forty years ago:

---

274 See, e.g., Granville Clark & Louis B. Sohn, World Peace through World Law (1967); Myres S. McDougal & Florentino P. Feliciano, Law and Minimum World Public Order (1961); Strategy of World Order: 1) Toward a Theory of Prevention, 2) International Law, 3) The United Nations, 4) Disarmament and Economic Development (Richard A. Falk & Saul H. Mendlovitz eds., 1966).

275 See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition in American Practice and World Public Order, 36 Tenn. L. Rev. 1, 30 (1968) ("order is the product of a system of action through the inter-reactions of pluralistic values in the perception and realization of the need for an intersocial criteria of an acceptable conduct."); Kenneth S. Carlston, World Order and International Law, 20 J. Legal Ed. 127 (1967).

276 For earlier views and debates on this issue, see Hans Kelsen, Principles of International Law (Edwin W. Tucker ed., 2d ed. 1966); Clyde Eagleton, Some Questions as to the Place of the Individual in International Law of the Future, 37 Am. J. Int'l L. 642 (1943); Philip C. Jessup, The Subjects of a Modern Law of Nations, 45 Mich. L. Rev. 383 (1947); Marek St. Korowicz, The Problem of the International Personality of Individuals, 50 Am. J. Int'l L. 533 (1956); Hersch Lauterpacht, The Subjects of the Law of Nations, 63 Law Q. Rev. 438 (1947); Edwin W. Tucker, Has the Individual Become the Subject of International Law?, 34 U. Cin. L. Rev. 341 (1965).

277 Wilfred C. Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind (1958); Philip C. Jessup, Transnational Law (1956).

278 See Robert H. Jackson, The Nürnberg Case 88 (2d. prtg. 1971) (1947); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law (2d. rev. ed., 1999); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Accountability for Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Other Serious Violations of Human Rights, in Post-Conflict Justice (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2001).

> International law, as a body of law, has changed rapidly with the increased needs of mankind to strengthen its ties in search of objectives highlighting commonality of purpose. Significantly also, the label has changed: jus gentium, droit des gens, völkerrecht, transnational law, world law and common law of mankind; and if I may be permitted the license of my own, universal inter-social public order [sic].[279]

None of these labels mean much. Only the enforceable norms of international law applied through effective procedural mechanisms have the potential to achieve the value-oriented goals described above.

The emergence of the individual in the sphere of international law has been attributed to humanistic concerns, which the late Judge Philip Jessup described as follows:

> The international society has come more slowly to recognize that what is involved is really a concern for the individual who has been the victim of barbarous treatment. In our traditional international system of interstate relationships, we were impelled to confine ourselves largely to the legal issue that the state was injured through the injury inflicted upon its citizen. But this was a procedural, not a substantive problem.[280]

This assertion is only partially correct because the recognition given the individual sprang out of the world community's desire to place international responsibility on individual conduct deemed violative of international norms.[281] It was only after international law established the basis for individual responsibility that it turned to the recognition of individual rights. Thus, between humanistic concerns and the desire to impose individual responsibility, the latter has been the more significant factor and has brought about the recognition of the individual as a subject of international law. As individuals became the subjects of international duties, they logically had to be recognized as the beneficiaries of international rights.[282] But the individual's place in international law should now be definitely recognized as intrinsic and not as only derivative of states' rights and states' conferral of rights.[283] The individual should no longer

---

279 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Islam: Concept, Law and World Habeas Corpus, 1 Rutgers-Cam. L.J. 163, 191 (1969).

280 Philip C. Jessup, The Conquering March of an Idea, Address Before the 72d Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association (Sept. 6, 1949), Dep't St. Bull., Sept. 1949 at 432–433.

281 Judge Jessup further stated, "A very large part of international affairs and, thus, of the process of international accommodation, concerns the relations between legal persons known as states. This is necessarily so. But it is no longer novel for the particular interest of the individual human being to break through the mass of interstate relationships." Id. at 434. See also Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228; Charles de Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public International Law 125 (P. E. Corbett trans., 1957); Myres S. McDougal et al., Human Rights and World Public Order (1980). The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states:

> The General Assembly proclaims the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and educating to promote respect of those rights and freedoms and by progressive measures national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

G.A. Res. 217 A (III) (Dec. 10, 1948). For the United Nations debates, see U.N. GAOR, 3d Sess., 180th meeting, 1st pt., Summary Record at 862 (Dec. 9, 1948). For a collection of human rights conventions, see http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/ (last visited Sept. 25, 2012).

282 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law: Draft International Criminal Code 1–26 (1980), revised and updated in Bassiouni, Draft Code, supra note 47. See also Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 47.

283 See, e.g., supra note 6; McDougal et al., supra note 281.

only be the third-party beneficiary of rights conferred upon him or her by states. Instead, such rights should be no different than those recognized in national constitutions.[284]

Since the end of WWII, the world has witnessed a significant increase in various forms of international and transnational criminality.[285] As a result, extradition has grown in importance as states increasingly seek to control different types and forms of international and transnational criminality.[286] Thus, not since the 1600s when piracy threatened world order has the maxim of Hugo Grotius, aut dedere aut punire,[287] been more relevant than it has been in the last twenty years.[288] Its inclusion in international criminal law conventions and in multilateral and bilateral treaties under the formulation aut dedere aut judicare[289] (the duty to prosecute or extradite) has added new dimensions to the processes of extradition. Among these is the question of whether extradition is a concurrent or alternative duty to prosecution; this remains to be settled. But, is there a civitas maxima to extradite?[290] If so, is that duty the new international legal basis for the practice of states, irrespective of treaties? The practice of extradition, however, does not yet fully bear out this interpretation even though the inter-state practice of international extradition has increased significantly in volume,[291] as has the number of extradition treaties in force.[292] These increases, however, have highlighted the sometimes cumbersome processes of extradition. As a result, the processes of extradition that guarantee individual rights have often been criticized as unnecessary obstacles.[293] Consequently, states have occasionally resorted to lawful but questionable alternative rendition devices,[294] as well as to manifestly unlawful ones.[295]

---

284 See generally, M. Cherif Bassiouni, Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice: Identifying International Procedural Protections and Equivalent Protections in National Constitutions, 3 Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L. 235 (1993) (correlating internationally recognized human rights and their counterparts in national constitutions). For an update on these rights, see Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 47.

285 See generally, 1 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law (2d ed. 1999); Bassiouni, Draft Code, supra note 47. For the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, see Commentaries on the International Law Commission's 1991 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, in 11 Nouvelles Etudes Pénales (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1993).

286 International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitives, 74 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 274–283 (1980). For information regarding "terrorism," see M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Terrorism and Political Crimes (1973); Christopher L. Blakesley, Terrorism, Drugs, International Law, and the Protection of Human Liberty: A Comparative Study of International Law, Its Nature, Role, and Impact in Matters of Terrorism, Drug Trafficking, War, and Extradition (1991); Alona E. Evans & John F. Murphy, Legal Aspects of Control of International Terrorism (1978); Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Effective National and International Action against Organized Crime and Terrorist Criminal Activities, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 9 (1990).

287 Grotius, supra note 13, at bk. II, ch. 21, §§ 4(1), 5(3).

288 See, e.g., European Convention of the Suppression of Terrorism, Jan. 27, 1977, Europ. T.S. No. 90.

289 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6; Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 47; Costello, supra note 48; Wise, supra note 51. See supra Sec. 3.

290 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6; Costello, supra note 48; Wise, supra note 51. See also Christine Van Den Wijngaert, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition 8 (1980).

291 Though there are no officially published figures, the United States usually makes and receives an average of some 300 extradition cases every year.

292 It is estimated that there are over 1000 extradition treaties in effect throughout the world.

293 See International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitives, supra note 286.

294 See Ch. IV.

295 See Ch. V.

Contemporary mechanisms of international cooperation polarize the interests at stake, namely whether to further international cooperation in the prevention and control of international and transnational criminality, or to protect individual human rights and preserve a lawful process in international relations.[296] This polarization underscores the need to re-identify and reappraise the different interests and values involved in the processes of extradition in light of the contemporary framework of extradition and the need for improved inter-state cooperation in penal matters.

This framework depends on the perceived goals and values of the world community during a given period of history. Extradition, however, is still regarded (with some variations in application but not in substance) as an institutional practice between and for the benefit of states, with little or no regard for the rights of individuals, who are still deemed in many legal systems as the objects of its outcome—a position that has been expressed in international extradition by both Andre Billot and John Bassett Moore in the late 1800s, but which still pervades the practice. Additionally, extradition is still not viewed as a process serving the overall interests of the world community. That failing is a consequence of the diverse political interest of states and the absence of commonly shared interests and values in enforcing international criminal law as well as certain violations of national criminal laws.

The individual who is the subject of extradition proceedings is still regrettably viewed as the object of the proceedings and not as one of the parties contemplated within the framework of extradition. With a few exceptions, defenses that exist under extradition law are not fully recognized as primarily designed for the benefit of the individual. Instead, they are viewed as and designed to inure to the benefit of the states involved.[297] Although it is certainly arguable that the individual is the beneficiary of certain protections, such as the "political offense exception"[298] and the "principle of specialty,"[299] the fact that such claims may not be raised by the relator without protest from the requested state,[300] or that they may be limited to the right to raise the issue and not to a particular objective outcome, is indicative of the real center of interest, namely the requested state.[301] Furthermore, the requesting state has the right to accept or reject the relator's contention that the alleged conduct falls within the scope of the "exception" or limitation, and does so in accordance with its own self-serving standards and political interests.[302]

To further emphasize the inter-state nature of the concept of extradition, nowhere in extradition law and practice can the individual—the subject of the proceedings—compel the requesting or requested state to adhere to internationally recognized principles and customary practices of extradition law, or even to adhere to specific treaty provisions if either state wishes not to apply them or wants to circumvent them in accordance with the state's national laws and practice.[303] Many states, in fact, deny that extradition is a subject-matter falling within customary international law, and therefore argue that no international obligations exist other than those specific duties created by treaty or accepted through reciprocal practice between states. Even then, these duties are interpreted in accordance with the judicial or political standards of the states involved.[304] As of yet, international extradition law confers few direct rights upon

---

296 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Policy Considerations on Inter-State Cooperation in Criminal Matters, in Principles and Procedures for New Transnational Criminal Law (Albin Eser & Otto Lagodny eds., 1992), reprinted in 1992 Pace Y.B. Int'l L. 123.

297 See Ch. V, Sec. 5.

298 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

299 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

300 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

301 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 1.

302 Id.

303 Id.

304 See Ch. II.

the individual that the individual can claim and enforce against either of the respective states involved. Even specific violations of rights recognized by the signatory states to the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[305] or the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights[306] do not result in the invalidation of improper unlawful state action, but only in the award of damages, a very poor substitute indeed for the specific performance by a state of an internationally recognized right.

The individual is therefore dependent upon the good faith and benevolence of states, because the application and enforcement of individual rights is still considered by many states a matter of municipal law, even though it might involve internationally protected human rights. This problem arises from the fact that the individual is still not yet recognized as a full-fledged subject of international law and still has few practical means for the implementation of internationally declared human rights and international redress of wrongs against an offending state.[307] State sovereignty remains the barrier that some governments use to prevent the effective enforcement of human rights. But also the absence of effective international machinery for the enforcement of internationally protected human rights reduces the opportunities for giving tangible effect to such rights and thus reduces the opportunity for their advancement.

The failure of a given state to abide by its extradition treaty obligations does not yet fully create a right under international law that the individual can raise against that state in opposition to extradition, other than when the municipal laws of the requested or requesting state allow him or her such a right under their respective laws.[308] The mutual or consensual failure by the respective states engaged in the extradition process to abide by a treaty obligation designed to inure to the relator's benefit is not yet fully recognized as constitutive of a breach of international law, as the individual—although bearing consequences of the breach—is not a party to the treaty creating the obligation or establishing the right in question; only the state that can claim the breach is in the position of seeking remedy. However, if the breach is of an internationally protected right, or the result of lack of fairness or good faith by the parties in the application of rights stipulated in favor of third parties, or conceded to individuals as third-party beneficiaries under the particular treaty, then there is a violation of international law.[309] What remains to be articulated are the effective means of enforcement of such obligations in a way that provides effective remedies and not merely the award of damages.

---

305 See European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, Europ. T.S. No. 5 [hereinafter European Convention]; Protocol No. 1 to the European Convention, Mar. 20, 1952, 213 U.N.T.S. 262; Protocol No. 2 to the European Convention, May 6, 1963, Europ. T.S. No. 44; Protocol No. 3 to the European Convention (Amendment), May 6, 1963, Europ. T.S. No. 45; Protocol No. 4 to the European Convention, Sept. 16, 1963, Europ. T.S. No. 46, 7 I.L.M. 978 (1986); Protocol No. 5 to the European Convention (Amendment), Jan. 20, 1966, Europ. T.S. No. 55; 6 I.L.M. 27 (1967); Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention, Apr. 28, 1983, Europ. T.S. No. 114, 22 I.L.M. 538; Protocol No. 7 to the European Convention, Nov. 22, 1984, Europ. T.S. No. 117, 24 I.L.M 435; Protocol No. 8 to the European Convention (Amendment), Mar. 19, 1985, Europ. T.S. No. 118, 25 I.L.M. 387; Protocol No. 9 to the European Convention, Nov. 6, 1990, Europ. T.S. No. 140, 30 I.L.M. 693; Protocol No. 10 to the European Convention, Mar. 25, 1992, Europ. T.S. No. 146.

306 See American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (Jan. 7, 1970); Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social & Cultural Rights, Nov. 17, 1988, O.A.S. Official Records, T.S. No. 69; Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty, June 8, 1990, O.A.S. Official Records, T.S. No. 73.

307 Except for awards of damages under the European Convention, supra note 288, or the American Convention on Human Rights, supra note 306.

308 See Ch. II, and Ch. V, Sec. 7.

309 For state responsibility, see Ch. V, Sec. 7.

Treaty rights created by states, which contain a stipulation for the benefit of the individual, are, to that extent, rights running in favor of a third party, even though the individual as the purported beneficiary is neither a party to the treaty nor yet a fully recognized subject of international law. A claim can be asserted that a state's failure to grant a relator those rights created for his or her benefit by a treaty, or by "general principles of international law,"[310] calls into question state responsibility.[311] Though rights conferred upon or granted to the individual in extradition treaties may be subject to waiver by the requested state, no state can waive internationally recognized fundamental human rights,[312] nor can a state evade the customary international laws of state responsibility for unlawful conduct that emerges from a breach of an international legal obligation.[313]

A basic policy consideration that must first be examined is what justifies extradition as an institution. Is it a civitas maxima, whereby states have mutual complementary duties to combat international and transnational forms of criminality on the grounds that world order rests in part on a level of international and national order? Or is it based exclusively on principles of voluntary cooperation? International law has not yet given a definitive answer, though there is a clear trend toward the first of the two propositions;[314] this writer suggests adherence to the first assumption.[315]

8.2. Law and Public Policy Considerations

Law and public policy considerations are based on constitutional and other national laws that warrant, limit, or qualify the conduct of governmental authorities acting under the color of law in seizing a person and evidence and delivering him or her to another government's representatives. This also involves internationally protected human rights.

The means by which extradition is accomplished affects only the actual processes of obtaining persons, not the substantive nature of extradition. In this regard, the differences between states with common law and the civil law systems are quite telling.[316] Some law and policy considerations in common law states are so outcome determinative of the process that they rise to a level of a substantive limitation.[317]

The first question of law and public policy arises with respect to the relationship between the requested state vis-à-vis the requesting state. The position of the states concerned depends on the legal basis of extradition, that is, whether in the particular case extradition is based: (1) on a treaty, (2) on reciprocity, or (3) on comity. The choice among these bases stems from the original choice of two hypotheses to justify the practice, namely civitas maxima or mutual cooperation between states. It is clear that if a state conceives of the practice as a duty of mutual cooperation and assistance in penal matters, it will grant extradition with fewer formalities 310 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Functional Approach to "General Principles of International Law," 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 768 (1990); Wolfgang Friedmann, The Uses of "General Principles" in the Development of International Law, 57 Am. J. Int'l L. 279 (1963).

---

311 See Draft Articles on State Responsibility, in The Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its 46th Session, 2 May-23 July, U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 10) at 223, U.N. Doc. A/49/10 (1994).

312 See Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

313 Id.

314 See supra note 20. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order: A Conceptual Evaluation, in Aktuelle Probleme des Internationale Strafrecht 10–15 (Paul Gunter-Potz & Dietrich Oehler eds., 1971); Wise, supra note 13.

315 Bassiouni, Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

316 See Ch. IX, Sec. I.

317 See Ch. IX.

than if the state deems extradition a matter of self-serving interest. In the latter case, it may insist on more technical formalities interpreted and applied to best serve the state's interests.[318]

A second set of considerations arises when a state accepts a request for extradition. Law and policy concerns that affect the process at this point in the extradition process include: (1) the choice of jurisdictional theory;[319] (2) requirements of extraditable offenses, interpreted either in concreto or in abstracto;[320] (3) limitations on the extraditability of certain types of offenses such as political, fiscal, economic, and military offenses (which stem more often from policy rather than humane considerations, even if an element of the latter is implicit in the formulation of the policy);[321] and (4) protection of the rights of the relator, which includes inquiry into how jurisdiction was obtained,[322] the sufficiency of the charge and the evidence presented,[323] and the defenses available to refute the charges or oppose the grant of extradition.[324] The need for a new legal order to enhance peace, security, and human rights under the rule of law should be one of the priorities in this age of globalization.[325]

8.3. Political Considerations

Political considerations have no direct relationship to the practice of extradition or its rationale, but derive from purely political factors and national political determinations, though at times they also reflect concern for individual human rights. They are nevertheless based on a value-oriented judgment frequently grounded in subjective and self-serving political interests. Thus, whether to grant or deny extradition for a real or alleged "political offense exception" depends more on the political relations of the respective states than on objective criteria relating to the offense or the offender.[326] The integrity of the practice is thus affected when, for the political and practical convenience of the interested states, forms of disguised extradition[327] and abduction[328] take place. A distinction must therefore be made between those law and policy concerns considered valid on the basis of objective value-oriented goals and purely national political considerations.

8.4. Individual Human Rights and Humane Considerations

Individual human rights considerations include the manner in which an individual is brought before the jurisdiction of the court and the manner in which evidence is seized and used against the relator.[329] It also refers to the treatment that may await the relator in the requesting state, which in part runs contrary to the "rule of non-inquiry."[330] Human rights considerations

---

318 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Political Offense Exception Revisited: Extradition between the U.S. and U.K.—A Choice between Friendly Cooperation among Allies and Sound Law and Policy, 16 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (1987); Christopher L. Blakesley, The Evisceration of the Political Offense Exception to Extradition, 15 Denv. J. Int'l Pol'y 109 (1986).

319 See Ch. VI.

320 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

321 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 1.

322 See Ch. V.

323 See Ch. X, Sec. 5.2.

324 See Ch. IX, Sec. 5.

325 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Perennial Conflict between International Criminal Justice and Realpolitik, 22 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 541 (2006).

326 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

327 See Ch. IV.

328 See Ch. V.

329 Id. See also Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

330 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

should allow inquiry into the criminal processes of the state wherein the relator is alleged to have committed a violation and where he/she is expected to be prosecuted or punished.[331] Because of the lack of international consensus as to what constitutes internationally mandated norms and standards of due process and fairness, the requested state will set itself up as a judge or evaluator of another state's legal or judicial processes.[332] Typically, however, the requested state will balance the relator's rights to fairness against the interests of the requesting state in prosecuting or punishing him or her, which invariably involves political considerations and considerations of law and policy.[333] The converse, however, may also occur, and the requested state may not inquire into the anticipated treatment of the relator upon his or her return because of its rigid conception of state sovereignty or because it suits its political interests to honor the request. Some individual human rights are discretionary, but fundamental human rights are not.[334]

8.5. Practical Considerations

Procedures for requesting, granting, and carrying out extradition are some of the practical concerns associated with extradition. The realization that the process is cumbersome, costly, and lengthy raises questions with decision-makers as to the proper balance between such

331 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

332 Admittedly, there exist international norms and standards of due process and fairness, which arise from international as well as regional human rights treaties. They include: European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, art. 3, Nov. 4, 1950, 312 E.T.S. 5; American Convention on Human Rights, art. 5, Nov. 22, 1969, reprinted in 9 I.L.M. 673 (1970); African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, art. 5, June 27, 1981, OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, reprinted in 21 I.L.M. 58 (1982) ; Arab Charter of Human Rights, art. 8, May 22, 2004, reprinted in 12 Int'l Hum. Rts. Rep. 893 (2005). See Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228; Stefan Trechsel, Human Rights in Criminal Proceedings (2006).

333 An example of this is the hesitance of certain countries to extradite individuals to Rwanda on fair trial grounds and human rights grounds, absent certain movement toward reform of the areas of deficiency in the Rwandan legal system. See generally, Philip Mayer, Rwanda and Burundi to Sign Extradition Treaty, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 14–15 (Jan. 2010); Bruce Zagaris, Switzerland Denies Rwandan Extradition Request of Former Minister on Genocide Charges, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 364–365 (2009); Bruce Zagaris, Swedish Supreme Court Finds Extraditable to Rwanda Genocide and Crimes against Humanity Suspect as Rwanda House Approves Law to Impose Solitary on Killers, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 317 (2009); Bruce Zagaris, Finland Denies Extradition to Rwanda of Genocide Suspect, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 142 (2009); Bruce Zagaris, German Arrest and Extradition of Rwandan Chief Protocol Officer to France Produces Diplomatic Tensions with Rwanda, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 1–2 (2009); Bruce Zagaris, French Court Grants Extradition Request of Rwanda for Genocide Suspect, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 271 (2008) ("A controversial issue in France with respect to its response to Rwandan extradition requests has been and continues to be a concern for due process and human rights in Rwanda."); Bruce Zagaris, Uganda Agrees to Sign Extradition Treaty with Rwanda, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 212–213 (2007); Bruce Zagaris, Rwandan Military Court Convicts Priest of Genocide in Absentia, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 20–21 (2007) (French refusal to extradite the individual tried in absentia). Health concerns have also been raised on behalf of relators as a human rights consideration. See Bruce Zagaris, English High Court Upholds Hacker's Extradition to the U.S., 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 133–134 (2007); Bruce Zagaris, Indian Magistrate Issues Arrest Warrant for Former Union Carbide Head, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 405–406 (2009); Bruce Zagaris, France Extradites Former Bank Head to Austria, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 403–405 (2009); The European Court of Human Rights suspended the extradition of a former Croatian general, Vladmir Zagorec, to Croatia pending resolution of the relator's claim of persecution, which raised concerns under Article 3 of the European Human Rights Charter. See Bruce Zagaris, European Human Rights Court Halts Extradition of Croatian General, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 3 (2008).

334 See Bassiouni Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

procedures. Usually, this results in a reduction in the requirements and formalities required to extradite an individual, and diminishes the procedural rights and protections afforded the individual.

As international, transnational, and national criminality increases, and as the mobility of accused or convicted offenders of national crimes increases, the need for more effective extradition procedures becomes more acute. The danger, however, is that governments and law-enforcement agencies increase informal cooperation at the risk of violating treaty obligations and the human rights of individuals. Thus, informal processes may overtake formal ones to the detriment of the integrity of legal processes. In other words, as the volume of cases increases while resources for international criminal law enforcement remains static, and offenders are more able to evade the process, it is likely that the rules of extradition will be strained and even broken; a prominent example of this is the increased use of "extraordinary rendition" by the United States in the decade following the attacks of September 2001.[335] Formalities and procedural safeguards will give way to the increasing needs of law enforcement and prosecution, particularly in the face of limited resources to act more in concert with legal obligations and professional standards.

9. A Proposed Conceptual Framework in Light of Existing State Practice

As discussed throughout this book, extradition may at times be a cumbersome process. With the increase in international, transnational, and national criminality, the volume of extradition cases has increased significantly in a number of countries. But the staff in the ministries of justice and foreign affairs who handle these cases has not increased commensurately. Resources are also limited. Judges and prosecutors who are experts in extradition are also limited in number. All of these factors, along with the mobility of accused offenders, reduce the effectiveness of the process. Thus, law enforcement and prosecution officials are tempted to seek alternative means, sometimes legal, such as the use of immigration,[336] and sometimes illegal, such as abductions.[337] Concomitantly, there are more multilateral and bilateral extradition conventions establishing the duty to extradite, thus increasing the burdens and pressures on already overburdened, understaffed, and underfunded national systems. This situation also tends to create a disparity in the practice, in that those who can afford expert counsel benefit from greater opportunities to oppose extradition whereas those who cannot frequently end up with less defense than that which might be available under treaties and national laws. Interestingly, however, the existence of international and regional norms and standards on the protection of human rights[338] has only slightly affected the practice of extradition. This is essentially due to the fact that extradition is deemed a sovereign act, its legal proceedings are deemed sui generis, and its purpose is not to adjudicate guilt or innocence but to determine whether a person should properly stand trial where accused or be returned to serve a sentence properly imposed by another state.[339]

The balance between states' needs to cooperate in penal matters and to provide a fair judicial review process does not mean that extradition should be cumbersome, lengthy, and ineffective. The best way to ensure that extradition runs smoothly, expeditiously, and effectively is to have

335 See supra Sec. 3.1 and Ch. 2, Sec. 6.2.

336 See Ch. IV.

337 See Ch. V.

338 See generally, Bassiouni Compendium, supra note 228.

339 The Constitutional Court of South Africa has cited this principle. See Geuking v. President of the Republic of South Africa and others, 2002 (1) SA 204 35 (CC) (S. Afr.).

clear and detailed national laws, and to train knowledgeable judges and prosecutors who will apply the law fairly and impartially.[340]

This writer's proposed conceptual framework for extradition is premised on five interlocking factors:

(a) the recognition of the national interests of the states who are parties to the extradition proceedings;

(b) the existence of an international duty to maintain world order;

(c) the effective application of minimum standards of fairness and justice to the relator in the extradition process;

(d) a collective duty on the part of all states to combat all forms of criminality, but more particularly international and transnational criminality; and

(e) the balancing of these factors within the juridical framework of the Rule of Law.

The relationship of these five factors is founded on the following propositions:

(a) The existence of a duty to maintain world order does not deny national sovereignty because the interests of the world community can be considered to be within the scope of the national interests;

(b) The enforcement of individual rights in extradition proceedings is not only a matter of humanitarian concern, but also a matter of recognizing that the individual is a party at interest vis-à-vis the respective states and the world community. Such recognition does not detract from state sovereignty because the individual is personally accountable before the world community for his or her violations of international law;

(c) Mutual cooperation and assistance in penal matters between states reinforces the effectiveness of the national public order of all states and does not have to depend for its effectiveness on political compromises or denial of individual rights; and

(d) Adherence to the Rule of Law based on standards of international due process that uphold the integrity of the international and national legal processes is needed to lend legitimacy and credibility to the process of extradition and international justice. It consequently makes acceptance of its results more likely and thus greatly diminishes opportunities for conflict over decisional outcomes.

In our contemporary, politically factionalized world, it would be naive to believe that the five factors will be measured equally during this balancing; some will undoubtedly carry more weight than others. The first of these factors, the nationally perceived interest of states, will remain the foremost consideration. The second factor, the duty to combat criminality, will be largely shaped by considerations ancillary to the first and, therefore will have a lesser impact in the course of the authoritative decision-making process leading to the granting or denial of extradition. The third, concern for the individual, will remain the least weighty factor in the overall balancing of the interests and policies involved, in particular when weighed against the value-oriented goals of institutional authoritative decision-making processes. The fourth, concern for the preservation of world order, is likely to be regarded as part of nationally perceived interests and not as an independent international consideration. Finally, as to the Rule of Law and international due process, it is likely to be treated more frequently in a perfunctory manner by adherence to certain forms and formalities with little regard for its substance whenever state interests are at stake.

---

340 For a criticism of the current extradition practices and an argument that the International Court of Justice may be utilized to adjudicate state transnational and international crimes where the offender of state law has fled the borders of that state, see Barbara M. Yarnold, International Fugitives: A New Role for the International Court of Justice (1991).

The solution for a better, more effective process of extradition is the formulation of internationally recognized principles embodied in a universal convention on extradition in the spirit of the following resolution, introduced by this writer at the 1968 Freiburg Preparatory Colloquium on Extradition to the Tenth International Congress on Penal Law,[341] and embodied in a similar resolution adopted by the 1969 International Penal Law Pre-Congress of Siracusa.[342] It states:

> It appears hopeful to substitute to the strictly national concepts of criminality and to the intransigent consequences of national sovereignty an international concept of forms of criminality which (by their very nature) endanger fundamental human and social values and for the preservation of which a closer cooperation between the states is indispensable.
>
> Consequently and in conformity with the contemporary trend to attribute to the individual the quality of subject of International Law, it is suitable to recognize that the individual who is the subject of an extradition procedure may uphold before national and international jurisdictions the prerogatives recognized to him by the international treaties, including of course those referencing human rights.
>
> To this effect and with a view to foresee a general international convention, it might be useful that there be organized regional or international jurisdictions capable of hearing individual recourses directed against the decisions of national authorities rendered in violation of the aforementioned individual rights.
>
> These jurisdictions could also be seized with a procedure inspired by habeas corpus which would permit and give a more effective and practical remedy for the establishment of the Rule of Law on a worldwide basis.[343]

Thus, the world community would advance its goals of collective security within the framework of a lawful process, guaranteeing individual human rights, while simultaneously preserving national order and enhancing international cooperation in penal matters.

This appeal, which this writer made in 1968, is still valid today. But then, the same ideas were advanced by Emerich de Vattel in the 1870s and by others since. Some progress, however, has been made. It needs to be made more uniform in its application. The effectiveness of any legal process depends first on its perceived legitimacy, but also on its fair and uniform application. We learned this lesson early in the history of law, but we still have to apply it to international justice processes such as extradition. The words of Aristotle were not utopian when he spoke of laws as being "the right reason," and of its equal application "in Athens and Rome." The ideal approach to extradition is to see it applied uniformly and fairly whether the case arises in Chicago or Cairo. Whether that level of uniformity and fairness will ever be achieved is doubtful, but at least concerned jurists should always be diligent in ensuring the integrity of the process and fairness to the individuals involved.

To achieve that result, however, states must also recognize the existence of a civitas maxima, aut dedere aut judicare.[344] Prosecution or extradition should be recognized as a duty for international and transnational crimes—a duty that is predicated on effective and fair prosecution, whether in the requested or requesting state.

---

341 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 829 (1968).

342 Association International de Droit Pénal, Actes du Pre-Congres International de Siracusa 855 (1969).

343 Id.

344 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 6.

Chapter II

Legal Bases for Extradition in the United States

Contents

1. Historical Background[1]

The practice of international extradition in the United States is neither the product of sound legislative policy nor the outgrowth of judicious doctrinal thinking. Instead, it is the outcome of circumstances and events that brought certain legal issues before U.S. courts, and which in turn generated legislative responses that are not particularly in keeping with contemporary needs.

Between 1799 and 1853, three major cases confronted federal district courts and the Supreme Court of the United States,[2] several presidents, and Congress. They are: In re Robbins,[3] In re Metzger[4] and In re Kaine.[5] The first of these cases, the most controversial of the three, involved the administration of President John Adams. John Marshall, later chief justice of the Supreme Court, was a member of Congress at the time of the Robbins controversy.

For the young nation that was the United States of America, having only recently fought for its independence, testing the limits of the executive branch's powers in foreign affairs presented major constitutional and political questions.[6] At the heart of that debate, with respect to extradition, was the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers, which still surfaces in many contemporary cases, particularly those involving the political offense exception[7] and the rule of non-inquiry.[8] The young nation was jealous of its newly acquired rule of law and the independence of its judiciary, and the question of whether the federal executive branch could decide on surrendering to a foreign power a person within the United States, particularly a U.S. citizen, without a judicial determination was highly questionable. Underlying that constitutional debate were the politics of federalism, and the ever-suspicious public concern with the expansion of federal executive powers.[9] A little over 200 years later, the reverse occurred. Congress largely gave the president powers that were used to override the Constitution with respect to

---

1 This section is based in part and with modifications on an article from an article by the author, Reforming International Extradition: Lessons of the Past for a Radical New Approach, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 389. Reprinted with permission of the Loyola of Los Angeles International & Comparative Law Review.

2 For an insightful scholarly review of these cases and the legal issues they presented, see John Parry, The Lost History of International Extradition Litigation, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 93 (2002) and Ruth Wedgewood, The Revolutionary Martyrdom of Jonathan Robbins, 100 Yale L.J. 229 (1990). For a history of U.S. extradition law and practice, see John Bassett Moore, 2 A Treatise on Extradition and Inter-State Rendition (2 vols. 1891) [hereinafter Moore, Extradition] and Samuel T. Spear, The Law of Extradition, International and Inter-State (3d ed. 1885). For a contemporary perspective on extradition history, see Ethan A. Nadelmann, The Evolution of U.S. Involvement in the International Rendition of Fugitive Criminals, 25 N.Y.U.J. Int'l L. & Pol. 813 (1993).

3 27 F.Cas. 825 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16, 175).

4 17 F.Cas. 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847) (No. 9.511), 46 U.S. (5 How.) 176 (1847). France requested the extradition of Metzger, a decision that Judge Betts made in chambers, without a public hearing. This provoked a public debate over such a procedure that violated the sense of fairness in the due process of law.

5 55 U.S. (14 How.) 103 (1852).

6 See, e.g., Bland Randall Walton, The Black Robe and the Bald Eagle: The Supreme,Court and the Foreign Policy of the U.S., 1789–1953 (1996).

7 See Ch. VIII Sec. 2.1.

8 Id.

9 See, e.g., Isaac Kramnick, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton and John Jay: The Federalist Papers (1987); The Federalists (Benjamin Fletcher ed., 1961); The Debate on the Constitution, Federalist and Anti-Federalist, Speeches, Articles and Letters during the Struggle over Ratification (1993). See also T.M. Cooley, Constitutional History of the U.S. (1889); Andrew McLaughlin, A Constitutional History of the U.S. (1935). It should be noted that President Adams was a federalist. See David McCullough, John Adams (2001); John R. Howe Jr., arbitrary arrests and detention, interrogations, torture, and the use of military commissions to bypass federal courts and ignore well-established due process guarantees.[10]

The context, in 1799, was laden with the emotionally charged undercurrent of America's suspicion of foreign governments, and the facts of the Robbins case were particularly gripping.[11] The fate of a U.S. citizen was at stake, one who was seeking the protection of his country from America's former colonial ruler, England, who unlawfully seized and impressed him on a British ship. The United States was, after all, a country established in the name of freedom and to which people from all over the world, particularly the oppressed, were welcomed. To turn them back to their oppressors was something that rubbed raw American public sensitivities. The continuation of all of these issues and the legislative and jurisprudential void on the subject of extradition made the situation particularly difficult to address by the new nation's executive and judicial branches.

England's request for Robbins was based on Jay's Treaty of 1794, which provided for extradition with England. It was the first international treaty entered into by the United States containing a specific provision on extradition.[12] Jay's Treaty was preceded, however, by the 1788 consular convention with France, which was the basis for extradition between the two countries.[13] Both treaties received the Senate's "advice and consent," but national implementing legislation was only enacted with respect to the 1788 French Treaty.[14] It gave the task of determining extradition, as of 1792 when the national implementing legislation was passed, to "District Judges of the U.S."[15] Thus the judiciary was empowered to determine whether to issue a warrant of surrender based on what was most natural for U.S. courts to rely upon, namely the standard of "probable cause" that was contained in the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, adopted in 1791.

The Changing Political Thought of John Adams (1966). He was succeeded by President Thomas Jefferson, who was not. See The writings of Thomas Jefferson (Andrew A. Lipscomb ed., 1903). See also David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period: 1789–1801 (1907).

10 1–2 International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents 1972–2001 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2002); International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents and Regional Conventions, 1970–2000 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2002); 1 International Terrorism: Multilateral Conventions 1937–2001 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2002); M. Cherif Bassiouni, "Terrorism": Reflections on Legitimacy and Policy Considerations, in Values and Violence: Intangible Acts of Terrorism (Wayne McCormack ed., 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Assessing "Terrorism" into the New Millennium, 12 DePaul Bus. L.J. 1 (2000); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Controls of International Terrorism: A Policy-Oriented Perspective, 43 Harv. Int'l. L.J. 83 (2002), U.S.A. PATRIOT Act (U.S. H.R. 3162, 107–156), Title VIII; National Defense Authorization Act of 2012, H.R. 1540.

11 27 F. Cas. 825 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175).

12 The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation with Great Britain (Jay's Treaty), Nov. 19, 1794, [1795] 8 Stat. 116, T.S. No. 105, reprinted in 1 William M. Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols and Agreements between the U.S. of America and Other Powers, 1776–1909, at 590 (1910). See also Samuel F. Bemis, Jay's Treaty: A Study in Commerce and Diplomacy (2d ed. 1965) [hereinafter Bemis, Jay's Treaty]. For a discussion of the treaty and its effect on American extradition, see 1 Moore Extradition, supra note 2, at 90.

13 Convention Between His Most Christian Majesty of France and the U.S. of America, with the Purpose of Defining and Establishing the Functions and Privileges of Their Respective Consuls and Vice-Consuls, November 14, 1788, 8 Stat. 106, T.S.84. For a contemporary perspective, see Christopher L. Blakesley, Extradition between France and the U.S.: An Exercise in Comparative and International Law, 13 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 653 (1980).

14 An Act Concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, 1 Stat. 254 § 1 (1792).

15 Id.

This was also a time when one of the United States' most important legislative acts had been adopted, the Judiciary Act of 1789.[16] It vested the powers of the Constitution's Article III in the "Justices of the Supreme" as well as "Justices of the District Court," who had the power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of any commitment or deprivation of liberty. Extradition was a commitment resulting in the deprivation of liberty, and thus should have naturally fallen within the meaning of Article III. But that was not so clear then; nor is it now.[17]

At that time, as now, parallel legal tracks dealt with the same subject and were unconnected, even though each implicated the Constitution, treaties, national legislation, and judicial interpretation of all of the above. The constitutional questions presented were: separation of powers, the power of the federal executive branch in matters of foreign affairs, the consequences of the treaty-making powers of the executive, the overlapping congressional power to pass national legislation to implement treaties, federal legislation on the jurisdiction and the powers of the federal judiciary in light of Article III, and the limits of judicial prerogatives in hearing and interpreting of these questions. In time, these issues became more complex as the United States became a state-party to multilateral treaties on international criminal law (ICL), containing extradition provisions[18] and other multilateral treaties on topics such as the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.[19] In addition, what used to be deemed a "treaty" at the time has since been enlarged to include inchoate executive agreements entered into by the president without the Senate's "advice and consent."[20]

At the time, these sources of law had some connection to international extradition, but none were explicitly applicable to that subject, and at best dealt with extradition only peripherally or partially. The exceptions are specific treaties, legislation, and judicial decisions.[21]

---

16 See, e.g., Origins of the Federal Judiciary: Essays on the Judiciary Act of 1789 (Maeva Marcus ed., 1992). See also Paul M. Bater, The Constitution as Architecture: Legislative and Administrative Courts under Article III, 65 Ind. L.J. 233 (1990). The debate over the constitutional status of extradition hearings, and whether it is within or outside Article III courts is persistent. See Kulekowski v. DiLenardi, 947 F. Supp. 741 (N.D. Ill. 1996), rev'd sub nom. DeSilva v. DiLenardi¸ 125 F.3d 1110 (7th Cir. 1997); LoBue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995), vacated on juris. grounds, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). In contrast, see Carreno v. Johnson, 899 F. Supp. 624 (S.D. Fla. 1995) (discussing the original ministerial role of the secretary of state prior to 1871); In re Suttan, 905 F. Supp. 631 (E.D. Mo. 1995), and Werner v. Hickey, 920 F. Supp. 1257 (M.D. Fla. 1996). These cases go so far as to deny the executive branch the "executive discretion," a proposition fully accepted by various circuit court and district court opinions.

17 To date, review of extradition hearing orders are by means of habeas corpus. See in particular Matter of Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d. Cir. 1981) where the government argued for a right of appeal and Judge Friendly went back to In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas. 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847) (No. 9, 511) and In re Kaine, 55 U.S. 103 (1852); Mackin, 668 F.2d at 125–130. For a review of early habeas corpus cases and doctrine, see William S. Church, A Treatise on the Writ of Habeas Corpus (1886). For relevant decisions during that period, see In re Kaine, 55 U.S. 103 (1852), Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (3 vol.) 2 (1867), and Ex parte Clarke, 100 U.S. 399 (1879).

18 See Appendix I.

19 Id.

20 See Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25 (1982).

21 But among the latter, treaties and judicial decisions pertaining to them were limited to the provisions of that treaty, and thus not extendable to other treaties and cases interpreting them. These legal sources and the legal issues arising from extradition practice have overlapped to create a confused and uncertain body of law. For example, the 1788 Consular Convention with France, which dealt with the surrender of fugitives, specifically provided for a hearing, but a certain ambivalence or uncertainty was evident in the choice of words so that such a hearing before "the courts, judges and officers competent" of the requested state. The statute implementing that Treaty specified that the hearing would be before "the District Judges of the U.S." One can

Jay's Treaty of 1794[22] required a hearing and also reflected the executive's uncertainty as to whether that hearing was to be a judicial adjudication. But Congress did not, as it did with respect to the French Treaty of 1788,[23] provide national implementing legislation for the 1794 Treaty with England.[24] However, Article 27 of the 1794 Treaty required the parties to:

> [D]eliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the country's of the other, provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality, and, according to the laws of the place, where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed.[25]

Although it is clear that this provision analogized the hearing to that of a "commitment for trial" as contemplated by the 1788 French treaty[26] and the implementing legislation,[27] it was still deemed an open issue. Instead, it should have been treated by analogy to any other "commitment for trial" under U.S. law. Consequently, there should have been no doubt that the hearing was to be a "probable cause" judicial hearing, even though the Fourth Amendment that refers to this standard was adopted only in 1791 along with the rest of the first ten amendments to the U.S. constitution.

Curiously enough, the debate still exists in contemporary practice as to whether the judicial hearing required by Section 3184,[28] which refers to "probable cause," is a reflection of the Fourth Amendment or whether it is purely a statutory requirement that can therefore be statutorily abrogated.[29]

The ambiguity, which could have been easily resolved on the basis of reasoned logic and analogy, soon became the basis of a national controversy in which politics and the then-vibrant American sense of fairness aroused public passion.[30] The case involved one Thomas Nash, alias only speculate that those who represented the United States in negotiating the Convention with France were uncertain as to the proper extraditing authority, since the statute referred to "judges and competent officers." The former are part of the judiciary and the latter are members of the exeecutive branch. Assuming that those representing the executive branch at these negotiations were unsure as to whether the power to surrender was an executive or judicial one, Congress had no doubt that such power vested in the judiciary as evidenced by the national implementing legislation of this Treaty. The executive branch's uncertainty however was reflected in the Attorney-General's petition for a writ of mandamus to compel New York federal district judge John Lawrence to issue a warrant for the surrender of a French captain, sought by France pursuant to the 1788 Consular Convention, who had abandoned his ship in New York. The Supreme Court in United States v. Lawrence confirmed the judicial nature of the hearing and denied the petition for a writ of mandamus on the grounds that this was not a remedy available to the executive for a case within the jurisdiction of a federal district court judge.

---

22 Jay's Treaty, supra note 12.

23 Convention Between France & the United States, supra note 13.

24 Id.

25 Id.

26 Id.

27 An Act Concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, supra note 14.

28 The judicial hearing controversy was resolved with the adoption of the 1848 Act, Ch. 167 §5, 9 Stat. 302. But the debate about whether the Fourth Amendment constitutional requirement of "probable cause" applies still exists.

29 But see Parretti v. United States, 122 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1997), withdrawn on other grounds, 143 F.3d 508 (9th Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 877 (1998).

30 *S*ee John Parry's detailed and incisive description of the facts and context of this case, supra note 2, as well as of In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas. 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847) (No. 9, 511), and In re Kaine, 55 U.S. 103 (1852); Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights 24 (2001).

Jonathan Robbins, who was arrested in 1799 in Charleston, South Carolina, for the charge of murder, allegedly committed during the course of a mutiny on the Hermione, a British ship, while it was moored in Charleston's port.[31] The British were eager to have Nash surrendered with the ostensible purpose of trying him for mutiny and murder, and hanging him for such offenses, even though he was a U.S. citizen who had been "shanghaied," that is, seized by force and kept against his will to serve on the ship.[32] The British addressed their request to Secretary of State Timothy Pickering, while at the same time the matter was brought before District Court Judge Thomas Bee to order the surrender of the requested person. Secretary of State Pickering advised President John Adams that Judge Bee should be directed to deliver the offender in question because the United States had obligated itself under Jay's Treaty to do so.[33] Having apparently convinced President Adams, Secretary Pickering informed Judge Bee of the President's request that Nash be delivered to a representative of England. But Secretary Pickering was careful to indicate that Judge Bee should do so on the basis of evidence of criminality to be produced by England that would justify, as the Treaty requires, his "commitment for trial."[34] At the outset, it appeared uncertain as to whether President Adams, acting through the secretary of state, was seeking to influence Judge Bee or whether he merely wished to emphasize that it was the Judiciary's prerogative to hear and consider the evidence and to determine whether it was sufficient to constitute, presumably, "probable cause" in order to justify "commitment for trial," after which the judge was to issue an order for the surrender of the requested person. In fact, one can feel this same impatience on the part of the government in many contemporary cases where the government argues that the treaty obligation of the United States would be impaired if extradition were not granted.[35]

Congressman John Marshall took the position in Congress that the judicial branch does not have the power to deal with treaties and that Article III does not cover matters that are within

---

31 Pyle, supra note 30 at 26

32 The facts are described in Judge Bee's opinion, in Wedgewood, supra note 2; Pyle, supra note 30.

33 Jay's Treaty, supra note 12; For the Adams and Pickering positions, see Parry, supra note 2, at 109–113 and notes 78–80 and 104 (referring to original sources).

34 Jay's Treaty, supra note 12.

35 In this writer's personal experience with over 100 extradition cases, rarely was it not said by the Assistant United States Attorney during or at the end of the proceedings that the treaty obligations of the United States were at stake, and that somehow the judiciary should be conscious of this, the implication being that because of overlapping powers, the judiciary should be mindful of the executive's powers. A more benign interpretation of that directive could be that the judge should order the surrender of the requested person to the requesting state without having to wait for any further action by the executive branch, but that does not seem borne out by the circumstances and context of the case. See Parry, supra note 2, at 108–124. In today's practice, it is not the judiciary that surrenders an individual to a requested foreign government, but the executive. See 18 U.S.C. § 3196 (2003). There could have been a reasonable and logical interpretation of the president's direction as a delineation of the overlapping powers of the judicial and executive branches. The debate over the foreign affairs powers of the executive has remained constant from these early days on. See, e.g., Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (2d ed. 1996). But at that time there was no legislation concerning extradition and, as stated above, no statute implementing the 1794 Treaty. Judge Bee treated the case as a federal question case under Article III and made the analogy between international extradition and inter-state rendition of a fugitive fleeing from one state to another. He also interpreted the judicial power as extending to treaty interpretation. Consequently, Judge Bee's jurisdictional ruling was intuitively correct, although it was not based on statutory authority. As he viewed the action by Secretary Pickering as executive interference with a judicial function, a constitutional controversy erupted. Nevertheless, Judge Bee ruled that Robbins was to be surrendered to the British Consul. In re Robbins, 27 F. Cas. 825, 833 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175). Robbins was then promptly convicted and executed by British authorities, fueling the controversy in light of his U.S. citizenship.

the jurisdiction of a foreign state's judicial prerogative.[36] He thus concluded that the case was for the executive to decide and not subject to judicial decision by a federal district court judge.[37]

Between 1794, when Jay's Treaty was entered into and the controversial Robbins case subsequently decided, and 1848 when the first extradition legislation was enacted,[38] extradition in the United States was carried out without the benefit of national legislation.[39]

In 1847, the Supreme Court revisited the issue of extradition in In re Metzger[40] and thereafter in In re Kaine.[41] The latter, however, was decided after the 1848 Act.[42] Yet both of these cases

---

36 See Statement of Representative John Marshall, 10 Annals of Congress 660th Cong., First Session 1st 607 (Mar. 7, 1800). This and other relevant facts and analysis are described in Wedgewood, supra note 2, at 229; Pyle, supra note 30, at 24–47. More particularly, see Parry, supra note 2, at 105–120. It should be noted that Chief Justice Marshall in his seminal opinion in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), held that a writ of mandamus was an appropriate remedy under Section 13 of the 1789 Judiciary Act. But in the Lawrence case, it was not judged to be an appropriate remedy. See supra note 21.

37 In a sense, Congressman Marshall raised the issue that subsequently became known as the "Political Question Doctrine." There is much debate as to what Marshall really advocated, though he supported, in part, Adams's position limiting the role of the judiciary. Marshall did, however, concede that a person sought for extradition had the right to question the legality of his arrest by means of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. See Statement of Representative John Marshall, supra note 36. Chief Justice Marshall's majority opinion in United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886) was most enlightened, solidly upholding the judiciary's role in international extradition. But that was after Congress had enacted the 1848 Act. Cha. 167 §5, 9 Stat. 302. See also infra note 39 (noting the legislative history of extradition). The pendulum then swung in favor of a greater role for the executive in matters of extradition, as the constitutional interpretation of the doctrine of separation of powers favored the executive branch in the absence of statutory authority to the contrary. See H. Jefferson Powell, The Founders and the President's Authority over Foreign Affairs, 40 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1471, 1511–1528 (1999). The issue of separation of powers was raised in LoBue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995), vacated on juris. grounds, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). That proposition was revisited by the Second Circuit in LoDuca v. United States, 93 F.3d 1100 (2d Cir. 1996). The position was also followed by other circuits in which the issue of the overlapping roles of executive and judicial powers were raised. See Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 1322, 1326 (9th Cir. 1997); Martin v. Warden, 993 F.2d 824, 828 (11th Cir. 1993); Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504, 513 (7th Cir. 1981).

38 Ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302.

39 As stated above, the first legislative act concerning extradition was the Act of August 12, 1848. See Ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302 (1848). The Act provided that extradition of relators from the United States could be performed only pursuant to a treaty, and set forth the procedure to be followed by judges or commissioners. During those years, the following legislation was passed: Act of August 12, 1848, Ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302, 303; Act of June 22, 1860, Ch. 184, 12 Stat. 84 (requiring authentication of documents); Act of March 3, 1869, Ch. 141, §§ 1–3, 15 Stat. 337 (establishing procedure for delivery of relator from United States to requesting state); Act of June 19, 1876, Ch. 133, 19 Stat. 59 (providing that authenticated foreign documents are admissible into evidence); Act of August 3, 1882, Ch. 378, §§ 1–6, 22 Stat. 215 (establishing fees and costs for extradition); Act of June 6, 1900, Ch. 793, 31 Stat. 656 (specifying extraditable offenses and establishing political offense exception); Act of June 28, 1902, Ch. 1301 (judicial), 32 Stat. 419, 475 (providing for collection of costs from requesting state); Act of March 22, 1934, Ch. 73, §§ 1–4, 48 Stat. 454 (establishing procedure for extradition to and from countries or territories controlled by the United States); Act of June 25, 1948, Ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822 (codifying existing practice not previously set forth in statute); Act of May 24, 1949, Ch. 139, 63 Stat. 96 (amending list of extraditable offenses); and Act of October 17, 1968, Pub. L. No. 90-578, Title III, § 301(a)(3), 82 Stat. 1115 (substituting "magistrate" for "commissioner" in extradition statutes). From 1848 to date, the original Act was amended in a piecemeal fashion eleven times.

40 In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847).

41 In re Kaine, 55 U.S. 103 (1852).

42 1848 Act, supra note 28.

were subsequently misinterpreted.[43] The same debate continued with respect to the "political offense exception,"[44] the role of the executive,[45] and the rule of non-inquiry in respect to violations of internationally protected human rights.[46] In the 1970s and 1980s controversy arose with the United Kingdom over judicial versus executive powers in connection with the United Kingdom's extradition request for persons charged with violent crimes in connection with the conflict in Northern Ireland.[47] The contemporary debate over the executive's power in matters of extradition continues, notwithstanding the existence of legislation regulating the practice. Understandably, the executive is concerned over delays in the extradition process.[48]

One would assume that the existing overlap between executive and judicial powers is not that complex to delineate and distinguish. The executive has the power to enter into treaties, and, if it were not for Section 3184,[49] as discussed below in Sections 2, 3, and 5, the executive could engage in extradition with executive agreements not subject to the Senate's "advice and consent," including on the basis of comity. The executive also has the power to use discretion in conditioning extradition or not surrendering a person otherwise found to be judicially extraditable. As to the judiciary, as discussed in Chapters IX and X, its role is to determine whether a treaty exists, the identity of the person sought, and the existence of "probable cause," and to apply the conditions of the treaty and any conditions arising under customary international law or other relevant applicable treaty, including both substantive conditions and defenses, exceptions, exemptions, and exclusions, and of course any applicable provisions of the Constitution.

Within that context, there are two major legal issues that remain controversial in terms of the overlapping powers of the executive and the judiciary. They are the political offense exception[50] and the rule of non-inquiry[51] with respect to issues concerning the treatment of the relator 43 For a discussion of this and other misconceptions about extradition, see John G. Kessler, Some Myths of U.S. Extradition Law, 76 Geo. L.J. 1441 (1988).

---

44 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

45 See Steven Lubet, Extradition Reform: Executive Discretion and Judicial Participation in the Extradition of Political Terrorists, 15 Corn. Int'l L. Rev. 247 (1982).

46 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

47 See In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981); United States v. Doherty, 786 F.2d 491 (2d Cir. 1986). In re McMullen Magis. No. 3-78-1099 MG (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979). Since the denial of the United Kingdom's extradition request, the Immigration and Naturalization Service has sought McMullen's deportation. McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986) (denying review of finding of ineligibility for asylum), overruled in part by Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2005) (relying on the incidental prong of Quinn v. Robinson); on rehearing, the appellate court held that the district court erred in classifying the Supplementary Treaty as a prohibited bill of attainder and remanded the case to the district court for resolution of the due process issues that remain unresolved. In re Extradition of McMullen, 989 F.2d 603, 604 (2d Cir. 1993); Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.3d 776 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 882 (1986). For a contemporary discussion on the executive's power over foreign affairs, see Saikrishna B. Prakash & Michael D. Ramsey, The Executive Power over Foreign Affairs, 111 Yale.L.J. 231 (2001) and Jack L. Goldsmith, Federal Courts, Foreign Affairs, and Federalism, 83 Va. L. Rev. 1617 (1997), favoring a predominant role for the executive over the judiciary in matters of foreign affairs.

48 Two landmark cases stand out: one in the Second Circuit, Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980), and one in the Seventh Circuit, In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 938 (1980), in which this writer represented the respective relators. The Caltagirone case lasted over four years and extradition was denied. The Assarsson case lasted almost five years and extradition was granted.

49 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (2003). See also Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 1933; Valentine v. U.S. ex. rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936); United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).

50 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

51 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

once surrendered, including the penalties that the requesting state may inflict upon him/her. Understandably, the judiciary is reluctant to give up its prerogatives in this matter insofar as it is using its powers to order the surrender of a person, who could also be a U.S. citizen, to a foreign country where his/her treatment and punishment could be contrary to the Eighth Amendment prohibition against "cruel and unusual punishment" or to public policy.[52]

It is astonishing that some of the same issues and debates that occurred in connection with the Robbins case and that lasted until the passage of the 1848 legislation still linger on. It is equally astonishing that the 1848 Act has not been comprehensively overhauled since then, notwithstanding congressional efforts between 1981 and 1984.[53]

To a large extent, this stagnation is due to the absence of sufficient congressional interest in the passage of progressive nonpartisan legislation that balances between the justifiable ends of surrendering to other countries persons accused or charged with crimes and the need to observe "due process of law," and where appropriate to uphold international human rights norms as well as constitutional norms and standards. Regrettably, the battle lines have been drawn along ideological lines between what is commonly referred to as conservative and liberal thinking on international human rights and domestic civil rights issues.[54] Instead, the proper balance should be drawn along the lines of efficient and expeditious extradition proceedings—unhampered by undue formalities, but consistent with the application of the same norms and standards the judiciary must apply in ordinary criminal cases. By no means should extradition be converted into a mini-trial, but neither should it become a rubber stamp judicial procedure for the requests of foreign governments that a given administration may support, as in the case of President John Adams's message to Judge Bee in the 1795 Robbins case. Although this history is largely overlooked, if not forgotten, by commentators and judicial opinion drafters, it remains the background, if not the foundation of subsequent legislative and major judicial developments.[55]

2. The Relationship among the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Branches and the Place of Treaties in the Extradition Process[56]

2.1. Introduction

The processes of extradition in the United States involve the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the federal government.[57] Each of these has a defined constitutional role in the making, the execution, and the interpretation of treaties. The interrelationship of the three branches of government in extradition is dictated by the constitutional grant of powers to them and by the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.

In In re Lehming,[58] a federal district court held that:

> The separation of powers principle is based on the belief that liberty can only be preserved if governmental powers are separated into three coordinate branches of government. Mistretta v. U.S., 52 Ch. VII, Sec. 8.3.

53 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extradition Reform Legislation in the U.S.: 1981–83, 17 Akron L. Rev. 495 (1984).

54 Id.

55 For the legislative history and relations between the branches of government, see infra Sec. 2.

56 See infra Sec. 4.

57 See generally, John T. Parry, The Lost History of International Extradition Litigation, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 93 (Fall 2002); Ann Powers, Justice Denied? The Adjudication of Extradition Applications, 37 Tex. Int'l L. J. 277 (Spring 2002); Christopher D. Man, Extradition and Article III: A Historical Examination of the "Judicial Power of the U.S.," 10 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 37 (Spring 2002).

58 In re Lehming, 951 F. Supp. 505 (D. Del. 1996).

488 U.S. 361, 380, 109 S.Ct. 647 659, 102 L.Ed.2d 714 (1989). However, "the Framers did not require—and indeed rejected—the notion that the three branches must be entirely separate and distinct." Id. The proper functioning of our government requires "a degree of overlapping responsibility, a duty of interdependence as well as independence the absence of which 'would preclude the establishment of a Nation capable of governing itself effectively.'" Id. at 381, 109 S.Ct. at 659, quoting Buckley v. Valeo 424 U.S. 1, 121 96 S.Ct. 612, 683, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976). The concern when analyzing an alleged violation of the separation of powers is not an overlap of responsibility, but rather "the encroachment and aggrandizement of one branch at the expense of another." Matter of Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565, 571 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). In the context of issues which specifically involve the Judicial Branch, the Supreme Court expressed grave concern for two dangers, "first, that the Judicial Branch neither be assigned nor allowed 'tasks that are more properly accomplished by [other] branches,' and, second, that no provision of law 'impermissibly threatens the institutional integrity of the Judicial Branch.'" Id. at 383, 109 S.Ct. at 660. This Court concludes, upon a review of the applicable Treaty and statutes, that the federal statutes are constitutional. Although a contrary position was taken in Lobue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995), vacated on jurisdictional grounds, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (vacated for lack of jurisdiction and ordering dismissal), the balance of federal court decisions support the conclusion that the statutes are constitutional. See Lo Duca, 93 F.3d at 1103–1112; In the Matter of Extradition of Lui Kin-Hong, a/k/a Jerry Lui, 939 F. Supp. 934, 962 (D. Mass. 1996); Sandhu v. Bransom, 932 F. Supp. 822, 826 (N.D.Tex. 1996); Marzook, 924 F. Supp. at 570–71; Matter of Extradition of Lin, 915 F. Supp. 206, 211–15 (D. Guam 1995); Matter of Extradition of Sutton, 905 F. Supp. 631, 636–37 (E.D. Mo. 1995); Matter of Extradition of Sidali, 899 F.Supp. 1342, 1350 (D.N.J. 1995).[59]

2.2. Treaties and Federal Legislation

Extradition in the United States is statutorily based on treaties.[60] Treaties are made by the executive subject to the "advice and consent" of the Senate.[61] The authority to enter extradition treaties and to request or grant extradition rests exclusively with the executive branch by virtue of its constitutional power to conduct foreign relations.[62] This power is only limited by the Senate's power to "advise and consent" to treaties that the executive branch submits to it[63] and by the authority of Congress to enact legislation defining the substantive requirements and procedures to be followed by U.S. courts whenever treaties are deemed to require it, and that is 59 Id. at 509. The following cases all raised the constitutionality of the extradition statute regarding the Lobue decision, and the issue of whether extradition is a judicial or executive process was raised again. This decision does not depart from precedent on the subject. See In re Extradition of Chan-Seong I, 346 F. Supp. 2d 1149 (D.N.M. 2004) (in which the constitutionality of the extradition statute were raised as part of the separation of powers issues). See also In re Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855, 864 (9th Cir. 1996); Carreno v. Johnson, 899 F. Supp. 624 (S.D. Fla. 1995); In re Extradition of Lang, 905 F. Supp. 1385, 1401 (C.D. Cal. 1995); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); In re Extradition of Lahoira, 932 F. Supp. 802 (N.D. Tex 1996); In re Extradition of Linn (D. Guam 1995). It should be noted as discussed in the context of LoBue that the present extradition statute has been enacted originally in 1825. See Lobue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995), vacated on jurisdictional grounds, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). See, e.g., Hayburns Case, 2 U.S. 408, 2 Da.. 409 (1792); United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40 (1851); Gordon v. United States (2 Wall. 1864); In re Kaine, 55 U.S. (14 Howe) (1852).

60 See infra Sec. 3.

61 See infra Sec. 4.

62 U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, c1. 1.2. See also United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Co., 299 U.S. 304, 318–321 (1936).

63 U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, c1. 1.2.

when treaties are non–self-executing (as discussed below).[64] Federal legislation is developed to regulate the procedures of extradition subject to the provisions of the relevant treaties, which are deemed self-executing.[65]

The federal judiciary has the prerogative of interpreting and applying treaties and general procedural legislative enactments in accordance with the applicable provisions of the U.S. Constitution.[66] The judiciary's role, however, is limited because it cannot enjoin, prohibit, or mandate the executive's negotiation of an agreement or a treaty, nor can it enjoin or mandate the executive's exercise of discretion to request a relator's extradition or to refuse to grant extradition although the terms of the applicable treaty have been satisfied.[67] The judiciary, however, has the authority to enjoin the federal government from extraditing a person if the extradition is in violation of the Constitution, U.S. laws, or the applicable treaty.[68] In the event of a conflict between an extradition treaty and a constitutional provision, the latter prevails.[69]

Federal legislation is subject to extradition treaties, which are deemed to be self-executing. As a result, U.S. legislation is complementary to treaties rather than substitutive of them. In the case of a conflict between a treaty provision and a legislative norm, the former should prevail.[70]

The first stage in the extradition process is the existence of a legal basis upon which the United States may request or grant extradition. Although there are several such bases (i.e., treaties, whether bilateral or multilateral; reciprocity; comity; and national legislation),[71] the United States relies essentially on bilateral treaties. Nothing prevents the United States from relying on multilateral treaties. In fact, the United States has ratified a number of multilateral treaties containing extradition provisions, but still, it does not rely on these treaties to grant or request extradition. This is exclusively a practice based on U.S. foreign policy, which denotes its exclusivist approach to international relations.[72]

The basis of the U.S. practice of extradition has not, however, been consistently limited to bilateral treaties, as some exceptions have occurred whenever it best suits this country's interests. Even in present times, the United States can request extradition from a foreign state with which no extradition treaty exists, or it can rely on a multilateral treaty containing an extradition clause. However U.S. legislation requires that a treaty must exist before extradition can be granted[73] and the Supreme Court and lower courts have frequently referred to the need for a treaty in order for extradition to be granted,[74] even though there is nothing in the Constitution that mandates this requirement.

---

64 Id.

65 See infra Sec. 4.

66 See Chs. VII, VIII, and IX.

67 See Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902); United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886); Shapiro v. Secretary of State, 499 F.2d 527 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976); Wacker v. Bisson, 370 F.2d 552 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 387 U.S. 936 (1967); United States v. Orsini, 424 F. Supp. 229 (D.C.N.Y. 1976), aff'd, 559 F.2d 1206 (2d Cir. 1977); United States v. Salzmann, 417 F. Supp. 1139 (D.C.N.Y.), aff'd, 548 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1976).

68 See Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936).

69 1 Moore, Extradition supra note 2, at 97.

70 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 734 (1968) [hereinafter, Whiteman Digest].

71 See Ch. I.

72 Bassiouni, International Criminal Law Conventions and Their Penal Provisions (1997) [hereinafter Bassiouni, ICL Conventions].

73 18 U.S.C. § 3181 et seq. (1988). "Extradition Treaties Interpretation Act of 1998" (2000).

74 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 229 U.S. 5 (1936); Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933); United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

Once the judiciary has established the appropriate basis of extradition, it is then within the sole discretion of the secretary of state to determine whether the relator is extraditable.[75] Rationalizing this bifurcated decision-making system, the First Circuit in Lui Kin-Hong v. United States stated:

> extradition proceedings contain legal issues peculiarly suited for judicial resolution, such as questions of the standard of proof, competence of evidence, and treaty construction, yet simultaneously implicate questions of foreign policy, which are better answered by the executive branch.[76]

In Cheung v. United States, the Second Circuit posited as follows:

> It has long been part of our settled law that the authority to recognize a foreign government is constitutionally committed to the Executive Branch. See, e.g., Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 38 U.S. 415, 420, 10 L. Ed. 226 (1839) ("When the executive branch of the government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall . . . assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive on the judicial department[.] . . . It is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the Court to determine, whether the executive be right or wrong."); First Nat'l City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759, 767, 32 L. Ed. 2d 466, 92 S. Ct. 1808 (1972) (noting the primacy of the Executive in matters of recognition); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217, 7 L. Ed. 2d 663, 82 S. Ct. 691 (1962) (explaining when an issue is nonjusticiable under the political question doctrine and stating that the "recognition of foreign governments . . . strongly defies judicial treatment"); Rein v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 162 F.3d 748, 764 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Our court held that recognizing foreign states and governments is a function of the executive branch . . . ."), cert. denied, 527 U.S. 1003, 119 S. Ct. 2337, 144 L. Ed. 2d 235 (1999). Federal courts lack the authority and institutional competence to make the political judgments involved in ascertaining the legitimacy of foreign systems. Thus, in this case, it is not for the courts to decide whether the HKSAR government is a legitimate government. Instead, our role is limited to answering the prior definitional question: what does the term "foreign government" in the extradition statute mean? More precisely, the question we must address is whether the government of a subsovereign constitutes a "foreign government" or the government of a "foreign country" for purposes of § 3184. Put another way, for most purposes of U.S. foreign relations, the HKSAR government is the government of Hong Kong because it has been recognized as such by the Executive, but it is a "foreign government" within the meaning of the extradition statute only if the judiciary interprets that term to encompass subsovereigns. See Baker, 369 U.S. at 212 (noting that while "the judiciary ordinarily follows the executive as to which nation has sovereignty over disputed territory, once sovereignty over an area is politically determined and declared, courts may examine the resulting status and decide independently whether a statute applies to that area" (footnotes omitted)). With this clarification, we turn to the text of the extradition statute.[77]

The federal judiciary continues to have a significant role in international extradition processes, but it is not superior to the respective roles of the executive and legislative branches in connection with treaty-making powers and the implementation of treaties, as discussed in this and the next two sections.[78]

The practice of extradition is a part of the foreign relations of the United States. Because it is based essentially on treaties, it reflects the relationship of the United States with foreign states. For these reasons, a change in U.S. foreign policy regarding a certain state can affect its extradition arrangements with that state. Thus, although a treaty is not necessarily suspended by the severance of diplomatic relations, the United States has taken the position that because

---

75 United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103, 110 (1997) (relying on 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (1996)).

76 Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d at 110.

77 Cheung v. United States, 213 F.3d 82, 88 (2d Cir. 2000).

78 See supra Sec. 1. See also Appendix I.

extradition is an act of cooperation between governments, it will not engage in the practice if diplomatic relations are severed.[79] This was the case with Cuba, until a memorandum of understanding was signed with Czechoslovakia, which was acting on behalf of Cuba, but only with respect to aircraft hijackers.[80]

A change in government does not abrogate a treaty, however,[81] nor does it suspend the treaty's application unless the treaty is of a political nature or the circumstances are such as to permit the invocation, in treaty interpretation, of the rule rebus sic stantibus,[82] namely that radically or significantly charged circumstances may justify reconsideration of certain treaty obligations for the party adversely affected by these changed circumstances.

As mentioned above, between 1794, when Jay's Treaty was entered into, and 1848 when the first extradition statute was adopted, extradition in the United States was carried out without the benefit of national legislation.[83]

The first legislative act concerning extradition was the Act of August 12, 1848.[84] The Act provided that extradition of relators from the United States could be performed only pursuant to a treaty, and set forth the procedure to be followed by judges or commissioners. During those years, the following legislation was passed: Act of August 12, 1848;[85] Act of June 22, 1860;[86] Act of March 3, 1869;[87] Act of June 19, 1876;[88] Act of August 3, 1882;[89] Act of June 6, 1900;[90] Act of June 28, 1902;[91] Act of March 22, 1934;[92] Act of June 25, 1948;[93] Act of May 24, 1949;[94] and Act of 79 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 769; Green Haywood Hackworth, Digest of International Law 37 (1944) [hereinafter Hackworth Digest]. See also Restatement of the Law (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States §§ 202, 203, 336 (1987).

---

80 Memorandum of Understanding on Hijacking of Aircraft and Vessels and Other Offenses, agreement effected by exchange of notes between U.S. Department of State and Czechoslovak Embassy (representing Cuban interests), and between the Cuban Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Swiss Embassy (representing U.S. interests), signed at Washington and Havana Feb. 15, 1973, 24 U.S.T. 737, T.I.A.S. No. 7579 (entered into force Feb. 15, 1973).

81 1 Moore, Extradition 98, supra note 2. See Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 203 cmt. c (addressing recognition in cases of constitutional succession), § 332 (concerning termination of international agreements), § 333 (regarding suspension of operation of international agreements).

82 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.80/31, as corrected by A/CONF.80/31/Corr. 2 of Oct. 27, 1978, reprinted in 17 I.L.M. 1488 (1978).

83 See Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540 (1840); In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas. 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847); (No. 9,511) In re Sheazle, 21 F. Cas. 1214 (C.C.D. Mass 1845) (No. 12,734); United States v. Davis, 25 F. Cas. 786 (C.C.D. Mass. 1837) (No. 14,932); Ex parte Dos Santos, 7 F. Cas. 949 (No. 4,016) (C.C.D. Va. 1835); United States v. Robins, 27 F. Cas. 825 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175); Commonwealth ex rel. Short v. Deacon, 10 Serg. & Rawle 125 (Pa. 1823); In re Washburn, 4 Johns. Ch. 106 (Ch. N.Y. 1819). Cheung v. United States, 213 F.3d 82, 93 (2d Cir. 2000).

84 Ch. 167, 9 Stat. 302.

85 Ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302, 303.

86 Ch. 184, 12 Stat. 84.

87 Ch. 141, §§ 1–3, 15 Stat. 337.

88 Ch. 133, 19 Stat. 59.

89 Ch. 378, §§ 1–6, 22 Stat. 215.

90 Ch. 793, 31 Stat. 656.

91 Ch. 1301 (judicial), 32 Stat. 419, 475.

92 Ch. 73, §§ 1–4, 48 Stat. 454.

93 Ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822.

94 Ch. 139, 63 Stat. 96.

October 17, 1968.[95] From 1848 until 1983, the original Act was amended in a piecemeal fashion ten times.[96]

Since 1981, a number of bills regarding extradition have been introduced in the Senate and the House. In addition, the administration, at that time, although backing the Senate versions, included similar extradition provisions in criminal law bills before the Senate.[97] The first version of the Extradition Reform Act was introduced in the U.S. Senate on September 18, 1981 as S. 1639,[98] ostensibly in order "to modernize the statutory provisions relating to international extradition,"[99] although it did not achieve these far-reaching objectives. The bill was entitled "The Extradition Reform Act of 1981."[100] After hearings before the Senate,[101] the original version was amended and a "clean bill" introduced in the Senate on December 11, 1981 as S. 1940.[102] This clean bill version was favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with Committee amendments on April 15, 1982[103] and sequentially referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on April 19, 1982.[104] Other than the "political offense exception," the Committee considered in a very cursory way other questions within its competence, and favorably reported the bill, with Committee amendments on June 17, 1982.[105]

During this period, the House of Representatives considered its own version of a new act to revise U.S. extradition law and procedure. H.R. 5227, the original House bill, was introduced on December 15, 1981, before the Subcommittee on Crime of the Committee on 95 Pub. L. No. 90-578, Title III, § 301(a)(3), 82 Stat. 1115.

---

96 Act of June 22, 1860, Ch. 184, 12 Stat. 84 (requiring authentication of documents); Act of March 3, 1869, Ch. 141, §§ 1–3, 15 Stat. 337 (establishing procedure for delivery of relator from United States to requesting state); Act of June 19, 1876, Ch. 133, 19 Stat. 59 (providing that authenticated foreign documents are admissible into evidence); Act of August 3, 1882, Ch. 378, §§ 1–6, 22 Stat. 215 (establishing fees and costs for extradition); Act of June 6, 1900, Ch. 793, 31 Stat. 656 (specifying extraditable offenses and established political offense exception); Act of June 28, 1902, Ch. 1301 (judicial), 32 Stat. 419, 475 (providing for collection of costs from requesting state); Act of March 22, 1934, Ch. 73, §§ 1–4, 48 Stat. 454 (establishing procedure for extradition to and from countries or territories controlled by the United States); Act of June 25, 1948, Ch. 645, 62 Stat. 822 (codifying existing practice not previously set forth in statute); Act of May 24, 1949, Ch. 139, 63 Stat. 96 (amending list of extraditable offenses); Act of October 17, 1968, 82 Stat. 1115, Pub. L. No. 90-578, tit. III, § 301(a)(3) (substituting "magistrate" for "commissioner" in extradition statutes). See also Bassiouni, supra note 53.

97 S. 1639, the first Senate bill introduced in the 97th Congress on U.S. extradition, was also introduced as part of S. 1630 to amend the federal criminal code. See infra note 98. S. 220, the first Senate bill introduced in the 98th Congress, was also introduced as part of S. 829 to amend the federal criminal code.

98 See S. 1639, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., 127 Cong. Rec. S10032 (daily ed. Sept. 18, 1981) [hereinafter S. 1639]. The provisions in the bill were originally introduced as part of proposed legislation to amend the federal criminal code. See S. 1630, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., 127 Cong. Rec. S9916 (daily ed. Sept. 17, 1981).

99 S. Rep No. 331, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 3 (1982) [hereinafter Senate Judiciary Report on S. 1940]. The Senate Judiciary Committee did not issue a report on S. 1639, but did issue one on the amended version of S. 1639, which was numbered S. 1940.

100 Id. at 3 n.1.

101 See The Extradition Reform Act of 1981: Hearings on S. 1639 Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981) [hereinafter Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639].

102 See S. 1940, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., 127 Cong. Rec. S15101 (daily ed. Dec. 11, 1981) [hereinafter S. 1940].

103 Senate Judiciary Report on S. 1940, supra note 99.

104 See S. Rep. No. 475, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1982) [hereinafter Senate Foreign Relations Report on S. 1940]. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee did not hold formal hearings on the bill.

105 Id.

the Judiciary.[106] It was entitled "The Extradition Reform Act of 1981."[107] The bill "incorporated many of the suggestions of the Administration which [would be] . . . found in Senate bill S. 1940."[108]

In response to suggestions made at hearings on the bill and through written statements,[109] the House Subcommittee on Crime made significant improvements in the bill and approved an amendment in the nature of a substitution to replace H.R. 5227. The resulting "clean bill," H.R. 6046, entitled "The Extradition Reform Act of 1982," was favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on June 24, 1982, with amendments.[110] On that day, it was sequentially referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.[111] That Committee, however, declined to entertain any amendments to provisions dealing with matters within its jurisdiction and favorably reported the bill without amendment on July 29, 1982.[112] The Committee's Report expressly noted, however, that it favorably reported the bill without amendment "with the understanding that the members of the committee would be able to offer their amendments to the bill when it [would be] considered by the Committee of the Whole House."[113] Committee members' views were published as "Additional Views" in the Committee's Report.[114]

---

106 See H.R. 5227, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., 128 Cong. Rec. H9670 (daily ed. Dec. 15, 1981) [hereinafter H.R. 5227].

107 H.R. Rep. No. 627, Part I, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., 1 (1982) [hereinafter House Judiciary Report on H.R. 6046]. The House Judiciary Committee did not issue a report on H.R. 5227, but did so on an amended version of H.R. 5277, which was numbered H.R. 6046.

108 Id. at 3.

109 See Extradition Reform Act of 1981: Hearings on H.R. 5227 Before the Subcomm. on Crime of the Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1981) [hereinafter House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227].

110 See H.R. 6046, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982), 128 Cong. Rec. H 1405 (daily ed. Apr. 1, 1982) [hereinafter H.R. 6046]; House Judiciary Report on H.R. 6046, supra note 107.

111 H.R. Rep. No. 627, Part II, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) [hereinafter House Foreign Affairs Report on H.R. 6046]. See The Extradition Reform Act of 1982: Hearings on H.R. 6046 Before the House Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) [hereinafter House Foreign Affairs Hearings on H.R. 6046].

112 See House Foreign Affairs Report on H.R. 6046, supra note 107.

113 Id. at 2.

114 Id. at 6 (remarks of Hon. Geo. W. Crockett, Jr.); id. at 7 (remarks of Hon. Paul Findley); id. at 8 (remarks of Hon. Arlen Erdahl). Subsequent to the House Foreign Affairs Committee's favorable reporting of H.R. 6046, several members of Congress voiced strong objections to the bill on the floor of the House. Congressman Crockett proposed provisions to: (1) amend the definition of a "political offense;" (2) give the judiciary the authority to deny extradition if it finds that the person, if returned, would be persecuted because of his "race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular group, or political opinion"; (3) impose upon the secretary of state the duty to condition extradition upon compliance with international law, including international protection of human rights; (4) provide explicitly for the relator's right to petition the secretary of state to refuse or condition his extradition; (5) provide explicitly for the "rule of specialty," which requires that the requesting state shall prosecute an individual only for those crimes for which extradition was granted; and (6) require that a requesting state shall be represented only by private counsel at extradition proceedings in the United States. See 128 Cong. Rec. H6968-70 (Sept. 14, 1982). The members of Congress, although not proposing specific amendments, voiced disagreement over substantially the same provisions with which Congressman Crockett took issue, most notably the narrowly defined "political offense exception" and the perceived need to have the judiciary determine whether the relator, if returned, would be subjected to persecution because of race, religious, or political beliefs. See 128 Cong. Rec. E4128 (daily ed. Sept. 13, 1982) (remarks of Hon. D. Edwards); id. at E4145, E4152 (daily ed. Sept. 14, 1982) (remarks of Hon. F. Stork; Hon. J. Conyers, Jr.); id. at E4179, E4189, E4192, E4200, E4201 (daily ed. Sept. 15, 1982) (remarks of Hon. A. Moffett, Hon. G. Studds, Hon. W. Fauntroy, Hon. P. Schroeder, Hon. S. Chisholm); id. at E4214, E4222, E4233, and E4241, E4245 (daily ed. Sept. 16, 1982) (remarks of Hon. R. Wyden, Hon. B. Frank, Hon. W. Brodhead, Hon. D. Bonioz, and Hon. B. Rosenthal). Congressman Hughes,

On August 19, 1982, the Senate, in accordance with congressional rules, published its enacted version of the Extradition Reform Act of 1981 in the Congressional Record.[115] By error, the enacted bill published in the Record contained, without distinction, both the amendments adopted by the Senate Judiciary Committee and those adopted by the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, which were contradictory on several important points, including the definition of the "political offense exception" and the court's jurisdiction to determine the applicability of the exception.[116] However, this was later corrected by an insertion in the Record to reflect that the Senate had enacted the bill as approved by the Foreign Relations Committee. This minor technical error was symptomatic of the limited and hurried attention given by the two Senate Committees to this important legislation.

Subsequently, the House was to have enacted its own version of the bill in September 1982 or in the "lame duck" session of November 1982, but it did not. On January 26, 1983, during the first session of the 98th Congress, a Senate bill was introduced before the newly established Senate Sub-Committee on Crime Legislation of the Committee on the Judiciary as S.220. This was the "Extradition Act of 1983,"[117] which is almost identical to S. 1940, which was sponsor of H.R. 6046 and Chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime of the House Judiciary Committee, responded to Congressman Crockett's proposed amendments in a letter to Congressman Crockett dated September 22, 1982. In that letter, Congressman Hughes defended the bill's definition of the "political offense exception" and failure to include political persecution in the court's determination of extraditability. He took no issue with the proposals regarding conditional extradition to ensure the protection of the relator's human rights, petition to the secretary of state, and the rule of specialty, because he considered these proposals to be merely codifications of existing practice. He did object to the requesting state's use of private counsel.

---

115 128 Cong. Rec. S10880–84 (daily ed. Aug. 19, 1982).

116 Id. at S10882–83.

117 See S. 220, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. S385 (daily ed. Jan. 27, 1983) [hereinafter S. 220]. Comparable extradition legislation was also introduced as Part M of Title X of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1983; see S. 829, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. S3070 (daily ed. Mar. 16, 1983), which was amended and subsequently reintroduced as S. 1762. See S. 1762, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. S11713 (daily ed. Aug. 4, 1983). This subsequent version was favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee on September 14, 1983; see S. Rep. No. 225, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983), and favorably reported by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 20, 1983. See S. Rep. No. 241, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983). The Senate removed the provisions regarding extradition from the Comprehensive Crime Control Act bill, however, and considered them separately. See also H.R. 2643, 98th Cong., 2d Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. H2249 (daily ed. Apr. 20, 1983) [hereinafter H.R. 2643]. The administration's views were conveyed to the Senate and the House by Michael Abbell, then Director, International Affairs Division, Department of Justice; John Harris of the Division who prepared the administration's drafts; and Daniel McGovern, then Deputy Legal Advisor, Department of State. S. 1639 and S. 1940 were introduced by Senator Strom Thurmond, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; the principal resource person on those bills was Paul Summit, Chief Counsel of the Judiciary Committee. H.R. 2643, H.R. 5227, and H.R. 6046 were introduced by Congressman William Hughes, Chairman, Sub-Committee on Crime of the Committee on the Judiciary. The principal resource person on these bills was David Beier, Counsel, Committee on the Judiciary. S. 220, which was almost identical to S. 1940, was introduced by Senator Paul Laxalt, Chairman of the newly created Sub-Committee on Crime Legislation to the Committee on the Judiciary. The American Society of International Law contributed to the legislative drafting process in 1982 by convening a meeting of the principal resource persons of the Senate and House Committees on the Judiciary, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, representatives of the Departments of Justice and State, and a number of experts to discuss the various contending views. The views of the administration were more specifically embodied in the Senate bills. Other views, including many suggestions presented by this writer, found their expression in the House bills. It was the expectation of all concerned that if H.R. 6046 passed the House, a conference on S. 1940 and H.R. 6046 would produce a new Act in 1982. But because the House bill was not passed in 1982, new Senate and House bills had to be introduced in 1983. This occurred in the Senate with S. 220 and in the House with H.R. 2643 and H.R. 3347. There was eventually a conference to reconcile differences adopted by the Senate on August 12, 1982. On April 20, 1983, during the second session of the 98th Congress, a new House Bill was introduced before the Sub-Committee on Crime of the Judiciary Committee as H.R. 2643, "The Extradition Act of 1983,"[118] which is very similar both to its predecessor in the House, H.R. 6046, and to the new Senate Bill, S. 220. The marked-up copy of H.R. 2643 was reintroduced as H.R. 3347, but was not technically reported out, even after being marked up.[119]

Congressman William J. Hughes, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, described the history of extradition reform legislation in the House:

> The Extradition Act of 1984 [H.R. 3347] is the product of extensive consideration by the Subcommittee on Crime and the Committee on the Judiciary. This consideration began in the 97th Congress and continued into the 98th Congress. The primary impetus for the legislation was the Committee's awareness that the extradition laws of the U.S. are outdated and sorely in need of reform. The extradition laws which are codified in 18 U.S.C. sections 3181 et seq., were last the subject of major legislative action in 1882.
>
> In addition, both the current and previous Administrations requested Congressional review of the extradition laws, so that judicial interpretation of the laws could be codified and so that more recent extradition treaties to which the U.S. is a party could be more effectively implemented.
>
> During the 97th Congress, the Committee considered and favorably reported the Extradition Act of 1982. Unfortunately, because of both the press of legislative business during the post-election session and certain controversies over its substance, the bill was not considered on the floor of the House.
>
> On April 20, 1983, during the 98th Congress . . . Harold S. Sawyer of Michigan, ranking Republican member of the Subcommittee, [and I] introduced H.R. 2643, the Extradition Act of 1983.
>
> The Subcommittee on Crime held two days of hearings on H.R. 2643. The Subcommittee received oral testimony and written statements from the Departments of State and Justice, leading scholars in the fields of international law and extradition, defense attorneys, civil liberties groups and persons concerned with the preservation of international human rights.[120] between the two versions before a new Act could be enacted into law entitled the "Extradition Act of 1983." Comparable extradition legislation was also introduced as part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1983 (see H.R. 2013, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. H1110 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 1983)), which was amended and subsequently reintroduced as H.R. 2151. See H.R. 2151, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., 129 Cong. Rec. H1265 (daily ed. Mar. 16, 1983). H.R. 2643 was the subject of hearings before the Subcommittee on Crime of the Committee on the Judiciary on April 28, 1983 and May 5, 1983. The bill was marked up by the Subcommittee and a clean bill ordered, which was favorably reported to the full Committee on June 8, 1983. It was then reintroduced as H.R. 3347, also entitled the "Extradition Act of 1983," on June 16, 1983, see 129 Cong. Rec. H. 4102 (daily ed. June 16, 1983), and forwarded to the full Committee. The Judiciary Committee further amended the bill and ordered it favorably reported to the House on October 4, 1983. See Staff of House Committee on the Judiciary, 98th Cong., 1st Sess., Extradition Bill (Comm. Print Oct. 6, 1983). H.R. 3347, as marked up, was technically never reported out to the House, however, as it had to be accompanied by a report and none was ever filed. It is thought that the report was not filed and the bill not reported out to the full House because of opposition to it from the Department of Justice, as well as dissatisfaction with some of its provisions within the Committee, particularly the provisions dealing with the rule of non-inquiry and conspiracy. As to the Department of Justice, it prefers to operate under existing legislation rather than under the new draft, essentially because of the bill's provisions regarding bail, but also, as this writer sees it, because the new legislation provides far less opportunity for ambiguity, which is frequently utilized to the government's advantage, than does existing legislation and its interpretation.

---

118 H.R. 2643, 98th Cong., 2d Sess (Apr. 20, 1983).

119 Id.

120 See H.R. Rep. 998, 98th Cong., 2d Sess., 2–7 (1984).

After considering several amendments to H.R. 2643, the Subcommittee on Crime reported a "clean bill," H.R. 3347, which was introduced on June 16, 1983. The Committee on the Judiciary favorably reported the new bill on October 4, 1983. H.R. 3347 went before the whole House as the "Extradition Act of 1984" on September 7, 1984.[121]

It is particularly interesting to note the historical similarity between the 1848 Act,[122] whose structure remains in effect to date subject to the amendments referred to above,[123] and the Act that was intended to replace it. The two reforms were prompted essentially by considerations arising out of the political aspects of extradition rather than its technical aspects. The 1848 Act can be traced to the landmark case of In re Robbins,[124] decided in 1799. In that case, President Adams granted England's request that the United States extradite an individual charged in England for a murder he had allegedly committed while in the British navy. Robbins's defense was that he had been impressed into British service, and that he had escaped during the other crew members' mutiny in which the ship's officers had been killed. Many individuals in the United States perceived this to be a justifiable act for which punishment was wholly inappropriate, believing that Robbins should not have been returned to England.[125] Although the exact term "political offense exception" was not used at the time, the underlying concept was already recognized.[126]

The legal basis for Robbins's surrender was President Adams's order that he be arrested and returned to England. In reviewing that order, in habeas corpus proceedings, the federal district court, sitting in Charleston, South Carolina, relied on the president's directions through the secretary of state, even though neither Jay's Treaty with England[127] (which was the treaty basis for the request) nor national legislation formed a legal basis for such action.[128] President Adams's decision in the highly publicized and controversial extradition of Robbins was one of the reasons for his failure to be reelected as president.[129]

The political controversy and legal irregularities of the Robbins case were not soon forgotten. In 1848, similar factors were brought to the forefront of public attention in the Metzger case,[130] which directly prompted Congress to enact the 1848 Extradition Act.[131]

---

121 Id. at 4.

122 Act of Aug. 12, 1848, ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302.

123 See supra notes 109–114 and accompanying text.

124 27 F. Cas. 825 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175).

125 See 10 Annals of Congress 580–640 (1800), reprinted following In re Robbins, 27 F. Cas. 825, 833–870 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175).

126 For a historical analysis of the "political offense exception," see Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1. See also Christine Van den Wyngaert, The Political Offense Exception to Extradition (1980).

127 The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation with Great Britain (Jay Treaty), Nov. 19, 1794, 8 Stat. 116, T.S. No. 105, reprinted in Malloy, supra note 12, at 490.

128 Robbins, 27 F. Cas. at 826–827).

129 1 Moore, Extradition, supra note 2, at 550–551.

130 In re Metzger, 17 F. Cas. 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1847) (No. 9, 511). In Metzger, France requested that the United States extradite an individual charged with forgery in France. The judicial determination of Metzger's extraditability was made by Judge Betts in chambers, who found Metzger's extradition in order. The decision prompted considerable discussion over whether judicial review could be performed in chambers as opposed to in open court.

131 Ch. 167, § 5, 9 Stat. 302, 303. See In re Kaine, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 103, 112 (1852) (noting "[t]hat the eventful history of Robbin's case had a controlling influence . . . especially on Congress, when it passed the act of 1848, is, as I suppose, free from doubt."). See also In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996).

The 1981–1984 Acts were prompted primarily by three highly publicized causes célèbres in which the "political offense exception" was at issue: In re Mackin,[132] In re McMullen,[133] and Eain v. Wilkes.[134]

In McMullen and Mackin, extradition to the United Kingdom was denied on the basis of the "political offense exception." In the Eain case, however, the exception was denied and the relator was extradited to Israel.[135]

The Department of Justice, through some of its officials, made an inordinate issue of these cases before the Senate and the House. Regrettably, the motivations for the revisions of the U.S. extradition statute were presented to Congress on the erroneous assumption that the "political offense exception" had been interpreted or perceived to be a bar to effective extradition. This position was asserted by administration representatives at hearings on the bills before both the Senate and the House,[136] where exaggerated claims were made that a continuation of such a trend would cause the United States to become a haven for terrorists.[137] Such result is unlikely as the "political offense exception" has rarely been argued in the United States as a basis for denying an extradition request. In addition, the "exception" is rarely used as a defense—consistently over the last several decades there has been on average one reported case having any bearing on the "political offense exception." During this same period there have been between fifty and one hundred extradition requests per year, raising a panoply of technical questions much more important to the administration of criminal justice and international cooperation in criminal matters than the rare "political offense exception."[138] 132 In re Mackin, 80 Cr. Misc. 1 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 13, 1981), aff'd, United States v. Mackin, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1981). In Mackin, the United Kingdom's request that a member of the Provisional Irish Republican Army be extradited to the United Kingdom in order to face prosecution for the charge of attempted murder and related offenses he allegedly committed against a British soldier (dressed in civilian clothes), standing in a Belfast bus station, was denied on the grounds that these charges were "political offenses" for which extradition could not be granted.

---

133 No. 3-78-1899 M.G. (N.D. Cal. May 11, 1979). In In re McMullen, the United Kingdom's request that a member of the Provisional Irish Republican Army be extradited to the United Kingdom in order to face prosecution for his alleged bombing of a British army installation in England was denied on the grounds that he was being sought for a "political offense" for which extradition could not be granted.

134 Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). In Eain, Israel's request was granted that an alleged member of the Palestine Liberation Organization be extradited to Israel to be prosecuted for his alleged bombing of a bus in Israel. The court refused to entertain the relator's defense that such actions constituted "political offenses." Id. See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

135 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 (discussing the political offense exception).

136 See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101, at 2, 4, 8, and 14 (testimony of M. Abbell, Dep't of Justice; D. McGovern, Dep't of State); House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227, supra note 109, at 26–27, 32 (testimony of R. Olsen, M. Abbell, Dep't of Justice; D. McGovern, Dep't of State); House Foreign Affairs Hearings on H.R. 6046, supra note 111.

137 See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101, at 30 (testimony of W. Hannay). The Senate Judiciary Committee, which supported the view that the political offense exception should be placed outside the court's jurisdiction, placed special emphasis on this testimony and written statement as "an excellent discussion of the 'political offense exception' to extradition and the impact of recent cases," which the Committee adopted as its view. See Senate Judiciary Report on S. 1940, supra note 99, at 14 nn.59, 60, and 15 n.61.

138 International penal cooperation includes the processes of extradition, judicial assistance, and transfer of offenders. See generally, Bassiouni, Draft Code [hereinafter, Bassiouni, Draft Code]; M. Cherif Bassiouni, II International Criminal Law (1999) [hereinafter, Bassiouni, II ICL]; A Treatise on International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 2 vols. 1973) [hereinafter,

These technical questions[139] have received little consideration in the Senate, though somewhat greater attention in the House.

The fundamental controversy giving rise to both the 1848 Act and the 1981–1984 Acts is the respective role of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches in granting a foreign state's extradition request. The outcomes, however, were different on these two historic occasions. The 1848 Act was designed to limit executive power, so that action such as President Adams's ordering an individual's surrender in In re Robins would be impermissible. The underlying theory was that the judiciary should have the authority to review executive action so that fundamental individual liberty would not be improperly infringed upon. The 1981–1984 Acts in the original Senate versions intended the opposite. The administration sought to expand the executive's authority to extradite individuals, on the theory that judicial review should not be allowed to interfere with the executive's authority to direct the United States' foreign relations, and to use extradition as a method of fostering friendly relations with foreign states.[140] This philosophical diversity is the essence of the difference between the Senate bills and the House bills, with the administration's view reflected in the Senate's more executive-oriented approach.

The Act did not fulfill all of the administration's requests, although it did curb judicial discretion and review and the increasing safeguards of individual rights, which were manifest in U.S. jurisprudence.[141] The Act represented a technical improvement over existing legislation, and was indeed needed to meet the exigencies of dealing with one hundred requests per year. It was also needed in order to settle some questions with which the judiciary had been wrestling for years due to the lack of a clear legislative mandate. Yet it left many open questions, which it shifted to the judiciary for future interpretation. In many respects, the Act did no more than codify existing jurisprudence. More should have been done, and an opportunity, which, at the time waited 135 years, was not fully utilized.

The relationship between legislative provisions and treaty provisions is of fundamental importance in U.S. extradition law and practice because of the Constitution and the relationship between treaties and legislation.[142] Basically, this relationship can take one of two forms: (1) the legislation can serve as the basis for all or most substantive and procedural matters, while treaties provide for exceptional matters not included in the legislation; or (2) the legislation can serve as a supplement to treaties such that all substantive and procedural matters are regulated primarily by treaties rather than by the legislation. The Act was a hybrid of both approaches.

Bassiouni & Nanda, Treatise]. The practice of extradition originated in early non-Western civilizations, and has now reached the point where it is a common feature of bilateral, regional, and multilateral arrangements between states. See Ch. I, Secs. 1, 4, 5, and 6. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Penal Characteristics of Conventional International Criminal Law, 15 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 27 (1983) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Conventional International Criminal Law]. The concept of the duty to prosecute or extradite originated in the writings of Hugo Grotius, who propounded the maxim aut dedere aut punire, which is more appropriately phrased as aut dedere aut judicaire. See Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, Bk. 2, ch. 21, secs. 3, 4 (1624). See generally Cornelius F. Murphy, Jr., The Grotian Vision of World Order, 76 Am. J. Int'l L. 477 (1982).

139 Examples of technical aspects are provisions regarding transit extradition, priority of extradition requests, and the rule of specialty. See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101, at 20–24 (testimony of this writer); House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227, supra note 109, at 98–106 (testimony of this writer).

140 This argument was raised unsuccessfully by the U.S. government in Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D.Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

141 See supra, Sec. 2.

142 See generally Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (2d ed.1996).

The distinction between these two possible relationships has important ramifications. If the former approach were followed, then national legislation would be controlling with respect to all extradition matters and would regulate both substance and procedure. Treaties would be the exception. That is, treaties would regulate matters not included in the legislation or negotiated in the treaty as an exception to the legislation. If the latter approach were followed, however, then national legislation would not be the general rule. Instead, every treaty would become a separate substantive and procedural statute, more or less different from the legislation. The result of that approach would be to have as many sets of norms applied by the courts as there are treaties. There are at present 160 treaties in force, applicable to 116 countries.[143] The obvious consequence would be a lack of consistency and uniformity in the practice of extradition and potential jurisprudential confusion, leading to increased litigation and prolongation of the process. Precedents would, therefore, usually affect the interpretation of the provisions of each treaty, thus stimulating increased judicial recourses and delays through the review process. In addition to the obvious advantages of uniformity, reduction of litigation, and shortening of delays in the process, a truly national legislation would also reduce the burden on the U.S. government in renegotiating with every foreign government basic substantive and procedural matters already contained in the national legislation. Furthermore, the existence of national legislation, although it would not preclude the government from negotiating treaty provisions that might be contrary to it, would nevertheless strengthen the government's position in its negotiations with foreign governments regarding provisions urged by the foreign government that would differ from national legislation. It would thus maintain greater uniformity among treaties and conformity between treaties and the legislation. The more the legislation, in its specific language, allows for treaties to regulate certain substantive and procedural matters, the more likely it is that foreign governments will insist on particular clauses that may differ from the legislation.

Furthermore, national legislation that is comprehensive, covering substance and procedure, would allow extradition to be performed on the basis of "executive agreement" and "reciprocity,"[144] which the Act excludes, presumably in reliance on longstanding and established jurisprudence,[145] although nothing in the Constitution would prevent it.[146]

Regrettably, the general orientation of the Act is that it is a supplement to treaties or that it otherwise applies in the absence of contrary treaty provisions, but only when a treaty does exist between the requesting state and the United States. Consequently, not all substantive and procedural matters that should be regulated by treaties will tend to be regulated in that manner. This approach differs from that of many countries, who attempt to conform their treaties to national legislation, and in fact specify in their treaties that they are applicable in accordance with national legislation.[147]

In addition, the Act is unclear as to reliance on multilateral international criminal law conventions as the basis for a relator's extradition.[148] These treaties provide, inter alia, that state-parties

---

143 See Extradition Treaties Interpretation Act of 1998, 18 U.S.C. § 3181 (2000), as amended Pub. L 104-132 title IV § 443 (a), Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1280. See also Igor I. Kavass & Adolf Sprudzs, Extradition Laws and Treaties: U.S. (2 vols. 1980); Igor I. Kavass, 1–3 A Guide to the U.S. Treaties in Force (2006).

144 See infra Sec. 4.

145 See, e.g., United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 411 (1886).

146 See infra Sec. 4.

147 These observations were made by this writer before the Senate and House Judiciary Committee Hearings on their respective proposed bills. See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101, at 20–23; House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227, supra note 109, at 101–102.

148 For a bibliography of international criminal law conventions, see Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 72. For duty to extradite or prosecute, see Ch. I, Sec. 3.

are obligated to prosecute or extradite individuals who have allegedly committed the proscribed act.[149] They contain no provision for the mechanism by which extradition is to be accomplished, because they remand to the applicable nation. In the instance where the basis for the extradition request is a multilateral international criminal law convention, the provisions of the Act would be applicable. By structuring the Act as an adjunct to treaties rather than as the generally applicable norm, the legislature neglected to take into account the way in which this would affect reliance upon multilateral international criminal law conventions that contain extradition clauses. Thus, in this respect, the Act is ambiguous. As one of Congress's principle objectives in its reform of existing extradition law and practice is to permit the United States to cooperate in combating international and transnational criminality,[150] the Act's failure to specifically provide for reliance upon multilateral international criminal law conventions containing extradition clauses is particularly unfortunate. Yet because of the ambiguity of the relevant language of the Act, the courts could construe it as applicable in such cases, as discussed below.

Neither the administration nor Congress appears willing to pursue comprehensive legislation to modernize the existing provisions of 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196. Instead, U.S. policy since 1981 seems to be intent on pursuing bilateral treaties, embodying whatever provisions could be negotiated that would alter or supplement existing statutory provisions. The problem with this approach is that it does not provide for uniformity and consistency in the extradition law and practice of the United States. In addition, it creates different jurisprudence for different treaties, thus creating a disparity in the law and practice of extradition, depending upon which treaty is applicable at the time and also depending upon how different circuits will interpret certain requirements for extradition. This situation makes it more difficult to ascertain the precedential value of decisions interpreting a given treaty with respect to other treaties. This situation can create inconsistencies. As a result, the most important area of jurisprudential development is that of treaty interpretation and the relationship of treaties to the existing statute, which they may supersede, and the application of constitutional rights. Thus, many issues, which have been solved by reference to the statute,[151] should be reconsidered in light of constitutional provisions that have not heretofore been relied upon because the provisions of the statute or other decisions were deemed sufficient. Among these issues are that of the requirement of "probable cause"[152] and its correspondence to the Fourth Amendment, and bail, which, though not statutorily provided for, has been established by the Supreme Court without reference to the Sixth Amendment.[153]

During the hearings before the Subcommittee on Crime regarding H.R. 5227, this writer spoke of the need for a unified approach to extradition:

> The importance of having a single national legislation providing uniformity in application cannot be underestimated. The Extradition Act should accomplish this purpose by serving as the 149 See Ch. I, Sec. 3. Bassiouni, Conventional International Criminal Law, supra note 138. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Report on the Judicial Status of the Requesting State Denying Extradition, XIth International Congress of Comparative Law, Caracas, Venezuela, August 20–September 5, 1982, Proceedings of XIth International Congress of Comparative Law (analyzing comparatively state law and practice regarding duty to prosecute or extradite).

150 Senate Judiciary Report on S. 1940, supra note 99, at 4; House Judiciary Report on H.R. 6046, supra note 107, at 3–4.

151 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 (2000).

152 18 U.S.C. § 3184 (Amended Pub. L. 104-132 title IV § 443 (b) Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1281). See also Ch. IX.

153 See Ch. IX.

> basis for all substantive and procedural matters, while treaties, on the other hand, should include exceptional matters not covered in the legislation.
>
> If the national legislation is not the general rule, then every treaty becomes a separate procedural statute, with the result that there could be as many as one hundred different procedures applied by the courts. The obvious consequence would be lack of consistency in the practice of extradition and potential jurisprudential confusion. Because precedents would only affect the interpretation of the provisions of each treaty individually, this would stimulate and increase judicial recourses with the result that the judicial case load would be significantly increased, especially at the appellate level, for a number of years to come. In addition to the obvious advantages of uniformity and reduction of litigation, a national legislation would also reduce the burden on the U.S. government on renegotiating with every foreign government basic substantive and procedural matters already contained in the Act.
>
> Furthermore, the existence of national legislation, while it would not preclude the government from negotiating treaty provisions that may be contrary to it, would nevertheless strengthen the government's position in its negotiations with foreign governments in maintaining greater uniformity among treaties and conformity between the treaties and the legislation. The more the legislation in its specific language allows for treaties to regulate certain substantive and procedural matters, the more likely it is that foreign governments will insist on particular clauses which may differ from the legislation. Thus a true national legislation is what is suggested as it is the trend throughout the world as opposed to our Act which merely supplements treaties which would put the U.S. in a rather unique position among most countries of the world with a tradition in extradition law and practice.[154]

The trend toward bilateralism as opposed to multilateralism is predicated on the assumption that the United States can obtain more favorable extradition bilateral treaties from friendly states and from those states it can influence. The embodiment of this approach is the United States–United Kingdom Supplementary Extradition Treaty of 1985,[155] which carves out limitations to the political offense exception only as between the United States and the United Kingdom.[156]

2.3. Defining a "Foreign Government" for Purposes of Extradition Treaties

In In re Extradition of Coe, the authority of a foreign government to enter into agreements with the United States was discussed.

> The authority of a foreign government to enter into any agreement with the U.S. is a political question on which the Court must defer to the political branches of the government. This Court agrees with the Second Circuit, as it found in Cheung, that the political question doctrine prevents the courts from determining the legitimacy of the government of the HKSAR. The Second Circuit further found that there was "no doubt that in enacting the Agreement, both the Executive Branch and the Senate intended to conclude a treaty with the government of HKSAR,

---

154 House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227, supra note 109, at 102. The same observation was made by this author before the Senate Judiciary Committee on S. 1639. See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101.

155 Supplementary Treaty Concerning Extradition, June 25, 1985, U.S.–U.K., T.I.A.S. (not yet numbered), 24 I.L.M. 1105 (1985), superseded by Extradition Treaty, U.S.–U.K., March 31, 2003, S. Treaty Doc. No. 108-23, 2003 WL 23527406. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The "Political Offense Exception" Revisited: Extradition Between the U.S. and the U.K.—A Choice between Friendly Cooperation among Allies and Sound Law and Policy, 15 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (1987); M. Cherif Bassiouni, U.S.–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty, Statement Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 99th Cong., 1st Sess., 276 (1985).

156 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 (discussing the political offense exception).

> rather than with its sovereign, the PRC." Cheung, 213 F.3d at 93. As argued by the U.S. here, it is uncontroverted that the President entered into the extradition agreement with the HKSAR and that he did so with the advice and consent of the Senate. (Position at 7-9). Therefore, the President and Senate have unequivocally indicated that they believe that the government of the HKSAR has the authority to enter into an extradition agreement with the U.S.
>
> In an analogous case, the Ninth Circuit found in Then v. Melendez, 92 F.3d 851 (9th Cir. 1996), that the actions of the government indicating an intention by the U.S. to negotiate and approve the continuation of an extradition treaty are sufficient to "establish the existence of a constitutionally valid extradition treaty between Singapore and the U.S.." Then, 92 F.3d at 854; see also Schroder v. Bush, 263 F.3d 1169, 1174 (10th Cir.2001) (noting that the President alone has the power to negotiate treaties and the Constitution does not contemplate participation by "the Judiciary in any fashion in the making of international agreements"), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1083, 122 S.Ct. 817, 151 L.Ed.2d 700 (2002); Miami Nation v. U.S., 255 F.3d 342, 346–47 (7th Cir. 2001) (noting that the recognition of a government is traditionally an executive function and "lies at the heart of the doctrine of 'political questions."), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1129, 122 S.Ct. 1067, 151 L.Ed.2d 970 (2002). Similarly, in determining whether Taiwan was bound by the Warsaw Convention, which was signed by the PRC, but not by Taiwan, the Ninth Circuit recognized that the Constitution "commits to the Executive Branch alone the authority to recognize, and to withdraw recognition from, foreign regimes." Mingtai Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. UPS, 177 F.3d 1142, 1145 (9th Cir.1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 951, 120 S.Ct. 374, 145 L.Ed.2d 292 (1999). Thus, the question of the sovereignty of Taiwan was found to be a political question, which could not be addressed by the courts. Id. In order to determine the applicability of the Convention in that case, the Ninth Circuit held that it would merely "look to the statements and actions of the 'political departments' in order to answer whether, following recognition of China and derecognition of Taiwan, China's adherence to the Warsaw Convention binds Taiwan." Id. Finding evidence of executive and legislative intent to deal separately with Taiwan, the Ninth Circuit found that "Taiwan is not bound by China's adherence to the Warsaw Convention." Id. at 1147.
>
> Here, this Court is not in a position to intrude into the political sphere and find, contrary to every indication of executive and legislative intent, that the HKSAR is not a foreign government capable of entering into a treaty with the U.S.. Because the recognition of foreign regimes is solely within the power of the Executive branch, this Court must defer to the decision by the President and State Department that the HKSAR was a proper foreign entity with which to enter into an extradition agreement.[157]

The relator in this case also argued that a treaty must be with a sovereign state. The district court, however, found that a treaty can also be with a "subsovereign entity." The court articulated its reasoning as follows:

> Coe argues that the Court is not precluded by the political question doctrine from examining the enforceability of the Agreement because the key question governing its validity is whether the President has the constitutional authority to enter into a "treaty" with a subsovereign entity. Because the Second Circuit in Cheung did not address this question, Coe claims that its analysis is incorrect. Coe contends that the President's actions in entering into the Agreement violated the Constitution because the Constitution only authorizes treaties with sovereign entities. Further, Coe asserts that this Court must examine the fundamental question of whether the President's actions exceeded the scope of his Constitutional authority. If the Agreement was not Constitutionally authorized, Coe argues, it is not a valid treaty and the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction to grant the request of the HKSAR for his extradition. (Response at 9–11).
>
> Coe's argument rests on his assertion that 'a treaty can only be maintained between nations, not between a nation and a city or region of a country.' (Response at 5). In support of this position, he cites Valentine v. U.S., 299 U.S. 5, 57 S.Ct. 100, 81 L.Ed. 5 (1936), as standing "for the proposition that treaties may be maintained only between sovereign nations." (Response at 6). But the Supreme Court's statement in Valentine that the "power to provide for extradition is a national power; it pertains to the national government and not to the states," was made in reference to the fact that the Constitutional power to negotiate treaties in this country is reserved for the federal government rather than left to the states. 299 U.S. at 8, 57 S.Ct. 100. The issue before the Supreme Court was the validity of an extradition treaty with France that excluded extradition of each country's own citizens. Because the Supreme Court found that it was limited to interpreting the terms of the existing treaty, which clearly excluded the citizens of each country, the Supreme Court concluded that the President was without power to agree to the request of France to extradite two citizens of the U.S.. In Valentine, both the U.S. and France were unquestionably sovereign entities and, thus, the Supreme Court had no occasion to even touch upon the issue presently before this Court. Similarly, in U.S. v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S.Ct. 234, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886), also cited by Coe, the issue before the Supreme Court was whether a defendant could be tried in the U.S. on a different crime than the one for which Great Britain had extradited him. Coe points to the Supreme Court's quote that "[a] treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations" (Rauscher, 119 U.S. at 418, 7 S.Ct. 234), as supporting his position that treaties must be "contracts between nations" and the U.S. is not authorized to enter into a treaty with a non-sovereign entity. (Response at 6–7). But the issue of the degree of sovereignty required in a foreign government to constitutionally permit the U.S. to enter into a treaty with it was not relevant to the decision therein, and the quoted language sheds no light on this question.

157 In re Extradition of Coe, 261 F. Supp. 2d 1203, 1208–1209 (C.D. Cal. 2003).

Coe also references the Ninth Circuit's decision in Stevenson v. U.S., 381 F.2d 142 (9th Cir.1967). (Response at 6). The Ninth Circuit in Stevenson did adopt the definition of "extradition" as being the "surrender by one nation to another of an individual accused or convicted of an offense outside of its own territory, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the other, which, being competent to try and to punish him, demands his surrender." See Stevenson, 381 F.2d at 144 (citing Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289, 22 S.Ct. 484, 46 L.Ed. 534 (1902)). This definition, however, does not pertain to the question herein of whether such a "nation" must be a sovereign entity. In Stevenson, the issue before the Ninth Circuit was again unrelated to this issue. There, the Ninth Circuit found that the treaty in question was "irrelevant" because "extradition, as contemplated by the treaty, was not involved" where the individuals were deported by Mexican immigration authorities as undesirable aliens and no extradition proceedings were ever commenced by the U.S.. Id. at 143–44.

Coe also asserts that the Ninth Circuit in Then found that a treaty between the U.S. and Singapore was a valid treaty because "Singapore became a sovereign state" prior to ratification of the continuation of an existing treaty that the U.S. had entered into with the former colonial power of Singapore, the United Kingdom. (See Response at 6). But Coe misconstrues the holding of Then. The Ninth Circuit did in fact note that Singapore had become a sovereign state because the change in sovereignty of Singapore was the basis for the challenge to the validity of the extradition treaty in question. But the Ninth Circuit stated this fact in recounting the history of the relations between the U.S. and the government of Singapore. See Then, 92 F.3d at 853. The Ninth Circuit went on to hold that "[t]he continuing validity of the Treaty after Singapore's independence from the United Kingdom presents a political question, and we must defer to the intentions of the State Departments of the two countries." Id. at 854. The Ninth Circuit found that "the existence of a constitutionally valid extradition treaty between Singapore and the U.S." was based on the "respective State Departments' actions evincing an intent to continue the Treaty between the two nations." Id. The fact that Singapore has become a sovereign county was not determinative of the holding. Thus, none of the cases cited by Coe support his argument that treaties are constitutionally limited to sovereign entities.

Article II, section 2 of the Constitution provides that the President has "Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators > present concur." Coe's argument that the power given to the President by Article II is limited to treaties executed with sovereign entities is belied by the extensive history of treaties between the U.S. and the various Indian nations. See, e.g., County of Oneida v. Oneida Indian Nation, 470 U.S. 226, 231–32, 105 S.Ct. 1245, 84 L.Ed.2d 169 (1985) (detailing the history of treaties entered into with the Oneida Indian Nations and noting that the 1793 revision of the Indian Trade and Intercourse Act provided that no purchase of tribal lands was valid unless "made by a treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the constitution"); Cheung, 213 F.3d at 89–90 (noting that at the time the federal extradition statute was passed, the U.S. had "ratified hundreds of treaties with Indian tribes or nations"). An Indian nation, while retaining some inherent sovereign powers, is not an independent sovereign entity. See, e.g., Nevada v. Hicks, 533 U.S. 353, 361, 121 S.Ct. 2304, 150 L.Ed.2d 398 (2001) ("Our cases make clear that the Indians' right to make their own laws and be governed by them does not exclude all state regulatory authority on the reservation. State sovereignty does not end at a reservation's border. Though tribes are often referred to as 'sovereign' entities, it was 'long ago' that the Court departed from Chief Justice Marshall's view that 'the laws of [a State] can have no force' within reservation boundaries.") (citing Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. 515, 6 Pet. 515, 561, 8 L.Ed. 483 (1832)); Montana v. U.S., 450 U.S. 544, 564, 101 S.Ct. 1245, 67 L.Ed.2d 493 (1981) (holding that the "exercise of tribal power beyond what is necessary to protect tribal self-government or to control internal relations is inconsistent with the dependent status of the tribes, and so cannot survive without express congressional delegation").[158]

In Cheung v. United States,[159] the Second Circuit addressed the treaty issue in connection with Hong Kong. Until July 1, 1997, Hong Kong was legally a part of the United Kingdom, and therefore the United States–United Kingdom Extradition Treaty and Protocols applied. Despite coming under China's sovereignty in 1997, Hong Kong's maintains its self-governing status until 2047.[160]

> Cheung challenged the court's jurisdiction on the ground that the Hong Kong Extradition Agreement was not a treaty between the U.S. and a "foreign government" as that term is used in § 3184. See Cheung II, slip op. at 6–7. He argued that a "foreign government" refers to the government of a foreign sovereign. See id. Because the HKSAR government is a subsovereign of the PRC, he asserted that the HKSAR government is not a cognizable party under § 3184, and, therefore, no enforceable treaty exists which authorizes his extradition to the HKSAR. See id. In the absence of such a treaty, he contends that the magistrate judge lacked jurisdiction under § 3184 to certify his extraditability.
>
> The magistrate judge held that the Hong Kong Extradition Agreement is valid and enforceable. See id. at 7–8. She noted that, notwithstanding the PRC's ultimate control of foreign affairs relating to the HKSAR, Article 151 of the Basic Law provides that the HKSAR government "may, on its own, using the name 'Hong Kong, China,' maintain and develop relations and conclude and implement agreements with foreign states and regions." Id. at 4. The magistrate judge also observed that the Basic Law created executive, judicial, and legislative bodies which govern Hong Kong, authorized an economic system independent of the PRC, and preserved civil and political rights. See id. at 4. Based largely on these factors, the magistrate judge concluded that:

---

158 Id. at 1209–1211.

159 Cheung v. United States, 213 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2000).

160 The Joint Declaration of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government for the People's Republic of Chin on the Question of Hong Kong, December 19, 1984, entered into effect May 27, 1985. The date of transfer of UK control to China occurred on July 1, 1997. Hong Kong will remain self-governing for fifty years (until 2047). 1399 U.N.T.S. 33. The United States entered into a treaty on Extradition with Hong Kong that provides reciprocal extradition. See Agreement Between the Government of the United States and the Government of Hong Kong for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders, December 20, 1996, entered into effect January 21, 1998. TIAS 105-3.

> with its own legislative body, its "high degree of autonomy on all matters other than defense and foreign affairs," and its unique "one country, two systems" for economic and legal matters, under the Basic Law and the U.S.–Hong Kong Policy Act, HKSAR does constitute a "foreign government" for purposes of § 3184.

Id. at 7.

Having found at a prior proceeding probable cause to believe that Cheung is guilty of the charged offenses, see Cheung I, 968 F. Supp. at 805–09, the magistrate judge granted the Government's request for extradition . . . [161]

On a petition for habeas corpus before the District Court:

> The court construed "such foreign government" to refer to the government of the "foreign country" where the charged crime was allegedly committed. See Cheung III, slip op. at 2–3. It held that because the HKSAR is not a "foreign country," the Hong Kong Extradition Agreement did not satisfy the § 3184 condition precedent for federal jurisdiction over Cheung's extradition. See id. at 6. In so holding, the district court implicitly equated a "foreign country" with a "foreign sovereign." See id. at 2–3.

The court also reasoned that Congress was unlikely to have intended to extradite foreign nationals to subsovereigns. See id. at 4. In support of this conclusion, the court noted several cases which have referred to extradition as a process between sovereign nations. See id.

Moreover, the district court held that neither the Hong Kong Extradition Agreement nor the Hong Kong Policy Act can be construed to have modified or repealed the federal extradition statute. See id. at 4–5. As to the Agreement, the district judge reasoned that this effort "by the Executive branch and the Senate does not supplant the prior legislation of the entire Congress." Id. at 5. Where Congress has exercised its authority to limit the Executive's latitude in conducting foreign relations by enacting the extradition statute, extradition contrary to the terms of the statute would "pose[] a substantial threat to the separation of powers." Id. at 6. As to the Policy Act, the district court found no "repugnancy" between the Act and the statute since the Act merely affirmed Congress's intent to fulfill existing treaty obligations, but did not itself authorize extradition. See id. at 5.

Accordingly, the district court held that Cheung may not be extradited to the HKSAR pursuant to § 3184 and ordered his release from custody. See id. at 6–7.[162]

The government sought review of this decision before the Second Circuit, which held:

> The extradition statute confers jurisdiction on federal judicial officers to conduct extradition proceedings based on "a treaty or convention for extradition between the U.S. and any foreign government." 18 U.S.C. § 3184. Although the term "treaty" is commonly understood in modern usage as a "contract[] between independent nations," Santovincenzo v. Egan, 284 U.S. 30, 40, 76 L. Ed. 151, 52 S. Ct. 81 (1931), the term was not necessarily so limited in the mid-19th century (or now) when the federal extradition statute was enacted. It is true that at the time Congress passed the act, the U.S. had ratified only two extradition treaties, both with sovereign nations—France and England. See Moore, supra note 2, § 74, at 84 (discussing Treaty of 1843 with France), § 78, at 84 (Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain), § 79, at 92–93 (Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain). However, the U.S. had also ratified hundreds of treaties with Indian tribes or nations. See Francis Paul Prucha, American Indian Treaties 1, 67 (1994) (noting that between 1778–1868, there were 367 ratified Indian treaties); Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. 515, 549-53, 8 L. Ed. 483 (1832) (discussing post-Revolutionary War treaties with the Delaware and Cherokee Nations); Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U.S. 1, 16, 8 L. Ed. 25 (1831) (noting the numerous treaties between the Cherokee Nation and the U.S.); U.S. v. Claus, 63 F. Supp. 433, 434 (W.D.N.Y. 1944) (discussing the impact of the Selective Service Act on treaties with various Indian tribes signed between 1784 and 1794). From the first years of our constitutional republic, the Indian treaties have enjoyed a status "on a par with foreign treaties," id. at 67; see Felix S. Cohen, Handbook of Federal Indian Law 33-34 (1988) ("That treaties with Indian tribes are of the same dignity as treaties with foreign nations is a view which has been repeatedly confirmed by the federal courts[.]"). This has been the case even though Indian treaty partners have been described as "domestic dependent nations" insofar as they had ceded powers generally associated with sovereignty, including the right freely to carry out foreign relations and trade. Cherokee Nation, 30 U.S. at 17; see Prucha, supra, at 5, 7.

161 Cheung, 213 F.3d at 86–87.

162 Id. at 87

Thus, it is clear that the term "treaty" had a meaning broader than an agreement between fully sovereign or independent entities. Indeed, at the time the extradition statute was enacted in 1848, "treaty" was also defined as "the treating of matters with a view to settlement; discussion of terms, conference negotiations" and "[a] settlement or arrangement arrived at by treating or negotiation." Oxford English Dictionary 465 (2d ed. 1991) (providing annotations about the uses of words in different historical eras); see Prucha, supra, at 24. Nothing in these definitions suggest that only a sovereign nation can enter into treaties, as Cheung contends.

We consider next the § 3184 requirement that the treaty be between the U.S. and "any foreign government." We believe the district court correctly construed "foreign government" by reference to § 3181, which clarifies that the relevant foreign government is the government of the foreign country where the alleged extraditable crime was committed.[3] This provision expressly applies to the entire chapter 209 of title 28. Moreover, the title of § 3184—"Fugitives from foreign country to U.S."—also indicates that the term "any foreign government" within the text means the government of any foreign country. "Although mindful of the limited role of statutory headings in textual interpretation," this Court has recognized that statutory headings may be used to resolve ambiguities in the text. U.S. v. Baldwin, 186 F.3d 99, 101 (2d Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 120 S. Ct. 558 (1999). Thus, federal courts have jurisdiction over extradition complaints only when a valid treaty exists between the U.S. and the government of the foreign country where the alleged offense occurred.. .

If § 3184 contains a sovereign nation requirement, that requirement would have to derive from the term "foreign country," because it cannot be implied from the term "treaty." The district court, without discussion, equated "foreign country" with a foreign sovereign or foreign central government. The Government contests this interpretation, arguing that if a "foreign country" means only a foreign sovereign government, then the word "any" in "any foreign government" would be rendered meaningless. See 18 U.S.C. § 3184. It maintains that the HKSAR government is indisputably both "foreign" and a "government" and therefore falls within the meaning of "any foreign government." It argues further that if Congress had intended to restrict the authority of the Executive to enter into extradition treaties with foreign sovereigns only, it would have used the modifiers "national," or "central," or "fully autonomous" foreign government.

We agree with the Government that a "foreign country" does not refer solely to a foreign sovereign or independent nation.. .

The Supremacy Clause declares the Constitution, federal law, and treaties to be "the supreme Law of the Land." U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. It is well-established that under the Supremacy Clause a self-executing treaty—one that operates of itself without the aid of legislation—is to be regarded in the courts as equivalent to an act of the legislature. See Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194, 31 L. Ed. 386, 8 S. Ct. 456 (1888) (to the extent that treaties are self-executing, they "have the force and effect of a legislative enactment."); see also Bassiouni, supra, at 72 ("Treaties of extradition are deemed self-executing and therefore equivalent to an act of the legislature." (footnote omitted)); Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 199 (2d ed. 1996) (same).[163]

163 Id. at 89–95.

3. The Different Constitutional Types and Meanings of "Treaties"

A strict interpretation of the Constitution would require that a treaty be defined as it was understood in customary international law at the time of the Constitution's drafting. But that was not the case, as evidenced in federal legislation and federal jurisprudence.

What constitutes a "treaty" under U.S. law is largely based on a constitutional interpretation of Article VI section 2 and Article II section 2 clause 2. Thus, whether a "treaty" is considered to be such under Article VI clause 2 will depend on Congress's intent in connection with the specific legislation in question. This means that what constitutes a "treaty" under a given congressional enactment may not necessarily be construed as such in another. Moreover, what constitutes a "treaty," for purposes of both Article VI para. 2 and Article II para. 2 as compared to an executive agreement and therefore not requiring "advice and consent" of the Senate pursuant to Article II may still be construed as a treaty for purpose of interpreting that agreement.

The Supreme Court held that there are various types and meaning of treaties for constitutional purposes. Specifically, in Weinberger v. Rossi, the Court was presented with the issue "…whether 'treaty' includes executive agreements concluded by the President with the host country, or whether the term is limited to those international agreements entered into by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate pursuant to Article II, § 2, cl. 2, of the U.S. Constitution." In this case, the Court stated that the "issue is solely one of statutory interpretation," and in Weinberger v. Rossi it resolved the issue:

> The word "treaty" has more than one meaning. Under principles of international law, the word ordinarily refers to an international agreement concluded between sovereigns, regardless of the manner in which the agreement is brought into force. 206 U. S. App. D. C., at 151, 642 F.2d, at 556. Under the U.S. Constitution, of course, the word "treaty" has a far more restrictive meaning. Article II, § 2, cl. 2, of that instrument provides that the President "shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."
>
> Congress has not been consistent in distinguishing between Art. II treaties and other forms of international agreements. For example, in the Case Act, 1 U. S. C. § 112b(a) (1976 ed., Supp. IV), Congress required the Secretary of State to "transmit to the Congress the text of any international agreement,…other than a treaty, to which the U.S. is a party" no later than 60 days after "such agreement has entered into force." Similarly, Congress has explicitly referred to Art. II treaties in the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, 16 U. S. C. § 1801 et seq. (1976 ed. and Supp. IV), and the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, 22 U. S. C. § 2551 et seq. (1976 ed. and Supp. IV). On the other hand, Congress has used "treaty" to refer only to international agreements other than Art. II treaties. In 39 U. S. C. § 407(a), for example, Congress authorized the Postal Service, with the consent of the President, to "negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions." A "treaty" which requires only the consent of the President is not an Art. II treaty. Thus it is not dispositive that Congress in § 106 used the term "treaty" without specifically including international agreements that are not Art. II treaties.
>
> The fact that Congress has imparted no precise meaning to the word "treaty" as that term is used in its various legislative Acts was recognized by this Court in B. Altman & Co. v. U.S., 224 U.S. 583 (1912). There this Court construed "treaty" in § 5 of the Circuit Court of Appeals Act of 1891, ch. 517, 26 Stat. 826, to include international agreements concluded by the President under congressional authorization. 224 U.S., at 601. The Court held that the word "treaty" in the jurisdictional statute extended to such an agreement, saying: "If not technically a treaty requiring ratification, nevertheless it was a compact authorized by the Congress of the U.S., negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of its President. We think such a compact is a treaty under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act…." Ibid.. .
>
> It has been a maxim of statutory construction since the decision in Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch 64, 118 (1804), that "an act of congress ought never to be construed to violate > the law of nations, if any other possible construction remains . . . ." In McCulloch v. Sociedad Nacional de Marineros de Honduras, 372 U.S. 10, 20–21 (1963), this principle was applied to avoid construing the National Labor Relations Act in a manner contrary to State Department regulations, for such a construction would have had foreign policy implications. The McCulloch Court also relied on the fact that the proposed construction would have been contrary to a "well-established rule of international law." Id., at 21. While these considerations apply with less force to a statute which by its terms is designed to affect conditions on U.S. enclaves outside of the territorial limits of this country than they do to the construction of statutes couched in general language which are sought to be applied in an extraterritorial way, they are nonetheless not without force in either case.[164]

It is important to note that the Supreme Court has held consistently since 1804 in Murray v. The Charming Betsy[165] that an act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains.[166] This is reflected in the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States,[167] which is in keeping with the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 even though the United States is not a state party to that Vienna convention.

4. The Legal Bases of Extradition

4.1. Introduction

In accordance with Title 18 U.S.C. § 3181, extradition can only be requested or granted on the basis of a treaty. Such a treaty can be: (1) a bilateral extradition treaty, (2) a multilateral extradition treaty, (3) a multilateral treaty containing an extradition clause, (4) a military rendition agreement, or (5) a treaty for the transfer of offenders containing a return clause.

Thus far, the practice of the United States has been to rely on bilateral extradition treaties, military rendition agreements, and transfer of offenders agreements, the latter two not being construed in the nature of formal extradition. Nevertheless, nothing in existing legislation precludes reliance on multilateral extradition treaties, whether they are specialized extradition treaties or other general treaties containing an extradition clause.[168]

In the past, the United States has requested or granted extradition on the basis of reciprocity or comity. Currently, it will only grant extradition on the basis of a treaty, although it can and does on occasion request extradition on the basis of comity.[169]

The 1981–1984 Draft Extradition Acts, in defining the term "treaty" (section 3191), permit reliance on multilateral treaties, but not on executive agreements. The testimony of this writer before the Senate and House Committees on the Judiciary, as published in the Senate Hearings and restated in the House Report and debates on this issue, reveals that reliance on multilateral treaties was intended by Congress, through the definition of the term "treaty." Although the proposed legislation was not passed, nothing precludes reliance on multilateral treaties.

---

164 Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 29–36 (1982) (footnotes omitted).

165 Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 6 U.S. 64 (1804).

166 Id. at 118.

167 Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 115.

168 See Ch. I, Secs. 4 and 5.

169 See infra Sec. 4.5.

4.2. Bilateral Treaties (See Appendix II)

The United States relies on bilateral treaties as the legal basis of extradition,[170] although reliance on multilateral treaties is equally valid.[171] The United States deems itself bound only by such extradition treaties or undertakings as it may elect,[172] and considers the process and practice of extradition subject to federal legislation. As a result, it is reluctant to apply customary international law to extradition though it does so with treaty interpretation. A classic example of this view can be found in the Supreme Court's United States v. Rauscher decision:

> It is only in modern times that the nations of the earth have imposed upon themselves the obligation of delivering up these fugitives from justice to the States where their crimes were committed, for trial and punishment. This has been done generally by treaties . . . Prior to these treaties, and apart from them . . . there was no well-defined obligation on one country to deliver up such fugitives to another, and though such delivery was often made, it was upon the principle of comity . . . [It] has never been recognized as among those obligations of one government towards another which rest upon established principles of international law.[173]

The United States' almost exclusive reliance on bilateral extradition treaties caused it to develop a burdensome practice of treaty-making. The resulting necessity of updating them was a major undertaking, leading to an almost constant process of negotiating new treaties or renegotiating supplementary ones. As a result, U.S. practice relying on bilateral treaties had all of the problems pertaining thereto, such as state succession, the effects of war, the severance of diplomatic relations, and the perennial dilemma of maintaining a network of treaties with a growing number of states. These treaties provide in detail for all matters ranging from extraditable offenses to modes of delivery of the relator.

With respect to the need for a treaty duly submitted to the Senate for its "advice and consent" and then ratified by the president, the contemporary position is that this is not specifically required. Thus, by signing an executive agreement, the president may act in a manner that parallels the conclusion of a treaty. This position was enunciated by the Fifth Circuit in Ntakirutimana v. Reno:

> Ntakirutimana alleges that Article II of the Constitution of the U.S. requires that an extradition occur pursuant to a treaty. It is unconstitutional, he claims, to extradite him to the ICTR pursuant to a statute in the absence of a treaty. Accordingly, he claims it is unconstitutional to extradite him on the basis of the Agreement and Pub.Law 104-106 (the "Congressional–Executive Agreement"). The district court concluded that it is constitutional to surrender Ntakirutimana in the absence of an "extradition treaty," because a statute authorized extradition. We review this legal issue de novo. See U.S. v. Luna, 165 F.3d 316, 319 (5th Cir.1999), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 1126, 119 S.Ct. 1783, 143 L.Ed.2d 811 (1999) (reviewing constitutionality of extradition statute de novo).
>
> To determine whether a treaty is required to extradite Ntakirutimana, we turn to the text of the Constitution. Ntakirutimana contends that Article II, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution requires a treaty to extradite. This Clause, which enumerates the President's foreign relations power, provides in part that "[the President] shall have Power, by and with the Advice and 170 See Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 732–737. See also Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 476; International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, 1980 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. 277 (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni).

---

171 See infra Sec. 4.3.

172 See Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 732–737.

173 See United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886). See also Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

> Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls . . . ." U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. This provision does not refer either to extradition or to the necessity of a treaty to extradite. The Supreme Court has explained, however, that "[t]he power to surrender is clearly included within the treaty-making power and the corresponding power of appointing and receiving ambassadors and other public ministers." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289, 22 S.Ct. 484, 492, 46 L.Ed. 534 (1902) (citation omitted).

Yet, the Court has found that the executive's power to surrender fugitives is not unlimited. In Valentine v. United States the Supreme Court considered whether an exception clause[174] in the United States' extradition treaty with France implicitly granted to the executive the discretionary power to surrender citizens. The Court first stated that the power to provide for extradition is a national power that "is not confided to the Executive in the absence of treaty or legislative provision."[175] The Court explained:

> [The power to extradite] rests upon the fundamental consideration that the Constitution creates no executive prerogative to dispose of the liberty of the individual. Proceedings against him must be authorized by law. There is no executive discretion to surrender him to a foreign government, unless that discretion is granted by law. It necessarily follows that as the legal authority does not exist save as it is given by act of Congress or by the terms of a treaty, it is not enough that the statute or treaty does not deny the power to surrender. It must be found that statute or treaty confers the power.[176]
>
> The Court then considered whether any statute authorized the Executive's discretion to extradite. The Court commented that:
>
> > Whatever may be the power of the Congress to provide for extradition independent of treaty, that power has not been exercised save in relation to a foreign country or territory "occupied by or under the control of the U.S.." Aside from that limited provision, the Act of Congress relating to extradition simply defines the procedure to carry out an existing extradition treaty or convention.
>
> Id. at 9, 57 S.Ct. at 102–03 (citations omitted). The Court concluded that no statutory basis conferred the power on the Executive to surrender a citizen to the foreign government. See id. at 10, 57 S.Ct. at 103. The Court subsequently addressed whether the treaty conferred the power to surrender, and found that it did not. See id. at 18, 57 S.Ct. at 106. The Court concluded that, "we are constrained to hold that [the President's] power, in the absence of statute conferring an independent power, must be found in the terms of the treaty and that, as the treaty with France fails to grant the necessary authority, the President is without the power to surrender the respondents." Id. The Court added that the remedy for this lack of power "lies with the Congress, or with the treaty-making power wherever the parties are willing to provide for the surrender of citizens." Id.
>
> Valentine indicates that a court should look to whether a treaty or statute grants executive discretion to extradite. Hence, Valentine supports the constitutionality of using the Congressional–Executive Agreement to extradite Ntakirutimana. Ntakirutimana attempts to distinguish Valentine on the ground that the case dealt with a treaty between France and the U.S.. Yet, Valentine indicates that a statute suffices to confer authority on the President to surrender a fugitive. See id. Ntakirutimana suggests also that Valentine expressly challenged the power of Congress, independent of treaty, to provide for extradition. Valentine, however, did not place a limit on Congress's power to provide for extradition. See id. at 9, 57 S.Ct. at 102 ("Whatever may be the power of the Congress to provide for extradition independent of treaty . . . "). Thus, although 174 Valentine v. United States, 299 U.S. 5 (1936).

175 Id. at 8.

176 Id. at 9.

some authorization by law is necessary for the Executive to extradite, neither the Constitution's text nor Valentine require that the authorization come in the form of a treaty.

Notwithstanding the Constitution's text or Valentine, Ntakirutimana argues that the intent of the drafters of the Constitution supports his interpretation. He alleges that the delegates to the Constitutional Convention intentionally placed the Treaty power exclusively in the President and the Senate. The delegates designed this arrangement because they wanted a single executive agent to negotiate agreements with foreign powers, and they wanted the senior House of Congress—the Senate—to review the agreements to serve as a check on the executive branch. Ntakirutimana also claims that the rejection of alternative proposals suggests that the framers believed that a treaty is the only means by which the U.S. can enter into a binding agreement with a foreign nation.

We are unpersuaded by Ntakirutimana's extended discussion of the Constitution's history. Ntakirutimana does not cite to any provision in the Constitution or any aspect of its history that requires a treaty to extradite. Ntakirutimana's argument, which is not specific to extradition, is premised on the assumption that a treaty is required for an international agreement. To the contrary, "[t]he Constitution, while expounding procedural requirements for treaties alone, apparently contemplates alternate modes of international agreements." LAURENCE H. TRIBE, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 4–5, at 228–29 (2d ed.1988) (explaining that Article 1, § 10 of the Constitution refers to other international devices that may be used by the federal government). "The Supreme Court has recognized that of necessity the President may enter into certain binding agreements with foreign nations not strictly congruent with the formalities required by the Constitution's Treaty Clause." U.S. v. Walczak, 783 F.2d 852, 855 (9th Cir. 1986) (citations omitted) (executive agreement). More specifically, the Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that a treaty or statute may confer the power to extradite. See, e.g., Valentine, 299 U.S. at 18, 57 S.Ct. at 106; Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 191, 23 S.Ct. 98, 102, 47 L.Ed. 130 (1902) ("Congress has a perfect right to provide for the extradition of criminals in its own way, with or without a treaty to that effect, and to declare that foreign criminals shall be surrendered upon such proofs of criminality as it may judge sufficient." (citation omitted)); Terlinden, 184 U.S. at 289, 22 S.Ct. at 492 ("In the U.S., the general opinion and practice have been that extradition should be declined in the absence of a conventional or legislative provision." (citation omitted)).

Ntakirutimana next argues that historical practice establishes that a treaty is required to extradite. According to Ntakirutimana, the U.S. has never surrendered a person except pursuant to an Article II treaty, and the only involuntary transfers without an extradition treaty have been to "a foreign country or territory 'occupied by or under the control of the U.S.' " Valentine, 299 U.S. at 9, 57 S.Ct. at 102. This argument fails for numerous reasons. First, Valentine did not suggest that this "historical practice" limited Congress's power. See id. at 9, 57 S.Ct. at 102–03. Second, the Supreme Court's statements that a statute may confer the power to extradite also reflect a historical understanding of the Constitution. See, e.g., id. at 18, 57 S.Ct. at 106; Grin, 187 U.S. at 191, 23 S.Ct. at 102; Terlinden, 184 U.S. at 289, 22 S.Ct. at 492. Even if Congress has rarely exercised the power to extradite by statute, a historical understanding exists nonetheless that it may do so. Third, in some instances in which a fugitive would not have been extraditable under a treaty, a fugitive has been extradited pursuant to a statute that "filled the gap" in the treaty. See, e.g., Hilario v. U.S., 854 F.Supp. 165 (E.D.N.Y.1994) (upholding extradition pursuant to a post-Valentine statute that granted executive discretion to extradite). Thus, we are unconvinced that the President's practice of usually submitting a negotiated treaty to the Senate reflects a historical understanding that a treaty is required to extradite.

We are unpersuaded by Ntakirutimana's other arguments. First, he asserts that the failure to require a treaty violates the Constitution's separation of powers. He contends that if a treaty is not required, then "the President alone could make dangerous agreements with foreign governments" or "Congress could legislate foreign affairs." This argument is not relevant to an Executive–Congressional agreement, which involves neither the President acting unilaterally nor Congress negotiating with foreign countries. Second, Ntakirutimana argues that "statutes > cannot usurp the Treaty making power of Article II." The Supreme Court, however, has held that statutes can usurp a treaty. This is confirmed by the "last in time" rule that, if a statute and treaty are inconsistent, then the last in time will prevail. See, e.g., Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194, 8 S.Ct. 456, 458, 31 L.Ed. 386 (1888) ("if the two are inconsistent, the one last in date will control the other"). This rule explicitly contemplates that a statute and a treaty may at times cover the same subject matter. Third, Ntakirutimana contends that not requiring a treaty reads the treaty-making power out of the Constitution. Yet, the treaty-making power remains unaffected, because the President may still elect to submit a negotiated treaty to the Senate, instead of submitting legislation to Congress. See the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law, § 303 cmt. e (1986) ("Which procedure should be used is a political judgment, made in the first instance by the President, subject to the possibility that the Senate might refuse to consider a joint resolution of Congress to approve an agreement, insisting that the President submit the agreement as a treaty."). Thus, we conclude that it is not unconstitutional to surrender Ntakirutimana to the ICTR pursuant to the Executive–Congressional Agreement.[177]

The first international treaty entered into by the United States containing a specific provision on extradition was Jay's Treaty in 1794.[178] Article 27 of that treaty states:

> It is further agreed that His Majesty and the U.S. on mutual requisition, by them respectively, or by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other, provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the offense had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.[179]

International extradition in U.S. law and practice remains a subject of periodic controversy and debate.[180] The contemporary state of U.S. extradition law and practice gives rise to the following definition of extradition:

> [A] process by which, in accordance to treaty provisions and subject to its limitations, one state requests another to surrender a person charged with a criminal violation of the law of the requesting

---

177 Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419, 424–427 (5th Cir. 1999) (footnotes omitted)

178 The Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation with Great Britain (Jay's Treaty), Nov. 19, 1794, [1795] 8 Stat. 116, T.S. No. 105, reprinted in Malloy, supra note 12, at 590. See also Bemis, Jay's Treaty, supra note 13; 1 Moore Extradition, supra note 2, at 90.

179 Jay's Treaty, art. 27, reprinted in Malloy, supra note 12.

180 See Bruce Zagaris, Argentina Again Asks U.S. to Extradite Antonini, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 89–91 (Mar. 2007) (discussing the controversial nature of U.S. and Argentine criminal cases and the U.S. review process of the Argentine application for consistency with a 1997 extradition between the United States and Argentina). Where the United States indicted a Colombian resident for charges with respect to which there was no operative extradition treaty, the United States worked with Trinidadian authorities to secure his extradition upon the relator's entry into Trinidad. See Bruce Zagaris, Trinidad Extradites Colombian to the U.S. on Money Laundering Charges, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 266–267 (July 2008). Symposium, International Law and Extradition, 16 N.Y.L.F. 315–525 (1970) [hereinafter Symposium]. Compare Alona E. Evans, Legal Bases for Extradition in the U.S., 16 N.Y.L.F. 525 (1970), with Brendan F. Brown, Extradition and the Natural Law, 16 N.Y.L.F. 578 (1970) and O. John Rogge, State Succession, 16 N.Y.L.F. 378 (1970). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: A Summary of the Contemporary American Practice and a Proposal, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 494 (1968), reprinted in 15 Wayne L. Rev. 733 (1968); Edward M. Wise, Prolegomenon to the Principles of International Criminal Law, 16 N.Y.L.F. 562 (differing from the position of Evans and Rogge, but remaining consistent with his views expressed in Some Problems of Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 518 (1968), reprinted in 15 Wayne L. Rev. 709 (1969)).

> state who is within the jurisdiction of the requested state, for the purpose of answering criminal charges, standing trial or executing a sentence arising out of the stated criminal violation.[181]

In comparison with other modes of penal cooperation between states, the definition offered above, though correctly interpreting the United States' position, is nonetheless a narrow one. As one author stated:

> [Extradition] includes not only modes by which a state effects the return of a fugitive offender to the demanding state against whose laws he may have committed some offense, but also the acts or processes by which one sovereign state, in compliance with a formal demand, prepares to surrender to another state for trial the person of criminal character who has sought refuge in its boundaries.[182]

Extradition treaties may be deemed declarative of an existing reciprocal relationship or creative of the substantive basis of the very process. The choice of theory relied upon will determine its applicability.[183] As stated by Marjorie Whiteman:

> Extradition treaties do not, of course, make acts crimes. They merely provide a means whereby a State may obtain the return to it for trial or punishment of persons charged with or convicted of having committed acts which are crimes at the time of their commission and who have fled beyond the jurisdiction of the State whose laws, it is charged, have been violated.[184]

4.2.1. Bilateral Extradition and Mutuality of Obligation[185]

Bilateral treaties do not necessarily require a treaty to enter into effect simultaneously in both countries, in other words, after the treaty has been ratified and entered into effect in each country. It is frequently the case that a bilateral treaty may enter into force with respect to one of the contracting parties before the other. This is the case with respect to the 2003 UK–U.S. treaty,[186] whereby the United Kingdom ratified the treaty and adopted it into its national legislation,[187] while the United States ratified the treaty, bringing it into force as to the United States, in April 2007.[188] In the United Kingdom, prior to the United States' ratification, the issue had been raised in a number of extradition cases concerning the unilateral nature of the 181 For a similar definitional approach, see 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 727–728. See also Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902).

---

182 Satya D. Bedi, Extradition in International Law and Practice 15–16 (1968).

183 Thus, if an extradition treaty is considered a reflection of reciprocal relationships, then it is nullified by the breaking of diplomatic relations between the state-parties to the treaty. This is the position of the United States. See Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 769; 6 Hackworth Digest, supra note 80, at 37.

184 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 753.

185 See Ch. VII, Sec. 1.

186 Extradition Treaty, U.S.–U.K., March 31, 2003, S. Treaty Doc. No. 108-23, 2003 WL 23527406. See generally, Robert Osgood & Nathy Dunleavy, UK–US Extradition for Antitrust Offenses, 19-SPG Int'l L. Practicum 35 (Spring 2006); The Law of Extradition and Mutual Legal Assistance (Clive Nicholls, Clare Montgomery & Julian Knowles eds., 2002); Satyadeva Bedi, Extradition: A Treatise on the Laws Relevant to the Fugitive Offenders and with the Commonwealth Countries (2002); John T. Parry, No Appeal: The U.S–U.K. Supplementary Extradition Treaty's Effort to Create Federal Jurisdiction, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 543 (Summer 2003); Alun Jones, Jones on Extradition (1995); V.E. Hartley-Booth, British Extradition Law and Procedure (1980).

187 Extradition Act of 2003, Ch. 41, entered into force January 1, 2004. Part 1 implements the EU Framework decision on the EAW. Part II governs all other countries that have bilateral extradition agreements with the United Kingdom. The United States is considered a category 2 country, falling under Part 2 of the Act.

188 U.S. Department of State London U.S. Embassy Press release, UK/U.S. Extradition Treaty Ratified, Apr. 26, 2007, available at http://london.usembassy.gov/ukpapress48.html (last visited September 10,

United Kingdom's extradition to the United States on the basis of the 2003 treaty without mutuality of obligation. The treaty provides for reciprocity, but the United Kingdom cannot obtain reciprocity from the United States as long as the treaty has not entered into force in the United States, although a number of Courts of Appeals have granted extradition by lower courts.[189] The House of Lords has heard testimony regarding the Extradition Act of 2003, including calls for its repeal.[190]

4.3. Multilateral Treaties

The legislation of the United States is not explicit as to the type of treaty required as a legal basis for extradition. As indicated in Section 4.2, U.S. practice is to rely solely on bilateral treaties, although nothing excludes reliance on multilateral treaties as the legal basis for extradition.[191]

There are two types of multilateral treaties that may serve as the basis for extradition: those treaties that deal exclusively with extradition, and those that deal with international crimes and impose on the signatories the duty to extradite the accused or convicted offender.

The United States is a party to two multilateral extradition treaties: the 1933 Montevideo Convention on Extradition[192] and the 1981 Inter-American Convention on Extradition.[193] The Montevideo Treaty between other American states and the United States could serve as a legal basis for extradition in the absence of a bilateral treaty, but has not yet been used. There are, however, a number of non-extradition multilateral treaties on international crimes containing an extradition provision,[194] and thus permitting the United States and other signatory states to rely on them as a substitute for bilateral treaties.[195]

2011). See also Jed Borod, US Senate Holds Second Hearing on Controversial UK Extradition Treaty, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 345 (Sept. 2006).

189 See Bermingham & Others v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. of the U.S., [2006] EWHC (QBD Admin) 200 (Eng.); Welsh, Thrasher v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. of the U.S., [2006] EWHC (QBD Admin) 156 (Eng.); Stepp v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. of the U.S., [2006] EWHC (QBD Admin) 1033 (Eng.); Norris v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. of the U.S., [2006] EWHC (QBD Admin) 280 (Eng.); Bentley v. Government of the U.S. of America, [2005] EWHC (QBD Admin) 1078 (Eng.); Bermingham & Others v. Sec. of State for the Home Dept. of the U.S., [2005] EWHC (QBD Admin) 647 (Eng.); Jenkins v. Government of the U.S. of America, [2005] EWHC (QBD Admin) 1051 (Eng.); Bohning v. Government of the U.S. of America, [2005] EWHC (QBD Admin) 2613 (Eng.); McCaughey v. Government of the U.S. of America, [2005] EWHC (QBD Admin) 248 (Eng.); Raffle v. Government of the U.S. of America, [2004] EWHC (QBD) 2913, (Eng.).

190 See Transcript of Oral Evidence, House of Commons, Before the Home Affairs Committee, Extradition, Jan. 18, 2011, HC-644-ii (statement of Ms. Gareth Pierce and Mr. Ashfaq Ahmad; statement of Mr. Julian Knowles), available at http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201011/cmselect/cmhaff/uc644-ii/uc64401.htm (last visited Sept. 10, 2011).

191 See Senate Judicial Hearings on S. 1639 (remarks of this writer). See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101. Section 3199(a)(2) of S. 1639 defines "treaty" as including present and future multilateral treaties ratified by the Senate.

192 Convention on Extradition, signed at Montevideo, Dec. 26, 1933, 49 Stat. 3111, T.S. No. 882.

193 Adopted at Caracas, Feb. 25, 1981, O.A.S. Doc. OEA/Ser.A/36(SEPF), reprinted in 20 I.L.M. 723 (1981).

194 See Ch. I, Sec. 4.

195 This author has identified 27 categories of international crimes covered in 281 international instruments between 1815 and 2012. A number of these instruments contain a provision on which the parties can rely for purposes of extradition in the absence of a bilateral treaty. M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law (2d ed. 2012). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Draft Statute International Criminal Tribunal, 9 Nouvelles Etudes Pénales 46 (1992). See Bassiouni, ICL

The European Union has moved in the direction of enhanced judicial integration and harmonization of its criminal laws and procedure. Although the harmonization part is a natural consequence of the greater affinity of the member states' legal systems, it also reflects the greater degree of cooperation existing between these countries where physical national boundaries have been eliminated to ensure the free movement of people and goods. However, the European Union has gone beyond that on the basis of the Maastricht[196] and Schengen[197] agreements, which delegate to the European Commission the power to develop Framework Directives that have a direct effect on the national legal systems of the member states. One of these Framework

---

Conventions, supra note 72. Since 1985, however, several new conventions entered into effect, leading to a new categorization of crimes with a new hierarchy. The crimes are:

1. Aggression;
2. Genocide;
3. Crimes against humanity;
4. War crimes
5. Unlawful possession, use, emplacement, stockpiling and trade of weapons, including nuclear weapons;
6. Nuclear terrorism;
7. Apartheid;
8. Slavery, slave-related practices and trafficking in human beings;
9. Torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment;
10. Unlawful human experimentation;
11. Enforced disappearances and extrajudicial execution;
12. Mercenarism;
13. Piracy and unlawful acts against the safety of maritime navigation and safety of platforms on the high seas;
14. Aircraft hijacking and unlawful acts against international air safety;
15. Threat and use of force against internationally protected persons and United Nations personnel;
16. Taking of civilian hostages;
17. Use of explosives;
18. Unlawful use of the mail;
19. Financing of terrorism;
20. Unlawful traffic in drugs and related drug offenses;
21. Organized crime and related specific crimes;
22. Destruction and/or theft of national treasures;
23. Unlawful acts against certain internationally protected elements of the environment;
24. International traffic in obscene materials;
25. Falsification and counterfeiting;
26. Unlawful interference with international submarine cables; and
27. Corruption and bribery of foreign public officials.

See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, ch. III (2d ed., 2012).

196 (Treaty on European Union), February 7, 1992, Official Journal C 325, December 24, 2002.

197 Schengen Agreement, June 14, 1985 (gradual abolition of checks at common borders); Schengen Convention, March 1995 (abolished checks at internal borders and created a single exterior border); Schengen Acquis, Council Decision 1999/435/EC of May 20, 1999, OJ L 176, 10.7.1999, p. 1. (compilation of the agreement, convention, protocols, decisions, and declarations regarding the Schengen documents).

Decisions is the European Arrest Warrant (EAW),[198] which reflects the notion of a common European judicial space.[199] Although this is applicable to EU member states, there is also the question of how the European Union as a unit deals with non–member states. Part of the answer is found in a multilateral agreement, which essentially represents a block of EU member states and a non-EU member state. In 2003, the European Union and the United States signed an agreement on extradition, which provides a new legal basis for extradition between the United States and E.U. member states.[200] The extradition agreement removes the legislative and certification requirements and simplifies the documentation in order to expedite the extradition process. By facilitating direct contact between the central authorities, it attempts to improve the channels of transmission, especially for cases concerning provisional arrest. It further enlarges the number of extraditable offenses, by allowing extradition for any offense that has a sentence of more than one year in prison, thus avoiding many legal issues pertaining to "dual criminality."[201] At the same time, EU member states can rely on grounds for refusal contained in their respective bilateral extradition treaties with the United States, since the extradition agreement does not totally replace the bilateral treaties, but supplements them or only replaces some provisions. European Union member states also can stipulate that the death penalty will not be imposed and the right to a fair trial by an impartial tribunal is guaranteed.

There is also another European multilateral extradition regime by the Council of Europe, namely the European Convention on Extradition and its three protocols.[202] It should be noted that EU member states are also Council of Europe members. Therefore, the states that are parties to the United States–European Union extradition treaty are also parties to the European 198 Council Framework Decision of June 13, 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), OJ L190/1 (July 18, 2002).

199 See Régis de Gouttes, Vers un Espace Judiciare Pénal Pan-Européen? 22 Recueil Dalloz Sirey 154 (1991); Régis de Gouttes, Variations sur L'Espace Judiciare Pénal Européen? 33 Recueil Dalloz Sirey 245 (1990); Christine Van den Wyngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Européen: Vers une Fissure au Sein du Conseil de L'Europe? 61 Rev. Int'le de Criminologie et de Police Technique 289 (1980); Christine Van den Wyngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Européen Face à L'Euro-Terrorisme et la Sauvegarde des Droits Fondamentaux, 3 Rev. Int'le de Criminologie et de Police Technique 289 (1980).

200 Agreements on Extradition and on Mutual Legal Assistance between the European Union and the U.S. of America, signed June 25, 2003, Council of Europe doc. 9153/03, CATS 28, USA 4. See also Council Decision of June 6, 2003 concerning the signature of the Agreements between the European Union and the United State of America on extradition and mutual legal assistance in Criminal Matters, 2003/516/EC, OJ L181 (July 19, 2003).

Current Council of Europe Members include (in order of succession): Belgium, Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom, Greece, Turkey, Iceland, Germany, Austria, Cyprus, Switzerland, Malta, Portugal, Spain, Liechtenstein, San Marino, Finland, Hungary, Poland, Bulgaria, Estonia, Lithuania, Slovenia, Czech Republic, Slovak Republic, Romania, Andorra, Latvia, Albania, Moldova, Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine, Russia, Republic of Croatia, Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Republic of Serbia, Monaco and Montenegro.

Current EU members include: Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Netherlands, and the United Kingdom.

201 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

202 December 12, 1957, Europe T.S. No.24; First Additional Protocol, Oct. 15, 1975, Europe T.S. No. 86 (thirty-seven states have ratified); Second Additional Protocol, Mar. 17, 1978, Europe T.S. No. 98 (forty states have ratified); Third Additional Protocol, Jul. 7, 2010, Europe T.S. No. 209 (two states have ratified). See generally Michael Plachta, Third Additional Protocol to the 1957 European Convention on Extradition, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 831–835 (Aug. 2011). The Convention and protocols are open to signature and ratification by non-EU countries, but the United States has not signed or ratified them.

Convention on Extradition. However, because the United States–European Union treaty comes after the convention, it supersedes it.

4.3.1. Relationship between Multilateral and Bilateral Treaties

The United States may be a party to a multilateral convention whose other state-parties have a bilateral treaty with the United States, as is the case of the United States–European Union treaty.[203] This treaty specifically states that it supersedes and replaces some of the provisions of the bilateral treaties,[204] and the United States has entered into protocols with the EU member states to amend them in a manner consistent with the United States–European Union treaty.[205] The EU agreement and its protocols were submitted together to the Senate for advice and consent and entered into effect on February 1, 2010.[206]

It is difficult to understand the rationale of the U.S. government in developing protocols with the EU member states, every one of which requires Senate advice and consent, when the multilateral United States–European Union treaty would apply to all of these states and contain the same treaty language. This would clearly avoid the risk of having different treaty language as it presently exists with respect to these bilateral treaties. Logically, a single multilateral treaty employing the same language and applying to all EU member states would greatly enhance the uniformity of application and provide for judicial economy.[207]

As stated above, the United States has as a matter of policy, particularly since the Reagan administration in the 1980s, explicitly rejected reliance on multilateral treaties as a legal basis for extradition, though there is of course nothing in U.S. legislation that calls for such a practice. Moreover the United States has ratified the 1931 Montevideo Convention.[208] But the policy of not relying on multilateral treaties has been applied rather consistently as a political choice. This means that different policies can change that initial one. Indeed since 1988 with the United States' ratification of the United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, the United States has adopted a new policy, and that is to rely on a multilateral treaty as a way of supplementing bilateral treaties providing that the counterpart in the bilateral treaty is also a state-party to the multilateral convention. This policy shift subsequently extended to the provisions of the corruption convention, the organized crime convention, and the United States–European Union Framework convention.

The United States still does not rely on any of these multilateral treaties as the basis for extradition, rather than relying on the bilateral treaty. However, if a provision of the multilateral treaty expands extraditable offenses or contains other provisions affecting the modalities of 203 EU–U.S. Extradition Treaty, supra note 201. The twenty-five EU states are party to this treaty. Agreement on extradition between the European Union and the U.S. of America, July 19, 2002, Article 3(1).

---

204 Twenty-three European states have entered into extradition treaties, amendments, or supplementary treaties with the United States since 2004. See Appendix IV.

205 Article 3(2)(a) states: "The European Union, pursuant to the Treaty on European Union, shall ensure that each Member State acknowledges, in a written instrument between such Member State and the U.S. of America, the application, in the manner set forth in this Article, of its bilateral extradition treaty in force with the U.S. of America."

206 See European Commission Treaties Office Database, Agreement on Extradition between the European Union and the U.S. of America 2003 O.J. 27 (L 181), available at http://ec.europa.eu/world/agreements/prepareCreateTreatiesWorkspace/treatiesGeneralData.do?step=0&redirect=true&treatyId=5461 (last visited Sept. 24, 2012) (summary of treaty); U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Public Affairs, U.S./EU Agreements on Mutual Legal Assistance and Extradition Enter Into Force, Feb. 1, 2010, available at http://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/2010/February/10-opa-108.html (last visited Sept. 10, 2011).

207 See Ch. I, Sec. 4.2.

208 Convention on the Rights and Duties of States (Montevideo Convention), Dec. 26, 1933, 165 L.N.T.S. 19, reprinted in 28 Am. J. Int'l L. (Supp.) 75 (1934).

extradition, the United States has considered the multilateral treaty as automatically supplementing the bilaterals (with respect to the state-parties of the multilaterals who are also a party to the bilateral). This practice is not based on legislation, nor is there anything explicitly stated in the treaties in question that specifically authorizes their interpretation to be construed as permitting a selective use of multilateral treaty provisions to implicitly amend bilateral treaty provisions without even an exchange of letters by and between the representatives of the states having bilateral treaties with the United States.

There is no logical explanation for what appears to be an anomalous practice, other than the reluctance of various administrations over the last twenty years from seeking to amend the provisions of Title 18 applicable to extradition, or, for that matter, to adopt a standalone act to authorize this type of treaty practice.

4.4. The United States' Non-Surrender Agreements with Certain States in Order to Avoid ICC Jurisdiction

Since 2002, the United States, which is not a state-party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), has entered into agreements with both state-parties and non–state-parties to the ICC pursuant to Article 98, aimed at preventing the surrender of any U.S. national to the court.[209] These agreements are based on an expanded reading of Article 98 of the ICC statute and have become a part of the current U.S. policy, which is opposed to the ICC. The Bush administration was inconsistent in its treatment of the agreements, submitting some for ratification, while considering others as executive agreements, which do not need to go to the Senate for advice and consent. Very few of these agreements have been submitted for parliamentary approval in the countries that have signed them.

As of 2011, ninety-six bilateral non-surrender agreements are listed as being in force with the Department of State,[210] of which twenty-one have been ratified and eighteen are considered executive agreements, which do not need ratification.[211] Since the signing of the first "non-surrender"

---

209 See Appendix V for a list of countries with which the United States has concluded Article 98 Agreements. M.Cherif Bassiouni, 1 The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis, and Integrated Text at 123 (2005); M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998); M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Court Ratification and National Implementing Legislation, 71 Rev. Int'l de Droit Pénal (2000).

210 See Appendix V for a complete list of countries with which the United States has concluded Article 98 agreements. However, there seems to be a discrepancy in the number of such agreements between the State Department's press release and the number found in the Treaties in force. See U.S. Signs 100th Article 98 Agreement, U.S. Department of State Press Statement (released May 3, 2005). For the collection of these non-surrender agreements, see the Georgetown University Law Library at the following website http://www.ll.georgetown.edu/intl/guides/article_98.cfm. See also Coalition for the International Criminal Court, Status of US Bilateral Immunity Agreements, available at http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CICCFS_BIAstatusCurrent.pdf (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). The Coalition for the ICC has documented "102+" such agreements, which is also questionable. The difficulty in ascertaining the exact number is due to the fact that some of these purported agreements are in the nature of an exchange of diplomatic notes that may not fulfill the criteria needed to be considered a treaty. Moreover, the reader should bear in mind exchanges of diplomatic notes or Memoranda of Understanding (MOU) must not only conform to the international understanding of what constitutes a treaty under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and customary international law, but that due regard should be given to national constitutional requirements of the states with which the United States entered into these Article 98 Agreements. In many of the cases these agreements have not been submitted for ratification in the foreign countries listed by the U.S. Department of State. All of this raises questions about the reliability of these purported agreements.

211 S*ee* Coalition for the International Criminal Court, Status of US Bilateral Immunity Agreements, available at http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CICCFS_BIAstatusCurrent.pdf (last visited Sept. 24, 2012).

agreement between the United States and Romania on August 1, 2002, the U.S. effort to secure the agreements has been criticized by both governments and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) alike.[212]

Despite a large number of agreements, the structure of the non-surrender agreements is similar.[213] At their core, each one of the agreements is aimed at prohibiting the surrender of any persons (defined broadly to include any nationals of one or both parties to the non-surrender agreement) to select international tribunals, absent the express consent of the other party. The vast majority of the agreements specifically prohibit the surrender of U.S. nationals to the ICC specifically, while a much smaller number prohibits the surrender of U.S. nationals to any international tribunal, unless the tribunal has been established by the UN Security Council, or surrender to any other tribunal, except if the obligation to surrender or transfer comes from an agreement to which both the United States and the other state are parties.[214] The agreements also contain provisions requiring the foreign state to ensure the non-surrender (to the ICC, or any other tribunal) in cases where the U.S. national is extradited, surrendered, or otherwise transferred, to a third country, pursuant to some other agreement. Thus, a party to the non-surrender agreement is precluded from transferring an individual to a third state if that third state may surrender the individual to the ICC.

In addition to the questionable legality of the agreements,[215] they are essentially the opposite of extradition because they restrict surrender, rather than facilitate the surrender of an individual falling within the purview of the agreement. However, despite their restrictive nature, state-parties to these agreements retain the ability to investigate and prosecute individuals who have committed crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC on their territory, which stems from the application of the territoriality principle. Thus, if a crime is committed on the territory of a state that has concluded a non-surrender agreement with the United States, it cannot rise above the jurisdiction of that state which has primary jurisdiction in the case. The territorial state may relinquish jurisdiction to the United States (as the state of nationality) or another state that may have jurisdiction through active or passive personality doctrine,[216] which allows for the exercise of jurisdiction in cases where citizens or the national interest of the state have been harmed and the state exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.[217]

As of 2006, agreements from the following countries have been ratified: Gambia, Ghana, Sierra Leone, Angola, Cape Verde, Mauritania, Mozambique, Guyana, Panama, El Salvador, Cambodia, East Timor, Bhutan, Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Georgia, Macedonia, Tajikistan, Kazakhstan, and Jordan. Agreements from the following countries are considered executive orders: Botswana, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Malawi, Nigeria, Uganda, Cameroon, Equatorial Guinea, Sao Tome and Principe, Antigua and Barbuda, Columbia, Afghanistan, India, Philippines, Turkmenistan, Algeria, Israel, and United Arab Emirates.

212 The European Union, for example, has rejected the U.S. practice of concluding these agreements and has developed a set of guidelines to be used by member states in reference to these agreements. See International Criminal Court (ICC)—Council Conclusions, in General and External Relations, 2450th Sess., at 9–10, Doc. 12134/02-Press 279 (2002), available at http://ue.eu.int/ueDocs/cms_Data/docs/pressdata/en/gena/72321.pdf (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). For the views of the NGO community, see the web page of the Coalition for the International Criminal Court, available at http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=bia (last visited Sept. 24, 2012).

213 See Attila Bogdan, The U.S. and the International Criminal Court: Avoiding Jurisdiction through Bilateral Agreements in Reliance on Article 98, 8 Int'l Crim. L.R. 1 (2006).

214 See Appendix V for a list of countries with which the United States has concluded Article 98 agreements.

215 Bogdan, supra note 214.

216 See Ch. VI.

217 See Christopher L. Blakesley, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, in II International Criminal Law: Procedural and Enforcement Mechanisms (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed., 1999).

The U.S. government has pursued an active campaign against the ICC, threatening every state, whether an ICC member or not, with loss of U.S. aid, both military and economic, should they not agree to a non-surrender agreement under Article 98. In pursuing this course, the United States has adopted the American Service-Members' Protection Act (ASPA) on August 2, 2002, which provides that U.S. military assistance to ICC state parties will be withheld unless they sign a bilateral non-surrender agreement.[218] As a result of this act, at least eighteen ICC member states have lost all U.S. military assistance. In 2004, the United States amended the Foreign Operations Appropriation Bill ("Nethercutt Amendment").[219] The Nethercutt Amendment allows Congress to deny economic assistance to countries that are ICC members if they fail to sign a bilateral non-surrender agreement. At the same time, countries that sign a bilateral non-surrender agreement are awarded large aid packages almost immediately.[220] Fifty-three countries have refused to sign these bilateral non-surrender agreements, and several of them had already lost large portions of their aid.[221] NATO members have been exempted from these cuts, and none of them have requested economic assistance from the United States.

4.5. Reciprocity and Comity

Although the view has been expressed that the United States will grant or request extradition only pursuant to a treaty, there have been several instances where it has deviated from that practice. In these instances, extradition was granted or requested on the basis of comity or reciprocity.[222]

There are few recorded instances where the United States granted extradition to a requesting state in the absence of a treaty.[223] The most well-known case is that of Arguelles, which occurred in 1864.[224] Arguelles, an officer in the Spanish army, had been accused in Spain of selling individuals into slavery for his own personal gain. Although the United States had no extradition treaty with Spain, it granted Spain's extradition request on the basis of comity because the crime was an international one. The secretary of state defended the decision as follows:

> There being no treaty of extradition between the U.S. and Spain, nor any act of Congress directing how fugitives from justice in Spanish dominions shall be delivered up, the extradition in the 218 American Service-Members' Protection Act of 2002, §§ 2001–2015, Pub. L. No. 107-206, 116 Stat. 820 (2002). The Act was satirically dubbed the "Hague Invasion Act" by its critics.

219 Limitation on Economic Support Fund Assistance for Certain Foreign Governments That Are Parties to the International Criminal Court, §574, Pub. L. No. 109-102 (2005).

220 U.S. Bilateral Immunity Agreements or So-Called "Article 98" Agreements, Questions & Answers, last updated Aug. 5, 2005, available at http://www.iccnow.org/documents/FS-BIAsAug2005.pdf (last visited Sept. 24, 2012).

221 Coalition for the International Criminal Court, Countries Opposed to Signing a US Bilateral Immunity Agreement: US Aid Lost in FY04 and FY05 and Threatened in FY06, http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CountriesOpposedBIA_AidLoss_current.pdf (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). See also U.S. State Department, Congressional Budget Justification for Foreign Operations, available at http://www.state.gov/s/d/rm/rls/cbj/ (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). In 2005, Kenya lost 98 percent of its international military education and training and foreign military financing funding after becoming a party to the ICC. In 2004, Malta lost 83 percent of all foreign aid from the United States, approximately $1.25 million dollars.

222 The Constitutional Court of South Africa has discussed this principle. Harksen v. President of the Republic of South Africa and others, 2000 Constitutional Court CCT41/99, 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC) at 53–55 (S. Afr.).

223 See 1 Moore, Extradition, supra note 2, at 33–35 (discussing the Arguelles case); Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 744–745 (discussing the Koveleskie case).

224 See 1 Moore, Extradition, supra note 2, at 33–35.

> case referred to in the resolution of the Senate is understood by this Department to have been made in virtue of the law of nations and the Constitution of the U.S.. Although there is a conflict of authorities concerning the expediency of exercising comity towards a foreign government by surrendering, at its request, one of its own subjects charged with the commission of crime within its territory, and although it may be conceded that there is no national obligation to make such a surrender on a demand therefore, unless it is acknowledged by treaty or by statute law, yet a nation is never bound to furnish asylum to dangerous criminals who are offenders against the human race; and it is believed that if, in any case, the comity could with propriety be practiced, the one which is understood to have called forth the resolution furnished a just occasion for its exercise.[225]

In 1996, the Third Circuit in Saroop v. Garcia relied on principles of comity to determine the validity of the extradition treaty between Trinidad and Tobago and the United States.[226] Saroop, a citizen of Trinidad and Tobago, was indicted in the United States on charges of drug trafficking and conspiracy. In her defense, Saroop contended that the extradition treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, signed in 1931, was never ratified by Trinidad and Tobago; therefore, the United States lacked a valid treaty supporting her extradition.[227] To determine the validity of the extradition treaty, the Third Circuit relied on a decision from the High Court of Justice of Trinidad and Tobago, which stated:

> the [Extradition] Act qualified as one of the existing laws of the Colony of Trinidad and Tobago immediately before the commencement of [the 1962 Act]. It was consequently preserved by the provisions of that section as part of the law of the independent Dominion of Trinidad and Tobago . . . [228]

The High Court of Justice explicitly held that the extradition treaty was incorporated into the laws of Trinidad and Tobago, and, therefore, binding upon Saroop. Recognizing that "the comity doctrine does not reach the force of obligation," the Third Circuit stated that "[comity] creates a strong presumption in favor of recognizing foreign judicial decrees."[229] As a result, the Third Circuit upheld the validity of the extradition treaty between the United States and Trinidad and Tobago based on the decision of the High Court of Justice, and the overt intent and actions of the two countries to be bound by the extradition treaty.[230]

Although the United States has rarely granted extradition on the basis of comity or reciprocity, it has on occasion requested extradition on these bases. Usually, its request on the basis of comity has been coupled with the observation that the United States would be unable to reciprocate if the requested state sought extradition from the United States in the absence of a treaty.[231] The United States has resorted to this basis to supplement treaty relations when the applicable extradition treaty does not include, as an extraditable offense, the offense for which the relator has been indicted. For example, in Fiocconi v. Attorney General of United States,[232] Italy surrendered the relators to the United States in an act of comity. The United States' request was not based on its extradition treaty with Italy because the treaty did not list the crime of conspiracy to import heroin, the offense for which extradition was requested, as

---

225 Id. at 35.

226 Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165 (3d Cir. 1996).

227 Id. at 167.

228 Id. at 169.

229 Id.

230 Id. at 171.

231 For earlier cases where the United States requested extradition on the basis of comity, see 1 Moore, Extradition, supra note 2, at 41–42.

232 Fiocconi v. Attorney General of the United States, 462 F.2d 475 (2d Cir. 1972).

an extraditable offense.[233] However, Italy granted extradition and surrendered the relators to the United States.[234]

In a few instances occurring in the 1800s, the United States requested extradition with the assurance that it would reciprocate, even though the United States had no extradition treaty with the requested states. For example, in 1855 the United States requested that Spain extradite an individual charged with murder in New York, and noted that the extradition "would be considered as an act of courtesy which would be appreciated and reciprocated."[235] Similarly in 1878, the United States requested that Portugal extradite an individual who had been charged with embezzlement in the United States.[236] The Portuguese government responded that it would be willing to comply if the proper documents were provided, and expressed the hope that "if at any time [the Portuguese government] has to address a requisition of like nature to the government of the United States, the same would be received with equal good will."[237] The U.S. government answered that "such application will meet with an equally prompt and effectual response." "[We] are fully alive to the courtesy shown by [the Portuguese government] in this instance, and will not fail to give a like evidence of its good feeling to any similar application made to it."[238] The relator was extradited to the United States. These commitments of reciprocity were of questionable legal validity in the absence of a treaty, as evidenced by the fact that in 1833 and 1888, when the Portuguese government requested that the United States extradite a fugitive and referred to the case discussed above, the United States refused extradition on the grounds that no extradition treaty existed with Portugal.[239]

It should be noted that the United States relies on other forms of ad hoc arrangements to secure extradition in the absence of a formal treaty. This has been the case with Egypt, where in at least one matter, the United States relied on a "letter of understanding" to obtain the surrender of an Israeli citizen arrested in Egypt at the request of the U.S. government.[240] The United States would not be able to surrender anyone from this country on such a basis, however, as it would violate Title 18 § 3183, which requires a treaty as a precondition of extradition.[241]

In Munaf v. Geren, U.S. forces in Iraq had arrested two naturalized U.S. citizens of Iraqi origin who had been captured by U.S. forces in that country and held on a U.S. base. Even though

---

233 See Ch. VII.

234 The United States also resorted to comity as the basis of its requests when it asked Lebanon to extradite an individual to face charges of drug trafficking, as there was no extradition treaty between Lebanon and the United States at that time. See United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff'd on other grounds, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 981 (1964). Similarly, the United States requested that Italy extradite Sam Accardi to face prosecution on drug smuggling charges as an act of comity, because its extradition treaty did not include these charges as an extraditable offense. See United States v. Accardi, 241 F. Supp. 119 (S.D.N.Y. 1964), aff'd, 342 F.2d 697 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 954 (1965). See also Alona Evans, Legal Bases of Extradition in the U.S., 16 N.Y.L.F. 525, 532–533 (1970). For a Commonwealth position, see Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition without a Treaty, 49 Austl. L.J. 116 (1975).

235 See 1 Moore Extradition, supra note 2, at 43 (discussing the Baker case).

236 Id. at 43–45 (discussing the Angell case).

237 Id. at 45.

238 Id.

239 Id.

240 See United States v. Levy, 947 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1991); United States v. Levy, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6332 (E.D.N.Y. May 8, 1991); United States v. Levy, 1994 U.S. App. LEXIS 13380 (2d Cir. June 3, 1994).

241 See, e.g., United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886).

an extradition treaty between the United States and Iraq had existed since 1935, the United States opted to simply surrender these two individuals to Iraqi authorities, without reference to the existence of an extradition treaty. This can therefore be referred to as a form of extradition outside of a treaty with the consent of the interested states.[242]

On August 30, 2009, the United States secured the surrender from the government of Cambodia three U.S. citizens who had entered that country as sex tourists. All three had been charged with the federal crime of "sex tourism" under Title 18 § 2423(f). They had previously been charged or convicted of sex-related crimes in the United States. What was unusual in this case is that the formal request submitted by the U.S. embassy to the prime minister of Cambodia was delivered on August 21, 2009, and that the order for the surrender of these three requested individuals was approved by the Minister of Justice four days later on August 25. This is probably the fastest extradition case in the history of U.S. extradition practice.[243]

4.6. Military Rendition

4.6.1. Status of Forces Agreements

The United States relies on status of forces agreements (SOFAs) as an alternative basis for rendition,[244] but does not consider the practice as part of extradition. A SOFA is an agreement between the United States and a host state of U.S. armed forces regarding, inter alia, the criminal jurisdiction that either state may have over U.S. armed services personnel who are alleged to have engaged in criminal conduct in the host state. The typical SOFA provides that the United States has the primary right to submit the accused service-person or civilian employee to criminal prosecution if the alleged offense was committed in the performance of official duty or if it was directed against the property or person of the U.S. military community. All other offenses, on the other hand, are within the primary criminal jurisdiction of the host country. Either state may, however, relinquish its primary jurisdiction to the other state-party.[245]

The SOFAs also set forth rendition procedures. Usually, a member of the U.S. armed services who is accused of a criminal offense in the host state will be held in custody by U.S. armed forces until the imposition of a criminal sentence by the judiciary of the host state. The detention by U.S. military authorities is based on the Uniform Code of Military Justice.[246] The convicted service-person is delivered by the U.S. military authorities to the host state to serve the judicially imposed sentence.[247]

---

242 See Ch. I, Sec. 6.

243 Raja Abdulrahim, U.S. Charges Three Men with Having Sex with Children in Cambodia, L.A. Times, Sept. 1, 2009, available at: http://articles.latimes.com/2009/sep/01/local/me-cambodia1.

244 See generally James R. Coker, The Status of Visiting Military Forces in Europe: NATO–SOFA, A Comparison, in A Treatise on International Criminal Law 115 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 2 vols. 1973). For a more recent appraisal of new trends in U.S. bilateral status of Forces Agreements see John W. Egan, The Future of Criminal Jurisdiction over the Deployed American Soldier: Four Major Trends in Bilateral U.S. Status of Forces Agreements, 20 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 291 (2006).

245 See, e.g., Agreement Between the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty Regarding the Status of Their Forces [NATO SOFA], June, 19 1951, 4 U.S.T. 1792, T.I.A.S. No. 2846, art. VII. See also William J. Norton, United States Obligations under Status of Forces Agreements: A New Method of Extradition?, 5 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. (1975).

246 10 U.S.C. § 810 (1994).

247 See Norton, supra note 246, at 17–18.

Surrender of a member of U.S. armed forces for foreign trial pursuant to a SOFA has been upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.[248] A landmark case is Holmes v. Laird.[249] In Holmes, American servicemen stationed in Germany requested a U.S. federal court to enjoin their surrender to Germany to serve criminal sentences imposed upon them by German courts. The servicemen had been convicted of attempted rape and related offenses committed in Germany. Shortly before the pronouncement of the German appellate court decision affirming their convictions, they left West Germany without authorization and returned to the United States. Thereafter, they surrendered to U.S. Army officials and initiated litigation in a federal district court to prevent their rendition to Germany. They claimed primarily that the German court's failure to provide the procedural guarantees set forth in the applicable SOFA rendered their convictions invalid.

The federal court rejected these claims on the grounds that it did not have the authority to review the sufficiency of the German courts' determinations. In reaching this conclusion, the court relied upon Neely v. Henkel,[250] where a U.S. citizen contended that a federal statute authorizing extradition pursuant to a treaty was unconstitutional because it failed to secure to the accused surrendered to a foreign state for trial in its tribunals those constitutional rights provided in the United States. The Holmes court determined that the Neely court's rejection of such a claim was controlling:

> What we learn from Neely is that a surrender of an American citizen required by treaty for purposes of a foreign criminal proceeding is unimpaired by an absence in the foreign judicial system of safeguards in all respects equivalent to those constitutionally enjoined upon American trials. We do not believe that [this] teaching has been eroded by time, nor that the slight factual differences between the pretrial extradition there and the post-conviction surrender here removes the instant situation from Neely's ambit.
>
> We conclude, then, that the Constitution erects no barrier to appellants' surrender to the Federal Republic.[251]

---

248 See Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957). See also Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972); Williams v. Rogers, 449 F.2d 513 (8th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 926 (1972); Cozart v. Wilson, 236 F.2d 732 (D.C. Cir.), vacated, 352 U.S. 884 (1956); United States ex rel. Stone v. Robinson, 309 F. Supp. 1261 (W.D. Pa.), aff'd, 431 F.2d 548 (3d Cir. 1970); Smallwood v. Clifford, 286 F. Supp. 97 (D.D.C. 1968). In Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340 (1983), the Fourth Circuit considered the return of a former U.S. serviceman to West Germany pursuant to the NATO SOFA. Under that agreement, the United States would retain jurisdiction only over those offenses committed by servicemen on a U.S. military base or that arose out of the performance of an official duty. Germany could thus claim jurisdiction over Plaster for the crime of murder. However, the treaty allowed Germany to waive its jurisdiction in favor of the United States. In 1959, the United States and Germany signed a Supplementary Agreement to the SOFA Treaty, July 1, 1963, T.I.A.S. No. 5351. The agreement provided, inter alia, that Germany would automatically waive its jurisdiction in favor of U.S. military courts at the request of the United States. Germany could recall its waiver only by notifying the United States within twenty-one days of receipt of a request for waiver. Plaster, a serviceman, had been suspected of murder in Germany, but had fled to the United States. While in custody for a murder committed in Wisconsin, Plaster allegedly confessed to the German murder. The United States formally notified Germany of its request of a waiver of Germany's jurisdiction. Germany urged the trial of Plaster and another serviceman for the German murder by an American military court, but did not recall its waiver. The Army filed formal court-martial charges against Plaster and the other serviceman. The Army ceased its pursuit of the prosecution when the Supreme Court handed down the Miranda decision, thus rendering the confession potentially inadmissible. Ultimately the Army promised Plaster transnational immunity from prosecution for the German murder if he agreed to testify against the other serviceman. Miranda v. Arizona, 396 U.S. 868 (1969).

249 Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972).

250 Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901).

251 Holmes, 459 F.2d at 1219.

The Holmes decision demonstrates the similarity between SOFAs and extradition treaties. Although SOFAs and extradition treaties are similar in some respects, there are several important distinctions between them.[252] For example, SOFAs do not require a judicial determination by a U.S. tribunal before surrender of the national to the host state, nor do they allow the U.S. executive's exercise of discretion to refuse surrender.[253] Both of these provisions are usually included in extradition treaties, however, and are required by U.S. legislation.[254] In addition, SOFAs generally cover an entire range of criminal conduct that permits the host country's exercise of primary jurisdiction.[255] Extradition treaties, on the other hand, are applicable only to those criminal offenses specifically enumerated in the treaty.[256] Furthermore, although an extradition treaty may prohibit a state's surrender of its own nationals to face prosecution in a foreign state, a SOFA may nevertheless permit such surrender if the accused was a member of the armed forces or a civilian employee of the armed forces when the alleged offense was committed in the host country.[257] As one commentator has noted:

> It is . . . apparent that extradition may be totally ineffective in a large number of cases where an individual encompassed by a SOFA manages to leave the receiving state before the alleged crime is adequately disposed of by the state. Some of the cases may be resolved by the exercise of American jurisdiction (if any exists) since the SOFAs do not prohibit such outside the receiving state. The difficulty of obtaining witnesses may, however, make this possibility practically ineffective. Since the U.S. follows the principle that individuals will not be surrendered to a foreign state absent a treaty obligation to do so or an authorizing statute, and there is no statute presently permitting extradition to any SOFA country, any requirement to return the fugitive individual to the receiving state must be found, if at all, in the SOFA.[258]

4.6.2. Occupational Forces

There have been instances during the history of the United States when its military was present in a foreign state or territory and rendition in the absence of a treaty was undertaken.[259] Rendition in these cases is subject to U.S. extradition legislation.[260] Statutory enactments authorizing the removal of individuals to or from areas under U.S. military control in order to face prosecution or punishment can replace an extradition treaty as the legal basis for such rendition.[261] Such cases were quite rare, as the United States had no occupying forces in any foreign state and had SOFAs with states in which it has troops stationed.[262]

---

252 See generally Norton, supra note 246.

253 Id. at 26.

254 18 U.S.C. § 3184 et seq. (1988).

255 See Norton, supra note 246, at 26.

256 Id. at 39–40.

257 Id. at 26–27.

258 Id. at 27.

259 See Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109 (1901). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); In re Kraussman, 130 F. Supp. 926 (D.C. Conn. 1955); 4 Hackworth Digest, supra note 79, at 16–19, 22; Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 745–746.

260 18 U.S.C. §§ 3183, 3185 (2000).

261 See Sayne v. Shipley, 418 F.2d 679 (5th Cir. 1969); United States ex rel. Perez-Varela v. Esperdy, 187 F. Supp. 378 (S.D.N.Y. 1960), aff'd, 285 F.2d 723 (2d Cir. 1960); but see United States ex rel. Martinez-Angosto v. Mason, 344 F.2d 673 (2d Cir. 1965), reversing 232 F. Supp. 102 (S.D.N.Y. 1964) (imprisonment of Spanish deserter by INS agents and Navy was illegal because they were not competent national or local authorities under the Treaty of General Relations and Friendship with Spain).

262 See supra Sec. 4.6.1.

The United States has for the last fifty years engaged itself militarily in a number of countries, usually for short-duration military operations, such as in the Dominican Republic (1965) and Panama (1990). During the operation in Panama, U.S. forces seized the then head of state, General Manuel Noriega, brought him to Miami, Florida, where he was prosecuted and convicted for drug trafficking.[263]

Since then, the United States has engaged in long-term military occupation in such countries as Afghanistan as of 2001 and Iraq as of 2003 without a SOFA agreement until 2008.[264] In both of these countries, U.S. troops have been accused of committing crimes against the local population. The United States has claimed that the Uniform Code of Military Justice and Title 10 apply exclusively to the U.S. military personnel abroad.[265] The U.S. military and the CIA have operated in these two theaters including bringing in and removing persons without any legal process and in disregard of the Constitution and U.S. law.[266] The United States has entered into defense cooperation agreements (DCAs), which unlike SOFAs are sometimes classified documents.[267]

In Munaf v. Geren, the Supreme Court held that two naturalized U.S. citizens of Iraqi origin, who had voluntarily gone back to Iraq, could be turned over from U.S. military custody to Iraqi custody without the formality of going through the existing extradition treaty between the two countries.[268] The Supreme Court identified that the two individuals had been in one case charged with a crime under Iraqi law, and in another case suspected of a crime under Iraqi law.[269] The fact that they were held in the custody of the U.S. military did not remove them from the exercise of territorial sovereignty by Iraq.[270] Arguments by and on behalf of the petitioners were to the effect that because they were held on a U.S. military base, which was under the exclusive jurisdictional control of the U.S. military, they should be treated, for purposes of their surrender to the territorial state, as if they were members of the U.S. armed forces or accompanying civilian personnel.[271] The argument was akin to saying that on these U.S. bases U.S. law applied, and there was no rational distinction as between U.S. citizens, namely military and civilians, when it came to their surrender to the territorial state.[272] The United States is assumed to exercise limited jurisdiction within these bases and should not simply turn over 263 See United States v. Noriega, 808 F. Supp. 791 (S.D. Fla. 1992); subsequent appeal at 117 F.3d 1206 (11th Cir. 1997); related proceeding at Noriega v. Pastrana, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108682 (S.D. Fla. Jan. 14, 2008); aff'd by 564 F.3d 1290 (11th Cir. 2008). It is interesting to note that the United States considered Manuel Noriega a prisoner of war within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, thus justifying his seizure in Panama and his transfer to the United States. The United States considered his prosecution during his detention as a prisoner of war (POW) justifiable because it was for common criminal acts preceding his seizure as a POW.

264 See infra note 552.

265 For the situation in Afghanistan, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Report to the General Assembly and to the United National Committee on Human Rights.

266 Leila N. Sadat, Ghost Prisoners and Black Sites: Extraordinary Rendition under International Law, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 309 (2006); M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 389 (2006); Jordan J. Paust, Beyond the Law: The Bush Administration's Unlawful Responses in the "War" on Terror 36–38 (2007).

267 See, e.g., the U.S.–Kuwaiti Defense Cooperation Agreement discussed in the Memorandum in Support of Defendant Ali Hijazi's Motion to Dismiss the Second Superseding Indictment in U.S. v. Hijazi, Case No. 05-40024, (C.D. Il, 2007) (on file with author). See also John W. Egan, supra note 245.

268 Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674, 674–706 (2008).

269 Id. at 681.

270 Id. at 686.

271 Id.

272 Id. at 684–687.

a U.S. citizen to the Iraqi government without going through the formalities of the extradition treaty.[273] The Supreme Court recognized the validity of the petitioner's challenges by means of the defendants filing a habeas corpus petition to oppose their transfer from U.S. custody to Iraqi custody.[274] The court held:

> Given these facts, our cases make clear that Iraq has a sovereign right to prosecute Omar and Munaf for crimes committed on its soil. As Chief Justice Marshall explained nearly two centuries ago, "[t]he jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute." The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, 11 U.S. 116, 7 Cranch 116, 136, 3 L. Ed. 287 (1812). See Wilson, supra, at 529, 77 S. Ct. 1409, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1544 ("A sovereign nation has exclusive jurisdiction to punish offenses against its laws committed within its borders, unless it expressly or impliedly consents to surrender its jurisdiction"); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 15, n. 29, 77 S. Ct. 1222, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1148 (1957) (opinion of Black, J.) ("[A] foreign nation has plenary criminal jurisdiction . . . over all Americans . . . who commit offenses against its laws within its territory"); Kinsella v. Krueger, 351 U.S. 470, 479, 76 S. Ct. 886, 100 L. Ed. 1342 (1956) (nations have a "sovereign right to try and punish [American citizens] for offenses committed within their borders," unless they "have relinquished [their] jurisdiction" to do so).
>
> This is true with respect to American citizens who travel abroad and commit crimes in another nation whether or not the pertinent criminal process comes with all the rights guaranteed by our Constitution. "When an American citizen commits a crime in a foreign country he cannot complain if required to submit to such modes of trial and to such punishment as the laws of that country may prescribe for its own people." Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109, 123, 21 S. Ct. 302, 45 L. Ed. 448 (1901).[275]

Since then, however, the United States and Iraq have signed a SOFA[276] as well as a Strategic Framework Agreement for a Relationship of Friendship and Cooperation between the United States of America and the Republic of Iraq.[277]

In Article 12 of the SOFA, the United States recognizes the primary right to exercise jurisdiction of Iraq over members of U.S. forces and the civilian component accompanying U.S. forces

---

273 See Extradition Treaty Between the United States and Iraq (June 7, 1934, Bagdad) TIAS 907.

274 Munaf, 553 U.S. at 684.

275 Id. at 694–695.

276 Id. at 693.

277 Agreement Between the United States of America and the Republic of Iraq on the Withdrawal of United States Forces from Iraq and the Organization of Their Activities during Their Temporary Presence in Iraq Pec 14, 2008 ("Iraq SOFA"); Stephen Farrell, Security Agreement Deja Vu, N.Y. Times, Nov. 20, 2008, available at http://baghdadbureau.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/ll/20/security-agreement-deja-vu/?partner=rss&emc=rss (last visited Sept. 24, 2012). See Jomana Karadsheh & Arwa Damon, Security Pact Runs into Discord in Iraqi Parliament, CNN, Nov. 17, 2008, available at http://articles.cnn.com/2008-11-17/world/iraq.security_1_parliament-security-agreement-sadrists?_s=PM:WORLD (last visited Sept. 24, 2012) (reporting that Iraqi lawmakers decried the U.S.–Iraq security agreement). See also Karen DeYoung, U.S., Iraq Scale Down Negotiations Over Forces, Wash. Post, July 13, 2008, available at http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/12/AR2008071201915.html (last visited Sept. 24, 2012); but see Rubaie Denies Hall of Iraq–US Security Pact, Alsumaria Iraq, July 15, 2008, available at http://www.alsumaria.tv/en/Iraq-Newsl-20093-Rubaie-denies-halt-of-Iraq-US-security-act.html (last visited Apr. 1, 2010). The Iraqi Cabinet approved the agreement on November 16, 2008 and the agreement was thereafter submitted to the Parliament. Parliamentary reaction to the agreement was mixed, with the Sadr party vocally opposing the plan and staging demonstrations to disrupt the voting process in Parliament. The agreement was finally reached on December 4, just prior to the December 31 sunset deadline of the UN Resolution that gave the United States the fig-leaf cover of legitimacy to have a military presence in Iraq.

stationed in Iraq.[278] Article 12 however limits Iraqi jurisdiction to "grave premeditated felonies" that are committed by U.S. forces and civilian components whether on or off duty outside U.S. installations.[279]

4.6.3. United States Military Personnel as a Part of UN Peacekeeping Missions

The United States has contributed military personnel to UN missions and peacekeeping operations, but no thought has been given to the questions raised in Sections 4.5.1 and 4.5.2. Such contributions of military personnel are presumably based on a "contract" between the United States and the United Nations. Consequently, U.S. military personnel may not benefit from the United Nations Treaty on Privileges and Immunities.[280] As things now stand, U.S. military personnel remain under U.S. military jurisdiction and the Uniform Code of Military Justice applies. Presumably, the law that applies to their extradition from the United States is the same as for civilians, but this has never been addressed by U.S. official policy or decided by U.S. courts.

4.7. Return of Transferred Offenders

Under the Foreign Offenders Transfer Act,[281] an individual who is a U.S. citizen may be returned to the United States to serve a sentence imposed by a foreign state for a crime committed in that state. In accordance with Title 18 § 4114, a transferred offender may be subsequently returned to the sentencing state to serve the remainder of his or her sentence. Section 4114 provides:

> Section 4114. Return of transferred offenders
>
> (a) Upon a final decision by the courts of the U.S. that the transfer of the offender to the U.S. was not in accordance with the treaty or the laws of the U.S. and ordering the offender released from serving the sentence in the U.S. the offender may be returned to the country from which he was transferred to complete the sentence if the country in which the sentence was imposed requests his return. The Attorney General shall notify the appropriate authority of the country which imposed the sentence, within ten days, of a final decision of a court of the U.S. ordering the offender released. The notification shall specify the time within which the sentencing country must request the return of the offender which shall not be longer than thirty days.
>
> (b) Upon receiving a request from the sentencing country that the offender ordered released be returned for the completion of his sentence, the Attorney General may file a complaint for the return of the offender with any justice or judge of the U.S. or any authorized magistrate within whose jurisdiction the offender is found. The complaint shall be upon oath and supported by affidavits establishing that the offender was convicted and sentenced by the courts of the country to which his return is requested; the offender was transferred to the U.S. for the execution of his sentence; that the offender was ordered released by a court of the U.S. before he had completed his sentence because the transfer of the offender was not in accordance with the treaty or the laws of the U.S.; and that the sentencing country has requested that he be returned for the 278 Strategic Framework Agreement for a Relationship of Friendship and Cooperation between the United States of America and the Republic of Iraq ("Framework Agreement") (Nov. 17, 2008).

279 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Status of U.S. Forces in Iraq from 2003–2008, 11 Chi. J. Int'l L. 1, 20–25 (2008).

280 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, 21 U.S.T. 1418, T.I.A.S. No. 6900, 1 U.N.T.S. 16 (entered into force Sept. 17, 1946).

281 18 U.S.C. §§ 4100–4115 (1988). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Transfer of Prisoners: Policies and Practices of the U.S., in Bassiouni, II International Criminal Law 239 (1999).

> completion of the sentence. There shall be attached to the complaint a copy of the sentence of the sentencing court and of the decision of the court which ordered the offender released.
>
> A summons or a warrant shall be issued by the justice, judge or magistrate ordering the offender to appear or to be brought before the issuing authority. If the justice, judge, or magistrate finds that the person before him is the offender described in the complaint and that facts alleged in the complaint are true, he shall issue a warrant for commitment of the offender to the custody of the Attorney General until surrender shall be made. The findings and a copy of all the testimony taken before him and of all documents introduced before him shall be transmitted to the Secretary of State, that a Return Warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of the sentencing country, for the surrender of offender.
>
> (c) A complaint referred to in subsection (b) must be filed within sixty days from the date on which the decision ordering the release of the offender becomes final.
>
> (d) An offender returned under this section shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the country to which he is returned for all purposes.
>
> (e) The return of an offender shall be conditioned upon the offender being given credit toward service of the sentence for the time spent in the custody of or under the supervision of the U.S..
>
> (f) Sections 3186 through 3188, and 3195 of this title shall be applicable to the return of an offender under this section. However, an offender returned under this section shall not be deemed to have been extradited for any purpose.
>
> (g) An offender whose return is sought pursuant to this section may be admitted to bail or be released on his own recognizance at any stage of the proceedings.[282]

This scheme is not considered to be an extradition procedure, although it is similar to it. The distinctions between these two rendition methods are noteworthy, as the choice of device employed to effect the offender's return could have substantial impact on the offender's rights and liberty. As this writer has previously noted:

> The implementing statute purports to create a mechanism that would operate speedily and smoothly to return transferred offenders released by U.S. courts before their sentences are completed to the state that convicted and sentenced them. On its face, this provision would appear to render attacks on the validity of the transfer or collateral attacks on conviction and sentence useless, since success in such attack would merely result in return of the offender to the state from whence he or she came. The validity of section 4114 is questionable, however. To examine its validity the provision should be considered in relation to extradition as that practice is followed in all three treaty signatory states [U.S., Canada, and Mexico].
>
> Extradition under the U.S.–Mexico and the U.S.–Canada treaties of extradition requires not only that the offense for which the relator is sought be criminal in both states (double criminality), but also that it be among those offenses expressly listed in the Extradition Treaty. The treaties on transfer of prisoners, however, permit transfer whenever the offense in question is criminal in both states, regardless of whether it is listed in any treaty as an extraditable offense. Thus, the possibility exists under section 4114 of the Act that an offender could be returned for an offense which is not among those listed in the extradition treaty between the parties. While a state may make a request for extradition at any time, under section 4114, the request for return must be made within six months of the offender's release. Finally, as a precondition to extradition, federal law requires that probable cause be shown in a hearing. That is, it must be shown that there is sufficient evidence of the offender's guilt of the crime in question as would justify holding him for trial under U.S. law. Under section 4114, it is sufficient to produce a certified copy of the conviction rendered by the court of the state seeking the offender's return. Should a U.S. court find that such "return" procedures are merely a form of extradition under another > label, it may consider that section 4114 discriminates against returnees as opposed to extraditees who are governed by sections 3181 et seq. without any rational basis and consider that provision a denial of equal protection.

282 18 U.S.C. § 4114 (1994).

>
> Probable cause as required by 18 U.S.C. section 3184 for extradition may be deemed inapplicable to "return" procedures under section 4114 because, in this case, the return is predicated on a conviction rather than an accusation. If, however, the release was due to a finding by the releasing U.S. court that the conviction was in violation of minimum criminal justice standards, the question remains how another U.S. court could rely on the validity of that judgment to order the offender's return. Should the Sending State request extradition of the transferred offender rather than requesting his or her return under section 4114, the Requesting State could have met a variety of requirements not included in the simple return mechanism of section 4114. Therefore, release without return is a possibility.[283]

In the first decision interpreting the return provision of this legislation, the Fifth Circuit, in Tavarez v. U.S. Attorney General,[284] equated the status of a transferred prisoner to that of an escaped convict held in legal custody. The court reasoned as follows:

> Generally, the legal custodian of an escaped convict can return the fugitive to custody without a warrant or a hearing. See, e.g., Rush v. U.S., 290 F.2d 709 (5th Cir. 1961) (federal authorities may reacquire custody of escaped convict from state authorities and return him to federal penitentiary in another state without a removal warrant and without a hearing before a magistrate), followed in Bandy v. U.S., 408 F.2d 518, 521 (8th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 890, 90 S. Ct. 180, 24 L. Ed.2d 164 (1969); U.S. v. Mensik, 440 F.2d 1232, 1234 (4th Cir. 1971) (FBI need not serve warrant on prisoner in escape status); U.S. v. Reed, 413 F.2d 338, 340 (10th Cir. 1969) (recapture of escaped convicts not an arrest requiring appearance before magistrate), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 954, 90 S. Ct. 982, 25 L. Ed.2d 137 (1970). The reason that the custodian need not normally resort to the judicial process is that the escaped convict "may be . . . confined under the authority of the original judgment until the term of his imprisonment has been accomplished." U.S. ex rel. Nicholson v. Dillard, 102 F.2d 94, 96 (4th Cir. 1939).
>
> Thus, the resolution of our first question turns on the scope of the Attorney General's authority as custodian of Tavarez. Under the statute,
>
> The Attorney General is authorized—
>
> > (3) to transfer offenders under a sentence of imprisonment . . . to the foreign countries of which they are citizens or nationals;
> >
> > . . .
> >
> > (6) to make arrangements by agreement with the States for the transfer of offenders in their custody who are citizens or nationals of foreign countries to the foreign countries . . .
>
> 18 U.S.C. section 4102. To effectuate his power to transfer Tavarez, and to hold a consent verification proceeding before a federal judicial officer, as required by 18 U.S.C. section 4107(a), the Attorney General made an agreement with the state of Texas in which the state surrendered custody of Tavarez to the Attorney General.
>
> Inherent in the power to transfer an offender to a foreign country is the power to exercise custody over the offender for the purpose of effecting the transfer. Had Tavarez escaped from federal custody while awaiting the consent verification proceeding, or while en route through the U.S. to Mexico, we have no doubt that the Attorney General could recapture him for the purpose of completing the transfer. The question, therefore, is whether the Attorney General's authority to exercise custody for the purpose of effecting the transfer is lost once the initial transfer is > completed. We hold that the authority is not lost. A sovereign does not lose its power to keep a convict in custody by turning the convict over to another sovereign for service of a sentence. Floyd v. Henderson, 456 F.2d 1117 (5th Cir. 1972) (federal government did not waive its power to resume custody over convict for completion of federal sentence by transferring him to state prison for concurrent service of state and federal sentences); Mitchell v. Boen, 194 F.2d 405, 407 (10th Cir. 1952). "[T]he question of jurisdiction and custody is one of comity between the two governments and not a personal right of the prisoner." Jones v. Taylor, 327 F.2d 493, 493–94 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 1002, 84 S. Ct. 1937, 12 L. Ed.2d 1051 (1964), cited with approval in Floyd v. Henderson, 456 F.2d at 1119.

283 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the U.S. and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 249, 265–267 (1978).

284 Tavarez v. U.S. Attorney General, 668 F.2d 805 (5th Cir. 1982).

>
> Tavarez argues that the Attorney General's power to exercise custody applies only to the initial transfer. But there is no provision of the statute that requires this result. To the contrary, the only indication the statute gives is that the federal and state governments retain their power—within the limits imposed by principles of jurisdiction and comity—to regain custody if the sentence is not completed. See 18 U.S.C. section 4107(b)(3). We hold, therefore, that the Attorney General's statutory power to exercise custody for the purpose of transfer includes the power to apprehend an offender who escapes from the confinement to which he has been transferred.
>
> May the Attorney General return the offender to Mexico without a hearing?
>
> Tavarez asserts that the government must commence extradition proceedings. The government's return of Tavarez to Mexico, however, is not an "extradition." "Extradition may be sufficiently defined to be the surrender by one nation to another of an individual accused or convicted of an offense outside of its own territory, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the other, which, being competent to try and to punish him, demands the surrender." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289, 22 S. Ct. 484, 492, 46 L. Ed. 534 (1902). The procedures of 18 U.S.C section 3184, which contains a similar definition of extradition, are simply inapplicable to this case. The government is not surrendering Tavarez for a crime committed in Mexico; to the contrary, it is attempting to enforce its own laws concerning the proper place of confinement for crimes committed in this country.
>
> While we hold the extradition process inapplicable, we do not therefore conclude that the apprehended individual is entitled to no procedural protection. Granting the government power to remove an individual from the street and surrender him to foreign confinement without judicial process creates a grave danger of erroneous deprivation of liberty. While the courts have held that no hearing is required prior to a return to imprisonment within this country, see Rush v. U.S., supra, this rule does not fully control the present case.. .
>
> We hold that a person who is apprehended as an escapee from a foreign prison after transfer pursuant to the Act must be given the opportunity—as Tavarez was here—to consult with a lawyer and to petition a federal habeas court for a stay of his return to the foreign nation pending the resolution of any issue concerning the legality of his return. See In re Wainwright, 518 F.2d 173, 174 (5th Cir. 1975) (district court has "inherent power" to control custody of prisoner pending its decision on habeas petition); Jimenez v. Aristiguieta, 314 F.2d 649, 652 (5th Cir. 1963) (district court has "inherent power" to stay extradition of petitioner pending his appeal of court's denial of habeas corpus).[285]

The first two major decisions upholding the constitutionality and validity of transfer of prisoner agreements and the implementing legislation, 18 U.S.C. §§ 4100 et seq., were Pfeifer v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons[286] and Rosado v. Civiletti.[287]

The United States has expanded its relations with other countries in the area of transfer of prisoners, but all of the treaties, as well as the implementing legislation (18 U.S.C. §§ 4100 et

---

285 Id. at 808–811 (citations omitted).

286 Pfeifer v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 615 F.2d 873 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 908 (1980).

287 Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856 (1980).

seq.), require that the transfer be based on the consent of the prisoner, as well as on the consent of both the sending and receiving states. Such consent by the prisoner must also be accompanied by a waiver of the prisoner's right to challenge the conviction upon which the transfer is to be based. As a result, transfer of prisoners under U.S. law and practice cannot be viewed as an alternative to extradition unless a given treaty does not make the transfer contingent upon the prisoner's consent. In such an event, the prisoner could be transferred to the United States for trial or for execution of another sentence imposed upon him in the United States, and his only remedy would be to challenge the foreign conviction upon which he was transferred, as he would not have waived that right prior to the transfer. As U.S. law now stands, however, this would not invalidate his trial, detention or incarceration in the United States on the basis of a U.S. court order.[288]

It must be noted that if the conviction is not for a federal crime, transfer of prisoners must be subject to state legislation authorizing such a transfer.[289]

5. The Constitution, Treaty-Making, and Treaty Interpretation[290]

5.1. Extradition: A Federal Prerogative

In the United States, international extradition is regarded as an exclusive power of the federal government, which is denied to the states.[291] The power to make treaties rests specifically with the president,[292] but is subject to the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate.[293]

The treaty-making power shared by the president and the Senate is limited only by other articles of the Constitution itself or by federal legislation. As the Supreme Court stated in 1890 in De Geofroy v. Riggs:

> The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or one of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent . . . But with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country.[294]

Thus, the determination of the extent of this treaty-making power requires an analysis of the substantive national rights that are created or proscribed under the terms of the treaty. In 1794, for example, the case of In re Robbins[295] raised the question of whether Article III of the 288 See Bassiouni, Transfer of Prisoners: Policies and Practices of the U.S., supra note 282 (citing numerous authorities on the question of transfer of prisoners, and listing the bilateral treaties of the United States, and the European Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Prisoners, Mar. 21, 1983, T.S. No. 112, ratified by the U.S. Senate in 1984, thus linking the United States to a number of European states that have ratified the Convention).

---

289 The following states have passed such legislation: Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

290 See supra Secs. 1 and 2.

291 See Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 731–738.

292 U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

293 Id.

294 De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890). See also Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1957).

295 In re Robbins, 27 F. Cas. 825 (D.S.C. 1799) (No. 16,175).

Constitution permitted judicial review in extradition proceedings. The issue arose because no statutory provision authorizing the court to act pursuant to presidential mandate existed, nor did the treaty make any provision for a judicial hearing or the manner in which the proceedings were to be undertaken. The president ordered the case heard in the U.S. district court. The court held that its judicial power under Article III extended to the interpretation and application of extradition treaties, and did not require federal legislation specifically implementing procedures for judicial review in extradition proceedings. Having thereby established its jurisdiction over the subject matter, the court ruled that the terms of the treaty had been satisfied and ordered the relator surrendered to the requesting state.

The central question presented in Robbins was whether extradition treaties are self-executing, in reliance on international law doctrine, or are non–self-executing and require national legislation for their implementation, in reliance on constitutional law doctrine.[296] The debate lasted from 1794 to 1848. During that period, the proponents of the view that extradition treaties are self-executing prevailed and extradition proceedings were adjudicated by federal district courts on request of the president or the secretary of state. It was not until 1848 that Congress passed the first extradition statute setting forth that extradition is to be undertaken by virtue of a treaty and subject to judicial proceedings in federal district court in accordance with the provisions of the statute.[297] Since then the federal extradition statute has been revised several times.[298] The 1948 statute states: "[t]he provisions of this chapter relating to the surrender of persons who have committed crimes in foreign countries shall continue in force only during the existence of any treaty of extradition with such foreign government."[299]

Since the resolution of this controversy, the judiciary has determined that the executive branch has the authority to do only that which is granted in federal legislation or in an extradition treaty. This doctrine is founded on the principle that executive prerogative alone cannot dispose of a person's liberty. The government's right to restrict personal freedom in a manner consistent with the Constitution must derive from a treaty that has become part of the law of the land through the consent of the Senate. The U.S. Supreme Court reiterated this view in 1936, when it stated:

> [A]pplying, as we must, our law in determining the authority of the President, we are constrained to hold that his power, in the absence of a statute conferring an independent power, must be found in the terms of the treaty and that, as the treaty with France fails to grant the necessary authority, the President is without power to surrender the respondents.[300]

The treaty-making power shared by the president and the Senate is an exclusive national power. The Supreme Court emphasized this point as early as 1886, when it stated:

---

296 See infra Sec. 5.2.

297 Act of Aug. 12, 1848, ch. 167, 9 Stat. 302 (1898).

298 Id. See also supra Sec. 2.

299 18 U.S.C. § 3181 (2000).

300 Valentine v. U.S. ex. rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 18 (1936). In Williams v. Rogers, 449 F.2d 513 (1971), the Eighth Circuit held that Valentine meant that the holding there requires only that there be a showing of some authority, whether in the form of congressional dictate or policy, or the provisions of an existing treaty, to provide a legitimate basis for the surrender of fugitives from justice by this country to another. Id. at 521. In this case, a U.S. military person had been reassigned from the United States to a U.S. base in the Philippines where he had once been and was under indictment by the Philippine courts for the crime of rape. Under the agreement between the United States and the Philippines, the latter had jurisdiction to prosecute for common crimes committed by U.S. military personnel. The reassignment order was construed by this decision as a form of surrender akin to extradition, but as quoted it apparently need not rest on a treaty.

> There is no necessity for the states to enter upon relations with foreign nations which are necessarily implied in the extradition of fugitives from justice found within the limits of the state, as there is none why they should in their own name make demand upon foreign nations for the surrender of such fugitives.
>
> At this time of day, and after the repeated examinations which have been made by this court into the powers of the Federal government to deal with all such international questions exclusively, it can hardly be admitted that, even in the absence of treaties or acts of Congress on the subject, the extradition of a fugitive from justice can become the subject of negotiation between a state of this Union and a foreign government.[301]

Thus, it is firmly established that the various states have no power to negotiate extradition treaties, that international extradition is regarded as an exclusively federal power, and that there can be no extradition under present practice without a treaty.[302] This doctrine is also at the basis of "Executive Discretion,"[303] which permits the president or whomever he/she may delegate (i.e., the secretary of state) to refuse to surrender a person who was ordered delivered to a requesting state by the judiciary.

Although the Constitution clearly grants the treaty-making power to the president with the advice and consent of the Senate, it does not designate the branch having the authority to terminate a treaty in all instances. One commentator has noted that:

> [A]t various times the power to terminate treaties has been claimed for the President, the President-and-Senate, the Congress. The Presidents have claimed authority, presumably under their foreign affairs power, to act for the U.S. to terminate treaties, whether in accordance with their terms, or in accordance with or in violation of international law. Franklin Roosevelt, for example, denounced an extradition treaty with Greece in 1933 because Greece had refused to extradite the celebrated Mr. Insull . . . Without formal termination, Presidents in conducting foreign relations have acted contrary to treaty obligations, even where the treaty had domestic effect as the law of the land, sometimes inviting the other party to terminate the treaty.[304]

The U.S. government, in carrying out its treaty obligations, must conform its conduct to the requirements of the Constitution. However, a treaty entered into subsequent to the date in which national legislation[305] has entered into force will supersede the provisions of the legislation.

Restatement (Third) section 326 states:

> (1) The President has authority to determine the interpretation of an international agreement to be asserted by the U.S. in its relations with other states.
>
> (2) Courts in the U.S. have final authority to interpret an international agreement for purposes of applying it.

The Comments and Reporters' Notes to Restatement (Third) section 326 expand upon the relationship between branches of the federal government and the treaty-making process. They state:

> a. Presidential authority to interpret. The President has authority to interpret international agreements for the purpose of U.S. foreign relations since he is the country's "sole organ" in its international relations and is responsible for carrying out agreements with other nations. See sec. 1, Reporters' Note 2. The Senate, whose consent is necessary for the U.S. to conclude a treaty, has 301 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 414 (1886).

---

302 See Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 734.

303 See Ch. XI.

304 Henkin, supra note 142, at 168.

305 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 (2000).

no special role in the implementation of the treaty after it is made, though, of course, it participates equally with the House of Representatives in enacting implementing legislation or appropriating funds. Interpretation by the Senate of a treaty after it has been concluded may have no special authority, but understandings expressed by the Senate in giving its advice and consent must be respected. See sec. 314, Comments b and d.

b. Executive and judicial interpretation. In exercising the authority stated in Subsection (1), the President will take into account interpretations by the courts of the U.S., but he may adopt a different interpretation vis-à-vis other states. For their part, courts in the U.S. give "great weight" to interpretations of an agreement by the President in his conduct of U.S. foreign relations. Subsection (2).

International agreements are law of the U.S., sec. 111, and the President "Shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." U.S. Constitution, Article II, Section 3. Execution of an international agreement as domestic law often requires interpretation of the agreement, and the President determines what the agreement means in the first instance. The courts, however, have the final say as to the meaning of an international agreement insofar as it is law of the U.S. applicable to cases and controversies before the courts.

c. Communication of Executive views to courts. In a case in a U.S. court to which the U.S. is not a party, the Executive Branch sometimes makes suggestions to the court about the interpretation of an agreement. Compare the former practice in immunity cases, Introductory Note to Part IV, Chapter 2. The Department of Justice may file a brief amicus curiae to present the views of the government, sometimes at the request of the court.

d. Interpretation as federal law. An international agreement to which the U.S. is a party is the supreme law of the land under Article VI of the Constitution, sec. 111(1). The interpretation of such an agreement, therefore, is a matter of federal law and binding on the courts of the several States. Interpretations by State courts are subject to review by the Supreme Court in the exercise of the judicial power of the U.S., defined in Article III, Section 2 of the Constitution as extending to "all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the U.S., and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority . . . " See sec. 112, Comment a.

Reporters' Notes

1. Subsequent Senate interpretation. The Senate's understanding of a treaty to which it gives consent is binding, sec. 314, Comments b and d, but later interpretations by the Senate have no special authority. Comment a. In Fourteen Diamond Rings v. U.S., 183 U.S. 176, 180, 22 S.Ct. 59, 60, 46 L.Ed. 138 (1901), the Court ignored a Senate resolution purporting to clarify the status of the Philippines as to customs duties under the treaty of peace between the U.S. and Spain to which the Senate had previously consented. The Court said: "[t]he meaning of the treaty cannot be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it."

2. Differing interpretations by Executive and courts. The Supreme Court has given great weight to the interpretation of an agreement by the Executive Branch. Increasingly, it has invited the Solicitor General to file an amicus brief giving the views of the Executive Branch. E.g., Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187, 81 S.Ct. 922, 6 L.Ed.2d 218 (1961); Zschering v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429, 88 S.Ct. 664, 19 L.Ed.2d 683 (1968); Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 102 S.Ct. 2374, 72 L.Ed.2d 765 (1982). However, the Supreme Court also has differed from the Executive Branch on various occasions. Compare Kolovrat v. Oregon, supra, with Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325, 59 S.Ct. 884, 83 L.Ed. 1320 (1939). Courts are more likely to defer to an Executive interpretation previously made in diplomatic negotiation with other countries, on the ground that the U.S. should speak with one voice, than to one adopted by the Executive in relation to a case before the courts, especially where individual rights or interests are involved. See, e.g., Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243, 104 S.Ct. 1776, 80 L.Ed.2d 273 (1984). Compare the discussion of determinations of international law in Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 432-33, 84 S.Ct. 923, 942, 11 L.Ed.2d 804 (1964).

In Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, supra, the Supreme Court followed the Department of State's interpretation of a treaty with Japan, though the lower courts had not done so. In Spiess v. C. Itoh & Co. (America), Inc., 469 F.Supp. 1, 9-11 (S.D.Tex.1979), the district court refused to follow the Department of State's interpretation of a treaty but, recognizing the seriousness of doing so, certified the question to the Court of Appeals, which reversed, 643 F.2d 353 (5th Cir. 1981). Occasionally, judicial interpretations seem to create difficulties for the Executive Branch. Maiorano v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co., 213 U.S. 268, 29 S.Ct. 424, 53 L.Ed. 792 (1909), interpreted a clause in a treaty with Italy giving aliens access to courts of justice so as to deny an Italian the protection of a State's wrongful death statute. This caused the Executive Branch to renegotiate a broader clause in 1913, but the Court also gave that clause a restrictive reading. Liberato v. Royer, 270 U.S. 535, 46 S.Ct. 373, 70 L.Ed. 719 (1926). Those cases were effectively superseded by later treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation. See Blanco v. U.S., 775 F.2d 53, 61-63 (2d Cir. 1985). Recent cases expressing doubts as to Executive interpretations of agreements include U.S. v. Decker, 600 F.2d 733 (9th Cir.1979), certiorari denied, 444 U.S. 855, 100 S.Ct. 113, 62 L.Ed.2d 73 (1979); U.S. v. Enger, 472 F.Supp. 490 (D.N.J.1978).

3. Interpretation not a "political question." It might be argued that an agreement should not have one meaning for the U.S. in its international relations and another in litigation in U.S. courts, and that therefore the meaning of an international agreement is a "political question." The courts have been clear, however, that interpretation of a treaty for purpose of a case before them is a legal and not a political question. See the discussion of "political questions" in section 1, Reporters' Note 4.

4. Interpretation of agreement and determination of international law. Courts give "particular weight" to Executive views on customary international law (section 112, Comment c), and "great weight" used in this section has the authority of the Supreme Court of the U.S.. See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 294–95, 54 S.Ct. 191, 196, 78 L.Ed. 315 (1933); Kolovrat v. Oregon, Reporters' Note 2.

5. Evidence of U.S. interpretive practice. Whether the U.S. has taken a position as to the meaning of an international agreement might be ascertained by examining the successive Digests of International Law edited by Wharton, Moore, Hackworth, and Whiteman, the more recent annual digests, and The Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the U.S.. As of 1986, the latter compilation was complete to 1954, with volumes relating to Vietnam up to 1959.[306]

5.2. The Relationship of Treaties to National Legislation

Generally, treaties are either self-executing and therefore require no implementing legislation in order to become effective and executory, or non–self-executing and require implementing legislation.[307] The test for determining if a treaty requires implementing legislation is whether its terms impart an obligation or need that must be executed by the legislature in order for it to become enforceable by both the executive and judicial branches.[308]

306 Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 326.]

307 See generally Jordan J. Paust, Self-Executing Treaties, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 760 (1988); Charles H. Dearborn III, The Domestic Legal Effect of Declarations That Treaty Provisions Are Not Self-Executing, 57 Tex. L. Rev. 233 (1979).

308 Foster & Elam v. Neilson, 27 U.S. 253, 314 (1829), overruled by United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. 51 (1883). See generally Restatement (Third) Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 111;] Richard Cohen, Comment, Self-Executing Agreements: A Separation of Powers Problem, 24 Buff. L. Rev. 137 (1974).

Extradition treaties are deemed self-executing and therefore do not need legislation.[309] Thus, they are effective and enforceable by the executive and judicial Branches as of the time the iven treaty has been ratified by the president, subsequent to the Senate's "advice and consent." As a result, they are incorporated into the municipal law of the United States and are binding upon the federal judiciary pursuant to Article III, which is under the same obligation to enforce extradition treaties as it is to enforce the Constitution and the laws of Congress. As the Supreme Court stated in the Head Money Cases:

> A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress. But a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country . . . The Constitution of the U.S. places such provisions as these in the same category as other laws of Congress by its declaration that "this Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under authority of the U.S., shall be the supreme law of the land." A treaty, then, is a law of the land as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute.[310]

Because extradition treaties and federal legislation regarding extradition carry the same weight and force, conflict between the two raises difficult questions of judicial interpretation and enforcement. Although the courts generally attempt to interpret the two in a manner that avoids inconsistency and conflict, the prevailing view in the United States is that federal legislation enacted after the ratification of a self-executing treaty is controlling over conflicting treaty provisions. In its Head Money Cases decision, noted above, the Court went on to state:

> But even in this aspect of the case there is nothing in this law which makes it irrepealable or unchangeable. The Constitution gives it no superiority over an act of Congress in this respect, which may be repealed or modified by an act of a later date. Nor is there anything in its essential character, or in the branches of the government by which the treaty is made, which gives it this superior sanctity.
>
> A treaty is made by the President and the Senate. Statutes are made by the President, the Senate and the House of Representatives. The addition of the latter body to the other two in making a law certainly does not render it less entitled to respect in the matter of its repeal or modification than a treaty made by the other two. If there be any difference in this regard, it would seem to be in favor of an act in which all three of the bodies participate. And such is, in fact, the case in a declaration of war, which must be made by Congress, and which, when made, usually suspends or destroys existing treaties between the nations thus at war.
>
> In short, we are of opinion that, so far as a treaty made by the U.S. with any foreign nation can become the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal.[311]

---

309 Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288 (1902). Unless a treaty is self-executing, "it does not, in and of itself, create individual rights that can give rise to habeas relief." Wang v. Ashcroft, 320 F. 3d 130, 140 (2d Cir. 2003). See also Antwi v. U.S., 349 F. Supp. 2d 663 (S.D.N.Y.2004).

310 Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598–599 (1884).

311 Id.

The court reaffirmed this view in its interpretation of an extradition treaty in Grin v. Shine.[312] There, the relator unsuccessfully argued that the extradition treaty with Russia, which required proof of probable cause by the production of an arrest warrant from the requesting state, should take precedence over subsequent congressional legislation, which did not require that the arrest warrant be issued by the requesting state. The Court reasoned that:

> [w]hile the treaty contemplates the production of a copy of a warrant of arrest or other equivalent document, issued by a magistrate of the Russian Empire, it is within the power of Congress to dispense with this requirement, and we think it has done so by Rev. Stat. sec. 5270 . . . The treaty is undoubtedly obligatory upon both powers, and, if Congress should prescribe additional formalities than those required by the treaty, it might become the subject of complaint by the Russian government and of further negotiations. But notwithstanding such treaty, Congress has a perfect right to provide for the extradition of criminals in its own way, with or without a treaty to that effect, and to declare that foreign criminals shall be surrendered upon such proofs of criminality as it may judge sufficient. Castro v. De Uriarte, 16 Fed. Rep. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1883).[313]

The United States' view on this issue is contrary to the practice of many other states. One commentator has noted that:

> in civil law systems international law is generally of superior force to municipal law. Thus, in the event that an extradition treaty should impose an obligation on these countries to extradite a national [for example] this obligation must be discharged, notwithstanding the contrary provisions of municipal law.[314]

National legislation may supersede treaty obligations. Because an extradition treaty is in the nature of an international agreement stating the parties' obligations, it is only logical that the precise extent of these obligations should be contained in the treaty. Therefore, regardless of the method by which U.S. courts resolve a conflict between treaty obligations and legislation, "by international law it is no defense to plead conflicting municipal law in answer to a breach of an internationally binding obligation."[315]

The U.S. Supreme Court in Medellin v. Texas was presented with the issue of whether a decision by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) had automatic domestic legal effect in the United States.[316] Medellin raised the argument that the ICJ's judgment in Avena constituted a binding obligation on the U.S. federal courts by virtue of the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution.[317] According to Medellin, the underlying treaty by which the United States submitted to ICJ jurisdiction with respect to Vienna Convention disputes created a domestically enforceable obligation on U.S. federal courts, which could not be defeated by state limitations on successive habeas petitions.[318] The Supreme Court was presented with the issue of whether a judgment issued by the ICJ pursuant to an underlying treaty had "automatic domestic legal effect such that the judgment of its own force applies in state and federal courts."[319]

---

312 Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181 (1902).

313 Id. at 191. The doctrine was affirmed in Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 465 (1913). See also In re Extradition of Rafael Eduardo Pineda Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

314 Ivan A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law 115 (1971).

315 Grin, 187 U.S. at 195. The 1984 Extradition Act maintains the traditional position of the United States that national legislation supersedes treaties. This position was criticized by this writer before the Senate and House Committee hearings on their respective proposed bills. See Senate Judiciary Hearings on S. 1639, supra note 101, at 20; House Judiciary Hearings on H.R. 5227, supra note 109.

316 Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008).

317 Id. at 504.

318 Id.

319 Id. (emphasis in original).

The Supreme Court began its analysis on this point by setting forth the long-established rule on the self-executing nature of treaties presented by Chief Justice Marshall in Foster v. Neilson as follows: that a treaty is "equivalent to an act of the legislature," "the 'courts' must regard 'a treaty . . . as equivalent to an act of the legislature,' " and hence self-executing, when it "operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision."[320]

The Supreme Court summarized the issue as follows: "In sum, while treaties 'may comprise international commitments . . . they are not domestic law unless Congress has either enacted implementing statutes or the treaty itself conveys an intention that it be 'self-executing' and is ratified on these terms.' "[321] Absent legislation or language in a treaty to make it self-executing, a treaty is not automatically enforceable by U.S. courts and depends on the respective governments to carry out its provisions.[322] The majority responded to the dissent's suggestion that a multi-factored approach was the proper approach to determining the self-executing nature of a treaty by reaffirming the longstanding analysis set forth in Foster v. Neilson, discussing the policy goals of consistency and predictability in treaty application; a "context-specific" inquiry could have the result that the same treaty may be self-executing in one context but non–self-executing in another.[323]

The underlying treaty at issue in Medellin was the UN Charter and the ICJ Statute, which is part of the Law of the Charter. The Supreme Court held that both required implementing legislation to become binding federal law.[324] The UN Charter, as a treaty, was ratified by the United States. After considering the plain language of the treaties, the Supreme Court reasoned that there was a distinction between submitting to the ICJ's jurisdiction and being bound by its decisions under U.S. law.[325] In other words, a duality exists as to the U.S. federal government being bound under international law, and that aspect of international law being enforceable domestically under U.S. constitutional Law. The Supreme Court concluded that "The most natural reading of the Optional Protocol [to the Vienna Convention, which pertains to acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction of the ICJ by state parties] is as a . . . grant of jurisdiction," and that "The Protocol says nothing about the effect of an ICJ decision [domestically] and does not itself commit signatories to comply with an ICJ judgment."[326] This reasoning is indeed challenging to legal logic, but it is the only approach the Supreme Court could follow to reach the 320 Id. (citations omitted).

---

321 Id. at 504–505 (citations omitted).

322 Id. at 505–506.

323 Id. at 513. The majority also raised a separation-of-powers concern. As the president with the advice and consent of the Senate enters into treaties with a given understanding, allowing the judiciary to reason that a treaty was sometimes self-executing and sometimes not would create much uncertainty regarding the application of treaties and adversely affect the United States' ability to negotiate and sign international agreements. The majority summarized the point by stating:

> The point of a non-self-executing treaty is that it "addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court." Foster, 27 U.S. 253, 2 Pet., at 314, 7 L. Ed. 415 (emphasis added); Whitney, 124 U.S., at 195,8 S. Ct. 456, 31 L. Ed. 386. See also Foster, 27 U.S. 253, 2 Pet., at 307, 7 L. Ed. 415 ("The judiciary is not that department of the government, to which the assertion of its interests against foreign powers is confided").

Id. at 515–516.

324 Id. at 506.

325 Id. at 507. The Supreme Court considered the language of the optional protocol, which stated "that '[d]isputes arising out of the interpretation or application of the [Vienna] Convention shall lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice' and 'may accordingly be brought before the [ICJ] . . . by any party to the dispute being a Party to the present Protocol.' Art. I, 21 U.S.T. at 326."

326 Id. at 507–508.

outcome it sought.[327] Furthermore, Article 94 of the UN Nations Charter, which addresses the effect of ICJ decisions, requires a commitment on the part of member states to comply with ICJ decisions, and specifies that the sole remedy for noncompliance is referral to the UN Security Council by an aggrieved party.[328] The Court concluded that this remedy evidences that Article 94 did not aim at making ICJ decisions automatically enforceable in domestic courts.[329] The Supreme Court also considered the executive's understanding of the binding nature of ICJ judgments against the United States.[330] Had the Court accepted Medellin's Supremacy Clause argument, the UN Charter's remedial scheme would have been rendered meaningless, and this outcome could not have been intended at the time of drafting of the UN Charter. The Supreme Court concluded that a different interpretation would undermine "the ability of the political branches to determine whether and how to comply with an ICJ judgment," meaning that "Those sensitive foreign policy decisions would instead be transferred to state and federal courts charged with applying an ICJ judgment directly as domestic law . . . This result would be particularly anomalous in light of the principle that '[t]he conduct of the foreign relations of our Government is committed by the Constitution to the Executive and Legislative—"the political"—Departments.' Oetjen v. Central Leather Co., 246 U.S. 297, 302, 38 S. Ct. 309, 62 L. Ed. 726 (1918)."[331] Thus, the Supreme Court held that the ICJ decision was not automatically enforceable domestically, and further reasoned that pursuant to Article 59 of the Charter, ICJ decisions could only be binding on states and not individuals, implying that individuals lacked standing in national courts to raise an argument based on a claim of rights arising under an ICJ decision.[332] This lack of standing applies only to ICJ decisions, which are proceedings involving states and international organizations and not individuals. It does not extend to 327 It is reminiscent of the same approach followed by the Court in Alvarez-Machain v. United States, where the Court upheld the kidnapping of a Mexican citizen at the behest of the U.S. Department of Justice in order to prosecute him on the proposition that the United States–Mexico bilateral extradition treaty did not specifically exclude kidnapping. Consequently, U.S. jurisdiction attached.

---

328 Id. at 508–509.

329 The Supreme Court also considered the post-ratification understanding of signatory nations, noting that of the 47 nations parties to the Optional Protocol and 171 nations parties to the Vienna Convention, none had treated ICJ judgments as domestically binding. Id. at 516–517.

330 Id. at 510 (citations omitted). The Court provided the following summary of the executive's understanding of this point:

> This was the understanding of the Executive Branch when the President agreed to the U.N. Charter and the declaration accepting general compulsory ICJ jurisdiction. See, e.g., The Charter of the United Nations for the Maintenance of International Peace and Security: Hearings before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 79th Cong., 1st Sess., 124–125 (1945) ("[I]f a state fails to perform its obligations under a judgment of the [ICJ], the other party may have recourse to the Security Council"); id., at 286 (statement of Leo Pasvolsky, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for International Organizations and Security Affairs) ("[W]hen the Court has rendered a judgment and one of the parties refuses to accept it, then the dispute becomes political rather than legal. It is as a political dispute that the matter is referred to the Security Council"); A Resolution Proposing Acceptance of Compulsory Jurisdiction of International Court of Justice: Hearings on S. Res. 196 before the Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 79th Cong., 2d Sess., 142 (1946) (statement of Charles Fahy, State Dept. Legal Adviser) (while parties that accept ICJ jurisdiction have "a moral obligation" to comply with ICJ decisions, Article 94(2) provides the exclusive means of enforcement).

331 Id. at 510. The Court also stated in dicta that giving an ICJ judgment automatic binding domestic effect would allow the ICJ to override contrary state and federal law without any means of domestic review of the ICJ's judgment. The Court further noted that, in prior decisions, it "held treaties to be self-executing when the textual provisions indicate that the President and Senate intended for the agreement to have domestic effect," as the Court's interpretation had always begun with the language of the treaty at issue. Id. at 517–519.

332 Id. at 511.

treaty rights conferred upon individuals by states, either in multilateral or bilateral treaties, whereby individuals are third-party beneficiaries entitled to claim such conferred rights and see their enforcement in national legal proceedings.[333]

5.2.1. The Effect of Self-Executing Provisions of Multilateral Treaties on Preexisting Bilateral Treaties and the Requirement of National Implementing Legislation.

Certain multilateral treaties, such as the United Nations Convention Against Corruption[334] ("United Nations Convention on Corruption") raise a peculiar issue as to whether a purportedly self-executing provision within that multilateral treaty can operate as a self-executing modification of preexisting bilateral extradition treaties. For example, this issue arises as to whether Article 44(4) of the United Nations Convention on Corruption applies as a self-executing provision and whether the Senate's Declaration on national implementing legislation is unambiguous about the automatic applicability of Article 44(4), namely as an automatic amendment to each and every pre-existing bilateral treaty the United States has with a state-party to the convention.[335] On its face, this does not seem very plausible insofar as a bilateral treaty requires the agreement of both parties to it, while the convention posits the automatic inclusion of other offenses as extraditable offenses in every U.S. bilateral treaty without any consideration as to whether another state to a given bilateral treaty also includes the said crime in its domestic criminal code. In other words, it is incongruous to say the least to have one state include a given crime in a bilateral treaty on the basis of a multilateral treaty without any assurance that the counterpart state in that bilateral treaty is also willing to do the same even when that state is a party to a multilateral treaty. This interpretation is consistent with Title 18 § 3181(a) that "[t]he provisions of this chapter relating to the surrender of persons who have committed crimes in foreign countries shall continue in force only during the existence of a treaty of extradition with such foreign government," and that it is well established that the United States relies exclusively on bilateral treaties, though essentially as a matter of policy as there is no constitutional impediment to relying on multilateral treaties. This policy is supported by the consistent reservations and declarations made by the U.S. Senate in multilateral treaties such as the declaration made with respect to Article 44(5) of the United Nations Convention on Corruption.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations' Report stated that the provisions of the United Nations Convention on Corruption "will be implemented by the United States in conjunction with applicable federal statutes. The lack of a private cause of action does not affect the ability of a person whose extradition is sought to raise any available defense in the context of an extradition proceeding."[336] What is required to operationalize Article 44(4) of the United Nations Convention on Corruption, and arguably for similar multilateral treaty provisions, is an additional provision to Title 18 §§ 3181–3196 of the U.S. Code whereby with respect 333 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6, concerning the Rule of Specialty about which U.S. circuit courts are divided as to whether individuals have standing to object to violators of that Rule in the absence of a protest by the surrendering state.

---

334 United Nations Convention Against Corruption, 2349 U.N.T.S. 41 (Oct. 31, 2003).

335 Article 44(4) states:

> Each of the offences to which this article applies shall be deemed to be included as an extraditable offence in every extradition treaty existing between States Parties. States Parties undertake to include such offences as extraditable offences in every extradition treaty to be concluded between them. A State Party whose law so permits, in case it uses this Convention as the basis for extradition, shall not consider any of the offences established in accordance with this Convention as a political offence.

336 Report on the United Nations Convention Against Corruption, Mr. Lugar's Report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, S-Exec. Rep. 109-18 at 8–9 (2006).

to § 3184 (discussing the hearing process for issuance of a U.S. arrest warrant for a fugitive in a foreign state) that would clearly state that a bilateral treaty can be automatically amended by a multilateral treaty without the need for further legislation and without the need for a specific amendment in the bilateral treaty in question. But this would have to be subject to a reciprocal action by the counterpart state in the bilateral treaty. If that were not the case the incongruous situation would exist of the United States including in its understanding of extraditable offense a given crime that the counterpart may not include in its understanding. If nothing else, either the legislation or the practice should reflect an exchange of understanding between the two parties to the bilateral treaty. Although the multilateral United Nations Convention on Corruption requires parties to amend their bilateral treaties to include certain offenses that may not have been part of preexisting bilateral extradition treaties, it does not state how each state shall do so in accordance with its constitutional order and other legal requirements. Notwithstanding the strong language of Article 44(4), there is no assurance that a state-party will in fact amend its national laws and its bilateral treaties to conform to the requirements of that provision. In short, there is a link missing in the chain going from the multilateral treaty obligation to the bilateral treaties. That link has to be made by means of an amendment to the U.S. extradition statute Title 18 §§ 3181–3196 or by means of some other bilateral understanding between the respective states.

The United States did inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations that it elected not to take the United Nations Convention on Corruption as the legal basis for cooperation on extradition with other states-parties.[337] Generally, all other treaties, excluding extradition treaties, are deemed non–self-executing, which means that they cannot be deemed part of U.S. law unless national implementing legislation is enacted. It is possible for a given treaty to be self-executing as to some parts and non–self-executing as to others. In other words, a given treaty may be considered by the U.S. Congress as being self-executing subject, however, to certain specific provisions that may be designated as being non–self-executing. With respect to these treaties, it would be necessary for Congress to pass national implementing legislation. Without such legislation, the provisions of that treaty would have no application in the United States because they would not be deemed part of U.S. law.

The language of the U.S. Senate's declaration means that insofar as the Senate is concerned, there is no need to adopt national legislation in order to make effective Articles 44 and 46 of the United Nations Convention on Corruption. Nevertheless, this declaration by the Senate is not binding on the U.S. government if it elects not to exercise the prerogative of deeming Articles 44 and 46 of the convention to be self-executing. Nothing prevents the U.S. government from officially changing its position by notifying the Secretary General of the United Nations in his/her capacity as the depository of the United Nations Convention on Corruption that it has elected, as of a given date, to rely on Articles 44 and 46 with respect to extradition. The questions of the enforceability of multilateral treaties in national courts and its correlative question of an individual's standing to raise such an issue obviously arises under rules of treaty-information as discussed below in Section 5.3.

5.3. Standing

In Medellin v. Dretke, the Supreme Court in 2005 held:

> While treaties are compacts between nations, a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country.[338]

337 The U.S. declaration states as follows: "(2) The U.S. declares that the provisions of the Convention (with the exception of Articles 44 and 46) are not self-executing." See S. Exec. Rep. No. 109-18 (2006).

338 Medellin v. Dretke, 544 U.S. 660, 680 (2005), quoting Edye v. Robinson ("Head Money Cases"), 112 U.S. 580 (1884).

If the Supreme Court recognizes that treaties not only create obligations for the benefit of the contracting states, but also rights and privileges for the benefit of individuals, as third-party beneficiaries, relators should be able to raise issues without having to rely on a protest by the originally requested state, such as issues relating to specialty, enhancement of penalties, length of sentence, and good faith of prosecutors.[339]

The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties has not been ratified by the United States; consequently, it does not confer a justiciable individual right in U.S. courts even though it embodies customary international law. However, customary international law is justiciable before U.S. courts. As most of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties' provisions are contained in the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, one could argue that the treaty provisions are a reflection of both customary international law and U.S. law for purposes of simplifying the issues of treaty interpretation presented by litigants before U.S. courts. This is not, however, the position that U.S. courts have taken. Instead, the circuits have tended either to rely on the provisions of the Restatement (Third), or what they perceive to be customary international law.

In United States v. Jiminez-Nava,[340] the Fifth Circuit reviewed the question of treaty interpretation with respect to the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and held:

> This court reviews a district court's interpretation of a treaty de novo. Kreimerman v. Casa Veerkamp, 22 F.3d 634, 639 (5th Cir.1994).
>
> The Vienna Convention is a 79-article, multilateral treaty negotiated in 1963 and ratified by the U.S. in 1969. See U.S. v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d 882, 884 (9th Cir.2000). Mexico is a signatory nation. The treaty governs "the establishment of consular relations, [and] defin[es] a consulate's functions in a receiving nation." U.S. v. Alvarado-Torres, 45 F.Supp.2d 986, 988 (S.D.Cal.1999). Jimenez-Nava asserts that Article 36 of the treaty bestows a private, judicially-enforceable right on foreign nationals to consult with consular officials. He argues that because this right was violated, his post-arrest statements and tangible evidence should have been suppressed. These are issues of first impression for this circuit. See Flores v. Johnson, 210 F.3d 456, (5th Cir.2000).
>
> A. Whether The Vienna Convention Confers An Enforceable Individual Right
>
> Ratified treaties become the law of the land on an equal footing with federal statutes. U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. They are to be construed initially according to their terms. U.S. v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 663, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 2193, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992). Treaty construction is a particularly sensitive business because international agreements should be consistently interpreted among the signatories. "Treaties are contracts between or among independent nations." U.S. v. Zabaneh, 837 F.2d 1249, 1261 (5th Cir.1988). As such, they do not generally create rights that are enforceable in the courts. U.S. v. Li, 206 F.3d 56, 60 (1st Cir. 2000); see also Goldstar v. U.S., 967 F.2d 965, 968 (4th Cir.1992) ('International treaties are not presumed to create rights that are privately enforceable'); Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255, 259 (7th Cir.1990) ("It is well established that individuals have no standing to challenge violations of international treaties in the absence of a protest by the sovereigns involved.").
>
> For enforcement of its provisions, a treaty depends "on the interest and honor of the governments which are parties to it." Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598, 5 S.Ct. 247, 254, 28 L.Ed. 798 (1884). "[I]nfraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations." Id. ("It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress."). See also U.S. v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063, 1090 (5th Cir.1980) ("[R]ights under international common law must belong to sovereign nations, not to individuals, just as treaty rights are the rights of the sovereign.").

339 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.5.

340 United States v. Jiminez-Nava, 243 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 2001).

Against the backdrop of these general principles, the Vienna Convention appears to be a standard treaty whose purpose is to facilitate consular activity in receiving states. The Preamble states: Believing that an international convention on consular relations, privileges and immunities would also contribute to the development of friendly relations among nations, irrespective of their differing constitutional and social systems, [and] Realizing that the purpose of such privileges and immunities is not to benefit individuals but to ensure the efficient performance of functions by consular posts on behalf of their respective States . . . (emphasis added).

This language would appear to preclude any possibility that individuals may benefit from it when they travel abroad, even, perhaps, if they are among the consular corps. Moreover, only one article out of 79 in the Treaty even arguably protects individual non-consular officials. Article 36, titled "Communication and Contact With Nationals of Receiving State," provides:

> 1. With a view to facilitating the exercise of consular functions relating to nationals of the sending State:
>
> . . .
>
> (b) if he so requests, the competent authorities of the receiving State shall, without delay, inform the consular post of the sending State if, within its consular district, a national of that State is arrested or committed to prison or to custody pending trial or is detained in any other manner. Any communication addressed to the consular post by the person arrested, in prison, custody or detention shall also be forwarded by the said authorities without delay. The said authorities shall inform the person concerned without delay of his rights under this sub-paragraph;
>
> (c) consular officers shall have the right to visit a national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention, to converse and correspond with him and to arrange for his legal representation. They shall also have the right to visit any national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention in their district in pursuance of a judgment. Nevertheless, consular officers shall refrain from taking an action on behalf of a national who is in prison, custody or detention if he expressly opposes such action.
>
> 2. The rights referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and regulations of the receiving State, subject to the proviso, however, that the said laws and regulations must enable full effect to be given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under this Article are intended.

Principally because of the references to "rights" in Article 36, the circuit courts have so far declined to decide whether the Vienna Convention intended to enact individually enforceable rights of consultation. The Supreme Court, in dicta, has also held the question open. Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371, 376, 118 S.Ct. 1352, 1355, 140 L.Ed.2d 529 (1998).

A strong argument has been made that such diffidence is unnecessary and that the Vienna Convention is not ambiguous as to whether it creates private rights. In Li, Judges Selya and Boudin stated:

> Nothing in [the] text explicitly provides for judicial enforcement of . . . consular access provisions at the behest of private litigants. Of course, there are references in the treaties to a "right" of access, but these references are easily explainable. The contract States are granting each other rights, and telling future detainees that they have a "right" to communicate with their consul is a means of implementing the treaty obligations as between States. Any other way of phrasing the promise as to what will be said to detainees would be artificial and awkward. Li, 206 F.3d at 60, 66. (Selya, J. & Boudin, J., concurring). In any event, as these judges pointed out, even if the treaty is ambiguous, the presumption against implying private rights comes into play. Finally, as both the majority and concurring judges in Li recognized, the U.S. State Department has consistently taken the position that the Vienna Convention does not establish rights of individuals, but only state-to-state rights and obligations. The State Department's view of treaty interpretation is entitled to substantial deference. Li, 206 F.3d at 63-66.

Jimenez-Nava's arguments in support of individually enforceable rights ultimately emphasize the treaty's ambiguity First, by dwelling on the plain language concerning "rights" in Article 36, Jimenez-Nava must discount the equally plain language in the Preamble that the treaty's purpose "is not to benefit individuals." Appellant would confine the limitation to consular officials, but that interpretive route hardly assists him, since consular officials are the specific beneficiaries of many of the treaty provisions. If the treaty cannot benefit them by creating individually enforceable rights, how can it intend to confer enforceable rights on all foreign nationals detained in the receiving state?

Second, while acknowledging the general rule against implication of personal rights in treaties, Jimenez-Nava notes that, like any agreement, treaties may explicitly confer individual rights.[] He cites as an example Supreme Court's construction of an extradition treaty in U.S. v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S.Ct. 234, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886). That case is inapposite, however, for an explicit purpose of the treaty in Rauscher was to govern "the giving up of criminals, fugitives from justice in certain cases" Id. at 410, 7 S.Ct. at 236. Unlike the Vienna Convention, the purpose and provisions of the extradition treaty related directly to the individual right asserted. Id. at 410, 7 S.Ct. at 236. Rauscher demonstrates at most the necessity for careful interpretation of each treaty[341]

A more liberal position was expressed by the Sixth Circuit in U.S. v. Emuegbunam,[342] which held:

Proper interpretation of a treaty presents a question of law that this court reviews de novo. U.S. v. Page, 232 F.3d 536, 540 (6th Cir.2000) (citing U.S. v. Morgan, 216 F.3d 557, 561 (6th Cir.2000)), cert. denied, 532 U.S. 935, 121 S.Ct. 1389, 149 L.Ed.2d 312 (2001). Under the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution, "all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the U.S., shall be the supreme Law of the Land." U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. Under federal law treaties have the same legal effect as statutes. See, e.g., Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194, 8 S.Ct. 456, 31 L.Ed. 386 (1888); Page, 232 F.3d at 540 (citing Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371, 378, 118 S.Ct. 1352, 140 L.Ed.2d 529 (1998) (per curiam)). As a general rule, however, international treaties do not create rights that are privately enforceable in the federal courts.

A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamation, so far as the injured parties choose to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress.

Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598, 5 S.Ct. 247, 28 L.Ed. 798 (1884). See also Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 306, 7 L.Ed. 415 (1829) ("The judiciary is not that department of the government, to which the assertion of its interests against foreign powers is confided; and its duty commonly is to decide upon individual rights, according to those principles which the political departments of the nation have established."), overruled in part on other grounds by U.S. v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 51, 8 L.Ed. 604 (1833). "International agreements, even those directly benefitting private persons, generally do not create private rights or provide for a private cause of action in domestic courts . . . ." Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the U.S. § 907, cmt. a (1987). In fact, courts presume that the rights created by an international treaty belong to a state and that a private individual cannot enforce them. See, e.g., Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. U.S., 967 F.2d 965, 968 (4th Cir.1992) ("International treaties are not presumed to create rights that are privately enforceable."); Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255, 259 (7th Cir.1990) ("It is well established that individuals have no standing to challenge violations of international treaties in the absence of a protest by the sovereigns involved.").

341 Id. at 195–198 (footnotes omitted).

342 268 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 2001).

Nonetheless, the Supreme Court has recognized that treaties can create individually enforceable rights in some circumstances. See, e.g., U.S. v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 667–68, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992) (citing U.S. v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S.Ct. 234, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886)); Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 442-43, 109 S.Ct. 683, 102 L.Ed.2d 818 (1989). "Whether or not treaty violations can provide the basis for particular claims or defenses thus appears to depend upon the particular treaty and claim involved." U.S. v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d 882, 885 (9th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 991, 121 S.Ct. 481, 148 L.Ed.2d 455 (2000). Absent express language in a treaty providing for particular judicial remedies, the federal courts will not vindicate private rights unless a treaty creates fundamental rights on a par with those protected by the Constitution. See, e.g., Page, 232 F.3d at 540–41.

Acknowledging that the Vienna Convention "arguably confers on an individual the right to consular assistance following arrest," the Supreme Court has left open the question of whether the Vienna Convention creates an individual right enforceable by the federal courts. Breard, 523 U.S. at 376, 118 S.Ct. 1352.[4]

C. Dismissal of the Indictment

With respect to Emuegbunem's claim that violation of his rights under the Vienna Convention requires dismissal of the indictment, we need not determine whether private individuals can enforce the treaty or whether Emuegbunem in fact suffered a violation of the rights conferred by the treaty. In Page, 232 F.3d at 540, we held that "although some judicial remedies may exist, there is no right in a criminal prosecution to have evidence excluded or an indictment dismissed due to a violation of Article 36." See also U.S. v. Chaparro-Alcantara, 226 F.3d 616, 618 (7th Cir.) (holding that dismissal of an indictment is not available to remedy a violation of the Vienna Convention), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 1026, 121 S.Ct. 599, 148 L.Ed.2d 513 (2000); U.S. v. Cordoba-Mosquera, 212 F.3d 1194, 1196 (11th Cir. 2000) (per curiam) (absent a showing of prejudice a violation of the Vienna Convention cannot be remedied through dismissal of the indictment), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 1131, 121 S.Ct. 893, 148 L.Ed.2d 800 (2001); U.S. v. Li, 206 F.3d 56, 66 (1st Cir.) (en banc) (dismissal of indictment is not an available remedy), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 956, 121 S.Ct. 379, 148 L.Ed.2d 292 (2000). Even if Defendant has suffered a violation of his rights under the Vienna Convention and even if he can enforce those rights in federal court, Page forecloses dismissal of the indictment as a remedy.

D. Reversal of the Conviction

In Page we addressed only the availability of suppression of evidence or dismissal of an indictment as remedies to redress a violation of the Vienna Convention. Accordingly, we must turn to consideration of whether reversal of a conviction can remedy a violation of the Vienna Convention. As a threshold matter, the government contends that the Vienna Convention does not create rights individually enforceable in the federal courts. We agree.

Confronted in recent years with numerous claims based upon the Vienna Convention without the benefit of a definitive statement from the Supreme Court, federal courts whenever possible have sidestepped the question of whether the treaty creates individual rights—typically by concluding that remedies such as suppression of evidence or dismissal of an indictment are not available even if the treaty creates individual rights. See, e.g., U.S. v. Santos, 235 F.3d 1105, 1108 (8th Cir.2000); Page, 232 F.3d at 540; U.S. v. Lawal, 231 F.3d 1045, 1048 (7th Cir.2000), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 1182, 121 S.Ct. 1165, 148 L.Ed.2d 1024 (2001); Chaparro-Alcantara, 226 F.3d at 621; Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d at 885; Li, 206 F.3d at 66. On other occasions courts have concluded that a defendant must show prejudice to establish a violation of the Vienna Convention. See, e.g., U.S. v. Minjares-Alvarez, 264 F.3d 980, 987–88 (10th Cir. 2001); U.S. v. Chanthadara, 230 F.3d 1237, 1256 (10th Cir.2000), petition for cert. filed, No. 00-9757 (May 2, 2001); Cordoba-Mosquera, 212 F.3d at 1196; U.S. v. Pagan, 196 F.3d 884, 890 (7th Cir. 1999); U.S. v. Ademaj, 170 F.3d 58, 67–68 (1st Cir.1999). One circuit has held that the Vienna Convention does not establish any judicially enforceable right of consultation between a detained foreign national and the consular representatives of his nation. U.S. v. Jimenez-Nava, 243 F.3d 192, 198 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 533 U.S. 962, 121 S.Ct. 2620, 150 L.Ed.2d 773 (2001). See also Santos, 235 F.3d at 1109 (Beam, J., concurring) (concluding that the Vienna Convention does not confer on private citizens rights enforceable in federal court); Li, 206 F.3d at 66–67 (Selya, J. & Boudin, J., concurring) (same). No federal appellate court has yet accepted a claim based upon violations of the treaty.

"In construing a treaty, as in construing a statute, we first look to its terms to determine its meaning." Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 665, 112 S.Ct. 2188 (citing Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392, 397, 105 S.Ct. 1338, 84 L.Ed.2d 289 (1985), and Valentine v. U.S. ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 11, 57 S.Ct. 100, 81 L.Ed. 5 (1936)). See also Eastern Airlines, Inc. v. Floyd, 499 U.S. 530, 534, 111 S.Ct. 1489, 113 L.Ed.2d 569 (1991); Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Schlunk, 486 U.S. 694, 699, 108 S.Ct. 2104, 100 L.Ed.2d 722 (1988). Of the seventy-nine articles of the Vienna Convention, only Article 36 arguably protects individual non-consular officials. Jimenez-Nava, 243 F.3d at 196. The argument that the treaty confers rights upon criminal defendants who are foreign nationals originates in the language of individual rights that appears throughout the Article among the treaty's protections for the ability of the consular officials of a sending State to communicate with a detained national. See, e.g., Vienna Convention art. 36, § 1(a) ("Nationals of the sending State shall have the same freedom with respect to communication with and access to consular officers of the sending State."); § 1(b) ("[Arresting] authorities shall inform the person concerned without delay of his rights under this sub-paragraph."). Yet the Preamble to the Vienna Convention expressly disclaims the creation of any individual rights: "[T]he purpose of such privileges and immunities is not to benefit individuals but to ensure the efficient performance of functions by consular posts on behalf of their respective States." Vienna Convention, 21 U.S.T. at 79, 596 UNITED NATIONST.S. at 262 (emphasis added). Similarly, Chapter II of the treaty, in which Article 36 appears, concerns the privileges and immunities of consular officers, not detained foreign nationals. Moreover, consistent with the background presumption against implying personal rights in international treaties, the rights contained in Article 36 belong to the party states, not individuals.

Of course, there are references in the [treaty] to a "right" of [consular] access, but these references are easily explainable. The contracting States are granting each other rights, and telling future detainees that they have a "right" to communicate with their consul is a means of implementing the treaty obligations as between States. Any other way of phrasing the promise as to what will be said to detainees would be both artificial and awkward.

Li, 206 F.3d at 66 (Selya, J. & Boudin, J., concurring). Accordingly, we conclude that the Vienna Convention does not create in a detained foreign national a right of consular access.

To the extent the treaty admits of any ambiguity on the question, nontextual sources, "such as a treaty's ratification history and its subsequent operation," U.S. v. Stuart, 489 U.S. 353, 366, 109 S.Ct. 1183, 103 L.Ed.2d 388 (1989), dispel any doubt about whether the Vienna Convention creates individual rights. In resolving doubts about the interpretation, "the construction of a treaty by the political department of the government, while not conclusive upon courts called upon to construe it, is nevertheless of weight." Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 295, 54 S.Ct. 191, 78 L.Ed. 315 (1933). See also El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155, 168, 119 S.Ct. 662, 142 L.Ed.2d 576 (1999) ("Respect is ordinarily due the reasonable views of the Executive Branch concerning the meaning of an international treaty."); Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187, 194, 81 S.Ct. 922, 6 L.Ed.2d 218 (1961) ("While courts interpret treaties for themselves, the meaning given them by the departments of government particularly charged with their negotiation and enforcement is given great weight.").

Since 1970 the State Department has consistently taken the view that the Vienna Convention does not create individual rights. Li, 206 F.3d at 63–64. See also Jimenez-Nava, 243

F.3d at 197; Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d at 887–88. In the view of the State Department, "the only remedies for failures of consular notification under the Vienna Convention are diplomatic, political, or exist between states under international law." Page, 232 F.3d at 541 (quoting Li, 206 F.3d at 63) (alterations omitted). This position accords with the view of the Department and the Senate during the ratification proceedings. Li, 206 F.3d at 64–65. In practice the parties to the Convention have attempted to remedy violations of Article 36 through investigations and apologies. "The State Department indicates that it has historically enforced the Vienna Convention itself, investigating reports of violations and apologizing to foreign governments and working with domestic law enforcement to prevent future violations when necessary." Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d at 886. In turn "[m]any, if not most, of the countries with which the U.S. raises concerns that consular notification obligations have been violated with respect to U.S. citizens will undertake to investigate the alleged violation and, if it is confirmed, to apologize for it and undertake to prevent future recurrences." Li, 206 F.3d at 65. Apparently, no country remedies violations of the Vienna Convention through its criminal justice system. Id. "These practices evidence a belief among Vienna Convention signatory nations that the treaty's dictates simply are not enforceable in a host nation's criminal courts[.]" Id. at 66.

In support of his argument that the Vienna Convention creates individually enforceable rights, Emuegbunem cites Faulder v. Johnson, 81 F.3d 515 (5th Cir.1996), and Breard v. Pruett, 134 F.3d 615 (4th Cir.1998). This reliance is misplaced. In Faulder, the Fifth Circuit stated that the Vienna Convention "requires an arresting government to notify a foreign national who has been arrested, imprisoned or taken into custody or detention of his right to contact his consul." 81 F.3d at 520. Although state authorities admitted that they had failed to comply with the Vienna Convention, the court affirmed a capital murder conviction because on the facts presented there the violation did not merit reversal of the conviction. Id. Subsequently, the Fifth Circuit explained that its ruling in Faulder had not expressed a view on the question of whether the Vienna Convention confers rights enforceable by individuals. Flores v. Johnson, 210 F.3d 456, 457–58 (5th Cir. 2000) (per curiam), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 987, 121 S.Ct. 445, 148 L.Ed.2d 449 (2000).

We do not read our opinion in Faulder as recognizing a personal right under the Convention. Rather, the panel dispatched the claim with its conclusion that any violation was harmless. Any negative implication inherent in rejecting the claim as harmless lacks sufficient force to support a contention that the panel held that the Convention created rights enforceable by individuals. While we conclude that Faulder has not decided the question, we do not reach its merits because at best Flores's assertion is Teague barred. Id. at 457. Accordingly, after Flores whether the Vienna Convention created individual rights remained an open question in the Fifth Circuit, Jimenez-Nava, 243 F.3d at 195 n. 2 (concluding in the wake of Faulder and Flores that the question was one of first impression in the circuit), and in Jimenez-Nava the court resolved the issue adversely to the position advocated by Defendant. Id. at 198.

Like Faulder, the Fourth Circuit's opinion in Breard simply attempts a description of the Vienna Convention and takes no position on the rights and remedies of criminal defendants in the U.S. who are foreign nationals. Breard v. Pruett, 134 F.3d 615, 619 (4th Cir. 1998) (setting forth Breard's argument that the court should overturn his conviction and death sentence because the "authorities failed to notify him that, as a foreign national, he had the right to contact the Consulate of Argentina or the Consulate of Paraguay pursuant to the Vienna Convention"), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 371, 118 S.Ct. 1352, 140 L.Ed.2d 529 (1998) (per curiam). Two features of the Fourth Circuit's decision in Breard confirm this conclusion. First, noting that Breard had failed to raise this claim in state court, the Fourth Circuit concluded that he had procedurally defaulted the claim and that he could not show cause to excuse the default. Accordingly, the court declined to consider the merits of Breard's Vienna Convention claim. Id. at 619–20. Second, the court quoted Murphy v. Netherland, 116 F.3d 97, 100 (4th Cir.1997), in which it rejected an argument that a habeas petitioner's Vienna Convention claim was so novel that he > could not have raised it in state court proceedings, because a reasonably diligent attorney should have discovered "the existence and applicability (if any) of the Vienna Convention." Breard, 134 F.3d at 620 (emphasis added). This procedural posture and the quotation from Murphy demonstrate that the Fourth Circuit in Breard took no position on the question of whether the Vienna Convention creates individual rights.

>
> For the foregoing reasons, we hold that the Vienna Convention does not create a right for a detained foreign national to consult with the diplomatic representatives of his nation that the federal courts can enforce. A contrary conclusion risks aggrandizing the power of the judiciary and interfering in the nation's foreign affairs, the conduct of which the Constitution reserves for the political branches. See Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d at 887 ("The addition of a judicial enforcement mechanism contains the possibility for conflict between the respective powers of the executive and judicial branches."). Significantly, the Supreme Court has twice held that the Vienna Convention does not provide a signatory nation a private right of action in the federal courts to seek a remedy for a violation of Article 36. Federal Republic of Germany v. U.S., 526 U.S. 111, 111–12, 119 S.Ct. 1016, 143 L.Ed.2d 192 (1999) (per curiam); Breard, 523 U.S. at 377, 118 S.Ct. 1352. If a foreign sovereign to whose benefit the Vienna Convention inures cannot seek a judicial remedy, we cannot fathom how an individual foreign national can do so in the absence of express language in the treaty.[343]

The U.S. Supreme Court was presented in Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon and Bustillo v. Johnson[344] with the issue of whether Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations[345] grants rights that may be invoked by individuals in a judicial proceeding. Both Sanchez-Llamas and Bustillo petitioned the Supreme Court to suppress evidence of their confessions, in light of the *Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals*by the ICJ.[346] The Court, however did not decide the issue but rather stated that "Because Sanchez-Llamas and Bustillo are not in any event entitled to relief on their claims, we find it unnecessary to resolve the question whether the Vienna Convention grants individuals enforceable rights. Therefore, for purposes of addressing petitioner's claims, we assume, without deciding, that Article 36 does grant Bustillo and Sanchez-Llamas such rights."[347]

Likewise in Medellin v. Texas,[348] the Supreme Court in March 2008 stated in a footnote that it did not need to resolve the issue whether an individual could enforce rights conferred by Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.[349] In Medellin, the Court was presented with the ICJ's Avena decision, which mandated that the United States provide a remedy for failure to enforce Medellin's Article 36 consular rights.[350] The Supreme Court responded that "The question is whether the Avena judgment has binding effect in domestic courts under the Optional Protocol, ICJ Statute and U.N. Charter. Consequently, it is unnecessary to resolve whether the Vienna Convention . . . grants Medellin individually enforceable rights."[351]

---

343 Id. at 389–394 (footnote omitted).

344 548 U.S. 331 (2006).

345 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, April 24, 1963 (Vienna), entered into force on March 19, 1967. 596 U.N.T.S. 261.

346 Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex. v. U.S.) I.C.J. 128 (March 31, 2008).

347 Sanchez-Llamas, 548 U.S. at 343.

348 552 U.S. 491 (2008).

349 Id. at 505 n.4.

350 Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex. v. U.S.) I.C.J. 128 (March 31, 2008).

351 Medellin, 552 U.S. at 505 n. 4.

In United States v. Osagiede,[352] a Seventh Circuit case decided after Medellin, the defendant raised a Sixth Amendment constitutional claim that his legal counsel failed to notify him of his Article 36 consular rights.[353] The government argued that no court has ever recognized that Article 36 confers individual rights in a criminal proceeding and that even if those rights do exist, no remedy is available.[354] The Seventh Circuit responded that because the claim was constitutional and not treaty-based, Article 36 rights and remedies were relevant only to the extent that it helped prove or disprove the elements necessary under Strickland v. Washington.[355] The Court went on to state that "we have always assumed that Article 36 confers individual rights, even in the criminal setting, and we stand by that position today. Furthermore, we believe that there was a viable (and simple) remedy for the Article 36 violation alleged in this case: counsel could have informed Osagiede of his right to consular assistance and the violation could have been raised with the judge presiding at trial."[356]

The issue of standing is related to the nature of the right invoked, its source, its relationship to other sources of national law, and the ranking of these sources of law. In Sanchez-Llamas, Sanchez argued that the Convention implicitly required a judicial remedy and was therefore self-executing.[357] The Supreme Court dismissed this, stating "there is little indication that other parties to the Convention have interpreted Article 36 to require a judicial remedy in the context of criminal prosecutions."[358] The Court emphasized that "where a treaty does not provide a particular remedy, either expressly or implicitly, it is not for the federal courts to impose on the States through lawmaking of their own,"[359] and although the Court did not directly say that Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations is not self-executing, it can be clearly inferred through its holding.[360]

In Medellin, the Supreme Court stated that it was also "unnecessary to resolve whether the Vienna Convention is self-executing…" because the Court was concerned with the ICJ Statute, the Protocol, and the UN Charter.[361]

The Supreme Court held in Sanchez-Llamas that ICJ opinions deserve "respectful consideration" but that they do not have binding effect on U.S. domestic courts.[362] The Court reasoned that nothing in the "structure or purpose"[363] of the ICJ suggests that its interpretations were intended to be binding on "our courts,"[364] particularly since the expressed remedy for a national legal system to implement ICJ opinions is a referral to the Security Council for enforcement or sanction.[365] The Court, therefore, implies that because such a remedy exists, U.S. domestic courts are not directly bound by ICJ decisions.[366]

---

352 543 F.3d 399 (7th Cir. 2008).

353 Id. at 406.

354 Id.

355 Id.

356 Id. at 407.

357 Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, 548 U.S. 331, 346 (2006).

358 Id. at 346.

359 Id.

360 Id.

361 Medellin, 552 U.S. at 505 n.4.

362 Sanchez-Llamas, 548 U.S. at 353.

363 Id. at 355.

364 Id. at 355.

365 Id.

366 Id.

Following Sanchez-Llamas, the Supreme Court in Medellin reasoned that because the ICJ Statute and Optional Protocol are not self-executing, the Avena decision did not have automatic domestic legal effect.[367] According to the Court, the Statute and Protocol are not self-executing because no enforcement mechanism is provided in the legal instruments mentioned by the Court.[368] Rather, Article 94 of the UN Charter addresses the consequences of a failure to follow an ICJ opinion, namely that state's referral to the Security Council.[369] The Supreme Court pointed to the language of the ICJ Statue and the Protocol stating that "…Article [I] is not a directive to domestic courts. It does not provide that the United States, 'shall' or 'must' comply with an ICJ decision, nor indicate to vest ICJ decisions with immediate legal effect in domestic courts."[370]

5.4. Treaty Interpretation[371]

In the constitutional scheme of separation of powers and the respective powers granted each branch of government, the judiciary does not have the power to terminate treaties,[372] nor that of preventing the executive branch from terminating a treaty,[373] or of ordering the executive branch to extradite a person pursuant to treaty.[374] Treaties are the "Supreme Law of the Land,"[375] and the judiciary has the authority to interpret a treaty duly ratified after the Senate's advice and consent whenever the treaty is relevant to the resolution of a dispute over which the court has jurisdiction.[376] Thus, "[t]he interpretation of treaties is essentially a judicial process," and a related principle is that " '[T]he judiciary serves an independent review function delegated to it by the Executive and defined by statute.' "[377]

---

367 Medellin, 552 U.S. at 507.

368 Id.

369 Id. at 507–508.

370 Id. at 508.

371 See generally Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, opened for signature, May 23, 1969, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.39/27 (1969), reprinted in 8 I.L.M. 679 (1969) and in 63 Am. J. Int'l. L. 875 (1969) [hereinafter Vienna Convention] (although the United States is not a party to the Vienna Convention, it has incorporated most of its provisions into the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1987), see Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at on Foreign Relations); T.O. Ellis, The Modern Law of Treaties (1974); Louis Henkin, Treaty Interpretation (1972); Farhad Malekian, The System of International Law (1987).

372 See Henkin, supra note 142, at 170.

373 See Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913); The Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. 581, 602–603 (1889). See also In re Extradition of Rafael Eduardo Pineda Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F. Supp. 2d 945 (S.D. Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

374 See Sabatier v. Dambrowski, 586 F.2d 866 (1st Cir. 1978); Peroff v. Hylton, 563 F.2d 1099 (4th Cir. 1977); Shapiro v. Secretary of State, 499 F.2d 527, 530–531 (D.C. Cir. 1974), aff'd on other grounds sub nom., Comm'r of Internal Revenue v. Shapiro, 424 U.S. 614 (1976).

375 U.S. Const. art. VI, § 1, cl. 2.

376 29 Am. J. Int'l L. Supp. 946, 973 (1935). See Condition of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations, [1947–1948] I.C.J. Reports 57, 61. See also United States v. Decker, 600 F.2d 733, 737 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 855 (1979) (stating that it is the responsibility of the court to interpret treaties).

377 In re Extradition of Tawakkal, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 65059 at *11 (E.D. Va. 2008).

The rules of treaty interpretation can be summarized as follows:

1. The purpose of treaty interpretation is to ascertain the plain meaning[378] of the language that comports with the parties' intentions.[379]
2. Sources of evidence which indicate this are:
   a. Negotiating history;[380]

---

378 See Sumitomo Shoji Am., Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176 (1981); Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936); Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933); Hu Yau-Lueng v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir. 1981); In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980); Greci v. Birknes, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976); United States ex rel. Bloomfield v. Gengler, 507 F.2d 925 (2d Cir. 1974); United States v. Vreeken, 603 F. Supp. 715 (Utah 1984); Hurtado v. Holder, 401 Fed. Appx. 453, 455 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion).

Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 329. General Rule of Interpretation:

> (1) An international agreement shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the agreement in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.
>
> (2) The context for the purpose of the interpretation of an agreement shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes
>
> (a) any agreement relating to the international agreement which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the agreement;
>
> (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connection with the conclusion of the agreement and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the agreement;
>
> (3) There shall be taken into account, together with the context
>
> (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the agreement or the application of its provisions
>
> (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the agreement which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation;
>
> (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties
>
> (4) A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended.

Section 329 is based on Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, supra note 372. The Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States embodies most provisions that are contained in the Vienna Convention, of which the United States is not a party. See Restatement (Third), supra note 79.

379 See Sumitomo Shoji Am., 457 U.S. 176; Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936); Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593 (1927); In re Gambino, 421 F. Supp. 2d 283 (D. Mass. 2006); United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1984); Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); United States v. Kember, 685 F.2d 451 (D.C. Cir. 1982); Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980); Reed v. Wiser, 555 F.2d 1079 (2d Cir. 1977); Day v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 528 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1975); Denby v. Seaboard World Airlines, Inc., 575 F. Supp. 1134 (E.D.N.Y. 1983), rev'd 737 F.2d 172 (2d Cir. 1984); Maschinenfabrik Kern, A.G. v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 562 F. Supp. 232 (N.D. Ill. 1983).

380 See Factor, 290 U.S. 276; Greci v. Birkens, 527 F.2d 956 (1st Cir. 1976); Day, 528 F.2d 31 (2nd Cir. 1975). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999). The Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States similarly allows for consideration of supplemental materials. Section 330 states: Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the international agreement and the circumstances of its conclusions, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of section 329 or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to section 329: (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or (b) leads to a result

b. Interpretation of the parties;[381] and

c. Subsequent conduct of the parties.[382]

3. These sources are then construed according to the following criteria:

a. Consistent interpretation of the terms;[383]

b. Liberal construction of terms;[384]

c. Rule of liberality;[385]

d. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius;[386]

e. Ejusdem generis;[387]

f. Retroactive application;[388] and

g. International law principles regarding treaty interpretation.[389]

5.4.1. Plain Meaning of the Words and Parties' Intentions

Generally, the provisions of the treaty itself are the starting point of its construction.[390] The language in these provisions should be construed according to its plain, ordinary meaning which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable. See Restatement (Third), supra note 79. Section 330 is based upon Article 32 of the Vienna Convention, supra note 372. Sindona v. Grant, 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978)

---

381 See Sumitomo Shoji Am., 457 U.S. 176; Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187 (1961); Factor, 290 U.S. 276; Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985); Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679 (9th Cir. 1983), superseded by statute; Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954).

382 See Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243 (1984); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902); Day, 528 F.2d 31; Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir. 1957); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954); In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1959).

383 See Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980). See also Sabatier v. Dambrowski, 453 F. Supp. 1250 (D.C.R.I.), aff'd, 586 F. 2d 866 (1st Cir. 1978).

384 See Factor, 290 U.S. 276; Jordan v. Tashiro, 278 U.S. 123 (1928); Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549; Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980); Vardy v. United States, 529 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1976); United States ex rel. Sakaguchi v. Kaulukukui, 520 F.2d 726 (9th Cir. 1975); In re Sindona, 584 F. Supp. 1437 (E.D.N.Y. 1984); Maschinenfabrik Kern, A.G. v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 562 F. Supp. 232 (N.D. Ill. 1983); Hurtado v. Holder, 401 Fed. Appx. 453, 455 (11th Cir. 2010) (unpublished opinion); In re Extradition of Sainez, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 9573 at *28 (S.D. Cal. 2008).

385 See Melia v. United States, 667 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1981). See also United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997); Handel v. Artukovic, 601 F. Supp. 1421 (C.D. Cal. 1985).

386 See Hu Yau-Lueng v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir. 1981); Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1977); In re Chan Kam-shu, 477 F.2d 333 (5th Cir. 1973).

387 See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

388 See Galanis v. Pallanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2nd Cir. 1977).

389 See United States v. Cadena, 585 F.2d 1252 (5th Cir. 1978), overruled in part by United States v. Michelena-Orovio, 719 F.2d 738 (5th Cir 1983); Day v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 528 F.2d 31 (2nd Cir. 1975); Husserl v. Swiss Air Transport Co., 351 F. Supp. 702 (S.D.N.Y. 1972).

390 See Vienna Convention, supra note 372, at art. 31, para. 1.

"as understood in the public law of nations."[391] The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties states that "[a] treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose."[392] The ICJ expressed this rule of construction in the following terms:

> The Court considers it necessary to say that the first duty of a tribunal which is called upon to interpret and apply the provisions of a treaty, is to endeavor to give effect to them in their natural and ordinary meaning in the context of which they occur. If the relevant words in their natural and ordinary meaning make sense in their context, that is the end of the matter.[393]

The seminal case of Wright v. Henkel[394] is exemplary of this practice. Pursuant to its extradition treaty with the United States, the United Kingdom requested the extradition of Whitaker Wright on the basis of an arrest warrant charging him with circulating and publishing false corporate statements with the intent to defraud corporate shareholders. Wright objected to the extradition request on the grounds that the offense was not criminal under U.S. law. The U.S. Supreme Court began its analysis with the observation that "[t]reaties must receive a fair interpretation, according to the intention of contracting parties, and so as to carry out their manifest purpose."[395] After comparing the relevant statutes of both England and Wales, and New York, the U.S. state in which Wright had been found, the Court looked to the kind of conduct the parties sought to prohibit under their respective criminal codes.

> We think it cannot be reasonably open to question that the offense under the British statute is also a crime under the third paragraph of section 611 of the Penal Code of New York, brought forward from section 603 of the Code of 1882. Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee or director, or member or officer of any company, is made the basis of surrender by the treaty. The British statute punishes the making, circulating or publishing with intent to deceive or defraud, of false statements or accounts of a body corporate or public company, known to be false, by a director, manager or public officer thereof. The New York statute provides that if an officer or director of a corporation knowingly concurs in making or publishing any written report, exhibit or statement of its affairs or pecuniary condition, containing any material statement which is false, he is guilty of a misdemeanor. The two statutes are substantially analogous. The making of such a false statement knowingly, under the New York act, carries with it the inference of fraudulent intent, but even if this were not so, criminality under the British act would certainly be such under that of New York. Absolute identity is not required. The essential character of the transaction is the same, and made criminal by both statutes.[396]

The court therefore denied Wright's writ of habeas corpus.[397]

5.4.2. Sources: Negotiating History, Executive View, and Subsequent Conduct

Because the parties' intentions are clear only if the particular treaty's context and history are considered, courts often look to the circumstances surrounding its culmination.[398] negotiations, preparatory works, and diplomatic correspondence, which are an integral part of these surrounding 391 Santovincenzo v. Egan, 284 U.S. 30, 40 (1931).

392 Vienna Convention, supra note 372, at art. 31, para. 1.

393 Advisory Opinion, Competence of the General Assembly for Admission of a State to the United Nations, [1950] I.C.J. 4, 8.

394 See Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40 (1903). See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

395 Wright, 190 U.S. at 57.

396 Id. at 58.

397 Id.

398 In re Ross, 44 F. 185 (C.C.N.D.N.Y. 1890).

circumstances, and often are relied on by courts in ascertaining the intentions of the parties in interpreting the relevant provisions of the treaty.[399] In addition, the parties' own interpretations of the treaty, such as that of the executive branch, may be used as a guide in construction.[400] The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties provides that:

> [t]he context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes:
>
> (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty;
>
> (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.
>
> There shall be taken into account, together with the context:
>
> (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions;
>
> (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation;
>
> …
>
> Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of [the above rules], or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to [the above rules]:
>
> (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or
>
> (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable.[401]

The negotiating history of a treaty reflects the parties' intentions and their expectations. It is relevant, indeed important, to clarify ambiguities and inconsistencies where these may appear in the language of the treaty. As the very words "negotiating history" imply, the term refers to the period of the negotiations and events surrounding the negotiations (including, at times, the signature and ratification process). The negotiating history is evidenced by formal exchanges of notes or memoranda between the parties, memoranda in the files of the respective parties, explanatory records, and clarifying position papers. All of these constitute a written record of the negotiating history.

In Sullivan v. Kidd,[402] the U.S. Supreme Court stated:

> Writers of authority agree that treaties are to be interpreted upon the principles which govern the interpretation of contracts in writing between individuals, and are to be executed in the utmost good faith, with a view to making effective the purpose of the high contracting parties; that all parts of a treaty are to receive a reasonable construction with a view to giving a fair operation to the whole. Moore, International Law Digest, vol. 5, p. 249. At the time of the negotiation of the treaty Great Britain had numerous colonies and possessions, and the U.S. had recently acquired certain islands beyond the seas. Concerning these the contracting parties made the stipulations contained in Article IV, adding the right to give like notice in behalf of any British protectorate, or sphere of influence, or on behalf of the island of Cyprus…[403]

---

399 See, e.g., Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546 (1963), amended 383 U.S. 268 (1966), amended 466 U.S. 144 (1984), subsequent determination 530 U.S. 392 (2000), supplemented by 531 U.S. 1 (2000).

400 See Zschernig v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429 (1968); Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187 (1961); Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933).

401 Vienna Convention, supra note 372, at arts. 31, 32.

402 Sullivan v. Kidd, 254 U.S. 433 (1921).

403 Id. at 439 (emphasis added).

In Sullivan the issue with respect to treaty interpretation was whether a Canadian citizen could inherit property in the United States under a provision in a treaty. The treaty required a notice of adherence to be given. The notice of adherence for the Dominion of Canada was not given. It was the position of the U.S. government that a treaty had to be interpreted on the basis of the express language of the treaty, and if the express language of the treaty provided for notice, the absence of notice was conclusive. It was held sufficient not to allow a Canadian resident to inherit in the United States. The subsequent expectation and intent of the parties are irrelevant particularly in the face of the plain language and meaning of the treaty.

An example of the use of these factors in interpreting extradition treaty provisions is Factor v. Laubenheimer.[404] Factor had been apprehended and held in Illinois in response to an extradition request from the United Kingdom. He challenged the sufficiency of the extradition request on the grounds that the offense for which he was sought in England was not criminal under Illinois law. The issue was therefore whether the provisions of the extradition treaty required finding that the offense was criminal under Illinois law specifically, or whether the treaty required the offense to be criminal in any state in the United States. The Supreme Court conceded that the relevant treaty provision was unclear, and determined that additional information was required to clarify its meaning:

> In ascertaining the meaning of a treaty we may look beyond its written words to the negotiations and diplomatic correspondence of the contracting parties relating to the subject matter, and to their own practical construction of it. And in resolving doubts the construction of a treaty by the political departments of the government, while not conclusive upon courts called to construe it, is nevertheless of weight . . . From . . . ensuing diplomatic correspondence it clearly appears that this government then asserted that the Treaty of 1842 obligated both parties to surrender fugitives duly charged with any of the offenses specified in Article X without regard to the criminal quality of the fugitive's acts under the law of the place of asylum. This contention was supported by full and cogent argument in the course of which it was specifically pointed out that the proviso of Article X relates to the procedure to be followed in asserting rights under the treaty and is not a limitation upon the definition of the offenses with respect to which extradition might be demanded . . . The diplomatic history of the treaty provisions thus lends support to the construction which we think should be placed upon them when read without extraneous aid, but with that liberality demanded generally in the interpretation of international obligations.[405]

Thus, the Court determined that the requirements of the treaty had been satisfied and ordered Factor's delivery to the United Kingdom.

In Plaster v. United States,[406] the Fourth Circuit interpreted the extradition treaty between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany[407] to require that the United States be obligated to extradite its nationals, while Germany was not similarly bound.[408] The court relied upon "the various documents accompanying the treaty during its formation and ratification."[409] The court held that although there is no symmetry in the reciprocal undertakings of the two states because Germany has a constitutional provision prohibiting the extradition of its nationals and the United States does not, there are other provisions in the respective laws of the two countries that are not symmetrically identical but act to balance the respective obligations

---

404 Factor, 290 U.S. 276. See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

405 Factor, 290 U.S. at 294–298 (citation omitted).

406 Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340 (4th Cir. 1983).

407 Treaty Between the U.S. and the Federal Republic of Germany Concerning Extradition, Aug. 8, 1980, 32 U.S.T. 1485, T.I.A.S. No. 9785.

408 Plaster, 720 F.2d at 347.

409 Id.

of the parties. In particular, under German law, a national may be prosecuted for a crime committed in the territory of another state. A similar law did not exist in the United States. Thus there is a complementary balance between the obligations of the two states. The United States would extradite its nationals to Germany because it could not prosecute a U.S. national for committing a crime in Germany, while Germany, which could not extradite its nationals to the United States, could prosecute its nationals in Germany for a crime committed in the United States.[410]

The case of Ivancevic v. Artukovic[411] is illustrative of the great weight courts have given to the practice and conduct of the parties to the relevant treaty in order to determine whether an obligation to extradite was created by the agreement.[412] In Ivancevic, the government of the People's Federal Republic of Yugoslavia requested the extradition of Andrija Artukovic from the United States for the crime of murder, under the Treaty of Extradition of 1902 between the United States and the Kingdom of Serbia. The federal district court held that no extradition treaty existed between the United States and Yugoslavia. The Ninth Circuit reversed on the ground that the Treaty of 1902 was still in force. It reasoned that the People's Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had evolved as a nation from the Kingdom of Serbia through internal political changes and was, therefore, not a new country but merely one formed as a result of the desire of the Slav people for self-determination. The court decided that these internal changes did not affect the validity of the treaty with the Kingdom of Serbia, which provided the core of the Yugoslav nation, a party to the pending extradition proceedings. Furthermore, the court noted that both the United States and Yugoslavia had continued to act under the premise that "the entity as it existed after the union was the political successor of the original Serbia with international political compacts continuing."[413]

Subsequent practices of the parties must be immediate and directly related to the terms of the treaty. There is therefore an element of timeliness and clarifying relevance that is indispensable. Subsequent practice must be reasonably related in time to the date of entry into force of the treaty. It must clarify in a relevant way the intentions of the parties and their expectations as they existed at the time of the treaty's entry into force. Subsequent practices cannot contravene the express language of the treaty, lest the subsequent practices of states become an informal amending process of their treaties. Such a result would be unconstitutional in the United States, as it would violate the Senate's ratification power. It would also violate "due process" and "equal protection" of the law if, by virtue of such changes in the application of treaty provisions to individuals, they would be detrimentally affected by such changes without prior notice.[414] Subsequent practice cannot, therefore, add or include new meaning contrary to the express language of the treaty or its plain meaning.

The judiciary, relying on the president's "[p]ower, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties,"[415] looks to executive practice to determine the existence and

---

410 See Ch. VI.

411 Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1954), later proceeding at Artukovic v. Boyle, 140 F. Supp. 245 (D. Cal. 1956), aff'd Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1957), vacated, 355 U.S. 393 (1958), on remand, 170 F. Supp. 383 (D. Cal. 1959), habeas proceeding, 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal. 1986), stay denied, Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986), overruled by Lopez-Smith v. Hood, 121 F.3d 1322 (9th Cir. 1997).

412 See Rogge, supra note 181, at 381.

413 Ivancevic, 211 F.2d at 572. In 1985, Artukovic was extradited to Yugoslavia on the basis of the Treaty Between the United States and the Kingdom of Serbia, which was held to be applicable under the doctrine of state succession. Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986).

414 See Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983).

415 U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. In 1936, the U.S. Supreme Court stated: "Not only . . . is the federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm . . . the President applicability of treaty obligations. Adherence to this view was illustrated in Charlton v. Kelly.[416] In this case, the question before the Supreme Court was whether Italy's refusal to permit the extradition of its own citizens abrogated the extradition treaty between the Kingdom of Italy and the United States. The treaty provided for the surrender of "persons" convicted of or charged with specific crimes. Italy maintained that this term did not include its own citizens and that it would try its own citizens in its own courts. The United States contended that the term "person" did include Italian citizens.[417] The Court, following the interpretation of the Department of State, held that the treaty was not abrogated:

> The executive department having thus elected to waive any right to free itself from the obligation to deliver up its own citizens, it is the plain duty of this court to recognize the obligation to surrender the appellant as one imposed by the treaty as the supreme law of the land and as affording authority for the warrant of extradition.[418]

Thus, the judicial position of the United States is to defer judgment on this issue to the executive as a matter falling within the prerogatives of that branch of government in its exercise of the powers to conduct foreign affairs.[419]

Last, it should be noted that the interpretation of treaty language should also take into account the meaning of a legal term in the respective laws of the two contracting states.[420]

5.4.3. Interpretative Criteria

(1) Consistent Interpretation of Terms

Once the court has determined the relevant sources of a treaty's meaning, it must choose which interpretation will be applied to the case at bar. Usually, the court will first attempt to interpret the relevant provision such that it is consistent with the other terms of the treaty.[421] Oppenheim has stated this rule in the following terms:

> It is taken for granted that the contracting parties intend something reasonable and something not inconsistent with generally recognized principles of International Law, nor with previous alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates." United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936).

---

416 Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447 (1913). See also In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1777 (S.D.N.Y. 1998), In re Extradition of Powell, 4 F.Supp. 2d 945 (S.D.Cal. 1998); Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

417 Charlton, 229 U.S. at 451–455.

418 Id. at 476. Also in Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270 (1902), the Supreme Court rejected the fugitive's contention that the creation of the German Empire in 1871 terminated the extradition treaty between the United States and the Kingdom of Prussia, holding that intervention by the courts on the theory that the treaty had been abrogated by the formation of the German Empire was improper, in light of the contrary judgment of both governments. The Court further stated that "the decisions of the Executive Department in matters of extradition, within its own sphere, and in accordance with the Constitution, are not open to judicial revision." Id. at 290.

419 See Curtiss-Wright, 299 U.S. at 304 (1936); Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920). See also Louis Henkin, The Treaty Makers and the Law Makers: The Law of the Land and Foreign Relations, 107 U. Pa. L. Rev. 903 (1959). See generally Edward S. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers (4th ed. 1957); C. Herman Pritchett, The American Constitution (1959). For a parallel analysis of presidential powers in the conduct of foreign affairs, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, The War Power and the Law of War: Theory and Realism, 18 DePaul L. Rev. 188 (1968); M. Cherif Bassiouni & Eliot A. Landau, Presidential Discretion in Foreign Trade and Its Effects on East–West Trade, 14 Wayne L. Rev. 494 (1968).

420 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

421 See, e.g., Sabatier v. Dambrowski, 453 F. Supp. 1250 (D.C.R.I.), aff'd, 586 F.2d 866 (1st Cir. 1978).

> treaty obligations towards third States. If, therefore, the meaning of a treaty is ambiguous, the reasonable meaning is to be preferred to the unreasonable, the more reasonable to the less reasonable, the consistent meaning to the meaning inconsistent with generally recognized principles of International Law and with previous treaty obligations toward third States.[422]

The Second Circuit applied this maxim in Caltagirone v. Grant.[423] There, Italy requested that the United States provisionally arrest an individual pursuant to Article XIII of the 1975 Extradition Treaty between Italy and the United States, pending a possible request for his extradition to Italy to face prosecution for fraudulent bankruptcy. In compliance with the Italian request, the United States prepared a complaint alleging the existence of Italian warrants for the individual's arrest and applied to the appropriate magistrate for a warrant. The United States made no showing to establish probable cause to believe that a crime had been committed in Italy, or that the individual requested had committed it. Nevertheless, the magistrate issued a warrant for the individual's arrest. The relator moved to quash the arrest warrant on the ground that it was issued without probable cause. This motion was denied. The relator then petitioned the appropriate federal district court for a writ of habeas corpus. When this was denied, the relator appealed to the Second Circuit. The appellate court granted the relator's petition, applying the following analysis:

> Article XIII of the Treaty provides that an application for provisional arrest must contain four elements: a description of the person sought; an indication of intent formally to request the extradition of the person; an allegation that a warrant for the person's arrest has been issued by the requesting state; and, finally, "such further information, if any, as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party."
>
> The language of Article XIII closely tracks the text of Article XI, the Treaty article governing formal requests for extradition. That article expressly requires all requests for extradition to provide "such evidence as . . . would justify [the relator's] arrest and committal for trial if the offense had been committed [in the territory of the requested party] . . . " Article XIII, in turn, requires applications for provisional arrest to set forth "such further information as would be necessary to justify the issue of a warrant of arrest had the offense been committed . . . in the territory of the requested Party." Clearly, the parallelism was intended by the Treaty's draftsmen, and this suggests that in all cases where the U.S. is the "requested Party," a showing of probable cause is required under both articles.[424]

The problem of inconsistency of terms in the two languages of a treaty arises in connection with words referring to whether a person was "charged" with a crime as including the meaning of accused as opposed to a technical meaning of formally charged (i.e., indicted).[425] It also 422 1 Lhassa Oppenheim, International Law 952–953 (Hersch Lauterpacht ed., 1955) (citations omitted) [hereinafter, 1 Oppenheim].

---

423 Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980); Looking at travaux preparatoires for intent of the parties, El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tseng, 525 U.S. 155, 119 S. Ct. 662 (1999) and Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392, 105 S. Ct. 1338 (1985). "The meaning of a treaty cannot be controlled by subsequent explanations" of members of the Senate, Fourteen Diamond Rings v. United States, 183 U.S. 176, 22 S. Ct. 59 (1901), but the interpretation of a treaty by the executive branch is to be given weight by the judiciary. See United States v. King-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997); Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 54 S. Ct. 191 (1933), Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 33 S. Ct. 945 (1913) 60 (1901) ("The meaning of the treaty cannot be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it.").

424 Caltagirone, 629 F.2d at 744–745.

425 See In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980).

arises with respect to ne bis in idem when one treaty language refers to the "same facts" and the other to the "same acts."[426]

(2) Liberal Interpretation of Terms

Where a provision is capable of two interpretations, either of which would comport with the other terms of the treaty, the judiciary will choose the construction which is more liberal and which would permit the relator's extradition, because the purpose of the treaty is to facilitate extradition between the parties to the treaty. The Permanent Court of Justice stated the general rule in the following manner:

> [I] do not see how it is possible to say that an article of a convention is clear until the subject and aim of the convention have been ascertained, for the article only assumes its true import in this convention and in relation thereto. Only when it is known what the Contracting Parties intended to do and the aim they had in view is it possible to say either that the natural meaning of terms used in a particular article corresponds with the real intention of the Parties, or that the natural meaning of the terms used falls short of or goes further than such intention.. .
>
> [S]ince the words have no value save as an expression of intention of the Parties, it will be found either that the words have been used in a wider sense than normally attaches to them (broad interpretation) or that they have been used in a narrower sense than normally attaches to them (narrow interpretation).
>
> The first question which arises therefore is what is the subject and aim of the convention in which occurs the article to be interpreted.[427]

The rule of liberal interpretation of terms was applied to an extradition treaty in Brauch v. Raiche.[428] In that case, the relator challenged the request for his extradition on the grounds that the applicable treaty required a finding that the conduct for which his extradition was sought was criminalized under the laws of the state where he was found, rather than under the laws of the United States. In rejecting his claim, the court made the following observation regarding Factor v. Laubenheimer, discussed above:

> Although it is clear that Factor held criminality in the asylum state was not a necessary precondition to extraditability, it is not clear whether the Court also meant that a finding of criminality under that state's law was always sufficient to justify extradition. Part of the rationale offered by the Court for its decision in Factor was a desire to avoid construing that treaty so that "the right to extradition from the U.S. may vary with the state or territory where the fugitive is found." Id. at 300, 54 S. Ct. at 198.... In light of the importance the Court placed on preserving reciprocity, we do not believe the Court's disapproval of extraditability varying with state law would extend to the situation in which one state's law might confer extraditability, while that of the preponderance of the states would not. A prerequisite under the Treaty for an extradition request by Great Britain is that the offense be one for which Britain would be willing to extradite. Thus, even if the asylum state from which Britain requests extradition is the only state criminalizing the conduct in question, the policy of reciprocity would be served since that state could presumably obtain extradition for the same acts in Britain.[429]

---

426 See infra Sec. 5.4. In re Gambino, 2006 WL 709445 (D. Mass. 2006), dismissed in Gambino v. Winn, Case No. 06-10552-RCL (D. Mass 2006); Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), aff'g 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

427 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 370.

428 Brauch v. Raiche, 618 F.2d 843 (1st Cir. 1980). See also United States v. Wiebe, 733 F.2d 549, 554 (8th Cir. 1984); In re Sindona, 584 F. Supp. 1437, 1447 (E.D.N.Y. 1984).

429 Brauch, 618 F.2d at 848–849. See also Elcock v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 70 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999).

Thus, the court adhered to the language of the text, but gave the wording the widest reasonable meaning and scope.

(3) Rule of Liberality

It is important to note that liberality cannot be stretched to allow extradition notwithstanding specific treaty and statutory requirements. Liberality is a rule of interpretation that has to remain within reasonable bounds, and is not a license to extradite. At times the judiciary will interpret terms beyond their actual meaning to encompass their spirit and intent. Judge Hersch Lauterpacht, for example, has noted that:

> the whole of a treaty must be taken into consideration, if the meaning of any one of its provisions is doubtful; and not only the wording of the treaty, but also its purpose, the motives which led to its conclusion and the conditions prevailing at the time.[430]

This rule was applied in Melia v. United States.[431] Canada requested the extradition of an individual charged with "procuring a murder." The United States' extradition treaty with Canada specified as extraditable offenses those that charged an individual with conspiracy or "being party to any"[432] of the enumerated offenses. The court found that the word "procuring," although not specifically listed as an extraditable offense, could be deemed within the meaning of "being a party to." A narrow construction would not have allowed the word "procuring" to be equated with "being a party to," whereas liberality permits such a construction by analogy.

Treaties must be interpreted in a liberal way and in good faith in order to give effect to the intentions of the parties.[433] The Supreme Court stated so in Jordan v. Tashiro[434]

> The principles which should control the diplomatic relations of nations, and the good faith of treaties as well, require that their obligation should be liberally construed so as to effect the apparent intentions of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. See Geofroy v. Riggs, supra; Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U.S. 424, 437; Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 57; In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453, 475.[435]

The issue of liberality versus restrictive interpretation arises when terms in question are ambiguous enough to create a doubt in the mind of the treaty interpreter.

The interpretation of the treaty in Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano[436] was the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation between the United States and Japan. The purposes

---

430 1 Oppenheim, supra note 423 at 953. Treaty construction implicates questions of foreign policy. See United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103, 110 (1st Cir. 1997). The executive branch's construction of a treaty, although not binding on the courts, is entitled to great weight. See Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276, 295, 54 S. Ct. 191, 196 (1933); Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 468, 33 S. Ct. 945, 952 (1913); Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 326(2) and reporters' note 2.]

431 Melia v. United States, 667 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1981). See also United States v. Medina, 985 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997).

432 Treaty on Extradition with Canada as amended by exchange of notes of June 28 and July 9, 1974, 27 U.S.T. 983, T.I.A.S. No. 8345, art 2, sec. 2 (entered into force Mar. 22, 1976).

433 See generally In re Extradition of Lara, 1998 U.S. Dist. Lexis 1777 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).

434 Jordan v. Tashiro, 278 U.S. 123 (1928).

435 Id. at 127. See also Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

436 Sumitomo Shoji Am. Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176 (1982). Treaties should be liberally construed to effect their purpose, namely, "the surrender of fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses." Ludecke v. U.S. Marshal, 15 F.3d 496, 498 (5th Cir. 1994) (quoting Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098, 1104 (5th Cir. 1980)) (quoting Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 10, 57 S. Ct. 100, 103 (1936)); accord United States v. Cancino-Perez, 151 F.R.D. 521, 523 (E.D.N.Y. 1993). See of such treaties are particularly relevant to the meaning of the language of the treaties because they confer benefits, especially corporate and tax benefits, to those who fall within their purview. It is completely different from the context of extradition treaties. Extradition treaties detrimentally affect the rights of individuals, whereas treaties of commerce, friendship, and navigation beneficially affect the rights of individuals. Thus, to err in favor of liberality in the cases of treaties of commerce, friendship, and navigation is to err in favor of granting more benefits to individuals, whereas to err in the liberality of interpreting extradition treaties is in fact to place individuals in greater jeopardy of their lives and liberties.

It must also be reemphasized that to allow extradition treaties to be reinterpreted in light of subsequent developments and expectations of the parties creates an unequal application of the law with respect to any and all individuals who would fall within the purview of that treaty at the different times when such interpretation may change without notice to the persons to whom it is intended. This would constitute a denial of due process of law in that individuals would not receive the appropriate notice that is necessary to know which conduct is deemed violative of the law in terms of whether that conduct is extraditable or not.[437]

(4) Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius

In contrast to the rule of liberality, courts have also relied upon the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius; namely, that which is specifically stated excludes anything else by implication. As Professors Myres McDougal, Harold Lasswell, and James Miller observed:

> [t]his principle . . . prescribes that whenever a given reference has been expressly included in an agreement, all other related references must be regarded as having been excluded . . . The rule of expresso unius may be stated in implicative form as follows: If any given individual or class expression (X) occurs in an agreement, then it must be inferred that any other similar individual or class expression (Y), (Z), etc., was intentionally excluded from the operation of the agreement by the parties.[438]

This method of interpretation can be employed with respect to the terms of a given treaty or between treaties when a certain provision is absent in one treaty but is present in other treaties regarding extradition. In these instances, the judiciary must resolve the ambiguity of the treaty's silence and determine whether the particular provision of other treaties may be read into the terms of the treaty that is silent on the question. In Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia,[439] for example, the applicable treaty required that an extradition request be based upon a charge that the relator was to be prosecuted for the commission of a crime classified as a felony under U.S. law. The relator challenged the request for his extradition on the grounds that because he was sixteen at the time he allegedly committed the crime, the crime for which he was being sought would not be considered a felony under U.S. law. The applicable treaty had no provision stating that the prosecution of juveniles could not result in a felony conviction, although other extradition treaties contain such provisions. The court reasoned that its absence in the treaty in question required a determination that the relator's age at the time the crime was allegedly committed also Factor, 290 U.S. at 293–294, 54 S. Ct. at 196 ("(I)f a treaty fairly admits of two constructions, one restricting the rights that may be claimed under it, and the other enlarging it, the more liberal construction is to be preferred."). "The obligation to do what some nations have done voluntarily, in the interest of justice and friendly international relationships . . . should be construed more liberally than a criminal statute or the technical requirements of criminal procedure." Factor, 290 U.S. at 298–299, 54 S. Ct. at 197 (citations omitted).

---

437 See, e.g., Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357 (1983).

438 Myres S. McDougal et al., The Interpretation of Agreements and World Public Order 330–331 (1967).

439 Hu Yau-Leung v. Soscia, 649 F.2d 914 (2d Cir. 1981).

was not relevant, and did not bar his extradition to the requesting state. Thus, the court refused to read such a provision into the treaty in question.

In Kamrin v. United States,[440] the Ninth Circuit similarly interpreted the silence of the Treaty of Extradition between the United States and Australia[441] regarding the applicability of the relevant U.S. statute of limitations as rendering that statute unavailable to the relator as a bar to his extradition.[442] The court stated:

> Generally, absent a specific treaty provision, the statute of limitation may be raised as a defense to criminal proceedings only after return to the requesting state . . . Given the general rule, the absence of a contrary provision should be interpreted as an intention by the party states that the statute of limitation of the requested state does not apply.[443]

(5) Ejusdem Generis

The rule ejusdem generis has also been referred to as the rule of generalia specialibus non derogant. Its most familiar restatement is by McNair, who characterized it as "a useful doctrine or presumption, well recognized and frequently applied in English, Scottish, and American law, to the effect that general words when following (and sometimes when preceding) special words are limited to the genus if any, indicated by the special words."[444] The Permanent Court of International Justice has stated that the ejusdem maxim requires that "special words, according to elementary principles of interpretation, control the general expressions."[445]

The ejusdem rule was applied by the Supreme Court in Factor v. Laubenheimer.[446] In Factor, the United Kingdom requested the relator's extradition in order to prosecute him for the charge of receiving sums of money, "knowing the same to have been fraudulently obtained." The relator challenged the extradition order on the grounds that this offense was not listed as an extraditable offense in the treaty between the United Kingdom and the United States. The Supreme Court rejected his claim:

> Paragraph 18 of Article 3 of the Dawes-Simon Treaty includes among the offenses for which extradition may be demanded "receiving any money, valuable security or other property, knowing the same to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained." It is insisted that "receiving money," knowing the same to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained, is not the equivalent of receiving money, knowing the same to have been fraudulently obtained. It is not denied that the phrase "unlawfully obtained," standing alone, is as broad as the phrase "fraudulently obtained." But it is asserted that its use in association with the word "stolen" restricts its meaning to offenses of the same type of unlawfulness as stealing, which it is said involves only those forms of criminal taking which are without the consent or against the will of the owner or the possessor. But we think the words of the treaty present no opportunity for so narrow and strict an application of the rule of ejusdem generis. The rule is at most one of construction, to be resorted to as an aid only when words or phrases are of doubtful meaning. Extradition treaties are to be liberally, not strictly construed. The words "steal" and "stolen" have no certain technical significance making them applicable only with respect to common law larceny. They are not uncommonly used as implying also a taking or receiving of property by embezzlement or false pretenses, offenses which are often embraced in modern forms of statutory larceny. Whatever was left vague or uncertain by 440 Kamrin v. United States, 725 F.2d 1225 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 817 (1984). See also Murphy v. United States, 199 F.3d 599 (2nd Cir. 1999).

---

441 Treaty of Extradition between the United States and Australia, 27 U.S.T. 957, T.I.A.S. No. 8234 (1974).

442 Kamrin, 725 F.2d at 1227.

443 Id.

444 Arnold D. McNair, The Law of Treaties 393 (1961).

445 The Payment of Various Serbian Loans Issued in France, 1929 P.C.I.J. (Ser. A) No. 20.

446 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933).

> the use of the word "stolen" was made certain by the added phrase "or unlawfully obtained," as indicating any form of criminal taking whether or not embraced within the term larceny in its various connotations. Even if the word "stolen" were to be given the restricted meaning for which the petitioner contends, it would be so precise and comprehensive as to exhaust the genus and leave nothing essentially similar on which the general phrase "or unlawfully obtained" could operate. This phrase, like all the other words of the treaty, is to be given a meaning, if reasonably possible, and rules of construction may not be resorted to render it meaningless or inoperative. See Mason v. U.S., 260 U.S. 545, 553.[447]

(6) Retroactive Application

As a general rule treaties are not retroactive. This is reflected in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties Article 28, which states that the provisions of a treaty "do not bind a party in relation to any act or fact which took place or any situation which ceased to exist before the date of the entry into force of the treaty with respect to that party." Thus a treaty cannot have retroactive effect unless the parties specifically agree to retroactive application. An extradition treaty can therefore be made retroactive if it contains a specific provision to that effect. Such retroactivity would not, in the United States, be deemed a violation of the Constitution's prohibition of ex post facto because extradition is not deemed a criminal trial, nor does it inflict any penalty on the requested person.[448]

Aside from the issue of the entire treaty's retroactivity, a subsequent treaty or an amending treaty can have retroactive application of some of its provisions even without a specific provision allowing retroactivity.[449] In Extradition of Ernst, the court, in reliance on McMullen, held thusly:

> In re Extradition of McMullen, 769 F. Supp. 1278 (S.D.N.Y.1991), aff'd sub nom., McMullen v. U.S., 953 F.2d 761 (2d Cir. 1992), aff'd in part, rev'd, in part on other grounds, 989 F.2d 603 (2d Cir.1993), involved closely analogous facts. In that case, the United Kingdom sought McMullen's extradition as a result of his alleged involvement in the bombing of an army barracks. The U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California denied the request, find that the offense charged was political in nature and, therefore, not extraditable. 769 F. Supp. at 1982.
>
> Subsequent to the decision of the California Court, the extradition treaty between the U.S. and the United Kingdom was amended to narrow the scope of the political offense exception. 769 F.Supp. at 1282-83. The United Kingdom then sought McMullen's extradition under the amended treaty. McMullen contested the extradition request, arguing, among other things, that prior to the amended treaty he had a complete defense to extradition and that application of the amended treaty to him would violate the prohibition against ex post facto laws.
>
> Judge Ward rejected McMullen's argument, explaining:
>
> > McMullen argues that the retroactive change in the law inflicts punishment upon him by depriving him of the substantive defense that he successfully asserted in the earlier extradition proceeding, "thereby rendering conduct which was protected by the political offense doctrine when done, now unprotected."
>
> The elimination of McMullen's defense to extradition—the alleged punishment must be viewed in light of the cases construing punishment under the ex post facto clauses and the nature of an extradition proceeding. As noted above, the ex post facto clauses have been narrowly construed to apply only to retroactive criminal penalties. Moreover, the ex post fact ban does not apply > to every change in law that "may work to the disadvantage of a defendant." Dobbert v. Florida, supra, 432 U.S. at 293, 97 S. Ct. at 2298 . . . .[450]

447 Id. at 302–304.

448 In re De Giacomo, 7 Fed. Cas. 366 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1874) (No. 3747); Hilario v. United States, 854 F. Supp. 165, 175–176 (E.D.N.Y. 1994); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 30283 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 27, 1998).

449 Ernst, 1998 WL 30283 (rejecting the relator's argument that the U.S.–Swiss Extradition Treaty could not apply retroactively because his extradition was commenced under the 1900 Treaty).

During McMullen's extradition proceedings the 1985 United States–United Kingdom Supplementary Extradition Treaty entered into effect. The Treaty significantly reduced the "political offense exception."[451] McMullen argued in vain that this new Treaty reduced the defense he had under the previous treaty.

It is a basic tenet of extradition law that a treaty providing for the extradition of individuals accused of specified crimes does not make an act a crime, but rather merely provides the means by which a state can obtain persons charged with those specified acts in order to try them where the act was committed. As a result, a treaty of extradition that includes a particular crime, but that was passed after the commission of that crime by the accused, still applies to the earlier act unless there is a specific treaty provision to the contrary,[452] thus in effect providing for some form of retroactivity.

The U.S. government, in both the executive and judicial branches, has adhered to this basic tenet. In 1933, the acting secretary of state sent a telegram to the chairman of the American Delegation to the 7th International Conference of American States in Montevideo informing him that extradition treaties applied to a previously committed offense unless the treaty expressly stated otherwise.[453] The Supreme Court reaffirmed this rule of law in Factor v. Laubenheimer,[454] where the Court stated that a later extradition treaty extended to proceedings concerning an offense not included in a previous treaty, regardless of the date of the offense. The Court added that a later treaty also would apply where there had been no previous extradition treaty.

However, this retroactivity provision can also be applied against the government. For example, in Galanis v. Pollanck,[455] a treaty of extradition between the United States and Canada contained a double jeopardy provision, which forbade extradition under the treaty where an accused had already been tried for the offense in the United States. The earlier extradition treaty lacked this provision. The defendant argued that as a result of the retroactivity rule, the provision applied even to a crime committed before the effective date of the treaty. The Second Circuit agreed, pointing out that the drafters of the treaty must have been aware of this basic rule, and their failure to include a provision excluding retroactive effect manifested their intent to give the article that force.

(7) Resort to Customary International Law Principles

In addition to the criteria enumerated above, U.S. courts also rely on customary international law principles in construing the meaning of treaty provisions. The recognition of customary international law is found in the much-quoted language of Justice Horace Gray in the Paquete Habana case:

> International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction, as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination.[456]

---

450 Id. at *4–5.

451 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

452 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70 at 753. For a treaty provision excluding retroactive effect, see Extradition Convention of 1856 between U.S. and Austria-Hungary, art. I, U.S.T. 9, 11 Stat. 691, 692–693.

453 M.S. Dept. of State, file 710. G. International Law 5; 1933 Foreign Rel., vol. IV, 185.

454 Factor v. Laubenheimer, 290 U.S. 276 (1933). See also In re De Giacomo, 7 F. Cas. 366 (S.D.N.Y. 1874) (No. 3,747).

455 Galanis v. Pollanck, 568 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1977); United States v. Flores, 538 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1976). See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

456 The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 700 (1900).

As Professor Louis Henkin has stated: "Like treaties, customary international law is law for the Executive and the courts to apply."[457] The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties,[458] although not yet ratified by the Senate, is already recognized as the "authoritative guide to current treaty law and practice."[459] Because the Convention essentially codifies customary international law governing international agreements, it may be used by the United States in interpreting treaties, even though the United States is not a party to the Convention. Many of its provisions have been included in the Restatement (Third) as being part of customary international law, binding on the United States.[460] In fact, U.S. courts have already treated certain provisions of the Vienna Convention as authoritative.[461]

A new debate has arisen between conservatives and neo-conservatives and traditional academics, the latter challenging the proposition that customary international law is binding on U.S. courts, or even relevant sources.[462]

(8) Resort to General Principles of Law

"General principles of law" are a source of international law. Consequently, as stated by this writer, they can be used for purposes of treaty interpretation:

> The best evidence that international law has not only accepted but relied on "General Principles" is the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which contains a number of such "principles" in its rules of treaty interpretation. Although that Convention codifies customary rules of international law, it nonetheless incorporates such principles as good faith and others as part of customary international law, even though their origin is found in "General Principles."[463]

Furthermore, this writer has also stated that:

> "General Principles" have been primarily used to clarify and interpret international law. For example, as Schlesinger notes, "General Principles" must be considered in determining the meaning of treaty terms. Lauterpacht points out that recourse by the ICJ to "General Principles" has constituted "no more than interpretation of existing conventional and customary law by reference to common sense and the canons of good faith." This interpretive function is the most widely recognized and applied function of "General Principles" and the one that is evidently the most needed and useful, in contrast to the use of "General Principles" as a method to supplant or remedy deficiencies in conventional and customary international law.

---

457 Henkin, supra note 142, at 221.

458 Vienna Convention, supra note 372.

459 S. Exec. Doc. L., 92d Cong., 1st sess. 1 (1971).

460 Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 325] (interpreting international agreements).

461 See United States v. Cadena, 585 F.2d 1252, 1261 (5th Cir. 1978) (applying Art. 36 to interpret High Seas Convention), overruled in part by United States v. Michelena-Orovio, 719 F.2d 738 (5th Cir. 1983); Day v. Trans World Airlines, 528 F.2d 31, 33, 36 (2d Cir. 1975) (applying Art. 31 to interpret Warsaw Convention).

462 For a traditional view, see Jordan J. Paust, After Alvarez-Machain: Abduction, Standing, Denials of Justice, and Unaddressed Human Rights Claims, 67 St. John's L. Rev. 551 (1993); Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law: Its Nature, Sources and Status as Law of the U.S., 12 Mich. J. Int'l L. 59 (1990); Jordan J. Paust, Rediscovering the Relationship between Congressional Power and International: Exceptions to the Last in Time Rule and the Primacy of Custom, 28 Va. J. Int'l L. 393 (1988); Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law and Human Rights Treaties Are Law of the U.S., 20 Mich. J. Int'l L. 301 (1999); and for the neoconservative view, see Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 816 (1997).

463 M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Functional Approach to "General Principles" of International Law, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 768, 786–787 (1990) (citation omitted).

> "General Principles" can be utilized to interpret ambiguous or uncertain language in conventional or customary international law, but, foremost, they can be relied upon to determine the rights and duties of States in the contextual, conventional, or customary law. This is particularly the case, for example, with respect to such principles as "good faith" and "equitable performance."
>
> The extent to which one can resort to "General Principles" for interpretative purposes has never been established. Consequently, "General Principles" can logically extend to fill gaps in conventional and customary international law and serve as a supplementary source thereto. From that basis, "General Principles" can be interpreted as a source of law that overreaches other positive sources of international law, and eventually supersedes it.
>
> This interpretative approach can be applied in extenso. "General Principles" thus become not only a source of new norms, but also a source of higher law, i.e., jus cogens.[464]

For example, with respect to determining double criminality, research may be required in comparative criminal law systems so that "general principles" can be determined and applied.

(9) Resort to National Legislation

Neither the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties nor the Restatement (Third) specifically addresses the issue of terminological inconsistencies in the official languages of treaties when the treaty in question states that all languages are equally binding and effective. Bilateral treaties almost always contain provisions that the text in both languages is binding and effective, but sometimes the translation of terms may have a different legal meaning in different languages.

In In re Assarsson,[465] the Seventh Circuit decided a case involving the United States–Sweden bilateral extradition treaty,[466] where the key difference was that the English text uses the term "charged," referring to an extraditable person, whereas the Swedish text used a term that in English means "accused." If the word "charged," a precondition to extradition, is interpreted in accordance with U.S. law, it would mean that an indictment or complaint has been returned, evidencing the beginning of formal criminal proceedings. If the word "accused," used in the Swedish text, were to be used, an arrest warrant would be sufficient.

Similarly, the 1983 United States–Italy Extradition Treaty[467] contains a provision in Article VI, which states that extradition is not permissible in cases where the requested person has been acquitted or convicted of the "same acts" in English and the "same facts" in the Italian text.[468] This change was made in the 1983 treaty because the language of the prior 1973 treaty spoke of the "same offense" in Article VI, which caused significant difficulties in determining what constituted the same offense. The 1973 treaty provided in Article VI: "Extradition shall not be granted

---

464 Id. at 776–777 (citations omitted).

465 In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980).

466 Convention on Extradition, U.S.–Sweden, Oct. 24, 1961, T.I.A.S. No. 5496, 14 U.S.T. 1845.

467 Extradition Treaty, U.S.–Italy, Sept. 24, 1984, T.I.A.S. 10837, 35 U.S.T. 3023.

468 The International Association of Penal Law, the oldest and most distinguished penal law organization in the world, at its XVIIth International Congress of Penal Law held in Beijing, China, Sept. 12–19, 2004, adopted the following text in a resolution on the topic of ne bis in idem:

> 2.1 The idem, in terms of the "same act" in the proceedings at issue, should be identified according to the facts established in the preceding process and, in particular, by the indictment and/or the final decision as governed by the applied law. This factual approach provides a more objective and clearer criterion than that of juridical equivalence, which is very much affected by the differences between the respective national penal provisions and the rules on concurrence of offences. (emphasis added).
>
> 2.2 If substantially the same facts constitute additional serious offences according to the second law applicable pursuant to Section 1.3, which offences are not punishable and, thus, have not been dealt with in the first proceedings, a new proceeding may be admissible only if, according to the principle of dedication, the first sentence, in so far as fully or partly enforced is accounted for. (emphasis added).

in any of the following circumstances: 1. When the person whose surrender is sought is being proceeded against or has been tried and discharged or punished in the territory of the Requested party for the offense for which his extradition is requested…" (emphasis added). The language was intensely debated in Sindona v. Grant because the term "offense" meant the same or substantially the same crime.[469] It was as a result of the terminological problems raised by the word "offense" in the 1973 treaty that the 1983 treaty reverted to a choice of terms reflecting Italian criminal law and practice, which is fact-based.[470]

It should be noted that Italy ratified the European Convention on Extradition,[471] which in Article 9 contains the same ground for refusal of extradition as that which is reflected in Article VI of the 1984 Treaty. Article 9 refers to the sameness of "fact" or "facts" of the prior acquittal or conviction and the extradition request. Italian jurisprudence as noted in numerous writings of scholars is fact-based with respect to ne bis in idem in extradition matters.[472]

It is obvious that any exercise in treaty interpretation needs to ascertain the parties' intention by relying on the plain language and meaning of the words, if possible.[473] Thus, the real inquiry must be into the parties' intentions. In the cases of Sweden and Italy, the parties intended to reflect in the respective treaties their national legislation. For example, Italy's law prohibiting ne bis in idem, specifically uses the words stessi fatti,[474] which are the same words used in the Italian version of Article VI, which mean "same facts." Understandably, Italy could not ratify a treaty that was inconsistent

---

XVIIth International Congress of Penal Law, Minutes of the Congress and Resolutions, 75 Revue Internationale de Droit Penal 804 (2004).

469 See Sindona v. Grant, 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980), aff'g 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

470 See Daniele Striani, L'extradizione con gli Stati Uniti, 36 Quaderni Della Giustizia 45 (1984).

471 European Convention on Extradition, ETS No 24 (Dec. 3, 1957).

472 See Novella Gallantini, Evoluzione del Prinipo del Ne Bis In Idem Europeo Tra Norme Convenzionale E norme Interne Di Attrazione, 12 Diritto Penale E Processo 1567 (2005); M. Pisani, Il Ne Bis In Idem Internazionale E Il Processo Penale Italiano, in Studi Di Diritto Processuale Civile In Onore Di G. Tarzia 553 (2005); M. Pisan, Le Principe Ne Bis In Idem au Niveau International et la Procedure Penal Italienne, Revue Internationale de Droit Penal 1017 (2002); G. Dean, Profili di un Indagine Sul Ne Bis In Idem Extradizionale, Rivisa di DIritto Procedurale 58 (1998); E. Amodio & O. Dominioni, Le'estradizione e il Problema Del Ne Bis In Idem, Rivisa Di Diritto Matrimoniale 362 (1968).

473 1 Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at Comment (f) states:

> Interpretation of agreements authenticated in two or more languages. When an international agreement has been authenticated in two or more languages, the text in each language is equally authoritative, unless it has been agreed that a particular text will prevail. A version of the agreement in a language other than one in which the text was authenticated is authentic only if it has so been agreed. The terms of the agreement are presumed to have the same meaning in each authentic text. Except where a particular text prevails, when a comparison of the authentic texts discloses a different meaning which is not removed by resorting to the rules of interpretation stated elsewhere in this section, the meaning that best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the international agreement, is to be adopted. Vienna Convention, Article 33.

see also Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, May 23, 1969, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.39/27; T.O. Elias, Modern Law of Treaties (1974); Peter Germer, Interpretation of Plurilingual Treaties: A Study of Article 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 11 Harv. Int'l L. J. 400, 413 (1970).

474 An indication of the intent of the parties is the choice of heading for Article VI, which is Ne Bis In Idem, which derives from Roman law and is contained in the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure in Article 649. Article 649 states (translation by author):

> Prohibition of a second judgment.
>
> 1. The accused who is acquitted or condemned with a judgment or penal decree which has become final cannot be subjected again to a criminal proceeding for the same fact, even when with its national legislation. Therefore, they must have the "same facts" to prevail, as opposed to the more narrow meaning of "same acts," because fatti, or "facts," may include multiple acts.[475]

This problem has arisen in the case of In re Gambino.[476] On September 11, 2006, the district court ruled on Gambino's habeas corpus petition that the magistrate's order granting extradition was in violation of the treaty's Article VI in that the facts upon which he was requested were the same "facts" on which he had been previously prosecuted on in the federal district court in New York. Thus Article VI, which uses the word "same acts" in English, stessi fatti in Italian, is interpreted to mean same facts of the 1983 treaty with Italy. The magistrate misunderstood the issue and confused the two concepts reflected in the 1973 United States–Italy treaty with its replacement, the 1983 United States–Italy Extradition Treaty. The federal district court judge, unlike the magistrate, understood the difference between a fact-driven concept of ne bis in idem and a law-driven one.

The same issue arose in United States v. Jurado-Rodriguez,[477] involving the 1883 United States–Luxembourg Extradition Treaty, which contains in Article III, a similar provision on ne bis in idem, as Article VI of the 1983 United States–Italy Extradition Treaty. In that case, the distinction as in Sindona v. Grant,[478] distinguishes between "same offense and same conduct." The "same offense" approach is driven by the crime charged while the "same conduct" terminology is fact driven, irrespective of what the charge may be. Considering that most modern treaties adopt a fact-driven approach to double criminality, it would be consistent with that approach for the interpretation of double jeopardy provisions such as Article III in the Luxembourg treaty and Article VI in the Italian treaty to be interpreted on a fact-driven basis. Moreover, the diversity in labeling crimes that exists between different legal systems would make it more fair to follow a fact-driven approach.

In re Aguilar[479] is an extradition case involving the interpretation of the 1908 United States–Portugal Extradition Treaty, and whether the 1988 United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances constitutes a modification of the 1908 extradition treaty. This issue in this case was the interpretation of Article I of the treaty, which specifically states that in order for jurisdiction to vest the person must be "actually within such this fact is considered differently as to its label or degree or for the circumstances, save for what is provided for in Article 69, para. 2 and Article 345.

---

2. If, notwithstanding the above, a new criminal proceeding is initiated, the judge at all stages [of the proceeding] and irrespective of the [judicial] level of the trial [shall] pronounce a judgment of acquittal or dismissal, enunciating the reasons for the order.

It should be noted that Article 69 and 345 of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure mentioned in Article 649 make exception for cases where a person was presumed dead, but was later found to be alive. Thus, these exceptions do not apply to the general rule enunciated above. There is no term such as ne bis in idem in U.S. criminal law, federal or state. Its counterpart is double jeopardy, which derives from common law and exists in federal criminal law, as well as state law. Although there is a doctrinal difference between ne bis in idem and double jeopardy, the two concepts have evolved in similar ways, both doctrinally and jurisprudentially. They relate to the preclusion of repeated prosecution and punishment of the same person for crimes arising out of the same or substantially the same facts. U.S. federal and state jurisprudence interpreting double jeopardy has long been based on the proposition that the facts control and not the specific acts or crimes.

475 This problem has arisen in the case of In re Gambino, 2006 WL 709445 (D. Mass. 2006), dismissed in Gambino v. Winn, Case No. 06-10552-RCL (D. Mass 2006). S*ee* Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

476 In re Gambino, 2006 WL 709445 (D. Mass. 2006), dismissed in Gambino v. Winn, Case No. 06-10552-RCL (D. Mass 2006).

477 907 F. Supp 568 (E.D.N.Y. 1995).

478 619 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1980).

479 In re Aguilar, 17 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. D. 477 (S.D. Fla. 2004).

jurisdiction when the crime was committed."[480] The Court held that the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties' plain language and meaning is explicit and that since Aguilar was not in Portugal at the time of the crime, he was not extraditable. The government argues that the 1988 UN Narcotic Convention (referred to above) modifies the language of the 1908 extradition treaty nd removes the requirement of physical presence. The issue of physical presence under Article I of the 1908 treaty has been previously adjudicated in Gouveia v. Vokes.[481] The court in that case concluded that the 1988 Narcotics Convention merely added extraditable offenses to the 1908 extradition treaty with Portugal, but did not amend other provisions of the treaty, as the government contended.

The trend in Europe, Canada, and the United States is for such issues as ne bis in idem and dual criminality to be fact driven and not law driven. In the end, this approach serves the interest of the government and the relators, as well as provides judicial economy.

5.4.4. Contemporary Jurisprudential Trends: The Restatement's Position

Since the 1980s, federal judges have tended to be more conservative while the zeal of federal prosecutors sometimes stretches the limits of propriety. The combination of these two realities has had a strong impact on the way treaties have been interpreted. Suffice it to note that the Supreme Court, the last bastion of justice and fairness, interpreted the United States–Mexico Treaty[482] as permitting abduction because the treaty did not exclude it.[483]

The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations states:

> § 325 Interpretation of International Agreement
>
> (1) An international agreement is to be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.
>
> (2) Any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the agreement, and subsequent practice between the parties in the application of the agreement, are to be taken into account in its interpretation.

Source Note:

Subsection (1) follows Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention; Subsection (2) follows Article 31(3).

Comment:

a. Customary international law of interpretation. Customary international law has not developed rules and modes of interpretation having the definiteness and precision to which this section aspires. Therefore, unless the Vienna Convention comes into force for the U.S., this section does not strictly govern interpretation by the U.S. or by courts in the U.S.. But it represents generally accepted principles and the U.S. has also appeared willing to accept them despite differences of nuance and emphasis. See comment g as U.S. practice.

b. Context of the agreement. For the purpose of interpreting an agreement, the context comprises, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes, (i) any other agreement between the parties in connection with the conclusion of the agreement and (ii) any instrument made by one

480 United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, 28 I.L.M. 492 (1989).

481 Gouveia v. Vokes, 800 F. Supp. 241 (E.D. Pa. 1992).

482 Extradition Treaty, May 4, 1978, 31 U.S.T. 5059, T.I.A.S. No. 9656; Rodrigo Labardini, Life Imprisonment and Extradition: Historical Development, International Context and the Current Situation in Mexico and the U.S., 11 Sw. J.L. & Trade Am. 1 (Winter 2005).

483 See Ch. IV, Sec. 6 (discussing Stevens's dissent).

of more parties in connection with the conclusion of the agreement and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the agreement. Vienna Convention, Article 31(2).

c. Subsequent practice and interpretation. Subsection (2) addresses subsequent agreements that purport to interpret an earlier agreement; agreements that amend an earlier agreement are dealt with in § 334. The distinction may be imperceptible in some instances. Subsection (2) conforms to U.S. modes of interpretation, affirming that subsequent practice of the parties can be taken into account in interpreting international agreements.

d. Interpretation of different types of agreements. Different types of agreements may call for different interpretive approaches. Agreements creating international organizations have a constitutional quality, and are subject to the observation in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 407, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819), that "we must never forget that it is a constitution that we are expounding." Treaties that lay down rules to be enforced by the parties through their internal courts or administrative agencies should be construed so as to achieve uniformity of result despite differences between national legal systems. Agreements involving a single transaction between governments, such as a transfer of territory or a grant of economic assistance should be construed like similar private contracts between private parties. Different approaches to interpretation have developed for particular categories of agreements such as extradition treaties, tax treaties, etc.

e. Recourse to travaux préparatoires. The Vienna Convention, in Article 32, requires the interpreting body to conclude that the "ordinary meaning" of the text is either obscure or unreasonable before it can look to "supplementary means." Some interpreting bodies are more willing to come to that conclusion than others. (Compare, for example, the experience in the U.S. with the parole evidence rule in interpreting contracts.) Article 32 of the Vienna Convention reflects reluctance to permit the use of materials constituting the development and negotiation of an agreement (travaux préparatoires) as a guide to the interpretation of the agreement. The Convention's inhospitality to travaux is not wholly consistent with the attitude of the International Court of Justice and not at all with that of U.S. courts. See comment g.

f. Interpretation of agreements authenticated in two or more languages. When an international agreement has been authenticated in two or more languages, the text in each language is equally authoritative, unless it has been agreed that a particular text will prevail. A version of the agreement in a language other than one in which the text was authenticated is authentic only if it has so been agreed. The terms of the agreement are presumed to have the same meaning in each authentic text. Except where a particular text prevails, when a comparison of the authentic texts discloses a difference of meaning which is not removed by resorting to the rules of interpretation stated elsewhere in this section, the meaning that best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the international agreement, is to be adopted. Vienna Convention, Article 33.

g. Interpretation by U.S. courts. This section suggests a mode of interpretation of international agreements somewhat different from that ordinarily applied by courts in the U.S.. Courts in the U.S. are generally more willing than those of other states to look outside the instrument to determine its meaning. In most cases, the U.S. approach would lead to the same result, but an international tribunal using the approach called for by this section might find the U.S. interpretation erroneous and U.S. action pursuant to that interpretation a violation of the agreement.

Reporters' Notes:

1. Resort to travaux préparatoires. Some states at the Vienna Conference objected to resort to travaux as contrary to their traditions, in which resort to legislative history to interpret domestic statutory questions is impermissible, or at least uncommon. Some were concerned that if resort to travaux were accepted, a state might be deterred from acceding to a multilateral convention negotiated at a conference that it had not attended. Others feared that resort to travaux would favor nations with long-maintained and well-indexed archives. The International Court of Justice, particularly as compared with the Permanent Court of International Justice, has been rather liberal in referring to travaux. The International Court of Justice did refuse to consider the travaux in its advisory opinion, Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations, [1950] I.C.J. Rep. 4, 8. In other cases, it has considered arguments based on negotiating documents. See, e.g., North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (Federal Republic of Germany v. Denmark & Netherlands), [1969] I.C.J. Rep. 3, 32; Reservations to the Convention on Genocide (Advisory Opinion), [1951] I.C.J. Rep. 15, 22; see H. Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court 124–27 (1958); Gordon, "The World Court and the Interpretation of Constitutive Treaties," 59 Am. J. Int'l L. 794(1965). Even the earlier court sometimes recognized the relevance of travaux. See Territorial Jurisdiction of the International Commission of the River Oder, P.C.I.J. ser. A, No. 23 (1929), p. 42. The Court states that, as to those states that had not participated in the Versailles conference, the record of the Conference "cannot be used to determine, insofar as they are concerned, the import of the Treaty." The Court appeared to assume the relevance of that record as to other parties.

Other international tribunals have varied in their readiness to use such materials. The European Court of Human Rights has resorted to them liberally but the Court of Justice of the European Communities has not. Sorensen, "Autonomous Legal Orders," 32 Int'l & Comp.L.Q. 559, 573 (1983). For use by an ad hoc arbitral tribunal, see Young Loan Arbitration (Belgium v. Federal Republic of Germany), 59 Int'l L.Rep. 495, 543 (1980).

U.S. courts, accustomed to analyzing legislative materials, have not been hesitant to resort to travaux préparatoires. See, e.g., Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392, 105 S. Ct. 1338, 84 L.Ed. 2d 289 (1985); TWA v. Franklin Mint, 466 U.S. 243, 104 S.Ct. 1776, 80 L.Ed. 2d 273 (1984). British courts, although reluctant to use domestic legislative materials, have not been inhibited in the use of travaux. E.g., Fothergill v. Monarch Airlines, [1981] A.C. 251 (H.L. 1980).

2. Agreements in two or more languages. Comment f recognizes the equality of texts in two or more languages and presumes that each text has the same meaning. An international tribunal, therefore, may consider any convenient text unless an argument is addressed to some other text. Judges of the International Court of Justice often refer to only one or two texts. See Germer, "Interpretation of Plurilingual Treaties: A Study of Article 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties," 11 Harv. Int'l L. 400, 413 (1970). However, the Court of Justice of the European Communities has warned that since the text of the Treaty of Rome is equally authentic in each of several languages, it is unlikely that a question of treaty interpretation will be so clear under all of them that national courts are justified in not referring the question to the Court of Justice for clarification. Srl CILFIT v. Ministry of Health, [1982] E.C.R. 3415.

In developing Article 33 of the Vienna Convention, the negotiators rejected amendments that would have given preference to the language in which the treaty had been originally drafted; they provided instead that the meaning that best reconciles the different texts, having regard to the agreement's object and purpose, should prevail. The original language may of course prevail on account of its greater clarity, either because the other text represents a faulty translation or because particular phraseology is more meaningful in the language of the legal system in which it originated. Such guides to the meaning of an agreement may emerge from the travaux préparatoires. Thus, in Air France v. Saks, Reporters' Note 1, the court stated "[w]e look to French legal meaning because the Warsaw Convention was drafted in French by continental jurists."

3. Evidence of interpretive practice. Ascertaining state interpretive practice may present difficult problems of research. A few countries, including the U.S., publish digests of their international practice, which ordinarily include diplomatic notes and other actions reflecting treaty interpretation. These compilations may not be complete, however, particularly as to interpretation by agencies of the government other than the one that publishes them. Furthermore, their publication is often delayed. In most countries no systematic reports of practice are available.

4. U.S. and international interpretive approaches. Courts and administrative agencies in the U.S. frequently interpret international agreements. The courts seek to avoid giving to an international agreement a meaning in domestic law different form its international meaning.

Nonetheless, in a science as inexact as the interpretation of agreements, differences will inevitably emerge. To some extent these are due to differences in the approaches to interpretation in different legal systems. Subsection (1) emphasizes interpretation in accordance "with the ordinary meaning" of the text of the agreement; the "object and purpose" of the agreement is ancillary, casting light on the "ordinary meaning." By way of contrast, in U.S. tradition the primary object of interpretation is to "ascertain the meaning intended by the parties"; "the ordinary meaning of the words of the agreement" is a factor to be taken into account, as are the preparatory materials. See previous Restatement §§ 146–47. The previous Restatement reflected the strong tendency in U.S. case law to reject literal-minded interpretation of statutes, a tendency that is not dominant in the jurisprudence of many other countries.

The difference in result between the international and the U.S. approaches, however, should not be exaggerated. On the one hand, a U.S. court has said: "It seems elementary to us that the language [of a treaty article] must be the logical starting point." Day v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 528 F.2d 31,33 (2d Cir. 1975), certiorari denied, 429 U.S. 890, 97 S.Ct. 246, 50 L.Ed. 2d 172 (1976) (citing Article 31(1) of Vienna Convention). On the other hand, both the Vienna Convention and the U.S. approach seek to determine the intention of the parties; neither favors "teleological interpretation" to achieve some purpose overriding that intention. "The meaning intended by the parties" and "the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms" normally do not differ. Moreover, since the "ordinary meaning" of terms is to be determined in context and in the light of the object and purpose of the agreement, both "context" and "the object and the purpose" may have to be identified and often cannot be determined without recourse to the preparatory materials and to other "extraneous" evidence. Nevertheless, there may be a difference in emphasis and presentation. A U.S. lawyer trying to anticipate or influence the interpretation of an international agreement by an international tribunal will have to be aware of these preferences. For classic statements of the European tradition on interpretation, see C. de Visscher, Problèmes d'Interprétation Judiciaire en Droit International Public (1963); Degan, L'Interprétation des Accords en Droit International (1963).

For other reasons, too, different national courts may place different construction on the same language or arbiters may find several different national readings of the same international agreement. An international tribunal interpreting an agreement seeks to determine its meaning as a matter of international law. A U.S. court interpreting the same agreement seeks to determine its meaning for purposes of its application as domestic law. See § 362(2). The agreement has status as domestic law by virtue of its being an international agreement (§ 111, Comment b), and the interpretation of the agreement by other nations, or by international tribunals in cases to which the U.S. is not a party, will be given due weight, but such "foreign" interpretations ordinarily are not binding on the U.S. as a matter of international law and are therefore not binding on U.S. courts. The U.S. and its courts and agencies, however, are bound by an interpretation of an agreement of the U.S. by an international body authorized by the agreement to interpret it. E.g., Matter of International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, 17 F.C.C. 450, 461 (1953).

The international law on the interpretation of international agreements is binding on the U.S., and is part of the law of the U.S.. Insofar as this section reflects customary law, or if the U.S. adheres to the Vienna Convention, courts in the U.S. are required to apply those rules of interpretation even if the U.S. jurisprudence of interpretation might have led to a different result.

5. Use of domestic sources. A court or agency of the U.S. is required to take into account U.S. materials relating to the formation of an international agreement that might not be considered by an international body such as the International Court of Justice. These may include:

(i) Committee reports, debates, and other indications of meaning that the legislative branch has attached to an agreement which, as a matter of internal law, requires the assent of the Senate or of Congress. See § 314, Comment b, as to the obligation of the President with respect to qualification upon such assent.

> (ii) The history of the negotiations leading to the agreement, including unilateral statements of understanding not included in the President's proclamation or otherwise communicated to the other party, and, probably, internal official correspondence and position papers prepared for use of the U.S. delegation in the negotiation. Some of this evidence of intention may not be given great weight internationally, but domestic courts may have to consider it in view of the weight to be given to Executive interpretations of an agreement. See § 326(2).[484]

5.4.5. Judicial Deference to the Executive Branch

It is understandably common practice for the government to represent in extradition proceedings that the judiciary must give deference to the executive in connection with treaty interpretation insofar as the power to conduct foreign relations is granted by the Constitution to the executive branch. In addition, the government also properly adds that extradition treaties should be liberally interpreted. However, the problem arises when representations are made to the effect that what is considered a liberal interpretation should be the province of the executive and that the judiciary should simply accept whatever interpretation the government offers under these two combined approaches to treaty interpretation. What is more appropriate is to distinguish them. An extradition treaty should be interpreted liberally in order to achieve the goals of extradition but subject to the treaty language and in accordance with other applicable treaties, statutes, and the jurisprudence of the courts. Liberality of interpretation becomes important when there is ambiguity, either in the language in the treaty, or arising out of the facts. Liberality should not be construed as authorizing the government to, in a sense, rewrite the language of a treaty, or go against its plain language and meaning. If an issue of the intent of the parties arises, then clearly the judiciary must give deference to the executive and this of course has bearing on the interpretation of treaty provisions.[485]

5.5. The Effects of State Succession and War on U.S. Extradition Treaties

5.5.1. Introduction

State succession and war cause the United States' treaty obligations regarding extradition to lapse or be suspended either until a new treaty comes into force or until hostilities are ended. During the interim, the United States has no legal basis upon which extradition may be requested or granted, because it chooses to reject the applicability of customary international law to matters of extradition and asylum. This self-imposed restriction condemns the practice to exclusive dependence upon one source of international law, namely treaties, and to lose the benefit of the alternative sources. The suspension of a treaty obligation because of war or its abrogation by a successor state would have definitive effect on extradition if the United States were to accept the existing alternatives under international law (i.e., reciprocity or comity). For example, instead of attempting to continue applying the previous treaty to which a state's predecessor had agreed, the United States could urge the negotiation of a new treaty; in the interim, the United States could rely on comity as a legal basis of extradition.

---

484 See Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at § 325, Source Note, Comment, and Reporters' Notes.

485 See Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F. Supp. 2d 651 (E.D. Pa. 2005) (giving deference to the Department of State); Best v. United States, 304 F.3d 308 (3rd Cir. 2002); In re Extradition of Platko, 213 F. Supp. 2d 1229, 1233 (S.D. Cal. 2002); El-Al, Ltd. v. Tsiu Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155 (1999); Sumitomo Shoji Am. Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176 (1982). The "state doctrine" has applied to prevent U.S. federal courts of appeals from considering the validity of a foreign head of state's action in extraditing a relator. See Reyes-Vasquez v. U.S. Attorney General, 304 Fed. Appx. 33, 35–36 (3d. Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion).

Furthermore, there is nothing that requires the suspension of treaty obligations during times of war. The effect of war on extradition treaties depends on whether the procedure is considered an aspect of foreign policy furthering the national interest, or whether it is considered a form of international cooperation against common criminality. If the former approach is adopted, extradition will be deemed dependent upon the friendly relations of the signatories; thus, treaty obligations would be suspended during unfriendly periods. If the latter approach is adopted, the international community's interest in combating common criminality would override political conditions between states. The United States adheres to the narrower position of self-interest; this explains the preponderant role played by the executive in extradition matters.

5.5.2. State Succession

State succession is a doctrine by which a successor state is bound by the treaty obligations undertaken by the legal entity called the prior state. It is designed to preserve world public order through predictability by maintaining treaty obligations. Although it is the privilege of the successor state to reject the application of the treaty concluded by the prior state, the same privilege also exists with respect to the counterpart state with respect to treaties that have a political content or political nature.

The practice of states has varied over the years and more particularly as between developed and developing states. In the decolonization era of the 1960s and early 1970s there was a presumption favoring continuation of treaties under state succession for newly independent states if the treaty was not of a political nature. Conversely, if the treaty was of a political nature the presumption was that state succession did not apply unless the successor state specifically acknowledged the binding legal effect of the treaty in question. In the last two decades, however, the practice has become more stable in favor of a presumption of state succession unless the successor state explicitly rejects a given treaty. However, some states such as China have taken a consistent position that they are not bound under the doctrine of state succession and they are only bound by the treaties they specifically undertake.

With respect to extradition treaties, state succession has been consistently recognized and practiced. Nevertheless, because an extradition treaty is premised on certain assumptions, the state that was an original party to it may elect not to be bound by state succession even if the successor state elects to accept the continued application of the extradition treaty. The assumptions upon which states rely in their extradition relations are: (1) that mutual and reciprocal interests in law enforcement and cooperation in penal matters are preserved; and, (2) that the criminal justice systems of the two states are not in contradiction with one another or contain such elements that may be contrary to the public policy of one another. The latter assumption is particularly significant in view of the "rule of non-inquiry,"[486] which prohibits a state with whom extradition relations exist from judging another state's criminal justice system in connection with an extradition request or the surrender of the individual. Thus, if either of these two assumptions is deemed by the original party to the extradition treaty not to exist with respect to the successor state, that original party may refuse to accept the continued application of the treaty under state succession.

The two cases discussed in Section 2, Ivancevic v. Artukovic and Charlton v. Kelly, reveal much about the constitutional framework of the United States' separation of powers. In these cases the judiciary determined to what extent it will defer to the executive in matters of treaty interpretation and state succession in order to abstain from interfering in the powers of an equal branch of government.

---

486 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

The major concern with respect to the state succession doctrine focuses on the question of how extradition relations are affected "when a state or territory covered by such a treaty changes its form of government, or becomes a part of a nation other than that with which the [United States has] the formerly applicable treaty."[487] If the treaty is deemed abrogated by such changes, the United States will not grant an extradition request, because its extradition practice is based exclusively on the existence of a treaty in force.[488]

Generally, the question of state succession arises whenever there is a change in the country's status, rather than in its government. This question recurs whenever former colonies of a given state become independent.[489] Upon gaining independence, several states have voluntarily assumed the treaty obligations applicable to their respective territories and that were formerly binding on the parent state. As an illustration, the Provisional Government of Burma assumed all applicable obligations of the United Kingdom, agreeing with the United States that:

> All obligations and responsibilities heretofore devolving on the Government of the United Kingdom which arise from any valid international agreement shall henceforth, insofar as such instrument may be held to have application to Burma, devolve upon the Provisional Government of Burma. The rights and benefits heretofore enjoyed by the Government of the United Kingdom in virtue of the application of any such international instrument to Burma shall henceforth be enjoyed by the Provisional Government of Burma.[490]

Although some newly independent states specifically assume the treaty obligations of the predecessor states,[491] others do not.[492] For example, Israel proclaimed its statehood in 1948. In 1949, it announced that the Extradition Treaty of 1931 between the United States and the United Kingdom (Palestine) was not in force with respect to Israel. As a result, the United States and Israel were compelled to negotiate a new extradition treaty. The new treaty was signed in 1962, thirteen years after Israel denounced the previous treaty.[493] The Israeli government's rejection of the treaties applicable to Palestine illustrates the controlling principle operative in such state succession situations: the government of the successor state determines whether or not a given treaty remains effective with that state.[494]

The prevailing position of the United States is that a treaty remains in force until it is abrogated and that it binds the successor state unless that state repudiates it.[495] In Sabatier

---

487 See Rogge, supra note 181, at 378. See generally Vienna Convention of Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.80/31, as corrected by A/CONF.80/31/Corr.2 of Oct. 27, 1978, reprinted in 17 I.L.M. 1488 (1978).

488 Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 727.

489 See Rogge, supra note 181, at 383. See also State v. Bull, 52 I.L.R. 84 (Sup. Ct., Transvaal Provincial Division 1966) (S. Afr.), where it was held that the extradition treaty between South Africa and Malawi, which became independent following the dissolution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, was in full force and effect.

490 Treaty between the United Kingdom and Burma Regarding Recognition of Burmese Independence, Oct. 17, 1947, art. 2, 70 U.N.T.S 184, 186. See also Whiteman Digest, supra note 70, at 763; Rogge, supra note 181, at 383.

491 Treaty between the United Kingdom and Burma Regarding Recognition of Burmese Independence, supra note 491.

492 Rogge, supra note 181, at 374.

493 Convention relating to Extradition, Dec. 5, 1963, 14 U.S.T. 1707, T.I.A.S. No. 5476, 484 U.N.T.S. 283.

494 Harvard Research in International Law Extradition, in 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 360 (Supp. 1935).

495 See Sabatier v. Dambrowski, 586 F.2d 866 (1st Cir. 1978) (concerning Canada's succession to treaty with England); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962) (concerning Lebanon's succession to treaty with France); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 348 U.S. 818 (1954) (concerning Yugoslavia's succession to treaty with the Kingdom of Serbia); Jhirad v. Ferrandina,

v. Dambrowski,[496] for example, the relator challenged the order certifying his extradition on the grounds that no extradition treaty between Canada and the United States was in force at the time he allegedly committed the offense for which his extradition was requested. In rejecting his contention, the court reasoned as follows:

> Sabatier's major contention is that the offense of armed robbery committed in 1975 is not extraditable under any valid treaty between Canada and the U.S. The government seeks to extradite Sabatier under Article X of the Webster–Ashburton Treaty, 8 Stat. 572, T.S. No. 119, signed by Great Britain and the U.S. in 1842 and incorporated into subsequent conventions with Britain and Canada. It relies on the fact that the weight of authority is "that new nations inherit the treaty obligations of the former colonies." Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F. Supp. 1155, 1159-61 (S.D.N.Y.), rev'd on other grounds, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833, 97 S. Ct. 97, 50 L.Ed.2d 98 (1976). Sabatier argues that Canada is an exception to this rule and that the Webster–Ashburton Treaty therefore is not applicable. In effect, he would have us hold that no extradition treaty between Canada and the U.S. covering the offense of armed robbery was effective until 1976, when the current treaty with Canada was ratified by the Senate. This disputes the conduct of the governments of both countries, to which we must give great deference. Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288, 22 S. Ct. 484, 46 L.Ed. 534 (1902). The history of the relations between the two countries, the terms of the current extradition treaty, the official position of the Department of State, and the relevant rules of law all point to the conclusion that Canada should be regarded as a party to the Webster–Ashburton Treaty and that treaty permits her to seek Sabatier's extradition for an armed robbery committed in 1975. Cf. Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 22 S. Ct. 484, 46 L.Ed. 534 (1902) (treaty with Germany); Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 436 F.2d 443, n.3 (treaty with India); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir.) cert. denied, 348 U.S. 818, 75 S. Ct. 28, 99 L.Ed. 645 (1954) (treaty with Yugoslavia).

In the last twenty years, U.S. courts have faced a number of issues dealing with state succession issues. State succession issues started appearing in U.S. courts after the 1989 breakup of the Soviet Union and the establishment of fifteen new republics, which was followed in 1991 by the breakup of the former Yugoslavia and the resulting establishment of four different republics, and then in 1993, by the breakup of Czechoslovakia into the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic.[497]

In a classic case of state succession, the breakup of Czechoslovakia presented no difficulties as to the applicability of the extradition and supplemental treaties signed between it and the United States in 1925 and 1935 respectively.[498]

---

355 F. Supp. 1155 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), rev'd on other grounds, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 833 (1976) (concerning India's succession to treaty with England).

496 Sabatier, 586 F.2d at 868.

497 Sean D. Murphy (ed.), Continuance of Extradition Treaty with Czech Republic, in Contemporary Practice of the U.S. Relating to International Law, 98 Am. J. Int'l L. 850 (Oct. 2004); Paul Williams, Treaty Obligations of the Successor States of the Former Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia: Do They Continue in Force? 23 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 1 (1994). See also In re Extradition of Sacirbegovic, 03 Crim. Misc. 01 Page 19, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 707 (S.D.N.Y. 2005); Hoxha v. Levi, 371 F. Supp. 2d 651 (E.D. Pa. 2005) (holding no extradition treaty between the United States and the Republic of Albania exists, even though there was a treaty with the former Kingdom of Albania, which is no longer in existence); Ven v. Malendez, 92 F. 3d 851 (9th Cir. 1996) (concerning the continued validity of the treaty of Singapore as being part of the 1931 treaty with the United Kingdom under the doctrine of state succession).

498 U.S.–Czechoslovakia Extradition Treaty, July 2, 1925, with the supplementary treaty signed on April 29, 1935. See United States v. Justik, Case No. 8:05-MJ-319-T-EAJ, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29944 (M.D. Fla. 2005); Kastnerova v. United States, 365 F.3d 980 (11th Cir.), cert denied 541 U.S. 1090 (2004); United States v. Peterka, 307 F. Supp 2d 1344 (2003); In re Extradition of Platko, 213 F. Supp. 2d 1229 (S.D. Ca. 2002); United States v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165 (3rd Cir. 1997) (state succession of Trinidad and Tobago to the United Kingdom). See also Then v. Melendez, 92 F.3d 851 (9th Cir. 1996).

With respect to the former Yugoslavia, the problem was more significant. In this case, the Kingdom of Serbia signed a treaty in 1902, which then applied through state succession to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia after World War II. In 1991, Yugoslavia broke up and its official state successor became the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In 2003, it became the Union of Serbia and Montenegro and subsequently split into the two separate states of Serbia and Montenegro.

For more than a decade after the dissolution of Yugoslavia the Department of State failed to update the status of its "Treaties in Force," and thus the status of states that were part of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were still listed under Yugoslavia. The problem arose because the 1902 treaty that applied to the Kingdom of Serbia did not include all of the territories that became part of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia after World War II.

The problem arises under the doctrine of state succession when a state was never part of the original state, which had the original treaty obligations, such is the case of Bosnia, which was not part of the original Kingdom of Serbia in 1902.

In other words, state succession has traditionally applied to the first inheritor states of the original state. If the inheritor state subsequently encompasses additional territory, as was the case when the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia incorporated Bosnia after World War II, then the obligations inherited by the Federal Republic from the Kingdom of Serbia apply during the period in which it is part of the Federation. But once Bosnia was no longer part of the Federation it could not be held to be a state successor to the treaty with Serbia, because it is legally twice removed and never had the option of choosing whether it wanted to be bound by that treaty.

This issue arose in the case of Sacirbey, where the extradition magistrate ruled as follows:

> Sacirbey contends that the Treaty originally entered into between the U.S. and the Kingdom of Serbia is not in force between the U.S. and BiH. (Relator's Brief in Opposition to Extradition, dated Nov. 14, 2003 ('Relator's Br.'), at 6). He argues that the Government has failed to meet its burden by "produc[ing] a legal document that clearly encompasses the express agreement of the U.S. and the government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to be bound by the 1902 Extradition Treaty." (Id. at 7) (emphasis added).
>
> The "question whether power remains in a foreign state to carry out its treaty obligations is in its nature political and not judicial, and . . . the courts ought not to interfere with the conclusions of the political department in that regard." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288 (1902) (considering the validity of the 1852 extradition treaty between the U.S. and Prussia). Accordingly, circuit courts that have considered whether a treaty has lapsed have typically deferred to the executive branch's determination. See Kastnerova v. U.S., 365 F.3d 980, 986-87 (11th Cir.) (holding that the conduct of the U.S. and the Czech Republic evinced their intent to adhere to a 1925 extradition treaty between the U.S. and Czechoslovakia), cert. denied, 124 S.Ct. 2826 (2004); U.S. ex rel. Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165, 171 (3d Cir.1997) (holding that Trinidad and Tobago succeeded to an extradition treaty between the U.S. and Great Britain based upon the conduct and intent of their governments despite the lack of an express confirmation treaty or exchange of diplomatic letters); Then v. Melendez, 92 F.3d 851, 854 (9th Cir.1996) ("The continuing validity of the [extradition treaty between the U.S. and Singapore] after Singapore's independence from the United Kingdom presents a political question, and we must defer to the intentions of the State Departments of the two countries."); New York Chinese T.V. Programs, Inc. v. U.E. Enters., Inc., 954 F.2d 847, 852 (2d Cir. 1992) (observing, in a copyright action, that "the judiciary should refrain from determining whether a treaty has lapsed, and instead should defer to the wishes of the elected branches of government"); Sabatier v. Dabrowski, 586 F.2d 866, 868 (1st Cir.1978) (noting that courts must give "great deference" to the conduct of the governments concerned in deciding a treaty's applicability).

> The courts also have recognized a presumption that emerging nations inherit the treaty obligations of their predecessors. See Jhirad v. Ferrandina, 355 F.Supp. 1155, 1159 (S.D.N.Y.1973), rev'd on other grounds, 486 F.2d 442 (2d Cir.1973); U.S. ex rel. Saroop, 109 F.3d at 172 (citing Jhirad); see also Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. U.S., 721 F.2d 679, 682 (9th Cir.1983) (holding that the extradition treaty between the U.S. and Denmark applied to Iceland after it gained its independence); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565, 573–74 (9th Cir.1954) (holding that the Treaty was valid and effective between the U.S. and the Federal Peoples' Republic of Yugoslavia).
>
> Here, the evidence shows that the Treaty was signed at Belgrade on October 25, 1901, that it later was ratified by the U.S. and the Kingdom of Serbia, and that it entered into force on June 12, 1902, thirty days after the signatories exchanged instruments of ratification. (See Ex. 8 (Decl. of Robert E. Dalton, dated Dec. 19, 2003 ('Dalton Decl.')), ¶ 3). It also appears undisputed that the Treaty has continued in force through a series of successor nations, including the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, later renamed the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ('SFRY'), which consisted of six republics, including Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Serbia. (Id. ¶¶ 4-6 (citing Ivancevic)).
>
> Although Sacirbey contends that BiH has not expressly ratified the Treaty, in April 1992, President Izetbegovic advised the U.S. Secretary of State that "Bosnia is ready to fulfill the treaty and other obligations of the former SFRY." (Id. ¶ 7). Since then, the U.S. has considered the Treaty to be in effect between the U.S. and BiH. (Id.; Ex. 1 (Decl. of Kenneth Propp, dated Apr. 2, 2002 ("Propp Decl.")), ¶ 2).
>
> Additionally, in both this proceeding and other proceedings, BiH's request for extradition has expressly relied on the Treaty. (See Ex. 8 ¶ 10; Ex. 5 at 1 (noting that the Request is made "[i]n accordance with . . . Articles II and III of the Convention on Extradition of Offenders concluded between the former Kingdom of Serbia and the U.S. of America . . . , taken over by Bosnia and Herzegovina from the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia[.]")).
>
> Sacirbey's reliance on the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations, as support for his contention that the Treaty has not properly been ratified, is wholly misplaced. Indeed, the Restatement provides that "[w]hen a part of a state becomes a new state, the new state does not succeed to the international agreements to which the predecessor state was a party unless, expressly or by implication, it accepts such agreements and the other party or parties thereto agree or acquiesce." (Relator's Br. at 8 (quoting Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations § 210 (1987)) (emphasis added). Here, President Izetbegovic's 1992 letter to the State Department expressly bound Bosnia to the Treaty. In addition, by making formal requests for extradition under the Treaty in this and other cases, BiH has implicitly conceded that it is bound by the Treaty. By certifying those requests, the U.S. also has impliedly agreed that BiH is bound. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: U.S. Law and Practice 144 (4th ed. 2002) (Bassiouni) ("The prevailing position of the U.S. is that a treaty is in force sua sponte and binds the successor state unless that state repudiates it.").
>
> In sum, there is ample evidence that BiH has adopted the Treaty, if not expressly, then impliedly. Accordingly, the Government has made the first showing necessary to secure Sacirbey's extradition.[499]

In Arambasic v. Ashcroft, the court also discussed state succession:

> The doctrine of state succession, by which a successor state is bound by the treaty obligations undertaken by the prior state, is applicable to the case at hand. State succession has been > consistently recognized and practiced with regard to extradition treaties. See, e.g., Sabatier v. Dabrowski, 586 F.2d 866 (1st Cir.1978) (Canada deemed successor to Webster–Ashburton treaty with England); Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir.1954) (Yugoslavia deemed successor to treaty with the Kingdom of Serbia). The trend is to favor the presumption of state succession unless the successor state explicitly rejects a given treaty. See generally, M. Bassiouni, International Extradition: U.S. Law and Practice, Ch. II, § 5.4.2 (4th Ed.2002). Petitioner has presented no evidence that the Republic of Croatia has rejected the treaty between the U.S. and Serbia. In fact, the request for extradition, which was submitted by the Minister of Justice of the Republic of Croatia, bases the request on the October 12, 1902, Convention on Extradition which produced the Extradition Treaty between the U.S. and Serbia.'[500]

499 In re Extradition of Sacirbegovic, 03 Crim. Misc. 01 Page 19, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 707 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). For issues surrounding state succession in the Former Yugoslavia, see In re Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 97893 (W.D.Mich. 2008) (citing International Extradition: U.S. Law and Practice (5th ed. 2007)); Sacirbegovic, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 707 (citing International Extradition: U.S. Law and Practice (4th ed. 2002)).

Similarly, in Ivancevic v. Artukovic,[501] the Ninth Circuit determined that the Treaty of Extradition of 1902 between the United States and Serbia[502] was a sufficient legal basis for the relator's extradition to Yugoslavia, which succeeded to the treaty when it became a separate state. The court reasoned that:

> the combination of countries into the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, and then by internal political action into "Federal Peoples Republic of Yugoslavia" was formed by a movement of the Slav people to govern themselves in one sovereign nation, with Serbia as the central or nucleus nation. Great changes in the going government were in the planning, and were brought about, but the combination was not an entirely new sovereignty without parentage. But even if it is appropriate to designate the combination as a new country, the fact that it started to function under the Serbian constitution as the home government and under Serbian legations and consular service in foreign countries, and has continued to act under Serbian treaties of Commerce and Navigation and the Consular treaty, is conclusive proof that if the combination constituted a new country it was the successor of Serbia in its international rights and obligations.[503]

The court in In re Extradition of Bilanovic, in considering whether the relator could be extradited to Bosnia-Hercegovina under the United States–Serbia extradition treaty of 1902, surveyed the extensive case law on the issue of state succession in the Former Yugoslavia and relied on the principle of judicial deference to the executive in extradition.[504] In response to the relator's arguments regarding the continuing existence of the 1902 Extradition Treaty, the court stated:

> These arguments suffer from three substantial flaws. First, no court has ever accepted these arguments. In fact, those district courts that have examined the continued existence of the 1902 Extradition Treaty have found that the U.S. and BiH have adopted the treaty by implication. Second, the State Succession Doctrine is not limited to new governments but extends to "new 500 Arambasic v. Ashcroft, 403 F. Supp. 2d 951, 955 (D.S.D., 2005).

---

501 Ivancevic v. Artukovic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 348 U.S. 818 (1954).

502 T.S. No. 406, 32 Stat. 1890 (1902).

503 Ivancevic, 211 F.2d at 572–573. The Ninth Circuit again considered the issue of state succession in Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679 9th Cir. (1983). The court held that a treaty concluded in 1902 between the United States and Denmark was binding upon Iceland, which in 1902 was part of Denmark, even though Iceland subsequently became an independent state with no ties to Denmark. The court affirmed the applicability and validity of the treaty as applied to Iceland, even though Denmark had terminated the treaty in 1968. The court noted that in the 1918 Act of Union, by which Iceland declared itself a sovereign state, Iceland explicitly accepted all treaty obligations between Denmark and other countries that had been applicable to Iceland. The court also gave weight to the endorsement of the treaty by the governments of both Iceland and the United States. See also In re the Extradition of Chen, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. 1997); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 1999).

504 In re Extradition of Bilanovic, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 97893 at *17–22 (W.D. Mich. 2008).

> states" as well. See Kasternova, 365 F.3d at 986 (holding that the conduct of the U.S. and the Czech Republic showed their intent to adhere to a 1925 extradition treaty between the U.S. and Czechoslovakia); RESATEMENT § 210(3). Consequently, the distinction that Mr. Bilanovic relies upon is no longer accepted in modern extradition law. Finally, and most basically, these arguments invite the court to overrule the judgment of the Department of State on this political question. The conclusion of the Department of State is well supported and is entitled to deference by the courts. The "question whether power remains in a foreign state to carry out its treaty obligations is in its nature political and not judicial, and . . . the courts ought not to interfere with the conclusions of the political department in that regard." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288, 22 S.Ct. 484, 46 L. Ed. 534 (1902) (considering the validity of the 1852 Extradition Treaty between the U.S. and Prussia).[505]

The determination of whether a treaty applies by state succession is to be made by the executive branch because it derives from the Constitution's Article II, § 2, which confers the treaty-making power to the president with the "Advice and Consent of the Senate."[506] The same rule applies for when a treaty is terminated.[507] The rule also applies with respect to determining whether a treaty is still in force.[508] The scope of judicial inquiry is therefore limited to the position of the executive branch on these questions, but it does not exclude evidence of the foreign government's position on the same questions. The Ninth Circuit reaffirmed the rule while allowing limited judicial inquiry in Then v. Melendez.[509]

Probably the most exhaustive inquiry into an extradition treaty question was made in the question of Lui King-Hong, also known as Jerry Lui, whose extradition was sought by Hong Kong, a former Crown Colony of the United Kingdom before it reverted to Chinese control. The extradition was made by Hong Kong pursuant to two bilateral treaties, the primary one entered into by and between the United States and the United Kingdom in 1972[510] and the supplemental treaty applicable to Hong Kong[511] and entered into by and between the United States and the United Kingdom in 1984. That supplemental treaty was annexed to the 1984 Hong Kong reversion treaty between the United Kingdom and China whereby Hong Kong was set to revert to Chinese sovereignty on July 1, 1997. The First Circuit reviewed this case twice and found the 1984 supplemental treaty of extradition to be valid notwithstanding the reversion treaty between the United Kingdom and China to which it was appended even though the United States was not a party to that treaty and could not therefore insist that China observes its terms. The issue was whether Hong Kong could surrender Lui to the mainland Chinese authorities after Hong Kong reverted to Chinese control, even though the reversion treaty forbade it.[512]

---

505 Id. at *20–22.

506 United States v. ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 57 S.Ct. 100 (1936); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 22 S.Ct. 484 (1902).

507 In re Extradition of Tuttle, 966 F.2d 1316 (9th Cir. 1992).

508 Ivanceinc v. Artukonic, 211 F.2d 565 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 348 U.S. 818, 75 S.Ct. 28 (1954).

509 Then v. Melendez, 92 F.3d 851 (9th Cir. 1996). See also Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679 (9th Cir. 1983); Duran v. United States, 36 F. Supp. 2d 622 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

510 U.S.–U.K. Extradition Treaty, 28 U.S.T. 227 (1972).

511 Supplemental Treaty U.S.–Hong Kong, T.I.A.S. No. 12050 (1984).

512 United States v. Lui King-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 5225); United States. v Lui King-Hong (1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 7587). See also Wang v. Masaitis, 416 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2005), affirming 316 F. Supp. 2d 891 (C.D. Cal. 2004); United States v. Sai-Wah, 270 F. Supp. 2d 748, 749–750 (W.D.N.C. 2003) (denying motion to dismiss, which was based on alleged invalidity of U.S.–Hong Kong Extradition treaty); In re Extradition of Coe, 261 F. Supp. 2d 1203 (C.D. Cal. 2003); Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419, 426 (5th Cir. 1999), cert. denied 528 U.S. 1135 (2000); Cheung v. United States, 213 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2000).

5.5.3. War

There are widely divergent views in international law regarding war's effect on treaty obligations, ranging from the view that war totally abrogates a treaty to the view that it has no effect on treaty enforcement. Early writers asserted that war ipso facto abrogated all treaties between the warring parties.[513] The contemporary view is that whether treaty provisions are annulled by war depends upon the provisions' extrinsic character.[514] It is obvious that war must extinguish certain treaties because of their very nature, such as those of friendship and alliance, whereas it only suspends rather than abrogates treaties contemplating a permanent arrangement of rights.[515]

Section 336 of the Restatement does allow termination following a fundamental change in circumstances in the relationship of the parties. Section 336 states:

> A fundamental change of circumstances that has occurred with regard to those existing at the time of the conclusion of an international agreement, and which was not foreseen by the parties, may generally be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from the agreement but only if
>
> (a) the existence of those circumstances constituted an essential basis of the consent of the parties to be bound by the agreement; and

---

513 See James J. Lenoir, The Effect of War on Bilateral Treaties, with Special Reference to Reciprocal Inheritance Treaty Provisions, 34 Geo. L.J. 129 (1946) (containing, in footnote 9, citations to the views of the earlier writers upon this question). The reasoning in support of this view is expressed in Emmerich de Vattel, The Law of Nations, sec. 175 at 877 (trans. 1758, C. Fenwick, 1916):

> Conventions and treaties are broken and annulled when war breaks out between the transacting parties, either because such agreements imply a state of peace, or because each party, having a right to deprive the enemy of his property, may take from him such rights as have been given him by treaties.

514 In Karnuth v. United States, 279 U.S. 231 (1929), the Supreme Court stated: "There seems to be a fairly common agreement that, at least, the following treaty obligations remain in force: stipulations in respect of what shall be done in a state of war; treaties of cession, boundary, and the like; provisions giving the right to citizens or subjects of one of the high contracting powers to continue to hold and transmit land in the territory of the other; and, generally, provisions which represent completed acts. On the other hand, treaties of amity, of alliance, and the like, having a political character, the object of which is to promote relations of harmony between nation and nation, are generally regarded as belonging to the class of treaty stipulations that are absolutely annulled by war." 279 U.S. 231, 236–237 (1929).

515 In Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts v. New Haven, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat) 464 (1823), the Supreme Court declared:

> But we are not inclined to admit the doctrine urged at the bar, that treaties become extinguished, ipso facto, by war between the two governments, unless they should be revived by an express or implied renewal on the return of peace. Whatever may be the latitude of doctrine laid down by elementary writers on the law of nations, declaring in general terms, in relation to this subject, we are satisfied, that the doctrine contended for is not universally true. There may be treaties of such a nature as to their object and import, as that war will put an end to them; but where treaties contemplate a permanent arrangement of territorial, and other national rights, or which in their terms are meant to provide for the event of an intervening war, it would be against every principle of just interpretation, to hold them extinguished by the event of war. If such were the law, even the treaty of 1783, so far as it fixed our limits, and acknowledged our independence, would be gone, and we should have had again to struggle for both upon revolutionary principles. Such a construction was never asserted, and would be so monstrous as to supersede all reasoning. We think, therefore, that treaties stipulating for permanent rights, and general arrangements, and professing to aim at perpetuity, and to deal with the case of war as well as of peace, do not cease on the occurrence of war, but are, at most, only suspended while it lasts; and unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made, they revive in their operation at the return of peace.

21 U.S. (8 Wheat). See generally 1 Moore, Extradition supra note 2, at 799.

> (b) the effect of the change is radically to transform the extent of obligations still to be performed under the agreement.

Authorization to suspend or terminate an agreement is part of the powers of the president. Section 339 states:

> Under the law of the United States, the President has the power
>
> (a) to suspend or terminate an agreement in accordance with its terms;
>
> (b) to make the determination that would justify the U.S. in terminating or suspending an agreement because of its violation by another party or because of supervening events, and to proceed to terminate or suspend the agreement on behalf of the U.S.; or
>
> (c) to elect in a particular case not to suspend or terminate an agreement.

United States courts have determined that extradition treaties are only suspended rather than abrogated by war. In Argento v. Horn,[516] for example, Italy requested the return of an individual who had been convicted in absentia and sentenced to life imprisonment in Italy in 1931 for a murder committed there in 1922. The relator challenged his extradition on the grounds that, despite the purported "revival" of the United States' extradition treaty with Italy pursuant to the peace treaty of 1947, the treaty had been abrogated by the outbreak of war and could be replaced only by a new treaty. Therefore, the relator argued, there was no legal authority for his extradition.

The court avoided the theoretical question by basing its decision on a consideration of the "background of the actual conduct of the two nations involved, acting through the political branches of their governments."[517] The court found that in light of the peace treaty's provision inviting notification of revival of treaties, the notification by the Department of State of its intention to revive the treaty, and the subsequent conduct of the parties evidencing an understanding that the treaty was in force, the treaty had been merely suspended during the war, not abrogated by it.[518]

A subsequent landmark decision on the effect of war on extradition treaties is In re Extradition of D'Amico.[519] On the application of the Republic of Italy, extradition proceedings were begun against the relator before the U.S. Commissioner for the Southern District of New York. The Commissioner found that the relator was the same Vito D'Amico who had been convicted in absentia in Italy in 1952 for robbery and kidnapping committed in Italy on or about April 15, 1946, and that there was probable cause to believe that D'Amico had committed the crime charged. The Commissioner therefore committed D'Amico to custody pending surrender to the Republic of Italy. D'Amico petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, contending: (1) that the convention between the United States and the Kingdom of Italy of 1868 for the surrender of criminals was abrogated by the outbreak of war between the parties in 1942, and was not validly revived by the notification of the United States to Italy on February 6, 1948; (2) that the revival of the Treaty of 1868 did not make it applicable retroactively to crimes committed during the existence of a state of war between the parties; and (3) that the offense was not committed in a territory subject to the jurisdiction of the demanding state because it was committed while the Italian government was subject to Allied control.[520] In discharging the 516 Argento v. Horn, 241 F.2d 258 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818 (1957).

---

517 Id. at 262.

518 Id. at 263. See also Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503 (1947); Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 51 (1960); In re Extradition of Ernst, 1998 WL 395267 (S.D.N.Y., July 14, 1998); In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y., Aug. 19, 1996); United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Mainero v. Gregg, 164 F.3d 1199, 99 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 200 (9th Cir. 1990) (No. 98-55069).

519 In re Extradition of D'Amico, 177 F. Supp. 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1959).

520 Id. at 650.

writ of habeas corpus and remanding D'Amico to the custody of the U.S. marshal, the court concluded that the extradition treaty was merely suspended by the outbreak of war between the parties and was revived by the formal cessation of hostilities. In effect, the court held that an extradition treaty could operate retroactively to apply to offenses committed while the treaty was suspended.[521] It would seem that this decision violates the principle nulla poena sine lege nullum crimen sine lege.[522]

The U.S. practice in connection with its use of force in other countries has, since World War II, been to not seek a congressional "Declaration of War" as required by the Constitution. Instead the various administrations have used other legal bases to accomplish the same objective.[523]

6. The Duty to Extradite and to Refrain from Unlawful Means of Surrender

6.1. The Duty to Extradite

As discussed in this chapter, the United States has a duty to extradite based on certain multilateral treaty obligations, especially with respect to international crimes, and more particularly jus cogens international crimes.[524] The United States is also obligated under its bilateral treaties. Under Title 18 § 3183 of the U.S. Code, the United States may extradite persons within its territory only pursuant to an extradition treaty between the United States and the state requesting extradition. Under § 3184, this treaty must be in force when the request for extradition is made.[525] Read in conjunction, these two sections permit surrender of an accused only in accordance with the applicable treaty in force. Although these provisions set forth the requirements to permit the United States to extradite an individual within its territory, they do not indicate whether satisfaction of these requirements creates a duty to extradite.

United States' jurisprudence reflects the view that an extradition treaty does not per se create an obligation to extradite, but a different view exists as to jus cogens international crimes as discussed in Chapter I, Section 3.3. The first view is founded on the notion that the state's right to protect its sovereignty and its freedom to provide asylum to whomever it chooses may override the state's obligation under the treaty.[526] It is for this reason that the secretary of state, exercising executive discretion through delegation of this authority by the president, may refuse to 521 In support of this view, the court stated, in United States ex rel. Oppenheim v. Hecht: "The status of relations between the demanding nation and the asylum nation at the time of the commission of the offense for which extradition is sought has never been deemed so critical, as we read the cases bearing on this issue; rather it is the status at the time of the demand that is determinative of whether or not extradition will be allowed." 16 F.2d. 955, 956 (2d. Cir. 1927).

---

522 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law 25–26 (1978).

523 G.A. Res. 438, U.N. GAOR, 5th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/1435 (Oct. 7, 1950) (War in Korea); Joint Congressional Resolution, "Gulf of Tonkin Resolution," H.J. RES. 1145 (Aug. 7 1964) (Vietnam War); The War Powers Act of 1973, Pub. L. 93-148, 93rd Congress, H. J. Res. 542 (Nov. 7, 1973) (Concerning the War Powers of Congress and the President); U.N. Sec. Council Res. 678 (Concerning the Implementation of Security Council Resolution 660), S.C. res. 678, 45 U.N. SCOR at 27, U.N. Doc. S/RES/678 (1991); U.N. Security Council Res. 1441 (Iraq disarmament) (based on Resolution 660, Resolution 661, Resolution 678, Resolution 686, Resolution 687, Resolution 688, Resolution 707, Resolution 715, Resolution 986, and Resolution 1284); Authorization for Use of Military Force against Iraq Resolution of 2002, Pub. L. 107-243, 116 Stat. 1497-1502 (Oct. 16, 2002); Security Council Res. 1373 para. 3(f) (2001); Security Council Res. 1526, para. 1 (2004).

524 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.

525 See United States ex rel. Donnelly v. Mulligan, 74 F.2d 220, 221 (2d Cir. 1934). See also 1 Oppenheim, supra note 423, at § 327.

526 See 1 Oppenheim, supra note 423, at 800–801.

extradite a relator despite a judicial determination that extradition would be compatible with the terms of the applicable treaty.[527]

The United States is of the view that executive discretion negates any duty to extradite under treaty obligations, which may be in contradiction to international law. According to the doctrine of state responsibility, an internationally wrongful act of a state exists when:

> (a) Conduct consisting of an act or omission is attributable to the State under international law; and
>
> (b) That conduct constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the State.[528]

The United States' treaty commitments are binding international obligations.[529] Under these treaties, the United States is obligated to extradite in accordance with the treaties' terms and conditions those persons who have been charged with or convicted of offenses enumerated in the treaties. The United States' practice of allowing executive discretion to override treaty obligations, therefore, may be in violation of its international duty.

Thus, the United States' view of the permissible scope of executive discretion conflicts with the obligations of the nation to satisfy its obligations in good faith. In addition, this doctrine contradicts the emerging customary international law principle of aut dedere aut judicare,[530] whereby a state's duty to extradite in the absence of prosecution cannot be subject to executive discretion.[531] Furthermore, this duty to extradite is present in international criminal law conventions.[532] The United States has faced demands from Venezuelan and Cuban officials to try or prosecute a former CIA operative wanted by Venezuela in connection with the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner.[533] However, despite its noncompliance with the Venezuelan extradition request, the United States has called on Panama to extradite a Panamanian accused of murdering U.S. soldiers despite the fact that the individual had been tried in Panamanian courts for the same offense.[534] Even more questionable is the U.S. government's refusal to honor Italian and German extradition requests for CIA operatives alleged to have been involved in the kidnapping of a radical Muslim cleric in Milan and a German citizen in Macedonia.[535] The failure to comply with the principle of aut dedere aut judicare may adversely affect the willingness of other states to cooperate with the United States in counterterrorism and other sensitive matters of international concern.

The argument that the principle aut dedere aut judicare (discussed in Chapter I, Section 3) is applicable in the United States is founded on the notion that the U.S. Constitution recognizes

---

527 See Ch. IX, Sec. 2.

528 See generally The Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its 53rd Session, April 23–Aug. 10, 2001, U.N. GAOR, 53 Sess., Supp. (No. 10), A/49/10 (1994); Ian Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility (1983); International Law of State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1983); Draft Articles on State Responsibility, 1984 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 259.

529 See Statute of International Court of Justice, art. 38, 59 Stat. 1055 (1945), T.S. No. 993.

530 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.

531 See Ch. I, Sec. 3. See also Appendix I.

532 Id.

533 See Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Court Frees Alleged Anti-Castro Terrorist as CARICOM Calls for Prosecution, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 262–263 (July 2007).

534 See Bruce Zagaris, Election of Panamanian Accused of Murdering U.S. Soldiers Clouds Prospects for Ratification of FTA, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 419–420 (Nov. 2007).

535 See Bruce Zagaris, State Department Legal Adviser Says U.S. Will Not Extradite CIA Defendants to Italy, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 181–182 (May 2007).

customary international law.[536] Indeed, customary international law is a source of law under the Constitution, which U.S. courts have followed and applied.[537]

Mindful of the difficulties of extradition, particularly in connection with limitations established by treaty or customary international law, such as the principle of specialty,[538] and the difficulties in interpreting diplomatic assurances,[539] the U.S. government has sought ways of avoiding extradition as a formal process. On occasion, it has engaged in abduction and unlawful seizure of persons as an alternative to extradition,[540] only to find itself facing legal difficulties before U.S. courts and internationally. It has trended toward seeking disguised means, such as the use of immigration techniques such as deportation and expulsion.[541]

On occasion, it has sought to obtain extradition from a requested state without labeling it a request for "extradition," but using such terms as "return" or "surrender" in order to create a constructive ambiguity with the authorities of the requested state but also eventually with U.S. courts if the person is in fact surrendered to the United States.

The use of such ambiguous terms that do not include "extradition" can only be interpreted by the requested state as an extradition request whenever there is no bilateral treaty and national law provides a basis for extradition. The U.S. government can then argue in U.S. courts that it did not seek the surrendered person by means of extradition because no extradition treaty existed, even though the surrender occurred on the basis of the requested state's national extradition law. The purpose of such deceptive approaches is to avoid the application of the principle of specialty.[542] That means that the U.S. prosecuting authority can amend the original indictment on which extradition was sought and add charges, which if known to the requested state may not have been included in the extradition order if they did not satisfy the requirement of double criminality in the requested state.[543] Such a practice could not have been deemed legally valid if the surrender is characterized as an extradition based on comity.

The legal characterization of any form of surrender based on the national extradition law of the requested state can be based on either reciprocity if the United States provides such an undertaking, or on the basis of comity if it is unilateral.

No matter whether extradition is obtained on the basis of a multilateral treaty, bilateral treaty, ad hoc, or specific reciprocity agreement, general reciprocity undertaking, the national legislation of the requested state either based on reciprocity or comity, or simply on the basis of 536 See The Paquette Habana, 175 U.S. 677 (1900); Filartiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980); Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (construing the Alien Tort Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350). See also the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA) (limiting the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) 28 U.S.C. § 1630). For a discussion of the applicability of customary international law, see Jordan J. Paust, After Alvarez-Machain: Abduction, Standing, Denials of Justice, and Unaddressed Human Rights Claims, 67 St. John's L. Rev. 551 (1993); Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law: Its Nature, Sources and Status as Law of the U.S., 12 Mich. J. Int'l L. 59 (1990); Jordan J. Paust, Rediscovering the Relationship between Congressional Power and International: Exceptions to the Last in Time Rule and the Primacy of Custom, 28 Va. J. Int'l L. 393 (1988); Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law and Human Rights Treaties Are Law of the U.S., 20 Mich. J. Int'l. L. 301 (1999); Restatement (Third), supra note 79 at §§ 102, 103, and 702; contra. Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 816 (1997).

537 Id.

538 See Ch.VII, Sec. 6.

539 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

540 See Ch. V.

541 See Ch. IV.

542 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

543 See Ch. VII, Secs. 2 and 3.

comity without a treaty or legislation if permitted under the law of the requested state, this falls within the category of "a rose by any other name is still a rose," to paraphrase Shakespeare.[544]

The contemporary practice of the United States has increasingly been, where there is no bilateral extradition treaty, to present the matter to both the requested state and to U.S. courts as being legally ambiguous in order to avoid, as stated above, the application of the principle of specialty and other limitations that may apply under customary international law and the treaty practice of the United States. Mostly, it has sought to rely on the cooperation of foreign states to secure the expulsion or deportation of the person sought.

6.2. Extraordinary Rendition and Other Forms of Extralegal Rendition[545]

Extraordinary rendition is a euphemism for the unlawful practice of abduction.[546] Other extralegal forms of seizure of persons and their transfer from one country to another by U.S. military or CIA personnel, or by their private contractor agents, are simply within the purview of the law. In some cases they are illegal under Title 10, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, or under the provisions contained in Title 18 U.S.C. on kidnapping, torture, and other crimes. Because of this subject's extensive legal ramifications, it is covered in a separate chapter.[547]

The basic legal assumption for both the practice of "extraordinary rendition" and the use of "black sites" is that if certain acts are committed outside the boundaries of the United States and the persons seized and transferred for torture are not U.S. citizens, then the acts in question are not crimes under U.S. law. Government lawyers exploited a gap in the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court that limits U.S. constitutional protections under the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments extraterritorially, particularly when those affected are non-U.S. citizens. This approach strictly construes the Constitution as providing rights applicable in the United States and perhaps abroad, but only to U.S. citizens. It does not construe the Constitution as establishing legal limitations on U.S. public agents acting no matter where.

Over the last fifty years, the Supreme Court in a number of decisions has ruled that the Constitution does not extend extraterritorially, and as a consequence that which is prohibited by the Constitution in the United States does not apply extraterritorially. The four major decisions on point are Reid v. Covert,[548] Wilson v. Girard,[549] Verdugo v. Urquidez,[550] and United States v. Alvarez-Machain.[551]

---

544 William Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (Dover Thrift Edition, 1993). A good example of this was a 2010 incident in which the United States made arrangements with Panama to expel the defendant, a U.S. citizen. The district and the circuit courts did not find the expulsion to be in violation of the extradition treaty between the United States and Panama, and also found that his deportation, even though in the direction of the United States, did not constitute a violation of the extradition treaty. See United States v. Struckman, 611 F.3d 560 (9th Cir. 2010). The court cited Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886) and Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952), cert. denied 343 U.S. 937 (1952). The court also cited United States v. Matta Ballesteros, 71 Fed. 3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995) "the manner by which a defendant is brought to trial does not affect the government's ability to try him" at 762.

545 See Ch. V.

546 See id.

547 See Ch. V, Sec. 4.

548 Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957) (addressing the non-applicability of the right to trial by jury, Sixth Amendment extraterritorially).

549 Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957).

550 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990) (on the non-applicability of the Fourth Amendment, unreasonable search and seizure extraterritorially).

551 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992) (on the recognition of valid U.S. jurisdiction over a person abducted abroad and brought by force to the United States, a position previously taken

The Supreme Court has historically been reluctant to extend constitutional rights extraterritorially and also reluctant to extend constitutional restraints on U.S. public agents extraterritorially. There are valid arguments to sustain this position, but there is also a policy argument expressed by the Second Circuit highlighted in United States v. Toscanino, namely that the Supreme Court's narrow rulings on what was essentially jurisdictional grounds left a wide door open for what several cases referred to as egregious illegal practices by U.S. public agents.[552] The Supreme Court has never directly addressed whether the Constitution limits illegal conduct by U.S. public agents outside the territory of the United States. While some argue that its position on the non-applicability of the Constitution extraterritorially is all-encompassing, others, including this writer, argue that it does not cover conduct that is illegal under U.S. law when perpetrated by U.S. public agents abroad, and when the fruits of that illegal conduct can be used in U.S. courts by a defendant. Another policy argument is the preservation of the integrity of the U.S. system by extending certain limitations to U.S. public agents abroad, whether that conduct is directed against U.S. or non-U.S. citizens.[553] The Second Circuit in Toscanino added another limitation, namely, when the U.S. public agents' conduct is egregious or that the conduct "shocks the conscience."[554] The threshold test is therefore different than when applied in the United States whenever a public agent violates a given constitutional standard (i.e., unreasonable search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment, or evidence obtained by coercion in violation of the Fifth Amendment). This was a higher threshold, but a threshold nonetheless. The Second Circuit subsequently renewed its Toscanino ruling in United States ex rel Lujan v. Gengler,[555] while other circuits also did the same or rejected the Toscanino approach in connection with forceful seizures of persons abroad and bringing them before U.S. courts.

The policies supporting the extension of constitutional limitations on U.S. public agents' conduct abroad are: the preservation of the integrity of U.S. legal processes, deterrence of public misconduct, and the continued protection of U.S. citizens irrespective of whether the violation stems from official misconduct by U.S. public agents. All three policies, however, stop short of encompassing within their reach unlawful extraterritorial conduct by U.S. public agents when the victim is not a U.S. citizen. However, these policies should cover such conduct against non-U.S. citizens whenever their evidentiary fruits are to be used in U.S. legal proceedings. Even so, there is some legal leeway for U.S. public agents—the CIA in this case—to kidnap non-U.S. citizens abroad, and to forcefully transfer them to another state that would engage in acts of torture against them. It cannot be assumed that the Supreme Court would extend constitutional limitations abroad when the evidence obtained is not going to be used in U.S. courts.[556] That is something for Congress to legislate or for the president to take action upon by executive order.

---

in Ker v. Illinois, 11 9 U.S. 436 (1886) and Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952)). For kidnapping as a substitute to lawful extradition, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition in U.S. Law and Practice 273–375 (5th ed.2007). But see United States v. Alvarez-Machain, rejecting the defendant's claim that the extradition treaty in effect between the United States and Mexico prohibited the United States from forcibly abducting a fugitive within the borders of Mexico. The Supreme Court, however, subsequently upheld Alvarez-Machain's right to file an action under the Alien Tort Claims Act, and to obtain damages for the kidnapping. See Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004).

552 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974).

553 This writer argued before the Fifth Circuit in Escabedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980) that on the basis of public policy, evidence secured by torture in Mexico should not be allowed in U.S. courts, in that torture is inherently offensive to U.S. public policy and to the Constitution. The Fifth Circuit rejected the argument, but this was before the United States ratified the Convention against Torture (CAT).

554 Toscanino, 500 F.2d at 273, citing Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952).

555 United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 550 F.2d 62 (2d Cir. 1975).

556 See supra note 544.

The use of "black sites" raises a particular issue with respect to the extraterritorial application of the Constitution, insofar as those sites are effectively under U.S. control. They are no different than U.S. military bases in foreign countries. As a rule, the United States negotiates a SOFA with the country in which it has military bases in order to preserve U.S. jurisdiction over the personnel on that base. However, in the case of the "black sites" there were no SOFA agreements, or for that matter any other legitimate agreements between the United States and the sovereign state within which these "black sites" were located. They were there because the CIA had developed a secret cooperation arrangement with the local intelligence services, allowing it to use a certain location as a facility to secretly interrogate persons usually illegally flown into the given country. It can therefore be said that the "black sites" are illegal facilities controlled by a foreign government, namely, the United States in the country in which they are located. The question is therefore one of attribution and agency relationship. The CIA is an agency of the U.S. government and its operatives are U.S. agents for purposes of any conduct abroad that they engage in. In other words, if a CIA agent violates the laws of another country, the civil responsibility is attributed to the United States; thus a foreign state that has been negatively affected by the work of U.S. public agents may have a claim against the U.S. government. This issue was raised before the International Court of Justice in the Case Concerning the Military and Paramilitary Activities In and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), where the Court ruled against the United States for the actions of paramilitary organization of the Contras, as well as covert CIA actions against Nicaragua.[557] Should "black sites" be considered foreign territory under the control of the United States, the Constitution would apply. The Supreme Court in a recent case involving Iraq probably anticipated this situation and ruled that in Iraq, U.S. military bases are not considered U.S. territory, and therefore the Constitution does not extend to them.[558] Nevertheless, it is valid to raise the question, particularly because the Supreme Court is likely to rule differently with respect to U.S. military bases in Iraq in accordance with the U.S.–Iraq SOFA agreement.[559]

Against this legal backdrop, the CIA felt legally free from constitutional restraints. However, although this gap arises under U.S. constitutional law, it does not arise under the Convention against Torture and All Forms of Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), which applies to the public officials of state parties, without geographic limitation. The policy underpinning the CAT is not jurisdictional, but the universal prohibition of torture. This was evidenced in the Charles Taylor, Jr. case in which the extraterritorial reach of the 1994 Torture Convention Implementation Act was applied. Taylor, an American citizen and son of the infamous Liberian dictator who was tried before the Special Court for Sierra Leone in The Hague for crimes against humanity, was sentenced to 147 years in prison for acts of torture committed in Liberia.[560] In a decision overruling the defendant's petition to dismiss, Federal District Judge Cecilia M. Altonaga wrote

> As to Defendant's second argument, that the Torture Act is presumed not to reach conduct that occurred extraterritorially, the argument finds no support from the plain words used in the statute, the starting and ending point here for any inquiry into its extraterritorial reach. Generally, courts are to presume that legislation of Congress is meant to apply only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. See E.E.O.C. v. Arabian American Oil Co., 499 U.S. 244, 248,

---

557 Case Concerning the Military and Paramilitary Activities In and Against Nicaragua (Nicar. v. U.S.), 1986 I.C.J. 14 (June 27).

558 See Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674, 684 (2008).

559 Agreement Between the United States of America and the Republic of Iraq on the Withdrawal of United States Forces from Iraq and the Organization of Their Activities during Their Temporary Presence in Iraq ("Iraq SOFA") (Dec. 14, 2008). See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Status of U.S. Forces in Iraq from 2003–2008, 11 Chicago J. Int'l L. 1 (2010).

560 See Elizabeth Dickinson, Chuckie Taylor Sentenced to 97 Years, Foreign Policy, Jan. 9, 2009.

> 111 S. Ct. 1227, 113 L. Ed. 2d 274 (1991). That presumption, however, ceases to exist where a contrary intent appears. Id.; see also Foley Bros. v. Filardo, 336 U.S. 281, 285, 69 S. Ct. 575, 93 L. Ed. 680 (1949) (presumption that "legislation . . . is meant to apply within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States" may be invoked "unless a contrary intent appears").[561]

It should be noted that extraterritorial legislation for crimes in addition to torture exist in connection with genocide,[562] child soldiers,[563] and the human rights accountability act,[564] as well as under a draft statute presently under review by Congress on trafficking in persons[565] and crimes against humanity.[566] President Bush signed all three existing legislations. The fact that these acts are committed outside the United States does not bar prosecution in the United States.

"Extraordinary rendition" occurs where a citizen is kidnapped or illegally arrested and then transferred to the authorities of another state, where he or she may be tortured.[567] The CIA employs this technique when it kidnaps, sequesters, and transfers non-U.S. nationals and delivers them to governments whose secret services engage in torture in order to obtain information of interest to the CIA.[568] Such an act by U.S. agents is in violation of the CAT, Article 3, which states:

> 1. No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.
>
> 2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.[569]

Thus, state-parties cannot extradite or surrender by other means such as "extraordinary rendition" a person to another state that is known or reasonably believed to subject persons to

---

561 United States v. Charles Emmanuel, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48510 (S.D. Fla. July 5, 2007)

562 Genocide Accountability Act of 2007, Pub. L. 110-151 § 1 (Dec. 21, 2007), 121 Stat. 1821, amending Title 18 U.S.C. § 1091.

563 Child Soldiers Accountability Act of 2008, Pub. L. 110-340 (Oct. 3, 2008).

564 Human Rights Enforcement Act of 2009, Pub. L. 111-122 (Dec. 22, 2009). This legislation established a section within the Criminal Division of the DOJ to enforce human rights laws, and to make technical and conforming amendments to criminal and immigration laws pertaining to human rights violations.

565 Trafficking in Persons Accountability Act of 2008, introduced by Sen. Richard Durbin in June 2007, and passed the Senate in Oct. 2008, at which time it was referred to the House Judiciary Committee for review.

566 Crimes Against Humanity Act of 2009, introduced by Sen. Richard Durbin in June 2009 and referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

567 See Ch. V, Sec. 4.

568 See Howard Bell, Bush, The Detainees, and the Constitution: The Battle over Presidential Power in the War on Terror 78 (2007). "[A]n April 2006 report issued by the European Parliament concluded that Air CIA had flown 1,000 undeclared flights over European territory since 2001." "Many times these planes stopped to pick up terrorism suspects who had been kidnapped to take them to countries that use torture." See also Dan Bilefsky, European Inquiry Says C.I.A. Flew 1,000 Flights in Secret, N.Y. Times, Apr. 27, 2006; Stephen Grey, CIA Prisoners "Tortured" in Arab Jails, BBC News, Feb. 8, 2005 (providing comments by Michael Scheuer, a twenty-two–year veteran of the CIA, on the rendition practices of the CIA). In February 2006, the House International Relations Committee of Congress defeated three resolutions that would have required investigations into these practices. James Risen, State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration (2006).

569 Convention against Torture, Dec. 10, 1984, 1465 U.N.T.S. 85 at art. 3.

torture. The U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition" is therefore a violation of the CAT.[570] Prior to the National Defense Authorization Act for 2005 (the McCain Amendment), the CAT could be interpreted as applying only to acts committed outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, thus allowing acts of extradition or kidnapping to fall outside the jurisdiction of the CAT if they were initiated at a U.S. facility abroad. However, pursuant to Section 1089 of the McCain Amendment, the "territorial jurisdiction" of the United States was limited to territories and possessions of the United States; thus the CAT then applied to acts that occur at U.S. facilities. Because Title 18 § 2340A also criminalizes conspiracies to commit torture outside the United States, it arguably could also apply in situations where a U.S. national conspired to transfer an individual outside U.S. territory so that he/she might be tortured.[571] However, the USA PATRIOT Act once again expanded the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States to include:

> premises of any diplomatic, consular, military, or other United States government missions or entities in foreign states, including the buildings, part of the buildings, and land appurtenant or ancillary thereto, or used for the purposes of these missions or entities, irrespective of ownership.[572]

This means that all the locations mentioned above can be deemed part of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and, thus, these locations are no longer outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, rendering the CAT provisions inapplicable.[573]

In addition to obligations under the CAT, "extraordinary rendition" is considered a violation of customary international law, as reflected in both the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance[574] and the Inter-American Convention on the Forced Disappearance of Persons,[575] even though the United States has not acceded to either one of these conventions. The International Convention defines forced disappearance as:

> . . . the arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorization, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment

---

570 It could be argued that "extraordinary rendition" of detainees to countries in which torture is regularly practiced " . . . Does not violate U.S. obligations under the CAT because, at the time of ratification, the U.S. appended an understanding that 'substantial grounds' under Article 3(1) means that it is 'more likely than not' that a person would be tortured. Yet, because the 'more likely than not' standard is framed as an 'understanding' as opposed to a 'reservation' to the torture convention, presumably it was not intended to actually modify US obligations under the treaty." Leila Sadat, Extraordinary Rendition, Torture and Other Nightmares from the War on Terror, 75 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 1200, 1221 (2007). Sadat goes on to note that " . . . [A]ll treaties must be interpreted in accordance with their 'object and purpose,' and an 'understanding' that was inconsistent with that object and purpose would presumably be tantamount to an illegal reservation to the treaty in question. Were an 'actual knowledge' standard to be read into the CAT, it would contravene the plain language of the treaty and undermine its broad, humanitarian purpose . . . " Id. at 1221–1222.

571 See John Garcia, CRS Report RL32438, UN Convention against Torture (CAT): Overview and Application to Interrogation Techniques (Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, Jan. 25, 2006).

572 Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism (USA PATRIOT) Act of 2001, Pub. L. No. 107-56, § 804, 115 Stat. 272, 377 (2001) (codified at 18 U.S.C.A. § 7(9)(A) (2001)).

573 Id.

574 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance, GA Res. 61/177, U.N. Doc. A/Res/61/177 (Dec. 20, 2006).

575 Inter-American Convention on the Forced Disappearance of Persons, June 9, 1994, 33 I.L.M. 1529 (1994).

> of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which place such a person outside the protection of the law.[576]

The Inter-American Convention defines forced disappearance as:

> the act of depriving a person or persons of his or their freedom, in whatever way, perpetrated by agents of the state or by persons or groups acting with the authorization, support, or acquiescence of the state, followed by an absence of information or a refusal to acknowledge that deprivation of freedom or to give information on the whereabouts of that person thereby impeding his or her recourse to the applicable legal remedies and procedural guarantees.[577]

Although the United States is not a signatory to the CAT, the prohibitions contained therein have long been considered part of customary international law.[578] The CAT, like the Inter-American Convention, does not provide for any exceptions to the prohibition on kidnappings, nor does it allow states to claim any "exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification for enforced disappearance."[579] The CAT also requires an up-to-date register of all persons held at every place of detention and that the register be available to family members and legal counsel of the detainees.[580]

The CAT is a reflection of the evolution of international reactions against this type of practice in tyrannical regimes, particularly as they have been practiced in Latin America and in some Asian and African countries. These types of regimes have engaged what is euphemistically referred to as making a person "disappear," which simply means to assassinate him/her. International human rights law has been unable for decades to bring a stop to these practices, and that is why they have been criminalized, as is the case with other persistent human rights violations whose elimination has proven to be difficult by non-criminal means, such as torture. Enforced disappearance usually involves torture, and it ultimately results in death. It also inflicts psychological pain and suffering on the members of the family of the victim, as well as members of the community. For obvious reasons, the United States has elected not to sign on to the International Convention, but as the prohibition of its practices becomes more recognized in customary international law, it will become binding upon the United States, notwithstanding its decision not to accede.

Kidnapping and transferring of persons from one country to another, even though occurring outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, is almost always likely to occur within the territorial jurisdiction of another state. As kidnapping is a crime under the laws of all countries of the world, and as many countries have ratified the CAT or have provisions within their criminal laws criminalizing torture, actions by CIA operatives and private contractors would constitute a crime under the laws of the state where the kidnapping or torture took place.[581]

---

576 International Convention, supra note 567, at Art. II.

577 Inter-American Convention, supra note 568, at Art. II.

578 What constitutes customary international law and how it is recognized as applicable to the United States is a subject of debate among academics reflecting not only different perspectives on the relationship between international law and U.S. law, but also ideological perspectives. For a more expansive view, see Jordan J. Paust, Customary International Law and Human Rights Treaties Are Law of the United States, 20 Mich. J. Int'l L. 301 (1999). For a contrary position, see Curtis Bradley & Jack Goldsmith, Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position, 110 Harv. L.R. 815 (1997).

579 International Convention, supra note 567, at Art. 1.

580 Id. at Art. 17.

581 For example, the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, C.E.T.S. no. 126, entered into force Feb. 1, 1989.

As Professor Jordan Paust reminds us, > the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States recognizes, "causing the disappearance of individuals" is absolutely prohibited under international law (Restatement, § 702c); constitutes a violation of the customary human rights of the persons who disappear (Restatement § 702, cmnts a, c, n); and constitutes a violation of a peremptory prohibition jus cogens (Restatement, cmnt n).[582] The U.S. Army also recognizes that "causing the disappearance of individuals" is a violation of customary international law.[583]

The practice of summary, arbitrary, and extrajudicial executions is of the same nature as enforced disappearance and torture.[584] It involves illegal conduct by public agents resulting in the disappearance and subsequent assassination of an individual based exclusively on the abuse of power of the executive branch. For all practical purposes, enforced disappearance, summary and extrajudicial executions, and torture resulting in death are all on the same continuum, the distinctions between them having more to do with the manner in which the unlawful conduct is carried out. Abusive governments and those that have on occasion resorted to these practices have resisted their criminalization, for example, the elaboration of the CAT, which was consistently opposed by a number of major governments. Although the United States was supportive of the CAT, as mentioned above it has been opposed to the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance, as well as the counterpart Inter-American Convention, and has consistently blocked efforts within the United Nations for the development of a convention against summary, arbitrary, and extrajudicial executions.

6.3. The Problems of Enforcing the Principle of Specialty and Assurances in Light of Governmental Interests[585]

The U.S. government has engaged in a number of diplomatic practices in connection with the surrender of individuals whose return it seeks from foreign countries, but by means other than formal extradition.[586] One of these approaches has been for the U.S. government to encourage foreign states to use their immigration laws or other administrative proceedings to expel or deport persons, and more particularly U.S. citizens, instead of initiating formal extradition proceedings. Under this approach, the United States is free from any limitations under the principle of specialty, as they cannot be imposed by the requested state under this approach, and that essentially means that the U.S. government can upon the return of the surrendered person charge him/her with any crimes it deems appropriate without the limitations that would otherwise be imposed by the principle of speciality.[587] This process frequently begins with the transmission of a diplomatic note from the U.S. embassy to the government of the requested state, in which the surrender of the sought person is requested. These diplomatic notes studiously avoid using the term "extradition" or any other language that might suggest or require the use of traditional extradition mechanisms.

Depending upon the country in question, the requested state may respond to the diplomatic note by using either its extradition procedures or its immigration and deportation procedures.

---

582 Jordan J. Paust, Beyond the Law: The Bush Administration's Unlawful Responses in the "War" on Terror 36–38 (2007).

583 See, e.g., U.S. Dep't of Army, Operational Law Handbook 39–40 (2003).

584 See Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary, and Summary Executions, E.S.C. Res. 1989/65, U.N. ESCOR Supp. No. 1, at 300, U.N. Doc. E/1989/89 (1989); United Nations Manual on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, U.N. Doc. E/ST/CSDHA/.12 (1991).

585 See also Ch. VII, Sec. 6.11 and Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

586 See Ch. IV.

587 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

The requested state may on its own elect to rely on its extradition procedures to effectuate the surrender of the person to the United States, despite the U.S. government's attempt to use non-extradition procedures. In these cases the surrender is still an extradition, irrespective of the U.S. government's characterization of the process as being different, namely an immigration or deportation procedure. If the requested state uses its national extradition laws to surrender a person, extradition is the only proper legal characterization of the surrender, and the U.S. government should act in good faith to recognize this legal characterization and not misrepresent before U.S. courts the procedure undertaken by the requested state. The operative question is not the label the U.S. government gives to the surrender, but rather the actual procedure used by the requested state. In other words, the manipulation of the formal name for the procedure does not eviscerate the process of its essential legal characteristic and properties, with all that this entails for the relator in U.S. courts. If, on the other hand, the requested state uses its immigration laws to expel or deport a person, then the characterization cannot be extradition, and the protections and procedures afforded him/her under the extradition regime cannot be pled in U.S. courts. But if the legal bases in the requested state are its extradition laws, then the customary international law of extradition applies in accordance with comity, and that is binding upon the United States.

The essential difference between extradition, irrespective of whether the legal basis is a multilateral or bilateral treaty, or national legislation, and expulsion and deportation is that U.S. courts are bound by the principle of specialty in extradition matters. The principle of specialty limits possible charges against the relator by establishing limits on the requesting state, and that means that the person cannot be prosecuted for a crime other than that for which he/she was surrendered.[588]

Where the requested state includes the specific charges for which extradition was granted in its judicial or administrative extradition order, U.S. courts will be bound under the principle of specialty to limit prosecution to that which is specified. If there is no clear specification of the charges for which extradition was granted the U.S. courts will have to rely on the charges contained in the request made by the U.S. government to the surrendering state. In so doing, U.S. courts will have to ensure that these charges are not subsequently enlarged to include other crimes, even though related to the original crime charged, if this addition does not satisfy dual criminality as it would be applied in the requested state. In other words, U.S. courts would find themselves in the position of having to substitute themselves to the courts of the requested state in order to determine the scope of double criminality in that state. This issue, whenever it would arise, would be treated in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as a question of fact that the parties will have to prove to the court's satisfaction.[589] These situations may also be further complicated whenever the U.S. government provides assurances with respect to certain penalties or the treatment of the surrendered person. With respect to penalties, this is mostly the case with respect to the death penalty, as most states in the United States are retentionist and a number of countries have become abolitionists.[590]

---

588 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

589 See Ch. VII, Sec. 5.

590 Eighteen states in the United States have abolished the death penalty, as well as the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. It should be noted that in some of the following states the death sentences of existing death row inmates have not been commuted to life terms, as the abolition was not applicable retroactively. The abolitionist states of the United States are: Alaska, Connecticut, Hawaii, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Rhode Island, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

The death penalty is undoubtedly one of the most complicated aspects of modern extradition practice. Although the death penalty has been a historically recognized punishment when imposed by a competent court after a trial for the most serious crimes, its practice is in quick decline. International law still provides for its imposition, however. Article 6(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states:

> 2. In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime and not contrary to the provisions of the present Covenant and to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. This penalty can only be carried out pursuant to a final judgement rendered by a competent court.

The European Convention on Human Rights similarly provided for use of the death penalty—Article Article 2(1) of the European Convention states: "Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law."—but beginning in the early 1980s the Council of Europe, which is responsible for promoting human rights and the rule of law in Europe began advocating the harmonization of laws concerning the abolition of the death penalty. This included the adoption of Protocol 6 of the European Convention, which abolished the death penalty in times of peace, and Protocol 13 of 2002, which abolished the death penalty at all times.

As indicated above, the imposition of the death penalty is in decline. The global trend since the 1980s has been toward the abolition of the death penalty for all crimes, and Amnesty International—Amnesty International, Death Sentences And Executions 2012 (2012)—estimates that as of April 2013, 140 countries are either abolitionist for all crimes, abolitionist for ordinary crimes, or abolitionist in practice. Contrariwise, fifty-eight countries retain the death penalty and have executed individuals within the last decade, but only twenty-one states actually executed individuals in 2012. In practice the use of the death penalty is centered on five states, namely China, Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and the United States, with China executing more than the rest combined. In 2012, the number of documented executions per country was at least: Afghanistan: 14; Bangladesh: 1; Belarus: 3; China: unknown; Gambia: 9; India: 1; Iran: 314; Iraq: 129; Japan: 7; North Korea: 6; Pakistan: 1; Gaza (Hamas): 6; Saudia Arabia: 79; Somalia: 6; Sudan: 19; South Sudan: 5; Taiwan: 6; United Arab Emirates: 1; United States: 43; and, Yemen: 28. There are no accurate figures for China, but it appears that several thousand were executed there.

In 2012, forty-three executions were carried out in the United States, making it the only country in the Americas to do so. Belarus executed at least three individuals in 2012, making it the only country in Europe or Central Asia to have carried out an execution in 2012. Russia, although not a signatory to Protocol 13, has not executed anyone since 1997 in order to satisfy the mandatory moratorium on the practice, as required by membership in the Council of Europe. The moratorium has been extended repeatedly, including by the Russian Constitutional Court, and it seems unlikely that it will re-introduce the practice especially after the Constitutional Court ruling.

A series of decisions by the European Court of Human Rights, most notably the Kirkwood, Soering, and Einhorn cases, have made clear that European Convention member states cannot extradite individuals to retentionist states without first securing diplomatic assurances that the extradited individual will be safe from execution. In order to continue to effectuate extraditions from these European states, the United States has increasingly turned to diplomatic assurances, in effect statements from the U.S. Department of State and Department of Justice to the requested state that the relator will not be exposed to the death penalty upon extradition. In certain instances, for example the United States–Germany extradition treaty, there is an explicit obligation for the provision of assurances in any extradition involving a capital case.

Given the federal nature of the U.S. system of government, these assurances must also be made by the relevant local prosecutor; an assurance solely from the federal government would be insufficient to guarantee the security of the relator following the jurisprudence of the European Court, as the federal government cannot make a binding commitment concerning the ultimate treatment of the extradited individual at the hands of the local judiciary.

Although at present European states continue to extradite individuals to the United States with the aforementioned assurances against the application of the death penalty, there is a general trend within the practice of European states against the practice, and this is slowly apparent in their extradition practice. For instance, the Italian Constitutional Court in the Venezia case refused extradition to any country that still maintains capital punishment for certain offenses. Although at present applicants

Most of the problems presented in U.S. courts have to do with enforcing the principle of specialty, for which the relator has standing to raise in some circuits and not in others.[591] In addition, however, the situation becomes more complex whenever the U.S. government makes diplomatic assurances to the original requested state and these assurances are ambiguous, vague, or difficult to enforce.[592] The U.S. government has been less than forthcoming when making assurances to foreign states, in particular with respect to punishments, by failing to make clear to the requested state the nature of American federalism and its constitutional limits when giving assurances, which also makes it difficult for the U.S. courts that are called upon to adjudicate the meaning and scope of the assurances. It is obvious that the U.S. government's purpose is to gain as much flexibility for the prosecution as possible, and to reduce the rights of relators in U.S. courts in order to assure convictions. The problem with this approach, however, is that the credibility of the U.S. government is reduced in foreign countries, and there is a greater awareness that the U.S. government's diplomatic assurances have to be examined carefully. This frequently leads to counterproductive situations by prolonging litigation in the requested state and eventually in litigation before regional human rights institutions.

before the European Court must show a "real risk" that the death penalty would be applied, and not the "mere possibility" of such a punishment, the long-term trajectory for the practice of the European Court and members states is clearly toward an absolute ban on extradition to any state that maintains capital punishment on its statute books. As stated above, eighteen U.S. states have abolished the death penalty, and in 2012 Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Mississippi, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Texas carried out executions. If the trend toward denying extradition continues, those and other U.S. states that maintain the death penalty and continue to execute individuals will lose access to individuals in European states, a process that may result in what Professor William Schabas has called "indirect abolition."

591 See Ch. VII, Sec. 6.6.

592 See Ch. VII, Sec. 7.

Chapter III

Asylum and Extradition

Contents

1. Introduction

The practice of asylum predates extradition. Asylum is deemed part of a state's sovereign prerogative, and is a determination made historically by the head of state and later by the executive branch of government. Even though asylum was historically discretionary, the 1967 Protocol Amending the 1951 Refugee Convention[1] placed a legal obligation on states to grant asylum under certain treaty-established conditions. Some states have made the asylum process a matter for the executive branch to decide alone, while others have implemented a dual approach similar to that of extradition, whereby some determinations are made by the executive and others by quasi-judicial or judicial processes. Not infrequently a person who has sought asylum in a given state is thereafter the subject of an extradition request, thus raising potential conflicts between two different legal and administrative processes. Extradition and asylum have become competing international duties that have not been resolved or reconciled through an international convention or the development of a customary hierarchy of priorities.

1 Convention Relating to Status of Refugees, July 28, 1951, 189 U.N.T.S. 150; Convention Relating to the International Status of Refugees, Oct. 28, 1933, 159 L.N.T.S. 199; Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, Dec. 16, 1966, 606 U.N.T.S. 267, 19 U.S.T. 6223, T.I.A.S. No. 6577.

The differences between extradition and asylum account for their distinct processes and legal standards. These differences have often been used by both a person deemed a fugitive in extradition terms and the government of a requested state in order to shift the process from extradition to immigration, as discussed in Chapter IV. In most cases, a person will seek asylum in another state for valid political reasons or for fear of persecution. Sometimes such a person will have committed a crime in his state of nationality before having sought asylum in another state, leading the state of nationality to seek his/her extradition. In this situation, there is interplay between asylum granted on political persecution grounds and the "political offense exception" to extradition.[2] It is possible for a person to be declared non-extraditable from the requested state on the basis of the "political offense exception,"[3] and to thereafter seek asylum. Asylum may or may not be granted, as the two determinations are made in different legal processes using different legal standards.

After September 11, 2001, the United States passed the USA PATRIOT Act[4] and the Homeland Security Act,[5] which added new processes and legal standards to an area already burdened by procedural and normative overlaps. Neither Act remedied the problems outlined above concerning the conflicting duties established by extradition law and asylum law.

2. Historical Introduction

The word "asylum" is Latin, but it was derived from the Greek for "inviolable place."[6] The concept of inviolability extends to the asylum seeker, who by virtue of this distinction becomes as inviolable as the place so considered. Historically, asylum was a place where a state could not exercise its jurisdiction over an individual granted the inviolability of his/her person. This gave rise to the legal connection between asylum and jurisdiction.

Asylum was not practiced by all civilizations; in fact, the practice of asylum was spotty, uneven, and selectively applied, even by states that recognized it. But asylum was essentially deemed a privilege to be requested by an individual rather than a right to be claimed. Nonetheless, its application throughout the ages have been increasingly relied upon to give credence to the theory espoused by Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) and before that by Canonists including Francisco

2 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

3 Id.

4 The USA PATRIOT (Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism) Act of 2001, Title IV, Subtitle B, § 411(c), Pub. Law 107-56 (Oct. 26, 2001) (amended 2006), (amended and extended in 2011). For a detailed historical analysis of the more controversial provisions of the USA PATRIOT Act, see The USA PATRIOT Sunset Extension Act of 2011, S. Rep. 112-13 (Apr. 5, 2011).

5 Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135. For the history and development of the Department of Homeland Security, see Brief Documentary History of the Department of Homeland Security 2001–2008, available at https://www.hsdl.org/homesec/docs/dhs/nps36-050709-02.pdf&code=977f5225b6f2ab7a422428510a589137 (last visited Sept. 28, 2012).

6 R. Caillemer, Asylia, in Charles Daremberg, Dictionnaire des Antiquitiés Grecques et Romaines d'Après les Textes et les Monuments 505 (Paris, Hachette 1877).

Suárez (1548–1617) and Balthasar de Ayala (1548–1584), that asylum is an inherent human right derived from natural law.[7] Among history's recorded civilizations, only those along the Mediterranean basin recognized and practiced asylum with some degree of consistency and applied common rules. The practice flourished in that area between the fifth century B.C.E. and the sixteenth century C.E., and the practice of that time provided the philosophical bases of the contemporary notion of asylum.

In Greece, asylum was institutionalized in two forms: (1) as applicable to certain places, and (2) as applicable to certain persons.[8] The persons to whom asylum first applied were athletes who participated in the Olympic Games, Dionysian artists, and ambassadors. The contemporary corollary would be diplomatic immunity, which is a form of exemption from the application of jurisdictional authority over the person enjoying that privileged status. Currently, such persons are protected by the 1963 Vienna Conventions on the protection of diplomats, consular officers, members of the family of diplomats and consular officers, and diplomatic and consular staff.[9] 7 The human rights theory of asylum is now well-established, as several international conventions establish the right of asylum and require states to protect refugees. James C. Hathawy, Rights of Refugees under International Law (2005); Regina Germain, Aila's Asylum Primer: A Practical Guide to U.S. Asylum Law and Procedure (2005); Julie Farnam, U.S. Immigration Laws under the Threat of Terrorism (2005); Stephen Legomsky, Immigration and Refugee Law and Policy (3d ed. 2002); Stephen Legomsky, An Asylum Seeker's Bill of Rights in a Non-Utopian World, 14 Geo. Imm. L.J. 619 (2000); Ira J. Kurzban, Immigration Law Sourcebook 247 (7th ed. 2000); Karen Musalo et al., Refugee Law & Policy 57 (1997); Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Status of Refugees in International Law (1996); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law (2d ed. 1996). Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Emergent International Law Relating to Refugees: Past, Present, Future (1985); S. Prakash Sinha, An Anthropocentric View of Asylum in International Law, 10 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 78, 86 (1971); Prakash Sinha, Asylum and International Law 5–49 (1971). See also Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, International Law and Asylum as a Human Right 5 (1956).

---

8 In the Greek tragedy The Supplicant Maidens by Aeschylus in 470 B.C., fifty women, daughters of Danaiis, sought refuge in Argos and sanctuary in the temple of Zeus from Pelasgus, whose fifty sons were to marry them. The play dealt with the concepts of sanctuary, the right of asylum, the penalty for their violation, and the right of the requesting king to obtain the return of the fugitives. The popularized knowledge of these concepts in ancient Greece indicates how common and generalized it was. It came to Egypt with the Ptolemaic Dynasty, though for several centuries earlier the Temples of Osiris and Amon had been sanctuaries for fugitive slaves. In the founding of Rome, Romulus and Remus made provisions in the city for a sanctuary. See Aeschylus, The Suppliant Maidens (H. Weir Smyth trans., 1973); Thomas Bulfinch, Mythology 57–60 (1979).

9 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Apr. 24, 1963, 596 U.N.T.S. 261, T.I.A.S. No. 6820; Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, 500 U.N.T.S. 95, 23 U.S.T. 3227, T.I.A.S. No. 7502. See also Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organizations of a Universal Character, Mar. 13, 1975, A/Conf.67/16; Optional Protocol to the Convention on Special Missions Concerning the Compulsory Settlement of Disputes, Dec. 16, 1969, G.A. Res. 2530 (XXIV) annex; United Nations Draft Convention on Special Missions, Dec. 18, 1968, U.N. Doc. A/Res/2419 (XXIII); Fourth Protocol to the General Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, July 16, 1961, 544 U.N.T.S. 328; Third Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, Mar. 6, 1959, 544 U.N.T.S. 294; Second Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, Dec. 15, 1956, 261 U.N.T.S. 410; Additional Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, Nov. 6, 1952, 250 U.N.T.S. 32; General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, Oct. 2, 1949, 250 U.N.T.S. 12; Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies, Nov. 21, 1947, 33 U.N.T.S. 261, T.I.A.S. No. 521; Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Feb. 13, 1946, 21 U.S.T. 1418, T.I.A.S. No. 6900. See generally Leonard V.B. Sutton, Jurisdiction over Diplomatic Personnel and International Organizations' Personnel for Common Crimes and for Internationally Defined Crimes, in 2 A Treatise on International Criminal Law 97 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 1973).

The places of asylum were historically temples, where, for reasons discussed below, sanctuary was always recognized. The historical inviolability of a sanctuary was respected even to the extent of protecting persons sentenced to death, as long as they remained on the premises of the sanctuary.

Throughout the early history of asylum, and particularly in ecclesiastic asylum in temples, a common concept of the relationship between punishment and transcendental beliefs existed. Thus, sanctuary was not violated because the pursuers believed that they would become subject to the vengeance of the divinity whose sanctuary had been violated, and in some cases would be subject to temporal punishment by humans as well. In ancient Greece and in the Egyptian Ptolemaic Dynasty (305 B.C.E.–30 B.C.E.), the penalty for violating a sanctuary was death, and in Christian Canon Law after 409 C.E., violating a sanctuary was deemed a crimen laesae maiestatis (offenses against the sovereign).

Starting in the sixteenth century a doctrinal shift appeared in scholarly writings regarding asylum. A state or church thereafter did not grant asylum to a fugitive solely because he/she had found his/her way into a sanctuary. Instead, governmental and religious authorities considered the individual's reasons for seeking asylum. In fact, this notion had existed in Greco-Roman and Talmudic asylum law and practice, but had been limited to the practice of ecclesiastic asylum, which relied more on the sanctity of the locus than on the individual who sought its sanctuary. This emphasis was due, in no small measure, to inhumane, punitive measures levied against offenders and fugitives, a reason that is still a valid basis for asylum under prevailing international law.

The pre-Islamic Arab tradition, long in existence in the Arabian Peninsula, was consecrated by the Prophet Muhammad who, upon entering Mecca in 623 C.E. proclaimed two sites as sanctuaries.[10] Mentions of asylum in the Talmud, the Bible, and the Qur'an are indeed among the most noteworthy records of that right.

By the sixteenth century, ideas about the reform of criminal justice arose in Europe. By the seventeenth century, as religious wars and unremitting religious feuds abated, particularly after the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, the need for cooperation in criminal matters grew as territorial sovereignty became absolute and limited the jurisdictional reach of states. By the eighteenth century, penal reform and concern for world order started to emerge in the writings of Cesare Beccaria (1738–1794). These developments brought new considerations to asylum: (1) places no longer conferred absolute immunity to all types of fugitives, because states were deemed to have a duty to prosecute common criminals, following the aut dedere aut judicare principle; and (2) states were deemed to have a reciprocal duty to each other to further the development of world order. These two considerations are as valid today as when they emerged in the writings of Hugo Grotius's De jure belli ac pacis in the seventeenth century. Interestingly enough, these developments coincided with the period in which penal reformers mustered enough support for their enlightened views to make criminal justice more humane. These penal developments arose in parallel to those of publicists who sought to develop a framework for a new world order.

Eighteenth-century political philosophies, including the doctrine of separation of church and state, brought about new rationales and practices of asylum for political and religious reasons, as religious and secular state institutions increasingly came into conflict with each other. Religious authorities declared churches, monasteries, and convents sanctuaries, and gave asylum to fugitives from secular authorities, especially when a religious matter was involved, and states increasingly gave political asylum to religious and political dissidents of other countries. But states did not distinguish between these and other reasons for granting asylum, which was tantamount to the modern justification for the denial of extradition on grounds of the "political offense exception."[11]

10 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Protection of Diplomats under Islamic Law, 74 Am. J. Int'l L. 609 (1980).

3. Rationale for Asylum and Its Different Forms

Religious asylum declined with the emergence of the non-ecclesiastic state in most of Europe, the development of theories of separation of church and state, and the decline of the divine right of kings, particularly after the Reformation. These developments gave rise to modern asylum practice—a form of immunity from foreign legal processes granted by the state of refuge to an alien who has become subject to its jurisdiction.

In its modern formative stages, the theory of asylum provided a basis for many extrapolations. One of these was the doctrine of ius quarteriorum (the law of quarter), a form of asylum by extraterritoriality, which shielded aliens from the authoritative decision-making processes of states in which they were and which would otherwise have had jurisdiction over them.[12] European states used this doctrine to further their colonial rule in the Middle East through the system of "capitulations" and in the Far East through "concessions." By implementing these mechanisms, European aliens in the Turkish Ottoman Empire and in parts of China enjoyed ius quarteriorum, which brought them outside the scope of local law. The result of this practice was outrageous, as it placed aliens above and beyond the reach of the law of the situs. Both of these colonial manifestations ended during or after WWII.

The foregoing survey suggests that after the decline of ecclesiastical asylum—with the exception of Rule 1179 of the Codex Iuris Cononici (Canon Law)—all types of asylum flourished in the Middle Ages. Further, the survey illustrates that with the elimination of the colonial doctrines of "concessions" and "capitulations," the only forms of asylum that exist in contemporary practice are forms of territorial asylum.

Thus, the concept of asylum remains one of personal immunity from the authoritative processes of a decision-maker other than that of the jurisdictional authority under whose power the alien falls. As such, it has two forms: (1) territorial asylum (e.g., denying the authoritative process of another state the ability to exercise jurisdiction over an asylee through extradition, or other modes of rendition); and (2) extraterritorial asylum (e.g., granting asylum in an embassy or on a vessel of one state that is situated in another state).[13] However, it should be noted that because of the long and complex evolution of asylum, the process has yet to reach a high level of clarity.[14]

Most publicists who treat the subject consider territorial asylum to be different from extraterritorial or diplomatic asylum. The rationale advanced for this distinction is that extraterritorial asylum denies the sovereignty of the state on whose territory it is exercised, while territorial asylum affirms the sovereignty of the state on whose territory it is practiced. The distinction is, however, without difference as to its effect because each of these aspects reaffirms the rationae materiae of the practice, which stems from the same source. However, the development of this distinction brought about the dichotomy between extraterritorial asylum, which is within the scope of customary and conventional international law, and territorial asylum, which is encompassed by national law. The distinction between territorial and extraterritorial asylum[15]

---

11 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

12 See, e.g., 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 278–427 (1963) [hereinafter Whiteman Digest].

13 See Ch. VI (discussing theories of extraterritorial jurisdiction).

14 See supra note 7.

15 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 12: Asylum in foreign embassies and legations within a country is known as "diplomatic asylum." Where granted, and recognized by the local sovereign, it thus constitutes in effect an exemption from the territorial jurisdiction of that state. It may, of course, be argued that a foreign embassy or legation is in some respects extraterritorial, but this is true only to the limited extent caused many countries, including the United States, to consider territorial asylum to be a matter of national law and to reject any application of customary international law to it, though conventional international law still applies.

Asylum has several facets but its most significant consequence occurs when one state denies another state the opportunity to exercise authority over an individual whom the asylum state is shielding. This may occur either prior to or after extradition proceedings are set in motion. When asylum is granted before extradition proceedings are set in motion, it serves to place the requesting state on notice that its request for extradition is likely to be denied. However, this is not necessarily always the case, as the asylum-granting state can withdraw the privilege of asylum from the beneficiary, particularly after the asylum-granting state becomes fully appraised of the facts supporting the extradition request, which may negate the legal grounds upon which asylum was granted. When asylum is granted after extradition proceedings are initiated, however, the granting of asylum results in denial of the extradition request on grounds of either the political offense exception or executive discretion.[16]

The traditional basis for granting asylum and denying extradition is a concern for the fate of the individual. The theory of humane concern is predicated on two factors: (1) altruistic humanitarian considerations relating to the treatment to which the relator may be subjected upon his/her return to the requesting state, and (2) a commitment in principle by the asylum-granting state to the values of personal freedom. Both criteria, although defensible in principle, constitute value judgments by a political entity predicated on ideology. As stated by one authority with respect to the United States:

> Those who have fled religious, racial or political persecution and who may be described as "political refugees"…have found territorial asylum in the United States, not by right, for the "…United States does not recognize or subscribe to, as part of international law, the so-called and in the sense that the receiving state may not exercise acts of jurisdiction within the premises of the foreign state. The concept of "diplomatic asylum" is to be distinguished from that of "political asylum" or "territorial asylum," which is granted by a receiving state to such refugees or fugitives from justice as that state may receive or permit. Thus, "political" or "territorial" asylum does not constitute an exemption from the jurisdiction of the local sovereign state. Although "diplomatic asylum," where granted and recognized, is accorded to "political offenders," as distinguished from common criminals, it does not thereby become "political asylum" as herein used. Id. at 428.

---

16 For the relationship among the law of asylum, the political offense exception, and the penal policies of some foreign countries, see Legomsky, Immigration and Refugee Law and Policy, supra note 7; Legomsky, An Asylum Seeker's Bill of Rights supra note 7; Sinha, supra note 7; Prakash Sinha, Asylum and International Law 5–49 (1971). See also Bernabe Africa, Political Offenses in Extradition (1927); Otto Kircheimer, Gegenwartsprobleme der Asylgewahrung (1959); Gerard V. Laforest, Extradition to and from Canada (2d ed. 1977); Francis T. Piggott, Extradition: A Treatise on the Law Relating to Fugitive Offenders (1910); P. Papathanassion, L'Extradition en Matiere Politique (1954); S. Planas-Suarez, Estudio Juridico y Politico el Asilo Diplomatico: Sobre Este Execrable Uso Latino Americano Destructor de la Soberania Nacional y de la Cordialidad Internacional (1953); L. Quintana, Derecho de Asilo (1952); C. Neale Ronning, Diplomatic Asylum, Legal Norms and Political Reality in Latin American Relations C. (1965); Manual Vieria, Derecho de Asilo Diplomatico (1962); Leslie C. Green, Recent Practice in the Law of Extradition, 6 Current Legal Probs. 274 (1953); R.B. Greenburgh, Recent Developments in the Law of Diplomatic Asylum; 41 Transactions of the Grotius Soc'y 103 (1955); Heinrich Grutzner, Staatspolitik und der Kriminal-Politik im Auslieferungsrecht, 68 Zeitschripft fur die Gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 501 (1956); Edvard Hambro, New Trends in the Law of Extradition and Asylum, 5 W. Pol. Q. 1 (1952); Arnold D. McNair, Extradition and Extraterritorial Asylum, 28 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 172 (1951); Felice Morgenstern, Extraterritorial Asylum, 25 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 236 (1958); Felice Morgenstern, Diplomatic Asylum, 67 Law Q. Rev. 362 (1951); Felice Morgenstern, The Right of Asylum, 26 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 327 (1949); Charles Rousseau, Preface to L. Bolesta-Koziebrodzki, Le Droit d'Asile (1962). See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 and Ch. XII, Sec. 2.

> doctrine of asylum," but by grant of the government for humanitarian reasons, in recognition of the obligation of a free people toward the politically oppressed or for considerations of foreign policy.[17]

The contemporary rationale for asylum must be examined in light of its duality: rationae materiae (or jurisdiction over a subject matter) and rationae personae (or jurisdiction over a person).

3.1. Rationae Materiae

Sovereignty over a territory confers upon the sovereign the right to exclude the exercise of jurisdiction over that territory by any other sovereign. Territorial asylum emanates from the assertion of that right. By extension, its applicability encompasses embassies, legations, military bases, territorial enclaves, vessels, and aircraft belonging to the sovereign. The extraterritorial application of sovereignty implies the same exclusive jurisdictional control as does the principle of territoriality of which it is a legal extension. The source of legal authority is said to differ in both because territorial asylum finds its basis in national law, whereas extraterritorial asylum is said to have its legal basis in international law, whether customary or conventional. Extraterritorial asylum is also an extension of territorial asylum, and therefore grounded in international law.

Although clearly established in international law, extraterritorial or diplomatic asylum is not frequently used in practice, in order to avoid political confrontations between the host country and the foreign state whose diplomatic mission is located in the host country. Where diplomatic asylum is granted, it is often contentious and raises problems between the host state and the foreign state granting extraterritorial asylum.

There are a number of prominent examples of diplomatic asylum over the past fifty years. One of the most famous is the case of Cardinal József Mindszenty, a prominent Hungarian anti-communist, who sought refuge in the U.S. embassy in Budapest in November 1956 to escape persecution by invading Soviet troops. Mindszenty was granted diplomatic asylum by the United States and remained in the embassy for fifteen years before it was arranged for him to leave the country. Later that decade, in November 1979, Iranians captured the U.S. embassy in Tehran and held fifty-two U.S. citizens. Six U.S. diplomats were able to escape arrest, however, and took refuge in the Canadian embassy, where they were hidden until January 1980, when they were spirited out of the country. Thus, they were given diplomatic asylum by Canada despite the fact that Iran, the host country, had no knowledge of the grant of asylum. In 1989, Panamanian president Manuel Noriega was ousted from power by U.S. forces. Noriega fled to the Vatican embassy, where he stayed for more than a week; American troops blared music into the embassy until Noriega surrendered.

In 2012 there were several prominent examples of diplomatic asylum. Two of these involved U.S. embassies in China. In the first, a regional police chief in Chengdu named Wang Lijun entered the U.S. consulate seeking protection after apparently falling out with the regional party chief whose wife was later convicted for the killing of a British businessman. Wang stayed in the U.S. consulate for a day before leaving again. The second involved the prominent Chinese "Weiquan lawyer" and activist Chen Guangcheng, sought refuge in the U.S. embassy in Beijing in April, where he stayed until May, when a diplomatic arrangement was reached allowing his departure to the United States.

A prominent example of diplomatic asylum is that of Julian Assange, the founder of the Wikileaks organization. In July 2012 Assange sought refuge in the Ecuadorian embassy in London after his extradition was approved from the United Kingdom to Sweden on what appears to be questionable complaints of sexual abuse that Sweden claims to be investigating but for which no official charge has been issued. Assange's extradition from the United Kingdom, on the sole basis that he is sought in Sweden for "questioning" with respect to allegations without any further evidence, is certainly a legal stretch. But when the order did not include any limitations on Sweden's possible subsequent extradition of Assange to the United States, it strongly raised the suspicion that the United States is seeking Assange's extradition for having published leaked government correspondence. The process indicates what may be a conspiracy among the United States, the United Kingdom, and Sweden to punish Assange for what is essentially a political offense. Assange sought asylum in the Ecuadorian embassy in London, and on August 16 the foreign minister of Ecuador gave Assange asylum. The United Kingdom considered revoking the permission granted to the Ecuadorian embassy to occupy the premises as a way of stripping it of its diplomatic immunity, and thus to be able to effectuate the arrest and extradition of Assange. Clearly this stratagem would constitute a breach of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Diplomatic Immunity. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, argues that Ecuador is violating the spirit of the Vienna Convention by giving asylum to what could be considered a fugitive from justice. If Assange had committed a common crime such as homicide, the United Kingdom would be justified in its claim, but as the legal basis for its claim is the extradition to Sweden, which on its face appears to be a subterfuge to achieve indirectly something it could not achieve directly, namely to extradite Assange to the United States to face charges for the release of the diplomatic messages (an act that would be protected by freedom of opinion under UK law, the European Convention, and Article 17 of the ICCPR), clearly the United Kingdom could not claim that Ecuador is in breach of the spirit of the Vienna Conventions when the United Kingdom itself is also in breach.

---

17 Alona E. Evans, The Political Refugee in United States Immigration Law and Practice, 3 Int'l Law. 204, 204–205 (1969) (emphasis added).

The practice of extraterritorial immunity has also been extended to international organizations in recognition of their need to pursue their functions. Arguably, this extension may fall into a special jurisdictional category. An important question that has never been adjudicated is whether an international organization can grant territorial asylum. The answer is negative, because an international organization does not need that legal prerogative to fulfill its functions, as would a state. The accredited representatives to such organizations and its staff enjoy immunity, however.[18]

3.2. Rationae Personae

Certain individuals, by reason of an immunity granted them in their private person or capacity, are beyond jurisdictional control of a state that would otherwise exercise jurisdiction over them by reason of territorial sovereignty. The capacity of the individual characterizes the immunity, not the place where the person may be located, and thus determines whether asylum is granted. This immunity applies to heads of state, senior government officials on mission, accredited diplomats, and qualified members of international organizations. It is predicated on an extension of the doctrine of sovereignty to secure the exercise of their representative functions. It should be noted, however, that immunity for heads of state does not extend to the commission of certain crimes such as genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture.[19] Furthermore, diplomats only enjoy diplomatic immunity in the country in which they are accredited, and while in transit to and from that country and their country of origin.[20]

---

18 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Feb. 13, 1946, 21 UST 1418, T.I.A.S. No. 6900, 1 UNTS 15; I.C.J. Advisory Opinion on the Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process of a Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, 1999 I.C.J. 62, 38 I.L.M. 873 (1999); Peter H.F. Bekker, Advisory Jurisdiction—Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations—Immunity from Legal Process of Expert on Mission Appointed by U.N. Commission on Human Rights—Effect of U.N. Secretary-General's Assertion of Immunity—Procedural Priority to Be Accorded Assertion of Immunity in Municipal Courts, 93 Am. J. Int'l. L. 913 (1999).

19 See Ch. VI, Sec. 8 for a more detailed evaluation of immunities.

20 The purpose of immunity is to enable representatives to fulfill their function fully. In other matters they should yield entire respect to the jurisdiction of the territorial government. See 4 Green Haywood Hackworth, Digest of International Law 77–78 (1944).

3.3. Difference between Rationae Materiae and Rationae Personae

It is said that rationae materiae affirms territorial sovereignty, whereas rationae personae is said to deny it. This explanation may, however, be misleading. Affirming territorial sovereignty by a grant of territorial asylum is to render a person in that territory immune from another jurisdictional authority. Denying territorial sovereignty by reason of personal immunity is also to render a person immune from jurisdictional authority, although regardless of the situs where territorial jurisdiction is otherwise exercised. Both have the same outcome—personal immunity from the reach of another authoritative process—even though their premises differ. The foundation of the legal prerogative in both cases is the doctrine of sovereignty, which in one case applies to the individual by reason of where he/she is and in the other case because of who he/she is or what his/her function is.

It may be argued that diplomatic asylum derogates from the principle of territoriality in order to secure the purposes and functions of accredited foreign officials in their capacity as representatives of another sovereign. However, if the principle of diplomatic extraterritoriality is accepted without qualification, the distinction between "diplomatic" and "territorial" asylum is no longer valid.[21]

4. Legal Bases for Asylum

Two sources of law support the practice of asylum: national law and international law. Proponents of the right of asylum find support for the existence of that right in each of these sources.[22]

4.1. The International Law of Asylum

Developments in international law and national laws have given rise to a general principle of international law of asylum. This body of law is shaped by the basic values underlying asylum and by the principle of protection of human rights, both of which are embodied in the 1951 Refugee Convention and its 1967 Protocol, which applies to asylum.[23] The duty of states to protect refugees inures to the benefit of the individual. When states choose to follow a given practice that is pursued and relied upon by its intended beneficiaries, they create rights in favor of such beneficiaries. More significant,, by following a certain practice, states not only bind themselves but may create customary international law.[24]

Despite references to asylum in extradition treaties and in domestic legislation on the subject, some writers consider it insufficient to constitute customary international law as evidenced by consistent state practice. They argue that a self-imposed limitation, such as a state's grant of asylum, is a discretionary privilege that can be abrogated unilaterally, and therefore a grant of 21 That view was put forward by many nineteenth-century authors who used the "fiction" of extraterritoriality as a useful descriptive term, but denied that it was "so absolute" as to justify a right of asylum. Travers Twiss, 1 The Law of Nations 218, 408 (Oxford, Clarendon 2d ed. 1884). Among twentieth-century writers, Fauchille claims that modern theory has "completely rejected" the idea of extraterritoriality. See Paul Fauchille, 1 Traité de Droit International Public 64, 78 (1926). His view is supported by the report of the League of Nations Codification Sub-Committee on Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities stating that "[I]t is perfectly clear that extraterritoriality is a fiction which has no foundation either in law or in fact… The mere employment of this unfortunate expression is liable to lead to legal consequences which are absolutely inadmissible." League of Nations Doc. C.196 M.70 1927 V, at 79 (1927).

---

22 See supra note 16. See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 1 and Ch. XII, Sec. 2.

23 Convention Relating to Status of Refugees, supra note 1; Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, supra note 1.

24 Sinha, supra note 7.

asylum does not create a legally enforceable right in favor of the individual but merely affords him/her a qualified privilege. These scholars fail to take into account that asylum provisions in constitutions, treaties, and domestic legislation are binding on the states that adopt them, even though these states have discretion in their application.

Thus, customary law is created inferentially as well as explicitly. The Permanent Court of International Justice in the Lotus case stated that in the case of negative—as opposed to positive—conduct, customary international law is created only if the abstention is based on consciousness of a duty to abstain.[25] The essence of the binding nature of custom is evidenced by consistent practice and the sense of legal obligation by the given state. However, as stated by Judge Rafael Altarmira in his dissenting opinion in Lotus:

> In the process of the development of a customary rule there are often moments in time in which the rule, implicitly discernible, has not yet taken shape in the eyes of the world, but is so forcibly suggested by precedents that it would be rendering service to the cause of justice and law to assist its appearance in a form in which it will have all the force rightly belonging to rules of positive law appertaining to that category.[26]

Several years later, this position became clear when the International Court of Justice, in its only opinion on the subject of asylum,[27] stated that the practice was laden with:

> so much uncertainty and contradiction, so much fluctuation and discrepancy in the exercise of diplomatic asylum and in the official views expressed on various occasions, there has been so much inconsistency in the rapid succession of conventions on asylum ratified by some States and rejected by others, and the practice has been so much influenced by considerations of political expediency in the various cases, that it is not possible to discern in all this any constant and uniform usage, accepted as law, with regard to the alleged rule of unilateral and definite qualification of the offense.[28]

The broadly diffused, though inconsistent, practice of asylum evidences some recognition of the historical practice or privilege. In whatever way it may have existed and developed in the course of its lengthy evolution, it now embodies certain basic common values of the world community. This recognition is thus sufficient for asylum to be deemed part of those general principles of international law recognized by civilized nations, which, under Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, constitute a source of international law. Asylum is thus a part of international law.

Asylum is considered a human right that developed in international law in two forms: (1) that of granting minorities the right to petition an international decision-making body for protection from political persecution, and (2) that of leaving the jurisdiction and becoming a refugee in another state.[29] To implement the latter form, it was indispensable that the refugee be

---

25 The Lotus Case (France v. Turkey), 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 10, at 28; Manley O. Hudson, The Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920–1942 (1943).

26 Hudson, supra note 25, at 610. See also Oppenheim's International Law (Robert Jennings & Arthur Watts eds., 9th ed. 1992).

27 Asylum Case (Colom. v. Peru), 1950 I.C.J. 266. See also Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, The Colombian-Peruvian Asylum Case and the Doctrine of Human Rights, 37 Va. L. Rev. 927 (1951).

28 Asylum Case (Colom. v. Peru), 1950 I.C.J. at 277. But see dissenting opinion of Judge Alvarez in the Asylum Case, who stated that "A principle, custom, doctrine, etc., need not be accepted by all of the states of the New World in order to be considered as a part of American international law. The same situation obtains in this case as in the case of universal international law." Id. at 294 (Alvarez, J., dissenting).

29 The human rights approach to asylum was prevalent in the Havana Convention on Asylum. Manley O. Hudson, 4 International Legislation 2412 (1932); 22 Am. J. Int'l L. 158 (Supp. 1928). See also American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, adopted at the Ninth International Conference of American States held in Bogota in 1948, reprinted in 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 133 (Supp. 1949); The Institute of International Law Resolution of September, 1950, reprinted in 45 Am. J. Int'l L. 15 granted the right to such a status, that it would be sanctioned by international law, and that it be subject to protection in domestic legislation.

As outlined above, there is considerable ambiguity as to the source, development, and legal basis for the contemporary human right to asylum. It does, however, appear that there are two applications of asylum: (1) as granted to refugees, displaced persons, and, in general, to a community or group of people subjected to persecution in one country by reason of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion; and (2) as granted to individuals singled out by a given state for any one of the above reasons. Accordingly, it recognizes a collective and an individual right to asylum.

It is noteworthy that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes a right to asylum, as expressed in Article 14: "Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution."[30] This right was included in the Universal Declaration as a response to the concern for refugees and stateless persons after WWII. This concern brought about the 1951 Convention[31] and the 1967 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees.[32] The same concern for refugees and the need to protect their human rights was also embodied in the 1966 International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights.[33] The right to asylum is also expressed in Article 2 of the Organization of African Unity Refugee Convention,[34] in Article 22 of the Inter-American Human Rights Convention of 1969,[35] and in Article 40(1) of the Arab Charter on Human Rights.[36]

It is also noteworthy that the General Assembly of the United Nations unanimously adopted Resolution 2312 (XXII) of December 14, 1967. The Declaration of Territorial Asylum states:

(Supp. 1951); The International Law Commission of the United Nations, Draft Declaration on Rights and Duties of States, reprinted in 44 Am. J. Int'l L. 8 (Supp. 1950); 1933 Montevideo Convention on Political Asylum, reprinted in Manley O. Hudson, 6 International Legislation 607 (1937); the international instruments cited supra note 9 and accompanying text. As to the doctrine on the subject, see Garcia-Mora, supra note 7, at 120–139 (1956) (referring to decisions upholding the right of asylum); Frank E. Krenz, The Refugee as a Subject of International Law, 15 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 90, 104 (1966); Paul Weis, The International Protection of Refugees, 48 Am. J. Int'l L. 193, 198 (1954).

30 Article 14 of the Declaration, reprinted in 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 127, 129 (Supp. 1949); The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217, U.N. Doc. A/811 (1948); Josef L. Kunz, The United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 316 (1949); Hersch Lauterpacht, The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 25 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 354 (1948). The Draft of the International Declaration on Asylum, prepared by the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations and transmitted to the United Nations General Assembly in July, 1960, declares in article 3 that > [n]o one seeking or enjoying asylum in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights should, except for overriding reasons of national security or safeguarding of the frontier, face return or expulsion which would result in compelling him to return or remain in a territory, if there is a well-founded fear of persecution endangering his life, physical integrity or liberty in that territory.

U.N. Doc. ECN.4/804 (E/3335) (1960).

31 See United Nations Convention Relating to Status of Refugees, supra note 1; Convention Relating to the International Status of Refugees, supra note 1.

32 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, supra note 1.

33 G.A. Res. 2200, 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. 16, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).

34 Convention Governing the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa, Sept. 10, 1967, 1001 U.N.T.S. 45, CAB/LEG/24.3.

35 Inter-American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. T.S. No. 36, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, reprinted in Basic Documents Pertaining to Human Rights in the Inter-American System, OEA/Ser.L.V/II.82 doc.6 rev.1 at 25 (1992).

36 Council of the League of Arab States, Arab Charter on Human Rights, Sept. 15, 1994, reprinted in 18 Hum. Rts. L.J. 151 (1997).

> (1) the granting of asylum does not constitute an unfriendly act and shall be respected by other States;
>
> (2) the situation of persons seeking asylum is of concern to the international community, which shall assist the State on which the granting of asylum is too heavy a burden; and
>
> (3) no one shall be subjected to measures such as rejection at the frontier, expulsion, or compulsory return to any state where he may be subjected to persecution, i.e., the principle of non-refoulement in its wider sense, including persons seeking admission at the border.

The Declaration, however, as a Resolution of the General Assembly is recommendatory rather than obligatory. Ten years later it gave way to the Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum.

The 1977 Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum[37] was designed to overcome some shortcomings of the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol.[38] However, the Draft Convention was aimed more at increasing the protection of those falling within the existing definition of a refugee than at broadening the definition to include more of those who are currently excluded therefrom. There is as yet no agreement on the text of the Convention, which has been tabled[39] at the United Nations. The major stumbling block in adopting a text of the Convention is the provision dealing with temporary asylum, Article 4, which states:

> A person seeking asylum at the frontier or in the territory of a Contracting State shall be admitted provisionally to or permitted to remain in the territory of that State pending a determination of his request, which shall be considered by a competent authority.

This text limits states in their initial decision to reject refugees and thus curtails their resort to immigration laws to do what they may deem politically expedient.[40]

Under the definitions of the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol, only about half of the world's displaced persons are eligible for the protection of the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) on the basis that they have crossed an international boundary; the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol had no effect on Internally Displaced Persons (IDP) who have not crossed an international boundary. The exclusion of so many individuals should concern much of the world community, even though it cannot be presumed that those fugitives from persecution who do not fall within the mandate of UNHCR are in all instances deprived of international protection.[41]

4.2. National Law and Asylum

In national law, asylum can be found in constitutional provisions or legislative enactments, particularly immigration laws and regulations. It may also exist in practice without legislative authority. It is frequently mentioned in extradition treaties, either directly or indirectly, particularly with reference to the political offense exception.

---

37 30 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 31) 38, U.N. Doc. A/10177 (1975).

38 See Richard Plender, Admission of Refugees: Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, 15 San Diego L. Rev. 45 (1977).

39 For the materials and proceedings of the Conference, see U.N. Doc. A/Conf.78/DC 2-5 (1977); U.N. Doc. A/Conf.78/DC R.1 (1977); U.N. Doc. A/Conf.78/C.1/L.104/Add 1-7 (1977); U.N. Doc. A/Conf. 78/C.1/SR 1-28 (1977) and Corrigenda; U.N. Doc. A/Conf.78/SR 1-9 (1977) and Corrigenda; U.N. Doc. A/10177 (1975).

40 See N.Y. Times, Feb. 3, 1977, at A9. See also Kay Hailbronner, Molding a New Human Rights Agenda, 8 Wash. Q. 183 (1985) (noting that the difficulty with the Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum has been that "[i]n an era of mass exodus, states were not prepared to accept far-reaching obligations without being able to measure the consequences.").

41 Plender, supra note 38, at 47.

An individual right to asylum exists, for example, under the constitutions of the Federal Republic of Germany,[42] the Czech Republic,[43] Italy,[44] and France,[45] as well as of those African countries whose constitutions are based on the French Constitution. It is noteworthy that the French Constitution of 1793 first recognized an individual's right to asylum.[46] In addition, the aliens' legislation of the Scandinavian countries contains provisions obliging the authorities to admit persons who otherwise would be subject to persecution, thus according them a right to asylum.

The uneven development of a practice—including asylum—means that it is likely to acquire characteristics based on more than one source of international law. Conversely, it would likely fail to attain a level that would satisfy the requirements of each source independently. Such a condition may, however, be capable of satisfying a single source through the cumulative effect of all its international characteristics. Thus, a combination of some characteristics of customary international law, bilateral and multilateral treaties on asylum and refugees, and the writings of distinguished publicists supporting the practice as an enforceable human right is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that asylum has become part of customary international law and a part of those "general principles of international law recognized by civilized nations." Asylum, therefore, constitutes an enforceable right under international law, in addition to its binding effect on those states who are parties to conventions on the subject.

5. Asylum in the United States

5.1. Asylum Process

Asylum and refugee status are based on the same legal standard, namely a well-founded fear of persecution in the country of nationality based on one of five protected grounds: race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.[47]

---

42 The Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Constitution of the Republic, provides at article 16(2) that "[p]ersons persecuted on political grounds shall enjoy the right of asylum." 6 Constitutions of the Countries of the World (Gisbert H. Flanz & Albert P. Blaustein eds., 1991). This provision has been interpreted by the German Federal Constitutional Court as directly enforceable law binding on the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the government. Hailbronner, supra note 40, at 183.

43 The Czechoslovak Constitutional Law of January 1991 enacting the Bill of Basic Rights and Freedoms provides at article 43 that the Republic "grants asylum to foreigners prosecuted for pursuit of political rights and freedoms. Asylum can be denied only to someone who has acted contrary to basic human rights and freedoms." Although the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic dissolved as of January 1, 1993, the new Constitution of the Czech Republic provides at Article 112(1) that the Bill of Basic Rights and Freedoms constitutes a part of the present constitutional order.

44 6 Constitutions of the Countries of the World, supra note 42. Article 10 of the Italian Constitution provides: "A foreigner to whom the practical exercise in his own country of democratic freedoms, guaranteed by the Italian Constitution, is precluded, is entitled to the right of asylum within the territory of the Republic, under conditions laid down by law." Id.

45 Id.

46 Cismigiu v. Seicaru, 47 I.L.R. 272 (Trib. gr. inst. de la Seine 1966) (Fr.).

47 INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 4 Immigr. Rep. A1-1 (1987); Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, 3 Immigration Law & Procedure, § 33.04[1][b], Release No. 113 (rev. ed. June 2006). See also Legomsky, Immigration and Refugee Law and Policy, supra note 7; Legomsky, An Asylum Seeker's Bill of Rights, supra note 7; Sinha, supra note 7; Garcia, supra note 7; Hathawy, supra note 3; Germain, supra note 3; Farnam, supra note 7. See Attila Bogdan, Guilty Pleas by Non-Citizens in Illinois: Immigration Consequences Reconsidered, 53 DePaul L Rev 19, 20 (2003) (summarizing immigration statutes: under federal law, a person who is convicted of an "aggravated felony" has fewer grounds for avoiding deportation than a person who is convicted of a felony); see Ira J. Kurzban, Kurzban's Immigration Law Sourcebook: A Comprehensive Outline and Reference Tool 481–497 (12th ed. 2010) (collecting cases).

In the United States, statutory recognition of asylum first appeared in 1980 with the passage of the Refugee Act.[48] Final regulations were not adopted until 1990, when they were incorporated into the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA).[49] The 1996 Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRAIRA)[50] subsequently amended the Refugee Act. Today, the Refugee Act and the federal regulations promulgated under it govern the asylum process in the United States, but must be considered in conjunction with other legislation, including the USA PATRIOT Act.

Contemporary asylum law differs from prior statutes in several respects. It allows refugees from any country, eliminates the requirement of having fled the country of nationality, and also adopts the language of Article I of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, which provides that the basis of a refugee claim is "persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution."[51]

The Attorney General or Secretary of Homeland Security is authorized by Section 208 of the INA to establish an asylum application procedure for an asylum-seeking alien who is physically present in the United States, or at land borders or ports of entry, and to grant asylum.[52] The asylum procedure promulgated by the Attorney General directs the asylum-seeking alien to file an asylum application with an asylum office, United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) district director, immigration judge, or the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA).[53]

Two types of asylum applications can be filed. First, a noncitizen with valid non-immigrant status may file an affirmative application through the USCIS. Second, a noncitizen can file a defensive application with an immigration judge in response to a deportation or other action taken against the noncitizen.[54] An alien must submit an application to the asylum office, where an asylum officer, who is an immigration officer with specialized asylum training, reviews the application for merit.[55] As a part of the merit review, the asylum officer is required to request an advisory opinion from the Department of State.[56] If the asylum officer finds that the alien is 48 INA § 101(a)(42), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(42), as added by the Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96-212 § 201(a), 94 Stat. 102 (1980). See Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at §34.02[2]. See also Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and Policy 819, 840 (1992) ("In 1974 the Justice Department issued regulations providing asylum criteria and procedures . . . but not until 1980 did asylum receive statutory recognition."). See also Kurzban, supra note 7.

---

49 55 Fed. Reg. 30,680-87 (July 27, 1990). See Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47 at § 34.02[2].

50 Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRAIRA), Div. C., Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 104-208, §601 (a)(1), 110 Stat. 3009-689 (codified as amended in various sections of 8 U.S.C.).

51 Convention Relating to Status of Refugees, supra note 1; INA §101(a)(42), as added by The Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 960212, § 201(a), 94 Stat. 102; Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at §34.02.

52 INA § 208 (b)(1), 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(1); 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a) (1994), amended by Pub. L. 104-32, title IV, § 421(a), April 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1270; Pub. L. 104-208, div. C, title VI, § 604(a), Sept. 30, 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-690.

53 INA § 208 (d)(1), 8 U.S.C. § 1158 (d)(1), 8 C.F.R. § 208.4(b) (2011). Also the Attorney General can promulgate Asylum regulations; see 55 Fed. Reg. 30, 674–688 (1990).

54 Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at §34.02.

55 8 C.F.R. §208.2(a) (The Office of International Affairs has initial jurisdiction over the asylum applications.) (2011); Richard K. Preston, Asylum Adjudication: Do State Department Advisory Opinions Violate Refugees' Rights and U.S. International Obligations?, 45 Md. L. Rev. 91, 108 (1986) (citing I.N.S. Operations Instruction § 208.9(d) (1980)).

56 8 C.F.R. § 208.11 (2011), 62 Fed. Reg. 10,337 (Mar. 6, 1997), as amended by 64 Fed. Reg. 8477 (Feb. 19, 1999). The Department of State procedure is as follows:

> After an asylum application is received, it will be reviewed and then placed into one of three categories. The first category consists of applications that the Department of State believes the Country eligible for asylum,[57] the officer may then grant asylum or refer the application to an immigration judge for adjudication in deportation, exclusion, or removal proceedings.[58]

Expedited removal was introduced in 1997 through the IIRAIRA.[59] This process expedites the removal of inadmissible arriving aliens, excepting only those who indicate an intent to apply for asylum.[60] After the alien applies for asylum, an asylum officer makes a determination of whether the alien has a "credible fear of persecution."[61] If, after interviewing the noncitizen,[62] the asylum officer determines that the alien does not have a credible fear of persecution, then the alien can request a review of the decision by an immigration judge who will issue a final determination that is not subject to review.[63] If either the asylum officer or immigration judge determines that the alien has a credible fear of prosecution, the alien will move forward in a regular asylum proceeding.[64]

When the alien applies for asylum while in exclusion, deportation, or removal proceedings, he/she submits the asylum application to the immigration judge who has jurisdiction over the case.[65] Upon receipt of the asylum application, the immigration judge can seek a Department of State advisory opinion, which was formerly a requirement, but due to budget constraints is now available only on only select applications.[66] However, State Department submissions are only advisory, and the Attorney General and Secretary of Homeland Security make the final > Reports on Human Rights Practices ("Country Reports") provides sufficient information for an asylum officer to determine the applicant's eligibility for refugee status. The Department of State will then refer the asylum officer to the Country Reports noting that the Department of State has nothing further to add. The second category consists of cases where the Country Reports do not provide enough information for an asylum officer to determine the applicant's eligibility for refugee status. In these cases, the Department of State will supplement the Country Reports by adding a "boiler-plate generic" opinion. This type of opinion provides more specific information on a certain group of persons (i.e. Christians in Iran) or note major changes in the government since the publication of the Country Reports. The third category includes asylum applications which the Department of State has information regarding the individual applicant or believes that the application is so unique that special treatment is warranted. In these cases the Department of State will submit an individualized advisory opinion to the asylum officer.

---

Letter from Edward H. Wilkinson, Director of Asylum Affairs, to Chief Immigration Judge William R. Robie and Delia Combs, INS Assistant Commissioner, (Oct. 21, 1987), reprinted in 64 Interpreter Releases 1215 (1987). See also 6 Immigration Law and Procedure § 138.06(3) (Ellen Gittel Gordon & Charles Gordon eds., 1995).

57 See supra Sec. 5.3 (discussing asylum eligibility grounds).

58 8 C.F.R. § 208.14(b), (c) (2006).

59 INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(ii) (2010), 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(A)(ii); 8 C.F.R. § 235.3(b)(4) (2006); Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 34.02[3][a].

60 INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(ii) b (2010), 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(A)(ii); 8 C.F.R. § 235.3(b)(4) (2006). See also 8 C.F.R. § 208.30; 8 C.F.R. § 235.3(b)(4) (2006). See Kurzban, supra note 47, at 510–519.

61 Under INA § 208, a credible fear of persecutions means that "there is a significant possibility, taking into account the credibility of the statements made by the non-citizen in support of the person's claim and such other facts as are known to the [asylum] officer that the non-citizen could establish eligibility for asylum under [INA] section 208." INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(v), 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(B)(v); see Kurzban, supra note 47, at 505–510 (collecting cases on a well-founded fear of persecution and asylum). Id. at 497–505 (collecting cases on past persecution).

62 8 C.F.R. § 208.30 (2006); 8 C.F.R. §235.3(b)(4) (2006).

63 INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(III), 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(III); 8 C.F.R. § 208.30(f) (2010).

64 8 C.F.R. § 235.6 (a)(1)(ii), (iii) (2009).

65 8 C.F.R. § 208.4(b)(3) (2006).

66 8 C.F.R. § 208.11; The State Department's role was reduced to one of "providing detailed and current country conditions and information"; see 59 Fed. Reg. at 62,293 (Dec. 5, 1994). See also Gordon et al, Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 34.02[8][c].

decisions on asylum.[67] The alien, or the USCIS on behalf of the government, may administratively appeal the immigration judge's decision on asylum to the BIA.[68]

The BIA, like the immigration courts, is a quasi-judicial body established by federal regulation.[69] If the BIA affirms the decision to deny asylum and affirms or enters a final order of deportation against the alien, the alien may appeal to a federal court by a petition for review.[70]

If the alien succeeds in obtaining asylum, he/she may remain in the United States for one year.[71] At the end of the one-year period, the USCIS examines the alien for admission to the United States as an immigrant.[72] Unless the alien's status as a refugee has been terminated within that one-year period,[73] the alien is eligible for an adjustment of status from refugee to lawful permanent resident.[74] As a lawful permanent resident, the alien enjoys the privilege of remaining in the United States, and qualifies for naturalization.[75] If, however, the alien fails to secure asylum, or if, for any reason, his/her asylum is revoked,[76] the USCIS may bring exclusion or deportation proceedings against him/her.[77] If the alien satisfies the standards for withholding of removal,[78] the Attorney General must withhold the alien's removal, but may return the alien to his/her country of origin if he/she meets the requirements of the INA in § 241(b)(3)(B).

The USA PATRIOT Act amended immigration, banking, and money laundering laws, as well as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). The provisions of the Act supplement provisions in 18 U.S.C. § 2339A, B, and criminalize "material support" to terrorists and foreign 67 Shah v. INS, 220 F.3d 1062, 1069 (9th Cir. 2000).

---

68 8 C.F.R. § 1003.3(a)(2006).

69 8 C.F.R. § 1003.1 (2006).

70 8 U.S.C. § 1252 (a)(1), (b) (2011). All petitions must be filed within thirty days (after Oct. 30, 1996) after date of final order.

71 Specifically, the alien will not be removed to the country of nationality. INA § 208 (c)(1)(A), 8 U.S.C. § 1158 (c)(1)(A).

72 8 U.S.C. § 1159(a) (1994), amended by Pub. L. 104-208, div. C, title III, §§ 308(g)(3)(a), 4(a), 371(b)(2), Sept. 30, 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-662.

73 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b) (2000 and Supp. 2004); Other grounds for termination of asylum are fraud in the alien's application for asylum or occurrence of one of the specific circumstances listed in 8 C.F.R. § 208.13(c) (2011), or the circumstances listed under INA § 208(c)(2).

74 8 U.S.C. § 1159(a)(2) (2000 and Supp. 2004). In order to effectuate the adjustment of status to lawful permanent resident, the alien must apply for the adjustment and meet specific requirements. See 8 C.F.R. § 209.2(a) (2006). The regulation requires that the alien must have been physically present in the United States for at least one year after receiving asylum, continues to be a refugee within the meaning of the Refugee Act, is admissible as an immigrant at the time of the application for adjustment, and has not been firmly resettled in another country. Id.

75 8 U.S.C. § 1429 (2000 and Supp. 2004).

76 8 C.F.R. § 208.24(a) (2006). Asylum may be revoked if the USCIS establishes any of the following: (1) There is a showing of fraud in the alien's application such that he or she was not eligible for asylum at the time it was granted; (2) As to applications filed on or after April 1, 1997, one or more of the conditions described in § 208(c)(2) of the Act exist; or (3) As to applications filed before April 1, 1997, the alien no longer has a well-founded fear of persecution upon return, due to a change of country conditions in the alien's country of nationality or habitual residence or the alien has committed an act that would have been grounds for denial of asylum under § 208.13(c)(2).

77 8 C.F.R. § 208.24 (2006). See also 8 C.F.R. §208.22 (Effect on exclusion, deportation, and removal proceedings) (2006).

78 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3) (2000 and Supp. 2004); 8 C.F.R. § 208.16 (2006). In various sections of 8 U.S.C. (the codification of the INA) it is called "restriction on removal," while in various portions of the USCIS regulations (8 C.F.R.), it is called "withholding of removal."

terrorist organizations.[79] The USA PATRIOT Act created a new category of crime, domestic terrorism, in addition to "international terrorism."[80] Domestic terrorism is defined in the Act as activities that:

> (A) involve acts dangerous to human life that are a violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any State;
>
> (B) appear to be intended—
>
> (i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;
>
> (ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or
>
> (iii) to affect the conduct of a government by mass destruction, assassination, or kidnapping; and
>
> (C) occur primarily within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.[81]

The definition of international terrorism in the Act is identical to domestic terrorism, except that it occurs outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, or transcends national boundaries.[82] In addition, the USA Act, which is now a component of the USA PATRIOT ACT, allows federal investigations of an alleged terrorist, provided he/she is not an agent of a foreign power, based on foreign intelligence.[83] The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA) was the precursor to the USA PATRIOT Act, and many of its provisions were taken over by the USA PATRIOT Act, including terrorism, immigration and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).[84]

In the largest government reorganization since WWII, the Homeland Security Act (HSA)[85] reorganized large portions of the federal government, bringing 185,000 federal employees and 22 federal agencies under the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). On March 1, 2003, the HSA abolished the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), thereby bringing it under the control of the DHS and splitting it into three parts (initially called bureaus).[86] The first component, the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), administers immigration benefits and services, and includes the Asylum and Refugee Affairs

---

79 In 2007, DHS exercised its discretionary authority with regard to individuals who provided material support to certain Tier II and Tier III terrorist organizations. See Rachel G. Settlage, Affirmatively Denied: The Detrimental Effects of a Reduced Grant Rate for Affirmative Asylum Seekers, 27 B.U. Int'l. L.J. 61, 92 (2009). For another case discussing how individuals may be forced to supply assistance to the FARC, see Escobar v. Holder, 657 F. 3d 537 (7th Cir. 2011) (petitioner started a small trucking company in Colombia, and the FARC hijacked his trucks at gunpoint multiple times and forced him to carry cargo to FARC locations, and the FARC later burned some of the petitioner's trucks). See United States v. Pineda, Cr. No. 04-232 (TFH), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17509 (D.D.C. 2006) (providing material assistance to FARC). See also Cheung v. United States, 213 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 2000).

80 18 U.S.C. § 2331 (2000 and Supp. 2004).

81 Id.

82 Id.

83 USA Act, Pub. Law No. 107-56 (amended 2006), (amended and extended in 2011). For a detailed historical analysis of the more controversial provisions of the USA PATRIOT Act, see The USA PATRIOT Sunset Extension Act of 2011, S. Rep. 112-13 (Apr. 5, 2011).

84 See also Interim Rule of Nov. 14, 2001, Continued Detention of Aliens Subject to Final Orders of Removal (INA); Interim Rule of Oct. 31, 2001, Prevention of Act of Violence and Terrorism (DOJ); Final Rule of Oct. 4, 2001, Aircraft Security under General Operating and Flight Rules (DOT).

85 Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135. For the history and development of the Department of Homeland Security, see Brief Documentary History of the Department of Homeland Security 2001–2008, available at http://permanent.access.gpo.gov/lps118010/brief-documentary-history-of-dhs-2001-2008.pdf (last visited Aug. 1, 2013).

86 Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at Special Alert to Chapter 1.

Operations.[87] The United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement (USICE), the second component, enforces customs laws and protects federal buildings and property. In addition, USICE is responsible for immigration investigations, detention, removal, and intelligence.[88] The final component, the United States Customs and Border Protection (USCBP), enforces immigration and customs laws at the ports of entry into the United States.[89] The USICE and USBCP operate under the Directorate of Border and Transportation Security (BTS). Although most immigration and asylum matters are under the jurisdiction of the USCIS, some immigration procedures are still under the Department of State and the Department of Justice, such as the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR), which remains under the Department of Justice.

Because of the changes in the structure of the federal government under the HSA, the Department of Justice has changed the location of the regulations relating to immigration in the Code of Federal Regulations (CFR).[90]

There were several last-minute changes in immigration laws at the end of 2004 and the start of 2005. First, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004[91] increases the penalty for "harboring aliens" in aggravated cases, establishes deportability on a new basis of terrorist-related training, and mandates studies of the U.S. asylum process.[92] Second, the Consolidated Appropriations Act of 2005 affects non-immigrant immigration procedures generally, as well as certain other features regarding regional concerns and terrorism.[93] Third, the REAL ID Act was enacted in 2005 as a component of the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror, and Tsunami Relief.[94] The most pertinent part of the REAL ID Act is section 101, entitled Preventing Terrorists from Obtaining Relief from Removal, which deals with general eligibility and the admissibility of evidence during asylum and withholding of removal on grounds of persecution.[95] This provision redefines the term "refugee," and shifts the burden to require the asylum seeker to establish his/her

87 Id.

88 Id.

89 Id.

90 See 68 Fed. Reg. 9824 (Feb. 28, 2003) (Dep't of Justice published the realignment of immigration functions within the federal government). Although there are no substantive hanges, there is now a ch. V in vol. 8 of the C.F.R. Provisions on asylum, now located in 8 C.F.R. 1208, ch. V, pt. 1208 (formerly 8 C.F.R. 208). See also 68 Fed. Reg. 10350 (Mar. 5, 2003). However, some asylum provisions remain in 8 C.F.R. 208, because of the possibility of both affirmative and defensive asylum applications. See Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at Special Alert to Chapter 1. Immigration laws are in section 101(a)(17) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(17), and all laws, conventions, and treaties of the United States relating to immigration, deportation, expulsion, or removal of aliens are incorporated into sec. 8 of the U.S.C. by 8 C.F.R. 1.1(a). See Immigration Laws, 68 Fed. Reg. pt. 44, p. 10922.

91 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, P.L. 108-408 §§ 7211–7214, 118 Stat. 3638, 3825–3832 (2004).

92 See Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at Special Alert to Chapter 1.

93 Id. The Act extends the deadline for adjusting paroled Indochinese and defines the eligibility of certain Vietnamese as refugees. Consolidate Appropriations Act, 2005, Pub. L. No. 104-477, tit. V, § 534(m), 118 Stat. 2809 (Dec. 8, 2004). It also defines the eligibility of certain Vietnamese and members of their families as refugees with special humanitarian concerns. Id. Further, it requires a study of how persons who are terrorists or connected to terrorism have exploited our asylum system persecution and present corroborating evidence, as well as making an asylum decision much more difficult to appeal.[96] The Act renders inadmissible any alien who is determined to be a terrorist, endorses or espouses terrorist activity, persuades others to commit terrorist acts, or has received military training from any organization that has been determined to be a terrorist organization.[97]

94 REAL ID Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-13, 119 Stat. 231, signed on May 11, 2005. See Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at Special Alert to Chapter 33. See also Gregory H. Siskind, REAL ID Act Becomes Law, 10 Bender's Imm. Bull. 1057 (June 15, 2005); Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, The REAL ID Act—The Real Winners, New York L.J. (June 27, 2005).

95 See Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at Special Alert to Chapter 33.

5.2. Judicial Review of Attorney-General Discretion

In Kucana v. Holder, the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the issue of "whether the proscription of judicial review stated in 8 U.S.C. § 1252 (a)(2)(B) applies not only to Attorney General determinations made discretionary by statue, but also to determinations declared discretionary by the Attorney General himself through regulation."[98] Section 1252(a)(2)(B) (of the INA) states that "…no court shall have jurisdiction to review (ii) any other decision or action of the Attorney General…the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in the discretion of the Attorney General…"[99] This provision was added to the INA by the IIRIRA. Prior to the enactment of IIRIRA in 1996, one of its regulations was amended to state that "the decision to grant or deny a motion to reopen…is within the discretion of the Board."[100]

The defendant in Kucana had moved the court to reopen his removal proceedings by asserting new evidence about worsening conditions in his homeland in support of his plea for asylum.[101] An immigration judge denied his motion, the BIA sustained the ruling, and the Seventh Circuit of Appeals held that the court lacked jurisdiction to review the administrative determination.[102] The Supreme Court granted a writ of certiorari to settle a split between the Seventh Circuit and the remaining circuits regarding the proper interpretation of § 1252,[103] as the remaining circuits ruled that the courts do in fact have jurisdiction to review a denial of a reopening motion.[104]

The Supreme Court held that the language of the statute did not delegate to the executive branch the authority to use regulations to limit judicial review.[105] The Court interpreted the statutory language "under this subchapter" to refer to "discretion" specifically mentioned in the statute because it found that other sections of the INA specifically made references to discretion granted to the Attorney General.[106] The Court stated that "If Congress wanted the jurisdictional bar to encompass decisions specified as discretionary by regulation along with those made discretionary by statute, moreover, Congress could easily have said so…[and that] Where Congress includes particular language in one section of the same Act, it is generally presumed that Congress acts intentionally and purposely in the disparate inclusion or 96 Id. These new standards will also apply to the cancellation of removal or suspension of deportation under the Violence Against Women Act, H.R. 3402 (2005) and to relief under the Convention against Torture and the Cuban Adjustment Act.

---

97 REAL ID Act, supra note 94, at § 103. For a critical, comparative analysis of antiterrorism concerns and the asylum process in the United States, the United Kingdom., Canada, and Australia, see Won Kidane, The Terrorism Bar to Asylum in Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, and the United States: Transporting Best Practices, 33 Fordham Int'l L.J. 300 (2010).

98 130 S. Ct. 827, 831 (2010)

99 8 U.S.C. § 1252 (a)(2)(B)(ii); quoted by Kucana v. Holder, 130 S. Ct. 827, 831 (2010).

100 8 CFR § 1003.2(a)(2009).

101 Kucana, 130 S. Ct. at 831.

102 Id.

103 Id.

104 Id.

105 Id. at 839.

106 Id. at 834–835.

exclusion."[107] The Court also stressed the precedential presumption that judicial review of administrative action is favored where statutory language appears vague.[108]

5.3. Restriction on Removal (Formerly Withholding of Deportation)

The internationally protected right of non-refoulement,[109] the right of a person not to be returned to a country where he or she would face persecution, is codified in the INA as "Restriction on Removal."[110] In the United States, restriction on removal is an alternative to asylum for refugees ho are unqualified or unwilling to apply for asylum.[111] However, a restriction on removal application is usually considered at the same time as an asylum application, in part because the asylum application itself is considered an application for restriction on removal.[112] The threshold for restriction on removal is higher than for asylum, as a noncitizen must show "a clear probability of persecution." Accordingly, the INA provides that

> [T]he Attorney General may not remove an alien to a country if the Attorney General decides that the alien's life or freedom would be threatened in that country because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.[113]

The INA, however, expressly excludes from restriction on removal certain classes of aliens, such as aliens who assisted in Nazi persecution or engaged in genocide.[114] Section 241(b)(3)(B) additionally excludes from eligibility for restriction on removal any alien if the Attorney General determines that:

> i. the alien ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in the persecution of an individual because of the individual's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion;
>
> ii. the alien, having been convicted of a particularly serious crime, is a danger to the community of the United States;
>
> iii. there are serious reasons to believe that the alien committed a serious non-political crime outside the United States before the alien arrived in the United States; or
>
> iv. there are reasonable grounds to believe that the alien is a danger to the security of the United States.[115]

One case involving the so-called "persecutor bar" to an asylum claim in (i), above, involved a former Peruvian military officer who was guarding a path while, unbeknownst to him, military units were massacring sixty-nine civilians during Peru's struggle against the Shining Path.[116]

---

107 Id. at 837 (internal quotations omitted).

108 Id. at 838.

109 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, supra note 1, at Art. 33.

110 INA § 241(b)(3)(A), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3)(a) (1994 and Supp. 1999); 8 C.F.R. § 208.16 (2006), as enacted by the IIRAIRA § 304(a)(3).

111 Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 33.05[7].

112 See 8 C.F.R. §§ 208.3(b) "An asylum application shall be deemed to constitute at the same time an application for withholding of removal." Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 34.03[1].

113 INA § 241(b)(3), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3)(A).

114 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3)(B) (Supp. 1999).

115 Id.

116 See generally, Castaneda-Castillo v. Holder, 638 F.3d 354, 359 (1st Cir. 2011) (noting that the BIA held that the "persecutor bar" did not apply as there was little evidence that the alien had "prior or contemporaneous knowledge of the . . . massacre"). This case also set forth the analysis of whether the alien faces

The original Withholding of Deportation (now Withholding of Removal) provision of the Refugee Act, which removed that remedy from the Attorney General's discretion, was based on Articles 32 and 33 of the 1951 Convention. These articles became binding on the United States in 1968 upon the country's accession to the 1967 Protocol that incorporated substantially all provisions of the 1951 Refugee Convention.[117] persecution as a member of a particular social group when he claims persecution based on status as an officer. Id. at 362–365. The Court stated:

---

> Castañeda's asylum claims have previously been before this court, having already been the subject of a 2006 panel opinion, Castañeda-Castillo v. Gonzáles, 464 F.3d 112 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Castañeda I"), as well as an en banc decision a year later, ("Castañeda II").[2] In Castañeda II, we vacated the decisions of the Immigration Judge ("IJ") and Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA") applying the "persecutor bar" to Castañeda's asylum claims, and held that the persecutor bar could not be applied to block asylum claims absent a finding that the individual involved had actual knowledge that he or she was engaged in the persecution of others. Castañeda II, 488 F.3d at 22. We remanded the case for further proceedings. [*357] The instant appeal is from the decision of the BIA reviewing the IJ's decision on remand. For reasons explained below, we conclude that the IJ and BIA adjudication of Castañeda's asylum petition was marred by legal error. Consequently, we again vacate the denial of Castañeda's asylum petition and remand for further proceedings
>
> . . .
>
> The government points out that when asylum and extradition "proceedings are contemporaneous, they are related inasmuch as they both involve a determination as to whether a foreign national will be required to return to his country of nationality." This argument ignores the fact that[2]asylum and withholding of removal proceedings are governed by different sources of statutory authority than extradition proceedings. The law governing asylum and withholding of removal was initially established by Congress in sections 208 and 241(b)(3), respectively, of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) of 1952, subsequently amended by the Refugee Act of 1980. See Act of March 17, 1980, Pub. L. No. 96-212, 94 Stat. 102 (1980), codified at 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158 and "In enacting the Refugee Act, Congress sought to bring United States refugee law into conformity with the 1967 United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees . . . to which the United States acceded in 1968." Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100, 1106 (9th Cir. 2000) (citing United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees art. 33, Jan. 31, 1967, 19 U.S.T. 6223, T.I.A.S. 6577); Matter of Acosta, 19 I. & N. Dec. 211, 219 (BIA 1985) (same). Extradition, in contrast, is governed by 18 U.S.C. § 3184, which in turn rests on "treat[ies] or convention[s] for extradition between the United States and any foreign government." Id. In this case, the relevant treaty is the bilateral extradition treaty between the United States and Perú. See Extradition Treaty, U.S.–Perú, July 26, 2001, S. Treaty Doc. 107-6. In short, although asylum and extradition proceedings are related insofar as they both bear on whether Castañeda will ultimately be forced to return to Perú, they are rooted in distinct sources of law, governed by procedures specified in distinct statutory regimes, and responsive to different sets of policy concerns.

Castaneda-Castillo, 638 F. 3d at 356, 361.

117 The Protocol provides in article I:

> 1. The State Parties to the present protocol undertake to apply articles 2 to 34 inclusive of the Convention to refugees as hereinafter defined. 2. For the purpose of the present Protocol, the term "refugee" shall, except as regards the application of paragraph 3 of this article, mean any person within the definition of article 1 of the Convention as if the words "As a result of events occurring before 1 January 1951 and . . . " and the words " . . . as a result of such events," in article 1A(2) were omitted. 3. The present Protocol shall be applied by the State Parties hereto without any geographic limitations, save that existing declarations made by States already Parties to the Convention in accordance with article IB(1)(a) of the Convention, shall, unless extended under article 1B(2) thereof, apply also under the present Protocol.

Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, supra note 1.

Article 32 of the 1951 Refugee Convention, entitled "Expulsion," states:

> 1. The Contracting States shall not expel a refugee lawfully in their territory, save on grounds of national security or public order.
>
> 2. The expulsion of such a refugee shall be only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with due process of law. Except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, the refugee shall be allowed to submit evidence to clear himself, and to appeal to and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority.
>
> 3. The Contracting States shall allow such a refugee a reasonable period within which to seek legal admission into another country. The Contracting States reserve the right to apply during that period such internal measures as they may deem necessary.[118]

Article 33 of the 1951 Refugee Convention, entitled "Prohibition of Expulsion or Return ('Refoulement')," states:

> 1. No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.
>
> 2. The benefit of the present provision may not, however, be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country.[119]

Even aside from its inclusion in Article 33 of the 1951 Refugee Convention, the principle of non-refoulement has long been considered a customary norm of international law,[120] and has been suggested to have risen to the status of jus cogens.[121] United States courts have not agreed on whether customary international law, in the case of non-refoulement, controls and takes precedent over U.S. national policy.[122]

---

118 Convention Relating to Status of Refugees, supra note 1.

119 Id.

120 For example, the 1969 American Convention on Human Rights ("Pact of San Jose, Costa Rica") prohibits the deportation or return of any alien to a country where his or her life or freedom would be in danger of being violated. The OAS Official Records of the 1969 American Convention specifically reads: "In no case may an alien be deported or returned to a country, regardless of whether or not it is his country of origin, if in that country his right to life or personal freedom is in danger of being violated because of his race, nationality, religion, social status, or political opinions." OEA/Ser.K/XVI/1.1. Article 22(8). Furthermore, the Organization of African Unity likewise recognized the right to non-refoulement in its 1969 Convention Governing the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa, 14 U.N.T.S. 691. Article II(3) of the 1969 African Convention provides: "No person shall be subjected . . . to measures such as rejection at the frontier, return or expulsion, which would compel him to return to or remain in a territory where his life, physical integrity or liberty would be threatened for [reasons for which the OAU recognizes a person as a refugee]." Id. See also Guy Goodwin-Gill, Non-Refoulement and the New Asylum Seekers, 26 Va. J. Int'l L. 896, 902 (1986) (arguing that obligations arising from the principle of non-refoulement come from both conventional and customary law).

121 1985 Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, U.N. Doc. E/1985/62 (1985).

122 See Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 33.07[3]; Customary International Law, Release No. 113, June 2006. An immigration judge in 1990 ruled that customary international law mandated that aliens coming from El Salvador must be granted safe haven in the United States until the threat ceased. Matter of Santos, File A29-564-781 (IJ Aug. 24, 1990), summarized in 67 Interpreter Releases 945, 982 (Aug. 1990). However, an appellate judge ruled that customary international law could not "preempt national policy reflected in statutes dealing with refugees." The judge further stated that there was no uniform practice that could be seen as customary international law. Echeverria-Hernandez v. U.S. INS, 923 F.2d 688, 692, 11 Immigr. Rep. A2-318 (9th Cir. 1991).

5.4. Asylum Distinguished from Restriction on Removal

Although asylum and restriction on removal differ procedurally and in their relief, persons granted restriction on removal will not be returned to the country where they fear persecution, as with asylum. Asylum applies only to refugees applying for sanctuary at a port of entry or while physically present in the United States. Moreover, asylum is a discretionary remedy, and applicants can be denied even if they meet substantive requirements,[123] whereas, restriction on removal is mandatory.[124] Although a person granted restriction on removal under § 241(b)(3) of the INA does not become an asylee by the virtue of such grant (i.e., he/she does not gain the privilege to remain in the United States permanently), the person nonetheless will not be returned to the country where he/she fears persecution.

Although there is this similarity between a grant of asylum pursuant to § 208 and restriction on removal pursuant to § 241(b)(3), the legal standards for securing either remedy and the effects of meeting such standards differ from each other. An alien seeking asylum under § 208 has a lower standard of persuasion than does an alien seeking withholding of removal. In INS v. Stevic,[125] the U.S. Supreme Court held that an applicant for withholding of removal (now restriction on removal)[126] must prove his/her claim by showing a "clear probability" of persecution should he/she be returned to his/her country of origin. Subsequently, in INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca,[127] the Court held that the standard of persuasion for asylum is lower. The Court decided that to qualify for asylum, an applicant only needs to show a "well-founded fear" of persecution, and noted that this is a lower standard than the "clear probability" showing required for withholding of deportation.[128]

The effects of successful persuasion with respect to asylum and withholding of deportation also differ. An alien who succeeds in persuading the adjudicator of a "clear probability" of persecution should the alient return to his/her country of origin must receive restriction on removal unless he/she fails to qualify for this remedy by virtue of one or more of the exclusionary clauses of § 241(b)(3). This is because § 241(b)(3) unambiguously provides that the Attorney General may not deport any alien if the alien would be persecuted upon his/her return. On the other hand, an alien who shows a "well-founded fear" of persecution merely qualifies for a discretionary grant of asylum. This too is clear from the statute, which at § 208 provides that "the Attorney General may grant asylum to an alien . . . if the Attorney General determines that such alien is a refugee . . . "[129] The INA defines a refugee as an alien who is unable or unwilling to return to his/her country of origin because of a well-founded fear of persecution on the grounds of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.[130]

---

123 Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 33.05[2]. Applicants can be denied for persecution of others (INA 208(b)(2)(A)(i), 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(2)(A)(i)), criminal activities (INA § 208(b)(2)(A)(ii), 8 U.S.C. § 1158 (b)(2)(A)(ii)), nonpolitical crimes outside the United States (INA § 208(b)(2)(A)(iii), 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(2)(A)(iii)), or terrorist activities (INA §208(b)(2)(A)(v), 8 U.S.C. §1158(b)(2)(A)(v)).

124 In re Salim, 18 I & N Dec. 311 (BIA 1982). see Kurzban, supra note 47, at 520–528 (collecting cases on withholding of removal).

125 INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407 (1984).

126 Id.

127 INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421 (1987).

128 The Court observed that "[o]ne can certainly have a well-founded fear of an event happening when there is a less than 50% chance of the occurrence taking place." Id. at 431. To show a "clear probability," however, one must prove a chance higher than 50 percent. Id.

129 8 U.S.C. § 1158 (6)(1) (2000 and Supp. 2004).

130 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(42)(A) (1994), amended by Pub. L. 104-208, § 601(a)(1), Sept. 30, 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-689.

Following the U.S. Senate ratification of the Convention against Torture (CAT),[131] the government implemented CAT through § 2242 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998.[132] The implementation of CAT created a new section in the Code of Federal Regulations that provides a temporary form of relief from removal.[133] This section provides for the deferral of removal of an alien who has been ordered removed, who was found by the immigration judge to be "more likely than not to be tortured in the country of removal,"[134] and who is subject to the mandatory denial of withholding of removal provisions,[135] which are derived from the exception provision to withholding of removal in the INA.[136] As mentioned above, the procedure of deferral of removal is a temporary one, which means that the deferral is subject to termination through an administrative hearing by the immigration judge, during which the alien bears the burden of proving that he/she is more likely than not to be tortured if sent back to the country of removal.[137] The deferral of removal will not grant the alien any lawful status, which will mean that the alien will likely be detained until the deferral is terminated or until a third country will accept the alien.[138]

---

131 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, U.N. G.A. Res. 39/46 Annex, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/708, Annex (1984), reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984).

132 Pub. L. 105-277 112 Stat. 2681, 2681–2821.

133 8 C.F.R. §208.17 (2006); 8 C.F.R. §208.16(c) (2006). see Kurzban, supra note 47, at 528–538 (collecting cases involving CAT and asylum).

134 8 C.F.R. § 208.17(b)(2006).

135 8 C.F.R. § 208.16(d)(2)–(3), 17(a) (2006).

136 8 C.F.R. § 243(h)(3)(2006).

137 8 C.F.R. § 208.17(d)(2006). For a case involving an application for asylum and withholding from removal based on the CAT, see Sarhan v. Holder, 658 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2011) (discussing whether a woman who would be subjected to an "honor killing" was entitled to relief under the CAT or withholding of removal):

> Withholding of removal is mandatory under the INA if an applicant establishes that it is more likely than not that she would be persecuted in the country of removal "because of [her] race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion."; see also Benitez Ramos v. Holder, 589 F.3d 426, 430–31 (7th Cir. 2009). The requirements for obtaining relief under the CAT are also stringent, but they differ in some respects from those for withholding. "To obtain protection under CAT, one must show that '"it is more likely than not that one would be tortured if removed to the proposed country of removal.'" Toure v. Holder, 624 F.3d 422, 429 (7th Cir. 2010) (quoting from Rashiah v. Ashcroft, 388 F.3d 1126, 1131 (7th Cir. 2004)). "Torture" for these purposes is defined as:
>
> > any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or her or a third person information or a confession, punishing him or her for an act he or she or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or her or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.
>
> 8 C.F.R. § 208.18.
>
> Unlike the remedy of withholding of removal, relief under the CAT is not conditioned on proof that the alien has been persecuted because of one of the five grounds listed in the INA. On the other hand, the need to prove "torture," as so defined, sets a high bar for relief. Relief under both the CAT and the withholding provisions requires the applicant to prove that it is "more likely than not" that the adverse consequences will occur if she is returned to the country in question.
>
> Sarhan, 658 F. 3d at 652.

138 8 CFR § 208.17(c)(2006).

The Third Circuit in Khouzam v. Chertoff considered a petition for deferral on removal based on the CAT.[139] Khouzam, a Coptic Christian, was granted a deferral of removal after lengthy legal proceedings, based on a finding that it was more likely than not that he would be tortured if returned to Egypt.[140] In 2007, the DHS, based on Egyptian diplomatic assurances that Khouzam would not be tortured on his return, prepared to remove him.[141] Khouzam filed an emergency habeas corpus and stay of removal petition arguing that DHS's action violated the prior order granting him CAT relief, and also violated his due process rights by failing to give him an opportunity to review and challenge the decision to remove him based on the diplomatic assurances.[142] After discussing the relevant legal provisions of the CAT as implemented by the Foreign Affair Reforms and Restructuring Act (FARR), the court considered the Department of Justice's regulations regarding the use of diplomatic assurances and termination of deferral of removal.[143] The court noted that once the Attorney General determines that a deferral of removal should be terminated based on diplomatic assurances, there is no guidance on procedures due to the alien in such circumstance.[144] After finding that the 2007 DHS order was a final order of removal, the court concluded it had jurisdiction to review the order removal pursuant to section 1252 of the REAL ID Act.[145] The court, after rejecting Khouzam's argument that it should adopt a categorical rather than individualized approach to deferral of removal to Egypt based on a history of consistent use of torture, considered whether to satisfy due process requirements the FARR required affording aliens in Khouzam's situation with notice and a hearing prior to removal.[146] After reviewing the DOJ's regulations regarding the 139 Khouzam v. Chertoff, 549 F.3d 235 (3d Cir. 2008).

---

140 Khouzam was wanted by Egyptian authorities for homicide, and was not granted withholding of removal due to "serious reasons" to believe that he had committed the homicide. He was granted a deferral of removal based on evidence of general torture and abuse of suspects by the Egyptian authorities as well as scars indicating that Khouzam was himself subjected to torture and abuse. Id. at 239–240.

141 Id. at 239.

142 Id. at 240–241.

143 Id. at 241–244. 8 C.F.R. § 1208.18(c) governs the use of diplomatic assurances and provides:

> Diplomatic assurances against torture obtained by the Secretary of State.
>
> (1) The Secretary of State may forward to the Attorney General assurances that the Secretary has obtained from the government of a specific country that an alien would not be tortured there if the alien were removed to that country.
>
> (2) If the Secretary of State forwards assurances described in paragraph (c)(1) of this section to the Attorney General for consideration by the Attorney General or her delegates under this paragraph, the Attorney General shall determine, in consultation with the Secretary of State, whether the assurances are sufficiently reliable to allow the alien's removal to that country consistent with Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture. The Attorney General's authority under this paragraph may be exercised by the Deputy Attorney General or by the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, but may not be further delegated.
>
> (3) Once assurances are provided under paragraph (c)(2) of this section, the alien's claim for protection under the Convention Against Torture shall not be considered further by an immigration judge, the Board of Immigration Appeals, or an asylum officer.

Section 1208.17(f) discussed the termination of deferral of removal based on diplomatic assurances and states:

> Termination pursuant to § 1208.18(c) [diplomatic assurances]. At any time while deferral of removal is in effect, the Attorney General may determine whether deferral should be terminated based on diplomatic assurances forwarded by the Secretary of State pursuant to the procedures in § 1208.18(c).

144 Khouzam v. Chertoff, 549 F.3d 235, 243–244 (3d Cir. 2008).

145 Id. at 244, 246–249.

146 Id. at 254–255. The court considered and rejected the government's arguments regarding the political question doctrine and rule of non-inquiry. Id. at 249–254.

use of diplomatic assurances in termination of a deferral of removal, the court found that those regulations neither permitted nor prohibited an alien's challenge of those diplomatic assurances, and considered what process Khouzam was due under his circumstances.[147] The court determined that Khouzam was entitled to due process, specifically stating that:

> In Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 96 S. Ct. 893, 47 L. Ed. 2d 18 (1976), the Supreme Court explained that "[t]he fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner." Id. at 333. We have found that due process guarantees three basic things in the removal context. First, an alien facing removal "is entitled to factfinding based on a record produced before the decisionmaker and disclosed to him or her." Abdulai, 239 F.3d at 549 (internal quotation marks omitted). This includes a "reasonable opportunity to present evidence on [his or her] behalf." Abdulrahman, 330 F.3d at 596. Second, the alien "must be allowed to make arguments on his or her own behalf." Abdulai, 239 F.3d at 549. Third, the alien "has the right to an individualized determination of his or her interests." Id. (brackets and internal quotation marks omitted). These elements are predicated upon the existence of a "neutral and impartial" decisionmaker. See Abdulrahman, 330 F.3d at 596 (internal quotation marks omitted).[148]

As Khouzam was unable to raise any arguments on his behalf, the government failed to engage in any fact-finding, and there was no neutral and impartial decision-maker tasked with making an individualized determination of Khouzam's circumstances, the court concluded that the government failed to afford Khouzam sufficient process to comport with his constitutionally required due process rights.[149] Last, the court found that Khouzam had suffered "substantial prejudice" as the complete lack of process was inherently prejudicial.[150] As such, the court vacated the termination of Khouzam's deferral of removal and remanded the case to the BIA for additional proceedings.[151]

5.5. Parole

In addition to securing a grant of asylum or restriction on removal, parole is another means by which a person may forestall a potential return to his/her country of origin, as it allows a temporary harbor in the United States for urgent humanitarian reasons or for reasons rooted in public interest.[152] Parole is a purely discretionary matter and a legal fiction that considers parolees to be outside the United States' borders, although they are usually physically in the country. It does not confer any legal residence status on the grantee. Parole is a device of wide flexibility.[153] Because of this flexibility, the power to admit aliens on parole has been used in a constantly increasing variety of cases. It has been used to admit thousands of refugees, many of whom were eventually given the right to acquire a permanent resident status in the United States.

The parole provision of the INA provides that:

> The Attorney General may . . . in his discretion parole into the United States temporarily under such conditions as he may prescribe for emergent reasons or for reasons deemed strictly in the public interest any alien applying for admission to the United States, but such parole of such 147 Id. at 255–256.

148 Id. at 257.

149 Id. at 257–258.

150 Id. at 258.

151 Id. at 259–260.

152 IIRAIRA, INA § 212(d)(5)(A), 8 C.F.R. § 212.15(a) (2006); see Kurzban, supra note 47, at 538–539 (collecting cases on parole).

153 Gordon et al, 5 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 62.01[3].

> alien shall not be regarded as an admission of the alien and when the purposes of such parole shall, in the opinion of the Attorney General, have been served the alien shall forthwith return or be returned to the custody from which he was paroled and thereafter his case shall continue to be dealt with in the same manner as that of any other applicant for admission to the United States.[154]

The parole provision was originally intended to aid high-level communist defectors, or someone extremely ill or shipwrecked at sea, in order to allow the person to gain admission into the United States without going through the bureaucracy associated with regular admission procedures.[155] When the exigencies of the moment have appeared to require it, the Attorney General's parole authority has been exercised according to the broadest possible interpretation, and it appears that the parole authority will continue to be broadly construed when the situation warrants it.

Parole can be terminated upon the fulfillment of its conditions or limitations, or if it is no longer warranted, or upon the individual's departure from the United States.[156] Once parole is terminated, the parolee reverts to a normal applicant for admission to the United States, who is subject to the normal admissibility proceedings, usually removal proceedings.[157]

In the case of extradition, a noncitizen who is extradited to the United States for prosecution is admitted on parole, which is not considered an application for admission to the United States.[158] After the noncitizen is acquitted or has served his sentence and the criminal process is completed, the noncitizen is given a reasonable opportunity to voluntarily leave the country, and if he/she fails to do so is considered an applicant for admission to the United States and will be processed through removal proceedings.[159]

The United States has also used a process of "silent parole" to allow the temporary entry of wanted individuals into the United States so that they may be detained in the United States. In one case, the U.S. district attorney obtained an arrest warrant, which was kept under seal, and coordinated with the DHS to allow the subject of the arrest warrant to enter the United States under "silent parole." At no time was the accused aware of any of the charges against him, and the United States never pursued a formal extradition request with the accused's country of nationality. The U.S. court of appeals, considering whether there was a violation of the relevant extradition treaty, found none, as the extradition treaty did not specify that extradition was the sole means by which an individual may be obtained.[160]

---

154 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(a) (1994), amended by Pub. L. 104-208, § 602(a), Sept. 30, 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-689. See also 8 C.F.R. § 212.5 (2006).

155 Congress reaffirmed its original intent with regard to the parole provision in 1965 when it amended the INA. Act of October 3, 1965, 79 Stat. 911.

156 8 C.F.R. § 212.5(e) (2006); Gordon et al, 5 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 62.01[3].

157 Id.

158 Id. See In re Badalamenti, 19 I & N Dec. 623, 6 Immigr. Rep. B1-43 (BIA 1988) (United States requests that a noncitizen be allowed to enter the United States as parole in the public interest); see also 8 C.F.R. § 212.5(a)(2).

159 Id. See also 8 C.F.R. §215.5(b)(5) (2006).

160 For a more detailed discussion of the facts, see David C. Levenson, Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon Rejects Turkish Man's Claims of Violation of United States–Turkey Extradition Treaty, 25 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 360–363 (Sept. 2009). The Supreme Court of Canada also considered this issue. See Németh v. Canada (Ministre de la Justice), [2010] SCC 56, at 193 (Can.).

6. The Interrelationship between Asylum and Extradition[161]

6.1. Two Different but Related Processes

In the United States, extradition is a judicial determination, while asylum is an executive one. As a result of the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers, extradition and asylum proceedings are not related, and the legislative authority on which extradition relies is different from that of asylum. Title 18 U.S.C. § 3181 et seq. regulates the substance and procedure of extradition, along with provisions of the applicable treaty. The INA, §§ 208, 241(b)(3), § 601 of IIRAIRA, govern the domestic provisions for asylum and restriction removal. Due to oversight, the two processes, asylum and extradition, overlap and deal concurrently with some common issues without legislative coordination.

First, judicial findings of political persecution in extradition proceedings are not binding on the USCIS in asylum proceedings, and similarly USCIS decisions to grant asylum on either a political or a humanitarian basis are not binding upon a court sitting in extradition proceedings. Thus, though grounds for granting asylum may be the same as those for denying extradition, they are not conclusive as to each of the respective procedures because they derive from different statutory authorities and are subject to separate authoritative decision-making processes.

Second, although the prospect of persecution is a key factor in asylum and withholding of deportation determinations, in extradition determinations the rule of non-inquiry compels courts to ignore the prospective treatment of the relator in the requesting state.[162] Consequently, courts in extradition proceedings may rely on different considerations from those upon which the administrative agency empowered to grant asylum or upon which withholding of deportation relies.

It should also be noted that asylum proceedings, though essentially administrative and subject to limited judicial review, are subject to political influence, which broad administrative discretion usually permits. Extradition, being initially a judicial determination, is less affected by political influence.

Also noteworthy is the fact that although an administrative judge may decide, in accordance with a statute, that an individual is entitled to asylum, the granting of asylum itself may be blocked by the executive branch of the government. The Attorney General, or the Department of State as an advisor to the Attorney General, would prevail in opposing a particular grant of asylum in such a situation. Executive discretion would prevail to the limits of countervailing mandatory statutory pronouncements that remove specific discretionary powers from the Attorney General or the executive branch.[163] With respect to extradition it must be noted that a decision to deliver a relator judicially deemed extraditable is also ultimately an executive branch decision, in that the court merely certifies the individual to be extraditable, whereas the decision to deliver the relator to the requesting state is one that is made by the president through the secretary of state. Therefore, it is possible at that juncture for the secretary of state to exercise "executive discretion."[164] In this respect, political considerations may become a factor, and ultimately extradition may not be effectuated. Thus, although the extradition and 161 For discussion of the use of immigration as an alternative to extradition, see Ch. IV. See also In re Extradition of Kapoor, 2011 U.S. Dist. Lexis 65054 (E.D.N.Y. June 6, 2011).

162 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

163 See 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3) (Supp. 1999) (making mandatory withholding of deportation in certain cases).

164 See Ch. IX, Sec. 2.

asylum procedures differ from each other and are grounded in different statutory authorities, both are ultimately subject to a determination made by the executive branch of the government.

There is also a relationship between removal (deportation) proceedings and extradition. Normally, removal proceedings are kept on hold until the extradition proceedings have concluded.[165] However, even though a noncitizen may have his/her extradition proceedings discharged, this decision will not bind the immigration courts in removal proceedings.[166] Furthermore, extradition will not preclude removal proceedings.[167]

However, there are two instances when executive discretion does not apply. When, in extradition proceedings, a court decides that an individual is not extraditable, it is not in the discretion of the executive to surrender him/her. Similarly, when an alien faces persecution in his/her country of origin if returned there, the restriction on removal under § 241(b)(3) of the INA is mandatory and the executive may not return the alien.[168]

Because the statutory bases and procedures for asylum and extradition are different and unrelated, both procedures may be pursued concurrently, though at times they could deal with the same subject matter. Should this indeed occur, the result would be confusion and delay, as well as potential conflict in legal findings. To illustrate, consider the following hypothetical cases:

1. An individual arrives in the United States and applies for asylum. He/she is not at that point sought by a foreign state, and thus there are no extradition proceedings pending. The case proceeds in accordance with the Refugee Act until the individual either receives asylum under § 208 or restriction on removal under § 241(b)(3)(B) on the grounds that he/she would be subjected to persecution in his/her country of origin because of his political beliefs. Subsequent to the grant of asylum or restriction on removal, the individual becomes the subject of an extradition request by his/her country of origin. At the extradition hearing, the relator, relying on his/her asylum or restriction on removal status, argues that his/her extradition is sought on political grounds. The extradition court would not be bound by the administrative decision granting the alien asylum or restriction on removal, nor by the alien's proven well-founded fear or clear probability of persecution in his/her country of origin as conclusive with respect to the issue of denial of extradition on the grounds of the "political offense exception."[169] The extradition judge would be free to make his/her own findings of fact and conclusions of law, which could be contrary to the earlier findings upon which asylum or withholding of deportation was granted. The secretary of state, acting for the executive branch, would have to resolve the conflict.

---

165 Gordon et al, 1 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 72.01[5]. See also In re Kam-Shu, 477 F.2d 33 (5th Cir. 1973) (paroled for extradition); In re Perez-Jiminez, 10 I & N Dec. 309 (BIA 1963) (deportation order withdrawn and case held in abeyance pending conclusion of extradition process).

166 Gordon et al, 6 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 72.01[5]. In re McMullen, 17 I. & N. Dec. 542 (BIA 1980) (conviction was political and thus not controlling in passing on persecution claim in deportation proceedings). See also 71 Interpreter Releases 746 (June 6, 1994) (reviewing extradition and deportation proceedings for John Demjanjuk).

167 Gordon et al, 6 Immigration Law & Procedure, supra note 47, at § 72.01[5]; Linnas v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024, 1031–1032, 3 Immigr. Rep. A2-277 (2d Cir. 1986) (court rejected contention that deportation was effectively extradition in absence of an extradition treaty); Doherty v. Thornburgh, 943 F.2d 204, 208 (2d Cir. 1991) (eight-year detention awaiting deportation and extradition was not unconstitutional).

168 However, it is within the discretion of the Attorney General to determine whether the alien applies for the exception under § 241(b)(3)(B).

169 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

From a public policy point of view, this is clearly a situation that is detrimental to the United States. If the United States refuses to surrender the individual by using executive discretion, it will anger the requesting state, which would have relied on the judiciary's grant of extradition. If the United States does surrender the individual, it will violate the individual's right to asylum and his internationally and domestically protected right not to be returned to a place where he would be persecuted. This situation is a result of the duality of extradition and asylum procedures that are dysfunctionally separate by reason of a legislative oversight.

2. In the second hypothetical case, an extradition request has been filed in a federal district court, the individual is subject to the extradition proceedings, and the court finds the individual not extraditable on the grounds that the crime for which he/she is requested constitutes a "political offense." The individual then files for political asylum in the United States, but the immigration authorities find that he/she does not fall within the meaning of the statute, or exercise administrative discretion and deny his/her asylum. The individual who is found not extraditable for political reasons would still not be able to obtain the status of political asylum in the United States because the extradition decision is not conclusive with respect to the asylum decision. The individual could then face return to his/her country of origin unless he/she would be able to invoke the protection of § 241(b)(3) of the INA and have his/her removal restricted by proving that, if returned, he/she would be persecuted in his/her country of origin on the basis of his/her political opinion. Again, the United States would risk embarrassment arising from the extradition–asylum conflict.

Indeed, this situation has transpired in the case involving Joseph Doherty.[170] The United Kingdom sought to extradite Doherty from the United States, where he was illegally, for his participation in the killing of a British Security Forces captain in Belfast, Northern Ireland. The federal district court for the Southern District of New York ruled that Doherty's extradition was barred because the crime for which the United Kingdom sought his extradition constituted a "political offense" within the meaning of the extradition treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom.[171] The then INS resumed deportation proceedings that had been pending against Doherty since the time of the extradition request. After eight years of litigation, the INS deported Doherty to the United Kingdom where he began serving a life sentence, but was later released in 1998 under the provisions of the Good Friday Agreement. Clearly, in Doherty's case, a finding of non-extraditability on grounds of a "political offense" did not preclude his eventual deportation on immigration grounds. The United States deported Doherty to the United Kingdom although, because of the life sentence for his political offense, Doherty faced a clear probability of persecution there.[172] Thus, what could not be achieved through extradition was accomplished through deportation.

As asylum and extradition are independent of each other, neither one can prevent the other. Thus, assuming that an extradition request or an asylum request is pending, does the fact that one of the two procedures is in progress mean that the other cannot proceed? The answer is negative, as there is no statutory provision on this point. In one decision, the First Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the U.S. government's argument that there should be no merits adjudication of an asylum claim until extradition proceedings are resolved.[173] The court reasoned,

---

170 For a thorough discussion of this case, see Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

171 In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 277 (S.D.N.Y. 1984).

172 Note, however, that what was at the time § 243(h) of the Refugee Act, which was titled "withholding of deportation," was not directly implicated in the decision concerning Doherty's deportation. Although Doherty at one time had filed applications for asylum and withholding of deportation, subsequently he had withdrawn these applications. INS v. Doherty, 502 U.S. 314 (1992), rev'g Doherty v. INS, 908 F.2d 1108 (2d Cir. 1990).

173 Castaneda-Castillo v. Holder, 638 F.3d 354 (1st Cir. 2011).

in part, that the government's argument that an adjudication of the merits of the asylum claim would unduly interfere with the sensitive foreign policy considerations in the extradition process ignored "the fact that asylum and withholding of removal proceedings are governed by different sources of statutory authority than extradition proceedings," and that "asylum and extradition proceedings are 'separate and distinct,' in the sense that 'the resolution of even a common issue in one proceeding is not binding in the other.' "[174] Of course, the asylum applicant or extradition relator can seek the other procedure. It could be assumed that the court in an extradition hearing would have no reason to stay its proceedings pending an asylum decision, which would not be binding upon it anyway. But the court may do so for the purpose of allowing a determination of asylum. This could produce the practical effect that the "executive discretion" of the executive branch in the asylum case would prevail and once the judiciary decision regarding extradition were reached, the relator would not be extradited in any case. In fact, that would be a practical solution that would enhance judicial economy. It may be more likely, however, that the asylum proceedings would be stayed pending the extradition hearing so as to find out whether the crime for which extradition is requested is one for which extradition cannot be granted. This solution would give the government an opportunity to rely on the judicial decision rather than an administrative decision that could be politically bothersome. In any event, there is always the possibility of executive discretion in refusing to surrender the relator.

The interrelationship between asylum and extradition also involves the "rule of non-inquiry."[175] Under this rule, extradition proceedings do not consider the subsequent treatment of the relator after he has been returned to a requesting state. In determining whether to grant asylum or to withhold removal, however, the adjudicator must precisely consider the individual's treatment upon return to his country of origin.[176] However, with the United States' accession to the 1967 Refugee Protocol, courts in extradition cases have started to look into the issue of treatment upon return as well,[177] though it is and should remain an issue to be considered by the executive branch in accordance with the appropriate legislation enacted especially to that end. Because of a lack of coordinating legislation between the related issues and procedures, the consideration of subsequent treatment injects into the extradition proceedings a dimension that does not properly belong there.

Under the draft of the 1982 Extradition Act, a question relating to the motives of a requesting state, particularly as to whether extradition is sought for purposes of persecuting the relator, is left to the discretion of the secretary of state.[178] The Act does not make a distinction between the political motives of the requesting state and a possible violation of internationally protected human rights norms. Both are dealt with in the same context and are left to the secretary of state for his/her unreviewable discretion, without authority for the judiciary (the extradition magistrate or judge) to inquire into such considerations.[179]

---

174 Id. at 360–361.

175 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8. For an argument that the rule of non-inquiry should not apply to removal cases, see Aaron S.J. Zelinsky, Comment: Khouzam v. Chertoff: Torture, Removal, and the Rule of Noninquiry, 28 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 233 (2009).

176 See supra Sec. 4.2.

177 See Nicosia v. Wall, 442 F.2d 1005 (5th Cir. 1971); Sindona v. Grant, 461 F. Supp. 199 (S.D.N.Y. 1978); but see Eain v. Wilkes, 641 F. 2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981).

178 See generally M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extradition Reform Legislation in the United States: 1981–1983, 17 Akron L. Rev. 495 (1984) (discussing the 1981, 1982, and 1983 Extradition Reform Acts).

179 The contrary position was taken by this writer before congressional hearings on the proposed 1981 and 1982 Extradition Acts. See Hearings on S. 1639 and S. 1940 Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 20 (1981) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni); Hearings on H.R. 5227 Before the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni); Hearings

A classic case involving the interplay of extradition and asylum proceedings is that of Barapind v. Reno.[180] Kulvir Singh Barapind, who attempted to enter the United States under a false name, was detained for an INA violation and deemed an excludable alien. He then applied for asylum pursuant to § 208(a) of the Refugee Act of 1980.[181] While these proceedings were pending before the INS, the government of India sought his extradition. The immigration judge, in reliance upon India's extradition request, found Barapind excludable and ineligible for asylum. Several other proceedings followed before the BIA and the federal district court for the Eastern District of California to consider Barapind's petition for declaratory, injunctive, and habeas corpus relief to suspend his deportation and to deny his extradition. The federal district court in Barapind v. Reno[182] denied Barapind's motion and the Ninth Circuit affirmed,[183] holding: "we confront the question of whether the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) may hold the adjudication of a petitioner's asylum application in abeyance pending the resolution of his parallel extradition proceedings in federal district court. We conclude that the BIA may do so, and affirm the judgment of the district court, albeit on different grounds."[184] The Ninth Circuit also affirmed the separate nature of INS proceedings for removal or exclusion, irrespective of the course of extradition proceedings. The Ninth Circuit outlined the interplay between asylum and the "political offense" exception to extradition.[185]

Somewhere in determining the "political offense" exception during an extradition request, the court should examine each of the relator's alleged crimes in respect to each of the relator's acts. The existence of the "political offense" exception with respect to one of the crimes charged as it relates to one of the acts committed does not necessarily apply to another crime charged based on the same or other facts if the legal tests of the "political offense" exception are not satisfied with respect to each of the crimes charged.[186] Thus, if the theory is relying on the "incidental test" established in Quinn v. Robinson, that test has to be satisfied with respect to each of the crimes charged.[187] on H.R. 6046 Before the House Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. (1982) (remarks of M. Cherif Bassiouni). See also Ch. VI, Sec. 7; Ch. IX, Secs. 7 and 8.

---

180 Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d. 1100 (9th Cir. 2000) (appeal from 72 F. Supp. 2d. 1132 (E.D. Cal. 1999)).

181 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158 and 1253(h) (2000 and Supp. 2004). The Act incorporates the relevant provisions of the 1967 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, which was ratified by the United States. 19 U.S.T. 6223. See also Orantes-Hernandez v. Thornburgh, 919 F.2d 549 (9th Cir. 1990).

182 Barapind, 225 F.3d 1100.

183 Id.

184 Id. at 1103.

185 See generally, Hansdeep Singh, Bringing Fairness to Extradition Hearings: Proposing a Revised Evidentiary Bar for Political Dissidents, 38 Cal. W. Int'l L. J. 177 (2007) (discussing the proceedings involving Barapind and arguing for a broader right of defendants to contest foreign governments' evidence during an extradition hearing). See inter alia, McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d. 591 (9th Cir. 1986), overruled in part by Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2005). McMullen is overruled with respect to applicability of the "incidental test," established in Quinn in dicta, but which under this case became the court's holding. The court also emphasized in Barapind that the burden of showing a factual nexus between the crime and the political goal lies with the requested person. The court for all practical purposes looks at it as if it were an affirmative defense in a criminal case. It should be noted that in the dissent by J. Rymer, the Ninth Circuit is still divided as whether to follow Quinn or whether to follow the "incidental" test by the Supreme Court in Ornelas v. Ruiz, 161 U.S. 502 (1896). This is clear in this case where five judges are dissenting on one issue, namely the different test enunciated in Quinn and Ornelas.

186 Barapind v. Enomoto, 400 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2005).

187 Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 809–810 (9th Cir. 1986). The "incidental to" prong inquires into whether a defendant's crimes are "causally or ideologically related" to a political uprising, focusing on the motivation for the acts, rather than the type of acts. Barapind, 400 F.3d at 750, citing Quinn, 783 F.2d at 809–810.

Under the USA PATRIOT Act and other new antiterrorism legislation, those who are guilty of a felony can be removed (deported). Accordingly, this status can be used for removing an individual instead of using extradition procedures.[188]

6.2. An Appraisal of the Relationship between Asylum and Extradition

The granting of asylum is distinguished from the decision to refuse extradition even though the two are at times intertwined. This is due to the fact that the state of refuge may decide the issue of allowing extradition irrespective of, and separate from, the issue of allowing the relator to remain on its territory or to grant him/her asylum, unless there are other grounds for expulsion such as compliance with the CAT. The extradition question may be decided on narrow, technical grounds, particularly where treaty interpretation may be involved. The extradition decision is usually left to the judiciary, while the asylum issue is, at least initially, dealt with by the executive and is frequently resolved on political or pragmatic grounds. It is apparent that any argument to sever asylum from extradition, whenever both questions are presented in the same case, is difficult. Whenever political or humanitarian asylum is granted and extradition proceedings are pending, the extradition request should be denied on the same grounds. However, asylum and extradition are not so intricately linked that a state cannot deny extradition on the basis of the "political offense exception" and also refuse to grant asylum to the fugitive.[189] In such a case the requested state will allow the relator the opportunity to choose the destination of departure (known as voluntary departure) or force the person to go to a given country. The United States frequently resorts to this technique to send the individual to the country of his/her nationality, which is on its face valid, even when the state of nationality was the requesting state in the extradition proceedings, and to which extradition was denied. In other words, this approach becomes a way of achieving extradition by other means. It must be remembered that denial of an extradition request does not confer asylum status on the relator.

It is likely that a person seeking to avoid extradition will, therefore, first seek asylum as a tactic for blocking the extradition request. Such a person is likely to seek refuge in a state that has the least interest in preserving the political interests of the requesting state from which the individual fled. Whatever the offender's prior conduct was, he/she is least likely to receive refuge in a state that has close political ties or interests with the state of nationality.

The decision to seek extradition of a fugitive is usually made by the executive of the requesting state. The decision to recognize or reject the requesting state's petition, either for political or humanitarian reasons, lies with the executive in the state of refuge, even though a judicial intervention may occur in the interim. Thus, conflicting policies of distinct authoritative decision-making bodies are likely to clash during the process.

Since WWII, many states have revised their immigration laws to provide asylum for political refugees, however differently asylum may be defined. But the 1967 Protocol has imposed a certain harmonization in the laws and practices of states.[190] This has been done for the avowed purpose of protecting individuals from persecution in the country from which they fled. The decision to request extradition by the requesting state, or to grant or deny extradition by the asylum state may, however, involve the whole spectrum of their political relations. The 188 See Attila Bogdan, Guilty Pleas by Non-Citizens in Illinois: Immigration Consequences Reconsidered, 53 DePaul L Rev 19, 20 (2003) (summarizing immigration statutes: under federal law, a person who is convicted of an "aggravated felony" has fewer grounds for avoiding deportation than a person who is convicted of a felony).

189 For a discussion of the "political offense exception," see Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

190 See, e.g., Kucana v. Holder, 130 S. Ct. 827; 175 L. Ed. 2d 694 (2010); Nemeth v. Canada (Justice), 2010 SCC 56, [2010] 3; R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, 1988 AC 958.

standard by which the relator's conduct will be evaluated and whether he/she will be extradited or granted asylum will depend on the overall political relations between the states involved.

7. Conclusion

The multiplicity of legal processes, norms, and standards applicable ostensibly to the same or similar issues and based on the same or similar facts is, at best, confusing. However, it does serve the government's interests in that the removal of a person from the United States can be achieved in more than one way. Extradition is, so far, the process that offers the greatest due process protections and legal standards and the right to judicial review. The asylum and immigration processes, as discussed in this chapter and in Chapter IV, offer much less protection in terms of due process for the person, including substantive and procedural norms that favor the government, much more than in respect to extradition. Moreover, the legal and evidentiary standards are lesser, thus giving the government additional advantages in obtaining the intended outcome of forceful removal and even surrender to a state whose extradition request has been denied or may be denied.[191] The USA PATRIOT Act[192] and the Homeland Security Act[193] reduce due process protections for a person in the process of asylum and immigration, and the substantive norms and procedural norms are also more favorable to the government, as are legal standards. In short, the right of asylum can easily be circumvented, and there are now several alternative mechanisms to forcefully remove a person from the United States without substantial due process.

191 See Ch. IV.

192 See USA PATRIOT Act, supra note 4.

193 See Homeland Security Act, supra note 5.

Chapter IV

Disguised Extradition: The Use of Immigration Laws as Alternatives to Extradition

Contents

1. Introduction

Disguised extradition is a means by which states achieve jurisdiction over a person without going through official extradition processes. These procedures are lawful but they are sometimes used abusively to circumvent an otherwise accepted ground for denying the return of an individual to a requesting state.[1] This is primarily achieved through the use of immigration law. Such parallel processes are resorted to as a way of avoiding extradition if, in a given case, extradition might be denied or delayed. In other words, if extradition is deemed unlikely and the authorities of the host states are unwilling to accept such a legal outcome, they seek other means more likely to procure the desired outcome. The same may occur in cases where extradition has been denied, and the executive branch subsequently resorts to immigration procedures to achieve the outcome that the extradition process could not.

1 See generally Steven Coren, Note, Disguised Extradition and Abuse of Process, 110 Law Q. Rev. 393 (1994).

Immigration law is the alternative regime by which a person can be delivered to a foreign state without resorting to formal extradition proceedings. Immigration law is used by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and its specialized immigration organ, the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS)[2] in three ways: (1) to deny an alien's admission into the United States, (2) to deport an alien who has entered the United States lawfully, and (3) to denaturalize an individual who had become a U.S. citizen. The first two procedures were formerly known as exclusion and deportation, respectively, but since April 1, 1997, have been combined into a single procedure, known as "removal."[3] Although "removal" is the formal nomenclature for excluding and removing individuals, it is important to note that some removal proceedings are for individuals attempting to enter the United States while other removal proceedings are for individuals who lawfully entered the country, and the procedures employed prior to April 1997 are substantially the same as those employed now. As such, in order to distinguish between the two variants of removal the text may refer to "removal (exclusion)" and "removal (deportation)" to keep the underlying grounds distinct. For cases occurring before 1997 the original terminology is maintained. Removal has its own sub-regime arising under special "terrorism" measures. These practices are separate and distinct from abduction and "extraordinary rendition," which are addressed in Chapter V. The difference between them is the legality or quasi-legality of the former and the illegality or the quasi-illegality of the latter.

It should be remembered that "rendition" refers to the process of surrendering a person from one state to another or to an international tribunal, provided it is done in accordance with the legal and administrative requirements of the surrendering state. Rendition is therefore a synonym for extradition. If the rendition bypasses extradition or other legal processes, it is legally questionable although usually practiced by some states. This form of rendition is still subject to international and regional human rights law norms, however. "Extraordinary rendition" is a term used since 2001 to describe the kidnapping and transfer of individuals by the United States for purposes of interrogation and torture. Although this practice violates the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) and other international human rights law norms, it has not been successfully challenged as a violation of the U.S. Constitution, as the U.S. Supreme Court continues to consider the Constitution and Bill of Rights applicable only on U.S. territory. This interpretation has two effects: first, U.S. and other nationals can be unlawfully seized abroad by U.S. agents or by agents of another state working for or on the behest of U.S. agents, and deprived of the protections afforded by the Constitution; second, the U.S. agents carrying out the questionable act are shielded from accountability.

Since 2001, the United States has made extensive use of immigration and other quasi-legal processes in order to obtain the surrender of persons it seeks from foreign countries without going through formal extradition processes. This is in addition to the increased U.S. domestic practice of delivering persons by and between law enforcement and intelligence officers without employing formal legal processes. In a 2001 report submitted by the Bush administration to Congress with respect to the Foreign Relations Act, it is asserted that over the preceding five years the United States had obtained the extradition of 600 persons, but during that same period of time, 200 persons were surrendered to the United States outside the extradition process through immigration, deportation, or expulsion, or without the use of any legal process whatsoever.[4] Since 2001, it is estimated that the number of persons surrendered to the United States by means other than by extradition has increased, although the exact number is unknown.

---

2 The USCIS replaced the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) in 2003. In this chapter all cases prior to 2003 maintain the INS terminology, while subsequent cases refer to the USCIS. Generic references to USCIS and INS practice refer solely to the USCIS.

3 INA §§ 239, 240; 8 C.F.R. §§ 1003.12 et seq., 1240.1 et seq. For a detailed discussion of the removal process, see Ira J. Kurzban, Kurzban's Immigration Law Sourcebook: A Comprehensive Outline and Reference Tool 45–453 (12th ed. 2010).

The process of surrender by means other than extradition is a dangerous trend, which is led worldwide by the United States, and which is likely to undermine international extradition as the primary legal process through which states surrender to each other a person accused or convicted of a crime. This is a dangerous trend because of the extrajudicial manner in which people are seized in one country and transferred to another, thereby denying individuals the opportunity, whether in the receiving or sending country, to challenge the process of surrender. Also, this process often involves physical use of force against the person surrendered by such means. Such physical abuses may include torture. These practices would thus thrust individuals into a legal black hole where torture and other forms of physical mistreatment are not subject to judicial scrutiny and protection.

2. Modalities of Disguised Extradition Evidenced in Certain Landmark Cases

Disguised extradition occurs when one state uses its immigration laws and police powers in such a way as to make it likely that an individual will fall under the control of the authorities of another state. In essence, it is a method by which a state makes use of its immigration laws to deny an alien the privilege of entering the state or remaining in it by means of administrative and/or judicial proceedings. In the United States this entails removal (exclusion), removal (deportation), and denaturalization. As a result of these proceedings, which sometimes test the legal limits of reasonableness and good faith, the individual in question is placed directly or indirectly in the control or reach of agents of another state that is seeking him without resorting to more burdensome extradition processes.

Disguised extradition is not per se illegal under international law because the fugitive is not abducted,[5] and because it is conducted under color of national judicial and/or administrative proceedings. However, certain aspects of the practice may nonetheless violate international and U.S. law.

The practice of disguised extradition is carried out through active or tacit cooperation between law enforcement and administrative agencies. Its success depends upon the fact that administrative proceedings in most countries confer significant discretionary power upon its authorities with respect to the removal (exclusion) and removal (deportation) of aliens. The administrative review process for such decisions, where available, is slow, and judicial review, if it is available, usually requires exhaustion of administrative remedies and is limited in scope. Administrative processes frequently lack adequate judicial oversight and remedy, and their occurrences also evidence a certain bias against unwanted aliens. The U.S. judiciary has been traditionally deferential to the executive branch in immigration matters.[6] 4 Report on International Extradition submitted to Congress pursuant to Section 211 of the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001 (Pub. L. 106-113).

---

5 See Ch. V.

6 For a somewhat critical position of U.S. practice, see Alona E. Evans, Extradition and Rendition: Problems of Choice, in International Aspects of Criminal Law: Enforcing United States Law in the World Community (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981); Alona E. Evans, The Apprehension and Prosecution of Offenders, in Legal Aspects of International Terrorism 493 (Alona E. Evans & John F. Murphy eds., 1978); Alona E. Evans, Acquisition of Custody over the International Fugitive Offender—Alternatives to Extradition: A Survey of United States Practice, 40 Brit. Y.B. Int' L. 77 (1960). Contra James W.

Disguised extradition exists because the processes of extradition and removal (through immigration law) move along two completely separate and independent tracks, and the principles, norms, processes, and evidentiary standards of each are different. Thus, law enforcement and prosecutorial officials can exploit the gap between these two processes and the differences between their norms and evidentiary standards to their benefit and achieve with one what they cannot achieve with the other.

The right of a state to admit and extend residence privileges to an alien is part of its immigration law and thus subject to national law. Some states, including the United States,[7] consider removal (exclusion) and removal (deportation) of aliens to be within their sole authority and not subject to international law. However, this position is highly questionable in light of several treaties and other sources of international law that govern the rights of refugees and that supersede national law.[8] A compelling case can be made under existing international law showing that rights conferred upon refugees entitles them to treatment equal to that granted non-refugees and that injuries to aliens subjects states to international responsibility.[9] Professor Evans, writing about this problem, stated that:

Moeller, United States Treatment of Alleged Nazi War Criminals: International Law, Immigration Law, and the Need for International Cooperation, 25 Va. J. Int'l L. 793, 814 n.102 (1985).

7 See Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 222 (1961) (discussing Congress's plenary power over aliens); Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893) (extending the governmental power over aliens to deportation); Ekiu v. United States, 142 U.S. 651, 659 (1892) (holding that as "an accepted maxim of international law," the powers of exclusion and expulsion are inherent in sovereignty); Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case), 130 U.S. 581 (1889) ("That the government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory is a proposition which we do not think open to controversy. Jurisdiction over its own territory to that extent is an incident of every independent nation."). See also Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 587 (1952) (stating that Congress's plenary power in those cases "bristles with severity"); Campos v. INS, 961 F.2d 309 (1st Cir. 1992) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Correa v. Thornburgh, 901 F.2d 1166 (2d Cir. 1990) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Flores v. Meese, 906 F.2d 396 (9th Cir. 1990) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Amanullah v. Nelson, 811 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1987) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Jean v. Nelson, 711 F.2d 1455 (11th Cir. 1983), aff'd, 472 U.S. 846 (1985) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Karmali v. INS, 707 F.2d 408 (9th Cir. 1983) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Palma v. Verdeyen, 676 F.2d 100 (4th Cir. 1982) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens); Adams v. Howerton, 673 F.2d 1036 (9th Cir.) (holding that the government has power over admission and exclusion of aliens), cert. denied, 458 U.S. 1111 (1982); Charles C. Hyde, Digest of International Law 216–218 (1922).

8 See Ch. III. See also Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law (2d ed. 1996); Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Status of Refugees in International Law (1966).

9 For a state's responsibility toward aliens in international law, compare 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 221 (1963) [hereinafter Whiteman Digest] with John B. Moore, 1 Digest of International Law 95 (1901) [hereinafter Moore Digest]. See also S. N. Guha Roy, Is the Law of Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens a Part of Universal International Law?, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 863 (1961); Hans W. Spiegel, Origin and Development of Denial of Justice, 32 Am. J. Int'l L. 63 (1938). On the United States' position on aliens' rights with respect to due process in exclusion cases, see Chin Yow v. United States, 208 U.S. 8 (1908), cited in Comment, The Alien and the Constitution, 20 U. Chi. L. Rev. 547, 551 (1953); Developments Recent in the Law, Immigration and Nationality, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 643, 661–676 (1953); Note, Constitutional Restraint on the Expulsion and Exclusion of Aliens, 37 Minn. L. Rev. 440 (1953); Note, The Right to Judicial Review of Deportation Orders under the Administrative Procedure Act, 62 Yale L. J. 1000 (1953). See also the following recent cases, each holding that classifications based on alienage are subject to relaxed scrutiny and are valid unless wholly irrational: Legalization Assistance Project v. INS, 976 F.2d 1198 (9th Cir. 1992), app. granted 510 U.S. 1301

> The potentiality of expulsion [or removal (deportation)] as a method for the rendition of fugitive offenders has been recognized by government officials for many years. The long borders with Canada and Mexico, the relative ease of crossing them, and the generally friendly relations prevailing between the United States and these two states have been conducive to the use of this method of rendition. For example, where a fugitive from justice in the United States has been known to be in prison in Canada, an indication to Canadian authorities of American interest in the prisoner's whereabouts upon the completion of his sentence might lead to his deportation with prior notice to interested federal or state officials of the time and place of his departure from Canada. Again, Mexican authorities, having been alerted by United States authorities to the presence in that country of a fugitive from the United States, might order his deportation on grounds of illegal entry into Mexico. Expulsion might be suggested where extradition was not available as in the case of a known "confidence man" whose offense of using the mails to defraud was not covered by treaty with the United Kingdom, or as a relatively inexpensive and more convenient alternative to extradition. It might also be held in reserve in the event that extradition should fail.
>
> Apart from deliberate rendition by expulsion, it is possible that the strict execution of a deportation order would result in placing an individual in jeopardy of criminal process in the states of destination; however, both judicial and administrative authorities have held that such ultimate result constitutes no bar to expulsion.[10]

In 1896, J.B. Moore, with what turned out to be a prophetic insight, drew attention to the possibility of the use of immigration laws for the purpose of extradition:

> It is, however, worthy of notice that the immigration laws of the United States require the return to the country from which they came, of all non-political convicts. Though this measure is not in the nature of an extradition treaty, the execution of which another government may require, its full significance, as affecting the subject of extradition, has, perhaps, hardly been appreciated. With such a provision in our statutes, it is difficult to set a limit to which the system of extradition may logically be carried.[11]

The person most vulnerable to this use and occasional abuse of immigration laws is the person who is sought by a friendly government for political reasons, or is the object of political

---

(1993), vacated, remanded 510 U.S. 1007 (1993); Campos v. INS, 961 F.2d 309 (1st Cir. 1992); Lynch v. Cannatella, 810 F.2d 1363 (5th Cir. 1987); Sudomir v. McMahon, 767 F.2d 1456 (9th Cir. 1985).

10 Alona E. Evans, The Political Refugee in United States Immigration Law and Practice, 3 Int'l law 204 (1969). See also 1 Moore Digest, supra note 9, at 259; United States ex rel. Giletti v. Comm'r of Immigration, 35 F.2d 687 (2d Cir. 1929); Moraitis v. Delaney, 46 F. Supp. 425 (D.C. Md. 1942); In re Banjeglav, Interim Doc. No. 1298, 10 I & N Dec. 351 (BIA 1963); In re S.C., 3 I & N Dec. 350 (BIA 1949); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 211.55 D 47 (Belg. 1926); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 242.11 Finkelstein, Sam (Can. 1937) (concerning individual wanted in Illinois for parole violation); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 242.11 Cerafisi, Michael (Can. 1935) (regarding individual wanted in New York for parole violation); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 242.11 B 17 (Can. 1922) (involving individual wanted for obtaining money under false pretenses); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 259.11 Rosen, Samuel (Den. 1931-33); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 212.11 Steele, Robert (Mex. 1940-41); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 211.41 (U.K. 1932); Dep't of State Misc. File No. 248.11 Long, John M. (S. Afr. 1931); Hackworth Digest 30. In Johnson v. Eisentrager, Justice Jackson noted that a "resident enemy alien is constitutionally subject to summary arrest, internment and deportation whenever a `declared war' exists," 339 U.S. 763, 775 (1950). In the Kendler case, deportation was ordered on grounds that the alien had concealed a previous criminal record in Canada; he was "turned over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who wanted him on forgery charges." Immigration and Naturalization Service, Annual Report 9 (1962).

11 1 The Collected Papers of John Bassett Moore 277 (1945).

pressures in the asylum state.[12] The same channels are also used to favor and facilitate law enforcement cooperation between friendly states to combat certain forms of criminality such as drug trafficking, terrorism, and organized crime.[13]

A landmark English case is Regina v. Secretary of State of Home Affairs, ex parte Duke of Chateau Thierry,[14] in which a challenge was brought against the validity of the use of the power of deportation in order to secure the return of the duke to France to face military charges for desertion. It was argued on his behalf (1) that the Home Secretary had no power to order the deportation of an alien to a particular country; and (2) that the duke was, in fact, a political refugee and would be punished for a political offense in France. The English Divisional Court agreed with the duke that immigration laws gave no power to the secretary of state to order deportation to any particular country.[15] Although the deportation order did not, on its face, purport to prescribe the destination of the alien upon deportation, it was nonetheless shown that immigration authorities admitted to the court that the decision to deport had been made for the purpose of returning the duke to France. Viscount Reading, C.J., concluded that:

> In form the order is correct, but this Court must look behind the mere form, and, when there is no doubt that the intention is to deport the alien to a particular country, though the form of the order does not state that this is the object and intention of the Executive in making the order, we must treat it as if the order did in effect state that the alien was to be deported to France.[16]

The Court of Appeal reversed, however, and affirmed the deportation.[17] Its judgment is authority for a number of important principles:

> (i) The Home Secretary has no power to order the deportation of an alien to a foreign state specified in the deportation order;
>
> (ii) The Aliens Act did, however, entitle the Home Secretary to cause an alien to be detained and placed on board a particular ship selected by the Secretary of State and there detained until the ship finally left the United Kingdom. The result being that the alien would be

---

12 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1 (discussing the "political offense exception"). See also Evans, The Political Refugee in United States Immigration Law and Practice, supra note 10, at 205; Henry P. DeVries & Jose R. Novas, Territorial Asylum in the Americas—Latin American Law and Practice of Extradition, 5 Inter-Am. L. Rev. 61 (1963). Section 243(h) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1253 (1988), provides that a person who has been admitted into the country and is then found to be deportable may request a temporary withholding of deportation on the plea that he would be subjected to persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion in the country to which he is to be deported. Section 208(a), added to the Act in 1980, 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a) (1988), provides for a discretionary grant of asylum to, among others, political refugees. For a thorough discussion of extradition and asylum see Ch. III.

13 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Effective National and International Action against Organized Crime and Terrorist Criminal Activities, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 9 (1990).

14 Regina v. Secretary of State of Home Affairs, ex parte Duke of Chateau Thierry, 1 K.B. 552 (Eng. K.B. Div'l Ct. 1917); 1 K.B. 922 (Eng. C.A. 1917).

15 5 B.I.L.C. 203. In this case the Attorney General admitted on behalf of the Home Office that there was no power to order deportation to a particular named country. Nonetheless, the police and other authorities had indicated to the intended deportee that it was proposed to deport him to Czechoslovakia. Cf. Papadimitriou v. Inspector-General of Police and Prisons, 12 Ann. Dig. 231 (Palestine Sup. Ct. 1944).

16 1 K.B. at 555–556 (1917). Compare Lord Reading's judgment in Regina v. Governor of Brixton Prison, ex parte Sarno, 2 K.B. 742, 749 (Eng. K.B. Div'l Ct. 1916), where dealing with the validity of an order for the deportation of a Russian, he said: "If we were of opinion that the powers were being misused, we should be able to deal with the matter. In other words, if it was clear that an act was done by the Executive with the intention of misusing those powers, this court would have jurisdiction to deal with the matter."

17 1 K.B. 922 (Eng. C.A. 1917). See also C. v. E., 13 I.L.R. 146 (1946).

obliged to disembark at the port to which the vessel sailed. Thus, the Secretary of State could lawfully, but indirectly by selecting the means of departure, effectuate what he had no power to do directly, namely secure an alien's deportation to a particular state. In the case of the Duke of Chateau Thierry, the order for his deportation was valid, as it did not purport to order his deportation specifically to France. Although it was admitted that the Home Secretary intended under the order to send the Duke to France, this was immaterial because the procedure employed was to specify the Duke's departure by a particular ship (which happened to be sailing for France) and not to require in the order itself that he be deported to France;

(iii) The fact that an alien is a political refugee, or is likely to be punished for a political offense in the country to which it is intended that he should, albeit indirectly, be deported, does not invalidate a deportation order made against him.[18] However, the Home Secretary expressly disclaimed the intention of using deportation proceedings against political refugees.[19] The same view is held by the British Government today.[20] It should be noted that the Duke of Chateau Thierry failed to satisfy the court that he was a political refugee; and

(iv) A court can invalidate a deportation order only on very limited grounds. Because deportation (or removal in the United States) is within the powers of the executive branch as it concerns aliens, judicial review is before the administrative court and it is limited to abuse of discretion by the administration.

The court of appeal took the view that the use of deportation proceedings to secure, in effect, the surrender of military deserters is lawful.[21] Subsequently, in Regina v. Superintendent of Chiswick Police State, ex parte Sacksteder,[22] the court of appeal again upheld the validity of the use of deportation orders to secure the return of military deserters to France.

Significantly, in the surrender of the Duke of Chateau Thierry, it was admitted on behalf of the states concerned that the principles of specialty and non-surrender of political offenders should apply. The states themselves treated the surrender as a special form of extradition to which the general rules governing extradition should be applied.[23]

---

18 Cf. Regina v. Governor of Brixton Prison ex parte Sliwa, 1 K.B. 169 (K.B. Div'l Ct. 1952), I.L.R. 310 (1951).

19 1 K.B. 922, 929 (1917) (Swinfen Eady L.J.).

20 Elihu Lauterpacht, The Contemporary Practice of the United Kingdom in the Field of International Law: Survey and Comment, VI, 7 Int. & Comp. L. Q. 514, 553–555 (1958).

21 1 K.B. at 928–932 (1917). This can readily be seen from the following extracts from the judgments:

> In July, last inquiry was made at the request of the French Government as to the failure of the respondent (who is a Frenchman, within military age, whether reckoned according to the French or the British standard) to discharge his military duties… These [French] authorities dispute that he is a political refugee; they state that his return to France is sought in connection with his "irregular military situation" and for no other cause, and that he is not known to the French police for any other offense. An assurance has been given by the French Government that the respondent, if returned to France, would be treated as a military absentee, and not as liable to prosecution for any other offense. We were informed that there exists an agreement between this country and France by which this country undertakes to return to France subjects of that country who are of military age and liable to military service, and that it was by reason of this agreement that the Secretary of State made this (deportation) order.

Id.

22 Regina v. Superintendent of Chiswick Police Station, ex parte Sacksteder, 1 K.B. 568 (Eng. K.B. Div'l Ct. 1918). See also Regina v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex parte Venicoff, 3 K.B. 72 (Eng. K.B. Div'l Ct. 1920).

23 Id.

Notwithstanding the apparent ease and convenience of the removal (deportation) device as a substitute for a formal process of extradition, the fugitive is still entitled to the benefits of national legal processes. Prior to removal (deportation), the alien must first be found deportable, but that determination is subject to limitations.

These limitations are illustrated by the Horn case.[24] Horn, a prisoner in a U.S. federal penitentiary, was wanted by Canadian authorities during WWI on charges of sabotage. The Department of Justice was at first inclined to deport him to Canada upon completion of his sentence, as an enemy alien and a threat to the safety of the United States. The Department of Justice, however, decided against this procedure, apparently on grounds of its doubtful legality as an alternative to extradition. Removal (deportation) is not an available remedy where the fugitive can show that he entered the country legally and has not otherwise violated immigration laws, or that he is a national of the state from which he is under threat of deportation, or where the immigration authorities are satisfied that he was not actually implicated in an offense in the requesting state as alleged by the state's authorities. Horn was not surrendered to Canada because he was not deportable for violating immigration laws and was not extraditable under the treaty.

It is always possible, however, for the alien to elect "Voluntary Departure" to a country of his/her own choice and thereby avoid compulsory removal to a country in which he/she might be subject to criminal prosecution. The discretionary power of the executive in such cases is likely to be used to make a bargain with the foreign authorities. Such was the case in 1961 in the deportation of Mikhail Gorin to the Soviet Union and the exchange of Colonel Rudolf Abel and the U-2 pilot Francis Gary Powers between the Soviet Union and the United States.[25]

A counterpart to the device of removal (deportation) is removal (exclusion), which is designed to prevent the alien from entering the country, on the grounds that he/she is inadmissible under the terms of the INA. A means of carrying out disguised extradition by the use of exclusion is to limit the options to the alien's departure, thus causing him/her to fall into the control of agents of the foreign state. A state desiring to secure an individual without resorting to extradition, or after an extradition request fails to effectuate extradition of the individual, can request the state of refuge and its surrounding states to exclude the individual by denying his/

---

24 Horn v. Mitchell, 232 F. 819 (1st Cir. 1916), appeal dismissed, 243 U.S. 247 (1917). But see Stevenson v. United States, 381 F.2d 142, 144 (9th Cir. 1967), wherein the court stated:

> While the formalities of extradition may be waived by the parties to the treaty, Glucksman v. Henkel, 221 U.S. 508, 31 S. Ct. 704, (1910), a demand in some form by the one country upon the other is required, in order to distinguish extradition from the unilateral act of one country, for its own purposes, deporting or otherwise unilaterally removing unwelcome aliens. See Fung Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 709, 13 S. Ct. 1016, (1893).
>
> In the instant case the evidence shows that the removal of the appellants from Mexico was not initiated by the United States. At the hearing in the district court on the appellants' motion to dismiss, the Sonora Chief of Police who had arrested the appellants in Mexico testified that to his knowledge no demand for extradition was ever made by the United States; that the appellants were deported by Mexican immigration authorities as undesirable aliens found in Mexico under suspicious circumstances; that it is the Mexican practice to refuse, in such circumstances, to permit aliens to remain in Mexico; that regardless of any interest of the United States in the appellants, they would have been returned to the Mexican–American border. The evidence showed that it was the Mexican authorities who first contacted American officials with regard to the appellants.

25 10 Foreign Relations of the United States 937 (1958–1960). The exchange of Colonel Abel, convicted in the United States on espionage charges, was for U-2 pilot Francis Gary Powers. J. Donovan, Strangers on a Bridge: The Case of Colonel Abel 371 (1964). The return to Mexico of Lopez, who had been kidnapped from Mexico by Hernandez and Villareal, in exchange for Mexico's dropping its extradition request for Hernandez, was suggested to the Mexican Government in 1935. Villareal v. Hammond, 74 F.2d 503 (5th Cir. 1934).

her entry into the state. This leaves no alternative to the state of refuge that excludes the alien but to remand the individual to the country that is seeking him/her.[26]

The landmark exclusion case remains Soblen.[27] Dr. Robert Soblen was accused of espionage against the United States. Released on bond, he fled to Israel, claiming asylum and citizenship as a Jew under the Israeli Law of Return. Israel, under U.S. pressure, found that Dr. Soblen did not qualify for Israeli citizenship, and placed him on a flight bound for New York. Interestingly, there were no other passengers aboard except U.S. marshals. In flight, close to England, Dr. Soblen attempted suicide. The plane made an emergency landing in Great Britain, and Dr. Soblen was taken to a hospital. The United States still wanted Dr. Soblen, but the crime of which he was accused was clearly a "political offense" and thus, non-extraditable under the Anglo–American extradition treaty of 1931.[28] Great Britain, however, found that Dr. Soblen had not been "legally admitted" into the country and ordered his departure on the first available flight of the day, presumably to be returned to Israel. It so happened that there were no flights bound for Israel that day and that the first flight out was to New York aboard the plane that had brought Dr. Soblen from Israel. En route to the airport, Dr. Soblen committed suicide. Thus, in Soblen the legal process of extradition was avoided, while the result desired by the states involved was basically attained. It is interesting to note that a British court reviewing the Soblen case found that the deportation order was valid.[29] The court recognized the possibility of the use of deportation in place of extradition, but held that the burden of showing abuse of discretion in deportation lies with the party who was ordered deported, which is difficult in practical terms.

Another cause célèbre was that of Klaus Barbie, an SS officer in Lyon, France, during WWII, who in 1945 was tried in absentia by a Lyon court and found guilty of war crimes.[30] With the help of the United States, Barbie concealed his identity, and lived in South America after the end of the war. France eventually sought Barbie's extradition from Bolivia, where he had been residing under a false identity. In 1973, the Bolivian Supreme Court refused the extradition request. After a change in government in Bolivia, Barbie was expelled on February 4, 1983, to Cayenne, French Guiana, from where he was flown to Lyon to stand trial. After a long and highly publicized trial he was found guilty on July 3, 1987, of "crimes against humanity" and was sentenced to life imprisonment. The Lyon court rejected Barbie's argument that it had no jurisdiction over him because he was unlawfully expelled from Bolivia to a French-controlled territory. The court held that it had jurisdiction even though it was secured by disguised extradition after a formal extradition request had been refused.

Another variant of disguised extradition involves the intentional misrepresentation of facts by one state to secure the deportation of an individual from another state. A prominent example of this is the case of Samuel Evans, general counsel to Adnan Khashoggi (a leading figure in the Iran-Contra affair), who was deported from Bermuda to the United States where he and others were tried for arranging arms sales to Iran.[31] In order to secure Evans's deportation, the United 26 The Insull case provides a good example of the use of requests for exclusion addressed to countries in the vicinity of Greece in order to force the fugitive to return to face charges in the United States. 2 Foreign Relations of the United States 566 (1934); 2 Foreign Relations of the United States 552 (1933).

---

27 Paul O'Higgins, Disguised Extradition: The Soblen Case, 27 Mod. L. Rev. 521 (1964). The converse can also occur whenever expulsion is used to defeat extradition. See In re Esposito, 7 Ann. Dig. 332 (STF 1932) (Braz.).

28 47 Stat. 2122 (1933).

29 R. v. Brixton Prison (Governor), ex parte Soblen, 3 W.L.R. 1154 (Q.B. Div'l Ct. 1962).

30 Matter of Barbie, Judgment of Oct. 6, 1983, G.P. 710 (Fr). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law 543–544 (2d ed. 1999) (discussing the Barbie case); Leila Sadat Wexler, The Interpretation of the Nuremberg Principles by the French Court of Cassation: From Touvier to Barbie and Back Again, 32 Colum. J. Transnat'l L 289 (1994).

31 United States v. Evans, 667 F. Supp. 974 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

States had not advised Bermuda that the supposed buyer of the arms was not in fact an Iranian representative but a U.S. agent playing a role in a U.S. sting operation.

Evans and the other defendants moved to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, arguing that jurisdiction had been improperly obtained through fraud on the government of Bermuda.[32] The defendants claimed that the offenses with which they had been charged were not extraditable and that the United States gained jurisdiction over them by convincing Bermuda through misrepresentations to deport them to the United States.[33] The court observed that "absent protest by Bermuda as to a violation of international law and where Bermuda has not sought defendants' return, defendants have no standing to assert that a fraud has been committed upon Bermuda."[34] Because Bermuda did not protest the misrepresentation, the court denied the defendants' motion and affirmed its jurisdiction. Thus, in the Evans case deportation replaced extradition, which could not have been effectuated as the offenses charged were non-extraditable.

Disguised extradition is not limited to instances involving well-known persons. The Mexican police arrested two men, Douglas Stevenson and Elbert Nero, after the two had attempted to sell tires in Mexico from a vehicle stolen in Arizona. Following communication between the Mexico and Arizona police authorities, the Mexican police transferred Stevenson and Nero to Mexican immigration authorities, who transported them to the border and delivered them to sheriff's deputies from Maricopa County, Arizona. Stevenson and Nero were tried for and convicted of a federal crime of transporting a stolen motor vehicle in foreign commerce. The two men appealed on the grounds that because their surrender to the U.S. authorities by the Mexican authorities constituted an extradition proceeding in violation of the provisions of the Extradition Treaty between Mexico and the United States, the court lacked jurisdiction over them. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals denied the motion to dismiss on the grounds that the surrender of Stevenson and Nero did not violate any applicable laws, including the Extradition Treaty.[35] The court held that because the United States did not demand the surrender of Stevenson and Nero, their surrender by Mexico was not an act of extradition but rather a unilateral action of Mexico, which allowed that state to rid itself of undesirable aliens.[36] The disguised extradition through deportation was thus successfully effectuated.

This overview of disguised extradition would not be complete without a discussion of the Tang case. Although Tang did not involve disguised extradition strictu sensu, as it involved no use of the immigration procedures ordinarily used to effectuate delivery of a person to a state seeking him, the case did involve use of summary judicial proceedings allowing United States marshals to deliver Tang to the Hong Kong authorities that sought him.

The United Kingdom, on behalf of the Crown Colony of Hong Kong, sought the extradition of Tang from the United States on charges of fraudulent trading and accounting practices.[37] After a hearing, Judge Edmund Palmieri of the Southern District of New York certified to the secretary of state that sufficient evidence existed to sustain the charges against Tang and that he was extraditable.[38] Tang subsequently filed a habeas petition that Judge Palmieri, the same judge who certified Tang's extraditability, considered and denied.[39]

---

32 Id. at 978.

33 Id.

34 Id. at 979.

35 Stevenson v. United States, 381 F.2d 142, 143 (9th Cir. 1967).

36 Id. at 144.

37 United States v. Tang, 657 F. Supp. 1270, 1271 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

38 In re Extradition of Tang Yee-Chun, 674 F. Supp. 1058, 1070 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

39 Tang Yee-Chun v. Immundi, 686 F. Supp. 1004, 1013 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

Tang then filed an appeal with the Second Circuit from Judge Palmieri's denial of the habeas petition along with a motion for stay of execution of the extradition order. As there is a right to appeal from a district court's denial of a habeas corpus petition, it would follow that a stay should be granted as a matter of right pending the determination of the habeas denial appeal. The motion for stay of execution was denied in an oral decision, and on Friday afternoon Tang's counsel sought through the clerk of the emergency judge of the Second Circuit an order for a stay of execution. The clerk reported that the motion was denied, thus allowing U.S. marshals to put Tang on a plane and send him to Hong Kong over the weekend. Once Tang left the United States it was too late to appeal the oral denial of the stay of execution.

Such a device, which in a sense constitutes a violation of the petitioner's rights when done over a holiday period, creates a window of opportunity for U.S. marshals to effectuate the delivery of a person under sufficient color of law to make it appear legal but which, in a sense, may also be counted as a form of disguised extradition even though it does not involve the use of immigration procedures.

3. U.S. Immigration Procedures as Alternatives to Extradition

3.1. Introduction

In light of the cumbersomeness and the difficulties that have characterized the process of extradition, particularly the time delays and numerous procedural requirements,[40] which sometimes transform extradition proceedings into mini-trials, the tendency of states has been to turn to alternative forms of rendition. Although states still resort to abduction,[41] it violates world public order and the individual human rights of the persons abducted. For these reasons, states are probably more loathe to use abduction than they are to use other legal or quasi-legal approaches to rendition. An alternative approach often is the use of immigration procedures.

In the United States, the practice has not been very frequent but has been resorted to at times when attempts to extradite have failed, such as in the Doherty,[42] Mackin,[43] or McMullen[44] cases, or where extradition was not possible, such as in the Badalamenti case.[45] The greatest frequency in the use of disguised extradition by the United States is with Mexico[46] and Canada.[47] In practice, this means that citizens of Mexico, Canada, and the United States whose visas have expired are sent across the border to the waiting hands of the federal or state agents of the neighboring state.

---

40 See Chs. IX—XII.

41 See Ch. V.

42 See infra Sec. 3.2.2 (discussing the Doherty case) and Ch. III (discussing Doherty's asylum claim).

43 In re Mackin, No. 86 Cr. Misc. 1, at 47, 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7201, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. 1981), appeal dismissed, 668 F.2d 122 (2d. Cir. 1981).

44 In re McMullen, 989 F.2d 603, 604 (2d Cir. 1993).

45 See infra Sec. 3.2.1 (discussing the Badalamenti case).

46 See Bruce Zagaris, Mexico Deports Ohio Executive Fugitive Convicted of Fraud, 27 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 515–517 (Jan. 2011); Bruce Zagaris, Extraditions between the U.S. and Mexico Increase Significantly, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 47–49 (Feb. 2008) (discussing the deportation of a Mexican fugitive to Mexico by the United States); Rodrigo Labardini, Deportation in Lieu of Extradition from Mexico, 20 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 239 (June 2004); Rodrigo Labardini, Life Imprisonment and Extradition: Historical Development, International Context, and the Current Situation in Mexico and the United States, 11 Sw. J.L. & Trade Am. 1 (2005).

47 Contrary to the practice during the Vietnam War in the 1960s, Canada is now deporting U.S. military deserters from the Iraq war back to the United States. See Bruce Zagaris, Canada No Longer a Haven for U.S. Military Deserters, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 399–401 (2008); Bruce Zagaris, Canada

In the Luster case, Andrew Luster was expelled from Mexico to the United States, where he had been convicted in absentia.[48] Luster was the heir to Max Factor and was charged in Ventura County, California, with eighty-seven counts of rape, sodomy, and poisoning.[49] He fled to Mexico mid-trial, but was convicted in absentia and sentenced to 124 years in prison.[50] Because of his conviction in absentia, Mexico most likely would have refused his extradition. After he was captured by bounty hunters, Mexico expelled him to the United States and charged the bounty hunters with kidnapping.[51]

Another example is that of Victor Tafur, who was arrested in 2000 and announced as the first Colombian to be extradited from the United States.[52] At the time of Tafur's arrest, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (now the United States Customs and Immigration Service)[53] served Tafur with a notice of deportation while he was in his jail cell.[54] The service of the notice assured that if he was released on his extradition warrant, then removal proceedings would begin.[55]

The United States has not yet developed a systematic, consistent policy on the use of immigration laws as an alternative to extradition. One exception is the denaturalization and deportation of Nazi war criminals, where the process is well developed.[56] At various times this policy has been directed against members of the Communist Party[57] and members of organized

---

Deports U.S. Military Deserter and U.S. Sentences Him to 15 Months, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 436–437 (2008).

48 Labardini, supra note 46.

49 Id.

50 Id.

51 Id.

52 Ann Power, Justice Denied? The Adjudication of Extradition Applications, 37 Tex. Int'l L. J. 277 (2002); Douglas Waller & Cathleen Farrell, The DEA's Big Bust: Did They Get the Wrong Guy?, Time, Apr. 17, 2000.

53 In 2003 the Immigration and Naturalization Service was incorporated into the Department of Homeland Security as the United States Customs and Immigration Service. See Ch. III, Sec. 5.1 for more information.

54 Notice to Appear, In re Tafur-Dominguez (File No. A077 626 394, Case Nol PMI0003000060) (INS Mar. 17, 2000). After the magistrate denied extradition, the INS warrant was still pending.

55 Power, supra note 52.

56 See infra Secs. 3.2.2 and 3.2.3.

57 Following the end of WWII, during the developing period of the Cold War, as part of a program to drive communists from positions of power in the United States, the Department of Justice intensified its campaign to deport alien communists. The undertaking was, however, frustrated by a number of stumbling blocks. The deportation statute then in effect made no reference to communists or Communist Party members, as such. It provided only for the deportation of aliens who personally advocated, or belonged to an organization that advocated, the violent overthrow of the U.S. government. In the wake of the Supreme Court's analysis of the Communist Party in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118 (1943), the lower courts refused to take judicial notice that the Communist Party fell within the meaning of the deportation statute. Thus, the question of whether the Communist Party had a violent nature needed to be addressed in every deportation proceeding. This turned out to be a costly and time-consuming process, resulting in the production of former Communist Party members to authenticate and testify as experts on the voluminous literature of the Party. In desperation, the Justice Department sought legislative relief, and the deportation statute was ultimately amended to its present form, which specifically names the Communist Party, among others, as a proscribed organization. Maurice A. Roberts, The Grounds of Deportation, Statute of Limitations on Deportation, and Clarification of the Nature of Deportation, 57 Interpreter Releases 157 (1980).

crime, particularly the Mafia.[58] More recently, the focus of denaturalization and deportation proceedings has been on terrorists.

There have been numerous examples of deporting alleged terrorists over recent years, both to and from the United States. One of the individuals behind the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, Ramzi Ahmed Yousef, was apprehended by Pakistani authorities in February of 1995, and turned over to the FBI, who transported him to the United States the next day, bypassing formal extradition processes.[59] In 2003, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged terrorist behind the September 11 attacks, the 1993 World Trade Center Bombing, and the 2002 attack on the USS Cole was also captured by Pakistani authorities and turned over to the United States, who detained him at the U.S. air base in Bagram, Afghanistan.[60]

When another state does not want to cooperate with the United States' attempt to attain terrorists, the United States proceeds with alternatives outlined in a Presidential Decision Directive, which states:

> If we do not receive adequate cooperation from a state that harbors a terrorist whose extradition we are seeking, we shall take appropriate measures to induce cooperation. Return of suspects by force may be effected without the cooperation of the host government, consistent with the procedures outlined in NSD-77, which shall remain in effect.

When a suspect's location is ascertained, an asylum state may cooperate by extraditing the suspect pursuant to a treaty, or handing him/her over to U.S. authorities by deportation or expulsion. A problem emerges when the asylum state does not cooperate with methods of rendition, including, but not limited to, extradition. In the case of Alvarez-Machain, Mexico denied the United States' requests for extradition.[61] After Mexico's decision, U.S. agents abducted Alvarez-Machain, without the consent of the Mexican government, and returned him to the United States for trial.

Another possibility is where the United States does not have an extradition treaty with an asylum state. Without an extradition treaty, a state has no general duty under international law to extradite.[62] For example, the asylum state may be providing sanctuary for criminal suspects, such as Afghanistan's harboring of Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda operatives. In the aftermath of the September 11th attacks, evidence pointed to Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda as potential

---

58 See Costello v. United States, 365 U.S. 265 (1961); United States v. Galato, 171 F. Supp. 169 (M.D. Pa. 1959); United States v. Palmeri, 52 F. Supp. 226 (E.D.N.Y. 1943).

59 Matthew Slater, Trumpeting Justice: The Implications of U.S. Law and Policy for the International Rendition of Terrorists from Failed or Uncooperative States, 12 U. Miami Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 151, 168–169 (2004); U.S. Department of Justice, Terrorism In The United States 9 (1997), available at http://www.fbi.gov/stats-services/publications/terror_97.pdf.

60 Slater, supra note 59, at 168–169. See Liz Sly, Threat from bin Laden's Followers Is Lower, Officials Say, Chi. Trib, Mar. 21, 2003, at 16, available at 2003 WL 17254163; Testimony of Robert S. Mueller, III, Director, FBI, Before the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary on Mar. 4, 2003. The War Against Terrorism: Working Together to Protect America: Hearing Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 108th Cong. 1 (2003), available at http://judiciary.senate.gov/testimony.cfm? id=612&wit_id=608; Michael Daly, In Our Grasp Years Earlier, N.Y. Daily News, Mar. 2, 2003, at 2, available at 2003 WL 4067029.

61 See Royal J. Stark, Comment: The Ker-Frisbie-Alvarez Doctrine: International Law, Due Process, and United States Sponsored Kidnapping of Foreign Nationals Abroad, 9 Conn. J. Int'l L. 113, 149 (1993) (discussing that Mexico did not violate international law by declining to extradite Alvarez-Machain to the United States).

62 Id. at 149–150.

suspects. However, Afghanistan's Taliban regime, which was sympathetic to al Qaeda, refused to cooperate with U.S. authorities in extraditing those suspected of involvement in those attacks.

In the case of an uncooperative state, the United States first tries to induce cooperation through diplomacy, economic sanctions, or even through disguised extradition, such as luring. PDD-39 indicates that the United States may return suspects by force, without the cooperation of an asylum state.[63] Although forcible abduction of criminal suspects from foreign states will not divest U.S. courts of jurisdiction, it nonetheless violates international law.[64]

There could be serious international consequences for the United States if it were to forcibly abduct a suspect from an uncooperative foreign state. For instance, it could face a claim before the International Court of Justice for violating the asylum state's territorial integrity.[65] The UN Security Council could also take up the matter and condemn the abduction, as it did following Israel's abduction of Eichmann from Argentina in 1960.[66] However, it is unlikely that the Security Council could pass such a resolution, as the United States is a permanent member and has veto power. Another possibility is a military response by the asylum state to the unauthorized abduction.[67]

Immigration laws provide a simple and easily accomplished alternative to extradition. To use this method of rendition, one would have to find out on what basis a person has established status in the United States, and then determine on what grounds, under the immigration laws, that status can be terminated or revoked. For example, persons whose status in the United States derives from any type of a visa other than an immigration visa do not have the same due process guarantees under the Fourteenth Amendment as do permanent residents or citizens of the United States, though permanent residents are allowed lesser rights under the amended Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) §§ 235(c), 240(b), and Title V. Consequently, non-immigrants' rights are determined exclusively by the INA, and their due process rights are limited to the appropriate application of the INA's provisions. It is clear, with respect to these individuals, that once their visas expire, nothing obligates the United States to renew or extend them. In the exercise of his or her discretion, the executive may or may not grant visa renewals and extensions. If the executive does not renew or extend an alien's visa, the individual has no legal basis for remaining in the United States and will be required to leave the country.

The question then arises whether the individual's departure will be voluntary or involuntary, and whether the individual will be free to leave for a destination of his/her choice. If he/she leaves prior to the termination of his/her lawful status in the United States, he/she has the right to leave for any destination of his/her choice. If the visa holder overstays his/her lawful status, he/she becomes deportable under the INA. He/she may seek voluntary departure under § 240B of the INA, but the voluntary departure grant is discretionary, and 63 See Presidential Decision Directive-39: U.S. Policy on Counterterrorism (June 21, 1995), available at http://www.fas.org/irp/offdocs/pdd39.htm.

64 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice 17 (3d ed. 1996).

65 See Michael Gunlicks, Citizenship as a Weapon in Controlling the Flood of Undocumented Aliens: Evaluation of Proposed Denials of Citizenship to Children of Undocumented Aliens Born in the United States, 63 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 551, 566 (1995) (discussing potential consequences for violations of international law).

66 U.N. SCOR, 15th Sess., 865th mtg, at 4, U.N. Doc. S/INF/15/Rev.1 (1960).

67 Slater, supra note 59, at 181–183.

final authority rests with the executive.[68] At this juncture, the individual may file a petition for asylum[69] so long as the petition is made within one year of the individual's arrival in the United States.[70]

If the individual's application for voluntary departure, and any other remedy he/she may have applied for, is denied, the individual will be found to be a deportable alien and subject to removal. Under the INA, a deportable alien has a right to designate a country of deportation.[71] The executive, however, has the authority to refuse deportation to the country of the alien's choice if such deportation would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States.[72] The alien can thus be sent to his/her country of origin, and if his/her country of origin is the one seeking him/her, then, clearly, removal would obviate the need for extradition. On the other hand, he/she may be deported to any other country on an involuntary basis, provided such country would accept him/her, unless it is to a country where the alien fears for his/her life or freedom because of his/her race, religion, nationality, membership in a social group, or political opinion, as described by INA § 241(b)(3)(A). This process would also obviate the need for extradition proceedings. Thus, deportation is one of the ways by which extradition can be circumvented.

As Professor John Murphy has noted,

> [Exclusion and deportation] are not designed for the purpose of cooperation in furthering the international criminal justice system. Rather, both exclusion and deportation are civil processes, designed for immigration control and dominated by the executive. As a consequence, exclusion and deportation proceedings utilized for rendition purposes do not apply criminal justice standards, either with respect to the interests of the states involved or to the protection of the accused.[73]

---

68 8 C.F.R. 240.25 states that if the alien is permitted voluntary departure in lieu of removal proceedings, then to be eligible for voluntary departure, an alien must show, among other things, that he is able to leave the United States at his own expense. However, if the immigration judge orders voluntary departure in lieu of removal after removal proceedings have taken place, then the alien, in order to be eligible for that voluntary departure, has to have been a person of good moral character for the past five years. 8 U.S.C. § 1229c(b)(1)(B) (2000, as amended in 2006). Additionally, an alien found deportable because of a conviction for an aggravated felony under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii) (2000), or for terrorist activity under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii) (Supp. 1999), is ineligible for voluntary departure. In making its decision as to the exercise of discretion in a request for voluntary departure, the executive also considers the alien's immigration history, nature of her entry into the United States, violation of immigration and other laws, length of residence in the United States, family ties in the United States, and humanitarian needs. In re Seda, 17 I & N Dec. 550 (BIA 1980). Decisions concerning voluntary departure are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Garcia-Lopez v. INS, 923 F.2d 72 (7th Cir. 1991). For an overview of the development of voluntary departure in U.S. law and its relationship to removal proceedings, see Michael P. Bracken, Comment: The Proper Interplay of the Voluntary Departure and Motion to Reopen Provisions of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 57 Cath. U. L. Rev. 511 (Winter 2008).

69 See Ch. III.

70 INA § 208(a)(2)(B).

71 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(2)(a) (2000).

72 This decision, absent fraud, lack of jurisdiction, or unconstitutionality, is not reviewable. Doherty v. United States, 908 F.2d 1108, 1113–1114 (2d Cir. 1990), rev'd on other grounds, 502 U.S. 314 (1992); Doherty v. Meese, 808 F.2d 938 (2d. Cir. 1986).

73 John Murphy, Punishing International Terrorists: The Legal Framework for Policy Initiatives 81–82 (1983).

3.2. Exclusion, Deportation, and Denaturalization Procedures

INA removal (exclusion) provisions apply to persons deemed not to have entered the United States yet, while the removal (deportation) provisions apply to persons who lawfully entered into the country. Distinguishing between those who have been admitted from those seeking admission has been defined by the amended INA § 101(a)(13)(A).[74] Because aliens in removal (deportation) proceedings are afforded more rights and procedural safeguards than aliens in removal (exclusion), it may make a difference in which of the two proceedings the alien is placed. Prior to the passage of the 1980 Refugee Act, there was no forum for claims of refugee status except in deportation proceedings under § 243(h) of the pre-1996 amended INA, the provision for temporary withholding of removal to countries where the deportee fears persecution. At present, the reformed INA § 241(b)(3) replaced § 243(h) by granting a conditional withholding of removal to a country where the alien would be unsafe. On the other hand, asylum requests may be filed by the alien inter alia during removal proceedings, and the immigration judge may adjudicate both proceedings regardless of whether asylum was granted.[75]

The INA specifies procedures for adjudicating removal through excludability and deportability. Because aliens in the United States have more rights than those merely "knocking at the gates," aliens are afforded greater protection in removal (deportation) hearings than in removal (exclusion) hearings. Additionally, aliens in removal (deportation) proceedings have more avenues of relief available to them than aliens in removal (exclusion) proceedings, and the government bears the burden of proof in showing them removal (deportable).[76] On the other hand, in removal (exclusion) proceedings, except for returning resident aliens, the alien bears the burden of establishing admissibility into the United States.[77] Historically, aliens already in the United States were entitled to more protection under the Due Process Clause of the Constitution, whereas those "knocking at the gates" did not enjoy the same benefits.[78] After the 1996 amendments to the INA this is no longer the case.

It is clear that a host country would want to allow itself flexibility and discretion in its efforts to filter out unwanted persons from the masses that flow to its ports. However, this flexibility may cause immigration procedures to be used beyond their designated purposes, and immigration law may thereafter become a viable rendition device alternative to extradition.

3.2.1. The Removal (Exclusion) Process[79]

If a requested country wishes to extradite an alien who seeks entry to its territory but finds extradition procedures to be too cumbersome, it may resort to removal (exclusion) procedures

74 The INA defines "admission" and "admitted" as "the lawful entry of an alien into the United States after inspection and authorization by an immigration officer" under 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(13) (2000, as amended in 2006). Additionally, "entry" has been administratively and judicially construed as (1) a crossing into the United States territory, (2)(a) inspection and admission by an immigration officer, or (b) intentional evasion of inspection by an immigration officer, and (3) freedom from restraint. In re Patel, Interim Dec. 3157 (BIA 1991); In re Ching and Chen, 19 I & N Dec. 203 (BIA 1984); In re Lin, 18 I & N Dec. 219 (BIA 1982); In re Pierre, 14 I & N Dec. 467 (BIA 1973).

75 8 C.F.R. § 208.16(a) (1990). See also Ch. III (discussing asylum procedures and extradition).

76 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c) (Supp. 1999). Also see generally Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276 (1966); Gastelum-Quinones v. Kennedy, 374 U.S. 469 (1963) (holding that the INS must prove the alien's deportability by "clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence"). Additionally, relying on a Supreme Court decision, the Attorney General has said that "[m]atters of doubt should be resolved in favor of the alien in deportation proceedings. Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan, 333 U.S. 6 (1948)." In re G., 9 I & N Dec. 159, 164 (A.G. 1961).

77 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c) (Supp. 1999).

78 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982); Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945).

79 The exclusion proceeding, as with deportation, has been replaced by removal for actions commencing after April 1997. For a discussion of grounds of inadmissibility as related to the removal process, see to accomplish the desired end. As the alien seeking entry is not yet within the jurisdiction of the requested state, he/she is not entitled to the benefits of due process that could hamper the efforts of the requested state in removing him/her.

Immigration judges are authorized to conduct removal (exclusion) hearings;[80] administer the oath to witnesses; introduce evidence; and interrogate, examine, and cross-examine the alien and the other witnesses.[81] In removal (exclusion) the alien bears the burden of proving his/her admissibility.[82]

If the alien fails to prove his/her admissibility to the United States, he/she is excluded and is inadmissible for a period of five years.[83] The alien may appeal the exclusion decision to the Attorney General, and while the appeal is pending, any final action with respect to the alien is stayed.[84] Upon a final decision as to the alien's inadmissibility, he/she is to be immediately removed to the country in which he/she boarded the vessel or aircraft on which he/she arrived in the United States.[85]

There are ten categories of grounds comprising thirty-five classes of aliens currently excludable at entry.[86] An alien may be found excludable for fitting into one or more of the thirty-five classes and may be subsequently ordered removed on such grounds. There are thus ample means of using removal (exclusion) for rendition purposes. For example, a Nazi war criminal could fit into at least three removal (exclusion) classes: (1) the use[87] or threat, attempt or conspiracy to use[88] explosive or firearm with intent to endanger the safety of one or more individuals; (2) participation in Nazi persecutions;[89] and (3) willful misrepresentation of a material fact to procure visa or entry to the United States.[90]

The case of Vito Badalamenti provides a good example of how exclusion can be used where extradition is unavailable as a vehicle of rendition. Vito Badalamenti, the son of Gaetano Badalamenti, generally, Kurzban, supra note 3, at 60–133 (collecting cases involving grounds of inadmissibility); id. at 133–161 (discussing procedures governing inadmissibility and collecting cases).

---

80 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(b)(1) (2000).

81 Id.

82 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c)(2) (2000). Relying on In re Walsh & Pollard, Kurzban notes that if a consular official issued a visa to the alien, it is prima facie evidence of the alien's admissibility sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the DHS to show inadmissibility. Kurzban, supra note 3, at 62 (citing Interim Dec. 3111 (BIA 1988)).

83 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)(B) (2000), as amended Pub. L. 104-208, § 301(c)(1), 110 Stat. 3009-567.

84 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c)(5) (2000).

85 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(1)(a) (2000), as amended Pub. L. 104-208, Sept. 30, 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-590, 3009-607, 3009-63. The Federal Regulations provide that:

> [the excludable alien] shall be deported to the country where the alien boarded the vessel or aircraft on which the alien arrived in the United States. If that country refuses to accept the alien, the alien shall be deported to:
>
> (1) The country of which the alien is a subject, citizen, or national;
>
> (2) The country where the alien was born;
>
> (3) The country where the alien has a residence; or
>
> (4) Any country willing to accept the alien.

8 C.F.R. § 241.25(b) (2001).

86 8 U.S.C. § 1182 (2000).

87 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)(iii)(V) (2000).

88 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)(iii)(VI) (2000).

89 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(E) (2000).

90 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)(C) (2000).

was identified as a former leader of the Sicilian Mafia.[91] In 1984, Vito Badalamenti and his father were arrested in Spain at the request of the United States and in 1985 extradited to the United States to stand trial in the "Pizza Connection" heroin trafficking case.[92] While his father and seventeen other defendants were convicted of different charges in the "Pizza Connection" case, Vito Badalamenti was acquitted.[93]

Following his acquittal, Vito Badalamenti was unlawfully kept in detention instead of being allowed to leave voluntarily to a country of his choice, a violation of the United States–Spain Extradition Treaty. He was held on the grounds that because he was an alien paroled into the United States solely for the purpose of standing trial, that ground of parole expired with his acquittal, and the INS assumed jurisdiction over him.[94] Vito Badalamenti petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. In deciding on his petition, Judge Thomas Griesa of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York summarized Badalamenti's situation in the following way:

> One would normally expect that a person extradited to the United States would, upon acquittal of the criminal charges here, be free to return to the country from which he had been extradited. However, in the present case it quickly became apparent that the matter was not so simple. Spain would not receive him back. Italy, the country of his citizenship, would receive him, but petitioner did not wish to go to Italy because he faces criminal charges there. The extradition treaty between the United States and Spain provides that a person extradited under the treaty cannot be tried by the requesting nation for another offense and cannot be extradited to a third nation unless he has not left the territory of the requesting nation within 45 days after "being free to do so." This provision places limits upon further prosecution in the United States and upon extradition to Italy, but otherwise does nothing to solve the problems about petitioner's status.
>
> On March 10, 1987 the INS sent the petitioner a letter stating that he was free to leave the United States for a country that demonstrated a willingness to accept him. The letter stated that petitioner should notify the INS by March 13 of arrangements to depart by March 17, and that otherwise the INS would commence exclusion and deportation proceedings. By March 17 there was no country willing to receive petitioner which he was willing to go to.. .
>
> On March 30, 1987 the Immigration Judge handed down a ruling that petitioner was inadmissible. Presumably the effect of this ruling is to give the INS the right to exclude and deport him.. .
>
> On April 23 petitioner's attorneys advised the INS that Paraguay would accept the petitioner. Petitioner made a reservation on a flight from Miami to Paraguay departing April 26, but he was not transported by the INS to take that flight. There is a question about whether the INS was at fault in this . . . Another possibility which was explored was having petitioner leave April 27 on a flight to Paraguay via Brazil. Petitioner refused to take this flight because of possible problems in Brazil.
>
> On April 29 the INS took petitioner to an airport for a flight to Paraguay which did not involve Brazil. However, the Commissioner of the INS interceded at the last minute and directed that petitioner not be allowed to leave.
>
> The record shows that the Italian government had been in touch with the Office of International Affairs of the Department of Justice about the possibility of having petitioner deported to Italy. It was this which ultimately caused the INS to prevent the petitioner's departure for Paraguay. The Justice Department has now concluded that he should be deported to Italy.[95]

---

91 Ralph Blumenthal, Acquitted in "Pizza Connection" Trial, Man Remains in Prison, N.Y. Times, July 28, 1988, at 3. See generally Shana Alexander, The Pizza Connection (1988).

92 Badalamenti v. Sava, 1987 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4925, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. June 15, 1987).

93 Blumenthal, supra note 91.

94 See Blumenthal, supra note 91.

95 Badalamenti, 1987 U.S. Dist. Lexis 4925, at *1–4 (emphasis added).

In May, Paraguay withdrew its offer to admit Vito Badalamenti, forcing Judge Griesa to deny his habeas petition, and to hold that:

> Regardless of whether the United States Government was to some extent at fault in this regard, the fact is that petitioner can offer no country of his choice where he can go.
>
> There is no basis at the present time for this court to order petitioner's release from custody since he does not have any viable proposal for leaving the country and it would be wholly inappropriate to have him at liberty in the United States.[96]

Judge Griesa's opinion shows clearly that the government, not being able to extradite Vito Badalamenti to Italy due to provisions in the United States–Spain Extradition Treaty, resorted to exclusion to achieve the desired result.[97]

3.2.2. The Removal (Deportation) Process[98]

The INA[99] contains removal (exclusion) and removal (deportation) provisions intended to protect the United States from aliens considered actually or potentially undesirable. While the general concept is widely accepted, the grounds and procedures relating to exclusion and deportation are matters of some controversy. The provisions are characterized by some as unduly harsh and inhumane and are criticized for not providing a fair hearing.[100] Others claim the provisions are so highly technical as to be vulnerable to sophisticated legal maneuvering that renders them ineffective.[101]

It is more difficult for the requested state to use the removal (deportation) process as an alternative rendition device than the removal (exclusion) process because an alien in removal (deportation) proceedings has the benefit of due process rights.[102] Essentially, once an alien is deemed to have entered the United States, his/her removal is difficult. Not only is the alien allowed the benefits of due process, but the decision of the immigration judge as to the alien's deportability must be based on reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence and must be established by clear, convincing, and unequivocal evidence.[103] It is thus difficult to establish an alien's deportability. The next difficulty is that the alien is allowed to designate a

---

96 Id. at 5.

97 Upon his return to Italy, Vito Badalamenti was acquitted and released.

98 For a more detailed discussion of deportation grounds and procedures, see Kurzban, supra note 3, at 65–157. For a discussion on the usefulness of a Freedom of Information Act Request to obtain information about deportation as an alternative to extradition, see Bruce Zagaris, Freedom of Information Act Request Illumines Use of Deportation as Alternative to Extradition, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 344–345 (2007). See also Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights 207–217 (2001).

99 66 Stat. 163 (1952) (codified as amended in various sections of 8 U.S.C.).

100 For example, the U.S. Supreme Court has equated deportation with banishment. See Rosenberg v. Flueti, 374 U.S. 449 (1963); Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan, 333 U.S. 6 (1948).

101 Departments of Justice, Labor and State, Interagency Task Force on Immigration Policy: A Staff Report 411 (1979).

102 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982); Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945). However, the 1996 IIRIRA, 110 Stat. 3009-641 Public Law 104-208 Sept. 30, 1996, § 354, significantly affected the due process rights of alien residents by allowing the use of "secret evidence" in certain removal proceedings.

103 Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276 (1966) (stating that the INS must prove the alien's deportability by "clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence"). Furthermore, matters of doubt are to be resolved in favor of the alien. Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan, 333 U.S. 6 (1948). Additionally, considerable precedent exists for the proposition that deportation statutes must be construed in favor of aliens. Rosenberg v. Flueti, 374 U.S. 449 (1963); Bonetti v. Rogers, 356 U.S. 691 (1958).

country to which he/she wishes to be removed (deported) under the "voluntary departure" system.[104] If the country of designation accepts him/her, and it does not happen to be the requesting state, then the use of the removal (deportation) process as a rendition device has been unsuccessful. Finally, an alien in removal (deportation) proceedings may apply for various means of relief, including asylum.[105] These factors make it difficult for the requested state to remove (deport) aliens lawfully present in the country. To obtain relief from removal (deportation), however, the alien must first qualify for the particular means of relief he/she seeks and, if that means of relief is discretionary, he/she must receive the favorable discretion of the immigration judge.

There is a wide range of grounds justifying removal (deportation), which are divided into six general categories including: (1) aliens excludable at the time of entry,[106] (2) other violations of lawful alien status,[107] (3) economic grounds,[108] (4) security and political grounds,[109] (5) failure to register and falsification of documents,[110] and (6) criminal grounds.[111]

A removal (deportation) case generally begins with an investigation by the USCIS to establish whether an individual is an alien and whether he/she is deportable. The USCIS seeks to ascertain alienage, whether the alien is subject to removal (deportation), whether he/she will depart promptly from the United States without removal (deportation) proceedings, and whether he/she should be arrested. Provided the USCIS decides to proceed against the alien, it files a notice to appear with the immigration court.[112] An immigration officer then issues a notice to appear to be served to the alien, which contains, among other things, the "charge against the alien."[113] The Attorney General may issue an arrest warrant, arrest the alien, and take him/her into custody pending a decision on his/her deportability.[114] The arrested alien may be released on bond in an amount not less than $1,500,[115] or without bond on conditional parole.[116]

---

104 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(2)(A) (2000). An alien may designate one country to which she wishes to be deported. Provided that the country is willing to accept her and "unless the Attorney General, in his discretion, concludes that deportation to such country would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States," the alien will be deported to such country. Id.

105 Relief from deportation includes voluntary departure under § 240B of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1229c(a),(b) (2000)), cancellation of removal and adjustment of status under § 240A of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1229b (2000)), waiver of inadmissibility under § 212 of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1182(e) (2000)), and asylum or withholding of removal under §§ 208(a) and 241(b)(3)(B) of the INA respectively (8 U.S.C. §§ 1158, 1231(b)(3)(B) (2000)).

106 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(1) (Supp. 1999).

107 These include entry without inspection or presence in the United States in violation of law (8 U.S.C. § 1227 (a)(1)(c)(i) (2000)), failure to maintain non-immigrant status (8 U.S.C. § 1227 (a)(1)(c)(i) (2000)), termination of conditional permanent residence (8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(1)(D) (2000)), encouragement of or aid in illegal immigration (8 U.S.C. § 251(a)(1)(E) (2000)), and marriage fraud (8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(1)(G) (2000)).

108 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(5) 1994 (2000).

109 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(4) 1994 (2000).

110 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(3) 1994 (2000).

111 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2) 1994 (2000).

112 8 C.F.R. § 239.1(a) (2001).

113 Id.

114 8 U.S.C. § 1226(a) (2000).

115 Id. (with security approved by, and containing conditions prescribed by, the Attorney General.)

116 Id.

Every detained alien, according to regulations, shall be notified that he/she may communicate with the diplomatic officers of the country of his/her nationality.[117] Existing treaties with certain countries listed in the regulations require immediate notification to appropriate diplomatic officers on behalf of the alien, whether or not he/she requests such communication.[118]

When an alien is dissatisfied with the bond or custody decision of the USCIS, he/she may apply to an immigration judge for redetermination as to bond or custody.[119] The bond or custody redetermination proceeding is conducted separately from the removal (deportation) hearing, and the redetermination may be appealed by the alien and by the INS to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA).[120]

A deportation hearing follows the issuance of the Order to Show Cause. The deportation hearing is conducted before an immigration judge[121] and, in almost all cases, with an INS trial attorney.[122] The hearing should be held in the district of the alien's arrest or residence. Deportation hearings are open to the public; however, the immigration judge may, at his/her discretion, exclude particular individuals or the general public from the hearing.[123] Removal proceedings may take place in person, in the absence of the alien (where agreed to by the parties), through video conference, or, subject to the alien's consent, via telephone conference.[124] As noted above, the decision of the immigration judge must be based upon reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence on the issue of removal (deportability),[125] and the USCIS must establish alienage and deportability by clear, convincing, and unequivocal evidence.[126]

In his/her removal (deportation) hearing, the alien, known as the respondent, has the right to a reasonable notice of the charges against him/her,[127] the right to a reasonable opportunity to present evidence and to cross-examine witnesses,[128] the right to counsel,[129] and the right to a fair hearing under the language of the statute and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth

---

117 8 C.F.R. § 236.1(e) (2001).

118 Id.

119 8 C.F.R. § 236.1(d)(1) (2001).

120 Id.

121 8 U.S.C. § 1229a (2000) (governing proceedings to determine deportability); INA § 240.1(b)(1) (regarding authority of immigration judges in deportation proceedings).

122 INA § 240.1(b)(4)(a) (concerning aliens privilege to be represented by a trial attorney).

123 8 C.F.R. § 240.10(a)(7)(b) (2001); 8 C.F.R. § 1003.27 (2011).

124 INA § 240.1/(b)(2)(A)(B). For a detailed discussion of U.S. removal proceedings, and a comparative analysis of the discretion afforded to U.S. immigration judges and Canadian immigration judges, particularly with regard to considering family ties in removal proceedings, see Adam Collicelli, Note, Affording Discretion to Immigration Judges: A Comparison of Removal Proceedings in the United States and Canada, 32 B.C. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 115 (2009).

125 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c)(3)(A) (2000).

126 Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276 (1966).

127 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(a)(2) (2000). See also 8 CFR 1240.10.

128 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(b)(4)(B) (2000).

129 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(b)(4)(A); 8 U.S.C. § 1362 (2011) (regarding right to representation by counsel at no expense to the government). See also 8 C.F.R. § 292.5(b) (1995) (concerning right to representation). In the United States Code, the alien has a privilege of representation. However, that privilege becomes a right in the Code of Federal Regulations in the context of the examination of a person at various points in removal proceedings. The result of this is that approximately two-thirds of noncitizens in removal proceedings proceed pro se, even during periods of examination of the person. See Michael Kaufman, Note: Detention, Due Process, and the Right to Counsel in Removal Proceedings, 4 Stan. J. C.R. & C.L. 113, 114, 124 (2008).

Amendment.[130] Due process is not guaranteed for those aliens who have unlawfully entered.[131] In Shaughnessy the court quoted approvingly that "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned."[132] With the adoption of the INA, Congress abolished the concept of entry in favor of admission, which is now the standard terminology used in U.S. immigration law.

In removal hearings, the immigration judge opens the hearing by reading the "factual allegations and the charges in the notice to appeal" as described by Title 8 of the CFR, Part 240.10(a)(6), and 8 CFR, Part 1240.10(a)(6).[133] The alien is generally called as the first witness, after which adverse witnesses may be called. Upon completion of the government's case, the alien may rebut. At any time prior to the immigration judge's decision as to removal (deportability), the alien may request relief from removal (deportation).[134]

The decision of the immigration judge is final.[135] No appeal is possible where voluntary departure is denied, but such denial does not prejudice the alien's right to apply for voluntary departure under section 240.26 or relief from removal under any provision of law.[136] All other cases involving removal (deportability) are appealable to the BIA within thirty days of the final removal decision.[137] An alien may file a motion to reconsider within thirty days of the final removability decision, and one motion to reopen within ninety days.[138] After the order of removal (deportation) achieves administrative finality, the alien may seek judicial review or take further administrative steps. Provided appeals have been waived or exhausted, the USCIS will complete the arrangements for the alien's deportation.

The removable (deportable) alien has the right to specify a country to which he/she would prefer to be removed.[139] The alien will be removed to a country of his/her designation, provided that the country is willing to accept him/her, and that deportation to such country would not be, in the discretionary determination of the Attorney General, prejudicial to the interests of the United States.[140] The alien may not, however, designate a country contiguous to the United States or adjacent islands unless the alien is a citizen or subject of, or had a residence in, such place.[141] If the country designated by the alien refuses to accept him/her, he/she is ordered removed to the country of his/her citizenship; if that country also refuses to accept him/her, then the removal will be to any country willing to accept him/her.[142] It should be noted that 130 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982); Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945) (except under the special removal procedure of alien terrorists pursuant to INA § 504(e)(1)(A)).

---

131 Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945); Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel Mezei, 345 U.S. 206 (1953).

132 Id. at 212, quoting Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U. S. 544 (1950).

133 The 2011 C.F.R. has removed and reserved part 240.10 of Title 8. This provision can be found in the 2001 version of part 240.10 of Title 8 of the C.F.R. For the federal regulations on the conduct of removal hearings, see 8 C.F.R. §1240.1 et. seq. (2011).

134 See supra note 76 (listing various means of relief from deportation and referencing statutory provisions).

135 8 C.F.R. § 240.14 (2001) (covering finality of order); 8 C.F.R. § 1003.39 (2011) (finality of decision); 8 C.F.R. § 3.39 (1995) ("[An] Immigration Judge's decision becomes final upon waiver of appeal or upon expiration of the time to appeal if no appeal is taken.").

136 8 C.F.R. § 240.25(e) (2011).

137 8 C.F.R. § 240.15 (2001) (regarding appeals). This provision has been removed and reserved in the 2011 C.F.R. and is no longer defined as it was in the 2001 version. However, for the provision regarding appeals of orders of removal, see 8 C.F.R. § 1240.15 (2011).

138 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c)(6) (motion to reconsider) (7) (motion to reopen) (2011).

139 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(2)(A) 1994 (2000).

140 Id.

141 Id.

142 Id.

unless there is a country willing to accept the alien, deportation cannot take effect and the alien will remain in custody. Because the alien may designate only one country of deportation and because it is within the discretion of the Attorney General to not deport him/her to such country if it would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States, the government enjoys substantial flexibility in the deportation of an alien. This means that deportation proceedings can be manipulated as an irregular rendition device.

An example of how deportation proceedings could replace extradition as a means of surrendering an individual can be seen in the handling of former Nazi war criminals who immigrated to the United States after WW II. Consider the following hypothesis: a foreign nation is seeking the extradition of a former Nazi war criminal and extradition proceedings prove too cumbersome or are unavailable due to treaty provisions; in this case deportation proceedings may be substituted. Through removal (deportation), an individual may be delivered to the requesting foreign state without employing extradition proceedings. The Justice Department has created a special unit to coordinate war crimes litigation, including removal (deportation) proceedings against alleged former war criminals living in the United States as aliens, as well as denaturalization of former war criminals currently living in the United States as naturalized citizens.[143]

The removal (deportation) of Nazi war criminals is not the only example of how immigration laws have been manipulated to serve as an alternative means of rendition.[144] Maurice A. Roberts, the former Chairman of the BIA, in a discussion on the use of deportation to remove communists from the United States, explained that:

> responding to periodic tensions, Congress has from time to time added fresh groups of aliens to the excludable and deportable classes, followed some time later by additional avenues of discretionary relief as new hardships were exposed by the over-broad new restrictions. None of the new restrictions, however, are ever repealed.[145]

Roberts also mentioned that unusual excesses can be contemplated by the INS (now the USCIS) in a time of crisis, in reliance on the plenary power of Congress in the immigration area. This has become readily apparent with the push for broader executive discretion in the wake of the tragic attacks suffered by the United States on September 11, 2001.[146]

Uneasy relations between the United States and Iran in the early 1980s presented a similar crisis. Iranians seeking political asylum in the United States made their appeal under what was at the time § 243(h) of the INA, on the grounds that they would be subject to persecution if they were returned to Iran. Almost without exception, asylum requests from Iranians were denied.[147] An illustrative case of the manipulation of immigration laws to serve a specific 143 For a full discussion, see Robert A. Cohen, Note, United States Exclusion and Deportation of Nazi War Criminals: The Acts of October 30, 1978, 13 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 101 (1980). The INS unsuccessfully attempted to operate a Special Task Force to denaturalize and deport Nazi war criminals. The Attorney General eventually transferred the Task Force to the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. Moeller, supra note 6, at 817–818.

---

144 See infra Sec. 3.2.3 (Denaturalization).

145 Roberts, supra note 57, at 158.

146 See Narenji v. Civiletti, 481 F. Supp. 1132, 1139 (D.D.C. 1979), wherein it is stated "It is not surprising then that the Supreme Court has also declared that `over no conceivable subject is the legislative power of Congress more complete that it is over' the immigration and naturalization of aliens." Accord Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977); Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972). See also Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranaham, 214 U.S. 320, 330 (1909). Congressional power is so broad in such matters as to entitle Congress to "make rules that could be unacceptable if applied to citizens." Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 80 (1976); USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, Title IV, Subtitle B ("Enhanced Immigration Provisions").

147 See Christopher T. Hanson, Note, Behind the Paper Curtain: Asylum Policy versus Asylum Practice, 7 N.Y.U. Rev. Law & Soc. Change 107, 117–121 (1978). Under the Shah, Iran strenuously objected to purpose is Narenji v. Civiletti.[148] The case was brought by the Attorney General in response to a regulation issue by the Attorney General (8 C.F.R. 214.5), which was effective only against Iranian students. Contrary to general trends in the adjudication of such regulations, the district court in Narenji declared the regulation unconstitutional for singling out Iranian students and thus violating their Fifth Amendment right to equal protection of the laws.[149] But the effect of the district court decision was short-lived as a month and a half later the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed it. The appellate court rejected the district court's conclusion that the INA "does not empower [the Attorney General] to draw distinctions among nonimmigrant alien students on the basis of nationality."[150] The appellate court specifically affirmed a reasonable basis test for discrimination, stating: "Distinctions on the basis of nationality may be drawn in the immigration field by the Congress or the Executive. So long as such distinctions are not wholly irrational they must be sustained."[151]

Given the broad discretionary power of Congress with respect to removal by exclusion and deportation, flexibility of immigration laws, lack of effective judicial review, and foreign policy considerations, it is likely that if extradition proves fruitless the United States will use immigration laws as an alternative rendition device. This alternative has been pursued with success on several occasions.[152]

A prominent example of this occurred with respect to Peter McMullen and Joseph Doherty.[153] McMullen, a former member of the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA), entered the United States illegally in 1978 using false documents. That year, the United Kingdom requested his extradition from the United States for various acts McMullen had allegedly committed on behalf of the PIRA. A U.S. magistrate denied the extradition request on the grounds of the political offense exception.[154] Following the denial of extradition, the United States attempted to deport McMullen, before finally obtaining a deportation order to Ireland in 1986.[155] While McMullen was in the process of being deported to Ireland, the United Kingdom again requested his surrender, this time under a new extradition treaty that eliminated the political offense exception contained in the earlier treaty that had served as the basis for the denial of the granting of asylum to Iranian citizens, and the United States bowed to these objections, regardless of the possibility of persecution of those sent back to Iran.

---

148 Narenji v. Civiletti, 481 F. Supp. 1132 (D.D.C. 1979), rev'd, 617 F.2d 745 (D.C. Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 957 (1980).

149 Narenji, 481 F. Supp. at 1145.

150 Narenji, 617 F.2d at 745, 747.

151 Id. at 747 (citations omitted).

152 McMullen v. United States, 953 F.2d 761, 763 (2d Cir. 1992). See also Barapind v. Reno, 225 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2000).

153 See supra notes 42–44 and accompanying text. See also Ch. III.

154 Id.

155 McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986) (affirming Board of Immigration Appeals' denial of request for asylum and withholding of deportation). The final deportation order was preceded by the following proceedings: (1) in 1980, an immigration judge found McMullen deportable but granted his application for asylum and withholding of deportation; (2) the BIA reversed the decision, not believing that McMullen would suffer persecution were he to return to Ireland (In re McMullen, 17 I & N Dec. 542 (BIA 1980)); (3) the Ninth Circuit found that BIA's finding of no likelihood of persecution was not supported by substantial evidence (In re McMullen, 658 F.2d 1312 (9th Cir. 1981)); (4) the BIA, again considering McMullen's request for asylum and withholding of deportation, found that by participating in PIRA activities, McMullen had participated in the persecution of others and could thus not be considered a refugee or a person eligible for withholding of deportation, and ordered him deported to Ireland (In re McMullen, 19 I & N Dec. 90 (BIA 1984)); (5) the Ninth Circuit reviewed the BIA's decision and affirmed (McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986)).

the United Kingdom's earlier extradition request for McMullen.[156] McMullen sought to have the new extradition request dismissed on the grounds that it was barred by the statute of limitations, but the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York denied his motion, and he was extradited to the United Kingdom.[157] As noted in Chapter III, the United Kingdom sought to extradite Doherty from the United States for his participation in a PIRA killing of a British Army captain. When a court barred Doherty's extradition on political offense exception grounds,[158] the INS deported him to the United Kingdom over his objection and his expressed designation of Ireland as the country to which he wished to be deported. These are good examples of the successful use of deportation as an alternative to extradition.

There are several examples of the United States working with foreign governments to gain the surrender of individuals to the United States through foreign immigration processes.[159] For example, in United States v. Struckman, Rian Stuckman, a U.S. citizen, fled to Panama to avoid charges of tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the United States.[160] United States and Panamanian authorities chose to remove Struckman from Panama through various visa revocations and denials rather than through the use of formal extradition procedures.[161] In other situations, the United States has filed an Interpol red notice and subsequently worked with the country where the alleged criminal was present to obtain that criminal's surrender via expulsion proceedings,[162] or obtained surrenders from other countries via their deportation procedures.[163]

---

156 In re Extradition of McMullen, No. 86 Cr. Misc. 1, at 47, 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7201, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. June 24, 1988).

157 See McMullen v. United States, 989 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 301 (1993) (reversing the earlier holding that the subsequent extradition treaty is an unlawful bill of attainder as applied to McMullen); reversing in part, McMullen v. United States, 953 F.2d 761 (2d Cir. 1992) (affirming the district court's holding); McMullen v. United States, 769 F. Supp. 1278 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (holding that the subsequent extradition treaty is an unlawful bill of attainder as applied to McMullen).

158 In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270, 277 (S.D.N.Y. 1984).

159 The Council of Europe recently issued a document discussing this process of U.S. "disguised extradition." For the European perspective on this issue, see Opinion of the European Committee on Crime Problems, Committee of Experts on the Operation of European Conventions on Co-Operation in Criminal Matters on "Disguised Extradition i.e. Surrender by Other Means, Some Ideas to Start a Discussion," PC-OC (2011) 09rev, May 16, 2011, available at http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/pc-oc/PCOC_documents/PC-OC%20_2011_%2009%20rev%20E%20Mr%20Eugenio%20Selvaggi%20%20Disguised%20Extradition%20and%20Comments%20%20Cz%20Rep-Belgium.pdf (last visited Sept. 28, 2012). See also Mohamed & Another v. Pres. of the Rep. of South Africa 2001 (17) CCT 01 (CC) (S. Afr.)

160 United States v. Struckman, 611 F.3d 560, 564 (9th Cir. 2010). See also United States v. Liersch, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98439 (S.D. Cal. June 26, 2009) (involving an individual accused of money laundering and tax evasion removed from Guatemala without formal extradition proceedings. As extradition was not involved, the relator was not able to raise defenses under the United States–Guatemala extradition treaty).

161 *Id.*at 565–566 (the Ninth Circuit upheld the district court's ruling that Struckman was under its jurisdiction and discussed the Ker/Frisbie doctrine; see Chs. V and VI).

162 See United States v. Gardiner, 279 Fed. Appx. 848, 849–850 (11th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion) (upholding the expulsion and reasoning that "for extradition to be the sole method of transfer, the treaty must expressly prohibit any other method."); Yousef v. United States, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79295 at *2–3, *21 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) (the Honduran Department of Immigration and Alien Affairs issued an order of deportation less than a month after the U.S. submitted an Interpol Red Notice application for the alleged criminal's arrest. The court reasoned, "A lawful arrest and expulsion, even if performed by armed, masked agents, is simply not a kidnapping."). The United States has also removed aliens to foreign states after the foreign state issued an international arrest warrant for the alien. See Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Surrenders to Costa Rica a Former Police Officer Wanted for Murder, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 134–135 (Apr. 2008).

163 See Bruce Zagaris, Cuba Deports American Fugitive Wanted for Sexual Crimes against a Minor, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 315–316 (Aug. 2008).

3.2.3. The Denaturalization Process[164]

The fact that an individual has become a naturalized citizen of the United States does not mean that he/she is no longer subject to possible removal (deportation). A naturalized citizen of the United States may lose his/her citizenship through denaturalization, at which time he/she can be subjected to removal proceedings.[165] Denaturalization may play a significant role in extradition as well. For example, if a foreign country sought a naturalized citizen of the United States and extradition proceedings proved fruitless or too cumbersome, denaturalization followed by removal (deportation) provides an alternative.

In order to facilitate the surrender of naturalized U.S. citizens, the INA provided for the creation of the Office of Special Investigations (OSI). The OSI, which is a unit of the Criminal Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, has the authority to find, investigate, and denaturalize aliens.[166] An example of how denaturalization and removal (deportation) proceedings operate in place of extradition proceedings can be found in cases involving Nazi war criminals.[167] Denaturalization cases are few, but as evidenced by the Demjanjuk case discussed below, they reveal the possibility of abuse of the process in order to achieve desired results.[168]

Of the INA's many requisites for naturalization, the most important is that the applicant, during the period of his permanent residence in the United States, has been a person of good moral character.[169] A material misrepresentation of an applicant's moral character can be found if the applicant failed to provide the INS with information concerning his association with the Nazi government of Germany. Additionally, the Government may consider any past conduct of the alien in appraising his present moral fitness.[170]

The Justice Department has brought denaturalization proceedings in several prominent cases against naturalized citizens for alleged Nazi war crimes.[171] Perhaps the most famous of these 164 See Kurzban, supra note 3, at 670–676 (discussing loss of citizenship). For an analysis of international law regarding denaturalization of individuals with multiple nationalities, as well as the processes of denaturalization, see William Thomas Worster, International Law and the Expulsion of Individuals with More than One Nationality, 14 U.C.L.A. J. Int'l L. & For. Aff. 423 (Fall 2009).

---

165 See 8 U.S.C. § 1451 (2000) (concerning revocation of naturalization).

166 See Eli M. Rosenbaum, An Introduction to the Work of the Office of Special Investigations, 54 U.S. Attorneys' Bulletin 1 (Jan. 2006), available at http://www.justice.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usab5401.pdf (last visited Sept. 28, 2012).

167 Cohen, supra note 143, at 129. See also International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Fugitive Offenders, 1980 Am. Soc'y Int'l L. Proc. 279; Moeller, supra note 6, at 817–843.

168 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1993) (holding that the Office of Special Investigations of the Department of Justice Criminal Division engaged in prosecutorial misconduct that "seriously misled the court" and led to Demjanjuk's forced departure from the United States and trial on capital charges in Israel). See generally Alfred de Zayas, Human Rights Implications of the Demjanjuk Case, 31 The Globe 3 (1994). See also Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights 235–262 (2001).

169 8 U.S.C. § 1427(a) (2000).

170 See United States v. Palciauskas, 734 F.2d 625 (11th Cir. 1984); United States v. Fedorenko, 455 F. Supp. 893 (S.D. Fla. 1978), rev'd, 597 F.2d 946 (5th Cir. 1979), aff'd, 449 U.S. 490 (1981). See also 56 Interpreter Releases 340, 340–342 (1979); Moeller, supra note 6, at 820 nn.143, 145.

171 See, e.g., United States v. Spogiris, No. CV-82-1804 (E.D.N.Y. May 18, 1984), aff'd, 763 F.2d 115 (2d Cir. 1985), appeal docketed, No. 85-4163 (2d Cir. Feb. 26, 1985); United States v. Kungys, 571 F. Supp. 1104 (D.N.J. 1983), rev'd, 793 F.2d 516 (3d Cir. 1986); United States v. Kowalchuk, 571 F. Supp. 72 (E.D. Pa. 1983), rev'd, 744 F.2d 301 (3d Cir. 1984), aff'd 773 F.2d 488 (3rd Cir. 1985); United States v. Palciauskas, 559 F. Supp. 1294 (M.D. Fla. 1983), aff'd, 734 F.2d 625 (11th Cir. 1984); United States v. Koziy, 540 F. Supp. 25 (S.D. Fla. 1982), aff'd, 728 F.2d 1314 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 835 (1984); United States v. Schellong, 547 F. Supp. 569 (N.D. Ill. 1982), aff'd, 717 F.2d 329 (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1007 (1984); United States v. Dercacz, 530 F. Supp. 1348 cases involved John Demjanjuk, who was alleged to be Ivan Grozny, also known as "Ivan the Terrible," a notorious guard at the Treblinka extermination camp in Poland. Demjanjuk was admitted for lawful permanent residence in the United States in 1952 and became a citizen of the United States in 1958.[172] Nearly thirty years later, the OSI, brought an action under the INA to revoke Demjanjuk's Certificate of Naturalization. The government alleged that Demjanjuk had willfully concealed the fact that he had served with the Nazis as an armed guard at the extermination camp and that this made him ineligible for an immigration visa and for citizenship in the United States.[173] In 1981, following a trial, a district court entered an order revoking Demjanjuk's Certificate of Naturalization and vacating the order admitting Demjanjuk to U.S. citizenship.[174]

After his denaturalization, the INS commenced deportation proceedings against Demjanjuk.[175] An immigration judge found Demjanjuk deportable and designated the Soviet Union as the country of deportation.[176] The judge, however, also granted Demjanjuk the option of voluntary departure from the United States.[177] The BIA affirmed the finding of deportability, but reversed the grant of voluntary departure.[178]

In the meantime, Israel requested Demjanjuk's extradition from the United States pursuant to an Israeli arrest warrant charging him with "crimes of murdering Jews."[179] "[B]ased largely on the District Court's finding in the denaturalization case that Demjanjuk was Ivan the Terrible,"[180] the District Court held that sufficient evidence existed to conclude that there was probable cause that Demjanjuk committed the acts alleged in the Israeli arrest warrant.[181] Consequently, the court certified to the secretary of state that Demjanjuk was extraditable to Israel.[182]

Demjanjuk was then extradited to Israel where he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death by the Jerusalem District Court.[183] After Demjanjuk had spent seven years in an Israeli prison, the Israeli Supreme Court reversed his conviction and ordered his acquittal and release after considering evidence that cast doubt on the allegation that Demjanjuk was, in fact, Ivan the Terrible.[184] Upon release, Demjanjuk returned to the United States, though not before

---

(E.D.N.Y. 1982); United States v. Linnas, 527 F. Supp. 426 (E.D.N.Y. 1981), aff'd, 685 F.2d 427 (2d Cir.) (mem.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 995 (1982); United States v. Demjanjuk, 518 F. Supp. 1362 (N.D. Ohio 1981), aff'd, 680 F.2d 32 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1036 (1982); United States v. Osidach, 513 F. Supp. 51 (E.D. Pa. 1981); United States v. Fedorenko, 455 F. Supp. 893 (S.D. Fla. 1978), rev'd, 597 F.2d 946 (5th Cir. 1979), aff'd, 449 U.S. 490 (1981). See also Moeller, supra note 6, at 831–833; Irene A. Steiner, Note, Misrepresentation and Materiality in Immigration Law—Scouring the Melting Pot, 48 Fordham L. Rev. 471 (1980).

172 United States v. Demjanjuk, 518 F. Supp. 1362, 1363 (N.D. Ohio 1981), aff'd, 680 F.2d 32 (6th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1036 (1982).

173 Demjanjuk, 518 F. Supp. at 1363.

174 Id. at 1386.

175 In re Extradition of Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 544 (N.D. Ohio 1985), aff'd, Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986).

176 In re Extradition of Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. at 544.

177 Id.

178 Id.

179 Id.

180 Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338, 356 (6th Cir. 1993).

181 In re Extradition of Demjanjuk, 612 F. Supp. 544 (N.D. Ohio 1985), aff'd, Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986).

182 Id.

183 The trial and appeal are discussed in Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338 at 356 (6th Cir. 1993).

184 Id.

overcoming the efforts of the Department of Justice to keep him from exercising his right of return.

In 1993, the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, on its own motion, considered whether attorneys of the OSI engaged in prosecutorial misconduct by failing to disclose exculpatory evidence in their possession casting doubt on the assertion that Demjanjuk was the man known as Ivan the Terrible.[185] The court held that the OSI attorneys engaged in prosecutorial misconduct and that their actions constituted fraud on the court. The court specifically stated:

> [W]e hold that the OSI attorneys acted with reckless disregard for the truth and for the government's obligation to take no steps that prevent an adversary from presenting his case fully and fairly. This was fraud on the court in the circumstances of this case where, by recklessly assuming Demjanjuk's guilt, they failed to observe their obligation to produce exculpatory materials requested by Demjanjuk.[186]

The Court also stated:

> The attitude of the OSI attorneys toward disclosing information to Demjanjuk's counsel was not consistent with the government's obligation to work for justice rather than for a result that favors its attorneys' preconceived ideas of what the outcome of legal proceedings should be . . . We do not believe their personal conviction that they had the right man provided an excuse for recklessly disregarding their obligation to provide information specifically requested by Demjanjuk . . . the withholding of which almost certainly misled his counsel and endangered his ability to mount a defense . . .[187]

Finally, the court acknowledged the political pressure exerted on OSI from outside forces, noting that:

> In August of 1978 Congressman Eilberg, the Chairman of an important committee, wrote then Attorney General Bell a letter insisting that Demjanjuk be prosecuted hard because "we cannot afford the risk of losing" the case. The trial attorney then in charge of the case, Mr. Parker, wrote in his 1980 memorandum that the denaturalization case could not be dismissed because of factors "largely political and obviously considerable." Other lawyers in OSI wrote memos discussing this case as a political "hot potato" that if lost "will raise political problems for us all including the Attorney General." Mr. Ryan, Director of the office, wrote the Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division in 1980 that OSI had "secured the support in Congress, Jewish community organizations, public at large for OSI—press coverage has been substantially favorable and support from Jewish organizations is now secure," but he went on to say that "this support can't be taken for granted and must be reinforced at every opportunity." Mr. Ryan also testified that "in 1986, which was the year before the [Israeli] trial [of Demjanjuk], I went to Israel for about 10 days on a lecture tour that was sponsored by the Anti-defamation League . . . " It is obvious from the record that the prevailing mindset at OSI was that the office must try to please and maintain very close relationships with various interest groups because their continued existence depended upon it.[188]

The court then vacated the judgment of the district court and its own judgment in Demjanjuk's extradition case "on the ground that the judgments were wrongly procured as a result of prosecutorial misconduct that constituted fraud on the Court."[189] Neither Demjanjuk's return to the United States nor the prosecutorial misconduct addressed by the Sixth Circuit, however,

185 Id. at 339.

186 Id. at 354.

187 Id. at 349–350.

188 Id. at 354–355 (citations omitted).

189 Id. at 356.

ipso facto invalidated Demjanjuk's denaturalization, nor did they preclude renewed extradition proceedings against him at a later point. In fact, Demjanjuk was deported to Germany in 2009 to face trial, and was sentenced by a German court to five years in prison after being found guilty of taking part in the murder of tens of thousands of individuals while working as a guard at the Sobibor concentration camp.[190] The Demjanjuk case highlights the fact that in cases involving denaturalization and extradition, the government can effectively pick and choose the proceeding that will most easily accomplish its objective.

Denaturalization has been used on numerous occasions to deal with naturalized U.S. citizens who were Nazis.[191] In United States v. Walus,[192] the defendant, Frank Walus, was denaturalized on May 30, 1978, after Judge Julius Hoffman held that the record established that the defendant had been a member of the Gestapo during WWII and committed criminal acts of violence. Judge Hoffman found that Walus had gained his citizenship illegally by concealing these facts, which reflected his lack of good moral character.[193]

In United States v. Fedorenko,[194] the defendant, Feodor Fedorenko, was a Russian soldier captured by German forces in 1941. He had been trained by the Germans to serve as an armed concentration camp guard and had been sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. In 1949, Fedorenko applied for admission to the United States. In his visa application he deliberately falsified his whereabouts during the war years and did not reveal his service as a concentration camp guard. Fedorenko was naturalized in 1970. However, in August 1977, the government filed a denaturalization complaint against Fedorenko under § 340(a) of the INA. Fedorenko admitted that he had falsified his visa application, but asserted that he had done so out of fear of repatriation to the Soviet Union. The district court found in favor of Fedorenko, but the court of appeals reversed, stating that:

> There is a crucial distinction between a district court's authority to grant citizenship and its authority to revoke citizenship. In the former situation, the court must consider facts and circumstances relevant to determining whether an individual meets such requirements for naturalization as good moral character and an understanding of the English language, basic American history, and civics. The district courts must be accorded some discretion to make these determinations. Once it has been determined that a person does not qualify for citizenship, however, the district court has no discretion to ignore the defeat and grant citizenship. The denaturalization

190 Jack Ewing & Alan Cowell, Demjanjuk Convicted for Role in Nazi Death Camp, N.Y. Times, May 12, 2011.

191 In the past, there have been a number of denaturalization cases of Nazi war criminals' see United States. v. Tittjung, 235 F.3d 330 (7th Cir. 2000); United States v. Dailide, 227 F.3d 385 (6th Cir. 2000); Breyer v. Meissner, 214 F.3d 416 (3rd Cir. 2000); United States.v. Szehinskyj, 104 F.Supp.2d 480 (E.D. Pa. 2000); Tittjung v. Reno, 199 F.3d 393 (7th Cir. 1999); Hammer v. INS, 195 F.3d 836 (6th Cir. 1999); United States. v. Lindert, 142 F.3d 437 (6th Cir. 1998); United States. v. Hajda, 135 F.3d 439 (7th Cir. 1998); United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666, 118 S.Ct. 2218 (1998); United States.v. Stelmokas, 100 F.3d 302 (3rd Cir. 1996); United States v. Lileikis, 929 F. Supp. 31 (D. Mass. 1996); United States v. Koreh, 59 F.3d 431 (3d Cir. 1995); United States v. Gecas, 50 F.3d 1549 (11th Cir. 1995), vacated by 81 F.3d 1032 (11th Cir. 1996), reh'g on banc, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997); United States v. Ragouskas, 1995 WL 86640 (N.D. Ill. 1995); United States v. Breyer, 41 F.3d 884 (3d Cir. 1994); United States v. Hutyrczyk, 803 F. Supp. 1001 (D.N.J. 1992); Kairys v. INS, 981 F.2d 937 (7th Cir. 1992).

192 United States v. Walus, 453 F. Supp. 699 (N.D. Ill. 1978), rev'd, 616 F.2d 283 (7th Cir. 1980). See also David Kreig, Hunting Nazis: Trying Task for Immigration Service, Nat. L.J., Nov. 6, 1978.

193 Walus, 453 F. Supp. at 716.

194 United States v. Fedorenko, 597 F.2d 946, aff'd, 449 U.S. 490 (1981). It was the first Supreme Court decision in a denaturalization case. See generally Moeller, supra note 6, at 820–822.

> statute, 8 U.S.C. Section 1451, does not accord the district courts any authority to excuse the fraudulent procurement of citizenship.[195]

In Linnas v. Immigration and Naturalization Service,[196] the Second Circuit upheld the deportation of Karl Linnas as a Nazi war criminal. Linnas had entered the United States in 1951 and was naturalized in 1960. In 1979, the government began proceedings to revoke his citizenship on the grounds that he had procured it fraudulently, arguing that Linnas had not been a university student during WWII, as he had claimed in 1951, but rather that he had been chief of the Nazi concentration camp in Tartu, Estonia. After Linnas's denaturalization[197] the government sought his deportation. Linnas selected the independent Republic of Estonia as his destination, although Estonia was at that time a part of the Soviet Union.[198] The immigration judge disregarded Linnas's request and designated the Soviet Union as the country to which Linnas was to be deported. Linnas had earlier been tried in the Soviet Union in absentia and sentenced to death. Linnas appealed on the grounds that his deportation constituted disguised extradition and violated his rights to equal protection and due process.[199] The Second Circuit denied both challenges and upheld the deportation on the grounds that Nazi war criminals are not a class within the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution and that the federal judiciary cannot require that U.S. constitutional protections be applied to persons who are outside federal jurisdiction.

United States law does not provide for the automatic extradition of persons found guilty of war crimes.[200] The rendition of such persons is achieved in practice, however, through reliance upon immigration laws, in particular the INA.[201] This statute has been applied by the courts both to deport noncitizens who are seeking asylum on political or humanitarian grounds or to denaturalize persons who have become U.S. citizens.[202]

As a consequence of these practices, persons who are denied entry or whose citizenship has been revoked are returned to their country of origin. In most cases in the past this meant return to communist-bloc countries where prosecution and punishment had been heavily influenced by political considerations. Additionally, because the alleged crimes dated to WWII, the deported individuals may have suffered further hardship because of advanced age and infirmity.

The dilemma that confronts the immigration judge in these cases consists, on the one hand, of the need to bring such individuals to justice, and on the other of the realization that

---

195 Fedorenko, 597 F.2d at 953–954 (citations omitted). Fedorenko was deported to the Soviet Union in 1984 and his execution for treason and war crimes was announced on July 27, 1987. See Ex-Nazi Fedorenko Executed, Chi. Trib, July 28, 1987, § 1, at 5.

196 Linnas v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024 (2d Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 995 (1986). Linnas was deported to the Soviet Union on April 20, 1987. See Kenneth B. Noble, U.S. Deports Man Condemned to Die in Soviet Union, N.Y. Times, Apr. 21, 1987, § 1, at 1.

197 United States v. Linnas, 527 F. Supp. 426 (E.D.N.Y. 1981), aff'd, 685 F.2d 427 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 883 (1982).

198 Linnas apparently intended to designate an office building in New York that then housed the representatives of the Republic of Estonia. Linnas, 790 F.2d at 1027.

199 Linnas also claimed that the amendment to the INA that allows the deportation of former Nazis constituted a bill of attainder. This ground was also denied by the Second Circuit. 790 F.2d at 1028–1030.

200 For a discussion of war crimes and crimes against humanity as exceptions to exemption from extradition, see Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.7.

201 8 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq. 1994 (2000).

202 See United States v. Fedorenko, 455 F. Supp. 893 (S.D. Fla. 1978), rev'd, 597 F.2d 946 (5th Cir. 1979), aff'd, 449 U.S. 490 (1981); United States v. Walus, 453 F. Supp. 699 (N.D. Ill. 1978), rev'd, 616 F.2d 283 (7th Cir. 1980).

prosecution may result in a harsh penalty.[203] As an alternative to this practice, a jurisdictional basis should be established in the United States to prosecute persons accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity. This would ensure that courts could make objective determinations of these grave charges and guarantee equitable punishment, taking into account such mitigating factors as the age and health of the accused, and the years he/she has spent as a law-abiding United States citizen.[204]

The USCIS determines citizenship status where issues involving possible denaturalization are concerned. These issues include instances where prior findings of loss of citizenship were reversed, and anywhere a previously issued citizenship document was either destroyed or replaced. Where the subject was not entitled to a citizenship document, the case reflects the USCIS' decision regarding citizenship status.

The law provides for denaturalization in cases where the subject obtained the document by fraud or illegality.[205] The denaturalization procedure protects the holder's interest by assuring that he/she is accorded due process of the law. The INA provides for the revocation of citizenship and the cancellation of the certificate of naturalization where they were procured illegally, or by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation.[206] The naturalized citizen has sixty days upon the service of notice to answer the government's petition alleging fraud or misrepresentation.[207]

Under the provisions of § 340 of the INA, not only can the naturalized person lose his/her citizenship by a showing of illegality or misrepresentation in the procurement of the naturalization, but the naturalized person can also be subjected to possible revocation of naturalization by joining or becoming affiliated with various organizations.[208]

Procedure for the revocation of naturalization is as follows:

1. The USCIS district director, having jurisdiction over the area where the naturalized citizen resides, reviews the evidence and makes a report to the USCIS regional commissioner.

2. The USCIS regional commissioner prepares an "affidavit of good cause" stating why action should be taken to denaturalize—that is, remove the citizenship of—the naturalized citizen.

3. The affidavit of good cause is forwarded to the General Counsel of the USCIS at the USCIS headquarters in Washington, DC.

4. The USCIS General Counsel recommends to the Justice Department Criminal Division that proceedings be initiated to revoke citizenship.

5. The Criminal Division, if it concurs in the recommendation, advises the United States Attorney having jurisdiction over the area where the naturalized citizen resides to file a suit in the U.S. district court seeking to have the naturalization revoked.

6. The action is "for the purpose of revoking and setting aside the order admitting such person to citizenship."[209]

7. The holder of a naturalization certificate then has sixty days to show why the revocation should not take place.

---

203 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Procedures for the Apprehension and Rendition of Offenders, 1980 Proceedings of the Am. Soc'y of Int'l L. 277 (1980).

204 Id.

205 8 U.S.C. § 1451(a), (f) (2000).

206 8 U.S.C. § 1451(a) (2000).

207 8 U.S.C. § 1451(b) (2000).

208 8 U.S.C. § 1451(c) (2000).

209 8 U.S.C. § 1451(a) (2000).

8. The naturalized citizen has the full right of appeal through the judicial system.

If successful in having naturalization revoked, the USCIS must initiate separate proceedings to remove (deport) the alien.

In the cases of Walus and Fedorenko, there is reason to believe that the certificates of citizenship were illegally procured by concealment and, therefore void ab initio, justifying revocation and cancellation. In these cases there has been no questionable use of immigration laws. However, on consideration of underlying factors, the use of immigration laws is in reality a disguised substitute for extradition: the defendants in these two cases were alleged war criminals and subject to prosecution for their crimes. On discovery of these defendants, the correct procedure for their removal for prosecution would be through extradition, as in the Demjanjuk case, although there the government abused the extradition process. This is significant, because the defendants then would be subject to the benefits and limitations specific to extradition proceedings.

This problem could be resolved by an application of the jurisdictional basis of universality to which the United States does not subscribe. If the United States had universal jurisdiction for these crimes,[210] individuals such as the ones involved in the above cases could be prosecuted in the United States for war crimes and crimes against humanity. This exercise of jurisdiction and subsequent prosecution would act as a legitimate alternative to extradition and would be in keeping with the maxim aut dedere aut judicare.[211]

3.3. Immigration and Naturalization Act Reforms

As discussed above, immigration laws, whether through removal (exclusion) or removal (deportation) proceedings, have been used by the government to remove persons from the United States and deliver them to states that have either sought to extradite them unsuccessfully or who have an interest in obtaining their custody but are unable to do so through extradition. This practice is made possible by the absence of legislative linkage between the extradition and immigration statutes, respectively contained in title 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196 and 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101–1537. Because extradition proceedings are judicial and INA's proceedings are administrative, the latter gives the government greater discretion. As they became effective in 1997, INA amendments made by both the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRIRA)[212] and by the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act 1996 (AEDPA)[213] have sharply circumscribed the rights of aliens, including permanent residents of the United States.[214] Unprecedented discretion given to the Attorney General and the USCIS, coupled with a curtailment of due process rights and the abhorrent practice of "secret evidence," may make disguised extradition even easier when other mechanisms would be rejected.

3.3.1. Removal (Deportation)

Reformed INA § 101(a)(43) permits deportation of an alien including a permanent resident who was found guilty of an "aggravated felony," which includes crimes of moral turpitude with an accompanying sentence of one year or longer.[215] Under the reformed statute, high-speed flight,

---

210 See Ch. VI.

211 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.

212 Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009-546 (1996) (codified as amended in various sections of 8 U.S.C.).

213 Pub. L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214 (1996) (codified as amended in various sections of 8 U.S.C.).

214 With respect to permanent residents, it is a departure from the traditional "equal protection" between the civil rights of citizens and permanent residents of the United States, as well as the right to the due process of law to all persons within the United States, as discussed below.

215 See AEDPA § 440(e), 110 Stat. at 1276–1278; AEDPA § 435(a), 110 Stat. at 1274 (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. §§ 2244-66).

domestic violence, stalking, and violations of protective orders can all be considered crimes involving moral turpitude, and therefore grounds for removal (deportation).[216] The IIRIA also amended the INA § 101(a) by redefining an aggravated felony as a serious crime with an accompanying sentence of one year or longer,[217] a significant reduction from the previous requirement that the sentence be for five years or longer. This change renders a permanent resident alien removable (deportable) if he/she commits a less serious crime, such as theft, even if that crime was committed prior to the two acts. The IIRIRA and the AEDPA amendments to INA § 101 have retroactive effect with respect to the definition of an aggravated felony.[218] Thus, for the first time in U.S. history, a sanction, namely removal (deportation), has been added to the sanction received after a criminal conviction, notwithstanding Article I § 8(3) of the Constitution, which prohibits congress from passing ex post facto laws.[219] The issue of the constitutionality of the retroactivity of the new provisions was dealt with by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Domond v. U.S. INS,[220] which upheld the provision in AEDPA making aliens convicted of 216 See Gabrielle M. Buckley, Immigration and Nationality, 32 Int'l Lawyer 471, 475 (1998).

---

217 See IIRIRA § 321(a), Pup. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009-546, 3009-627 (codified as amended at various sections of 8 U.S.C.).

218 See Ira J. Kurzban & Raquel M. Chaviano, Immigration Law: 1997 Survey of Florida Law, 22 Nova L. Rev. 149, 156 (1997) ("Ancient convictions for relatively minor matters will now result in the deportation of long-term residents without relief.") For a discussion of cases involving crimes of moral turpitude, see Kurzban, supra note 3, at 75–95 (discussing, among others, In re Almanza, 24 I&N Dec. 771 (BIA 2009) and Vasquez-Hernandez v. Holder, 590 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2010) where petty offenses were crimes of moral turpitude). For a case discussing the analytical framework that the immigration judge, Board of Immigration Appeals, and Department of Homeland Security must apply to determine if a conviction involves a crime of moral turpitude, see In re Silva-Trevino, 24 I&N Dec. 687 (AG 2008).

219 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law (1977), explaining the prohibition against ex post facto laws:

> These laws undertake to define as offenses acts committed before the adoption of the statute prohibiting such conduct and to punish acts committed prior to the enactment of the statute sought to be applied. The United Stated Constitution prohibits such laws because they seek to make a person accountable for conduct that could not have been known to constitute a criminal act. Thus, no criminal statute can be retroactive, and no person can be found to be guilty of a crime which was not a crime at the time when the alleged offense was committed. Any such offence, defined after its commission, lacks "legality" because the law on its face violates the constitutional principle limiting the power of the sovereign in the enactment of such criminal statutes . . . In the landmark case of Calder v. Bull, the Court defined ex post facto laws as:
>
> > (1) Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes that action. (2) Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. (3) Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence and receives less or different testimony, than the law required at the time of commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender.
>
> . . . In Bouie v. City of Columbia, the Supreme Court held that the prohibition against ex post facto laws extended to the retroactive application of law by judicial decision: "If a state legislature is barred by the Ex Post Facto Clause from passing such a law, it must follow that a State Supreme Court is barred by the Due Process Clause from achieving precisely the same result by judicial construction." . . . As to other procedural changes, the Supreme Court applies the following test: Does the change adversely affect a substantial right existing at the time of the offence? Among those changes held to be "substantial" are the reduction of the number of trial jurors, the reduction in the number of jurors needed for a guilty verdict, and the abolition of the right to trial by jury in certain cases.

Id. at 30–32 (citing Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 390 (1878); Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 353–354 (1964)). See also USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, Title IV, Subtitle B, § 411(c) (applying broader definitions of terrorist activities retroactively).

220 Domond v. U.S. INS, 244 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 2001).

certain specified crimes ineligible for discretionary relief if they had been convicted for a qualifying crime based on acts occurring prior to AEDPA's effective date. The court also held that the application of AEDPA's provisions to aliens did not violate the ex post facto clause of the Constitution. However, in the 2001 INS v. St. Cyr[221] decision, the Supreme Court struck down only the retroactively applicable provisions that denied discretionary relief from removal (deportation) of an alien who pled guilty to an aggravated felony prior to the statutes' enactment.

The IIRIRA provides, also for the first time in the history of the United States, for the removal (deportation) of a permanent resident who has committed an aggravated felony whether under state or federal law, where the conviction is based on an admission of facts sufficient to find guilt, without requiring an actual sentencing by a judge.[222] This establishes what appears on its face to be an unconstitutional presumption of the removability (deportability) of aliens who commit aggravated felonies (as defined by the Act) with retroactive application. Furthermore, the Act does not even give permanent residents, who heretofore were in the same class as U.S. citizens for purposes of civil rights under the Equal Protection Clause,[223] the right to judicial review.[224] However, the USCIS bears the burden of proving the conviction by clear and convincing evidence as stated by the U.S. Supreme Court in Nijhawan v. Holder: "... [A] deportation proceeding is a civil proceeding in which the Government does not have to prove its claim 'beyond a reasonable doubt.' At the same time the evidence that the Government offers must meet a 'clear and convincing' standard. 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(c)(3)(A)."[225]

The same deprivation of the right to judicial review is contained in AEDPA § 440(a), which provides that once a final order of removal is entered by the USCIS for an alien who was found removable (deportable) on the grounds that he/she committed a criminal offense covered by INA statute,[226] that order is final and is not, under the Act, subject to review by any court.[227] The IIRIRA adds that the alien cannot have access to judicial review of orders detaining him/her pending his/her removal.[228] Amended INA § 242(a)(2)(B) also denies judicial review of all discretionary relief other than asylum.[229]

For the first few years following the enactment of the 1996 Acts, the Supreme Court was reluctant to grant certiorari in cases that dealt with judicial review.[230] This resulted in lower

---

221 INS v. St. Cyr, 121 S.Ct. 2271 (2001).

222 See IIRIRA § 322(a), 110 Stat. at 3009–3628 (codified as amended at various sections of 8 U.S.C.). See also Kurzban, supra note 3, at 169–193 (collecting cases involving aggravated felonies).

223 U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

224 See infra notes 225–232.

225 INA §240(c)(3)(A); Nijhawan v. Holder, 557 U.S. 2294, 129 S. Ct. 2294, 2303 (2009) (concluding that, where deportation proceedings are instituted under the $10,000 monetary threshold in the aggravated felony provision of 8 U.S.C. §1101(a)(43)(M)(i), that statutory provision applies to the specific circumstances surrounding the commission of a fraud and deceit crime on a specific occasion, and not to a category of crimes defined to include the monetary threshold); Cruz-Garza v. Ashcroft, 396 F.3d 1125, 1128–1129 (10th Cir. 2005). See also Kurzban, supra note 3, at 169.

226 See 8 U.S.C § 1252(a)(2)(C) (1999) for a list of sections that defined criminal offenses for removal purposes.

227 See infra notes 228–232.

228 C.F. David Cole, No Clear Statement: An Argument for Preserving Judicial Review of Removal Decisions, 12 Geo. Immigr. L.J. 429 (1998).

229 INA § 240A (cancellation of removal and adjustment of status) greatly limits the availability of discretionary relief to begin with; it combines the earlier §§ 244, 212(c) (suspension of deportation, and waivers, respectively) to produce a much harsher standard to obtain relief, therefore, rendering an alien convicted of an aggravated felony requesting relief to have to pass the "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship" standard. See also Ch. III for a discussion of asylum.

230 See John Assadi & Craig Donovan, Immigration and Nationality, 34 Int'l Lawyer 646 (1999).

courts dealing with the constitutionality of the reform Acts' provisions that deprived petitioners from obtaining federal courts habeas corpus review. Consequently different courts reached different results, which resulted in a split in the circuits. For example, in Dunbar v. INS[231] the federal district court of Connecticut held that the IIRIRA did not deprive the court of habeas jurisdiction over aliens' claim. A similar result was reached by the court of the Eastern District of New York.[232] However, in Moore v. District Director, INS,[233] the district court of Nebraska stated that "Congress has repealed all statutory habeas jurisdiction."[234] Eventually, the Supreme Court, in INS v. St. Cyr[235] resolved the issue of whether federal courts have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 to review a decision denying the aliens discretionary relief, holding that under § 2241, the federal courts are allowed to grant writs of habeas corpus when the government unlawfully deprives a petitioner of his/her liberty.[236] However, in 2005, Congress unambiguously eliminated habeas review of alien removal orders through the passage of the REAL ID act.[237] However, it should be noted that the REAL ID Act's legislative history makes it clear that habeas corpus relief will not be barred by the REAL ID Act in contexts other than challenges to removal orders.[238]

Under the IIRIRA and the AEDPA a permanent resident will not only lose his/her status, if found eligible for removal (deportation), because of an "aggravated felony" he/she committed, even in the past, but he/she is also potentially subject to removal (deportation) to a country where the alien would fear for his/her life or freedom based on the alien's race, religion, nationality, or political opinion.[239] This provision appears on its face to violate the 1967 Protocol amending the 1951 Refugee Convention discussed in Chapter III on asylum.

Using the removal (deportation) provisions, §§ 231–244, 501–507, the USCIS could remove (deport) a person to a country that seeks to obtain custody over that person, but has been unable to obtain custody through extradition, or unwilling to go through extradition because of anticipated failure. It is possible for the USCIS to do so by anticipating the country to which the person may be removed (deported), or for which the person has expressed a preference. Through informal or formal diplomatic channels the USCIS can arrange for that country to decline accepting that person, thus eliminating possible countries to which the alien can be removed (deported) and thereby secure removal to the country that USCIS ultimately wants to deport him/her to.

In some cases the USCIS is unable, in good faith, to find a country willing to accept the removable (deportable) person, and that has led to prolonging the detention of that person without any constitutional basis, as the person in question has already served the full prison term of 231 Dunbar v. INS, 64 F. Supp. 2d 47 (D. Conn. 1999), aff'd 229 F.3d 406 (2d Cir. 2000), cert. granted 531 U.S. 1107 (2001), aff'd 553 U.S. 289 (2001).

---

232 Mojica v. Reno, 970 F. Supp. 130 (E.D.N.Y. 1997).

233 Moore v. District Director, INS, 956 F. Supp. 878 (D. Neb. 1997).

234 Id. at 882.

235 INS v. St. Cyr, 121 S. Ct. 2271 (2001).

236 Id.. See Assadi & Donovan, supra note 230, at 643.

237 See Jennifer Norako, Comment, Accuracy or Fairness?: The Meaning of Habeas Corpus after Boumediene v. Bush and Its Implications on Alien Removal Orders, 58 Am. U. L. Rev. 1611, 1622–1624, 1647–1648 (2009). For a critical analysis of the REAL ID's shortcomings in providing review of alien removal decisions, see id. at 1640–1647. For a detailed discussion of the effect of the REAL ID Act on habeas corpus review, and for the availability of habeas corpus relief generally, see Kurzban, supra note 3, at 1226–1234 (collecting cases involving habeas corpus actions and related proceedings).

238 See also Kurzban, supra note 3, at 1227–1229 (collecting cases involving habeas corpus proceedings). See also Ch XI (discussing habeas corpus proceedings).

239 INA § 241(b)(3)(b)(ii) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C. § 1227 (a)(2)(A)(iii) (2000)).

his/her conviction under state or federal law. The Supreme Court, in Zadvydas v. Davis,[240] held that after serving their sentences, removable (deportable) aliens cannot be detained for a period longer than six months despite the fact that no country would receive them. The Supreme Court, however, failed to offer any valid constitutional basis for detaining a person who has not been sentenced by a court of law. The Supreme Court in this case acted ultra vires and in a quasi-legislative capacity when it arbitrarily selected a six-month maximum additional detention period, and this matter needs to be remedied.

3.3.2. Secret Evidence

The INA, AEDPA, and IIRIRA further facilitate the surrender of persons outside the extradition process through the use of secret evidence in certain situations. As discussed below, both Acts include sections that allow the use of classified information or "secret evidence" in order to remove (exclude) arriving aliens and to remove (deport) aliens, including permanent residents. These provisions are, on their face, unconstitutional and perhaps Congress will repeal them soon. But for now they are in effect.[241]

Section 235(c) of the INA provides for the automatic denial of admission of "arriving aliens"[242] who are suspected, possibly based on "secret evidence," of being inadmissible because of a connection to a terrorist group, as determined by the Attorney General in his/her discretion, or because they are suspected of terrorist activity.[243] Problematically, however, that determination may be made without sufficient statutory legal standards. Section 235(c) outlines the relatively simple process of removing/excluding the arriving alien suspected of such "terrorist" connections. The process begins when an immigration officer suspects that an alien may be inadmissible based on the security grounds specified in INA.[244] The officer then issues and serves the alien with a Notice of Temporary Inadmissibility. The alien has the right to submit a written response, including any additional facts he/she may choose to disclose. The case is then referred to the USCIS Regional Director who makes the final determination to: (1) issue a declaration of "Permanent Inadmissibility"; (2) conduct further investigation; or (3) refer the case to an immigration judge for removal proceedings pursuant to INA § 240.[245] If the case is referred to an immigration judge for § 240 removal proceedings the alien cannot examine the "secret evidence" that was relied upon as the basis of his/her removal (exclusion),[246] and thus is unable 240 Zadvydas v. Davis, 121 S. Ct. 249 1 (2001). An arbitrary six-month detention for aliens who may "threaten the national security of the United States" (regardless of eligibility for relief from removal or grant of relief from removal) was also introduced into the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, Title IV, Subtitle B, § 412 as within the discretion of the Attorney General. See also Marks v. Clark, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72456 (W.D. Wa. Jul. 13, 2009) (finding detention claim moot on alien's release, and finding lack of jurisdiction to review of citizenship in the context of removal proceeding where sole relief is direct petition for appellate review).

241 It is noteworthy that a number of congressional representatives are opposed to the use of secret evidence, and as a result have introduced the Secret Evidence Repeal Act, which deems the use of secret evidence in immigration actions unconstitutional. However, this movement suffered a tremendous setback on September 11, 2001; it appears now that the INS will seek greater authority than ever before to use secret evidence. See Stephen Franklin & Ken Armstrong, Secret Evidence Bill Raises Concerns, Chi. Trib., Sept. 30, 2001.

242 A term that includes aliens who were not "admitted" to the United States; however, for purposes of § 235(c) aliens who were not admitted prior to April 7, 1997, are not applied to § 235(c) excludability procedure.

243 INA § 212(a)(3)(A)(i) and (iii), (B), and (C) (codified as amended by 8 U.S.C. § 1182 (a)(3)(A)(i) and (iii), (B), (C) (2000)). These definitions were actually broadened by amendments in the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, § 411.

244 Id. The USA PATRIOT Act of 2001 now calls for mandatory detention of suspected terrorist aliens with the addition of § 236A to the INA.

245 The implementing regulations for INA § 235(c) appear at 8 C.F.R. § 235.8 (2001).

246 INA § 240(b)(4)(B) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C. § 1229 a (b)(4)(B) (2000)).

to defend himself/herself against the allegations, let alone to confront and cross-examine his/her accusers, which violates the Sixth Amendment.

Aliens who are not deemed to be "arriving aliens" are subject to special removal proceedings contained in Title V of INA, which was added by the 1996 IIRIRA. Under this authority, a new Star Chamber[247] has been established, called the Alien Terrorist Removal Court, which decides on the issue of whether the alien is removable on due to the determination that he/she is an "alien terrorist" on the basis of "secret evidence." Before the commencement of the special removal proceedings, the immigration judge must decide whether there is probable cause that the alien is an "alien terrorist," namely, an alien who has engaged, is engaged, or at any time after admission was engaged in any terrorist activity.[248] The judge must also decide whether the alien "would pose a risk to the national security of the United States."[249] After making such a finding, the special proceeding commences. The government can present "secret evidence," and the alien can present whatever defense he/she can, even though he/she has no access to the "secret evidence" relied upon by the USCIS and immigration judge. The alien is entitled, however, to an unclassified summary of the "classified information" as long as it is determined by the immigration judge that the "unclassified summary" will not cause harm to the national security of the United States.[250] If the alien was a lawful permanent resident, he/she is entitled to a representation by a "special attorney" who can review the "unclassified summary" even if it is not provided to the alien on national security grounds.[251] This procedure is not only contrary to the principles that this country as espoused since its inception, but it is unique in the world, except for some authoritarian regimes.

Moreover, the IIRIRA, through INA Title V, authorizes the government to use "the fruits of electronic surveillance and unconsented physical searches" in removal proceedings.[252] On its face this constitutes a clear violation of the Fourth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. It also violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as applied to permanent residents and other aliens present in the United States.[253] Section 240(b)(4)(B) of the INA, which applies to all other removal proceedings, deprives the alien of the fundamental right to examine evidence, manifested in "national security information," that is presented by the government against the alien's admission or the alien's application for discretionary relief. Title V of the INA also contains a number of other constitutionally questionable provisions. But perhaps the most questionable provision is the use of "secret evidence" before a special judicial proceeding, which clearly violates the right to due process and fairness, and offends the notion of justice and fair play that this country has long recognized.[254]

---

247 The Star Chamber was an English court established in the seventeenth century to try aristocrats and powerful merchants, but soon became a tool of oppression used by the Crown to try opponents in secret and without legal protections such as the issuing of indictments, the calling of witnesses, or other means for the defendant to rebut the Crown's charges. Michael Stuckey, The High Court of Star Chamber (1998).

248 As defined in INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iii) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C. § 1182 (a)(3)(B)(iii) (2001)).

249 INA § 503(a)(1) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C.S. § 1533 (a)(1) (2001)).

250 INA § 504(e)(3) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C.S. § 1534 (e)(3) (2001)).

251 INA §§ 501(7), 504(e)(3)(F) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C.S. §§ 1531 (7), 1534 (e)(3)(F) (2001)).

252 INA § 504 (e)(1)(A) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C.S. § 1534 (e)(1)(A) (2001)).

253 U.S. Const. amend. IV; U.S. Const. amend. V; U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1. See also Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954) (treating actions by the federal government that would be considered as Equal Protection Clause violations, if done by a state, as violations of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, which is a clause that directly applies to the federal government).

254 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law (1977):

> Due process is a living concept that embodies the idea of "fair play and substantive justice." It . . . is essential to the maintenance of certain "immutable principles of justice." The concept of "due process of law" was well expressed by Justice Frankfurter in the following words:

The constitutionality of the use of secret evidence in immigration proceedings was considered by the Supreme Court in Mathews v. Diaz,[255] but for all practical purposes it left the patently unconstitutional procedure in place. Nevertheless, the Court affirmed that both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution protect an alien's right to due process of law. The Court defined an alien as someone within the jurisdiction of the United States, even if the alien's presence was unlawful.[256] In another case, Mathews v. Eldridge,[257] the Supreme Court established a balancing test between the rights of the alien and the government's interest, which, also includes an element of examining the "risk of erroneous deprivation of [the alien's] interest";[258] on its face it would appear that this element should assume that the use of "secret evidence" always poses a high risk of error that will result in the deprivation of the alien's right, but this logical conclusion was not reached. Following the test laid out in Mathews v. Eldridge[259] courts have found, in the cases mentioned below, that whenever an alien's due process rights under the Constitution are affected, the use of secret evidence is likely to be held unconstitutional.

In Kiareldeen v. Reno,[260] the petitioner, Hany Kiareldeen, a Palestinian who was in the process of adjusting his status to a permanent resident, was detained by the INS and held without bond for overstaying his student visa—an unusually harsh and rarely resorted to measure. When petitioner sought discretionary adjustment of status and mandatory relief the INS presented "secret evidence" that linked him to a designated "terrorist" group.[261] There was no evidence presented that he had actually committed any wrongdoing. The federal district court of New Jersey[262] held that the INS's use of "secret evidence," both at the alien's bail hearing and throughout his removal proceedings, violated the alien's right to "due process." The court found that "…[t]he government's reliance on secret evidence violates the due process

> The "due process" clause embodies a system of rights based on moral principles so deeply embedded in the tradition and values of our people as to be deemed fundamental to a civilized society as conceived by our whole history. "Due process" is that which comports with the notion of what is fair and right and just. The more fundamental the beliefs are, the less likely they are to be explicitly stated. But respect for them is the very essence of the "due process" clause.
>
> These principles are precisely the standards that society has a right to expect from those entrusted with the sovereign prerogatives. Justice Stanley Mathews, speaking for the Supreme Court in Hurtado v. California, declared:
>
> > Arbitrary power enforcing its edicts to the injury of persons and property of its subjects is not law. Whether manifested as decrees of a personal monarch or of an impersonal multitude…the enforcement of these limitations by judicial process is the devise of self-governing countries to protect the rights of individuals and minorities, as well as against the powers of its members, against the violence of public agents transcending the limits of lawful authority, even when acting in the same wielding force of the government.
>
> Thus, no offense is lawful unless it satisfies the requirements of the principles of legality and complies with certain canons of statutory construction as embodied in the meaning of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution.

Id. at 27–28 (citing Solesbee v. Balkcom, 339 U.S. 9 at 16 (1949); Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 536 (1884)).

255 Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67 (1976).

256 Id. at 77.

257 Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976).

258 Id. at 335.

259 Id.

260 Kiareldeen v. Reno, 71 F. Supp. 2d 402 (D.N.J. 1999).

261 Id. at 404. Such harsh decisions will undoubtedly become more commonplace with the implementation of the "Foreign Student Monitoring Program" established by the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, Title IV, Subtitle B, § 416. This program is actually an expansion of the program authorized by the IIRIA of 1996, § 641(a).

262 Kiareldeen, 71 F. Supp. 2d at 402.

protections that the constitution directs must be extended to all persons within the United States citizens and resident aliens alike."[263] Judge William Walls held in the Kiareldeen case that "reliance on secret evidence raises serious issues about the integrity of the adversarial process, the impossibility of self-defense against undisclosed charges, and the reliability of government processes initiated and prosecuted in darkness."[264]

The Ninth Circuit Court, in American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee v. Reno[265] (AAADC), found that the government's reliance on "secret information" in legalization proceedings constituted a violation of "due process." The court also held that INS procedures failed the Mathews v. Eldridge test of constitutionality.[266] In AAADC, two resident aliens, among others, applied to the INS to legalize their status. The INS charged them with membership in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), and denied their applications on the basis of undisclosed classified information. No evidence of wrongdoing was presented. The court affirmed that "[a]liens who reside in this country are entitled to full due process protections."[267] In applying the test used in Mathews v. Eldridge, the court held that "the very foundation of the adversary process assumes that the use of undisclosed information will violate due process because of the risk of error."[268] The court went on to say that "where governmental action seriously injures an individual, and the reasonableness of the action depends on fact findings, the evidence used to prove the Government's case must be disclosed to the individual so that he has an opportunity to show that it is untrue."[269]

It is clear from actual practice that the use of "secret evidence" results in manipulation and bias against vulnerable groups. By April 2001 there were twenty-eight persons detained under the "secret evidence" provisions of the INA;[270] all of them were Arabs or Muslims.[271] This in itself shows the racial discrimination[272] pattern evident in this procedure.[273]

---

263 Id. at 414.

264 Id. at 413.

265 Am.-Arab Anti-Discrimination Comm. v. Reno, 70 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 1995), appeal after remand 119 F.3d 1367 (9th Cir. 1997), reh'g en banc denied 132 F.3d 531 (9th Cir. 1997), vacated remanded 525 U.S. 471 (1999).

266 Id. at 1067.

267 Id. at 1069.

268 Id.

269 Id.

270 The detention of Mazen Al Najjar, a U.S. resident for almost twenty years, is another example of the use of "secret evidence" by the government to detain U.S. residents without bond during deportation proceedings. Najjar's case was heard by the Southern District Court of Florida. In Najjar v. Reno, 97 F. Supp. 2d 1329 (S.D. Fla. 2000), the court held that the government's reliance on "secret evidence" to detain Najjar violated his constitutional right to due process, furthermore, his association with a known "terrorist" organization was not reasonable grounds for his continued detention pending his removal hearing. Appeal after remand at Najjar v. Ashcroft, 257 F 3d 1262 (2001), vacated, appeal dismissed by 273 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2001). Petitions for review denied.

271 The use of secret evidence to designate a certain organization as "terrorist" has been authorized by INA § 219. Further, secret evidence can also be used to designate an alien to be linked to a "terrorist" organization, rendering that alien removable on security grounds.

272 As the content of previous "secret" documents is being gradually accessed by certain people, such as the former CIA director James Woolsey, "serious errors" in Arabic–English translations have been found in such documents, as well as statements that are the product of stereotyping based on religion or ethnicity. Michael J. Whidden, Unequal Justice: Arabs in America and United States Antiterrorism Legislation, 69 Fordham L. Rev. 2825, 2848 (2001).

273 The politicized nature of the deportation process is evident in the invocation of issues of "national security," particularly relying on secret evidence. For instance, the Department of Justice withheld deporting the Irish nationals, who were members of the IRA, as a result of the Northern Ireland peace

3.3.3. Mandatory Bars to Asylum and Withholding of Removal

There are several categories that constitute a bar to asylum, most of which have been enacted since 2001:[274] particularly serious crimes,[275] aggravated felonies for asylum,[276] aggravated felonies for withholding of removal,[277] serious nonpolitical crimes,[278] participation in the persecution of others,[279] danger to the security of the United States,[280] and terrorism.[281]

The list of aggravated felonies in the INA was subsequently expanded, and now includes many minor, nonviolent offenses, such as theft.[282] Even if a sentence is for fewer than five years, the BIA official may now find the offense sufficient to constitute a bar.[283] In Matter of Y-L, the Attorney General ruled that all drug trafficking offenses are now presumptively considered particularly serious crimes.[284] In Matter of Q-T-M-T, the BIA held that a categorical classification negotiations. Niels W. Frenzen, National Security and Procedural Fairness: Secret Evidence and the Immigration Laws, 76 No. 45 Interpreter Releases 1677, 1685 (1999).

---

274 8 C.F.R. §§ 208.16(d)(2), 1208.16(d)(2).

275 INA §§ 208 (b)(2)(A)(ii), 241(b)(3)(B)(ii), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(ii), 1231 (b)(3)(B)(ii). See, e.g.,Choeum v. INS, 129 F.3d 29, 40–43 (1st Cir. 1997); Hamama v. INS, 78 F.3d 233, 240 (6th Cir. 1996); Ahmetovic v. INS, 62 F.3d 48, 52–53 (2d Cir. 1995). For a critical analysis of the process of determination of a "particularly serious crime," see Michael McGarry, Note: A Statute in Particularly Serious Need of Reinterpretation: The Particularly Serious Crime Exception to Withholding of Removal, 51 B.C. L. Rev. 209 (2010). See also Kurzban, supra note 3, at 522–525 (collecting cases involving particularly serious crimes, including In re Frentescu, 18 I&N Dec. 244 (BIA 1982) (setting forth criteria to determine whether someone was convicted of a particularly serious crime); In re N-A-M-, 24 I&N Dec. 336 (BIA 2007) aff'd N-A-M- v. Holder, 557 F.3d 1052 (10th Cir. 2009), and Gao v. Holder, 595 F.3d 549 (4th Cir. 2010)).

276 For asylum cases: IIRAIRA, INA § 101(a)(43), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43); INA § 208(b)(2)(B)(i), 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(2)(B)(i). See generally, Kurzban, supra note 3, at 524–525 (collecting cases involving aggravated felonies).

277 For withholding of removal: INA § 241(b)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3)(B). See generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 524–525 (collecting cases involving aggravated felonies).

278 INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(iii), 241(b)(3)(B)(iii), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(iii); In re McMullen, 19 I&N Dec. 90, 97 (1984). See generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 525–526 (collecting cases involving serious nonpolitical crime, including the recent decision of Khouzam v. Ashcroft, 361 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2004), Pronsivakulchai v. Gonzales, 461 F.3d 903 (7th Cir. 2006), Urbina-Mejia v. Holder, 597 F.3d 360 (6th Cir. 2010), Guo Qi Wang v. Holder, 583 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 2009)).

279 INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(i), 241(b)(3)(B)(i), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(i), 1231(b)(3)(B)(i). See also Hernandez v. Reno, 258 F.3d 806, 813–814 (8th Cir. 2001); Negusie v. Holder, 555 U.S. 511 (2009). See also Kurzban, supra note 3, at 462–464 (collecting cases involving the persecutor bar, including Diaz-Zanatta v. Holder, 558 F.3d 450 (6th Cir. 2009); Parlak v. Holder, 578 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2009); Yan Yan Lin v. Holder, 584 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 2009); and Wang v. Holder, 562 F.3d 501 (2d Cir. 2009)).

280 INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(iv), 241(b)(3)(b)(iv), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(iv), 1231 (b)(3)(B)(iv) for asylum. See also Yusupov v. Attorney General of the United States, 2011 U.S. App. Lexis 12110 (3d Cir. Jun 16, 2011). See generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 526–527 (collecting cases involving danger to U.S. security, including Khan v. Holder, 584 F.3d 773 (9th Cir. 2009) and Malkandi v. Mukasey, 576 F.3d 906 (9th Cir. 2009)).

281 USA PATRIOT ACT of 2001; INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(v), 241(b)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(v), 1231(b)(3)(B). See also Regina Germain, Rushing to Judgment: The Unintended Consequences of the USA PATRIOT Act for Bona Fide Refugees, 16 Geo. Immigr. L.J. 505 (2002).

282 IIRAIRA, INA § 101(a)(43), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43); INA § 208(b)(2)(B)(i), 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(2)(B)(i); Regina Germain, AILA's Asylum Primer 76 (3d ed. 2003).

283 Germain, supra note 282, at 76.

284 23 I&N Dec. 270 (A.G. 2002); but see In re Santos-Lopez, 23 I&N Dec. 419 (BIA 2002) (finding that two misdemeanor offenses for possession under state law do not fall under the federal definition of drug of particularly serious crimes did not violate the Refugee Convention.[285] In determining the seriousness of the offense, the UNHCR has suggested that a fact-finder look at: whether the offender was a minor, on parole, whether there had been a lapse of five years since the conviction or completion of sentence, general good character, whether the offender was merely an accomplice, and other circumstances surrounding the offense.[286]

The government can use these processes instead of extradition because they have fewer due process guarantees than in any criminal or quasi-criminal process and lower substantive mores and evidentiary standards than in any other legal process in the United States. For all practical purposes, the government has used the PATRIOT Act and other "terrorism" measures to bypass the extradition process whenever it suits the government to label a case as involving "terrorism," particularly when extended to include "material support."[287]

(a) Terrorism Excusing Extradition

Since September 11, 2001, the U.S. government has consistently used the classification of an individual as a "terrorist" to avoid extradition proceedings. Through the PATRIOT ACT and the REAL ID Act, the definition of terrorist activities in INA § 212 was expanded. Immigration officials can return individuals with "terrorist" connections to countries from which they are seeking asylum with fewer obstacles. Both the PATRIOT Act and the REAL ID Act are applicable retroactively.[288] The REAL ID Act is applicable to any group of more than one individual that has engaged in terrorist activities, whether organized or not.[289] Many individuals who would normally qualify for asylum have been denied under this broad category. For example, two women, one from Liberia and the other from Sierra Leone, were attacked by rebels in their respective countries, raped, and held captive in their own homes.[290] Upon evaluation, the UNHCR decided that they were refugees. However, the USCIS determined that these women provided "material support" for terrorist groups by providing the rebels with shelter, food, and laundry services while they were being held hostage.[291]

For terrorism cases, a mandatory bar can be set for danger to the security of the United States or for terrorism. Under an asylum claim and request for withholding of removal, an individual trafficking); Germain, supra note 282, at 76. See generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 522–525 (collecting cases involving particularly serious crimes).

---

285 In re Q-T-M-T, Int. Dec. 3300 (BIA 1996).

286 G. Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law 107 (1996). See also Germain, supra note 282, at 77. See also In re Frentescu, 18 I & N Dec. 244, 245 (1982) (holding that a particularly serious crime is more serious than a serious nonpolitical crime.)

287 See White House, National Strategy for Combating Terrorism (2006), http://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/nsc/nsct/2006/. See also Human Rights Watch, In the Name of Counter-Terrorism: Human Rights Abuses Worldwide, Human Rights Watch Briefing Paper for the 59th Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (Mar. 25, 2003), http://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/counter-terrorism-bck_0.pdf.

288 REAL ID § 103, 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3).

289 Id.

290 U.S. Dep't of State, Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration (PRM), Case Summaries. See also Terrorists or Victims?, N.Y. Times, Apr. 3, 2006.

291 Under INA § 212 (a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI), the USCIS said that the two women provided "services" and "housing," which qualifies as material support. See also Jennie Pasquarella, Victims of Terror Stopped at the Gate to Safety: The Impact of the "Material Support for Terrorism" Bar on Refugees, 13 Human Rights Brief 28 (2006).

is barred if there are reasonable grounds to assume he/she is a danger to the United States.[292] Further, under the withholding of removal procedure, an applicant who has engaged in terrorist activity is barred as well.[293] Engaging in a terrorist activity is defined as committing, inciting, preparing, planning terrorist activities, soliciting funds and individuals, and providing material support for a terrorist organization.[294] Most of the recent cases rest on the material support bar.

Individuals who are barred from asylum can still apply for relief under the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) in the form of deferral of removal.[295] However, the material support for terrorism claim will totally bar an asylum claim.

3.3.4. Convention against Torture[296]

The CAT was implemented by the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act (FARR Act).[297] The FARR Act states that "[t]o the maximum extent consistent with the obligations of the United States under the Convention," the regulations should remove individuals barred from relief under the withholding of removal section of the INA.[298] Both the CAT and the FARR Act require "substantial grounds for believing [the person] would be in danger of being subjected to torture."[299] Unlike the asylum and withholding of removal procedures, the CAT does not have any bars to relief.[300] Under Article 3(1) of the CAT, no one can be returned to a country where there are "substantial grounds" to believe that the individual would be subjected to torture. Thus, in Matter of G-A,[301] the BIA held that no matter how serious an applicant's criminal convictions were, they did not constitute a bar to deferral of removal under the CAT. However, the USCIS barred individuals from withholding of removal under § 241(b)(3) of the INA.[302] These individuals are only entitled to "deferral of removal."[303] Deferral of removal under the CAT is available to individuals who establish that it is "more likely than not" that they will be tortured if removed to their home country.[304] Unlike other provisions, under deferral of removal there are no bars to relief.[305] Where deferral of removal claims are presented in the context of an asylum and removal proceedings with concurrent extradition proceedings, 292 INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(iv), 241(b)(3)(b)(iv), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(iv), 1251(b)(3)(B)(iv) for asylum.

---

293 See definition of terrorism INA § 212(a)(3)(B); INA § 241(b)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1251(b)(3)(B); Germain, supra note 282, at 80. See also 1951 Refugee Convention, art. 33(2). See, e.g., Ali v. Reno, 829 F. Supp. 1415, 1434 (S.D.N.Y. 1993); Azzouka v. Meese, 820 F.2d 585 (2d Cir. 1987); Avila v. Rivkind, 724 F. Supp. 945 (S.D. Fla. 1989).

294 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)(iv); In re U-H, 23 I&N Dec. 355 (BIA 2002).

295 64 FR 8478, § 208.17. See also Germain, supra note 282.

296 See Ch. VII, Secs. 7 and 8 for more information about the relationship between extradition and torture.

297 Pub. L. No. 105-277, 112 Stat. 2681, Div. G., Oct. 21, 1992.

298 FARR Act, §1242(c); Germain, supra note 282, at 80.

299 Art. (3)1 of the CAT; FARR Act § 1242(a); Germain, supra note 282, at 80; In re M-B-A, 23 I&N Dec. 474 (BIA 2002); In re J-E, 23 I & N Dec. 291, 303 (BIA 2002); In re Y-L, 23 I&N Dec. 270 (AG 2002)

300 Germain, supra note 282, at 206.

301 23 I&N Dec. 366, 368 (BIA 2002).

302 See 8 C.F.R. § 208.16(d)(2); Germain, supra note 282, at 206.

303 8 C.F.R. § 208.17

304 Id.

305 Id. See also In re G-A, 23 I & N Dec. 366, 368 (BIA 2002). For a detailed analysis of the relevant regulations related to CAT/Deferral of Removal, see generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 528–538 (collecting cases and detailing regulations, procedures, and judicial review).

the asylum and removal proceedings will generally be deferred pending the secretary of state's decision on the claims in the extradition proceedings.[306]

3.3.5. Equal Protection

The 1996 legislation discussed above constitutes a marked departure from Supreme Court pronouncements on the application of the "Equal Protection" Clause of the U.S. Constitution[307] to permanent residents. Under the guise of combating terrorism, there is for all practical purposes no longer a constitutional privilege of equal protection of aliens lawfully in the United States, including permanent residents. What is particularly astonishing is the absence of empirical data to support this historically unprecedented reversal: there is no factual data to support the presumed preventative impact of legal measures whose discriminatory nature smacks of racism, and ethnic and religious discrimination.

In a leading case on the matter that detailed the long-standing jurisprudence, the Supreme Court held, in Mathews v. Diaz,[308] that aliens within the United States were protected by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments' "due process" clauses of the Constitution "from deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."[309] The Court clearly stated that "[e]ven one whose presence in the country is unlawful, involuntary, or transitory is entitled to that constitutional protection."[310] Although the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause does not explicitly require the federal government to provide equal protection of the laws, the Supreme Court in Bolling v. Sharpe,[311] treated actions by the federal government (which would be considered as Equal Protection Clause violations if done by a state) as violations of the Fifth Amendment. As to what constitutes an equal protection violation by the federal government, the Supreme Court held in Plyler v. Doe,[312] that "[t]he Equal Protection, Clause directs that 'all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike.' "[313] It is this writer's contention that permanent resident aliens are "similarly circumstanced" with U.S. citizens with respect to civil rights, as they share a significant part of the rights and duties of U.S. citizens. And because deporting a U.S. citizen for committing an "aggravated felony"[314] or based on "secret evidence" will never be a permissible form of sanctioning a citizen, an alien resident who is eligible for citizenship (after three years for some and five years for others) should be treated the same. The government argues that because aliens are not a "suspect" or a "quasi-suspect" class, they should not be afforded such "equal protection." The government bases that argument on Supreme Court language that was used in deciding the constitutionality of some forms of discrimination against minorities and unpopular groups.[315] However, it is important to note that the Court's approach to the classification of these groups is essentially a procedural one, as the Court, in order to prevent a flood of litigation, set a number of procedural hurdles before cases can reach it. The argument that permanent residents are not a "suspect class" is a "boot strapping" argument that seeks to transform a procedural standard of access to the federal courts for relief to a substantive standard for denial of a constitutional right.

---

306 See Masopust v. Fitzgerald, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5414 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 21, 2010) (providing an overview of the case law regarding concurrent removal and extradition proceedings).

307 U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1; U.S. Const. amend. V.

308 Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67 (1976).

309 Id. at 77.

310 Id. (emphasis added.)

311 Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954).

312 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982).

313 Id. at 216 (quoting F.S. Royster Guano Co. v. Virginia, 253 U.S. 412, 415 (1920)).

314 As defined by INA § 101(a) (codified as amended at 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a) (2001)).

315 See United States v. Carolene Prods. Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938).

On another note, the exclusive use of "secret evidence" provisions against persons of Arab or Muslim origin triggers the argument that a violation of equal protection exists because the government is using a "suspect classification" against that particular group based on their national origin or religion. The Supreme Court repeatedly scrutinized those kinds of classifications with respect to citizens, and the Court almost always struck down the governmental act as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. A distinction between citizens and permanent residents that permits discrimination based on ethnicity or religion is constitutionally unjustified.

3.3.6. Assessment

Never before in the legal history of the United States has there been such a blatant disregard of the Constitution, which touches on the prohibition of ex post facto laws, violations of "equal protection," and violations of "due process." But probably most egregious is the deprivation of the right to judicial review.[316] The deprivation of constitutional principles and judicial review from individuals leaves very little for totalitarian regimes to envy, as they similiarly deprive people of fundamental legal rights.

The interplay between extradition and immigration is discussed throughout this chapter, but a case from the mid-1990s merits mention, namely the extradition request by Israel of Dr. Mousa Abu Marzook,[317] one of the leaders of the political wing of Hamas. Hamas modeled itself after the IRA by separating its political wing, which engages in legal political activities, from the organization's military wing, which engages in acts of violence.[318] Dr. Marzook was a permanent resident of the United States, and his children were born in the United States. His movements and activities were known to U.S. authorities, with whom he had contacts, and there was never a claim that he was involved in "terrorist" activities. For reasons heretofore unknown, Israeli and U.S. security agencies thought that his arrest would deal a blow to Hamas and that it would intimidate the organization's leaders. As a result, Dr. Marzook was placed on a "terrorist" watch list in U.S. airports and was detained at JFK airport under the INA. Shortly thereafter, an extradition request from Israel appeared charging him with a broad and undefined theory of criminal conspiracy, which curiously does not even exist under Israeli law. It was beyond doubt that this extradition request was politically motivated as it was intended to eliminate effective political representatives of Hamas, and to eliminate those who wish to be active in its political wing without having any connection with the military wing. The Israeli request made no mention of any direct or indirect involvement by Dr. Marzook in any criminal activity. However, it alleged that as one of the leaders of Hamas he was responsible for all of the acts of violence committed by Hamas, irrespective of whether he planned them, participated in them, or even knew of them. While extradition proceedings went on, INS proceedings were instituted so that in the event extradition was not successful, immigration proceedings could then result in deporting him to Israel even though it was not his country of citizenship. The plan was to consider him a Palestinian by birth and thus to deport him to that territory, which was under Israeli control. The collusion between Israel and the U.S. government, as well as between officials in the Justice Department and the INS was obvious, and the hostility of the Orthodox Jewish Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA) assigned to the extradition case was evident throughout the case.

Federal district court Judge Kevin Duffy, who sat as the extradition judge, accepted the charges made without making an inquiry into the evidence. He even labeled the charges, sua sponte, as "crimes against humanity," even though Israel did not make mention of that. Judge Duffy 316 Although under INS v. St. Cyr, 121 S.Ct. 2271 (2001), habeas corpus relief was available, the REAL ID Act of 2005 removed habeas corpus as an avenue of relief for aliens facing removal.

317 In re Extradition of Marzook, 924 F. Supp. 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

318 The political wing of the IRA, the "Sinn Fein," is headed by Gerry Adams, who is perceived, at least by the U.S. government, as a legitimate political actor and as a negotiating figure.

disallowed defenses provided for in the extradition treaty and in the relevant provisions of Title 18. Meanwhile, in Israel, officials in the foreign affairs and justice ministries responded to media inquiries in perplexed ways, raising doubts whether Dr. Marzook could be successfully prosecuted in Israel under the broad conspiracy theory contained in the extradition request. Judge Duffy made short shrift of the case and decided on extradition. On habeas corpus, his colleague rubber-stamped the extradition decision without any effort to support the order. A review of the habeas corpus petition's denial was filed with the Second Circuit,[319] but during its pendency, petitioner Dr. Marzook withdrew the petition, and agreed to be surrendered to Israel for the charges proffered in its extradition request. Under § 3188,[320] the United States is obliged to deliver a person adjudged extraditable within two months of the extradition order's date. It was this writer's conviction, as Dr. Marzook's co-counsel, on the basis of the pronouncements of Israeli foreign and justice ministry officials, that Israel would not conduct a trial. After the statutory two months passed, a motion was filed for Dr. Marzook's release as he had not been surrendered. But the judge, in clear violation of the statute's language, prolonged Dr. Marzook's detention a few more days at the request of the U.S. government.

During this time Israel formally renounced its request for Dr. Marzook's extradition, which meant that he should have been released forthwith. By then, Dr. Marzook had spent twenty-eight months in solitary confinement, being kept twenty-three hours a day in his cell and one hour a day on the roof of New York's Metropolitan Correctional Center (MCC). However, even after that he was not released because the INS had a "hold" on him at the MCC. Dr. Marzook's defense team proceeded to seek his release by habeas corpus, but the federal district court judge (a former AUSA) did not grant it, even though she lacked a valid legal basis to deny the pettition. At this point, on advice of counsel, Dr. Marzook renounced his permanent residency in the United States, thus rendering unnecessary the deportation proceedings. The INS was caught by surprise, but insisted that deportation proceedings continue, even though there is nothing in the INA that provides for deportation of someone who has renounced being a permanent resident. Under such a condition the alien is entitled to return to his/her country of origin, to the country from which he/she came if deemed inadmissible at the border, or to a country of his/her choice that would accept him/her. The INS, however, resisted that in order to keep Dr. Marzook for a longer period in solitary confinement at the MCC while it searched for another way to deport him. Because the country from which he came at the time of his arrest at JFK airport was Jordan, he was entitled to be returned to that country, if its government permitted it. Jordan made a diplomatic démarche to have him returned, but the INS continued holding Dr. Marzook in solitary confinement for a few more days until diplomatic efforts resulted in allowing him to leave the United States and return to Jordan. As an ultimate sign of gratuitous vindictiveness, he was not allowed to board a Jordanian plane to return to Jordan, but was placed on a U.S. plane dressed in his prison garb with handcuffs on during the fourteen-hour flight.

This case is not only illustrative of the abusive interplay of extradition and immigration proceedings, it is also an example of how far the abusive process can be carried out in a way that inflicts severe hardship on persons targeted in the United States, essentially for political reasons.

4. Remedies

The question that arises in regard to the use of immigration laws as an alternative rendition device to extradition is whether it is contrary to the universal ideal of justice. It is clear that the administrative processes of removal (exclusion) and removal (deportation) allow for a wide use of discretion. In some instances, the laws are arbitrary and discriminatory, and infringe upon the rights of aliens to enjoy freedom of movement and residence within the United States.[321] Balanced against the rights of aliens is the need and privilege of a state to allow itself discretion, in essence, to pick and choose among those who wish to enter and/or remain within its boundaries. The concepts of justice and equality must play a role in the balancing process. As Jack Wasserman noted:

319 Marzook v. Christopher, Case No. 96-2841 (2d Cir. 1996).

320 18 U.S.C. § 3188.

> Our American heritage of equality has given us prestige among the nations of the world and a strong feeling of pride at home. However, our heritage and our aspirations have fallen short of our goals in relation to our immigration laws.[322]

Although those words were written over fifty years ago, they still reflect the shortcomings of the present immigration laws.

The USCIS has come under close scholarly and legislative scrutiny in recent years due to a great influx of aliens into the United States. The plight of Haitian aliens[323] is an example of the due process problems of aliens seeking refuge in the United States; the discretionary power in the administrative processes of the USCIS tips the scales against the traditional humanitarian concerns of the United States.

The practice of using immigration laws for purposes of rendition as an alternative to extradition raises not only issues of justice and equality, but also questions of the integrity of judicial, legislative, and administrative processes. Whereas every attempt should be made to safeguard the rights of an alien who may be subject to expulsion, we find instead that immigration laws and the discretionary powers built into them are being used against the alien. In a discussion of then INS operation instructions, Leon Wildes concluded that

> With the weight of the entire government against the alien, he should be entitled to rely upon the fact that the government will at least be bound by its own directives. Only by doing so will any petitioner or applicant before the Immigration Service be assured that the Immigration Service's own proposal will be fulfilled "to assure that all applicants and petitioners receive fair and equal treatment before the Service."[324]

To lose one's citizenship and be deported from one's adopted homeland or to be turned away at the borders of a state of refuge is a serious loss for any individual, and the laws that bring about such losses must be examined strictly to insure their fairness.[325] These laws must be applied with care, and the discretion afforded by them must be used carefully to avoid infringement on the rights of aliens and naturalized citizens, as well as universal concepts of justice. These concerns highlight the questionability of the use of immigration laws as an alternative to extradition. In the face of the cumbersomeness and expense of extradition, the use of immigration 321 Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Immigration Citizenship and International Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 39, 182 (July 19–21, 1978).

---

322 Jack Wasserman, The Universal Ideal of Justice and Our Immigration Laws, 34 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1, 2 (1958).

323 See also Haitian Ctrs. Council v. Sale, 823 F. Supp. 1028 (E.D.N.Y. 1993) (addressing the conditions of Haitian asylum-seekers at the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo, Cuba, and holding that the detained asylum-seekers are entitled to access to counsel during interviews, to medically adequate conditions of confinement, to not being arbitrarily or indefinitely detained, and to not being subjected to "administrative segregation," that is, to punishment by removal to a special camp apart from the general camp population, without procedural safeguards). See generally Jane M. Kramer, Note, Due Process Rights for Excludable Aliens under United States Immigration Law and the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees: Haitian Aliens, A Case in Point, 10 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 203 (1977).

324 Leon Wildes, The Operations Instructions of the Immigration Service: Internal Guides or Binding Rules?, 17 San Diego L. Rev. 99, 119 (1979).

325 Kurzban, supra note 3, at 402.

laws may be appealing, but one must ask whether the convenience is outweighed by the possible loss of rights of aliens and naturalized citizens.

The vehicle of disguised extradition, other than abduction,[326] is the assortment of immigration devices that are within the jurisdiction of the state that engages in such practices. Two issues arise with regard to these practices: (1) whether there is a violation of an international legal obligation; and (2) whether there is a violation of national law. Although a given conduct may involve both types of violations, the issues are severable.

4.1. Violations of International Law

When disguised extradition is used, three types of violations of international law can occur:

(a) a violation of a specific treaty provision that is binding upon the state and eventually enforceable within that state;

(b) a violation of a specific treaty provision binding upon the state that engages in the violation that is enforceable in the receiving state (to which an individual may have been deported); and

(c) a violation of a specific treaty provision that is not enforceable either under the laws of the state engaging in the violative conduct or in the receiving state.

At the outset, it must be noted that the various conventions protecting human rights are not always enforceable within national legal systems. There exists at present no international enforcement mechanism to redress such violations except under certain regional conventions and systems of complaint, namely the African, European and Inter-American human rights systems,[327] and complaint and reporting mechanisms under some multilateral conventions.[328] It is important first to distinguish among these conventions.

4.2. Multilateral Conventions

4.2.1. International Conventions

(a) Universal Declaration of Human Rights[329]

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights contains a number of articles that relate to the protection of the rights of individuals in regard to the use of immigration devices and the violations that may result from their use. If an alien is precluded from returning to his own country through the use of immigration laws, he may invoke Article 13(2), which states that: "[e]veryone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and return to his country." For violations of individual rights, the Declaration is explicit in allowing for both a determination of rights and an effective remedy for violations. Article 8 enunciates the right of

326 See Ch. V.

327 See African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, June 27, 1981, O.A.U. Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3/Rev. 5, (1981) reprinted in 21 I.L.M. 58; American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, Organization of American States Official Records Der. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. (Jan. 7, 1970); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221.

328 See United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. Res. 39/46, U.N. GAOR 3d Comm., 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, at 197, 198 U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1984/72 (1984); International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, G.A. Res. 2200A, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 16, at 49, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966); Optional Protocol of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, G.A. Res. 2200A, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. No. 16, at 59, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).

329 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Dec. 10, 1948, U.N.G.A. Res. 217 A (III).

equal protection: "[e]veryone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law."

These provisions indicate that remedies must be available for violations of an individual's rights on both international and national levels. They have the effect of giving the alien within the United States the right to a fair hearing and an effective remedy for violations of universally recognized human rights. The Universal Declaration enumerates specific rights relevant to disguised extradition in Articles 3, 7, 9, 12, 14(1), and 25(1). These provisions are designed to protect the integrity of the individual against arbitrary actions of the host state.

> Article 3: "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person."
>
> Article 9: "No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile."
>
> Article 12: "No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks."

These individual rights belong to all persons regardless of their legal status in the host country. Article 7 states that "[a]ll are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination."

Aliens who flee to the United States consist mostly of refugees escaping from hunger, economic plight, and political oppression. They often come from circumstances of extreme hardship and seek a better, more secure life for themselves and their families. Article 25(1) recognizes this quest as a right:

> Everyone has a right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

The concepts of this provision were brought to life in Doe v. Plyler,[330] where Mexican children who had entered the United States illegally and resided illegally in Texas were excluded by Texas law from attending state schools.[331] The Supreme Court described the situation of the illegal alien thus:

> The hope of obtaining jobs, coupled with the unwillingness or inability of the federal government to enforce its immigration laws has enticed thousands of young Mexicans to leave their native country and illegally enter the United States. It is undisputed that, compared to United States citizens as a whole, illegal aliens constitute a disadvantaged group. But bad as their living and working environment is in the United States, it is apparently better than what they would experience in Mexico; thus these aliens continue to illegally cross the border. Because they are within this country illegally, they often do not receive the benevolent protections of the law, for they know that to invoke government protection would subject them to possible identification and deportation to their native country. Hence, the rights of these native aliens and the corresponding responsibilities of the states toward them have not been litigated to an appreciable degree.[332]

Aliens who wish to escape from other lands to seek freedoms that are lacking in their homelands are considered in Article 14(1), which provides that "[e]veryone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution." The problem that arises, however, with 330 Doe v. Plyler, 628 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1980), aff'd, 457 U.S. 202 (1982).

---

331 Id.

332 Id. at 451. The Texas law excluding illegal aliens from attendance at public schools was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, and the District Court for the Eastern District of Texas.

regard to the fundamental rights and remedies enumerated in the Declaration, is enforcement. This is because no international or national enforcement mechanism exists, and because the enforceability of the Declaration itself is still in question.

(b) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[333]

This multilateral convention reiterates many of the rights enumerated in the Universal Declaration. Similar to the Universal Declaration, the International Covenant recognizes the rights enumerated in its provisions as belonging to all members of the human family.[334] Explicit in this convention are remedies available to every individual.

Article 2(1) provides:

> Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in the present Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

The first Optional Protocol permits individual complaints against state-parties.[335] The procedure permits the filing of individual complaints before the Human Rights Committee,[336] but affords no other remedies.[337]

Article 2(3) continues:

> Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes:
>
> (a) To ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;
>
> (b) To ensure that any person claiming such a remedy shall have his right thereto determined by competent judicial, administrative or legislative authorities, or by any other competent authority provided for by the legal system of the State, and to develop the possibilities of judicial remedy;
>
> (c) To ensure that the competent authorities shall enforce such remedies when granted.

Article 9 protects the individual against arbitrary arrest and detention. Part 4 of this article entitles the individual to an effective remedy: "[a]nyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that that court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful." Finally, Article 12 at parts 2 and 4 grants the individual freedom of movement from and between countries. Part 2 of Article 12 stipulates "[e]veryone shall be free to leave any country, including his own." Part 4 of the same article provides "[n]o one shall be arbitrarily 333 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, supra note 328.

---

334 Id. at Preamble.

335 Note for example that although the United States ratified the International Covenant on June 8, 1992, and the Covenant entered into force for the United States on September 8, 1992, the United States did not become a party to the First Optional Protocol and the individual complaint mechanism is thus not applicable to it. See Manfred Nowak, U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (1993). See generally Symposium, The Ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 1167 (1993) (discussing the United States' ratification of the International Covenant).

336 Optional Protocol, supra note 328, at art. 2.

337 See also E. Kamenka & A. Ehr-Soon Tay, Human Rights 126–127 (1978); Richard B. Lillich & Frank C. Newman, International Human Rights: Problems of Law and Policy 324 (1979); Arthur H. Robertson, Human Rights in Europe 149–154 (1977) (discussing right of individual petition).

deprived of the right to enter his own country." These provisions mirror Article 13(2) of the Universal Declaration.

As with the rights enumerated in the Universal Declaration, however, the International Covenant does not provide for a universal enforcement mechanism of the rights it purports to guarantee. The Optional Protocol[338] of the International Covenant, which provides an individual complaint mechanism, is applicable only to states that ratified it. This does not include the United States, which ratified the ICCPR subject to developing national legislation to implement it, which it has not done to date.

(c) Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees[339]

This Convention extends to refugees, inter alia, access to courts and legal assistance in seeking remedy for violations of human rights in all contracting states the same as that afforded to nationals of such states. Article 16 states:

> (1) A refugee shall have free access to the courts of law on the territory of all Contracting States.
>
> (2) A refugee shall enjoy in the Contracting State in which he has his habitual residence the same treatment as a national in matters pertaining to access to the Courts, including legal assistance and exemption from cautio judicatum solvi.
>
> (3) A refugee shall be accorded in the matters referred to in paragraph 2 in countries other than that in which he has his habitual residence the treatment granted to a national of the country of his habitual residence.

The rights of refugees in the country of refuge are specified in Articles 31 and 32 of the Convention. These articles are designed specifically to avoid any kind of manipulation of immigration laws toward ends to which they were not designed. It is in these provisions that it becomes clear that using immigration as an alternative rendition device to extradition is a violation of the individual's rights.

Article 31 states:

> (1) The Contracting States shall not impose penalties, on account of their illegal entry or presence, on refugees who, coming directly from a territory where their life or freedom was threatened in the sense of Article 1, enter or are present in their territory without authorization, provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence.
>
> (2) The Contracting States shall not apply to the movements of such refugees restrictions other than those which are necessary and such restrictions shall only be applied until their status in the country is regularized or they obtain admission into another country. The Contracting States shall allow such refugees a reasonable period and all the necessary facilities to obtain admission into another country.

The drafters of this convention recognized the harsh nature of expulsion of an alien from a country of refuge, and, through Articles 32 and 33, imposed restrictions on the host state to protect the alien.

Article 32, entitled Expulsion, provides:

> (1) The Contracting States shall not expel a refugee lawfully in their territory save on grounds of national security or public order.
>
> (2) The expulsion of such a refugee shall be only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with due process of law. Except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, the refugee shall be allowed to submit evidence to clear himself, and to appeal to and be > represented for the purpose before competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority.

338 Optional Protocol of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, supra note 328.

339 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, Apr. 26, 1954, G.A. Res. 526A (XVII).

>
> (3) The Contracting States shall allow such a refugee a reasonable period within which to seek legal admission into another country. The Contracting States reserve the right to apply during that period such internal measures as they may deem necessary.

Article 33 concerned with non-refoulement provides:

> (1) No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers or territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.
>
> (2) The benefit of the present provision may not, however, be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country.

The rights of the refugee are clearly stated in this convention; however, again, an enforcement mechanism is lacking. There is no international enforcement mechanism for violations, save for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and U.N. administrative action, which is of a diplomatic, political nature that does not give rise to individually enforceable legal rights.

With respect to those states that have adopted this convention, a remedy could lie under their national laws. In the United States, for example, remedies arising out of this convention can be found in the 1980 Refugee Act.

It must be pointed out that a violation committed by a given state has not so far been recognized as giving rise to a legal action in a receiving state once the individual has been removed from the territory of the state that committed the original violation. In particular, that individual could not challenge the jurisdiction that the receiving state may wish to exercise upon him/her.[340]

4.2.2. Regional Conventions

Although remedies under the following conventions exist in the applicable regions, they are not applicable in the United States, because the United States is not a party to any of the following conventions.

(a) The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[341]

This Council of Europe Convention provides for many of the rights recognized in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Article 13 provides for effective remedy for violations of these rights:

> Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.

The drafters of the Convention also established enforcement mechanisms. Having defined the rights to be guaranteed, the Convention goes on to set up international machinery, which is designed to make the guarantees effective. The authors of the Convention did not consider it sufficient to have only domestic mechanisms to enforce the different rights and freedoms: they required some measure of international control. In other words, national obligations were not enough, and international machinery to reinforce them was also required. In this respect the Council of Europe followed the principle already established by the General Assembly of the

---

340 See Ch. VI.

341 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221.

United Nations in 1948, which intended that the proclamation of the Universal Declaration would be followed by a covenant containing legal obligations and by another instrument providing for "measures of implementation." This is made clear in Article 19 of the Convention, which established a European Commission and a Court of Human Rights "to ensure the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties in the . . . Convention . . . " The member governments of the Council of Europe accepted the idea that a European Commission should be created for this purpose, as an impartial, international organ to which complaints could be made in the event of any failure by a member state to secure to anyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention. Today forty-seven European states have ratified the European Convention and accepted the jurisdiction of the European Court, the successor to the earlier commission.[342]

In 1998 the powers of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) were expanded significantly and the Commission abolished under Protocol 11 to the European Convention on Human Rights.[343] Since 1998 all complaints under the European Convention have been dealt with by the ECtHR, and since 1994 individual complaints can be considered after the adoption of of Protocol 11. Under Article 35 of Protocol 11, a precondition to the ECtHR's jurisdiction is the exhaustion of domestic remedies; complaints must be filed within six months of the final ruling in the domestic judicial system. Article 35 also limits the ECtHR's competence to complaints against states, and precludes anonymous submissions. Since the adoption of Protocol 14[344] the ECtHR has adopted a standard by which in order to gain standing before the court, the complainant must show that he/she suffered "significant damage." In 2011 the ECtHR received approximately 64,500 complaints. In 2011 the ECtHR issued 1,511 judgments and ruled that 50,677 were inadmissible. At present there are approximately 151,600 applications pending before the ECtHR.[345]

(b) The American Convention on Human Rights[346]

This convention again reaffirms the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.[347] The Convention declares the right of freedom of movement in Article 22, entitled Freedom of Movement and Residence:

> (1) Every person lawfully in the territory of a State Party has the right to move about in it and to reside in it subject to the provisions of the law.
>
> (2) Every person has the right to leave any country freely, including his own.

---

342 Impact in 47 Countries, Council of Europe, http://human-rights-convention.org/impact-of-the-european-convention-on-human-rights/. The states are: Albania, Germany, Andorra, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Croatia, Denmark, Spain, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Iceland, Italy, Latvia, "The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia," Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Moldova, Monaco, Montenegro, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Czech Republic, Romania, United Kingdom, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and Ukraine. Belarus and the Vatican are not state-parties to the European Convention and are not within the jurisdictional competence of the European Court of Human Rights.

343 Protocol No. 11 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, restructuring the control machinery established thereby, E.T.S. 155, entered into force November 1, 1998.

344 Protocol No. 14 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, amending the control system of the Convention, E.T.S. 194, entered into force June 1, 2010.

345 European Court of Human Rights, Annual Report 151 (2011).

346 American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, Organization of American States Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc. 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (Jan. 7, 1970).

347 Id. at Preamble.

> (3) The exercise of the foregoing rights may be restricted only pursuant to a law to the extent necessary in a democratic society in order to prevent crime or to protect national security, public safety, public order, public morals, public health, or the rights or freedoms of others.
>
> (4) The exercise of the rights recognized in paragraph 1 may also be restricted by law in designated zones for reasons of public interest.
>
> (5) No one can be expelled from the territory of the state of which he is a national or be deprived of the right to enter it.
>
> (6) An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to this Convention may be expelled from it only pursuant to a decision reached in accordance with law.
>
> (7) Every person shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum in a foreign territory, in accordance with the legislation of the state and international conventions, in the event he is being pursued for political offenses or related common crimes.
>
> (8) In no case may an alien be deported or returned to a country, regardless of whether or not it is his country of origin, if in that country his right to life or personal freedom is in danger of being violated because of his race, nationality, religion, social status, or political opinions.
>
> (9) The collective expulsion of aliens is prohibited.

Note that parts 3 and 4 of the foregoing article allow for discretion on the part of the state in recognition of the rights of each state as a national sovereign, although these parts should not have the effect of diminishing the rights of individuals.[348]

This convention again provides for equal protection under the law and effective remedy for violations of individual human rights. Article 24, entitled Right to Equal Protection, provides:

> All persons are equal before the law. Consequently, they are entitled, without discrimination, to equal protection of the law.

And Article 25(1), entitled Right to Judicial Protection, continues:

> Everyone has the right to simple and prompt recourse, or any other effective recourse, to a competent court or tribunal, for protection against acts that violate his fundamental rights recognized by the constitution or laws of the state concerned or by this Convention, even though such violation may have been committed by persons acting in the course of their official duties.

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights are the enforcement bodies designated to take action on alleged violations of individual human rights. An individual has the right to bring a petition before the Commission but not before the Inter-American Court. The Commission may, however, bring a case before the Inter-American Court after investigating the matter and attempting to resolve it directly with the relevant state. The Inter-American Court also has jurisdiction over complaints brought by one state against another state over violations of the Inter-American Convention.

(c) The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights[349]

Similar to other human rights conventions, the African Charter reaffirms the principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.[350] In 348 Similar language can be found in other human rights conventions, that is, art. 22(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, supra note 328; art. 29(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, supra note 329.

---

349 African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, June 27, 1981, 21 I.L.M. 58 (1981).

350 Id. at Preamble.

setting forth the rights it guarantees, the Charter provides that "[e]very individual shall be equal before the law" and that "[e]very individual shall be entitled to equal protection of the law."[351]

In similar terms to the American Convention, the African Charter guarantees the right to freedom of movement. Article 12 provides:

> 1. Every individual shall have the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of a State provided he abides by the law.
>
> 2. Every individual shall have the right to leave any country including his own, and to return to his country. This right may only be subject to restrictions, provided for by law for the protection of national security, law and order, public health or morality.
>
> 3. Every individual shall have the right, when persecuted, to seek and obtain asylum in other countries in accordance with the laws of those countries and international conventions.
>
> 4. A non-national legally admitted in a territory of a State Party to the present Charter, may only be expelled from it by virtue of a decision taken in accordance with the law.
>
> 5. The mass expulsion of non-nationals shall be prohibited. Mass expulsion shall be that which is aimed at national, racial, ethnic or religious groups.[352]

The African Charter obliges state parties to it to "recognize the rights, duties and freedoms enshrined in [the] Charter and . . . undertake to adopt legislative or other measures to give effect to them."[353] Clearly, the rights guaranteed by the Charter were not meant to be hollow. However, the enforcement system has a weak structure, and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights set up under the Charter has no authority to act on individual petitions unless such "reveal the existence of a series of serious or massive violations of human and peoples' rights."[354] In 2004 the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights was established to complement the work of the Commission;[355] to date twenty-six states have accepted the court's jurisdiction.[356] However, Article 5 of the African Court's statute limits jurisdiction to complaints filed by the African Commission, state-parties, and African Intergovernmental Organizations; individuals may submit cases if the relevant state has accepted the African Court's competence over such petitions. In this respect the African Court is similar to the Inter-American Court and the ECtHR prior to 1998. Since 2008 the African Court has received twenty complaints and issued judgments in ten.

---

351 Id. at art. 3.

352 Id. at art. 12.

353 Id. at art. 1.

354 Id. at art. 58(1) (emphasis added).

355 Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights, June 9, 1998, OAU Doc. OAU/LEG/EXP/AFCHPR/PROT (III).

356 Through June 2012, state-parties to the protocol include Algeria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Côte d'Ivoire, Comoros, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Kenya, Libya, Lesotho, Mali, Malawi, Mozambique, Mauritania, Mauritius, Nigeria, Niger, Rwanda, South Africa, Senegal, Tanzania, Togo, Tunisia, and Uganda. See African Union, List of Countries Which Have Signed, Ratified/Acceded to the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights, available at: http://www.african-court.org/en/images/documents/Court/Court%20Establishment/Members.pdf. Only Cape Verde, Eritrea, Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic, and Sao Tome and Principe have not signed the Protocol.

(d) The Draft Charter on Human and People's Rights in the Arab World[357]

The Draft Charter is a comprehensive instrument for the protection of human rights covering civil and political rights; economic, social, and cultural rights; and collective rights of the Arab people. The Draft Charter seeks to secure these rights by creating the Arab Commission on Human Rights and the Arab Court of Human Rights. Article 53(4) of the Draft Charter allows for the review of individual petitions by the Arab Commission on Human Rights.

With respect to the right of movement, the Draft Charter provides in Article 8 the following:

> 1. Everyone has the right to liberty of movement within his country and freedom to choose his residence.
>
> 2. Everyone who is a citizen of an Arab country or of Arab origin has the right to leave his country and return to it and to enter any other Arab country.
>
> 3. No citizen shall be expelled from his country.

Additionally, the Draft Charter addresses the right of asylum in Article 40.

> 1. Every citizen who is subjected to persecution on political grounds has the right to seek and obtain asylum in any Arab country in accordance with the law and the provisions of this Charter.
>
> 2. No person enjoying asylum or seeking it shall be expelled to an Arab or foreign country where his life would be in danger or where he may be persecuted.

The Draft Charter thus could be a useful tool in the protection of individuals in regard to the use of immigration devices and violations that may result from their use or abuse.

5. The International Law Commission's Principles of State Responsibility[358]

Below are several relevant Articles of the ILC's Principles of State Responsibility, which were adopted in 2001 and subsequently submitted to the General Assembly.

> Article 1, Responsibility of a State for its internationally wrongful acts. Every internationally wrongful act of a State entails the international responsibility of that State.
>
> Article 2, Elements of an internationally wrongful act of a State. There is an internationally wrongful act of a State when conduct consisting of an action or omission:
>
> a. Is attributable to the State under international law; and > b. Constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the State.
>
>
> Article 3, Characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful. The characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law.
>
> Article 4, Conduct of organs of a State. 1. The conduct of any State organ shall be considered an act of that State under international law, whether the organ exercises legislative, executive, judicial or any other functions, whatever position it holds in the organization of the State, and whatever

---

357 Draft Charter on Human and People's Rights in the Arab World, 1987, in International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences, Draft Charter on Human and People's Rights in the Arab World (1987). Various websites containing information on the subject refer to it as a draft even though it was adopted by the Standing Committee on Human Rights at the Summit Meeting of the Heads of State in Tunis in January 2004. For the text in English, see 12 Int'l Human Rts. Rep. 893 (2005).

358 See Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of the Fifty-Third Session, April 23–August 10, 2001, Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, U.N. GAOR, 53rd Session, A/CN.4/L.602/Rev.1, July 26, 2001.

its character as an organ of the central government or of a territorial unit of the State. 2. An organ includes any person or entity which has that status in accordance with the internal law of the State.

Article 5, Conduct of persons or entities exercising elements of governmental authority. The conduct of a person or entity which is not an organ of the State under Article 4 but which is empowered by the law of that State to exercise elements of the governmental authority shall be considered an act of the State under international law, provided the person or entity is acting in that capacity in the particular instance.

Article 8, Conduct directed or controlled by a State. The conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered an act of a State under international law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that State in carrying out the conduct.

Article 12, Existence of a breach of an international obligation. There is a breach of an international obligation by a State when an act of that State is not in conformity with what is required of it by that obligation, regardless of its origin or character.

Article 28, Legal Consequences of an internationally wrongful act. The international responsibility of a State which is entailed by an internationally wrongful act in accordance with the Provisions of Part One involves legal consequences as set out in this Part [Two].

Article 30, Cessation and non-repetition. The State responsible for the internationally wrongful act is under an obligation:

a. To cease that act, if it is continuing;

b. To offer appropriate assurances and guarantees of non-repetition, if circumstances so require.

Article 31, Reparation. 1. The responsible State is under an obligation to make full reparation for the injury caused by the internationally wrongful act. 2. Injury includes any damage, whether material or moral, caused by the internationally wrongful act of a State.

Article 32, Irrelevance of internal law. The responsible State may not rely on the provisions of its internal law as justification for failure to comply with its obligations under this Part.

Article 58, Individual responsibility. These articles are without prejudice to any question of the individual responsibility under international law of any person acting on behalf of a State.

6. Particular Remedies within the United States

Three principal avenues of remedies exist in the United States for disguised extradition. The first is under the INA in the context of its procedures, particularly deportation and denaturalization.[359] The second is an action under § 1985 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964,[360] which provides for injunctive relief as well as damages. The third mechanism exists under the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA),[361] which provides for a remedy in the United States for violations committed abroad. The latter two statutes offer a unique remedy unparalleled in most, if not all, foreign legal systems in that they grant jurisdiction to U.S. courts to entertain claims for tortious conduct committed against a non-U.S. citizen (who could even be a citizen of the offending country) for an act deemed to be a violation of the law of nations. Under these statutes, the remedy is limited to monetary recovery. Additional avenues of remedies exist in actions

359 See supra Secs. 3.2.2 and 3.2.3.

360 Pub. L. No. 88-352.

361 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (2000). See Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004); Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004). For a discussion of the post-Sosa cases and procedures under the ATCA, s*ee generally* Kurzban, supra note 3, at 1370–1373 (12th ed. 2010) (collecting cases involving aggravated felonies).

arising under the U.S. Constitution (Bivens claims), the Privacy Act (5 U.S.C. § 552a(g)), the Tucker Act (28 U.S.C. § 1491(a)(1)), and the Federal Tort Claims Act (28 U.S.C. § 2674).[362]

In recent cases, the U.S. Supreme Court has relied upon the concept that the Due Process Clause is territorial in basis and is to be applied to everyone within the borders of the United States. An alien's physical presence within the United States thus endows him/her with due process rights. Although an alien's illegal status subjects him/her to deportation, it does not strip him/her of the rights granted by the Constitution.[363]

The ATCA is designed specifically to give courts jurisdiction over torts committed against aliens in violation of the law of nations or a treaty to which the United States is party. It provides that "[t]he district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." This action is designed to give federal district courts original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort committed in violation of the law of nations or of a treaty (as long as the treaty is relevant to the plaintiff's case).[364] A violation of the "law of nations" within the meaning of this provision relates to the jurisdiction of the court and arises when there has been conduct by one or more individuals of one state that violates those standards, rules, or customs affecting the relationship between states or between an individual and a foreign state.[365] The "law of nations" may be ascertained through the general usage and practice of nations, judicial decisions recognizing and enforcing that law, or the writings of the most distinguished publicists.[366] The "law of nations" in U.S. jurisprudence refers more to relations between states than to relations between individuals.[367]

Sources relevant to the law of nations are enumerated under Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which states, in pertinent part:

> 1. The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:
>
> (a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states;
>
> (b) international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
>
> (c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
>
> (d) subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.[368]

It should be noted that judicial decisions and scholarly writings are secondary sources of law that are relevant only insofar as they interpret conventional, customary, and general international law. Because the Statute of the International Court of Justice is part of the Charter of the United Nations and the United States is a signatory of the Charter, it is binding on the United States.

---

362 For a discussion of these avenues of remedies, including collected cases and procedures, see generally Kurzban, supra note 3, at 1364–1369, 1374 (collecting cases involving aggravated felonies).

363 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982); Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945). See also Peter S. Munoz, The Right of an Illegal Alien to Maintain a Civil Action, 63 Cal. L. Rev. 762 (1975).

364 Valanga v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 259 F. Supp. 324 (E.D. Pa. 1966).

365 See, e.g., ITT v. Vencap, Ltd., 519 F.2d 1001 (2d Cir. 1975).

366 United States v. Smith, 18 U.S. 153 (1820). See also Lopes v. Schroder, 225 F. Supp. 292 (E.D. Pa. 1963).

367 Dreyfus v. Von Finck, 534 F.2d 24 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 835 (1976).

368 Statute of the International Court of Justice, art. 38, 59 Stat. 1055, 33 U.N.T.S. 993 (June 26, 1945).

Articles 55 and 56 of the U.N. Charter promote international protection of human rights:

> Article 55
>
> With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:
>
> (a) higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;
>
> (b) solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and
>
> (c) universal respect for, and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.
>
> Article 56
>
> All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization for the achievement of the purpose set forth in Article 55.[369]

What constitutes the "law of nations" is readily ascertainable, but what constitutes a violation of such law is more problematic. The conventions protecting human rights cover a wide range of rights that vary significantly and qualitatively. Surely, cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment—which appears in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Art. 5), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Art. 7), and the Inter-American Convention (Art. 5)—may amount to torture, and is a clear violation.[370] It may not be the same with respect to social security, which, in various formulations, is also provided for in these documents. Nevertheless, this qualitative issue has never been addressed, and the assumption could be made that even though these rights are not predicated on the protection of equal human values, they are nonetheless equal in that they constitute an international obligation upon the signatory states.

In U.S. domestic law, the ATCA was revitalized in the case of Filartiga v. Peña-Irala,[371] where federal jurisdiction was established for a tort suffered by an alien outside the United States. The Act had not previously been used as a basis for jurisdiction in cases involving human rights violations. The principle espoused in Filartiga was not, in retrospect, as powerful and as universally applied as had been hoped.[372]

---

369 U.N. Charter, Oct. 24, 1945, 59 Stat. 1931, T.S. No. 993, 3 Bevans 1153.

370 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pénal 23 (1977).

371 Filartiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980). See Bruce A. Barenblat, Note, Torture as a Violation of the Law of Nations: An Analysis of 28 U.S.C. Section 1350, 16 Texas Int'l L.J. 117 (1981).

372 That it has done so to the present is not at all clear. Compare Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (affirming dismissal of action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction brought by survivors and representatives of persons murdered in an armed attack on a civilian bus in Israel), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1003 (1985) and Sanchez-Espinosa v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (affirming dismissal of action brought by members of Congress, citizens of Nicaragua, and two U.S. residents against the U.S. president and other defendants alleging claims arising out of the United States' actions in Nicaragua and holding that the alien tort statute does not constitute a waiver of sovereign immunity) with In re Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litigation, 978 F.2d 493 (9th Cir. 1992) (holding that the alien tort statute provided jurisdictional basis for a claim of an alien for the tort of wrongful death, committed by Filipino military intelligence officials through torture), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2960 (1993). See also Helen C. Lucas, Comment, The Adjudication of Violations of International Law under the Alien Tort Claims Act: Allowing Alien Plaintiffs Their Day in Federal Court, 36 DePaul L. Rev. 231 (1987).

In Filartiga, the plaintiff, Dr. Joel Filartiga, joined by his daughter, claimed that his son, a seventeen-year-old Paraguayan boy, had been tortured to death in March 1976 by members of the Asuncion Police in retaliation for political activities. At the time Peña-Irala was the Inspector General of Police of Asuncion. The plaintiff alleged that his son was whipped repeatedly and subjected to high voltage electrical shocks that resulted in his death.

In 1978, the alleged perpetrator, Peña-Irala, entered the United States under a visitor's visa. The daughter of the plaintiff learned of Peña-Irala's presence and caused him to be personally served at the Brooklyn Navy Yard where he was being held pending deportation for overstaying his visa. The district court dismissed the complaint on jurisdictional grounds. Although stays of deportation were sought in the Second Circuit and in the Supreme Court, they were denied as well, and Peña-Irala returned to Paraguay. Subsequently, however, the district court's dismissal of Filartiga's claim was overturned by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which found that torture is a violation of the law of nations and thus within the scope of ATCA.[373] Filartiga marked an important change from earlier cases[374] in that the tortious actions complained of in Filartiga were not clearly violations of the law of nations at the time, and the courts had previously assumed a narrow interpretation of the Act.[375]

The immediate effect of the Filartiga decision was to recognize torture as a violation of the law of nations and to bring such a violation within the reach of the ATCA. However, on an international level, the decision expands U.S. jurisdiction for the protection of aliens for tortious actions that constitute violations of the law of nations, and could be an effective weapon against such violations.

However, as indicated above, the practical effect of Filartiga was not as great as might have been hoped and causes of action were slowly limited.[376] In 2004 the Supreme Court mandated in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain that under ATCA courts should engage in "vigilant doorkeeping" and limit jurisdiction to crimes under international law.[377] It should be noted that all cases of "extraordinary rendition" that have been brought in U.S. courts have been dismissed or denied.[378] Relatedly, in 2012 the Supreme Court ruled in Mohamed v. Palestinian Authority[379] that the Torture Victim Protection Act[380] does not apply to organizations.

---

373 Filartiga, 630 F.2d at 878.

374 See, e.g., Dreyfus v. Von Finck, 534 F.2d 24 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 835 (1976); Salimoff & Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 186 N.E. 679 (N.Y. 1933) (holding that international law is not violated when the aggrieved parties are nationals of the acting state), cited with approval in Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398 (1964).

375 See, e.g., Dreyfus v. Von Finck, 534 F.2d 24 (2d Cir. 1976) (concerning wrongful confiscation of property); ITT v. Vencap Ltd., 519 F.2d 1001 (2d Cir. 1975) (regarding fraud, conversion and corporate waste); Cohen v. Hartman, 490 F. Supp. 517 (S.D. Fla. 1980) (involving embezzlement). See also Kenneth C. Randall, Federal Jurisdiction over International Law Claims: Inquiries into the Alien Tort Statute, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 1 (1985); Kenneth C. Randall, Further Inquiries into the Alien Tort Statute and a Recommendation, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 473 (1986).

376 See also Ch. V, Sec. 8.

377 Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 724 (2004).

378 See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). See also El-Masri v. United States, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2007). Although the Fourth Circuit denied damages to El-Masri, his case proceeded before the ECtHR, which resulted in a finding by the Grand Chamber of several violations of the European Convention of Human Rights, including the prohibitions on torture, arbitrary detention, the duty to investigate, the right to the truth, and the right to an effective remedy. El-Masri v. The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, App. No. 39630/09 Eur. Ct. H.R. (2012).

For an overview, see Open Societies Institute, El-Masri v. Macedonia, available at: http://www.soros.org/initiatives/justice/litigation/macedonia (last visited May 8, 2012).

379 Mohamed v. Palestinian Authority et al, 566 U. S. ____ (2012).

380 Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, Pub. L. 102-256, Mar. 12, 1992, 106 Stat. 73.

7. Conclusion

It is clear upon review of the foregoing that the flexibility of immigration procedures can, and at times does, result in the circumvention of extradition procedures and their attendant safeguards. Although the use of immigration procedures as an alternative means of rendition is at present an exception and not the rule, it nonetheless circumvents the intent of states who enter into extradition treaties for the specific purpose of avoiding disguised extradition, which detrimentally affects the international rule of law and violates individual human rights of those subjected to such means of rendition.

The use of immigration procedures for the purpose of rendition is in part possible because: (1) a substantial amount of discretion is vested in the executive branch that is administering such procedures; (2) there is an unclear hierarchical relationship between the judicial and administrative processes of national legal systems, which regulate extradition and immigration proceedings, respectively; (3) there is an unclear hierarchical relationship between international and national laws; (4) the notion of international due process is not yet well established and its normative content still lacks specificity;[381] and (5) there is at present no internationally agreed process of extradition binding upon all states.

In short, the failures of extradition and the insufficient protections afforded by immigration laws as separate legal and administrative processes make the abusive practice of disguised extradition possible.

The tragic events of September 11, 2001, redefined the traditional liberal approach to immigration laws, and the rights of aliens in this country. This is, undoubtedly, an unfortunate development as it betrays the best of what the American legal tradition has to offer.

28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1994).

381 See The Protection of Human Rights in the Administration of Criminal Justice: A Compendium of United Nations Norms and Standards (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1994).

Chapter V

Abduction and Unlawful Seizure as Alternatives to Extradition

Contents

1. Typology and Rationale

The title of this chapter does not suggest that alternatives to extradition include the lawful surrender of a person other than by treaty, namely by means of reciprocity, comity or on the basis of national legislation.[1] Alternatives to extradition are therefore methods that do not fall within the framework of extradition.[2] This chapter addresses the rendition of a person, against his/her will, from one state to another through unlawful means. It includes abduction and other forms of unlawful seizure for purposes of extralegal rendition and the more recent U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition," which also involves kidnapping and torture.

Extradition is the Rule of Law approach to rendition. Abduction and other forms of unlawful seizure are the antithesis to the observance of the Rule of Law. Rule of Law–oriented states consider abduction and other methods of unlawful seizure for rendition purposes illegal. The United States regrettably is not among states that respect this aspect of the Rule of Law. Since 2002, the United States has developed an even more abhorrent practice that is euphemistically called "extraordinary rendition," whereby persons are not only abducted, but flown to countries where they are tortured for purposes of obtaining information.[3] The practice also includes abductions to what the United States calls "black sites" where U.S. agents torture individuals.[4] These practices exist because of the complacency of the U.S. judiciary that turns a blind eye to all these unlawful practices, as discussed in this chapter. The Supreme Court has unfortunately paved the way for such practices by refusing to extend the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution extraterritorially, even when the effects of the violation are given legitimacy within the United States.

In Mapp v. Ohio,[5] Justice Tom Clark, speaking for the majority, dismissed the argument that observance of the law allows criminals to go free. Instead, he wrote: "The criminal goes free, if he must, but it is the law that sets him free. Nothing can destroy a government more quickly than its failure to observe its own laws, or worse, its disregard of the charter of its own existence."[6] Unfortunately, these wise words have been lost on those who have upheld unlawful abductions and seizure of persons, and their subsequent delivery to other states, particularly when these practices involve torture as described below.

The unlawful techniques used by some states, including the United States, fall essentially into four categories:

1. abduction of a person by agents other than those of the territorial state, with or without the knowledge or consent of the territorial state;

---

1 See Chs. I and II.

2 These lawful alternatives include the use of immigration laws to deport non-nationals. See Ch. III.

3 See Ch. IV.

4 See Open Societies Institute, Globalizing Torture: CIA Secret Detention and Extraordinary Rendition (2013). See also Peter Taylor, "Vomiting and Screaming" in Destroyed Waterboarding Tapes, BBC News, May 9, 2012, available at http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-us-canada-17990955 (The head of the CIA's Counterterrorism Center, Jose Rodriguez, has conceded that "It's not a pretty sight when you are waterboarding anybody or using any of these techniques, let's be perfectly honest." Rodriguez, a proponent of the CIA's program, disputes that torture victims were screaming and vomiting—something that was recorded on the tapes that Rodriguez later ordered destroyed—but agrees that irrespective of the consequence, "it's not a pretty sight." The CIA's chief legal counsel at the time stated that one of his staff members saw the destroyed tapes and that "the tapes, particularly those of [Abu] Zubaydah being waterboarded, were extraordinarily hard to watch.")

5 Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

6 Id. at 659. Justice Clark later writes that "The ignoble shortcut to conviction left open to the State tends to destroy the entire system of constitutional restraints on which the liberties of the people rest." Id. at 660.

2. seizure of a person by the agents of the territorial state and his/her surrender to the agents of another state outside any formal legal process either within the territorial state or across its borders to a neighboring state;

3. seizure of a person in any state by agents of that state or another state, and his/her delivery to yet another state, outside legal processes;[7] and

4. cooperation among agents of several states, outside their respective states' legal process to abduct a person in one state and deliver him/her to another state, which then formally extradites the person to a third state.[8]

This typology is important to determine the existence and extent of the violation of individual human rights and breaches of national and international law, and their consequences on state responsibility.

These techniques exist because of the application of the maxim mala captus bene detentus, whereby national courts assert in personam jurisdiction without inquiring into the means by which the presence of the defendant was secured.[9] Thus, as they produce legally valid results, there is no deterrent for state agents to engage in these techniques. Aside from subverting the

---

7 Over the past decade the United States has euphemistically referred to this process as "extraordinary rendition."

8 This was the case with respect to Bozano who was unlawfully seized in France (after that state had denied his extradition to Italy), and delivered by French agents to Swiss agents inside Switzerland. While Bozano was under arrest in Switzerland, Italy requested his extradition from Switzerland, and he was then lawfully extradited to Italy. Thus, Italy accomplished his surrender, which it had been unable to do formally and legally while Bozano was in France. The European Court of Human Rights condemned the process. See infra note 54 and accompanying text (discussing the Bozano case).

9 S*ee* United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992); United States v. Lazore, 90 F. Supp. 2d 202 (N.D.N.Y. 2000); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952); Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886) (cited by numerous countries as a landmark for the mala captus bene detentus rule). See also Abraham Abramovsky, Extraterritorial Abductions: America's "Catch and Snatch" Policy Run Amok, 31 Va. J. Int'l L. 151 (1991); Edwin D. Dickinson, Jurisdiction following Seizure or Arrest in Violation of International Law, 28 Am. J. Int'l L. 231 (1934); Charles Fairman, Ker v. Illinois Revisited, 47 Am. J. Int'l L. 678 (1953); D. Cameron Findlay, Abducting Terrorists Overseas for Trial in the United States: Issues of International and Domestic Law, 23 Tex. Int'l L.J. 1 (1988); Manuel R. Garcia-Mora, Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over Fugitives Brought from a Foreign Country by Force or Fraud: A Comparative Study, 32 Ind. L.J. 427 (1957); Mark Gibney, Policing the World: The Long Reach of U.S. Law and the Short Arm of the Constitution, 6 Conn. J. Int'l L. 103 (1990); Andreas F. Lowenfeld, U.S. Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution and International Law, Continued, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 444 (1990); G. Gregory Schuetz, Apprehending Terrorists Overseas under United States and International Law: A Case Study of the Fawaz Younis Arrest, 29 Harv. Int'l L.J. 499 (1988); Austin W. Scott, Jr., Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over a Defendant Based upon Presence Secured by Force or Fraud, 37 Minn. L. Rev. 91 (1953); Wade A. Buser, Note, The Jaffe Case and the Use of International Kidnapping as an Alternative to Extradition, 14 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 357 (1984); Andrew B. Campbell, Note, The Ker-Frisbie Doctrine: A Jurisdictional Weapon in the War on Drugs, 23 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 385 (1990); Andrew K. Fletcher, Note, Pirates and Smugglers: An Analysis of the Use of Abductions to Bring Drug Traffickers to Trial, 32 Va. J. Int'l L. 233 (1991); Theodore C. Jonas, Note, International "Fugitive Snatching" in U.S. Law: Two Views from Opposite Ends of the Eighties, 24 Cornell Int'l L.J. 521 (1991); Andreas F. Lowenfeld, Note, Kidnapping by Government Order: A Follow-Up, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 712 (1990); Edmund S. McAlister, Note, The Hydraulic Pressure of Vengeance: U.S. v. Alvarez-Machain and the Case for a Justifiable Abduction, 43 DePaul L. Rev. 449 (1994); Lawrence Preuss, Note, Kidnapping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 502 (1935); Lawrence Preuss, Note, Settlement of the Jacob Kidnapping Case, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 123 (1936); Kristofer R. Schleicher, Note, Transborder Abductions by American Bounty Hunters—The Jaffe Case and a New Understanding between the United States and Canada, 20 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 489 (1990).

lawful extradition process, such practices violate the subject's internationally protected human rights and occasionally infringe upon the sovereignty of other states.

The rendition techniques listed above are extraordinary in the legal sense, as extradition exists as an ordinary legal process. However, recourse to these techniques may well be due to the frustration of a requesting state that follows formal channels to no avail. This led one writer to ask: "When extradition fails, is abduction the solution?"[10] Indeed, there are numerous examples that illustrate this unfortunate dilemma. Some states who seek a fugitive or convicted offender resort to these alternatives because their efforts fail, for reasons that may or may not be justified, especially when the denial of extradition violates the principle of aut dedere aut judicare discussed in Chapter I, Section 3. The solution, however, should be to make extradition more efficient, not to subvert it by resorting to unlawful or legally questionable means to replace it. To place states in a position where they can benefit from the alternative rendition practices encourages further violations and erodes compliance with international law. At this stage in the development of international law, it is no longer possible to rationalize violations of international law on grounds of expediency or to allow such violations to be perpetrated without an adequate deterrent-remedy. The United States' "War on Terror" following the tragic events of September 11, 2001, tends to justify the abduction of suspected "terrorists" in total disregard for the Rule of Law or the human rights of the individual, no matter how abhorrent the crime he/she is suspected of committing may be.[11]

2. The Policy of Abduction in Comparative Law and Practice

When employed to the ends of rendition, abduction is carried out by agents of one state acting under color of law who unlawfully seize a person within the jurisdiction of another state and deliver that person to the state seeking him/her. The abduction can therefore be carried out entirely by foreign agents, or by cooperation between foreign and domestic agents acting for and on behalf of their respective states. This involves several issues, namely: (1) violations of the domestic laws of the states involved, (2) infringement on the sovereignty and territorial integrity of a given state, (3) violation of the internationally protected human rights of the unlawfully seized individual, and (4) disruption of world order. This technique must be distinguished from any other formal or quasi-formal means of rendition or even from the erroneous exercise of a formal process, such as when a public official, acting under color of law, surrenders or causes to be surrendered a person seeking refuge in that state to the agents of another state.[12]

---

10 Michael H. Cardozo, Note, When Extradition Fails, is Abduction the Solution?, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 127 (1961).

11 See, e.g., M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010).

12 Compare the classic Savarkar case in Hague Court Reports 276 (L. Scott, ed., 1916) (this text contains the text of a treaty establishing an arbitration tribunal to determine whether Savarkar should be returned to French authorities. It does not contain the disposition of the tribunal.) with D.S.M.S. File No. 211.12 Hinojos, Efren/2 (Mexico, 1936) (indicating that apparently the governor of Chihuahua mistakenly assumed that he was empowered by Article IX of the Extradition Treaty of 1899, 31 Stat. 1818, to extradite fugitives to the United States). Where a fugitive was removed to Canada without court order "by the precipitate action of the representatives of the Canadian Government" before he could appeal against the dismissal of his petition for habeas corpus in extradition proceedings, Canadian authorities returned him at the request of the United States. His appeal was then heard, and the grant of extradition was affirmed. Judge of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals (Hamilton), to Secretary of State (Hull), September 6, 1938; same to same, July 13, 1939; D.S.M.S. File No. 211.42 Miller, C.E./10/27. In People v. Pratt, 78 Cal. 345 (1889), an attempted plea to the jurisdiction failed where a fugitive was returned from Japan at the request of the governor of California after the Department of State refused to request extradition in the absence of a treaty. The Supreme Court of California noted that the governor's action was probably illegal, but that this did not oust the court's jurisdiction over the fugitive. Illegal action by Mexican authorities in returning a fugitive to the United States did not oust the court's

The causes célèbres cases mentioned in this chapter reveal the extraordinary and extralegal means resorted to by government agents to secure jurisdiction over wanted persons in violation of the domestic laws of the states involved, the internationally protected human rights of individuals, international law, and, when allowed to stand by the judicial authority, the integrity of the judicial process.[13]

Although the causes célèbres discussed in this chapter have attracted the attention of world public opinion, there are other less notorious cases that are nonetheless equally violative of international law and that occurs with greater frequency.[14] jurisdiction in Wentz v. United States, 244 F.2d 172 (9th Cir.); Leila Nadya Sadat, Extraordinary Rendition, Torture, and Other Nightmares from the War on Terror, 75 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 1200 (2007).

---

13 For an analysis of the legal issues in the Soblen case, see Paul O'Higgins, Disguised Extradition: The Soblen Case, 27 Mod. L. Rev. 521 (1964). The case aroused considerable interest. See Id. at 521 n.1 (comments listed). Dr. Soblen was party to the following cases: Regina v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex parte Soblen, [1962] 3 All E.R. 373; Regina v. Governor of Brixton Prison, ex parte Soblen, [1962] 3 All E.R. 641; United States v. Soblen, 199 F. Supp. 11 (S.D.N.Y. 1961), aff'd, 301 F.2d 236 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 370 U.S. 944 (1962). For a brief account of the Israeli phase of the case, see Soblen Case Summarized, 5 Isr. Dig. 8 (1962). Deportation in the broadest sense comprehends exclusion and expulsion—now known as removal—among other methods, for the ouster of aliens from a country. These are hardly terms of art, depending as they do for definition upon particular national law and practice. See United States ex rel. Paktorovics v. Murff, 260 F.2d 610 (2d Cir. 1958). For a discussion of Eichmann, see Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, [1968] 36 Int'l. L.R. 5 (Israel) and the Supreme Court opinion, in 36 Int'l. L. R. 277 (1962). For Argentina's protest against Israel for the kidnapping of Eichmann and the Security Council's action, see 15 U.N. SCOR, U.N. Doc. S/4349; William J. Brennan, Jr., Comment, International Due Process and the Law, 48 Va. L. Rev. 1258 (1962). See also Pierre A. Papadatos, The Eichmann Trial (1964); Michael A. Musmanno, The Objections in Limine to the Eichmann Trial, 35 Temp. L.Q. 1 (1961). For a discussion of Argoud, see Bart DeSchutter, Competence of the National Judiciary Power in Case the Accused Has Been Unlawfully Brought within the National Frontiers, 1 Rev. Belge de Droit Int'le 88 (1965). The decision in Argoud was rendered by the Cour de Sûreté de l'Etat on December 28, 1963. Argoud was a leader of the military revolt against President DeGaulle during the Algerian controversy. He was kidnapped from Munich in February 1963, and later sentenced to life imprisonment. West Germany Protested the Kidnapping. See N.Y. Times, Jan. 1, 1964, at 3; N.Y. Times, Dec. 31, 1963, at 3. Conrad Ahlers, one of the editors of Der Spiegel, fled to Spain after police raids on the magazine following his criticism of the state of military preparedness in West Germany. He was summarily deported from Spain to Germany at the request of German authorities. Defense Minister Franz Josef Strauss was subsequently dropped from the government for his part in the affair. In October 1964, Ahlers and two others were indicted for treason on the charge of publishing state secrets in the magazine. N.Y. Times, Oct. 28, 1964, at 3. See also N.Y. Times, Nov. 11, 1964, at 15; N.Y. Times, Nov. 9, 1964, at 11; The Observer (London), Oct. 18, 1964, at 6. Charges against Ahlers and the publisher of Der Spiegel were dismissed by the Federal Supreme Court in May 1965. N.Y. Times, May 15, 1965, at 5. For a discussion of the Tshombé case, see 32 Bull. Int'l Comm'n Jur. 28–29 (1967). For a discussion of the Alvarez-Machain case, see infra Secs. 3 and 4.

14 Egyptian agents attempted to kidnap Mordechai Luk, an alleged double agent for Egypt and Israel, by shipping him in a trunk to Egypt. Two Egyptian diplomats were expelled from Italy in response. Luk returned to Israel, where he was wanted for military desertion. N.Y. Times, Nov. 19, 1964, at 1; N.Y. Times, Nov. 18, 1964, at 1; N.Y. Times, Nov. 18, 1964, at 6. The disappearance of Professor Jesus de Galindez from New York in March 1956 has never been solved. He was allegedly kidnapped by agents of Trujillo, taken to the Dominican Republic, and killed. N.Y. Times, Mar.–Dec. 1956. See also 36 Dep't St. Bull. 1027 (1957). The particularly vigorous campaign for the "repatriation" of defectors, conducted in the late 1950s by the Soviet Union and other Communist-bloc states, can also be classed as a form of "irregular recovery." See Alona E. Evans, Comment, Observations on the Practice of Territorial Asylum in the United States, 56 Am. J. Int'l L. 148, 151–153 (1962). Following the West German government's offer of a $25,000 reward for the recovery of Martin Bormann, a government official was reported to have pointed out that if Bormann were recovered by kidnapping, "the reward would be paid only if the country of hiding later gave its approval." N.Y. Times, Nov. 24, 1964, at 12. See also infra note 54 and the accompanying text (discussing the Bozano case).

As stated above, the inducement for the practice of abduction is that national courts recognize in personam jurisdiction, notwithstanding the manner in which it was secured. The case of Ker v. Illinois[15] in the United States is the most-cited decision in such situations. All too often, however, Ker is cited for various forms of unlawful seizure to which it may not apply in terms of the strict application of stare decisis. One inappropriate application of Ker was in the trial of Faik Bulut, a Turkish citizen seized by Israeli armed forces in February 1973 in a Palestinian refugee camp located one hundred miles inside Lebanese territory. Bulut was seized with ten other persons who were citizens of various Arab states. The seized persons were charged under an Israeli law purporting to apply to anyone, anywhere, who associates with an organization intending to cause harm to the State of Israel or its citizens. Counsel for defendant Bulut raised, inter alia, the jurisdictional argument that Bulut and the others were seized in violation of international law and that the application of Israeli law was extraterritorial. The military tribunal rejected both arguments, citing Eichmann and Ker as authority.[16] The court's reliance on these cases was inappropriate. In Ker, Illinois had territorial jurisdiction because Ker had committed a crime there, while in Eichmann,[17] there was universal jurisdiction because Eichmann had committed international crimes. Serious questions as to the legality of the jurisdictional subject matter and in personam bases existed in the Bulut case.[18]

In a case before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the Tribunal considered whether it could exercise jurisdiction over an individual who was illegally arrested and abducted, in violation of international human rights and due process standards.[19] The ICTY held:

> [T]he exercise of jurisdiction should not be declined in cases of abductions carried out by private individuals, whose actions, unless instigated, acknowledge or condoned by a State, or an international organization, or other entity, do not necessarily in themselves violate State sovereignty.[20]

---

15 Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886). See also Fairman, supra note 9.

16 Time, Aug. 20, 1973, at 31; Jerusalem Post Weekly, Aug. 14, 1973; N.Y. Times, July 24, 1973, at 31. See also Israel's law of March 21, 1972. The judgment was rendered by the Israeli Military Court (in Hebrew), Judgment of Aug. 7, 1973; Note, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and Jurisdiction following Forcible Abduction: A New Israeli Precedent in International Law, 72 Mich. L. Rev. 1087 (1974).

17 See Garcia-Mora, supra note 9; Scott, supra note 9. See also Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886) (cited by numerous countries as a landmark case for the mala captus bene detentus rule); Dickinson, supra note 9; Fairman, supra note 9; Preuss, Kidnapping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory, supra note 9; Preuss, Settlement of the Jacob Kidnapping Case, supra note 9.

18 Çavus and Bulut v. Turkey, Court Judgment, App. No. 41580/98 (Oct. 23, 2003).

19 Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli, Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest (June 5, 2003). See also Juvenal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, Judgement of May 23, 2005. In this case, the Appellate Chamber of the ICTR noted that:

> [A] shared burden exists with regard to safeguarding the suspect's fundamental rights in international cooperation on criminal matters. A Judge of the requested State is called upon to communicate to the detainee the request for surrender (or extradition) and make him or her familiar with any charge, to verify the suspect's identity, to examine any obvious challenges to the case, to inquire into the medical condition of the suspect, and to notify a person enjoying the confidence of the detainee and consular officers. It is, however, not the task of that Judge to inquire into the merits of the case. He or she would not know the reasons for the detention in the absence of a provisional or final arrest warrant issued by the requesting State or the Tribunal. This responsibility is vested with the judiciary of the requesting State, or in this case, a Judge of the Tribunal, as they bear principal responsibility for the deprivation of liberty of the person they requested to be surrendered.

Id. at ¶221 (citations omitted).

20 Id. at ¶ 26.

The Tribunal relied on Alvarez-Machain as well as cases from other national courts.[21] The court then dismissed the appeal, finding that jurisdiction should be set aside only if egregious human rights violations have occurred.[22]

The United States has been on both sides of abduction cases, but remains fixed to the Ker position,[23] provided there is valid subject matter jurisdiction. The decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Frisbie v. Collins,[24] an inter-state rendition case, affirmed this position in 1952. In 1992, the Supreme Court again affirmed this position in United States v. Alvarez-Machain,[25] an international abduction case from Mexico, which to the embarrassment of the United States turned out to have resulted in the abduction of the wrong person. The criminal charges were dismissed on the merits, and Dr. Alvarez-Machain was allowed to return to Mexico.[26]

The earlier position of the United Kingdom was the same as that of the United States, and was enunciated in 1829 in Ex parte Suzannah Scott.[27] Many other countries have found themselves embroiled in the same application of the maxim mala captus bene detentus, as discussed below. But European states that are bound by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) have eschewed this practice in the last two decades.

---

21 Id. at ¶ 21.

22 Id. at ¶¶ 30–34.

23 United States v. Unverzagt, 299 F. 1015 (W.D. Wash. 1924), aff'd sub nom., Unverzagt v. Benn, 5 F.2d 492 (9th Cir. 1952), cert. denied, 269 U.S. 566 (1957), Converse and Blatt case (1911); Lawshe v. State, 121 S.W. 865 (1909); Meyers and Tunstall case (1862); State v. Brewster, 7 Vt. 118 (1835); Restatement on Foreign Relations of the United States § 606 (1918); Green Hayood Hackworth, Digest of International Law 14–15 (1944) [hereinafter Hackworth Digest]; John B. Moore, Digest of International Law 332 (1901) (discussing the Adsetts case). For an excellent survey of U.S. practice, see Alona E. Evans, Acquisition of Custody over the International Fugitive Offender—Alternatives to Extradition: A Survey of United States Practice, 40 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 77 (1964).

24 Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952).

25 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992). See infra Secs. 3 and 4 (discussing the case in context). See also United States v. Hill, 03 C 4196 (95 CR 730–731), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18345 (N.D. Ill. 2004) (upholding the validity of jurisdiction even though the relator was abducted from Guinea). In Hill, the court also refused to suppress his confession that was obtained while he was forcefully abducted to be brought to the United States to face criminal charges. In relying on Alvarez-Machain and the Ker-Frisbie rule, the court noted that the Second Circuit exception under United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1972), reh'g denied 504 F.2d 1380 (1974), on remand 398 F. Supp. 916 (1975), has not been followed in the Seventh Circuit. Id. See also Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255 (7th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 878 (1990).

26 See infra Secs. 5 and 6.6 for full discussion of the case and its ramifications.

27 109 E.R. 166. See also Ex parte Elliott, [1949] 1 All E.R. 373 (K.B.) (Eng.); Felice Morgenstern, Jurisdiction in Seizures Effected in Violation of International Law, 29 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 265 (1952); O'Higgins, supra note 13. For the practice between England and the United States, see the case of Townsend, concerning the kidnapping of an American national from the United Kingdom by an American police officer. The Law Officers of the Crown, in the Opinion of 1865, did not challenge the validity of the jurisdiction so acquired. However, they did suggest that "it would be proper and expedient that the attention of the Government of the United States should be called to this case, in order that such instructions may be given to their police authorities as may prevent the possibility of the repetition of similar proceedings." 6 Parry, British Digest of International Law 480–481 (1965). In Blair's case, involving the forcible removal of a British subject from the United States, the Law Officers in 1876 did not challenge the validity of jurisdiction so acquired as a matter of law, but questioned it as a matter of policy. Id. at 482–483. The same approach was followed in South Africa in Abrahams v. Minister of Justice, 4 S. Afr. L.R. 542 (1963) (S. Afr.), and in Palestine during the British Mandate in Afounch v. Attorney General, 10 Ann. Dig. 327 (Sup. Ct. Palestine 1942). For the position of Belgium, see Geldof v. Meulemester and Stiffen, 31 I.L.R. 385 (Cass. 1961) (Belg.). For a comparative analysis, see Garcia-Mora, supra note 9.

For abduction to be unlawful under international law, the abductors must: (1) be public agents or other persons acting under color of law (not bona fide volunteers) of a state other than the one where the individual was present at the time of seizure, and (2) these agents must act without the consent of the state where the seizure takes place.[28] This definition is grounded in the notion that international law is designed to protect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of states by restricting impermissible state conduct. It does not, however, ensure the integrity of the rendition process when violated by individuals acting in their private capacity because private actions are left to national legislation and enforcement.

The "private volunteers" argument was presented at first in the Eichmann case, but it was established that those who seized Eichmann were operating as state actors for the Israeli government.[29] By contrast, in the Vincenti case, U.S. Department of Justice agents unlawfully seized a U.S. citizen in England. On complaint of Great Britain, Vincenti was released, and the United States apologized to Great Britain for the improper seizure, stating that the agents "acted in their own initiative and without the knowledge or approval of [the] government."[30] If the "private volunteers" argument is accepted, it would mean that states would only have to allow their agents to act as "private volunteers" to avoid the problem of unlawful abduction in the view of international law.

The question of connivance between officials may be classified as a form of abduction, but a distinction is drawn between these two techniques. Abduction only occurs when the state where the individual is present is not a party to the plot. Connivance, on the other hand, occurs when the agents of the two interested states act jointly under color of law. Abduction differs from other informal modes of surrender, particularly those authorized or approved by the respective states, because in those instances there is no violation of the sovereignty or territorial integrity of the state where the individual was present at the time of the seizure. Such a practice would, therefore, not disrupt relations between the respective states nor would it involve infringement of sovereignty. However, issues of human rights violations would remain. The existence of such cooperative undertakings by state agents, even though violative of international due process of law, evidences the cooperation and friendly relations of the respective states, except in cases when the action of agents of such states is based solely on their personal cooperation. There are no cases in legal or diplomatic records available to this writer that illustrate this latter type of practice. There are, however, numerous cases involving agents of neighboring states who seek to circumvent formal rendition processes by acting on their own. In such cases, however, the agents' conduct is known to their superiors and cannot be deemed wholly private. International legal doctrine as expressed in the majority of scholarly writings remains, however, opposed to these practices and to the application of the maxim mala captus bene detentus.[31]

In a European cause célèbre in 2003, Turkey sought the extradition of Abdullah Öcalan, a leader of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), a Kurdish separatist group. As leader of the PKK, he was charged with committing several acts of violence that resulted in the death of a number of persons, leading a terrorist group, and trafficking in narcotics to finance the terrorist 28 See Cardozo, supra note 10. See also Dickinson, supra note 9; T. Sponsler, International Kidnappings, 5 Int'l L. 27 (1971); Note, The Effect of Illegal Abductions by Law Enforcement Officials on Personal Jurisdiction, 35 Md. L. Rev. 147 (1975).

29 D. Eisenberg, V. Dan & E. Landau, The Mossad 22–35 (1978).

30 Hackworth Digest, supra note 23, at 624. See also DeSchutter, supra note 13, at 88–124; O'Higgins, supra note 13.

31 DeSchutter, supra note 13; O'Higgins, supra note 13. For a comparative view, see IX Congrès, Les Problèmes Actuels de L'Extradition, 39 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pènal 375 (1968); Eleni Sakellar, Acquisition of Jurisdiction over Criminal Defendants by Forcible Abduction: Strict Adherence to Ker-Frisbie Frustrates United States Foreign Policy & Obligations, 2 ASILS Int'l L.J. 1 (1978). The authors cited in the notes above and in Secs. 1 and 2 are all critical of the practice.

organization. Because the PKK has adherents in a number of European countries, Öcalan escaped to Italy where he sought refuge. After his flight to Italy, Germany sought his extradition, as did Turkey; however, Germany did not pursue the request for fear that his return to Germany would provoke acts of terrorism and violence by members of the PKK. Italy sought to negotiate a transfer of criminal proceedings under the European Convention on the Transfer of Proceedings in Criminal Matters[32] to another state that had ratified the Convention, but none accepted or qualified under the terms of the convention. In the meantime, Öcalan escaped to Kenya, where he was later kidnapped and transported to Turkey, where he was tried and convicted.[33]

As described below in Alvarez-Machain,[34] the U.S Department of Justice paid a bribe of $50,000 to Mexican drug officials to kidnap Dr. Alvarez-Machain and deliver him to U.S. DEA agents who were present at the scene and who subsequently brought him to the United States.[35] The U.S. Supreme Court majority took the preposterous position that because the United States–Mexico extradition treaty did not specifically prohibit such a form of rendition, that it was therefore valid. Later, the Court in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain denied Alvarez-Machain's claim for damages.[36] The two applicable laws are the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA)[37] and the Victim Torture Protection Act of 1991 (VTPA).[38] Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled in Mohamed v. Palestinian Authority that the VTPA did not apply to organizations,[39] and in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum that the ATCA only applied to cases in the United States or on the high seas.[40] All cases involving "extraordinary 32 European Convention on the Transfer of Proceedings in Criminal Matters, March 30, 1978, CETS No. 073, 1137 U.N.T.S 17825.

---

33 His case was reviewed by the ECHR, but the conviction was upheld. Öcalan v. Turkey, Chamber Judgment, App. No. 46221/99 (Mar. 12, 2003).

34 See infra Sec. 6.

35 Alvarez-Machain v. United States, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).

36 Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004).

37 Alien Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1994).

38 Victim Torture Protection Act of 1991, 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1991).

39 Mohamed v. Palestinian Auth., 566 U. S. ____ (2012).

40 In Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. et al., 2013 WL 162893, the Supreme Court held that Congress alone may decide whether U.S. legislation is to be applied extraterritorially. Although the case did not address the powers of the president, it would logically follow that the executive branch, acting within the proper scope of its constitutional authority, may also engage in extraterritorial conduct that could be justiciable. The Court in Kiobel also distinguished between a cause of action that has extraterritorial effect and the statutory merit basis for the exercise of jurisdiction. The Kiobel case addressed the Judiciary Act of 1789 and reviewed its evolution, particularly focusing on Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 124 S. Ct. 2739 (2004). The Court in Sosa recognized that the ATS is a jurisdictional statute that provides for U.S. jurisdiction by recognizing private claims under federal common law for violations arising under international law. Sosa, however, emphasized that such violations should be "specific, universal, and obligatory"; id. at 732. The Supreme Court in Kiobel also addressed the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, and also the Genocide Accountability Act of 2007, 18 U.S.C. § 1090(e), which provides jurisdiction in the United States for the offense of genocide, irrespective of where the offense was committed if the alleged offender is present in the United States. The Kiobel judgment, in a very clear manner, reaffirms the principle of territoriality of U.S. laws. In short, the judgment makes clear that territoriality is not only the general rule, but the presumption of U.S. laws. That presumption can of course be rebutted by a showing that Congress intended the law in question to be extraterritorial. This would apply in such cases where statutory language is not clear and unambiguous about the jurisdictional scope and application of the said law. Thus, extraterritorial application of U.S. laws in terms of the merits is not excluded by Kiobel. Extraterritorial jurisdiction is also not excluded provided there is a legislative basis for the cause of action.

In Kiobel, the Supreme Court emphasized the historic context of the adoption of the Judiciary Act of 1789, more particularly on what would constitute a violation of international law at the time, relying on Blackstone's identification of what international law meant by universal jurisdiction. The Court stated

> We explained in Sosa that when Congress passed the ATS, "three principal offenses against the law of nations" had been identified by Blackstone: violation of safe conducts, infringement of the rights of ambassadors, and piracy. 542 U.S., at 723, 724; see 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 68 (1769). The first two offenses have no necessary extraterritorial application. Indeed, Blackstone—in describing them—did so in terms of conduct occurring within the forum nation. See ibid. (describing the right of safe conducts for those "who are here"); 1 id., at 251 (1765) (explaining that safe conducts grant a member of one society "a right to intrude into another"); id., at 245–248 (recognizing the king's power to "receiv[e] ambassadors at home" and detailing their rights in the state "wherein they are appointed to reside"); see also E. De Vattel, Law of Nations 465 (J. Chitty et al. transl. and ed. 1883) ("[O]n his entering the country to which he is sent, and making himself known, [the ambassador] is under the protection of the law of nations . . . ").
>
> Two notorious episodes involving violations of the law of nations occurred in the United States shortly before passage of the ATS. Each concerned the rights of ambassadors, and each involved conduct within the Union. In 1784, a French adventurer verbally and physically assaulted Francis Barbe Marbois—the Secretary of the French Legion—in Philadelphia. The assault led the French Minister Plenipotentiary to lodge a formal protest with the Continental Congress and threaten to leave the country unless an adequate remedy were provided. Respublica v. De Longschamps, 1 Dall. 111, 1 L.Ed. 59 (O.T. Phila.1784); Sosa, supra, at 716–717, and n. 11. And in 1787, a New York constable entered the Dutch Ambassador's house and arrested one of his domestic servants. See Casto, The Federal Courts' Protective Jurisdiction over Torts Committed in Violation of the Law of Nations, 18 Conn. L.Rev. 467, 494 (1986). At the request of Secretary of Foreign Affairs John Jay, the Mayor of New York City arrested the constable in turn, but cautioned that because "neither Congress nor our [State] Legislature have yet passed any act respecting a breach of the privileges of Ambassadors," the extent of any available relief would depend on the common law. See Bradley, The Alien Tort Statute and Article III, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. 587, 641–642 (2002) (quoting 3 Dept. of State, The Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States of America 447 (1837)). The two cases in which the ATS was invoked shortly after its passage also concerned conduct within the territory of the United States. See Bolchos, 3 F. Cas. 810 (wrongful seizure of slaves from a vessel while in port in the United States); Moxon, 17 F. Cas. 942 (wrongful seizure in United States territorial waters).
>
> These prominent contemporary examples—immediately before and after passage of the ATS—provide no support for the proposition that Congress expected causes of action to be brought under the statute for violations of the law of nations occurring abroad.
>
> . . .
>
> Piracy typically occurs on the high seas, beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the United States or any other country. See 4 Blackstone, supra, at 72 ("The offence of piracy, by common law, consists of committing those acts of robbery and depredation upon the high seas, which, if committed upon land, would have amounted to felony there"). This Court has generally treated the high seas the same as foreign soil for purposes of the presumption against extraterritorial application. See, e.g., Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155, 173–174, 113 S.Ct. 2549, 125 L.Ed.2d 128 (1993) (declining to apply a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act to conduct occurring on the high seas); Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 440, 109 S.Ct. 683, 102 L.Ed.2d 818 (1989) (declining to apply a provision of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 to the high seas). Petitioners contend that because Congress surely intended the ATS to provide jurisdiction for actions against pirates, it necessarily anticipated the statute would apply to conduct occurring abroad.
>
> Applying U.S. law to pirates, however, does not typically impose the sovereign will of the United States onto conduct occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of another sovereign, and therefore carries less direct foreign policy consequences. Pirates were fair game wherever found, by any nation, because they generally did not operate within any jurisdiction. See 4 Blackstone, supra, at 71. We do not think that the existence of a cause of action against them is a sufficient basis for concluding that other causes of action under the ATS reach conduct that does occur within the territory of another sovereign; pirates may well be a category unto themselves. See Morrison, 561 U.S., at —— (slip op., at 16) ("[W]hen a statute provides for some extraterritorial application, the presumption against extra-territoriality operates to limit that provision to its terms"); see also Microsoft Corp., 550 U.S., at 455–456.

rendition" against the United States and U.S. public officials have been dismissed or denied by U.S. courts.[41]

3. Comparative Jurisdictional Analysis of Unlawful Seizure Cases[42]

Unlawful seizure can be defined as occurring when officials of the state where the individual is present act with the connivance of agents of another state outside the framework of the applicable legal process to effectuate the surrender of the individual to the agents of another state. Cases of governmental connivance or connivance between agents acting in their official capacity are difficult to document, as they presuppose the complicity of those who could bring the matter to the attention of the judiciary.[43] The present view of the position of the

---

As stated by Justice Kennedy's concurring opinion, as well as those by Justices Breyer, Ginsburg, Kagan, and Sotomayor, Kiobel leaves open a number of significant questions that relate not only to the ATS, but also to the TVPA, as well as the evolving meaning of "international law." As stated by Justice Breyer

> The majority nonetheless tries to find a distinction between piracy at sea and similar cases on land. It writes, "Applying U.S. law to pirates…does not typically impose the sovereign will of the United States onto conduct occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of another sovereign and therefore carries less direct foreign policy consequences." Ante, at 10 (emphasis added). But, as I have just pointed out, "[a]pplying U.S. law to pirates" does typically involve applying our law to acts taking place within the jurisdiction of another sovereign. Nor can the majority's words "territorial jurisdiction" sensibly distinguish land from sea for purposes of isolating adverse foreign policy risks, as the Barbary Pirates, the War of 1812, the sinking of the Lusitania, and the Lockerbie bombing make all too clear.
>
> The majority also writes, "Pirates were fair game wherever found, by any nation, because they generally did not operate within any jurisdiction." Ibid. I very much agree that pirates were fair game "wherever found." Indeed, that is the point. That is why we asked, in Sosa, who are today's pirates? Certainly today's pirates include torturers and perpetrators of genocide. And today, like the pirates of old, they are "fair game" where they are found. Like those pirates, they are "common enemies of all mankind and all nations have an equal interest in their apprehension and punishment." 1 Restatement § 404 Reporters' Note 1, p. 256 (quoting In re Demjanjuk, 612 F.Supp. 544, 556 (N.D.Ohio 1985) (internal quotation marks omitted)). See Sosa, supra, at 732. And just as a nation that harbored pirates provoked the concern of other nations in past centuries, see infra, at 8, so harboring "common enemies of all mankind" provokes similar concerns today.
>
> Thus the Court's reasoning, as applied to the narrow class of cases that Sosa described, fails to provide significant support for the use of any presumption against extraterritoriality; rather, it suggests the contrary. See also ante, at 10 (conceding and citing cases showing that this Court has "generally treated the high seas the same as foreign soil for purposes of the presumption against extraterritorial application").

In the opinion of this writer, nothing in this decision should be interpreted as constituting a jurisdictional limitation to a party having a claim arising under international law, particularly when such a claim is also based on treaties ratified by the United States, which provide for extraterritorial jurisdiction, as stated in the concurring opinion.

41 See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009); El-Masri v. United States, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2007). Although the Fourth Circuit denied damages to El-Masri, his case proceeded before the European Court of Human Rights, which resulted in a finding by the Grand Chamber of several violations of the European Convention of Human Rights, including the prohibitions on torture, arbitrary detention, the duty to investigate, the right to the truth, and the right to an effective remedy. El-Masri v. The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, App. No. 39630/09 Eur. Ct. H.R. (2012). For an overview of the case, see Open Societies Institute, El-Masri v. Macedonia, available at: http://www.soros.org/initiatives/justice/litigation/macedonia.

42 See infra Sec. 6 for a detailed analysis of U.S. jurisprudence.

43 See Evans, supra note 14 (citing cases, mostly from diplomatic archives). See also Collier v. Vaccaro, 51 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1931); Ex parte Lopez, 6 F. Supp. 342 (S.D. Tex. 1934); Vaccaro v. Collier, 38 F.2d 862 (D.C. Md. 1930); Hackworth Digest, supra note 23, at 624.

individual in international law and in most states remains, however, that he/she cannot raise these issues before international or national courts (except for the right to individual petition before the European Commission on Human Rights, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, and the United Nations Human Rights Committee under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights).

The plea of unlawful seizure by connivance between officers of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and Mexican Security Police was advanced unsuccessfully in United States v. Sobell.[44] There the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, sustaining the jurisdiction of the District Court to try Sobell on espionage charges, stated:

> But it can hardly be maintained, still assuming the truth of appellant's charges, that the unlawful and unauthorized acts of the Mexican police acting in behalf of subordinate agents of the executive branch of the United States Government were any more acts of the United States than the unlawful and unauthorized acts of the emissary of the Chief Executive (in Ker). We think the question presented is indistinguishable from that before the Supreme Court in Ker, and that our decision here is controlled by that case.[45]

Many cases of unlawful seizure occur between neighboring states, in particular when the individual is a national of the state to whose agents he/she is delivered. Such occurrences have taken place between the United States and Canada, and the United States and Mexico.[46]

In United States v. Sobell,[47] U.S. public agents participated with Mexican public officials in the seizure of a U.S. citizen in a foreign country, whereas in Illinois v. Ker, it was a U.S. citizen acting under color of U.S. law who acted on his own in Peru. In Eichmann, Israeli agents pretending to act on their own seized the accused without the knowledge or connivance of Argentina.

In Ker[48] a private detective from the United States, while in Peru, received duly executed extradition papers from the U.S. government, conforming to the requirements of the extradition treaty between the United States and Peru. He failed to use them, however, because the legitimate government of Peru was disorganized as a result of the military occupation of the capital by Chilean forces, and was therefore inaccessible. The occupation forces assisted the U.S. officials in forcing Ker to board a U.S. vessel. At no time did Peru object to the proceedings. If Peru had protested, the question would have arisen whether the occupation by a foreign force had so deprived the Peruvian government of sovereignty over the place where Ker was found that it had no standing to object to police action by foreign authorities.

A similar situation enabled the U.S. government in 1946 to have Douglas Chandler seized in Germany by U.S. military forces and forcibly returned to the United States for trial on charges of treason.[49] The sovereignty of no government was offended by the action of foreign officers on its soil.

In the Sobell case the abducting party in Mexico was allegedly made up originally of Mexican officers. Sobell was carried, against his will, to the U.S. border and there turned over to U.S. authorities before being brought into the United States. He was then taken to New York, where he was tried and convicted for conspiracy to commit espionage. Sobell lost in his efforts to obtain release on various grounds, including a charge that the extradition treaty had been 44 United States v. Sobell, 142 F. Supp. 515 (S.D.N.Y. 1956), aff'd, 244 F.2d 520 (2d Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 873, reh'g denied, 355 U.S. 920 (1958). See also O'Higgins, supra note 13.

---

45 United States v. Sobell, 244 F.2d 520, 525 (2d Cir. 1957).

46 Evans, supra note 14.

47 United States v. Sobell, 142 F. Supp. 515 (S.D.N.Y. 1956).

48 Ker v. Illionois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886).

49 Chandler v. United States, 171 F.2d 921 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 918 (1949), reh'g denied, 336 U.S. 947 (1949).

violated. It seems clear that the collaboration of the Mexican police, like that of the French in the Savarkar case,[50] deprived Mexico of any basis for complaint, even if it had wanted to raise an objection.

Many years before, however, Mexico had protested vigorously against retention by the United States of Martinez, who was forcibly taken from Mexico to the United States by another Mexican. The latter was extradited to stand trial in Mexico for kidnapping, but the United States refused to release Martinez.[51]

The problems described above are not problems only felt in the United States, but also elsewhere in the world. Suffice it to recall that the case of Franco Freda in which the defendant was convicted in Italy for placing a bomb that killed a number of people in a public place. Pending the appeal, Freda fled to Costa Rica, where he was arrested without cause by the Costa Rican authorities, and put on board a plane where he was delivered into the hands of members of the Italian police authority, who took him back to Italy without any formal legal process.[52]

There is also the 1980 case of Lorenzo Bozano. After the French Court of Appeals of Limoges[53] denied Italy's request for Bozano's extradition, he was one day, by connivance among the Italian, French, and Swiss police, picked up in the streets of Grenoble by French police without any formal process, driven by car eleven kilometers to the Swiss border, and handed over to a Swiss police officer, who took him into custody. Bozano was jailed in Geneva and then surrendered to Italy. This rendition device was made necessary by the fact that France had denied Bozano's extradition on a technical basis, in that the defendant had been acquitted at the trial level but found guilty by the Court of Assizes on appeal, in absentia. As the procedure did not exist in France, there was lack of procedural reciprocity, and the French court found that Bozano was not extraditable. The Italian and the French police authorities agreed to have Bozano returned to Italy, but there was no legal way in to accomplish this. The conspiracy among the 50 Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkar, between France and Great Britain, 19 Scott, The Hague Court Reports 276 (1916), reprinted in 5 Am. J. Int'l L. 520 (1911).

---

51 1906 U.S. Foreign Relations 1121–1122. See Ex parte Lopez, 6 F. Supp. 342 (S.D. Tex. 1934) See also Charles G. Fenwick, Cases on International Law 420 (2d ed. 1951).

52 The seizure took place in August 1979, and he was delivered to Italian authorities on August 24, 1979. For lack of evidence, he was later found not guilty. The seizure was criticized in Rivista Italiana di Diritto e Procedura Penale 693 (1981).

53 Chambre de Mises en Accusation de la Cour D'Appel de Limoges Arret. No. 37, May 15, 1979. After his abduction into Switzerland, an action was brought before the Tribunal du Canton de Genève to challenge the validity of his detention, but was rejected on November 9, 1979. Bozano's counsel appealed the Swiss decision before the Tribunal Federal Suisse, which decided on June 13, 1980 that the extradition was valid. Another action was brought before the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris challenging his expulsion, but was rejected in the Ordonnance de Référé of January 14, 1980. However, the Tribunal Administratif de Limoges, in an Arret of December 23, 1981, annulled his expulsion. As Bozano remained incarcerated on the island of Elba, his counsel submitted the case to the European Commission on Human Rights on March 30, 1982. In 1982, the Commission held the complaint admissible (Decision No. 9990/82). The European Court of Human Rights on December 18, 1986, Decision 5/1985/91/138, held against France on grounds of violation of Article 5(1) (right to liberty and security of person) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. 9 E.H.R.R. 297 (Eur. Ct. H.R. 1986). In an earlier case, however, France had rejected the validity of jurisdiction by abduction in Re Jolis, (1933–34) Ann. Dig. 191 (no. 77) (Fr.). But in 1978, the French authorities delivered Klauss Croissant to Germany after he was ordered extraditable by the trial court before he could appeal. See Thomas E. Carbonneau, Extradition and Transnational Terrorism: A Comment on the Recent Extradition of Klaus Croissant from France to West Germany, 12 Int'l Law. 813 (1978). See also the case of Amekrane v. United Kingdom, 16 Y.B. Eur. Conv. on H.R. 356 (1973). In Amekrane, British authorities in Gibraltar delivered Colonel Amekrane, who fled from Morocco to Gibraltar, to Moroccan military authorities who took him to Morocco, sentenced him to death, and executed the sentence.

three police authorities resulted in the forcible expulsion of Bozano from France, his delivery to Swiss police authorities, and his subsequent extradition to Italy.

The third example is that of Camillo Caltagirone, who was charged by Italy with the crime of fraudulent bankruptcy. Caltagirone had become a permanent resident of the Dominican Republic and was in the process of applying for Dominican citizenship.[54] The Italian authorities, in collusion with Dominican police authorities, seized him and put him on board a plane destined for Spain. Once in Spain, by connivance with Spanish police authorities, the Italian authorities put him on another plane from Spain to Italy, where members of the Italian police took custody of him.

In a more recent case, a dual United States–Jordanian citizen was taken into custody in Jordan and handed over to U.S. authorities the next day.[55] He was then placed on an airplane and returned to the United States to face a recently filed indictment. The United States did not formally request extradition in this matter, and no Jordanian court was involved.[56] The only basis for his delivery to U.S. custody was the arrest warrant issued by the United States.[57] The individual attempted to challenge this conduct as violative of the 1995 United States–Jordan extradition treaty, but the court rejected this argument, reasoning that only Jordan had standing to raise an objection based on the extradition treaty (which it did not) and that as neither country invoked the treaty none of the treaty rights were available to the individual.[58] The court also relied on the Ker-Frisbie doctrine as providing personal jurisdiction over the individual in question.[59]

Interestingly enough, in these four cases, the judicial authorities were never involved, nor were they advised of the cases, nor did they have an opportunity to intervene. Cooperation in all of these cases was between different law enforcement authorities who avoided and evaded judicial and legal processes. These cases may point to a trend in extradition practices where police, in avoidance of the judicial authorities, work out their own arrangements to obtain rendition of individuals, regardless of what the respective legal systems require. This creates serious problems for the integrity of the legal process, even though it may be a manifestation of the frustration of law enforcement authorities with their inability to make the extradition system work with the speed and satisfaction they desire.

In some cases, however, all the organs of government, including the judiciary, may be working either in concert or with the same purpose of preserving jurisdiction over an abducted defendant. This situation appears in the case of Mordechai Vanunu, an Israeli technician who had given information to British newspapers about Israel's military nuclear capabilities. On October 5, 1986, the Sunday Times published these accounts, showing that Israel had secretly built up the world's sixth largest nuclear arsenal, a claim that the government of Israel has always denied. Vanunu vanished in London on or about September 30, 1986, and subsequently appeared in custody in Israel.[60] He was tried in Israel on charges of treason and espionage. At a hearing before the Jerusalem District Court on December 21, 1986, Vanunu raised the issue

---

54 The two other brothers, Gaetano and Francesco, had been duly requested by the Italian government and their case went before the Southern District of New York. See Caltagirone v. Grant, 629 F.2d 739 (2d Cir. 1980). The cases were dismissed four years later when the Italian Supreme Court reversed the decision of the lower bankruptcy court, which had found the two brothers guilty of the crime of fraudulent bankruptcy.

55 United States v. Amawi, 2008 U.S. Dist. Lexis 27628 (N.D. Ohio 2008).

56 Id. at *2.

57 Id. at *3.

58 Id. at *3–*6.

59 Id. at *7–*8.

60 The press reported that Vanunu had been lured from London by a female Mossad agent to Rome "where he was attacked by two men and held down while she injected him with a powerful anesthetic. He was chained and smuggled out of Italy in a cargo ship." Jeff Cohen & Norman Solomon, Jailed News Source Is Victim of "Free Press," Plain Dealer, May 29, 1993, at 6B.

of his kidnapping. The court dismissed this issue, and Vanunu was subsequently convicted of the charges and sentenced to eighteen years in prison.[61] Vanunu was tried and convicted even though it is quite clear that he was kidnapped by Israel's secret service, and the United Kingdom did not file a protest.[62]

It is important to point out here that the efforts of the members of the Council of Europe to develop a convention on European judicial and mutual cooperation in penal matters are ultimately directed toward securing not only easier extradition procedures, but also improved cooperation in penal matters—cooperation at the level of ministries of interior and, therefore, between law enforcement agencies.[63] It is quite likely that if such cooperation develops outside the control of a judicial system, abuses are likely to occur. If such cooperation is subject to judicial control, experience leads one to believe that the temperateness of the legal and judicial process will have a salutary effect on the tendencies of law enforcement agencies to engage in expeditious practices that do not fit the minimum standards of fairness and justice found in a contemporary society.

In Kasi v. Angelone, Mir Aimal Kasi killed two CIA employees and injured three others in 1993. He was indicted in Virginia and for over four-and-a-half years was a fugitive. In 1997, he was kidnapped by FBI agents in a hotel in Pakistan. As described by the Fourth Circuit, > [h]e was hooded, shackled, and transported by vehicle and air to an undisclosed location where he was held in a jail-like facility. Two days later, Kasi was transported by military aircraft from Pakistan to Fairfax County, Virginia, still in the custody of FBI agents, and delivered to the Commonwealth of Virginia for prosecution. The place of Kasi's detention prior to his being returned to the United States, and the identities of any foreign persons involved in his capture and return, have not been disclosed due to security concerns.

>
> During the flight to the United States, Kasi signed a written waiver of his rights and gave an oral and written confession to the crimes to Agent Garrett.[64]

On the basis on the confession he made after being kidnapped, Kasi was convicted and sentenced to death. After his conviction, which was affirmed by the Virginia Supreme Court, he applied for certiorari, which was denied.[65] The Fourth Circuit affirmed the Ker-Frisbie position as confirmed in Alvarez-Machain:

> [u]nder this country's jurisprudence, it has long been held that a criminal defendant who has been abducted to the United States from a foreign nation with which the United States has an

---

61 Vanunu served his sentence in an Israeli prison in solitary confinement in a 6 by 10 foot cell. Samuel H. Day, Jr., Clemency for a Spy, Compassion for a Peacemaker, S.F. Examiner, Dec. 14, 1993, at A-OP. See also Peter Hounam, Israelis Pressed to Free Vanunu, Sunday Times, Sept. 26, 1993; Supreme Court Rejects Nuclear Spy's Petitions, Agence France Presse, Sept. 6, 1993. He was eventually released in 2004 after eighteen years' imprisonment, but significant restrictions were placed on his liberties. Greg Myre, Vanunu, Disdaining Israel, Is Freed to Chants vs. Cheers, N.Y. Times, Apr. 22, 2004, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2004/04/22/international/middleeast/22vanu.html.

62 Man Accused of Leaking Israeli Secrets to Be Jailed during Trial, United Press International, Dec. 22, 1986.

63 At first, there was the French initiative in the Council of Europe to develop a European judicial space. See Estradizione e Spacio Giuridico Europeo (Consiglio Superiore Della Magistratura, 1981); Christine Van den Wijngaert, L'Espace Judiciare Europén: Vers une Fissure au sein du Conseil de L' Europe, 6 Revue de Droit Pènal et de Criminologie 511 (1981). But this initiative was dropped. Then, two groups developed: one within the Council of Europe called the Pompidou Group to develop quiet intergovernmental cooperation in the area of drug trafficking; and the other within the European Economic Community enlarged to the United States and Canada called the Trevi Group to deal with terrorism. See Ekkehart Müller-Rappard, The European Response to International Terrorism, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 385 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988).

64 Kasi v. Angelone, 300 F.3d 487, 491 (4th Cir. 2002).

65 Id.

extradition treaty does not thereby acquire a defense to the jurisdiction of the courts within this country. See Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 444, 7 S.Ct. 225, 30 L.Ed. 421 (1886) (rejecting defendant's claim that he was illegally subjected to trial in Illinois where a person acting on behalf of the United States government, although armed with a warrant to effectuate the defendant's removal from Peru pursuant to the applicable extradition treaty between the countries, opted instead to forcibly abduct defendant and return him to the United States without Peruvian assistance); cf. Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522, 72 S.Ct. 509, 96 L.Ed. 541 (1952) (relying upon Ker to hold, in the context of a defendant's domestic abduction from the state of Illinois to the state of Michigan for trial, that the power of a court to try a defendant is not impaired by the fact that the defendant was brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a "forcible abduction"). As noted in Frisbie, the Supreme Court:

> has never departed from the rule announced in Ker v. Illinois, that the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a "forcible abduction." No persuasive reasons are now presented to justify overruling this line of cases. They rest on the sound basis that due process of law is satisfied when one present in court is convicted of crime after having been fairly apprized of the charges against him and after a fair trial in accordance with constitutional procedural safeguards. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires a court to permit a guilty person rightfully convicted to escape justice because he was brought to trial against his will. Id. at 522, 72 S.Ct. 509 (citation and footnote omitted); see also United States v. Porter, 909 F.2d 789, 791 (4th Cir.1990) (noting this circuit's adherence to the doctrine announced in Ker and Frisbie to reject criminal defendants' challenge to their involuntary removal from the Philippines and return to the United States for trial); United States v. Wilson, 721 F.2d 967, 972 (4th Cir.1983) (rejecting criminal defendant's challenge to district court's jurisdiction on the grounds that he was "tricked" by the lies of an acquaintance working for the government into leaving Libya (where he was safely a fugitive from justice) and traveling to the Dominican Republic, where he was seized by United States agents and returned to the United States for trial).

In United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 7 S.Ct. 234, 30 L.Ed. 425 (1886), however, the Supreme Court interpreted an extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and held that a criminal defendant who had been returned to the United States from a foreign nation by virtue of extradition proceedings under an extradition treaty could only be tried for offenses charged in the extradition request, "until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings." Id. at 430, 7 S.Ct. 234.

In United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992), the Court addressed a similar, but slightly different situation from that presented in Ker, and reconciled its holdings in Ker and Rauscher. Specifically, unlike in Ker, agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") were directly involved in the forcible abduction of a physician suspected of aiding the torture and ultimate murder of an undercover DEA agent operating in Mexico, and in effectuating the physician's removal from Mexico and return to the United States for trial on the charges. The Mexican government protested the action as a violation of the extradition treaty in effect between the United States and Mexico. See id. at 657, 112 S.Ct. 2188.

On appeal, the United States Supreme Court rejected the defendant's claim that the treaty prohibited the United States government from forcibly abducting a fugitive within the borders of Mexico. Specifically, the Court noted that the express language of the treaty "d[id] not purport to specify the only way in which one country may gain custody of a national of the other country for the purposes of prosecution," id. at 664, 112 S.Ct. 2188," and "d[id] not support the proposition that the Treaty prohibits abductions outside of its terms," id. at 666, 112 S.Ct. 2188. The Court also refused to imply a term, based upon international practice and precedent, that would "prohibit[] prosecution where the defendant's presence is obtained by means other than those established by the Treaty." Id. The Court's willingness to imply a term prohibiting the trial and conviction of an extradited defendant for a crime not specified in the extradition > request in Rauscher was distinguishable, the Court held, because such a term was justified by the express requirement that evidence establishing probable cause of the crime be presented before extradition was required. See Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 669, 112 S.Ct. 2188.

>
> In sum, although the terms of an extradition treaty might limit a court's ability to prosecute a defendant who has been returned to the United States by virtue of the treaty in certain circumstances, the Court has plainly held that an extradition treaty does not divest courts of jurisdiction over a defendant who has been abducted from another country where the terms of the extradition treaty do not prohibit such forcible abduction. See Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 670, 112 S.Ct. 2188; United States v. Noriega, 117 F.3d 1206, 1213 (11th Cir.1997) ("Under Alvarez-Machain, to prevail on an extradition treaty claim, a defendant must demonstrate by reference to the express language of a treaty and/or the established practice thereunder, that the United States affirmatively agreed not to seize foreign nationals from the territory of its treaty partner.").[66]

The Fourth Circuit followed the Supreme Court's tortured reasoning in Alvarez-Machain that because the treaty does not include a prohibition against kidnapping that jurisdiction obtained by kidnapping is valid.[67] The court also took the position that absent a protest by the state from which the kidnapping took place the person does not have standing to challenge the kidnapping, relying on United States v. Verdugo.[68] The Fourth Circuit, without giving any reason, rejected the proposition that Kasi should be repatriated to Pakistan and that the United States should seek extradition pursuant to the treaty with that country. In short, the Fourth Circuit's interpretation of Alvarez-Machain is that unless an extradition treaty governs forced abductions abroad, nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States (at present) control that issue. Thus, the Fourth Circuit legalized abductions abroad by U.S. agents of anyone who is not a U.S. citizen. Considering that Kasi had killed two CIA agents and injured three more, it is not surprising that the courts in Virginia did not give much weight to the argument that his coerced confession after abduction was used to convict him. Probably because of the nature of the crime, it was unlikely that the Fourth Circuit would have given greater consideration to other constitutional arguments related to his abduction.

4. Extraordinary Rendition: The United States' New Kidnapping Techniques since September 11, 2001[69]

The very use of the term "extraordinary rendition" implies some legitimacy for a practice that is devoid of any. The United States practiced a form of rendition known as "rendition to justice," which had existed since the late 1980s. The process of "extraordinary rendition" was initiated in 1998 by the Clinton administration, and was dramatically modified after the events of 66 Id. at 493–495 (internal citations omitted).

---

67 United States v. Torres Garcia, 2007 U.S. Dist Lexis 29922 (D.C. Cir. 2007); United States v. Mejia, 448 F.3d 426, 443 (D.C. Cir. 2006). In these two cases that followed Alvarez-Machain, the courts followed the distinction between resort to processes outside extradition even when an extradition treaty exists, provided said treaty did not preclude other forms of rendition.

68 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990) (holding that the Fourth Amendment protecting against unreasonable searches and seizure does not apply extraterritorially to a nonresident alien and presumably to a non-U.S. citizen). With respect to the issue of standing to protest a violation of the rule of specialty, see Ch. VII, Sec. 6.

69 Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration, supra note 11; Sadat, supra note 12; Jordan Paust, The Absolute Prohibition of Torture and Necessary and Appropriate Sanctions, 43 Val. U. L. Rev. 1535 (2009); Christopher Hitchens, Believe Me, It's Torture, Vanity Fair, Aug. 2008; Steven Miles, Oath Betrayed: Torture Medical Complicity and the War on Terror (2006); George Annas, Human Rights Outlaws: Nuremberg, Geneva, and the Global War on Terror, 87 Boston U. L. Rev. 427 (2007); Stuart Grassin, Psychiatric Effects of Solitary Confinement, 22 Wash. U. J.L. Pol'y 325 (2006).

September 11, 2001.[70] Since September 11, 2001, the United States has blatantly engaged in illegal conduct under international law, attempting to use the cover of some legal ambiguity arising out of the practice of abduction, which as discussed above is unlawful.[71] It should be noted that many states, such as those bound by the ECHR and the ACHR, recognize the legality of kidnapping, as practiced by the U.S. practice and jurisprudence.[72]

The rationale for U.S. courts looking the other way in kidnapping cases has usually been either because the conduct was performed by non-U.S. officials or because it has been carried out on foreign territory. With respect to the latter, a number of cases have considered that if the extraterritorial conduct of U.S. officials is "egregious,"[73] then the U.S. courts may not wish to recognize the jurisdictional validity of the kidnapped person.

Recent practice has taken this situation to a new level of illegality or questionable legality by having CIA officials either acting by themselves or with their foreign counterparts, completely outside either U.S. or foreign law. In one reported case in Italy, CIA agents and their Italian counterparts have already been the subject of an indictment.[74] The object in these cases is not only unlawful seizure (kidnapping in domestic laws), but also an intent to commit an international crime, such as torture. This case is due to the personal courage, integrity

---

70 Under this practice, CIA or FBI personnel apprehended individuals in states unable to prosecute them due to civil war or other similar circumstances with the intention of transferring them to states interested in and capable of prosecuting them. See generally Jillian Button, Spirited Away (Into a Legal Black Hole?): The Challenge of Invoking State Responsibility for Extraordinary Rendition, 19 Fla. J. Int'l L. 531, 537 (2007). Under the Clinton administration, the process of extraordinary rendition was similarly designed to transfer individuals to states where they were wanted for trial or detention. There were several limitations on this process, including

> . . . an "outstanding legal process" against the suspect (usually consisting of a conviction connected to terrorist-related offenses in a foreign state); the creation of a CIA profile; the review and approval of the rendition by senior government officials, including the CIA's legal counsel; the existence of states willing to assist in the apprehension and incarceration of the suspect; and diplomatic assurances that the suspect would be treated in accordance with applicable national laws.

*See*Lucien L. Dhooge, The Political Question Doctrine and Corporate Complicity in Extraordinary Rendition, 21 Temp. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 311, 314–315 (2007) (approximately seventy terrorism suspects were returned to foreign jurisdictions under this method prior to September 11, 2001). See also Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration, supra note 11; Sadat, supra note 12.

71 For a reverse of "extraordinary rendition"—when individuals connected with terrorism are returned from other states to the United States, seeAppendix D: Extraditions and Renditions of Terrorists to the United States, 1993–1999, http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/10306.pdf for the following individuals: Mahmoud Abu Halima (extradited March 1983); Mohammed Ali Rezaq (rendition from Nigeria July 1993); Ramzi Yousef (extradition from Pakistan Feb. 1995); Wali Khan Amin Shah (rendition Dec. 1995); Tsutomu Shirosaki (rendition Sept. 1996); Mir Aimal Kasi (rendition Kenya Aug. 1998); Mohamed Sadeek Odeh (rendition Kenya Aug. 1998); Mamdouh Mahmud Salim (extradition Germany Dec. 1998); Khalfan Khamis Mohamed (rendition S. Africa Oct. 1999). See also Report on International Extradition submitted to the Congress Pursuant to Section 211 of the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001 (Pub. L. 106-113).

72 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 971 F.2d 310 (9th Cir. 1992.), cert. granted, 502 U.S. 1024 (1992); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952); Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886).

73 See United States v. Toscanino, 500 F. 2d. 267 (2d. Cir. 1972), reh'g denied 504 F.2d 1380 (1974), on remand 398 F. Supp. 916 (1975).

74 See Bruce Zagaris, Extradition—Italian Justice Minister Defers Extradition of CIA Operatives, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. (2006); John Crewdson, CIA Targeted "More than 10" in Italy for Kidnap, Agent Says, Chic. Trib,, July 31, 2006; Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Council of Europe, Alleged Secret Detentions in Council of Europe Member States, Information Memorandum II, Jan. 22, 2006.

and determination of a Milano-based investigative judge, Armando Spataro.[75] Judge Spataro's indictment and request for extradition have been buried in the Ministry of Italy, which has not even publicly confirmed that it forwarded the extradition request for the U.S. agents to the United States. The United States has, however, announced, without any legal basis, and without submitting the Italian request to a U.S. court (assuming a request was formally filed by Italy) pursuant to the extradition treaty with Italy,[76] and to U.S. law, Title 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181–3196, that the individuals will not be extradited. The indictment in question was against twenty-six Americans for the kidnapping of Sheikh Abu Omar, an Egyptian cleric who was abducted from Milan and sent to Egypt where he was tortured.[77] Among the indictees were the CIA station chiefs in Milan and Rome, the first and two second secretaries at the U.S. embassy in Rome, and a lieutenant-colonel in charge of security at Aviano Air Base.[78] Italy convicted twenty-three of the twenty-six indicted Americans in absentia,[79] acquitting three on the grounds that they enjoyed diplomatic immunity.[80] The U.S. Department of Defense responded that the Italian judiciary lacked jurisdiction over the matter and insisted that the case against the lieutenant-colonel implicated in the kidnapping be transferred to the United States; the CIA did not respond.[81] These individuals will have to be apprehended by European officials or extradited by the United States upon a formal request from Italy.[82] In September 2012 the Italian Court of Cassation upheld the convictions of the CIA officers.[83]

The Abu Omar case was the first prosecution for such unlawful seizures. No government has yet brought an action against another government before the ICJ for a breach of "state responsibility" under international law in the context of extraordinary rendition. In Ahmad & Aswat v. United States the United Kingdom considered, in the context of a U.S. extradition request for alleged "terrorists," whether the prospect of a relator being subjected to extraordinary rendition upon his surrender to the United States was sufficient grounds to deny the U.S. extradition request.[84]

---

75 Armando Spataro, Ne Valeva la Pena: Storie di Terrorismi e Mafie, di Segreti di Stato e di Giustizia Offesa (2010).

76 Extradition Treaty between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Italy, Sept. 24, 1984, 1590 U.N.T.S. 27835.

77 Under Title 18, there is no general extraterritorial criminal provision and the principle of nationality in respect to criminal jurisdiction does not exist except with respect to some limited provisions such as treason, espionage, and tax evasion. This legal stratagem is akin to that of the corporate veil in business law. However, jurisprudence in corporate criminal responsibility has established that the corporate veil cannot be used to conceal conspiracies and crimes. Id. See also Zagaris, supra note 74, at 135–136 (2007) (noting a "growing European willingness to seek accountability for the aggressive U.S. policy of abducting suspected terrorists on foreign soil, interrogating them at secret locations in a third country, and surrendering them to foreign intelligence agencies with deplorable human rights records.")

78 "FACTBOX: Italy convicts 23 Americans in CIA rendition case," Reuters, Nov. 4, 2009, available at http://www.reuters.com/article/2009/11/04/us-italy-renditions-verdict-factbox-idUSTRE5A352H20091104.

79 Erik Sapin, Italy Convicts 23 Americans for Alleged Rendition of Terrorism Suspect, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 11–14 (2010).

80 Reuters, supra note 78.

81 Id.

82 Id.

83 Ian Shapira, Italy's High Court Upholds Convictions of 23 Americans in Abu Omar Rendition, Wash. Post, Sept. 19, 2012; Elisabetta Povoledo, High Court in Italy Backs Convictions for Rendition, N.Y. Times, Sept. 19, 2012.

84 See Ahmad & Aswat v. United States, [2006] EWHC 2927.

A further extension of extraordinary rendition is the CIA "black sites," or secret prisons, which have been operating in Europe.[85] The CIA may have operated over twenty European sites, at which individuals were unlawfully held and tortured and/or delivered to countries where they were tortured, including Jordan, Egypt, Morocco, and Syria.[86] Through this and other methods, individuals have been transferred for detention in countries that are known for torturing their prisoners.[87] This practice was condemned by the Council of Europe, but no U.S. court has condemned it even in the more benign context of ATCA and VTPA cases, which as stated above have all been dismissed or denied.[88]

Notwithstanding some attempts by U.S. courts, particularly the Second Circuit in the 1970s in Toscanino v. United States,[89] to limit the application of male captus bene detentus, the Supreme Court validated the doctrine in Alvarez-Machain.[90] Even though it could be argued that a court should not look into how a person was brought within its jurisdiction in criminal cases, this is not at all the case in civil matters, where the relevant argument is related to the degree to which a given judicial system adheres to the Rule of Law. Regrettably the international Rule of Law has not received much deference let alone application in the United States in recent years. While the Second Circuit in Toscanino sought to limit the Ker-Frisbie doctrine discussed above, it adopted language to the effect that if the government agents' conduct "shocks the conscious,"[91] the court should divest itself of jurisdiction as a matter of constitutionality in that such conduct constitutes an "[. . .] unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights."[92] In contrast, the Fifth Circuit in Postal held that a defendant "cannot rely upon a mere violation of international law as a defense to the court's jurisdiction."[93]

The Second and Fifth Circuit may not have anticipated the abhorrent and illegal practice carried out by the George W. Bush administration as of September 11, 2001, including the CIA's kidnapping of non-U.S. citizens abroad and either delivering them to other countries for purposes of torture or detaining them outside the United States for what the administration 85 For an in-depth discussion of the CIA's use of "black sites," see Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration, supra note 11, at 141–181; Leila N. Sadat, Ghost Prisoners and Black Sites: Extraordinary Rendition under International Law, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 309 (2006). See also David Weissbrodt & Amy Bergquist, Extraordinary Rendition: A Human Rights Analysis, 19 Harv. Hum. Rts. J. 123 (Spring 2006); Crewdson, supra note 74. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, 37 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L 389 (2006).

86 Jane Mayer, Outsourcing Torture: The Secret History of America's "Extraordinary Rendition" Program, New Yorker, Feb. 14, 2005, available at http://www.newyorker.com/archive/2005/02/14/050214fa_fact6#ixzz1uChTS9QS.

87 Human Rights Watch, "The United States' 'Disappeared,' The CIA's Long-Term 'Ghost Detainees'" (October 2004). Poland and Romania are mentioned.

88 See Council of Europe, Resolution 1433 (2005), on the Lawfulness of Detentions by the United States in Guantanamo Bay. See also Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Council of Europe, Alleged Secret Detentions in Council of Europe Member States, Information Memorandum II, Jan. 22, 2006; Human Rights Watch, "The United States' 'Disappeared,' The CIA's Long-Term 'Ghost Detainees'" (Oct. 2004), available at http://www.hrw.org/backgrounder/usa/us1004/.

89 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d. Cir.), reh'g denied 504 F.2d 1280 (1974), on remand 398 F. Supp. 916 (1975).

90 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).

91 Toscanino, 500 F.2d at 273.

92 Id. at 275.

93 Postal v. United States, 589 F.2d 862, 884 (5th Cir. 1979).

euphemistically calls "Enhanced Interrogation Techniques"—to quote Shakespeare, "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet."[94]

In addition, a U.S. citizen may be kidnapped by U.S. agents or illegally arrested by U.S. agents and transferred to the authorities of another state, where he or she may be tortured—a practice known as "extraordinary rendition." Kidnapping outside the United States by U.S. agents for "Enhanced Interrogation Techniques" or for extraordinary rendition to another state where there is a likelihood such person will be tortured is in violation of the 1984 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), which the United States has ratified and passed implementing legislation under the Torture Victims Protection Act (TVPA). Such conduct by U.S. agents abroad will still constitute a crime under U.S. law pursuant to Title 18 U.S.C., even if the U.S. agents do not themselves engage in torture, as the agents know or have reasonable grounds to believe that the kidnapped or surrendered individual will or is likely to be tortured. This is specially prohibited by Article 3 of the CAT, which prohibits extradition of a person to a country where there are substantial grounds to believe he or she will be tortured. As stated by this writer:

> CIA personnel have been engaged in interrogations in Guantanamo Bay, Iraq (Abu Ghraib and other detention facilities), and Afghanistan (Bagram, Kandahar, and other free-fire bases). A legalistic interpretation of U.S. law would be that they are not subject to the [Uniform Code of Military Justice], although they accompanied U.S. military forces and operated on U.S. bases. However, under the PATRIOT Act, Federal criminal law applies to U.S. bases abroad and to actions by U.S. citizens abroad. Violations of the CAT also apply to acts committed outside the territorial jurisdiction of the U.S.
>
> Another artful technique employed by the CIA is the resort to euphemistically termed the practice of "extraordinary rendition." This apparently means the kidnapping, sequestration, and transfer of non-U.S. nationals and their physical delivery to governments whose secret services engage in the torture of these individuals in order to obtain information of interest to the CIA. Like the techniques described above, this one is intended to take advantage of the jurisdictional loopholes in Title 18 criminal violations by selecting victims who are not U.S. citizens, kidnapping them outside the territory of the U.S., and delivering them to yet another state. Moreover, by not directly involving any U.S. official in the torture, plausible deniability is advanced by the CIA. If it is possible to establish a connection in terms of knowledge or reasonable foreseeability between the CIA agents who deliver such victims to foreign government agents and the subsequent torture by these governments, then clearly these CIA agents have committed an international crime under the CAT and can be prosecuted under this convention in any country that can exercise jurisdiction over them. They could also be prosecuted under the [Uniform Code of Military Justice]. As early as 1994, Congress, pursuant to the CAT, criminalized torture even when committed outside the territory of the United States. How the government lawyers . . . were able to simply argue that the Guantanamo Bay Naval Station is under Cuban sovereignty and therefore outside the jurisdiction of the U.S. was at best a fantastic argument, particularly when the position of the U.S. for years has been that Cuba does not have sovereignty over that base, so long as the U.S. occupies it.[95]

The George W. Bush administration used the ambiguity in extradition cases as well as jurisdictional cases involving the applicability of Title 18 U.S.C. and Supreme Court and Circuit Court cases limiting the applicability of the U.S. Constitution beyond its territorial boundaries in carrying out its extraordinary rendition scheme. This practice, as well as

---

94 See Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration, supra note 11, at 52–73; Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, supra note 85. See also Sadat, supra note 85; Weissbrodt & Bergquist, supra note 85.

95 Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, supra note 85, at 411–412.

how the administration looks at international treaty obligations, the U.S. Constitution, and U.S. laws, is a good measure of how much deference it gave the Rule of Law, both under its U.S. conception and as conceived internationally. A sounder interpretation is that the U.S. Constitution applies to U.S. agents whenever the relevant provisions constitute a limitation on what officials of the U.S. government can do. It would not make sense to say that such a rule stops at the boundaries of the United States. If that were the case, then a U.S. agent on board a vessel or an aircraft, could, the moment the vessel or aircraft is outside the territorial waters or airspace, do what is otherwise prohibited by the Constitution. As stated by Prof. Leila Sadat:

> Sometimes countries, not just the United States, arrest an individual present within their territories and transport him abroad for the purpose of interrogation. In the U.S. case, were the individual a U.S. citizen, such an arrest and transfer would be presumptively illegal, although there is some evidence that it has occurred. Whatever confusion may exist in the jurisprudence of the U.S. Supreme Court as to the extraterritorial application of U.S. Constitutional law, one hopes that we are not yet at the point at which it can seriously be argued that a U.S. citizen present in the United State would not receive the protections of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the Constitution to be "secure in their persons" and receive "due process of law" if deprived of his or her liberty through government action. [citations omitted] Even to the extent the government has asserted the power to detain U.S. citizens without charges as part of the [Global War on Terrorism], detention is not tantamount to exile, and the extralegal rendition of a U.S. citizen to a foreign government for interrogation is a power that even the government has not asserted. [citation omitted]."[96]

In the Verdugo case the Supreme Court, confirming a Ninth Circuit decision, held that constitutional limitations are applicable only to U.S. citizens, thus excluding U.S. citizens abroad and noncitizens abroad when the unlawful action is performed by U.S. agents, and thus excluding constitutional limitations on U.S. agents acting outside the United States. The constitutional policy upholding the Rule of Law can therefore be suspended by merely crossing U.S. state boundaries, as discussed below in Section 6.[97]

5. Extraterritorial Application of the U.S. Constitution in U.S. Jurisprudence

The abduction and unlawful seizure of persons abroad raises constitutional issues. The basic question in this regard is whether the Constitution has extraterritorial effect. The Supreme Court considered in Reid v. Covert[98] which specific provisions of the Constitution apply extraterritorially, and to whom.[99] So far, the Supreme Court has not extended, in the same manner as it did in Reid, the guarantees of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments extraterritorially. The question is still recurring, however. The Fifth Circuit, in Escobedo v. United States,[100] rejected an argument raised by this writer that evidence secured by torture in Mexico 96 Sadat, supra note 85; Weissbrodt & Bergquist, supra note 85.

97 Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, supra note 85; Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, supra note 11.

98 Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957).

99 See Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Reach of the Bill of Rights beyond the Terra Firma of the United States, 20 Va. J. Int'l L. 741 (1980); Paul B. Stephan, Constitutional Limits on International Rendition of Criminal Suspects, 20 Va. J. Int'l L. 777 (1980). See also Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950); Bruce Bryan, Note, The Constitutional Rights of Nonresident Aliens Prosecuted in the United States, 3 Fordham Int'l L.J. 221 (1980) (discussing the contacts an alien must have with the United States to entitle him to benefit from U.S. constitutional rights).

100 Escobedo v. United States, 623 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1980).

should be barred in the United States, but this was before the United States ratified the CAT in 1984.[101]

The Second Circuit, in Rosado v. Civiletti,[102] which preceded the U.S. ratification of the CAT, acknowledged that the petitioners, U.S. citizens arrested and convicted in Mexico, "have demonstrated that their convictions, under the laws of the sovereign state of Mexico, manifested a shocking insensitivity to their dignity as human beings and were obtained under a criminal process devoid of even a scintilla of rudimentary fairness and decency."[103] Nevertheless, the Second Circuit, for policy reasons, did not follow its factual finding to its logical conclusion, and refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus freeing the petitioners who had elected to be transferred from Mexico to serve their Mexican sentences in the United States under the United States–Mexico Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences. In Rosado the Second Circuit stated:

> Indeed, because the statutory procedures governing transfers of these prisoners to United States custody are carefully structured to ensure that each of them voluntarily and intelligently agreed to forego his right to challenge the validity of his Mexican conviction, and because we must not ignore the interests of those citizens still imprisoned abroad, we hold that the present petitioners are estopped from receiving the relief they now seek.[104]

The Escobedo and Rosado cases evidence two different policies. The first reflects the rule of non-inquiry,[105] which though respectful of a foreign sovereign, is not entirely without inquiry.[106] The second reflects a purposeful "no-see" policy in order not to undo the workings of transfer-of-prisoner treaties. But as stated above, both cases were prior to the CAT. Whether U.S. courts will rely on that convention and U.S. implementing legislation,[107] or erode these positions, is as yet unknown. Issues pertaining to the Fourth Amendment are different, and cases have held that its reach extends extraterritorially with respect to the conduct of a U.S. agent against a U.S. citizen.[108] It does not apply to the conduct of a private citizen of the United States or a foreign agent against a citizen of the United States.[109] In addition, the 102 Rosado v. Civiletti, 621 F.2d 1179 (2d Cir. 1980). See also United States v. Fernandez-Morris, 99 F. Supp. 2d 1358 (S.D. Fla. 1999); Jordan Paust, The Unconstitutional Detention of Prisoners by the United States, Under the Exchange of Prisoners Treaties, in International Aspects of Criminal Law 204 (Richard B. Lillich ed., 1981); Abraham Abramovsky, A Critical Evaluation of the American Transfer of Penal Sanctions Policy, 61 Wis. L. Rev. 25 (1980); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Perspectives on the Transfer of Prisoners between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada, 11 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 249 (1978); 2 International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d ed. 2007).

---

101 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, G.A. res. 39/46, [annex, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984)], art. 3.

103 Id.

104 Id.

105 See Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

106 See Ch. VII. Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1960) (which opened the door for a possible humanitarian exception, but that was never pursued by the Second Circuit or any other Circuit).

107 Torture Victims Protection Act 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (2000); 18 U.S.C. § 2340 (2000).

108 The Constitution applies to all actions taken abroad by the U.S. government against its citizens. Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 5 (1957). In Reid, the Court stated, "The United States is entirely a creature of the Constitution. Its power and authority have no other source. It can only act in accordance with all the limitations imposed by the Constitution." Id. at 6.

109 Stonehill v. United States, 405 F.2d 738, 743 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 960 (1969) (holding Fourth Amendment does not apply to conduct by foreign officials). The Fourth Amendment is only directed at the U.S. government, not foreign governments. The exclusion from U.S. courts of evidence obtained by foreign officials through searches that violate the Fourth Amendment would not deter

Fourth Amendment does not extend extraterritorially to the conduct of a U.S. agent against a non-U.S. citizen unless the acts are egregious enough to fall within the exception set out in United States v. Toscanino.[110] If an abduction abroad results in the seizure of evidence, the Fourth Amendment applies to conduct against a U.S. citizen by a U.S. agent or to that of a foreign agent acting under the direction of a U.S. agent.[111] Thus, evidence collected in this manner would be inadmissible in U.S. courts.[112]

The Fourth Amendment, unless there is specific legislation,[113] does not apply to conduct by a U.S. agent against an alien, or by a foreign agent against a U.S. citizen, if the conduct does not fall such conduct by those officials. Brulay v. United States, 383 F.2d 345, 348 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 986 (1967). See generally Jordan Paust, Constitutional Limitations on Extraterritorial Federal Power: Persons, Property, Due Process and the Seizure of Evidence Abroad, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 449 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds,, 1987); Saltzburg, supra note 99.

---

110 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267. In Toscanino, the defendant, an Italian citizen, was convicted of conspiracy to import and distribute narcotics. He appealed, alleging that he had been forcibly abducted from Uruguay, where he resided, by foreign officials who were paid by the U.S. government. In addition, he alleged that after his capture, he had been taken to Brazil, where he was tortured by Brazilian authorities under the direction of U.S. agents, and that he was eventually drugged and put on a commercial flight to the United States. He was arrested on the aircraft when it landed. The district court relied on the Ker-Frisbie rule, refusing to conduct any inquiry into the means by which he had been brought to the United States, to convict him. The Second Circuit held that Toscanino was at least entitled to a hearing on his claims, stating "[W]e view due process as now requiring a court to divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant where it has been acquired as the result of the government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights." Id. at 275.

111 In United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, No. 86-0107-JLI-Crim. Amended Memorandum and Order of Feb. 18, 1987, the court stated:

> In the context of a warrantless search, conducted by United States military personnel, of a United States citizen's apartment in post-war occupied Austria, the First Circuit discussed a relevant hypothetical: For present purposes we assume, and we think it is probably so, that the protection of the Fourth Amendment extends to United States citizens in foreign countries under occupation by our armed forces. [citations omitted] . . . . For example, suppose A, a citizen of the United States, goes to Germany to take employment in a civilian capacity under the High Commissioner. He is suspected of having previously transported stolen goods in interstate commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. Section 2314. Agents of the F.B.I. without any search warrant, break into A's dwelling in Germany, ransack the place, find and seize the alleged stolen goods. Upon a subsequent prosecution of A in the United States for that offense, it can hardly be doubted that the evidence so obtained would be excluded as the product of a search and seizure forbidden by the Fourth Amendment. And this would be so, even though no judicial officer had been authorized to act on an application for a warrant. Obviously, Congress may not nullify the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment by the simple expedient of not empowering any judicial officer to act on an application for a warrant. If the search is one which would otherwise be unreasonable, and hence in violation of the Fourth Amendment, without the sanction of a search warrant, then in such a case, for lack of a warrant, no search could lawfully be made.

See United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341, 1360 (9th Cir. 1991). United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990). See also Best v. United States, 184 F.2d 131, 138 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 340 U.S. 939 (1951). In Best, the court ultimately held that the Fourth Amendment permitted the warrantless search, given the drastic circumstances of the immediate postwar military occupation of Austria. Id. at 138–141. The initial example discussed by the Best court, however, remains relevant to foreign searches conducted in the absence of a state of war, and has been cited with approval by the Second Circuit. United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 at 280.

112 Toscanino, 500 F.2d at 276.

113 E.g., the Uniform Code of Military Justice, Title 10 U.S.C.

within the Toscanino exception.[114] The U.S. Supreme Court made this clear in 1990 in the case of United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez.[115] In that matter, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to U.S. agents' search and seizure of property owned by an alien and located in a foreign country.[116] Chief Justice William Rehnquist, writing for the Court, stated that the purpose of the Fourth Amendment was to "protect the people of the United States against arbitrary action by their own Government, and not to restrain the Federal Government's actions against aliens outside United States territory. Nor is there any indication that the Amendment was understood by the Framers' contemporaries to apply to United States activities directed against aliens in foreign territory or in international waters."[117] Rehnquist continued that the effect of the Court's extension of protections to noncitizens outside the United States as sought by Verdugo-Urquidez, "would have significant and deleterious consequences for the United States in conducting activities beyond its boundaries."[118] All told, the Fourth Amendment's protections of noncitizens only applies to those who "come within the territory of the United States and develop[] significant connections."[119] The issue in Verdugo-Urquidez arose out of Mexican Federal Judicial Police and DEA agents' search of Verdugo-Urquidez's homes in Mexico and seizure of certain documents found there.

At the district court, Verdugo-Urquidez moved to suppress evidence seized during the searches of his Mexican homes. The court granted his motion, holding that the Fourth Amendment applied and that the DEA failed to justify the warrantless searches.[120] The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.[121] The appellate court concluded that "[t]he Constitution imposes substantive constraints on the federal government, even when it operates abroad."[122] The dissent, however, argued that the Fourth Amendment does not apply extraterritorially to aliens as it is expressly limited to "the people" of the United States.[123]

The Supreme Court found the reasoning of the dissent persuasive and noted that while the protections of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments extend to "person," some amendments specifically apply

---

114 Id. at 275. Permitting the use of evidence illegally seized abroad by a foreign agent or a private citizen to obtain a conviction in the United States is similar to the "silver platter" doctrine that developed in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Wolf v. Colorado, in which the Court held that the exclusionary rule did not apply to the states under the Fourteenth Amendment. As a result, evidence illegally obtained by federal agents, which would be excluded in a federal prosecution, could be passed to state officials "on a silver platter" for use in a state prosecution. 338 U.S. 25 (1949), overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

115 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990). See also United States v. Vilches-Navarette, 523 F. 3d 1, at *13 (1st Cir. 2008), cert denied (noting that Vilches is a Chilean citizen who is a nonresident of the United States, was apprehended in international waters, and had no substantial connections to the United States, and that accordingly the Fourth Amendment does not apply).

116 Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S.at 261. See also Abramovsky, supra note 9; Gibney, supra note 9; Emmanuel Kijo Bentil, Note, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez: The U.S. Supreme Court's Effort to Halt the Trade in Illegal Drugs, 15 N.C. J. Int'l L. & Com. Reg. 511 (1990).

117 Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 266–267.

118 Id. at 273–274.

119 Id. at 271.

120 Id. at 259.

121 Id. The Ninth Circuit also discussed the need of a foreign state to protest claims of kidnapping of its nationals. See United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341, 1360 (9th Cir. 1991).

122 Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S.at 259 (citations omitted).

123 Id. at 264.

to "the people" of the United States.[124] The Court, while recognizing the limits of this argument, nonetheless said that:

> [w]hile this textual exegis is by no means conclusive, it suggests that "the people" protected by the Fourth Amendment, and by the First and Second Amendments, and to whom rights and powers are reserved in the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, refers to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this country to be considered part of that community.[125]

The Court also noted that there is "no indication that the Fourth Amendment was understood by contemporaries of the Framers to apply to activities of the United States directed against aliens in foreign territory or in international waters."[126] Because Verdugo-Urquidez was not of "a class of persons who are part of a national community," but rather "a citizen and resident of Mexico with no voluntary attachment to the United States, and the place searched was located in Mexico . . . the Fourth Amendment has no application."[127] After Verdugo-Urquidez, there is no question as to the inapplicability of the Fourth Amendment protections to aliens abroad.

In these cases, however, the Fifth Amendment guarantee of due process does apply.[128] Due process under the Fourteenth Amendment has been held to require the exclusion of evidence obtained by the government in a manner that "shocks the conscience."[129] In addition, a U.S. court, under its inherent supervisory powers, could exclude evidence as violative of public policy because of the manner in which it was obtained.[130] Such general due process violations are reflected in the egregious conduct standard set out in Toscanino.[131]

In the event an indictment has been returned in the United States against an individual, whether a U.S. citizen or not, a given court in the United States would have jurisdiction. In such cases, the Fourth Amendment applies, as do the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Consequently, if a U.S. agent goes abroad to unlawfully seize, or procure the seizure of, a person or evidence, such conduct would violate Rule 41 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. In such a case, the court should exercise its inherent powers of supervision to suppress evidence illegally obtained.[132]

---

124 Id. at 265.

125 Id. (emphasis added).

126 Id. at 267.

127 Id. at 274–275.

128 Id

129 Id.

130 The supervisory power of the courts to exclude evidence in order to maintain civilized standards in the administration of criminal justice was set out in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643.

131 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974) For a Second Circuit opinion not finding the kinds of violations in Toscanino, see United States v. Romano, 706 F.2d 370, 373–375 (2d Cir. 1983).

132 The inherent power theory was used in Berlin Democratic Club v. Rumsfeld, 410 F. Supp. 144 (D.D.C. 1976). The plaintiffs were a group of U.S. citizens living in West Germany, who claimed in their suit that U.S. military personnel had conducted warrantless electronic surveillance of their political meetings and other activities. The defendants argued that the clause was inapplicable overseas because there was no U.S. magistrate authorized to issue an overseas warrant. The court acknowledged that Rule 41(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure restricts the power of a magistrate to warrants that authorize the seizure of persons or property within his district, but stated:

> Rule 41(a) cannot limit or restrict the dictates of the Constitution to the United States . . . particularly when the Supreme Court has held those dictates applicable overseas.

Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957). The court's authority over federal officials is sufficient to require an official to present for approval in the United States a warrant for a wiretap overseas. Berlin Democratic Nevertheless, the suppression of evidence would not invalidate the criminal jurisdiction of the court over the defendant brought before it, though illegally, under the Ker-Frisbie rule as affirmed by Alvarez-Machain.[133] It is amazing that U.S. courts, which in the 1960s emphasized repeatedly the importance of adhering to the Rule of Law as part of constitutional doctrine and textual doctrine, have so easily jettisoned that foundational American legal value-oriented approach. This has been interpreted as having been caused by the influence of political considerations on judges, a public attitudinal shift away from the previously recognized value-oriented approach to the Rule of Law in the American legal system, a more insular American approach to the international Rule of Law, and American exceptionalism in international matters.

6. Abduction and Other Forms of Unlawful Seizure in the Jurisprudence of the United States[134]

As stated above, the jurisprudence of the United States has traditionally upheld the validity of in personam jurisdiction even when secured through extralegal methods, including abduction by government agents. The two landmark U.S. Supreme Court cases that U.S. courts rely on are Ker v. Illinois,[135] decided in 1886, and Frisbie v. Collins,[136] decided in 1952. These cases established the doctrine that criminal jurisdiction is not impaired by the illegality of the method by which the court acquires in personam jurisdiction over the relator. These two landmark cases were confirmed by the Supreme Court in Alvarez-Machain.[137] There have been a number of circuit court cases addressing the issues raised by these three cases, as well as related

---

Club v. Rumsfeld, 410 F. Supp. at 160. See also United States v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063, 1099 (5th Cir. 1980) (en banc) (concurring opinion).

133 See supra Sec. 4 (discussing the Ker-Frisbie doctrine). At first glance, the Ker-Frisbie rule appears similar to the rule of non-inquiry (see Ch. VII, Sec. 8). Under the rule of non-inquiry, a U.S. court may not inquire into (1) the manner in which a requesting state secures evidence sufficient to establish "probable cause" in order to make an extradition request of the United States; (2) the processes by which a foreign criminal conviction is obtained; or (3) the treatment to which the relator may be subject upon extradition to the requesting state. Both doctrines limit the extraterritorial application of the Constitution. However, the rule of non-inquiry is distinguishable on one essential basis: it does not subject an individual to criminal conviction by a U.S. court. Thus, even if unconstitutional acts have occurred prior to a foreign state's extradition request, or even if such acts may occur after the relator has been extradited, the criminal justice processes and standards of the United States have not been perverted by these acts. Failure to exclude evidence seized abroad in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and failure to release a defendant who has been forcibly abducted, allows complete disregard for the basic standards of fairness and decency that underlie the U.S. Constitution. The Ker-Frisbie rule has been used in Congress as a justification for the abduction abroad by the United States of suspected terrorists. In introducing the Terrorist Prosecution Act of 1985, S. 1429, Senator Arlen Specter, its sponsor, stated:

> In many cases, the terrorist murderer will be extradited or seized with the cooperation of the government in whose jurisdiction he or she is found. Yet, if the terrorist is hiding in a country like Lebanon, where the government, such as it is, is powerless to aid in his removal, or in Libya [sic], where the Government is unwilling, we must be willing to apprehend these criminals ourselves and bring them back for trial. We have the ability to do that right now, under existing law. Under current constitutional doctrine, both U.S. citizens and foreign nationals can be seized and brought to trial in the United States without violating due process of law.

S. 1429, 99th Cong., 1st Sess., 131 Cong. Rec. S9431 (daily ed. July 11, 1985). For the text of the Terrorist Prosecution Act, see id.

134 See supra Sec. 4 for non-U.S. cases.

135 Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886).

136 Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952).

137 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992).

issues. The practices of "extraordinary rendition" may be the catalyst for a re-examination of the jurisprudence whose description follows.

In Ker, the defendant, while residing in Peru, was indicted by an Illinois grand jury for larceny and embezzlement. At the request of the governor of Illinois, the president, invoking the current treaty of extradition between the United States and Peru, issued a warrant authorizing a Pinkerton agent to take custody of Ker from Peruvian authorities.[138] The agent, however, never served the warrant, probably because by the time he had arrived there the armed forces of Chile, then at war with Peru, were in control of Lima. Instead of using the extradition process, the agent forcibly abducted Ker, placed him aboard an American vessel, and took him to the United States. Ker was subsequently tried and convicted in Illinois. The Supreme Court rejected Ker's argument that he was entitled, by virtue of the treaty with Peru, to a right of asylum there, and held that the abduction of Ker did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, then less than twenty years old, which the Court construed as requiring merely that the accused be regularly indicted and brought to trial "according to the forms and modes prescribed for such trials."[139] The Court accordingly held that Illinois validly tried Ker, regardless of the method by which it acquired control over him.

In Frisbie a Michigan state prisoner, petitioning for habeas corpus, alleged that he had been brought from Illinois to Michigan for trial only after he had been kidnapped, handcuffed, and blackjacked in Chicago by Michigan police officers who had gone there to retrieve him.[140] The prisoner claimed that his conviction in Michigan violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as the Federal Kidnapping Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1201, and was, therefore, a nullity.[141] Relying upon Ker, the Court rejected the prisoner's due process claim. Thus, under the so-called Ker-Frisbie doctrine, due process is limited to the guarantee of a constitutionally fair trial, regardless of the method by which jurisdiction was obtained over the relator.

Since Ker and Frisbie, the first major decision on unlawful seizure was rendered by the Second Circuit in United States v. Toscanino.[142] In this 1974 decision, the court held that the Ker-Frisbie doctrine is subject to the overriding principle that, where agents of the United States are directly involved in the seizure of a person outside the jurisdiction of the United States by means involving a serious violation of due process standards, no advantage may be taken by such a denial of the individual's constitutional rights. The court in Toscanino held that a federal court must "divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant where it had been acquired as the result of the government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights."[143]

In the Toscanino case the defendant, Francisco Toscanino, and four others were charged with conspiracy to import narcotics into the United States. In his appeal from the narcotics conviction entered against him in the Eastern District of New York, Toscanino contended that the court acquired jurisdiction over him unlawfully through the conduct of U.S. agents, who 138 Pinkerton is a private security company, which at one time had a monopoly in the United States on ferrying currency and gold from various locations.

139 Ker, 119 U.S. at 440.

140 Frisbie, 342 U.S. 519.

141 Id.

142 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974). See Note, International Abduction of Criminal Defendants: Overreaching by the Long Arm of the Law, 47 U. Colo. L. Rev. 489 (1976); Fred C. Pedersen, Note, International Criminal Law: Due Process Rights of Foreign National Defendants Abducted from Native Country by Federal Agents, 7 U. Tol. L. Rev. 723 (1976).

143 Toscanino, 500 F.2d at 275.

kidnapped him in Uruguay, used electronic surveillance, tortured him, and abducted him to the United States for purposes of prosecuting him.[144]

Toscanino claimed that he was lured from his home in Montevideo, Uruguay, by a phone call made by a member of the Montevideo police, acting as a paid agent of the U.S. government, to a deserted bowling alley. There he was abducted by seven members of the Montevideo police force. He was knocked unconscious, bound, blindfolded, thrown into a car, and driven to the Brazilian border by a circuitous route. With the connivance of the U.S. government, a group of Brazilians met the car and took custody of Toscanino. Toscanino further claimed the he was incessantly tortured and interrogated for seventeen days. Throughout this entire period the U.S. government and the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York prosecuting the case were aware of Toscanino's interrogation and did, in fact, receive reports of its progress. The defendant was held incommunicado and his requests to consult with his family were denied. Finally, Toscanino was brought to Rio de Janeiro, where he was drugged by Brazilian and U.S. agents and placed on a flight to the United States in the custody of U.S. agents.[145]

In Toscanino, the court said in dicta that the Ker-Frisbie doctrine cannot be reconciled with subsequent Supreme Court decisions expanding the concept of due process protecting the accused against pretrial illegality, which denies the government the fruits of its exploitation of any deliberate and unlawful activities on its part.[146]

After Toscanino, in 1975 the Second Circuit in United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler[147] limited Toscanino by reaffirming the Ker-Frisbie doctrine. The court held that for a federal court to divest itself of jurisdiction, the U.S. agent's conduct (outside the United States and which results in the person's presence in the United States) must be "conduct of the most outrageous and reprehensible kind," which results in the denial of due process.[148] The court, however, found that the government's conduct in Lujan did not reach the level proscribed by Toscanino.

In Lujan, the defendant and eight others were indicted by a grand jury of the Eastern District of New York and charged with conspiracy to import and distribute a large quantity of heroin in the United States. An arrest warrant had been issued for the defendant. However, Lujan alleged that the arrest warrant had been enforced in an unconventional manner. Lujan, a licensed pilot, was hired in Argentina by an individual named Duran to fly him to Bolivia. Although Duran represented that he had business to transact there with American interests in Bolivian mines, he in fact had been hired by American agents to lure Lujan to Bolivia. When Lujan landed in Bolivia on October 26, 1973, he was promptly taken into custody by Bolivian police, who were not acting at the direction of their superiors or their government, but as paid agents of the United States. Lujan was not permitted to communicate with the Argentine embassy, an attorney, or any member of his family.

On the following day the Bolivian police, commanded by police major Guido Lopez, took Lujan from Santa Cruz to La Paz, where he was held until November 1, 1973. On that date, Lieutenant Terrazas and other Bolivian police officers, acting together with U.S. agents, brought Lujan to the airport and placed him on a plane bound for New York. Upon his arrival

---

144 Id. at 268.

145 Id. at 270.

146 Id. at 275. It is essential to note that most of the cases discussed here deal with mistreatment and forcible abductions perpetrated by or with the acquiescence of representatives of the U.S. government and not by private individuals. In Toscanino, for instance, the court stated that upon remand the defendant would be required to establish "that the action was taken by or at the direction of United States officials." Id. at 281. See also Abraham Abramovsky & Steven J. Eagle, U.S. Policy in Apprehending Alleged Offenders Abroad: Extradition, Abduction, or Irregular Rendition, 57 Or. L. Rev. 51 (1977).

147 United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001 (1975).

148 Id. at 65.

at Kennedy Airport in New York, Lujan was formally arrested by U.S. federal agents. At no time prior to arriving in the United States had Lujan been formally charged by the Bolivian police, nor had the United States requested his extradition.[149]

The court in Lujan recognized that Ker and Frisbie no longer provided carte blanche to government agents bringing defendants from abroad to the United States by the use of torture, brutality, and similar outrageous conduct, but it also suggested that not every irregularity in the circumstances of the defendant's arrival in the jurisdiction would vitiate the subsequent legal proceedings. The court found that the arrest in Lujan may have been unconventional, but not of the kind that would afford sufficient grounds for challenging the jurisdiction of the court.[150] The conduct proscribed by Toscanino and Lujan is the "deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights" at the hands of U.S. agents.

Essentially, Toscanino stands for the proposition that although the U.S. Constitution does not protect U.S. citizens from the abuses of process by a foreign government or its agents, it nonetheless may have an extraterritorial effect in that it constitutes a limitation on certain actions of U.S. agents acting abroad under color of legal authority.[151] This means that if a U.S. agent participates in the abduction or use of force against an individual outside the territory of the United States in serious violation of certain aspects of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments, the protections of due process apply to such violations. Under such an application of due process, the court seeks to uphold the integrity of the judicial system by refusing to take legal cognizance of certain acts committed outside the United States, if those acts are done by U.S. agents in violation of U.S. constitutional protections, which acts are then sought to be given legal effect and cognizance in a U.S. court. However, the court did not extend this rule to cases where U.S. agents are not directly involved in the commission of such violations, even if they were present during their occurrence.

In 1975, in United States v. Lira,[152] the Second Circuit held that in the absence of any direct evidence of gross misconduct on the part of U.S. agents, the court's jurisdiction was not impaired by the forcible abduction of a defendant-relator, even following torture by agents of a foreign state. The defendant, Lira, convicted on a narcotics charge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, claimed that, after being arrested at the home of his common law wife in Santiago by Chilean police officials, he was blindfolded, beaten, and tortured over a period lasting nearly four weeks by Chilean officials allegedly acting for U.S. agents. Finally, the defendant was placed aboard a plane headed for New York and was arrested on arrival.

In the discussion of the facts, the court stated that the U.S. government's conduct did not reach the level proscribed by Toscanino.[153] In the Lira case, the court did not discuss the policy question of deterrence against unlawful behavior by U.S. public officials abroad, nor did it reaffirm its earlier position of the need to protect the integrity of the judicial process from conduct that constitutes a serious violation of minimum standards of due process.

Toscanino has also been distinguished by the District of Columbia, as well as the First, Second, Fourth, Sixth, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits, and was rejected by the Fifth, Seventh, and Eleventh Circuits.[154]

---

149 Id. at 63.

150 Id. at 65.

151 See infra Sec. 5 (discussing extraterritorial application of the U.S. Constitution).

152 United States v. Lira, 515 F.2d 68 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 847 (1975).

153 Id. at 70.

154 United States v. Mitchell, 957 F.2d 465 (7th Cir. 1992); United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 971 F.2d 310 (9th Cir. 1992); United States v. Matta, 937 F.2d 567 (11th Cir. 1991); United States v. Pelaez, 930 F.2d 520 (6th Cir. 1991); United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991); United States v. Porter, 909 F.2d 789 (4th Cir. 1990); Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255; United States v. Rosenthal, 793

The United States' position thus remains linked to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, which has been followed rather consistently,[155] albeit with some erosion.

F.2d 1214 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 919 (1987); United States v. Wilson, 732 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1099 (1984); United States v. Darby, 744 F.2d 1508 (11th Cir), reh'g denied, en banc, 794 F.2d 733 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1100 (1985); United States v. Wilson, 721 F.2d 967 (4th Cir. 1983); David v. Attorney General of the United States, 699 F.2d 411 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 832 (1983); United States v. Cordero, 668 F.2d 32 (1st Cir. 1981); Davis v. Muellar, 643 F.2d 521 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 892 (1981); United States v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1981); United States v. Fielding, 645 F.2d 719 (9th Cir. 1981); Weddell v. Meierhenry, 636 F.2d 211 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 941 (1981); United States v. Fielding, 630 F.2d 1357 (9th Cir. 1980); United States v. Valot, 625 F.2d 308 (9th Cir. 1980); United States v. Sorren, 605 F.2d 1211 (1st Cir. 1979); United States v. Lopez, 542 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1976); United States v. Lara, 539 F.2d 495 (5th Cir. 1976); United States v. Marzano, 537 F.2d 257 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1038 (1977); United States v. Quesada, 512 F.2d 1043 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 946 (1975); United States v. Winter, 509 F.2d 975 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 825 (1975); United States v. Lovato, 520 F.2d 1270 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 985 (1975); United States v. Lira, 515 F.2d 68 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 847 (1975); United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001 (1975).

155 Adhering to the Ker-Frisbie rule, federal courts have generally assumed jurisdiction over an abducted defendant. See United States v. Cadena, 585 F.2d 1252 (5th Cir.), overruled in part by United States v. Michelena-Orovio, 719 F.2d 738 (5th Cir. 1983); Mastrian v. McManus, 554 F.2d 813 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 433 U.S. 913 (1977); United States v. Yanagita, 552 F.2d 940 (2d Cir. 1977); United States v. Lovato, 520 F.2d 1270 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 985 (1975); United States v. Lira, 515 F.2d 68 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 847 (1975); United States v. Quesada, 512 F.2d 1043 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 946 (1975); United States v. Winter, 509 F.2d 975 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 825 (1975); United States v. Herrera, 504 F.2d 859 (5th Cir. 1974); United States v. Cotten, 471 F.2d 744 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 936 (1973); United States v. Vicars, 467 F.2d 452 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 967 (1973); United States ex rel. Calhoun v. Twomey, 454 F.2d 326 (7th Cir. 1971); Bacon v. United States, 449 F.2d 933 (9th Cir. 1971); United States v. Sherwood, 435 F.2d 867 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 909 (1971); United States v. Zammiello, 432 F.2d 72 (9th Cir. 1970); Charron v. United States, 412 F.2d 657 (9th Cir. 1969); United States v. Sobell, 244 F.2d 520 (2d Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 873 (1957), reh'g denied, 355 U.S. 920 (1958); Wentz v. United States, 244 F.2d 172 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 806 (1957); Chandler v. United States, 171 F.2d 921 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 918 (1949); Robinson v. United States, 144 F.2d 392 (6th Cir.), aff'd, 324 U.S. 282 (1945), reh'g denied, 325 U.S. 895 (1945), reh'g denied, 326 U.S. 807 (1945), reh'g denied, 328 U.S. 878 (1946), reh'g denied, 356 U.S. 978 (1958); United States ex rel. Voight v. Toombs, 67 F.2d 744 (5th Cir.), cert. dismissed, 291 U.S. 686 (1934); Ex parte Lamar, 274 F. 160 (2d Cir.), aff'd, 260 U.S. 711 (1923); In re David, 390 F. Supp. 521 (E.D. Ill. 1975); United States v. Marzano, 388 F. Supp. 906 (N.D. Ill.), aff'd, 537 F.2d 257 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1038 (1977); Snedeker v. United States, 54 F. Supp. 539 (M.D. Pa. 1944). See generally Herbert B. Chermside, Jr., Annotation, Jurisdiction of Federal Court to Try Criminal Defendant Who Alleges That He Was Brought within United States Jurisdiction Illegally or aAs a Result of Fraud or Mistake, 28 A.L.R. 685 (1976). State courts have almost unanimously followed the Ker-Frisbie rule. See Glasgow v. State, 469 P.2d 682 (Alaska 1970); People v. Leary, 40 Cal. App. 3d 527, 115 Cal. Rptr. 85 (1974); In re Walters, 15 Cal. 3d 738, 543 P.2d 607, 126 Cal. Rptr. 239 (1975); People v. Bradford, 70 Cal. 2d 333, 450 P.2d 46, 74 Cal. Rptr. 726 (1969), cert. denied, 399 U.S. 911 (1970); Brown v. District Court, 571 P.2d 1091 (Colo. 1977); DeBaca v. Trujillo, 167 Colo. 311, 447 P.2d 533 (1968); State v. Segovia, 93 Idaho 594, 468 P.2d 660 (1970); Herman v. Brewer, 193 N.W.2d 540 (Iowa 1972); State v. Smith, 209 Kan. 664, 498 P.2d 78 (1972); Bruffett v. State, 205 Kan. 863, 472 P.2d 206, cert. denied, 400 U.S. 1010 (1971); State v. Millican, 84 N.M. 256, 501 P.2d 1076 (N.M. Ct. App. 1972); People v. Walls, 35 N.Y.2d 419, 321 N.E.2d 875, 363 N.Y.S.2d 82, cert. denied, 421 U.S. 951 (1975); State v. Fox, 250 Ore. 83, 439 P.2d 1009 (1968); Commonwealth v. Bishop, 425 Pa. 175, 228 A.2d 661, cert. denied, 389 U.S. 875 (1967); Berry v. State, 4 Tenn. Crim. App. 592, 474 S.W.2d 668 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1971); Ex parte Burge, 409 S.W.2d 403 (Tex. Crim. App. 1966); State v. Blanchey, 75 Wash. 2d 926, 454 P.2d 841, cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1045 (1970); Brooks v. Boles, 151 W. Va. 576, 153 S.E.2d 526 (1967). See generally Annotation, 165 A.L.R. 947 (1946).

United States v. Cordero[156] involved the seizure of a number of defendants in Panama at the behest of U.S. agents. The defendants were subsequently sent to Venezuela and then to the United States for prosecution. The First Circuit decided the issue of unlawful seizure in that case as follows:

> Appellants' preliminary claim is that the circumstances surrounding their arrest and transport to Puerto Rico deprived the federal district court of jurisdiction to try them. Appellants primarily rely upon what is known as the Toscanino exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine.
>
> As we pointed out when Sorren's case was previously before us, United States v. Sorren, 605 F.2d 1211, 1215-16 n.5 (1st Cir. 1979), ("Sorren I," seeking mandamus), "under the so-called Ker-Frisbie doctrine, the forcible abduction of a criminal defendant into the court's jurisdiction does not impair the court's power to try him." See Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 7 S.Ct. 225, 30 L.Ed. 421 (1886); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 72 S.Ct. 509, 96 L.Ed. 541 (1952). The vitality of this doctrine, which is widely applied throughout the world, has recently been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court. United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463, 474, 100 S.Ct. 1244, 1251-52, 63 L.Ed.2d 537 (1980); Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 96 S.Ct. 3037, 49 L.Ed.2d 1067 (1976); Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 95 S. Ct. 854, 43 L.Ed.2d 54 (1975).
>
> The Toscanino exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine requires a court, in the name of due process, to divest itself of jurisdiction of the person of a criminal defendant "where it has been acquired as the result of the [U.S.] government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights." United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d. Cir. 1974). This exception, however, has been narrowly interpreted to cover only egregious cases. Thus, in Toscanino itself, "the 'unreasonable' invasion of . . . rights included beatings, denial of sleep for prolonged periods, fluids injected in his eyes and nose, and electric shocks administered to his ears, toes, and genitals." Sorren I, 605 F.2d at 1215–16 n.5. And, where less outrageous treatment was at issue, the courts have tended to apply Ker-Frisbie, not the exception. See, e.g., United States v. Lopez, 542 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1976) (abduction at "instigation" of United States but without direct United States involvement in torture insufficient to divest court of jurisdiction); United States v. Lara, 539 F.2d 495 (5th Cir. 1976) (no Toscanino violation where defendant failed to show direct United States involvement in torture; forcible abduction without more insufficient); United States v. Lira, 515 F.2d 68 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 847, 96 S. Ct. 87, 46 L.Ed.2d 69 (1975) (no Toscanino violation without showing direct United Stated involvement); United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001, 95 S. Ct. 2400, 44 L.Ed.2d 668 (1975) (seizure of defendant not in violation of treaty or against wishes of foreign government and no showing of "shocking" conduct by United States agents made Toscanino inapplicable.) Sorren I, 605 F.2d at 1216. See generally Henkin, International Law 477–78 (2d ed. 1980).
>
> After Sorren I and after the subsequent trial, the district court held a hearing outside the presence of the jury to determine the relevant Toscanino facts. We have reviewed the record of that hearing with care. It fails to show shocking circumstances or the type of U.S. Government involvement in those circumstances which might together bring the Toscanino exception into play. The record indicates that United States Drug Enforcement Administration agent Jimenez identified Sorren to several Panamanian officials at Sorren's hotel on May 8, 1979. Cordero was arrested by Panamanian authorities the next day at the Panama City airport. Cordero states that she saw Jimenez once again after she was arrested. Both appellants saw an American consul who visited them. Aside from this, however, there is no evidence linking American agents to the appellants' treatment. Indeed, when Sorren's counsel asked co-defendant Warren Turner whether he had seen or heard American agents while he was under arrest, Turner replied that he did not.
>
> More importantly, the record does not show the outrageous conduct involved in Toscanino. At worst, it shows poor treatment by Panamanian authorities and poor conditions in Panamanian 156 Cordero, 668 F.2d 32.

> jails. When Panamanian officials arrested Sorren, they insulted him, pushed him and slapped him. In jail, Sorren was poorly fed, he had to sleep on the floor and had to "huddle up in a corner" to avoid the splashing of urine coming from prisoners in other cells. The Panamanian arresting officers insulted Cordero. They also fed her badly while she was in jail. She had to sleep on the floor or in a chair. These conditions may be poor, unfortunate, hardly decent, but they are a far cry from deliberate torture, and they are beyond the control of American law enforcement authorities and American courts. Were American courts to seek to improve conditions in foreign jails by refusing to try those who are temporarily held there, the result would not be better jails, but the creation of safe havens in foreign lands for those fleeing the reach of American justice. Hence, the Toscanino exception does not apply here.
>
> Appellants seek to bolster their "lack of jurisdiction" claim by arguing that their arrests in Panama and subsequent return to Puerto Rico via Venezuela violated extradition treaties between the United States and those countries. See Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, Providing for the Extradition of Criminals, May 25, 1904, 34 Stat. 2851, T.S. No. 445; Extradition Treaty, January 19–21, 1922, United States of America–United States of Venezuela, 43 Stat. 1968, T.S. No. 675. The procedures used to return them to the United States were quite different from the extradition procedures referred to in these treaties. The short and conclusive answer to appellants' claim, however, is that nothing in these treaties suggests that the countries involved must follow the extradition procedures set out in the treaties when they return criminal defendants to the United States. Extradition treaties normally consist of commitments between governments to the effect that each will return those accused of certain crimes at request of the other. See H. Kelsen, Principles of International Law 373 (1952). Nothing in the treaty prevents a sovereign nation from deporting foreign nationals for other reasons and in other ways should it wish to do so.
>
> Moreover, insofar as relevant here, extradition treaties are made for the benefit of the governments concerned. See I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law 307 (2d ed. 1973); Kirkemo, An Introduction to International Law 31–32 (1974). But cf. Garcia-Mora, International Law and Asylum as a Human Right 30-51, 133–36 (1956). And under international law, it is the contracting foreign government, not the defendant, that would have the right to complain about a violation. United States v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896, 902 (2d Cir. 1981); United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62, at 67–68. The record here provides no basis for any inference that either Panama or Venezuela objected to the appellants' departure from their territories. To the contrary, it was Panamanian and Venezuelan authorities who deported them. Cf. 88 Harv. L. Rev. 813, 818–19 (1975)…To hold that extradition treaties forbid foreign nations to return criminal defendants except in accordance with the formal procedures they contain, would insofar as we are aware, represent a novel interpretation of those treaties. Under any such interpretation, extradition treaties would hinder, rather than help serve, the return of those accused of crimes within American jurisdiction. We therefore reject appellants' arguments.
>
> There is nothing in the circumstances present here that could make any such showing relevant to the result. See United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 702, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3104, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974); United States v. Lieberman, 608 F.2d 889, 904 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1019, 100 S.Ct. 673, 62 L.Ed.2d 649 (1980) (absent a showing of arbitrariness or lack of support on the record an appellate court should not disturb the trial court's determination as to the need for enforcing a subpoena duces tecum).[157]

This regrettable position of the court can only encourage disregard for extradition procedures, the resort to extrajudicial proceedings, and abuses by law enforcement officials.

---

157 Id. at 36–38 (internal footnotes omitted). See also United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991), 288 U.S. App. D.C. 129 (D.C. Cir. 1991); United States v. Yunis, 867 F.2d 617, 276 U.S. App. D.C. 1 (D.C.Cir. 1989); United States v. Yunis, 705 F. Supp. 33 (D.D.C. 1989); United States v. Yunis, 859 F.2d 953, 273 U.S. App. D.C. 290 (D.C. Cir. 1988); United States v. Zabaneh, 837 F.2d 1249 (5th Cir. 1988).

A notable case in which a foreign government vigorously protested unlawful seizure involved the kidnapping of Sidney Jaffe, a U.S. citizen, by two Florida bail-bondsmen for jumping bail in Florida. Canada then sought the extradition of Kear, one of the bondsmen, for the kidnapping of Jaffe. Kear filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to prevent his extradition to Canada. The petition for the writ of habeas corpus was denied and Kear was extradited to Canada.[158]

In 1982, the Seventh Circuit in David v. Attorney General[159] affirmed the traditional rule, and for all practical purposes distinguished the Toscanino case.[160] The court did not wish to apply the doctrine that it has supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice to deny the government the right to exploit its own illegal conduct, as expressed in Mapp v. Ohio[161] and Wong Sun v. United States.[162] This was recognized in Toscanino, even though the Seventh Circuit still considered it an open question in United States v. Marzano.[163] There is still some question in the United States as to the applicability of the exclusionary rule in extradition proceedings, although some decisions hold that it is inapplicable.[164]

On September 13, 1987, after luring Fawaz Yunis onto a yacht located in the eastern Mediterranean Sea with promises of a drug deal, FBI agents waited until the yacht sailed into international waters, and then handcuffed, shackled, and arrested Yunis on charges of conspiracy, hostage taking, aircraft damage, and air piracy.[165] Thereafter, Yunis was transferred onto a Navy vessel in which he was reported to have suffered severe sea sickness, and later developed swollen and bruised wrists from the use of handcuffs. Yunis, however, maintained the he was tortured by FBI agents who were on board the naval vessel. But neither the district court nor the court of appeals paid much attention to these facts. The court of appeals in United States v. Yunis, citing the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, upheld the legality of Yunis's abduction and stated: "the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a 'forcible abduction.' "[166] The court of appeals refused to apply the Toscanino[167] exception, stating that "[such] rule has, moreover, been limited to cases of torture, brutality, and similar outrageous conduct."[168] Even though the circumstances surrounding Yunis's arrest were not "a model for law enforcement behavior," the court of appeals refused to extend the Toscanino exception to the "discomfort and surprise" experienced by Yunis.[169]

It is important to note that this case differs from other abduction cases in that the seizure occurred on the high seas, and thus it did not violate any state's sovereignty. As the seizure was on the high seas, where no state can claim sovereignty, it can be argued that the seizure was not 158 Kear v. Hilton, 699 F.2d 181 (4th Cir. 1983). See also State Territory and Territorial Jurisdiction, 78 Am. J. Int'l L. 207 (1984) (discussing request by Attorney General and secretary of state for early parole of Sidney Jaffe, whose abduction from Canada had strained U.S.–Canada relations); Buser, supra note 9.

---

159 David v. Attorney General, 699 F.2d 411 (7th Cir. 1983). This case involved the torture and drugging of David, and his illegal detention abroad by U.S. agents.

160 United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974). See also Gary W. Schons, United States v. Toscanino: An Assault on the Ker-Frisbie Rule, 12 San Diego L. Rev. 865 (1975).

161 Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

162 Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963).

163 United States v. Marzano, 537 F.2d 257.

164 See Simmons v. Braun, 627 F.2d 635 (2d Cir. 1980).

165 United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086 (C.A.D.C. 199)

166 Id.

167 Id.

168 Id. at 1093 (quoting United States ex. rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62, 65 (2d Cir. 1975); 421 U.S. 1001, 95 S.Ct. 2400, 44 L.Ed 2d 668 (1975)).

169 Yunis, 924 F.2d at 1093.

in the nature of an abduction because the arrest was lawful. As to luring Yunis out on the high seas, it is hard to argue that the greedy expectation of a drug deal, even though false, can be deemed a sufficient breach to undermine the validity of the arrest. The only serious question that arises in this writer's mind is the allegation of torture of Yunis, or at least of his physical mistreatment. Those who were accused of such acts should have been investigated by the FBI's Office of Professional Standards.

In 1990, the Seventh Circuit declared that "Toscanino, at least as far as it creates an exclusionary rule, no longer retains vitality" and became the latest circuit to reject the Toscanino exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine.[170] In the case of Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman,[171] the petitioner Juan Ramon Matta-Ballesteros petitioned the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals for habeas corpus relief. Matta-Ballesteros alleged that U.S. agents kidnapped him from his home in Honduras and tortured him before transporting him to the United States to face trial on criminal charges.[172] Matta-Ballesteros's treatment by and at the direction of the U.S. agents following his seizure was similar to that of Toscanino. Matta-Ballesteros alleged that when on April 5, 1988, he arrived at his home in Honduras, he was surrounded by armed members of the Honduran Special Troops or "Cobras," who were accompanied by at least four U.S. marshals. He was arrested and handcuffed, allegedly at the direction of the U.S. marshals. A black hood was placed over his head and he was pushed onto the floor of a car driven by the U.S. marshals.

> A United States Marshal immediately drove him to a United States Air Force base approximately an hour-and-a-half away. During the ride, Matta claims that he was severely beaten and burned with a "stun gun" at the direction of the United States Marshals. Once he arrived at the airport, Matta was flown to the United States. He claims that during this flight, he was once again beaten and shocked about the body, including on his testicles and feet, again by United States Marshals.
>
> Upon his arrival in the United States, Matta was immediately transferred to Marion Penitentiary. Approximately 24 hours had passed from the time of his apprehension. Matta was subsequently examined by a physician who found abrasions on his head, face, scalp, neck, arms, feet, and penis, as well as blistering on his back. According to the examining physician, these injuries were consistent with those which could have been caused by a stun gun.[173]

Matta-Ballesteros asserted that the treatment he received at the hands of the U.S. agents constituted a due process violation, and consequently moved for release due to lack of jurisdiction to prosecute him. The district court denied Matta-Ballesteros's petition without a hearing, on the basis that the alleged facts did not entitle him to relief.[174]

The Seventh Circuit affirmed.[175] The court said:

> The Seventh Circuit has never squarely faced the Toscanino exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine. In United States v. Marzano, this Court expressly refrained from deciding whether to follow Toscanino and we have not faced the issue since. Several other circuits, however, have considered Toscanino. While the Ninth Circuit has adopted this exception, the Fifth and the Eleventh Circuits have rejected it. In addition, no court, including the Toscanino court which remanded the case for factual findings, has ever found conduct that rises to the level necessary to require the United States to divest itself of jurisdiction. The decision to follow Toscanino is now squarely before this court.

---

170 Matta-Ballesteros v. Henman, 896 F.2d 255 (1990).

171 Id.

172 Id. at 256.

173 Id. (citations omitted).

174 Id.

175 Id.

> We initially note that Toscanino is of ambiguous constitutional origins. On its face, Toscanino purports to rely on the due process clause (of either the fifth amendment or the fourteenth amendment). Yet the Second Circuit relied for support on Mapp v. Ohio, a fourth amendment exclusionary rule case.
>
> . . . While we do not condone government misconduct such as Matta alleges, we cannot create an exclusionary rule for the person of the defendant in light of our analysis and in the face of repeated re-affirmation by the Supreme Court that no such rule exists. The Court has rejected both the deterrence and the judicial integrity rationales for the exclusionary rule applied to this context. We therefore conclude that Toscanino, at least as far as it creates an exclusionary rule, no longer retains vitality and therefore decline to adopt it as the law of this circuit.[176]

It is noteworthy that the United States has ratified the CAT.[177] The ratification of this convention means that U.S. courts will have to alter their position and inquire into allegations of torture in extradition cases, with the ensuing effect of denying extradition in cases in which torture was used to secure evidence or a conviction, or when it is likely that the relator may be subjected to torture in the requesting state.[178] The abduction and unlawful seizure of persons abroad, whether citizens or aliens, may also be accompanied by the unlawful seizure of evidence. The availability of remedies under the U.S. Constitution is in question as is the applicability of constitutional rights to aliens.[179]

Another question arises as to whether abduction and unlawful seizure violates formal extradition treaties between the United States and the state in which the individual was seized. In the case of United States v. Valot,[180] the defendant argued that his removal from Thailand violated the extradition treaty between the United States and Thailand. In Valot, decided by the Ninth Circuit in August 1980, the defendant, Steven Valot, violated his parole in the District of Hawaii by traveling to Asia and Nevada, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. In 1977, he was arrested in Thailand on a marijuana charge and was incarcerated. On May 4, 1979, Thai immigration officials brought Valot to the Bangkok airport and forced him to remain there. Two officials of the U.S. DEA arrived, received Valot from the Thai officials, and over his protests, took him aboard a flight to Honolulu.[181]

In one of his arguments, Valot contended that his removal from Thailand violated the extradition treaty between the United States and Thailand, and that the prosecution was, therefore, barred by the doctrine of United States v. Rauscher.[182] However, the Court in Ker, decided the same day as Rauscher, held that the alleged abduction of the defendant Ker from Peru by an official of the U.S. government, in the face of an extradition treaty in effect between the United States and Peru, would not bar Ker's prosecution in Illinois courts.

---

176 Id. at 261, 263 (citations omitted).

177 G.A. Res. 39/46, U.N. GAOR 3d Comm., 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, at 197, 198 U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1984/72 (1984). The Convention against Torture is implemented in the United States through 18 U.S.C. 113B 2340–2340B. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, An Appraisal of Torture in International Law and Practice: The Need for an International Convention for the Prevention and Suppression of Torture, 48 Rev. Int'le de Droit Pènal 1 (1977).

178 At Article 3(1) the Convention against Torture provides:

> No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

Such a development would alter the rule of non-inquiry, discussed in Ch. VII, Sec. 8.

179 See infra Sec. 5 (discussing the extraterritorial application of the U.S. Constitution).

180 United States v. Valot, 625 F.2d 308 (9th Cir. 1980).

181 Id. at 309.

182 United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407 (1886). See also Ch. II.

The court in Valot held that where no demand for extradition is made by the United States, and the defendant is deported by the authorities of the other country that is party to the treaty, "extradition" does not occur, and consequently failure to comply with the extradition treaty does not bar prosecution.[183] Because Thai officials aided Valot's removal to the United States, the court held that the extradition treaty was not violated.[184]

In 1992 the Supreme Court ruled again on the issue of whether abduction and unlawful seizure violate extradition treaties. In United States v. Alvarez-Machain,[185] the Court held that if the extradition treaty in question does not prohibit abduction, the mala captus bene detentus principle of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine applies and U.S. courts may validly exercise jurisdiction over the abducted relator.[186]

Dr. Alvarez-Machain, a citizen of Mexico,, was indicted for participating in the torture and murder of a U.S. DEA agent and a pilot working with him. The DEA believed that Alvarez-Machain had participated in the murder by keeping the DEA agent alive so that he could be tortured and interrogated longer.[187] The DEA wished to proceed against Alvarez-Machain and attempted to secure his presence in the United States through informal negotiations with Mexican officials.[188] A DEA agent offered a Mexican DEA informant $50,000 plus expenses for delivery of Alvarez-Machain to the United States.[189] At trial, the DEA agent testified that the final terms of the abduction had been approved by the DEA in Washington, DC, and that he believed that this was done with the consultation of the U.S. Attorney General's Office.[190] The trial court record described the abduction in the following way:

> On April 2, 1990,. . . [f]ive or six armed men burst into [Dr.Alvarez-Machain's] office. One showed Dr. Machain a badge of the federal police. Another man placed a gun to Dr. Machain's head and told him to cooperate or he would be shot.
>
> Dr. Machain was taken to a house in Guadalajara. One of the men hit him in the stomach as he exited the car at their request. In the house, he was forced to lay on the floor face down for two to three hours. Dr. Machain testified that he was shocked six or seven times through the soles of 183 Valot, 625 F.2d at 310.

184 The Second Circuit has followed the results reached in this case. See United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62, 67 (2d Cir. 1975). See also United States v. Lovato, 520 F.2d 1270, 1272 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 985 (1975).

185 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992). In proceedings at the district cout level, the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California cited to this text. See United States v. Caro-Quintero, 745 F. Supp. 599, 607, 609, 614 (C.D. Cal. 1990).

186 Id. at 657. The court said:

> The issue in this case is whether a criminal defendant, abducted to the United States from a nation with which it has an extradition treaty, thereby acquires a defense to the jurisdiction of this country's courts. We hold that he does not, and that he may be tried in federal district court for violations of the criminal law of the United States.

In a recent decision, an Oklahoma federal district court refused to entertain a motion to dismiss an indictment and withdraw a guilty plea where the individual, a Mexican citizen, attempted to rely on his alleged illegal abduction as grounds to dismiss the indictment. The court reasoned that "defendant's claim of illegal abduction is not a basis to dismiss the charges against him, and it would be a waste of judicial resources to allow defendant to withdraw his guilty plea to pursue a meritless defense." United States v. Bonilla, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65718 at *5–*7 (N.D. Okla. 2010).

187 Id.

188 Id.

189 Id. at 603.

190 Id.

> his shoes with "an electric apparatus." He says that he was injected twice with a substance that made him feel "light-headed and dizzy."
>
> Dr. Machain was then transported by car to Leon where they were joined by a "fair-skinned" man. Dr. Machain asked the fair-skinned man to identify himself and to indicate where they were going. The man said that he was "with the DEA" and they were going to El Paso . . .[191]

The district court found that the DEA was responsible for the kidnapping of Dr. Alvarez-Machain. In this respect the court noted:

> The record reveals that the DEA and its informants were integrally involved in Dr. Machain's abduction. Prior to the kidnapping, the DEA induced the abductors with the offer to pay a $50,000 reward for the successful abduction of Dr. Machain and promised to reimburse these individuals for their expenses. These promises were communicated to the abductors prior to the abduction. The DEA gave the go ahead for the abduction. This command was approved at the highest levels of the DEA. The United States Attorney General's office appears to have been consulted. Upon completion of the abduction, the DEA paid a $20,000 reward to the abductors and their families. In addition, many of the abductors and their families have been relocated to the United States. The United States pays approximately $6,000 per week in living expenses for the relocated abductors.[192]

The Mexican government officially protested the abduction of Alvarez-Machain. The district court summarized the Mexican protests as follows:

> On April 18, 1990, the Embassy of Mexico presented a diplomatic note to the United States Department of State in Washington, D.C., requesting a detailed report on possible U.S. participation in the abduction of Dr. Machain . . . The Mexican government advised the Department of State that "if it is proven that these actions were performed with the illegal participation of the U.S. authorities, the binational cooperation in the fight against drug trafficking will be endangered . . . "
>
> On May 16, 1990, the Embassy of Mexico presented a second diplomatic note to the Department of State. The note stated that "[t]he Government of Mexico considers that the kidnapping of Dr. Alvarez Machain and his transfer from Mexican territory to the United States of America were carried out with the knowledge of persons working for the U.S government, in violation of the procedure established in the extradition treaty in force between the two countries." In the note, the government of Mexico demanded Machain's return to Mexico.
>
> On July 19, 1990, the Embassy of Mexico presented a third diplomatic note to the Department of State requesting the provisional arrest and extradition of [the DEA informer and the DEA agent who masterminded the abduction] for prosecution in Mexico for crimes relating to the abduction of Dr. Machain.[193]

Alvarez-Machain moved to dismiss the indictment, claiming that his abduction constituted outrageous governmental conduct and that the district court lacked jurisdiction because he had been abducted in violation of the extradition treaty between Mexico and the United States.[194] The district court held that while the U.S. government's conduct was not outrageous, the court lacked jurisdiction to try Alvarez-Machain because his abduction was in violation of the extradition treaty and ordered that he be repatriated to Mexico.[195] The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed.[196]

---

191 Id.

192 Id. at 609.

193 Id. at 604.

194 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 658 (1992).

195 Id.

196 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 946 F.2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. granted, 504 U.S. 1024, rev'd and remanded, 504 U.S. 655, 656 (1992).

The Supreme Court reversed, deciding that forcible abduction does not violate the extradition treaty between Mexico and the United States, and that consequently, it did not divest U.S. courts of jurisdiction over Alvarez-Machain.[197]

> Respondent and his amici may be correct that respondent's abduction was "shocking," and that it may be in violation of general international law principles . . . We conclude, however, that respondent's abduction was not in violation of the Extradition Treaty . . . and therefore the rule of Ker v. Illinois is fully applicable to this case. The fact of respondent's forcible abduction does not therefore prohibit his trial in a court in the United States for violations of the criminal laws of the United States.[198]

The Supreme Court's Alvarez-Machain decision takes the rather curious position that where the abduction or kidnapping is not proscribed by the relevant extradition treaty, the Ker-Frisbie rule of mala captus bene detentus applies and U.S. courts may exercise jurisdiction over abducted or kidnapped relators.[199] This is apparently so even in a case where a citizen of another state is forcibly abducted from the territory of that state by U.S. agents acting under color of official authority and where the foreign state objects to the removal of its citizen.[200]

Justice Stevens, writing for the dissent in Alvarez-Machain, objected strongly to the majority's interpretation of the United States–Mexico Extradition Treaty and to the notion, advanced by the majority opinion, that because the treaty explicitly does not prohibit forcible abductions they are not violative of it.[201] Justice Stevens said:

> It is true, as the Court notes, that there is no express promise by either party to refrain from forcible abductions in the territory of the other Nation. Relying on that omission, the Court, in effect, concludes that the Treaty merely creates an optional method of obtaining jurisdiction over alleged offenders, and that the parties silently reserved the right to resort to self help whenever they deem force more expeditious than legal process. If the United States, for example, thought it more expedient to torture or simply to execute a person rather than to attempt extradition, these options would be equally available because they, too, were not explicitly prohibited by the Treaty. That, however, is a highly improbable interpretation of a consensual agreement, which on 197 Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 668.

---

198 Id. at 669–670 (citations omitted).

199 But see United States v. Chapa-Garza, 62 F.3d 118 (5th Cir. 1995) (interpreting Alvarez-Machain as being inapplicable where extradition proceedings are pending at the time of the fugitive abduction).

200 The majority's position was severely criticized by three dissenters. See United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 668–685 (Stevens, J., Blackmun, J., and O'Connor, J., dissenting). See also United States v. Lazore, 90 F. Supp. 2d 202 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). The court's decision produced significant backlash in the United States and abroad. Then president-elect Clinton said: "The Supreme Court ruled that unless the treaty explicitly forbids it, our country was free to go into Mexico or into any other country that we had a similar treaty with and take someone out. . . . My own opinion is that that is too broad a policy for our country to have." Clinton, High Court Differ on Abduction, L.A. Times, Dec. 16, 1992, at A32. The Mexican Attorney General's Office sought the extradition of DEA agents involved in the kidnapping of Dr. Alvarez-Machain. Mexico Seeks DEA Agents on Charges of Kidnapping, Wash. Post, Dec. 16, 1992, at A10. The United States was required by the government of Mexico to promise to Mexico that it will not kidnap Mexican citizens and to enter into negotiations with Mexico to ban the practice of cross-border kidnapping. Steven A. Holmes, U.S. Gives Mexico Abduction Pledge, N.Y. Times, June 22, 1993. In the wake of the Court's decision, furthermore, Senator Moynihan has introduced a bill that would prohibit kidnappings and deprive U.S. courts of jurisdiction in cases where the defendants are brought to trial in the United States in violation of international law. U.S. Must Not Kidnap Suspects Abroad, Newsday, Dec. 2, 1993, at 114. See also 2 Limits to National Jurisdiction: Documents and Judicial Resolutions on the Alvarez-Machain Case (Secretaria de Relaciones Exteriores, 1993).

201 Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 674.

> its face appears to have been intended to set forth comprehensive and exclusive rules concerning the subject of extradition.. .
>
> It is shocking that a party to an extradition treaty might believe that it has secretly reserved the right to make seizures of citizens in the other party's territory.[202]

Justice Stevens also observed that:

> [i]t is ironic that the United States has attempted to justify its unilateral action based on the kidnapping, torture, and murder of a federal agent by authorizing the kidnapping of respondent, for which the American law enforcement agents who participated have now been charged by Mexico.[203]

Subsequent to the discovery that Alvarez-Machain was not the person intended by the United States to be kidnapped from Mexico, in that he had nothing to do with the torture and death of Agent Camarena, Alvarez-Machain filed suit under the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA).[204] The Ninth Circuit upheld the claimant's position:

> Unlike transborder arrests, there exists a clear and universally recognized norm prohibiting arbitrary arrest and detention. This prohibition is codified in every major comprehensive human rights instrument and is reflected in at least 119 national constitutions. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice: Identifying International Procedural Protections and Equivalent Protections in National Constitutions, 3 Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L. 235, 260–61 (1993). The Universal Declaration, perhaps the most well-recognized explication of international human rights norms, provides that "[n]o one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile," Universal Declaration, art. 9, and the ICCPR, which the United States has ratified,[16] unequivocally obliges states parties to refrain from "arbitrary arrest or detention." ICCPR, art. 9.[17]
>
> We recently reaffirmed the universal, obligatory, and specific nature of this norm in Martinez, 141 F.3d at 1384 (recognizing a "clear international prohibition against arbitrary arrest and detention"); see also Marcos IV, 103 F.3d at 795 (recognizing "arbitrary detention . . . as[an] actionable violation[] of international law"). We explained, in defining the norm, that "[d]etention is arbitrary if it is not pursuant to law; it may be arbitrary also if it is incompatible with the principles of justice or with the dignity of the human person." "Martinez, 141 F.3d at 1384 (quoting Restatement on Foreign Relations § 702 cmt. h).[18]
>
> Sosa acknowledges the prohibition against arbitrary arrest and detention, but he contends that for ATCA liability to attach, Alvarez's detention must be "prolonged" in addition to being arbitrary. We can divine no such requirement in our precedent or in the applicable international authorities. Rather, as the language of the international instruments demonstrates, the norm is universally cited as one against "arbitrary" detention and does not include a temporal element. Other authorities reflect this understanding. See, e.g., Bassiouni, Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice, supra, at 260; Paul Sieghart, The International Law of Human Rights 135–59 (1983); see also United Nations Study, supra, at 5–8 (defining elements of the norm without mention of a temporal component).[19]
>
> Although § 702 of the Restatement on Foreign Relations includes a reference to "prolonged arbitrary detention,"[20] neither the Restatement nor our cases import a separate temporal requirement for purposes of ATCA liability. Section 702 contains a short list of human rights norms that it deems sufficient to qualify as customary law violations. See Restatement on Foreign Relations § 702(a)–(g). But the comments to § 702 clarify that the list is non-exhaustive and that

---

202 Id. at 674–675 (citations omitted).

203 Id. at 674, n.12.

204 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 331 F.3d 604 (9th Cir. 2003), 542 U.S. 692 (2004), vacated & remanded en banc, 374 F.3d 1384 (2004).

virtually all of the norms listed, including "prolonged arbitrary detention," belong among the elite set of jus cogens norms that are non-derogable. Id. cmts. a, n. Section 702 does not state that every arbitrary detention must be "prolonged" to qualify as a violation of the law of nations—which is all that is required under the ATCA—and in fact implies the opposite. See id. cmt. ("A single, brief, arbitrary detention by an official of a state party to one of the principal international agreements might violate that agreement."). Likewise, our holding in Martinez, which cited the Restatement, included the length of detention as but one factor among many in determining whether a violation of the law of nations had occurred. 141 F.3d at 1384.

This is not to say that the length of detention cannot be a factor in evaluating whether there was an actionable violation of international law. Indeed, an extended detention following an improper arrest would necessarily contribute to "arbitrariness." We simply hold, consistent with international law, that there is no freestanding temporal requirement nor any magical time period that triggers the norm.[205]

---

16. The ICCPR is one of several international covenants designed to formally codify many of the rights embodied in the Universal Declaration. See Brownlie, supra, at 576.

17. Each of the regional human rights instruments contains a similar prohibition. See American Convention, art. 7(3) ("No one shall be subject to arbitrary arrest or imprisonment."); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("European Convention"), art. 5(1), opened for signature Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 222 (deprivation of liberty must be "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law" and only in the case of, inter alia, "the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority . . . ."); African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ("African Charter"), art. 6, June 27, 1981, 21 I.L.M. 58 (1982) ("[N]o one may be arbitrarily arrested or detained.").

18. Our standard reflects the language of the Restatement as well as other major international sources. See Restatement on Foreign Relations § 702 cmt. h; ICCPR, art. 9(1) ("No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established by law."); id., art. 9(5) ("Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation."); European Convention, art. 5(1) (deprivation of liberty must be "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law" and only in the case of, inter alia, "the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority . . . ."); African Charter, art. 6 ("No one may be deprived of his freedom except for reasons and conditions previously laid down by law. In particular, no one may be arbitrarily arrested or detained."); see also Winterwerp v. Netherlands, 33 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A.) at para. 39 (1979) ("[N]o detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as lawful."); United Nations, Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile 7 (1964) ("United Nations Study") (adopting the view that "an arrest or detention is arbitrary if it is (a) on grounds or in accordance with procedures other than those established by law, or (b) under the provisions of a law the purpose of which is incompatible with the respect for the right to liberty and security of person").

19. This reading is also supported in the case law. See, e.g., de Sanchez v. Banco Central de Nicaragua, 770 F.2d 1385, 1397 (5th Cir. 1985) (recognizing "the right not to be arbitrarily detained" as part of the law of nations); Rodriguez-Fernandez v. Wilkinson, 654 F.2d 1382, 1388 (10th Cir. 1981) ("No principle of international law is more fundamental than the concept that human beings should be free from arbitrary imprisonment."); Paul v. Avril, 901 F.Supp. 330, 333–34, 335 (S.D.Fla.1994) (concluding plaintiff suffered arbitrary detention although he was held for less than ten hours); Forti v. Suarez-Mason, 672 F.Supp. 1531, 1541

---

205 Id. at 331 F.3d at 620–622 (internal citations omitted).

(N.D.Cal.1987) ("There is case law finding sufficient consensus to evince a customary international human rights norm against arbitrary detention. The consensus is even clearer in the case of a state's prolonged arbitrary detention of its own citizens." (internal citations omitted)); see also Litwa v. Poland, App. No. 26629/95, 33 Eur. H.R. Rep. 53 (2000) (finding detention of six hours and thirty minutes constitutes violation under Article 5 of the European Convention); Quinn v. France, App. No. 18580/91, 21 Eur. H.R. Rep. 529 (1995) (finding claim of arbitrary detention under Article 5 of the European Convention where petitioner was detained for a period of eleven hours).

20. The Restatement provides that "[a] state violates international law if…it practices, encourages, or condones…prolonged arbitrary detention." Restatement on Foreign Relations § 702(e).

However, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that neither the ATCA nor the Federal Tort Claims Act provided a remedy for the alien despite the fact that the government controlled the abduction of the alien and had custody of him in the U.S.[206] The Supreme Court relied on the fact concluded that the alleged harm, namely the abduction, occurred in Mexico irrespective of whether the U.S. was the proximate cause of the harm. Subsequently, the U.S. District Court dismissed Dr. Alvarez-Machain's claim for damages under the Federal Tort Claims Act.[207]

The United States increasingly resorts to extraordinary rendition devices, including abduction, thus circumventing traditional extradition processes. As shown in this chapter, there are several municipal and international rights derogated by the increasing use of these devices. In conjunction with such seizures are the related problems of seizing evidence illegally abroad and using it in U.S. courts. In these areas, the question arises as to the appropriate legal remedy.

The remedies for such seizures are not clearly apparent in U.S. law and policy. Courts could divest themselves of jurisdiction in illegal seizure and abduction cases, but as shown above, that is not the practice in the United States. The only available remedy for abduction seems to be damages.[208] These damages are not provided for under law. However, following the U.S.

---

206 Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004), vacating 331 F.3d 604 (9th Cir. 2003).

207 Alvarez-Machain v. United States, CV 93-4072 SVW (SHx), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28528 (D. Cal. 2004) (on remand).

208 The first damages case was Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). See also Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980); Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979). For damages for unconstitutional rendition, see Arar v. Ashcroft, 585 F.3d 599 (2d Cir. 2009) (refusing to extend Bivens actions to the extraordinary rendition context); Brown v. Nutsch, 619 F.2d 758 (8th Cir. 1980); Sami v. United States, 617 F.2d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1979); McBride v. Soos, 594 F.2d 610 (7th Cir. 1979); Wirth v. Surles, 562 F.2d 319 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 933 (1978); Waits v. McGowan, 516 F.2d 203 (3d Cir. 1975); Sanders v. Conine, 506 F.2d 530 (10th Cir. 1974). As a postscript to the Alvarez-Machain case, it should be noted that Dr. Alvarez-Machain was acquitted of the torture and murder charges. "Judge Edward Rafeedie of U.S. District Court said the evidence presented during two weeks of testimony against the doctor…had been based on 'hunches' and the 'wildest speculation' and had failed to support the charges that he had participated in the torture of the drug agent…" Seth Mydans, Judge Clears Mexican in Agent's Killing, N.Y. Times, Dec. 15, 1992, at A20. The acquittal improved relations between Mexico and the United States. "Mexican Foreign Minister Fernando Solana [called the] verdict a 'very positive step…It will also allow the creation of an atmosphere of respect and better understanding to strengthen anti-drug cooperation between both nations.'" George de Lama, Abducted Mexican Cleared in Killing, Chi. Trib., Dec. 15, 1992, at 1. See also Gail Diane Cox, Drug War's Big Showcase Falls Apart, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 1, 1993, at 8; Judge Says U.S. Was Told It Held Wrong Doctor in Agent's Killing, N.Y. Times, Dec. 17, 1992, at A27; Seth Mydans, Abduction Gone Awry; Mexican Doctor Is Cleared in Killing of U.S. Drug Agent, N.Y. Times, Dec. 20, 1992, at § 4, p. 2. On July 9, 1993, Alvarez-Machain filed a suit against the DEA and the Justice Department seeking $20 million in damages for his kidnapping. Doctor Abducted in Camarena Case Sues U.S. Officials, Chi. Trib., July 9, 1993, at 2. See also Mexican Doctor Files Claims against U.S. for Abduction, Liability Wk., July 12, 1993; Jerry Seper, Justice Sued for $20 Million by Doctor in Camarena Case, Wash. Times, July 10, 1993, at A5. See generally infra Sec.

Supreme Court ruling in Bivens, a plaintiff may have standing and seek damages when advocating a fundamental violation under the principle that there is necessarily a remedy for a wrong. This exception, however, has been applied only in limited circumstances, and courts appear wary of expanding the principle greatly. In Arar the Second Circuit refused to extend Bivens to cases of extraordinary rendition, holding that in determining whether to award damages "we must consider: whether there is an alternative remedial scheme available to the plaintiff; and whether 'special factors counsel[] hesitation' in creating a Bivens remedy."[209] The court concluded that the existence of alternative remedies implied the legislature's wish that such matters not be dealt with by the court. Further, it held that special factors similarly militated to a Bivens remedy, namely security and foreign policy considerations,[210] the disclosure of classified information,[211] and the inevitability of trying cases in open court where such classified information would be made public.[212]

In a similar vein, opponents of the justiciability of extraordinary rendition for private actors conclude that the analysis necessary for such a claim would inevitably and inappropriately lead courts to consider political questions squarely reserved for the executive and the legislature.[213] One critic argues that "extraordinary rendition contemplates a close contractual relationship" between the government and the corporate entity, such as an airplane operator and the CIA, thereby necessarily invoking the political doctrine limitation as enunciated in Baker v. Carr.[214]

In the event that the unlawful seizure of the person is accompanied by unlawful evidentiary seizure abroad, or if evidence in the United States is obtained illegally, the remedy in the United States could still be application of the exclusionary rule,[215] although the Supreme Court has been limiting that remedy and collateral attacks based on it.[216]

It seems that, for all practical purposes, the judiciary has largely abandoned any concerns for the integrity of the judicial process in the face of practical exigencies that facilitate the work of the U.S. government in its prosecutorial function, as well as that of other governments' law enforcement agencies working together to apprehend wanted or alleged offenders. The reading of court decisions gives the inescapable feeling that courts reach a judgment on the criminality of the accused and then decide how to avoid applying a legal rule that would negate criminal jurisdiction and thus allow the relator to go free. The resulting signals encourage law enforcement officers

---

7 (discussing U.S. remedies for abduction abroad). See Alien Tort Claims Act, The 1789 Judiciary Act, ch. 20, § 9, 1 Stat. 73, 77 (1789), codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1994). See infra Sec. 7.5 (discussing remedies available to aliens).

209 Arar v. Ashcroft, 585 F.3d 559, 563 (2d. Cir. 2009).

210 Id. at 575 ("A suit seeking a damages remedy against senior officials who implement an extraordinary rendition policy would enmesh the court ineluctably in an assessment of the validity and rationale of that policy and its implementation in this particular case, matters that directly affect significant diplomatic and national security concerns.").

211 Id. at 576.

212 Id. at 577 ("The court's reliance on information that cannot be introduced into the public record is likely to be a common feature of any Bivens actions arising in the context of alleged extraordinary rendition. This should provoke hesitation, given the strong preference in the Anglo-American legal tradition for open court proceedings.").

213 Dhooge, supra note 70.

214 Id. at 329–330.

215 See Steven M. Kaplan, Note, The Applicability of the Exclusionary Rule in Federal Court to Evidence Seized and Confessions Obtained in Foreign Countries, 16 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 495 (1977) [hereinafter Note, Applicability of the Exclusionary Rule]; Charles E. M. Kolb, Note, The Fourth Amendment Abroad: Civilian and Military Perspectives, 17 Va. J. Int'l L. 515 (1977).

216 For limits on collateral relief to apply the exclusionary rule, see Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976); Mackey v. United States, 401 U.S. 667 (1971).

to continue the practice of unlawful seizure and abduction.[217] Regrettably, the Reporters of the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States uphold the validity of the practice of unlawful seizure without criticism.[218]

Subsequent to the Supreme Court decision in Alvarez-Machain, in 2002 the Third Circuit in United States v. Best summarized the U.S. jurisprudence as follows:

> At issue in this appeal is whether the District Court has personal jurisdiction over a defendant charged with violating the immigration laws and seized from a foreign vessel on the high seas. It is well established that a court's power to try a defendant is ordinarily not affected by the manner in which the defendant is brought to trial. See Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522, 72 S.Ct. 509, 96 L.Ed. 541 (1952) (upholding conviction of defendant who had been kidnapped in Chicago by Michigan officers and brought to trial in Michigan); Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 444, 7 S.Ct. 225, 30 L.Ed. 421 (1886) (holding that court's power to try defendant for crime was not impaired by forcible abduction of defendant from Peru); see also United States v. Romero-Galue, 757 F.2d 1147, 1151 n. 10 (11th Cir. 1985) (noting that "[j]urisdiction over the person of a defendant 'in a federal criminal trial whether citizen or alien, whether arrested within or beyond the territory of the United States,' is not subject to challenge on the ground that the defendant's presence before the court was unlawfully secured") (quoting United States v. Winter, 509 F.2d 975, 985–86 (5th Cir. 1975)). This general rule, commonly referred to as the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, "rest[s] on the sound basis that due process of law is satisfied when one present in court is convicted of crime after having been fairly apprised of the charges against him and after a fair trial in accordance with constitutional procedural safeguards." Frisbie, 342 U.S. at 522, 72 S.Ct. 509.
>
> The Supreme Court explained in Frisbie that "[t]here is nothing in the Constitution that requires a court to permit a guilty person rightfully convicted to escape justice because he was brought to trial against his will." Id. In the years following Frisbie, however, it appeared increasingly difficult to reconcile the strict application of its rule with the expanded interpretation of due process expressed by the Court in later cases such as Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 646, 81 S.Ct. 1684, 6 L.Ed.2d 1081 (1961), in which the Court held that due process requires application of the exclusionary rule in state prosecutions. In 1970, nearly two decades after Frisbie had been decided, we observed that the doctrine's validity "has been seriously questioned because it condones illegal police conduct." Gov't of Virgin Islands v. Ortiz, 427 F.2d 1043, 1045 n. 2 (3d Cir.1970). Four years later, the Second Circuit, citing the "erosion" of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, carved out an exception to the general rule in United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir.1974).
>
> The defendant in Toscanino alleged that he had been forcibly abducted from Uruguay and tortured and interrogated over seventeen days at the behest of the United States government. Id. at 269–70. Concluding that the government's alleged conduct "shocks the conscience," id. at 273, the Second Circuit held that the Ker-Frisbie doctrine must yield to the requirements of due process and, accordingly, that a court must "divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a

---

217 See Meyer, You Can Run but You Can't Hide (At Least Not in Tijuana), San Diego Reader, Dec. 4, 1986, at 1; Jim Schachter, Long Arm of Law Bends the Rules, L.A. Times, July 17, 1986, at 1. See generally Sakellar, supra note 31. The practice of abduction received U.S. presidential approval in the unlawful seizure of an Egyptian civilian aircraft by U.S. warplanes in connection with the Achille-Lauro incident. See Gerald P. McGinley, The Achille Lauro Affair—Implications for International Law, 52 Tenn. L. Rev. 691 (1985). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Crime of Kidnapping and Hostage Taking, in, 2 International Criminal Law 859 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999); Robert A. Friedlander, The Crime of Hijacking, in 1 International Criminal Law 869 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2d ed. 1999).

218 The reporters indicated the adherence of the United States to the doctrine mala captus bene detentus, even though it has been eroded somewhat by the cases cited in this section, which are also cited in the Restatement. See Restatement (Third) on Foreign Relations Law of the United States §§ 431–433 and § 476, Reporters' Note 6 (concerning alternatives to extradition).

defendant where it has been acquired as the result of the government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights." Id. at 275

In United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62 (2d Cir.1975), which the Second Circuit decided shortly after Toscanino, the court effectively limited its holding in Toscanino to that case's shocking facts. In Lujan, a federal prisoner claimed that his due process rights had been violated under Toscanino because he had been forcibly abducted in Bolivia and then taken to New York. Id. at 63. Despite the fact that Lujan was forcibly abducted, the Second Circuit applied Ker-Frisbie and refused to order the district court to divest itself of jurisdiction, observing that "the government conduct of which [Lujan] complains pales by comparison with that alleged by Toscanino." Id. at 66. The court explained that "[l]acking from Lujan's petition is any allegation of that complex of shocking governmental conduct sufficient to convert an abduction which is simply illegal into one which sinks to a violation of due process." Id.[219]

Subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court indicate that there is reason to doubt the soundness of the Toscanino exception, even as limited to its flagrant facts. A year after Toscanino was decided, the Supreme Court generally reaffirmed the validity of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, refusing to "retreat from the established rule that illegal arrest or detention does not void a subsequent conviction." Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 119, 95 S.Ct. 854, 43 L.Ed.2d 54 (1975). More recently, in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992), the Court held that the rule of Ker-Frisbie was fully applicable to a case in which a Mexican national had been forcibly abducted, even though the abduction may have been "shocking" and in violation of general international law principles. Id. at 669–70, 112 S.Ct. 2188. In light of these cases, it appears clear that the Ker-Frisbie doctrine has not eroded and that the exception described in Toscanino rests on shaky ground. United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F.3d 754, 763 (9th Cir. 1995) (observing that, "[i]n the shadow cast by Alvarez-Machain, attempts to expand due process rights into the realm of foreign abductions, as the Second Circuit did in [Toscanino], have been cut short"). Even more apparent is that the alleged circumstances surrounding the Coast Guard's seizure of the defendant in this case do not come close to resembling the "shocking governmental conduct" that the Second Circuit equated with a violation of due process in Toscanino. Accordingly, even if we were to adopt the Toscanino exception to Ker-Frisbie, it would not apply to the facts of this case.

A second possible exception to the rule of Ker-Frisbie, rooted in cases from the Prohibition era, relates to the violation of a treaty. In Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593, 47 S.Ct. 531, 71 L.Ed. 793 (1927), the Supreme Court distinguished Ker, explaining that "the Ker case does not apply here" on the ground that "a treaty of the United States is directly involved." Id. at 605-06, 47 S.Ct. 531. Although the Court ultimately held that the defendants failed to raise timely the jurisdictional issue, the Court's dictum regarding Ker clearly indicated that "the rules may be quite different" when a treaty has been violated. United States v. Postal, 589 F.2d 862, 874 (5th Cir.1979).

In Cook v. United States, 288 U.S. 102, 53 S.Ct. 305, 77 L.Ed. 641 (1933), a later Prohibition-era case involving the same treaty discussed in Ford, the Supreme Court again acknowledged that the government may limit its own jurisdiction by entering into a treaty. In that case, the government seized the British vessel Mazel Tov outside the territorial seas of the United States and then brought suit against it. Id. at 108, 53 S.Ct. 305. Cook, as master and bailee of the Mazel Tov, argued that the trial court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate rights in connection with the vessel because it was seized outside the territorial limits of the United States and in violation of a treaty with Great Britain. Id. The Court agreed, noting that the treaty in question fixed the conditions 219 Specifically, the court noted that, unlike Toscanino, Lujan did not claim that he was knocked unconscious by a gun blow, that drugs were administered to subdue him during the flight to the United States, or that the U.S. Attorney was aware of his abduction or of any subsequent interrogation. Lujan, 510 F.2d 62, 66 (2d Cir. 1975). Perhaps most important, Lujan "disclaim[ed] any acts of torture, terror, or custodial interrogation of any kind." Id.

> under which a vessel may be seized and taken for adjudication in accordance with the country's applicable laws. Id. at 121, 53 S.Ct. 305. Accordingly, it held that "[o]ur government, lacking power to seize, lacked power, because of the Treaty, to subject the vessel to our laws." Id. In so holding, the Court distinguished prior cases where forfeitures of vessels wrongfully seized by the Navy were upheld, explaining that those cases involved vessels of American registry and that "the seizures did not violate any treaty, but were merely violations of the law of nations because made within the territory of another sovereign." Id. at 122, 53 S.Ct. 305.
>
> This second exception to the Ker-Frisbie doctrine is buttressed by the more recent Alvarez-Machain case, in which the Supreme Court observed that the Ker-Frisbie doctrine is inapplicable to cases where a person is forcibly abducted from a country in violation of an extradition treaty to which the United States is a party. 504 U.S. at 662, 112 S.Ct. 2188. To defeat jurisdiction in such a case, the Eleventh Circuit observed that, under Alvarez-Machain, "a defendant must demonstrate, by reference to the express language of a treaty and/or the established practice thereunder, that the United States affirmatively agreed not to seize foreign nationals from the territory of its treaty partner." United States v. Noriega, 117 F.3d 1206, 1213 (11th Cir.1997); see also United States v. Rezaq, 134 F.3d 1121, 1130 (D.C.Cir. 1998). However, the Ninth Circuit noted that, if a treaty does not specifically prohibit the abduction of foreign nationals, then it will not cause a court to be divested of jurisdiction over the abducted individual. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F.3d at 762 (citing Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 664–66, 112 S.Ct. 2188)
>
> …
>
> As the Fifth Circuit observed in Postal, a defendant "cannot rely upon a mere violation of international law as a defense to the court's jurisdiction." 589 F.2d at 884." We find substantial support for that position in Supreme Court cases such as Alvarez-Machain and Cook, which both recognize that the rule of Ker-Frisbie is not muted when there is a "violation of general international law principles." Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. at 669, 112 S.Ct. 2188; Cook, 288 U.S. at 122, 53 S.Ct. 305. Accordingly, we conclude that, unless the government's seizure of Best was in violation of a treaty between the United States and Brazil, the District Court has jurisdiction over Best in spite of the potential violation of international law.[220]

In United States v. Arbane, Arbane was acquitted on drug possession charges brought against him in Ecuador, and was deported from that country to Iran.[221] On the way to Iran, his plane landed for a stopover in Houston, Texas, where he was arrested on a Southern District of Florida indictment. The court relied on Alvarez-Machain to hold that there was nothing in the treaty between the United States and Ecuador that required extradition to the exclusion of other means of securing jurisdiction, albeit under Alvarez-Machain by means of unlawful abduction. The Eleventh Circuit held the same position in United States v. Noriega.[222]

It is important to note in this case that if a person remains on an aircraft the law of the flag of the aircraft applies, and U.S. agents would not have the right to board the aircraft in order to seize a passenger unless the passenger threatened the security of the United States or was committing a crime in violation of U.S. law while on the aircraft.[223] However, if the passenger deplanes and is in the terminal or elsewhere in U.S. territory, he could be apprehended.

It should be noted that if a person is seized in a foreign country in a manner that may violate either that country's laws or the law of the United States, but the seizure in question was not pursuant to the United States' request, either formally through an extradition request, or informally by means of law enforcement or intelligence cooperation, the conduct has no bearing on the validity of a subsequent extradition request made by the United States, except where the 220 United States v. Best, 304 F.3d 308, 314 (3d Cir. 2002) (internal citations omitted).

---

221 United States v. Arbane, 19 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. C. 491 (11th Cir. 2006).

222 United States v. Noriega, 117 F.3d 1206 (11th Cir.1997).

223 See Ch. VI, Sec. 2.3.8.

previous unlawful conduct was done at the request of the United States. Moreover, the existence of an extradition treaty and a request for extradition does not necessarily obviate other means of transferring custody of a person seized abroad, as argued throughout this chapter, though with some limitations.[224]

The cases described above are not about technical or formal violations of what some may consider the rules of the game. Most of these cases constitute fundamental violations of procedural and substantive due process of law as reflected in the U.S. Constitution, a number of U.S. laws, and several international treaties. More particularly, they involve kidnapping by use of force, which is a crime in every country in the world. This is usually followed by continued use of force during the relator's transit until the person reaches a U.S. destination. More egregious is the recurrence of torture and coercive interrogation during the voyage to the United States, which sometimes lasts days, if not weeks. U.S. courts have been all too lax with these egregious violations, allowing a de facto exception to the application of the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and its international treaty obligations, as if the end justified the means. In no other area of judicial supervisory power over law enforcement practices have U.S. courts been so willing to find some technical rationalization to look the other way. Whether U.S. courts will do the same with respect to "extraordinary rendition" is to be seen, considering the historically unprecedented deference given by U.S. courts to the Bush administration's practices since September 11, 2001. It is not a very likely prospect. However, just as the Supreme Court in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld came to the conclusion that presidential powers cannot create a legal black hole in Guantanamo, perhaps U.S. courts will find that kidnapping by force and torture are violations of the Constitution, U.S. laws, and international treaties, no matter how adroitly these violations may be described.

7. Abduction and Unlawful Seizure: State Responsibility in International Law

7.1. Introduction

It is important to note at the outset that the United States takes an entirely different position from what follows as part of its "exceptionalism" to international human rights norms.[225] Chapter II, Section 2.2 discusses the non–self-executing nature of certain international treaties and the non-applicability in U.S. domestic law of ICJ decisions.[226]

7.2. The Questionable Validity of Mala Captus Bene Detentus in International Law

The existence and extent of state responsibility in abduction, unlawful seizure, and other forms of irregular rendition vary.[227] Prior to discussing the subject of state responsibility, however, attention should be given to the premise upon which these practices rely, namely the maxim mala captus bene detentus. The application of this maxim by national courts over the past one hundred years has been inconsistent, as with other Roman law maxims. In particular this is because two higher principles have been consistently disregarded.

---

224 United States v. Herbert, 313 F. Supp. 2d 324 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Kasi v. Agelone, 300 F.3d 487, 499 (4th Cir. 2002); Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165, 168 (3d Cir. 1997); United States v. Noreiga, 117 F. 3d 1206 (11th Cir. 1997); United States v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896, 902 (2d Cir. 1981) (holding the issue cannot be raised); United States v. Antonakeas, 255 F.3d 714 (9th Cir. 2001).

225 Michael Ignatieff, American Exceptionalism and Human Rights (2005); Noam Chomsky, Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance (2003).

226 Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008).

227 See Ch. IV. For a critical discussion of these practices, referred to by one author as "the law of stolen people," see Christopher H. Pyle, Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights 263–281 (2001).

The first of these principles is procedural, namely nunquam decurritur ad extraordinarium sed ubi deficit ordinarium (never resort to the extraordinary until the ordinary fails). Thus, mala captus bene detentus, in order to be valid as an extraordinary process, must be preceded by the exhaustion of all ordinary procedures available, and cannot be admitted as a surrogate procedure to the existing ordinary channels. This rule of exhaustion of ordinary remedies is well established in international law and was reaffirmed in the 1959 decision of the International Court of Justice in the Interhandel Case (Switzerland v. United States).[228] There it was held that where rights claimed by one state have been disregarded by another in violation of international law, all local remedies and means of redress must first be exhausted before recourse to the International Court of Justice is allowed. In other words, the ordinary must be exhausted before resorting to the extraordinary.

The second principle is substantive, namely, the principle ex injuria ius non oritur. This principle was the Roman law's counterpart to the exclusionary rule developed in the United States.[229] It requires that certain violations of law not ripen into lawful results. Such a remedy was deemed, under Roman law and under some contemporary laws, an indispensable corollary to certain rights, without which these rights would have no real significance. In Roman law, the protected rights were those interests the violation of which was considered an injuria (injuria is not to be confused with "injury" as understood in the common law of torts). Every injuria had its legal remedy apart from the general principle that no legal validity attached to consequences of an injuria. The author of an injuria had to redress the wrong committed in a prescribed manner. In addition, there could not be any lawful consequences deriving from the transgression. The principle ex injuria ius non oritur was not, therefore, designed to redress the wrong perpetrated against the legally protected interest that had its specific remedy, but was intended to sanction the transgression of the law itself. In this sense, the law is meant lato senso, meaning the integrity of the law and the legal process.

A threshold question arises whether the violations stemming from the practices discussed above constitute an injuria in international law. The peculiarity of international law compels us to examine this question in light of the existing law of state responsibility.

7.3. The Bases of State Responsibility under International Law

Before considering the applicable international law principles of state responsibility, it is important to take note of the three categories of violations that are at issue in the practices discussed in the preceding sections of this chapter. These categories of violations are:

1. Violations of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and legal process of the state wherein such acts occurred;[230]
2. Violations of the human rights of the individual involved;[231] and 228 Interhandel Case (Switz. v. U.S.) 1959 I.C.J. 6 (Mar. 21).

229 See, e.g., Saltzburg, supra note 99; Stephan, supra note 99; Note, Applicability of the Exclusionary Rule, supra note 215.

230 Responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts, G.A. Res. 56/83, U.N. GAOR, 56th. Sess., U.N. Doc. A/56/83 (Jan. 28, 2002); James Crawford, The International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility: Introduction, Text and Commentaries (2002).

231 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 38544; Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, 1465 U.N.T.S. 24841; Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, CETS No. 005; American Convention on Human Rights Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1; African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, June 27, 1981, OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, 21 I.L.M. 58; International Convention

3. Violations of international due process.[232]

The international law of state responsibility has been clearly applied to violations of the first category,[233] and to some extent to violations of the second category,[234] but at best only tenuously to violations of the third category. However, it is apparent that the general principles and policies of state responsibility encompass the three categories of violations stated above.[235]

State responsibility attaches to actions by the state through its agents for specific acts as well as failure to act by a state itself, presumably wherever there is a preexisting legal obligation to do so. Two essential questions are raised in the context of this principle of state responsibility: (1) what degree of connection must be established between the state and its agents, or between the agents of the state and individuals acting in their private capacity, in order for state responsibility to attach?; and (2) is a state obligated merely to refrain from engaging in violative conduct, is there an obligation to prevent such conduct from occurring, or is a state an insurer of lawful conduct?

As to the first question, it is clear that state responsibility attaches to acts committed by agents of a state or by private individuals acting for or on behalf of the state. In the latter instance, the type of connection that must be established between the individual (acting privately) and the state (in order to impute that individual's act to the state) is not very clear, nor does customary international law provide us with reliable criteria. There is, however, no ambiguity in cases where the state, through its agents, incited, encouraged, or induced private individuals to undertake such actions with a view to benefit from the outcome. It is obvious that the less for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, Dec. 20, 2006, C.N.737.2008. TREATIES-12; European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Nov. 26, 1987, C.E.T.S. No. 126. For case law of the ECHR, see Chahal v. the United Kingdom, Eur. Ct. H. R. App. no. 22414/93 (Nov. 15, 1996); Nachova and Others v. Bulgaria, App. nos. 43577/98 and 43579/98 (Feb. 26, 2004). For case law of the IACHR, see Servellón García et al. Case, Inter-Am. C.H.R. (Ser. C) No. 152 (2006); Moiwana Village Case, Inter-Am. C.H.R. (Ser. C) No. 124 (2005).

---

232 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 14, Dec. 16, 1966, 999 U.N.T.S. 14668; Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Article 6, Nov. 4, 1950, C.E.T.S. No. 005; American Convention on Human Rights, Article 8, Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1; African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, Article 7, June 27, 1981, OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, 21 I.L.M. 58; Organization of American States, International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, Dec. 20, 2006, C.N.737.2008.TREATIES-12; European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Nov. 26, 1987, C.E.T.S. No. 126. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, ch. IX (2d ed. 2012).

233 There have been many cases unrelated to abduction such as that of Nicaragua v. the United States at the ICJ. Military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicar. v. U.S.), 1986 I.C.J. 14 (June 27). The Eichmann case is one of the most noteworthy causes célèbres. Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, [1968] 36 Int'l. L. R. 5 (Israel). See U.N. Doc. S/1439 (1960). But it was not submitted to the ICJ. Instead a Security Council Resolution was adopted condemning Israel. S.C. Res. 138, U.N. SCOR, 15th Year. U.N. Doc. S/Res/4349 (June 23, 1960).

234 Chattin Case (United States v. United Mexican States), 1927 IV Rev. Int'l Arb. Awards 282. See also William W. Bishop, International Law 753–785 (1962); 3 Hackworth Digest, supra note 23 at 279.

235 See Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of Its Fifty-Third Session, April 23–August 10, 2001, Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts U.N. GAOR, 53rd Sess., U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/L.602/Rev. 1, July 26, 2001; Crawford, supra note 230. See also Ian Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility (1983); Clyde Eagleton, The Responsibility of States in International Law (1929); Harvard Research in International Law, Responsibility of States, 23 Am. J. Int'l L. 131 (Spec. Supp. 1929).

direct the connection is between the state and the individual acting privately, the more difficult it will be to ascribe state responsibility for individual conduct even when it inures to the benefit of the state.

The second question raises a policy issue in the context of state practice, namely whether responsibility is to be based only on positive conduct, as when a state causes a given act to take place, or whether it also extends to passive conduct, as when a state merely permits conduct to take place. In the latter instance, one may ask whether a state has a duty to prevent unlawful conduct if it has the knowledge or capacity to do so, or if a state is to be held responsible, even though it lacks prior knowledge of the contemplated action or the capacity to prevent it.

The Eichmann[236] case is probably the most prominent example of state conduct that raises the question of state responsibility for wrongful conduct against another state. The search for state responsibility criteria in this area suggests that analogies to other aspects of state responsibility should be used. One parallel could be the regulation of armed conflicts and general principles of international criminal responsibility from which are derived applicable rules for state and individual responsibility in cases of violations of international extradition law.[237] Nothing in the writings of scholars, however, suggests this analogy, and to the extent that it is a novel doctrine, it requires refinement.[238] Consider, however, the principles of accountability with respect to command responsibility[239] and the unavailability of the defense of obedience to superior

---

236 Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, [1968] 36 Int'l. L. R. 5 (Israel). See U.N. Doc. S/1439 (1960).

237 Eagleton, supra note 235 at 80 (stating "A state owes at all times a duty to protect other states against injurious acts by individuals from within its jurisdiction."). See also Convention on the Rights and Duties of States, Dec. 26, 1933, 165 L.N.T.S. 10; Alwyn V. Freeman, The International Responsibility of States for Denial of Justice (1938); Oliver J. Lissitzyn, The Meaning of the Term Denial of Justice in International Law, 30 Am. J. Int'l L. 632 (1936); S.N. Guha Roy, Is the Law of Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens a Part of Universal International Law?, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 863 (1961).

238 Id. See also Fritz Munch, State Responsibility in International Criminal Law, in A Treatise on International Criminal Law 143 (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 1973); Theodor Meron, International Responsibility of States for Unauthorized Acts of Their Officials, 33 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 85 (1957); Antonio Cassese, On the Use of Criminal Law Notions in Determining State Responsibility for Genocide, 5 J. Int'l Crim. Just. 875 (2007); André Nollkaemper, Concurrence between Individual Responsibility and State Responsibility in International Law, 52 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 615 (2003); Marko Milanovic, State Responsibility for Genocide, 17 Eur. J. Int'l L 553 (2006); Paola Gaeta, On What Conditions Can a State Be Held Responsible for Genocide?, 18 Eur. J. Int'l L 631 (2007); Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide (Bosn. & Herz. v. Serb. and Mont.), 2007 I.C.J. 43 (Feb. 26); Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), 1984 I.C.J. 14 (June 27).

239 For the principle of command responsibility, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Substantive Criminal Law 154 (1978). For the responsibility of states, see 8 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 807–815, 825–830 (1963); Meron, supra note 238. For case law of the ICTY, see, e.g., Prosecutor v. Limaj et al., Case No. IT-03-66-T, Judgement, ¶ 519 (Nov. 30 2005) (holding that "The principle of individual criminal responsibility of superiors for failure to prevent or to punish crimes committed by subordinates is an established principle of international customary law. . . ."); Prosecutor v. Halilovic, Case No. IT-01-48-T, Judgement, ¶ 39 (Nov. 16, 2005) (holding that "the purpose behind the concept of command responsibility is to ensure compliance with the laws and customs of war and international humanitarian law generally. The principle of command responsibility may be seen in part to arise from one of the basic principles of international humanitarian law aiming at ensuring protection for protected categories of persons and objects during armed conflicts. This protection is at the very heart of international humanitarian law. Ensuring this protection requires, in the first place, preventative measures which commanders are in a position to take, by virtue of the effective control which they have over their subordinates, thereby ensuring the enforcement of international humanitarian law in armed conflict. A commander who possesses effective control over the actions of his subordinates is duty bound to orders.[240] By analogy, perpetrators of abductions would be individually responsible under international criminal law without benefit of the defense of obedience to superior orders, and their superiors would also be held accountable by reason of command responsibility.

State responsibility, as discussed within this section, attaches because an injuria has been perpetrated. The only established remedies are reparations and diplomatic apologies; the additional remedy of the return of the person seized unlawfully is not yet recognized, however, some courts have seen fit to apply it.[241] The latter approach is in compliance with the higher principle of ex injuria ius non oritur. Indeed, without such a remedy, the integrity of the international legal order would not be preserved.[242]

Section 207, Attribution of Conduct of States of the Restatement (Third), Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1987), states:[243]

> A state is responsible for any violation of its obligations under international law resulting from action or inaction by:
>
> (a) the government of the state,
>
> (b) the government or authorities of any political subdivision of the state, or
>
> (c) any organ, agency, official, employee, or other agent of a government or of any political subdivision, acting within the scope of authority or under color of such authority.

7.4. Internationally Protected Human Rights and State Responsibility

7.4.1. Introduction

State responsibility hinges on the existence of an international right or duty, the transgression of which has certain consequences and requires a remedy to attach. This applies to the second category discussed here, namely practices that violate human rights. The following questions arise in this context: what are these rights, what are their sources, what is their legally binding effect, what sanctions apply, and who applies them?

In judicial terms, state responsibility in this context encompasses:

1. The legally binding effect of internationally protected human rights proscriptions.
2. The self-executing nature of the obligations.

---

ensure that they act within the dictates of international humanitarian law and that the laws and customs of war are therefore respected."). For case law of the ICTR, see, e.g.,Prosecutor v. Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, Case No. ICTR-99-52-A, Judgement, ¶ 484 (Nov. 28, 2007) (holding that "for the liability of an accused to be established under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Prosecutor has to show that: (1) a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction was committed; (2) the accused was a de jure or de facto superior of the perpetrator of the crime and had effective control over this subordinate (i.e., he had the material ability to prevent or punish commission of the crime by his subordinate); (3) the accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was going to be committed or had been committed; and (4) the accused did not take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or punish the commission of the crime by a subordinate."). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application (2011).

240 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law (2d ed. 1999). See also Yoram Dinstein, The Defense of "Obedience to Superior Orders" in International Law (1965); Theo Vögler, The Defense of "Superior Orders" in International Criminal Law, in Bassiouni & Nanda, supra note 238, at 619.

241 See infra Sec. 7.5.

242 Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Fourth Session, May 4–July 24, 1992, U.N. GAOR, 47th Sess., Supp. (No. 10), at 34, U.N. Doc. A/47/10 (1992).

243 Restatement (Third), supra note 219, at § 207.

3. The penetration of international law into municipal law.

4. The enforcement of human rights proscriptions.

A complete treatment of all these questions is obviously beyond the scope of this analysis, but some general observations must be made.

An initial observation should be made about the attitudes of national courts with respect to internationally protected human rights. Time and time again, court decisions on the subject of unlawful seizures and irregular rendition practices distinguish between violations of international law and violations of national law. National courts accept this dichotomy and do not deem themselves jurisdictionally impaired by violations of international law, and proceed with the case as if the violation of internationally protected human rights did not exist.

The rationale sustaining this dichotomy between violations of international law and violations of national law is predicated on the concept of separate sovereignties. It is also argued that matters of international law are deemed within the prerogatives of the executive (in most national legal systems) and that national courts have no power to enforce internationally protected human rights.[244] Governments also argue that human rights are not enforceable by national courts for a variety of reasons, including:

1. There are no binding international sanctions for violations of human rights, except as provided by treaties;

2. There are no existing binding obligations arising out of internationally enunciated human rights, which are applicable to national courts qua, except as provided by treaties; and

3. Self-executing enforcement of internationally enunciated human rights would violate state sovereignty.

The answers to these issues in the present state of international law are by no means as clear-cut as the proponents of human rights or the proponents of state sovereignty claim they are. In fact, no other area of international law is as riddled with confusion between the lex lata and de lege ferenda as is the literature on international protection of human rights. One may even occasionally find some arguments in the nature of lex desiderata that are advanced as lex lata.

The observations that follow do not exhaust the arguments advanced on these issues, but are intended to present a cursory view of the present state of the law and its likely immediate development. The central issue is not whether there are human rights, but whether there are rules with enough specific content contained in one of the sources of international law deemed binding upon states and requiring enforcement. Thus, the need is to identify the sources of such rights and then to determine whether these sources contain specific rights with a defined content that applies to unlawful seizures and irregular rendition practices.

7.4.2. The Sources of Internationally Protected Human Rights

The sources of internationally protected human rights are:

1. the United Nations Charter;

2. the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

3. multilateral treaties;

---

244 See, e.g., Richard B. Lillich, International Human Rights (1991); Louis Sohn & Thomas Buergenthal, International Protection of Human Rights (1973). For cases wherein the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was invoked, see United States v. Steinberg, 478 F. Supp. 29 (N.D. Ill. 1979) (involving an extradition case); Fuji v. State, 38 Cal. 2d. 718, 242 P.2d 617 (1952). For references to other cases involving international human rights instruments, see Richard B. Lillich, The Role of Domestic Courts in Promoting International Human Rights Norms, 24 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 153 (1978).

4. decisions of international courts; and

5. United Nations resolutions.

Classification is based on the degree of applicability and binding nature of specific obligations falling within the meaning of internationally protected human rights.

(1) The United Nations Charter

The Charter refers to respect for human rights in Articles 1(3), 13(1)(b), 55(c), 62(2), and 76(c). The language of Article 55 is quite revealing:

> With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well being, which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principles of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:
>
> …
>
> (c) Universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

The language quoted above has been considered by some as a statement of principles or a goal, while others read it as stating Charter obligations. Consider, however, that Article 56 states:

> All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55.

Such a clear statement of obligation places in issue not whether an obligation to achieve the observance of human rights exists, but rather what the specific content of these rights is.

A comprehensive summary of these issues and the arguments of the proponents of various positions has been made by Professor Egon Schwelb.[245] One answer appears in the position of the International Court of Justice in its 1970 Advisory Opinion on "The Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia, notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276."[246] The Court unequivocally recognized that the Charter imposes human rights obligations on member states and that these are self-executing obligations. The Court, in paragraph 129 of its opinion, stated that South African apartheid laws and decrees "constitute a violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."[247]

In paragraph 131 the Court held:

> Under the Charter of the United Nations, the former Mandatory had pledged itself to observe and respect, in a territory on international states, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinctions as to race. To establish, indeed to enforce distinctions, exclusions, restrictions and limitations exclusively based on grounds of race, color, descent or national or ethnic origin which constitute a denial of fundamental human rights is a flagrant violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter.[248] 245 Egon Schwelb, The International Court of Justice and the Human Rights Clauses of the Charter, 66 Am. J. Int'l L. 337 (1972). The obligations of international law, though at times couched in moral terms, still have an internationally enforceable content. See Myres S. McDougal et al., Law and Public Order in Space 154–155 (1963).

---

246 Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, 1971 I.C.J. 16 (June 21).

247 Id. at 57.

248 Id. (emphasis added).

Thus, according to the Court's view, the Charter, by enunciating its purposes and principles on human rights, established self-executing obligations that acquire their specific content from the Charter as well as other sources of internationally protected human rights.

The issue, it seems, is whether the Charter, having established certain general principles and purposes, can be said to incorporate by reference those specific rights that, by virtue of the evolutionary nature of the subject, have and will continue to develop through various sources of international law. The answer is affirmative, and therefore, these specific rights must be ascertained to determine their applicability. Once ascertained, the specific rights become self-executing obligations by virtue of Article 56. Furthermore, the specific obligations expressed in multilateral treaties are another source of applicable laws and complement the general principles and purposes of the Charter. As an advocate of human rights, this writer maintains that such specific rights should be considered as interpretative of the Charter and become self-executing under Article 56.

(2) The Universal Declaration of Human Rights[249]

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted in 1948 as a General Assembly resolution. It enunciates specific rights, some of which are affected by the practices of unlawful seizures and irregular renditions, namely:

> Article 3: Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.
>
> Article 9: No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.
>
> Article 10: Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

These three specific provisions apply to the following instances: (1) unlawful seizures such as abductions, (2) connivance between agents of two states to seize a person without lawful means, and (3) actions by private volunteers acting for or on behalf of a state.

A question exists, however, as to the legally binding effect of the Declaration. One school of thought posits that as a General Assembly resolution, the Declaration has no binding effect on states, while another school claims that the Declaration interprets Charter obligations. The most persuasive argument is contained in the separate opinion of Vice President Ammoun of the International Court of Justice in the Advisory Opinion on the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa), wherein he states:

> The Advisory Opinion takes judicial notice of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In the case of certain of the Declaration's provisions, attracted by the conduct of South Africa, it would have been an improvement to have dealt in terms with their comminatory nature, which is implied in paragraphs 130 and 131 of the Opinion by the references to their violation.
>
> In its written statement the French Government, alluding to the obligations which South Africa accepted under the Mandate and assumed on becoming a Member of the United Nations, and to the norms laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, stated that there was no doubt that the Government of South Africa had, in a very real sense, systematically infringed those rules and those obligations. Nevertheless, referring to the mention by resolution 2145 (XXI) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it objected that it was plainly impossible for noncompliance with the norms it enshrined to be sanctioned with the revocation of the Mandate, inasmuch as that Declaration was not in the nature of a treaty binding upon states.
>
> Although the affirmations of the Declaration are not binding qua international convention within the meaning of Article 38, paragraph 1(a), of the Statute of the Court, they can bind > states on the basis of custom within the meaning of paragraph 1(b) of the same Article, whether because they constituted a codification of customary law as was said in respect of Article 6 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, or because they have acquired the force of custom through a general practice accepted as law, in the words of Article 38, paragraph 1(b) of the Statute. One right which must certainly be considered a preexisting binding customary norm which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights codified is the right to equality, which by common consent has ever since the remotest times been deemed inherent in human nature.

249 G.A. Res. 217 A (III), Dec. 10, 1948.

>
> …
>
> It is not by mere chance that in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of the Rights of Man there stands, so worded, this primordial principle or axiom: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights."
>
> From this first principle flow most rights and freedoms.
>
> …
>
> …The ground was thus prepared for the legislative and constitutional process which began with the first declarations or bills of rights in America and Europe, continued with the constitutions of the nineteenth century, and culminated in positive international law in the San Francisco, Bogota and Addis Ababa charters, and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which has been confirmed by numerous resolutions of the United Nations, in particular the above mentioned declarations adopted by the General Assembly in resolutions 1514 (XV), 2625 (XXV) and 2627 (XXV). The Court in its turn has now confirmed it.[250]

Six decades ago the Declaration expressed the consensus of the member states, and since then it has become part of those "general principles of international law recognized by civilized nations." Thus, the provisions of the Declaration can be construed as legally binding because they interpret the principles and purposes of the Charter and are applicable to member states as the embodiment of Article 55, whose execution is required by Article 56. Furthermore, as part of "general principles," transgression of the norms of the Declaration would constitute a violation of international law to which state responsibility would attach.

(3) Multilateral Treaties

In this category of specific human rights norms, the provisions applicable to unlawful seizures and irregular means of rendition are clear and unambiguous. The application of these treaties can be viewed, as in the case of the Universal Declaration, as those specific norms that interpret the principles and purposes of the Charter, and consequently, they could be considered as self-executing under Article 56 of the Charter. In addition, as international treaties, they are part of conventional international law and derive their binding force from that source of international law.

The following provisions would apply to the instances at hand:

(a) The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[251]

Article 9

> 1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law.

---

250 Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, 1971 I.C.J. 16 (June 21) at 76.

251 G.A. Res. 2200 A (XXI), Dec. 16, 1966, U.N. GAOR, 21st Sess., Supp. (No. 16), U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1967), reprinted in 6 I.L.M. 368 (1967) (entered into force, Mar. 23, 1976).

2. Anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him.

3. Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgment.

4. Anyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that that court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful.

5. Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation.

Article 12

1. Everyone lawfully within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence.

2. Everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own.

3. The above-mentioned rights shall not be subject to any restrictions except those which are provided by law, are necessary to protect national security, public order (ordre public), public health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others, and are consistent with the other rights recognized in the present Covenant.

4. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country.

Article 13

An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to the present Covenant may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by, and be represented for the purpose before, the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority.

(b) The Convention Relating to the Status of Stateless Persons[252]

Article 31 Expulsion

1. The Contracting States shall not expel a stateless person lawfully in their territory save on grounds of national security or public order.

2. The expulsion of such a stateless person shall be only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with due process of law. Except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, the stateless person shall be allowed to submit evidence to clear himself, and to appeal to and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority.

3. The Contracting States shall allow such a stateless person a reasonable period within which to seek legal admission into another country. The Contracting States reserve the right to apply during that period such internal measures as they may deem necessary.

(c) The Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees[253]

Article 32 Expulsion

1. The Contracting States shall not expel a refugee lawfully in their territory save on grounds of national security or public order.

---

252 Sept. 1954, 360 U.N.T.S. 130.

253 The Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, July 28, 1951, 189 U.N.T.S. 137.

2. The expulsion of such a refugee shall be only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with due process of law. Except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, the refugee shall be allowed to submit evidence to clear himself, and to appeal to and be represented for the purpose before competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority.

3. The Contracting States shall allow such a refugee a reasonable period within which to seek legal admission into another country. The Contracting States reserve the right to apply during that period such internal measures as they may deem necessary.

Article 33 Prohibition of Expulsion or Return ("Non-Refoulement")

1. No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion.

2. The benefit of the present provision may not, however, be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country.

(d) Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment[254]

Article 3

1. No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.

Article 11

Each State Party shall keep under systematic review interrogation rules, instructions, methods and practices as well as arrangements for the custody and treatment of persons subjected to any form of arrest, detention or imprisonment in any territory under its jurisdiction, with a view to preventing any cases of torture.

(e) International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance[255]

Article 1

1. No one shall be subjected to enforced disappearance.

2. No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification for enforced disappearance.

---

254 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. res. 39/46, [annex, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984)], entered into force June 26, 1987, art. 3. The Convention against Torture contains an additional protocol establishing the Committee Against Torture. As of May 2012 there are seventy-one signatories and sixty-three state-parties. The United States has not signed the Optional Protocol. Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 18, 2002, 2375 U.N.T.S. 24841.

255 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, Dec. 20, 2006, C.N.737.2008.TREATIES-12. As of September 2012 there are ninety-one signatories and thirty-five state-parties to the Convention. The United States is not a signatory.

Article 2

For the purposes of this Convention, "enforced disappearance" is considered to be the arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorization, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which place such a person outside the protection of the law.

Article 3

Each State Party shall take appropriate measures to investigate acts defined in article 2 committed by persons or groups of persons acting without the authorization, support or acquiescence of the State and to bring those responsible to justice.

Article 4

Each State Party shall take the necessary measures to ensure that enforced disappearance constitutes an offence under its criminal law.

Article 5

The widespread or systematic practice of enforced disappearance constitutes a crime against humanity as defined in applicable international law and shall attract the consequences provided for under such applicable international law.

Article 6

1. Each State Party shall take the necessary measures to hold criminally responsible at least:

(a) Any person who commits, orders, solicits or induces the commission of, attempts to commit, is an accomplice to or participates in an enforced disappearance;

(b) A superior who:

(i) Knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that subordinates under his or her effective authority and control were committing or about to commit a crime of enforced disappearance;

(ii) Exercised effective responsibility for and control over activities which were concerned with the crime of enforced disappearance; and

(iii) Failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress the commission of an enforced disappearance or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution;

(c) Subparagraph (b) above is without prejudice to the higher standards of responsibility applicable under relevant international law to a military commander or to a person effectively acting as a military commander.

2. No order or instruction from any public authority, civilian, military or other, may be invoked to justify an offence of enforced disappearance.

(f) General Assembly Resolution on Extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions

6. Urges all States:

(a) To take all necessary and possible measures, in conformity with international human rights law and international humanitarian law, to prevent loss of life, in particular that of children, during public demonstrations, internal and communal violence, civil unrest, public emergencies or armed conflicts, and to on behalf of or with the consent or acquiescence of the State act with restraint and in conformity with international human rights law and international humanitarian law, including the principles of proportionality and necessity, and in this regard to ensure that police and law enforcement officials are guided by the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials and the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials;

(b) To ensure the effective protection of the right to life of all persons under their jurisdiction and to investigate promptly and thoroughly all killings, including those targeted at specific groups of persons, such as racially motivated violence leading to the death of the victim, killings of persons belonging to national or ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities, killings of persons affected by terrorism, hostage-taking or foreign occupation, killings of refugees, internally displaced persons, migrants, street children or members of indigenous communities, killings of persons for reasons related to their activities as human rights defenders, lawyers, journalists or demonstrators, killings committed in the name of passion or in the name of honour, all killings committed for any discriminatory reason, including sexual orientation, as well as all other cases where a person's right to life has been violated, and to bring those responsible to justice before a competent, independent and impartial judiciary at the national or, where appropriate, international level, and to ensure that such killings, including those committed by security forces, police and law enforcement agents, paramilitary groups or private forces, are neither condoned nor sanctioned by State officials or personnel;

7. Affirms the obligation of States, in order to prevent extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, to protect the lives of all persons deprived of their liberty in all circumstances and to investigate and respond to deaths in custody;

8. Urges all States to ensure that persons deprived of their liberty are treated humanely and with full respect for their human rights and to ensure that their treatment, including judicial guarantees, and conditions conform to the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners and, where applicable, to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 19494 and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 8 June 197711 in relation to all persons detained in armed conflict, as well as to other pertinent international instruments;

(g) The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[256]

Article 5

1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:

(a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court.

(b) the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfillment of any obligation prescribed by law.

(c) the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offense or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent him committing an offense or fleeing after having done so.

(d) the detention of a minor by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision or his lawful detention for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority.

(e) the lawful detention of persons for the prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases, or persons of unsound mind, alcoholics or drug addicts or vagrants.

(f) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition.

2. Everyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him.

---

256 The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Nov. 4, 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 262, E.T.S. No. 5.

3. Everyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1(c) of this Article shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial.

4. Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.

5. Everyone who has been the victim of arrest or detention in contravention of the provisions of this Article shall have an enforceable right to compensation.

(h) European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment[257]

Having regard to the provisions of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms,

Recalling that, under Article 3 of the same Convention, "no one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment";

Noting that the machinery provided for in that Convention operates in relation to persons who allege that they are victims of violations of Article 3;

Convinced that the protection of persons deprived of their liberty against torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment could be strengthened by non-judicial means of a preventive character based on visits,

(i) The Inter-American Convention on Human Rights[258]

Article 7 Right to Personal Liberty

1. Every person has the right to personal liberty and security.

2. No one shall be deprived of his physical liberty except for the reasons and under the conditions established beforehand by the constitution of the State Party concerned or by a law established pursuant thereto.

3. No one shall be subject to arbitrary arrest or imprisonment.

4. Anyone who is detained shall be informed of the reasons for his detention and shall be promptly notified of the charge or charges against him.

5. Any person detained shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to be released without prejudice to the continuation of the proceedings. His release may be subject to guarantees to assure his appearance for trial.

6. Anyone who is deprived of his liberty shall be entitled to recourse to a competent court, in order that the court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his arrest or detention and order his release if the arrest or detention is unlawful. In State parties whose laws provide that anyone who believes himself to be threatened with deprivation of his liberty is entitled to recourse to a competent court in order that it may decide on the lawfulness of such threat, this remedy may not be restricted or abolished. The interested party or another person in his behalf is entitled to seek these remedies.

---

257 European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Nov. 26, 1987, C.E.T.S. No. 126.

258 Nov. 22, 1969, O.A.S. Official Records Ser. K/XVI/1.1, Doc 65, Rev. 1, Corr. 1 (Jan. 7, 1970).

(j) The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights[259]

Article 6

Every individual shall have the right to liberty and to the security of his person. No one may be deprived of his freedom except for reasons and conditions previously laid down by law. In particular, no one may be arbitrarily arrested or detained.

Article 12

4. A non-national legally admitted in a territory of a State Party to the present Charter, may only be expelled from it by virtue of a decision taken in accordance with the law.

(k) The International Right to the Due Process of Law

In addition to these specific rights, there is the general right that every accused is entitled to the due process of the law.[260] This general right is not stated specifically in human rights documents, but is inferred therefrom. It emanates from the total fabric of human rights treaties and doctrines and from specific protections, and emerges as an overall concept of fairness that is inherent in the international scheme of human rights protections. Even though it is specifically mentioned in Article 32 of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, its absence from other specific provisions underscores its obviousness. Indeed, what can specific rights signify in the absence of the basic framework of a lawful process? There are many rights in international instruments that provide the legal foundation for judicial processes and their fairness. The most important of these rights include:

1. The right to life, liberty, and security of the person;
2. The right to recognition before the law and equal protection of the law;
3. The right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention;
4. The right to freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment;
5. The right to be presumed innocent;
6. The right to a fair trial;
7. The right to assistance of counsel;
8. The right to a speedy trial;
9. The right to appeal;
10. The right to be protected from double jeopardy; and
11. The right to be protected from ex post facto law.[261]

The cumulative effect of these individual rights gives rise to the right to due process.[262]

---

259 The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, June 17, 1981, in Basic Documents on Human Rights 551 (Ian Brownlie ed., 3d ed., 1992).

260 See generally Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 232.

261 Id. at ch. 9.

262 See Brennan, supra note 13; Roscoe Pound, Toward a New Jus Gentium, in Ideological Differences and World Order (Filmer S.C. Northrop ed., 1949). See also Luis Kutner, The Human Right to Individual Freedom (1970); Luis Kutner, World Habeus Corpus (1962); Hersch Lauterpacht, International Law and Human Rights (1950). See generally Myres S. McDougal et al., Human Rights and World Public Order (1980).

(4) Decisions of International Courts

The International Court of Justice dealt with the issue of human rights in its decisions on Namibia. In its Advisory Opinion, rendered in 1971, the Court made its position on the legally binding effects of human rights unequivocal.[263] The Court affirmed the justiciability of human rights issues and interpreted Charter references to human rights as legally binding obligations that acquire their specific content from other international instruments, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The only other international court rendering judgments with respect to human rights as applied to those states subscribing to its jurisdiction is the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), which was created by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The ECtHR has as its sole purpose and function the adjudication of disputes arising out of the ECHR.[264] It should be noted that the ECtHR falls under the rubric of the Council of Europe, which was founded in 1949 to promote human rights, democracy, and the rule of law, and is distinct from the European Union and its judicial organ, the European Court of Justice. The ECtHR has a much larger reach than the European Union, as it extends to forty-seven countries at present.

The experience of the European human rights system is unique in the history of mankind and demonstrates that with respect to the protection of human rights the barriers of state sovereignty can be lowered without having shattering effects on the states involved. The experience of European states in this case ought to allay some of the apprehensions that arise whenever the justiciability of human rights is advanced.

A survey of this sort should not omit a reference to decisions of Arbitral Tribunals and national courts that add their weight to the recognition of state responsibility for violations of human rights. Such cases are plentiful in the annals of international law. One example is the Chattin case[265] between the United States and Mexico, wherein violations of the human rights of a U.S. defendant in Mexican criminal proceedings were arbitrated between the two states and resulted in an award of damages to the individual. The protection of minorities in the post-WWI period, arising out of the Minorities Treaty of 1919 and other decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as well as Arbitral Tribunals, offer an equally abundant source of precedents for justiciability of those issues under principles of state responsibility.[266]

---

263 Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, 1971 I.C.J. 16 (June 21).

264 See Annual Reports prepared by the Council of Europe, Commission on Human Rights, Stock-Taking on the European Convention on Human Rights. See also Dominique Poncet, La Protection de l'Accusé par la Convention Européene des Droits de l'Homme (1977). Several cases were heard by the European Commission on Human Rights and by the European Court on Human Rights concerning cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or violation of the European Convention; they are cited and discussed in Arthur H. Robertson, Human Rights in Europe (1978). See the cases against Greece in Requests No. 3321/66, 3323/67, 3344/67. See also the cases against the United Kingdom (e.g., Ireland v. United Kingdom, Decision of the Commission of October 1, 1972, Application No. 5310/71; Hilton v. United Kingdom, App. No. 5613/72 (Mar. 5, 1976)).

265 See Chattin Case (United States v. United Mexican States), 1927 IV Rev. Int'l Arb. Awards 282. See also Bishop, supra note 234, at 753–785; 3 Hackworth Digest, supra note 23, at § 269.

266 See also Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Advisory Opinion, 2004 I.C.J. 136 (July 9).

(5) United Nations Resolutions

It is appropriate first to discuss the impact on the United Nations of the 1971 Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice on Namibia (South West Africa). The Security Council, in a resolution of October 20, 1971, by a vote of thirteen in favor, none against, and two abstentions, conveyed its appreciation to the Court, stating expressly that it "agrees with the court's opinion expressed in paragraph 133 of the Advisory Opinion," which is quoted above. Shortly thereafter, the General Assembly, in a resolution of December 20, 1971, stated that it "welcomed" the Advisory Opinion "as expressed in paragraph 133." This statement of approval was passed by 111 votes in favor, 2 against, and 10 abstentions.[267] Clearly, as to the applicability of human rights under international law and as to their binding effect, there could be no stronger support than the overwhelming endorsement of the International Court of Justice Advisory Opinion by the Security Council and the General Assembly.

United Nations resolutions emanate from the Security Council and the General Assembly. The significance of such resolutions, particularly those of the General Assembly, which are recommendatory, is that it expresses the views of the world community. Such views, however, acquire legal significance from the recitations of the resolutions[268] and their relationship to further developments of the same subject through other international instruments. Such developments, combined with a record of consistent support by the General Assembly, exhibit and confirm the existence of "general principles" as well as international customs—two sources of international law. There is no greater or more overwhelming record of support for the protection of human rights than those expressed by the General Assembly and various UN specialized agencies. The record reveals that the UN bodies have consistently referred to and upheld the recognition, application, and implementation of the principles and purposes of the Charter and other international instruments dealing with human rights.

The conclusion is that General Assembly resolutions that have been consistently recited or relied upon, and that find tangible expression in other international law developments, rank among those expressions of world community prescriptions that are among the sources of international law having legally binding effects on the world community. In short, they can become customary international law, as is the case with the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

(a) The International Right to the Due Process of Law Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law[269]

II. Scope of the obligation

> 3. The obligation to respect, ensure respect for and implement international human rights law and international humanitarian law as provided for under the respective bodies of law, includes, inter alia, the duty to:
>
> > (a) Take appropriate legislative and administrative and other appropriate measures to prevent violations;

---

267 G.A. Res. 2871 (XXVI).

268 Samuel A. Bleicher, The Legal Significance of Re-Citation of General Assembly Resolutions, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 444 (1969).

269 The International Right to the Due Process of Law Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, G.A. Res. 60/147, U.N. GAOR 64th Sess., 1465 U.N.T.S. 24841 (Dec. 16, 2005). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Recognition of Victims' Rights, 6 Hum. Rts. L. Rev 203 (2006).

(b) Investigate violations effectively, promptly, thoroughly and impartially and, where appropriate, take action against those allegedly responsible in accordance with domestic and international law;

(c) Provide those who claim to be victims of a human rights or humanitarian law violation with equal and effective access to justice, as described below, irrespective of who may ultimately be the bearer of responsibility for the violation; and

(d) Provide effective remedies to victims, including reparation, as described below.

VI. Treatment of victims

10. Victims should be treated with humanity and respect for their dignity and human rights, and appropriate measures should be taken to ensure their safety, physical and psychological well-being and privacy, as well as those of their families. The State should ensure that its domestic laws, to the extent possible, provide that a victim who has suffered violence or trauma should benefit from special consideration and care to avoid his or her re-traumatization in the course of legal and administrative procedures designed to provide justice and reparation.

VII. Victims' right to remedies

11. Remedies for gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law include the victim's right to the following as provided for under international law:

(a) Equal and effective access to justice;

(b) Adequate, effective and prompt reparation for harm suffered;

(c) Access to relevant information concerning violations and reparation mechanisms.

7.4.3. State Responsibility for Violation of Internationally Protected Human Rights: Transfer and Torture

Although the sources of internationally protected human rights, discussed in the previous section, make it clear that states have an obligation to protect individual rights and liberties, the mechanisms of enforcing those rights and holding states accountable for violations of those rights can be elusive in the current international context. The United States' "extraordinary rendition" program has as its goal avoiding giving terrorism suspects due process of law in American courts and obtaining information from suspected terrorists by methods too brutal for American investigators to use.[270] This is evident from the statement of a former covert CIA agent who worked in the Middle East that "If you want a serious interrogation, you send a prisoner to Jordan. If you want them to be tortured you send them to Syria. If you want someone to disappear-never to see them again-you send them to Egypt."[271] Although the executive may attempt to deflect state responsibility by claiming that such "extraordinary rendition" was necessary to protect national security, this argument would fail as the protection against torture has arguably risen to a jus cogens norm that is non-derogable under any circumstances.[272] Furthermore, any argument the executive might attempt to raise that a special CIA unit engaged in "extraordinary rendition" ultra vires would fail as attribution principles view ultra vires actions of state organs as irrelevant to the inquiry regarding whether that state organ's actions are attributable to the state.[273]

---

270 See Button, supra note 70, at 535–536.

271 Bob Bear, quoted in Ruth Jamieson & Kierran McEvoy, State Crime by Proxy & Juridical Othering, 45 Brit. J. Criminology 504, 516 (2005).

272 See Button, supra note 70, at 545–569.

273 Id. at 544–545 (discussing ILC Articles 4 and 7 that allow actions by state organs to be attributed to the state).

The difficulty of bringing the United States to task for its policy of "extraordinary rendition" and its underlying motivation of torture via transfer to willing countries lies in practical and procedural hurdles.[274] Although the individuals who are the subject of torture would be theoretically able to bring a claim against the United States, it would be unlikely that they would have standing under the CAT and ICCPR to do so as the only forum with jurisdiction to hear individual complaints brought under these instruments is the Inter-American Commission and Court on Human Rights, and the number of such cases proceeding past screening procedures are few and far between.[275] Domestic claims in the United States under the ATCA or TVPA would fail as those claims can only be brought against natural persons or corporations.[276] For various reasons, including the prospect of losing U.S. aid, states largely lack the political will to challenge the United States' "extraordinary rendition" program before an international tribunal.[277] Furthermore, as the "extraordinary rendition" program was secretive in nature, there would likely be a paucity of discoverable evidence in the form of memoranda, directives, and other written evidence that could be obtained; and the United States has revoked general consent to the International Court of Justice's jurisdiction, so that absent voluntary consent to the International Court of Justice's jurisdiction in this matter (an unlikely prospect to say the least), the Court would lack jurisdiction to hear this matter.[278]

It is clear that the U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition," more specifically with regard to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, violates not only the CAT and the ICCPR, but also the provisions of the Geneva Conventions with respect to the rights of POWs and civilians in particular.[279] The Geneva Conventions apply, whether during international armed conflicts between two or more High Contracting Parties or during partial or total occupation of the territory governed by the Geneva Conventions, to any "protected persons" under the Geneva

---

274 See Button, supra note 70, at 566–567 ("The invocation of an international human right is virtually impossible. Unless an individual is 'fortunate' enough to be a victim at the hands of his state of nationality, giving him a right to personally invoke his rights or to be a citizen of a country willing to take up his case, he has no recourse to justice against a state that has rendered him to torture.") For an argument against domestic jurisdiction for crimes stemming from extraordinary rendition, see Dhooge, supra note 70, at 344 (2007) ("Even the staunchest supporter of the Bush administration's antiterrorism policies must admit that the U.S. rendition policy, as modified in the wake of September 11th, has resulted in human rights abuses. Rather, the issue in Jeppesen Dataplan, Inc. and similar future suits is whether U.S. courts should proceed with the adjudication of claims alleging violations of international human rights law arising from a domestic program created and implemented in secrecy by the executive branch and bearing significant consequences for U.S. national security and foreign policy. The answer to this issue is clearly in the negative despite the shocking nature of the conduct to which the plaintiffs were allegedly subjected.")

275 The case of Lopez Brugos v. Uruguay, Communication No. R12/52, U.N. Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40), allowed an individual to proceed against a state based on a human rights violation under the ICCPR. See Button, supra note 70, at 556. For a discussion of individual standing under the CAT and ICCPR, see Button, supra note 70, at 557.

276 Id. at 558.

277 Id. at 558–559.

278 Id. at 561–563. The CAT, ICCPR, Refugee Convention, and Geneva Conventions do not specifically provide the ICJ with jurisdiction over matters related to torture as it relates to a program of "extraordinary rendition."

279 See the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 and their two Additional Protocols of 1977: Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3114, 75 U.N.T.S. 31; Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3217, 75 U.N.T.S. 85; Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, 75 U.N.T.S. 135; Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 75 U.N.T.S. 287; Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions

Conventions, with different rights attaching to different groups of "protected persons."[280] The third Geneva Convention (regarding POWs) and the fourth Geneva Convention (regarding civilians) generally provide protection to "protected persons" until their release and repatriation.[281] The Bush administration raised arguments against there being a war between High Contracting Parties by stating that the conflict is between the United States and al-Qaeda, a nonstate actor to whom the Geneva Conventions do not apply, but has accepted the applicability of the Geneva Conventions to the war in Iraq.[282] Although there remain questions regarding the nature and extent of the United States' occupation of Afghanistan and Iraq, it is clear that the United States controlled at least portions of Afghanistan and Iraq, which would satisfy the Geneva Conventions' "occupation" requirement.[283] The United States has refused to extend "protected person" status to any al-Qaeda members, whether as POWs or as civilians detained during the wars.[284] This policy was necessary, as the Geneva Conventions protect both civilians and POWs from torture, and contain special protections prohibiting the transfer of civilians.[285] Were members of al-Qaeda protected as POWs or civilians, the United States could not have caused such individuals to be transferred to a third state, wherein they were likely to be tortured, without committing a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions. The concern of the Geneva Conventions against the deportation or transfer of civilians during a war was based in large part on the Nazi practice of stripping German Jews of their citizenship to facilitate a superficially lawful "deportation" of these individuals to either extermination or slave labor camps.[286] Thus, although the Geneva Conventions require an occupying power to respect existing immigration laws of an occupied state, the Geneva Conventions would not allow an occupying power to pressure an occupied state into passing immigration laws allowing for "deportation" of an unwanted class, such as "terrorists."[287] There is nothing in the Geneva Conventions or the Hague Convention that allows an occupying power to expand the rules of deportation in the occupied state, and Article 49 of the fourth Geneva Convention clearly prohibits deportations of civilians.[288] However, in 2003, the Administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq issued a memorandum requiring non-Iraqis in Iraq to obtain a permit to remain in the country, and this permit could be denied for individuals who engaged in "terrorism."[289] These permits were to be renewed every ninety days, and one of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, June 8, 1977, 1125 U.N.T.S. 3; Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of August 12, 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts, June 8, 1977, 1125 U.N.T.S. 609. See also Convention with Respect to the Laws and Customs of War on Land art. 4, July 29, 1899, 32 Stat. 1803, reprinted in 1 Am. J. Int'l L. 129 (Supp. 1907); Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land art. 4, Oct. 18, 1907, 36 Stat. 2277, r*eprinted in* 2 Am. J. Int'l L. 90 (Supp. 1908).

---

280 See David Weissbrodt & Amy Bergquist, Extraordinary Rendition and the Humanitarian Law of War and Occupation, 47 Va. J. Int'l L. 295, 297–298 (2007).

281 Id. at 301.

282 Id. at 300–303.

283 Id. at 303–307.

284 For a detailed discussion of the legal reasoning behind this policy, including the Bush administration's failure to consider the possibility that a person not protected as a POW could still be protected as a civilian, see id. at 309–318.

285 Id. at 318–321.

286 Id. at 323–324.

287 Id. at 321–332 (discussing the Goldsmith memo and changes to Iraqi immigration policies and practices).

288 Id. at 333–334.

289 More particularly, as one author notes, this order provides that:

> A permit may be denied if an officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the permit applicant "will commit offenses, or engage in criminal activity," or: Will engage in or has engaged in an act of terrorism, or is a member of a terrorist organization or an organization that there are reasonable grounds of the penalties for remaining in the country without such a permit was deportation.[290] It is difficult if not impossible to distinguish the effect of deporting someone on terrorism grounds after modifying local law from Nazi deportation of German Jews during WWII.[291] The same kind of reasoning behind the prohibition on "deportations" applies with equal force to "transfers," despite the arguments in the Bush administration's Goldsmith memorandum to the contrary.[292] However, such transfers and deportations have been ongoing, which has resulted in the torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment of an unknown number of individuals as such transfers are in all likelihood undocumented.

The same kinds of problems regarding holding the U.S. government responsible for violations of the CAT and ICCPR hold true with the Geneva Conventions. Although there is domestic legislation that may provide a ground for a U.S. trial on the matter, namely the War Crimes Act,[293] the lack of prosecutorial will coupled with congressional legislation making it more difficult to hold U.S. personnel accountable under the War Crimes Act makes domestic prosecution a nonstarter.[294] Although the International Criminal Court's (ICC) Rome Statute establishes the Court's jurisdiction over a plan or policy of unlawful deportation or transfer, Afghanistan has signed a non-surrender agreement with the United States and Iraq is not a party to the ICC.[295] As the United States is not a state-party to the Rome Statute, it is difficult to discern a jurisdictional basis for the Court to hear such a case against the United States.[296] Although the Geneva Conventions place an affirmative duty on High Contracting Parties to enact legislation to provide effective penal sanctions for those who commit grave breaches of the conventions, it remains to be seen whether a nation will effectively find jurisdiction to prosecute the United States on these grounds.[297]

The Obama administration issued Executive Order 13,491, which created an interagency task force charged with considering the current U.S. practice of interrogation and transfer of individuals and making recommendations regarding the policy.[298] Regarding interrogations, the task force recommended the creation of a "High-Value Detainee Interrogation Group" with a principal function of intelligence gathering as opposed to law enforcement.[299] The task force concluded that the existing Army Field Manual[300] and Navy Commander's Handbook on the Law of Naval Operations[301] provisions on interrogation were sufficient and no additional or to believe will: i) engage in acts which are offensive to the principles of democratic government, institutes or processes, in Iraq; or ii) engage in or instigate the removal by force of any government.

---

Id. at 330–331.

290 Id.

291 Id. at 335.

292 For a detailed discussion on this point, see id. at 337–343.

293 War Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2441 (1996).

294 Weissbrodt & Bergquist, supra note 280, at 344–345 & n.281–282.

295 Id. at 347–348.

296 Id.

297 Although a case was brought against Donald Rumsfeld and others on behalf of four Iraqi detainees in 2004 in Germany, where such enacting legislation existed, the German court refused to accept jurisdiction pursuant to the principle of subsidiarity as the United States had primary jurisdiction and had not indicated it was refraining from punishing the behavior described in the complaint. See id. at 349–355.

298 See John Crook, ed. Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law: International Human Right: U.S. Task Force Report on Interrogations and Transfers, 103 A.J.I.L. 760 (2009).

299 Id. at 761–762.

300 U.S. Dept. of the Army, Field Manual, 27–10 (1956).

301 U.S. Dept. of the Navy, Commander's Handbook on the Law of Naval Operations, NWP 1-14M (2007).

different guidance was necessary.[302] Regarding transfers, the task force recommended that the United States rely on assurances that transferees would not be tortured, but that these assurances should be evaluated by the State Department, with the Inspector General of the Departments of State, Defense, and Homeland Security preparing a coordinated annual report on transfers in reliance of assurances.[303] The task force also recommended the inclusion of a monitoring mechanism to ensure that the assurances were being met.[304] However, reliance on such "assurances" cannot be justified as torture is secretive by its nature and would likely escape any monitoring process, and neither state would have an interest in exposing human rights abuses resulting from such a rendition.[305] Thus, there is no indication that the Obama administration will change course regarding the policy of "extraordinary rendition."

7.5. Treaty Interpretation and Internationally Protected Human Rights

The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969[306] states in Article 31:

> 1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.
>
> …
>
> 3. There shall be taken into account, together with context:
>
> (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions.

Subsequent agreements and customs, as per subparagraph (b) of Article 31, are sources of interpretation of prior treaty provisions. Moreover, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights should be regarded as a subsequent agreement that interprets Article 55 of the Charter by reason of its intended import as stated in its Preamble, namely:

> Whereas, the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom.[307]

The link between Article 55 of the Charter and the Universal Declaration having been so established, and Article 31 of the Vienna Convention allowing the interpretation of Article 55 to be accomplished through subsequent agreements, the Declaration can be deemed to interpret the Charter's provisions. Consequently, its specific guarantees are incorporated in the general meaning of Charter provisions on human rights and are binding as well as self-executing under 302 Crook, supra note 298, at 761–762.

---

303 Id. at 762.

304 Id.

305 See Button, supra note 70, at 549 (discussing the Human Rights Watch reports regarding diplomatic assurances and torture). See also Human Rights Watch, Empty Promises: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture (2004); Human Rights Watch, Still at Risk: Diplomatic Assurances No Safeguard against Torture (2005).

306 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, U.N. Doc. A/Conf. 39/27, reprinted in 8 I.L.M. 679 (1969). See also Myres S. McDougal & W. Michael Reisman, International Law in Contemporary Perspective 1119–1270 (1981); Harvard Research in International Law, Who May Interpret, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 973 (Supp. 1935). It should be noted that the Vienna Convention embodies customary international law. The United States did not ratify the convention, but is bound by customary international law. The Restatement (Third) on Foreign Relations Law of the United States contains most of the Vienna Convention provisions. See Restatement (Third), supra note 219, 307 G.A. Res. 217 A (III), Dec. 10, 1948 (emphasis added).

Article 56 of the Charter. Additionally, other human rights sources should be considered as interpretative of Charter provisions. Violations of such obligations constitute a breach of international law, and therefore, states are estopped from recurring violations of human rights in their processes of unlawful seizures and irregular rendition devices.

The problem arises in the United States in light of recent Supreme Court cases holding that certain international treaties are non–self-executing as discussed in Chapter II, Section 2.2.

7.6. Remedies

From this discussion of the sources of state responsibility, there can be no doubt that violations of certain specific internationally protected human rights constitute internationally enforceable rights in the nature of an injuria to which state responsibility attaches, and that, in addition to affording specific remedies, cannot produce legitimate outcomes. The question is first whether arbitrary arrest and detention fall into the category of serious violations of internationally protected human rights so as to be considered injuria warranting a legal remedy. The answer seems obvious, as there can be no greater internationally protected human right after the right to life than the right to liberty.

In addition, there is the question relating to the extent of a state's obligation to protect such rights. Clearly, a state cannot infringe upon these rights without due process of law, but is the state obliged to insure against the occurrence of such results when committed by other states? Such an obligation is not yet recognized, because of the relatively recent development of the law of human rights, but if it were recognized, then the state wherein such violations occurred would be aggrieved in two ways. First, the actions of the other state would infringe on the obligation of the state to secure the right of freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. Second, arising by virtue of the first, the state, as all states, sharing a common duty to insure the safeguarding of internationally protected human rights would be affected by a transgression of such commonly binding obligations.

By arguing for this new obligation, it can be asserted that the rights of an injured state cannot be severed from those of the individual whose internationally protected rights were infringed. The remedy applicable to an international injuria should bar the ripening of such violations into lawful outcomes.

A paradigm of such a remedy found its expression in the Jacob-Salomon case,[308] where a former German citizen was taken to Germany from Switzerland by force and deceit. Because of a 1921 treaty between Germany and Switzerland concerning unresolved disputes, the matter was submitted to an international court of arbitration.[309] Shortly after the case was initiated, Germany admitted error and returned Jacob to the Swiss authorities.

Five other cases deserve mention in this regard. The first is one in which a Belgian citizen was seized by French agents and brought to trial in France. The Tribunal Correctionel d'Avesnes held in 1933 that the defendant should be returned to Belgium because he was illegally seized, and the French government immediately complied. In a 1965 situation between Italy and Switzerland, the Affaire Mantovani,[310] Italy returned an unlawfully seized person to Switzerland, and the Italian authorities extended their apologies to the Swiss government.[311] A 1962

---

308 Preuss, Kidnapping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory, supra note 9; Preuss, Settlement of the Jacob Kidnapping Case, supra note 9.

309 Treaty of Arbitration and Conciliation between the Swiss Confederation and the German Reich, Dec. 3, 1921, 12 L.N.T.S. 281.

310 See Charles Rousseau, Chronique des Faits Internationaux, 69 Rev. Général de Droit Int'le Public 761 (1965).

311 But see the Bozano case, supra note 54 and accompanying text.

case, known as The Red Crusader,[312] between Denmark and the United Kingdom, involved the seizure of a fishing-boat captain by Denmark, which sought to prosecute him for illegally fishing in its territorial waters. On the United Kingdom's complaint of the illegal seizure, the captain was returned to his country. In another case, in September 1974, a U.S. deserter was seized by U.S. agents fifty yards inside Canada after hot pursuit commenced in U.S. territory. On Canada's complaint he was returned to Canada within days.[313] Finally, although in the 1981 Jaffe case Canada's protests did not result in his return to that state, his kidnappers were extradited to Canada from the United States to answer the kidnapping charges.[314] In the case of Kear v. Hilton,[315] the Fourth Circuit held that a professional bail bondsmen from the United States who kidnapped a bail jumper in Canada and brought him to Florida for trial was extraditable to Canada on kidnapping charges.

These cases upheld and vindicated the principle ex injuria non oritur. It must also be noted that world community standards were enunciated to that effect in the unanimous resolution of the Security Council in the complaint of Argentina against Israel in the Eichmann case wherein the Council stated:

> [A]cts such as that under consideration, which affect the sovereignty of another state and, therefore, cause international friction, may, if repeated, endanger peace and security. Requests the government of Israel to make appropriate reparation in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the rules of International Law.[316]

The Charter principles of the United Nations and rules of international law include international protection of human rights, which is at issue in unlawful seizure and abduction practices. This analysis leads to the following conclusions:

1. States must abide by specific human rights norms and fulfill the principles and purposes of the Charter and the instruments that interpret it.

2. Unlawful seizures in violation of international law and improper methods executed without benefit of a legal process insuring minimal standards of due process or in violation

---

312 The case was not reported in official texts but was discussed in several newspapers and magazines in the United States.

313 An incident involving Japan and South Korea was resolved in November 1973. In August 1973, Kim Dae Jung, spokesman for the opposition of the South Korea's government, was abducted from a hotel room in Tokyo.

> After a week of intensive negotiations, South Korea dispatched Prime Minister Kim Jong Pil to Japan to bow and offer an apology for the kidnapping to Prime Minister Kakuei Tanaka. Under the terms of the compromise, the government of President Chung Hee Park conceded that the chief "suspect" in the kidnapping was Kim Dong Woon, the former first secretary of the Korean Embassy in Tokyo and a suspected agent of the South Korea's Central Intelligence Agency. South Korea, though, insisted that whatever Kim Dong Woon might have done was not in any way an official act, but entirely private. That distinction was essential to the compromise. The government of Prime Minister Tanaka had stated earlier that Japanese sovereignty had been violated only if it turned out that the kidnapping was an "official" act of the Seoul government. As for Kim Dae Jung, South Korea's Foreign Minister said that he had been freed from protective custody in Seoul. South Korea would waive any action against Kim for past activities if he did not repeat his "crimes"—presumably public opposition to the Park regime.
>
> Time, Nov. 12, 1973, at 72.

314 See supra note 158 and accompanying text (discussing Jaffe's kidnapping by the bail bondsmen and their subsequent extradition).

315 Kear v. Hilton, 699 F.2d 181 (1983).

316 U.N. Doc. S/1439 (1960).

of specific human rights provisions are to be held violative of international law and sanctioned in the following manner:

a. The perpetrators, their aiders and abettors, and responsible superiors are to be held internationally responsible.

b. The person who was subjected to these practices is to be returned to the state from which he was seized and is entitled to damages.

c. The state wherein the act occurred is entitled to reparation and apologies.

3. The International Court of Justice is to exercise compulsory jurisdiction in hearing petitions by states on behalf of individuals who were the object of such treatment and to issue orders equivalent to Writs of Habeas Corpus and Amparo.

An alternative remedy, which is certainly not as effective as the exclusion of jurisdiction, is that of financial compensation, or damages. This was held in Amekrane v. United Kingdom, which was decided by the European Commission of Human Rights on July 19, 1974.[317] Colonel Amekrane had rebelled against the Kingdom of Morocco, and had fled to Gibraltar to avoid the death penalty imposed on him by Morocco. The colonel had applied for asylum in Gibraltar. The Gibraltar authorities, under UK control, conspired with Moroccan secret police to allow for his abduction back to Morocco. Following his abduction from Gibraltar, the colonel was killed in Morocco. A complaint filed against the United Kingdom was found to be admissible, in that the facts alleged clearly indicated violations of Articles 3, 5, and 8 of the ECHR. The colonel's widow received compensation as part of a settlement solution that was attached to the Commission's report on this matter. Obviously, as Colonel Amekrane was dead, requesting Morocco, the country that had kidnapped him, to return him was not an alternative remedy.[318]

For reasons discussed in Chapter II, Section 2.2, such remedies are not available in U.S. courts because certain international treaties are non–self-executing or because individuals are deemed not to have standing to raise the issue.

In the years since the Amekrane case the practice of the European Commission and the ECtHR has developed significantly. As a preliminary matter, it must be remembered that the Commission that made the finding in Amekrane has been effectively replaced by the ECtHR, which since 1998 has been the sole organ with jurisdiction over violations of the European Convention.[319] Moreover, under Protocol 11 individuals have direct access to the Court and can file applications without going before the Commission first, as was the case before 1998.

Substantively, a number of important decisions have developed the practice of the European Court with regard to extraditions in violation of the European Convention, particularly with regard to the Article 3 proscription of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and the Article 6 protection of fair trial rights. These developments have also allowed applicants to fight their extradition before the actual violation, in effect in order to secure an injunction against the requested state to prevent the extradition of an individual to a place where he/she might be subject to human rights violations.

---

317 Amekrane v UK, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 5961/72 (1973).

318 Note that neither the European Commission nor the European Court has the power to order the return of an abducted or unlawfully seized person.

319 Protocol No. 11 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, May 11, 1994, E.T.S. 155.

The most important of these developments was the landmark 1989 ruling in Soering v. United Kingdom,[320] in which the Court held that:

> extradition may give rise to an issue under Article 3 (art. 3), and hence engage the responsibility of that State under the Convention, where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting country.[321]

In Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom the ECtHR subsequently explained that its investigation of Article 3 violations "must necessarily be a rigorous one in view of the absolute character of this provision and the fact that it enshrines one of the fundamental values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe."[322] Accordingly, the ruling in Soering effectively established a hard protection against extradition in cases of torture, and of inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 3 of the ECHR), which was later extended to other articles of the European Convention, including the violation of fair trial rights (Article 6), lack of an effective remedy (Article 13), and collective expulsions (Protocol 4 to the ECHR).[323]

Procedurally, in these defensive actions to prevent extradition, > the Court considers that the same standard and burden of proof should apply as in Article 3 expulsion cases. Therefore, it is for the applicant to adduce evidence capable of proving that there are substantial grounds for believing that, if he is removed from a Contracting State, he would be exposed to a real risk of being subjected to a flagrant denial of justice. Where such evidence is adduced, it is for the Government to dispel any doubts about it.[324]

In effect, if the applicant/relator can show that there is a substantial and real risk of a violation of Article 3 or Article 6, extradition is precluded by the ECHR unless the requested state can make a showing to the contrary. Although these articles afford some protections to relators, it is important to note that the applicant before the European Court still bears the initial high burden of establishing the violation, a clear deference on the part of the Court to signatory states and their independent determination of the extraditability of the individual.

The landmark Soering case, which laid the foundation for the Court's subsequent jurisprudence, concerned the extradition of a German citizen from the United Kingdom to the United States where he was subject to prosecution for homicide and eventually to the death penalty. The applicant, Jens Soering, was a German citizen who grew up in the United States, where his father was posted as a German diplomat. While studying at the University of Virginia, he murdered the parents of his then girlfriend and fled with her to the United Kingdom, where he was eventually apprehended. Under the terms of the 1972 extradition convention, the United States sought the extradition of Soering and his girlfriend, Elizabeth Haysom, to face capital murder charges.[325] Thereafter the United Kingdom sought assurances that Soering would not face the death penalty, prompting an insubstantial reply from the prosecutor in Virginia; simultaneously West Germany sought Soering's extradition to face trial for the murders in a German court.

---

320 Soering v. United Kingdom, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 14038/88 (1989).

321 Soering v. United Kingdom, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 14038/88 (1989), ¶ 91.

322 Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application nos. 13163/87; 13164/87; 13165/87; 13447/87; 13448/87 (1991), ¶ 108.

323 See also Ch. VII, Sec. 6.11 and Ch. VIII, Sec. 6.

324 Othman (Abu Qatada v. United Kingdom), Application no. 8139/09 (2012), ¶ 261.

325 Elizabeth Haysom was surrendered to the United States where she pled guilty to accessory to murder charges and received a ninety-year sentence.

In response to the above-mentioned request by the United Kingdom for an assurance that Soering would not be exposed to the death penalty, the Virginia prosecutor trying the case provided an affidavit declaring that "should Jens Soering be convicted of the offence of capital murder as charged in Bedford County, Virginia . . . a representation will be made in the name of the United Kingdom to the judge at the time of sentencing that it is the wish of the United Kingdom that the death penalty should not be imposed or carried out."[326] During this period Soering was committed to a British mental hospital for psychiatric care due to his "dread of extreme physical violence and homosexual abuse from other inmates in death row in Virginia . . . [which was] having a profound psychological effect on him . . . [and that there was] a mounting desperation in the applicant, together with objective fears that he may seek to take his own life."[327] While fighting his extradition to the United States before the ECtHR, Soering stated that he would consent to his extradition to West Germany to face trial there.[328]

The ECtHR held that it had jurisdiction over the matter even though the alleged Article 3 violation would potentially occur outside of Europe, on the basis that extraditing individuals to places where they may be subject to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment would violate the spirit animating the ECHR. In effect, the significant importance the European and international communities saw in the proscription against torture or inhuman or degrading treatment demanded special care be given to situations in which individuals were subject to violations after their extradition. Accordingly, the court reasoned that

> It would hardly be compatible with the underlying values of the Convention, that "common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law" to which the Preamble refers, were a Contracting State knowingly to surrender a fugitive to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture, however heinous the crime allegedly committed. Extradition in such circumstances, while not explicitly referred to in the brief and general wording of Article 3 (art. 3), would plainly be contrary to the spirit and intendment of the Article, and in the Court's view this inherent obligation not to extradite also extends to cases in which the fugitive would be faced in the receiving State by a real risk of exposure to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment proscribed by that Article (art. 3).[329]

The Court continued,

> What amounts to "inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" depends on all the circumstances of the case . . . Furthermore, inherent in the whole of the Convention is a search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. As movement about the world becomes easier and crime takes on a larger international dimension, it is increasingly in the interest of all nations that suspected offenders who flee abroad should be brought to justice. Conversely, the establishment of safe havens for fugitives would not only result in danger for the State obliged to harbour the protected person but also tend to undermine the foundations of extradition. These considerations must also be included among the factors to be taken into account in the interpretation and application of the notions of inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment in extradition cases.
>
> It is not normally for the Convention institutions to pronounce on the existence or otherwise of potential violations of the Convention. However, where an applicant claims that a decision to extradite him would, if implemented, be contrary to Article 3 (art. 3) by reason of its foreseeable consequences in the requesting country, a departure from this principle is necessary, in view of 326 Soering v. United Kingdom, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 14038/88 (1989), ¶ 20.

327 Id. at ¶ 25.

328 Id. at ¶ 26.

329 Id. at ¶ 88.

> the serious and irreparable nature of the alleged suffering risked, in order to ensure the effectiveness of the safeguard provided by that Article (art. 3) … [330]

The actual extradition of Soering turned on the likelihood of his exposure to the death penalty, and hence the "death row syndrome" that would trigger a violation of Article 3 of the European Convention. The Court was, in this regard, not reassured by the Virginia prosecutor's assurance that he would represent the United Kingdom's wishes to the sentencing judge. The Court was of the view that the assurance was insufficient to guarantee the non-imposition of the death penalty,[331] a crucial point in the Court's assessment of whether the "death row syndrome" alleged by Soering, a violation of Article 3 of the Convention, was likely enough to trigger the Court's jurisdiction.

With respect to "death row syndrome," in the view of the Court, the length of time inmates were kept in detention, the conditions on death row, and other factors constituted a violation of the Article 3 proscription on torture, and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[332] The Court did not, notably, rule that the death penalty violated the Convention's protection of the Right to Life (Article 2), as at the time the death penalty was not completely barred under the terms of the Convention,[333] a legal position that likely no longer obtains given the evolution of the customary proscription on capital punishment since 1989, both within Europe and internationally.[334] The Court also did not find a violation of Article 6, concerning the right to a fair trial, given the adequate conditions in the Virginia court system. The ECtHR did, however, entertain the possibility, holding that "The Court does not exclude that an issue might exceptionally be raised under Article 6 (art. 6) by an extradition decision in circumstances where the fugitive has suffered or risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the requesting country. However, the facts of the present case do not disclose such a risk."[335] This basis for a denial of extradition was extended in other cases discussed below and is of particular relevance today in the post–September 11 era.

The determination of whether extradition violates Article 3, and by extension any other article of the European Convention, turns on a factual analysis of the situation on the ground in the receiving state. This is not wholly compatible with the doctrine of non-inquiry, especially with regards to Article 6 of the European Convention concerning fair trial rights. Although still the norm, the doctrine of non-inquiry no longer applies with respect to the violation of certain fundamental rights. In certain situations the violation is clear, as with the death penalty in the United States.

However, the Court has imposed certain factual limits on extradition, namely whether "a sufficiently clear causal link between the removal and any ill-treatment which might have occurred."[336] This language was adopted in a case involving the return of Tamil asylum seekers to Sri Lanka who were subsequently physically abused and emotionally distressed. In that case,

---

330 Id. at ¶¶ 88–89.

331 Id. at ¶¶ 97–99.

332 Id. at ¶ 111.

333 Id. at ¶¶ 101–104.

334 It should be noted that Protocol 6 of the European Convention, which explicitly outlawed the imposition of the death penalty, did not enter into effect until November 1, 1988. Protocol No. 6 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty. Protocol 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the Abolition of Death Penalty, Apr. 28, 1983, E.T.S. 114.

335 Soering v. United Kingdom, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 14038/88 (1989), ¶ 113.

336 Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application nos. 13163/87; 13164/87; 13165/87; 13447/87; 13448/87 (1991), ¶ 105.

the Court ruled that a violation of Article 3 only obtains where the extradition is "unreasonable or arbitrary" if a causal link had been established.[337] As held by the Court in Müslim v. Turkey, the mere presence of instability in a country is not enough to establish a violation of Article 3 of the European Convention. To establish a violation of Article 3, and hence a limit on extradition, specific acts must be shown.[338]

Beyond limits imposed by Article 3, the European Court has also increasingly found violations for Article 6 of the Convention, which provides for the right to a fair trial. Article 6 states:

> 1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.
>
> 2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.
>
> 3. Everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights:
>
> a. to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
>
> b. to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;
>
> c. to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require; > d. to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;
>
>
> e. to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.

The question of fair trial rights in extradition cases has taken on especial importance in the decade after September 11, 2001, when a significant number of Muslims were sought for prosecution for terrorism offences. Although Article 3 protections remain of prime importance in these cases, Article 6 has taken on new importance as a means of protecting individuals from sham trials.

A leading case with regard to Article 6 is the 2012 ruling in Othman (Abu Qatada) v. United Kingdom.[339] The Othman case involved the attempted extradition of Omar Othman, a Jordanian also known as Abu Qatada, from the United Kingdom to his country of citizenship to face trial for various charges related to terrorism. Othman had previously received asylum status in the United Kingdom on the basis of previous torture in Jordan. Based on allegations of terrorism, Othman was convicted in absentia in Jordan, which served as the basis of an extradition request to the United Kingdom. In 2002 Othman was taken into custody by the United Kingdom, leading to a six-year process of deportation attempts, leading to the application before the European Court. Othman's application alleged that he would likely be tortured 337 Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application nos. 13163/87; 13164/87; 13165/87; 13447/87; 13448/87 (1991), ¶ 105.

338 Müslim v. Turkey, App no. 53566/99 (2005).

339 Abu Qatada v. United Kingdom, App. no. 8139/09 (2012).

in Jordan in violation of Article 3 and that he would be unable to secure a fair trial, in violation of Article 6.

In the Othman case, the ECtHR relied on the language arising out of Soering that articulated a ground for denying extradition on the basis of a "flagrant denial of a fair trial in the requesting country."[340] In language resembling the justification offered in the Soering case, the court in Othman held that "the term 'flagrant denial of justice' has been synonymous with a trial which is manifestly contrary to the provisions of Article 6 or the principles embodied therein."[341] Such flagrant denials of justice include: where trials are conducted in absentia and where there is no provision to rehear the case or introduce new evidence,[342] where there are gross violations of the rights of the defense,[343] where these is extended detention without the right to challenge the validity of the detention,[344] and where there is lack of access to legal counsel.[345]

In the Othman case, the ECtHR noted, in particular, the use of evidence adduced under torture[346] would significantly infringe on Othman's Article 5 rights. In particular, the Court found that although torture evidence is not admissible under Jordanian law and the prosecution bears the burden of proving the admissibility of statements of third parties, > the Court is unconvinced that these legal guarantees have any real practical value. For instance, if a defendant fails to prove that the prosecution was implicated in obtaining an involuntary confession, that confession is admissible under Jordanian law regardless of any prior acts of ill-treatment or other misconduct by the GID. This is a troubling distinction for Jordanian law to make, given the closeness of the Public Prosecutor and the GID. Furthermore, while the State Security Court may have the power to exclude evidence obtained by torture, it has shown little readiness to use that power. Instead, the thoroughness of investigations by the State Security Court into the allegations of torture is at best questionable. The lack of independence of the State Security Court assumes considerable importance in this respect.[347]

Accordingly, the European Court ruled that Othman's extradition to Jordan would amount to a violation of Article 6, without resorting to an analysis of other possible grounds for denying extradition, namely "the absence of a lawyer in interrogation, the prejudicial consequences of his notoriety, the composition of the State Security Court, and the aggravating nature of the length of sentence he would face if convicted."[348]

One final aspect of note is the possible re-extradition of individuals subject to the protections of the ECHR. In a 2012 case the ECtHR found violations for the mass expulsion of Somalis and Eritreans to Libya, as well as its traditional protection of Article 3 on several grounds, some of which are covered above but raised the question of subsequent removal of individuals to third states. In Hirsi Jamaa and Others v. Italy the Court ruled that an Italian policy to automatically transfer all refugees found on the high seas to Libya constituted a violation of Articles 3 and 13 of the European Convention (concerning the right to a remedy in Italy), as well as Protocol 4 to the ECHR. More important, the Court extended its protections to groups who can state a prima facie claim of possible violation as the basis of their membership in a

340 Id. at ¶ 258.

341 Id. at ¶ 259.

342 See Sejdovic v. Italy, Application no. 56581/00 (2006); Stoichkov v. Bulgaria, Application no. 9808/02 (2005); Einhorn v. France, Application no. 71555/01 (2001).

343 Bader and Kanbor v. Sweden, Application no. 13284/04 (2005).

344 Al-Moayad v. Germany, Application no. 35865/03 (2007), ¶¶ 82–89.

345 Id. at ¶¶ 102–108.

346 Abu Qatada v. United Kingdom, Application no. 8139/09 (2012), ¶ 272.

347 Id. at ¶ 278.

348 Id. at ¶ 286.

group. In particular, the Court held that "where an applicant alleges that he or she is a member of a group systematically exposed to a practice of ill-treatment, the Court considers that the protection of Article 3 of the Convention enters into play when the applicant establishes, where necessary on the basis of [reports from international organizations such as Amnesty International], that there are substantial grounds for believing in the existence of the practice in question and his or her membership of the group concerned."[349]

Moreover, the ECtHR in Hirsi Jamaa and Others v. Italy held that where individuals may be subject to violations of Article 3, the guarantees of the European Convention cannot be evaded on the basis of flimsy assurances. The court held that

> Italy cannot evade its own responsibility by relying on its obligations arising out of bilateral agreements with Libya. Even if it were to be assumed that those agreements made express provision for the return to Libya of migrants intercepted on the high seas, the Contracting States' responsibility continues even after their having entered into treaty commitments subsequent to the entry into force of the Convention or its Protocols in respect of these States.[350]

This protection applies to further transfer of the individuals to a third country. The Court held that there was a risk of the applicants' repatriation to Eritrea and Somalia from Libya, and accordingly stated that > the Italian authorities knew or should have known that there were insufficient guarantees protecting the parties concerned from the risk of being arbitrarily returned to their countries of origin, having regard in particular to the lack of any asylum procedure and the impossibility of making the Libyan authorities recognise the refugee status granted by the UNHCR.[351]

The Hirsi Jamaa cases raise some questions over the duty of the United Kingdom toward Julian Assange, a recent cause célèbre, in which the United Kingdom is attempting to extradite Assange to Sweden for investigation and prosecution for sexual assault, despite the real risk that he will be further extradited to the United States for prosecution and potential execution in connection with the release of U.S. government documents on the Wikileaks website. Although the United Kingdom has made representations that Assange could not be executed in the United States, this assurance is notably lacking with respect to other possible violations of Articles 3 and 6 in the United States.

With respect to assurances, the European Court's ruling in Soering turned in part on the inadequate nature of the assurance given by the Virginia prosecutor. Subsequent rulings have enunciated further the baseline requirements of the assurance. In a 2010 ruling in Baysakov and Others v. Ukraine[352] the Court concluded that, beyond the failure of the Ukraine to receive assurances from the proper organ of the Kazakh government before extraditing Baysakov, "the lack of an effective system of torture prevention, [makes] it…difficult to see whether such assurances would have been respected."[353] Accordingly, the Court has imposed a burden upon requested states not only to receive assurances, but also to ensure that the assurances will be respected.

Finally, following the practice described in Chapter VIII,[354] the case law of the ECtHR provides numerous examples of protections for political acts, membership in political and criminal groups, and the requirement of certain assurances.[355]

---

349 Hirsi Jamaa and Others v. Italy, Application no. 27765/09 (2012), ¶ 119.

350 Id. at ¶ 129.

351 Id. at ¶ 156.

352 Baysakov and Others v. Ukraine, Application no. 54131/08 (2010).

353 Id. at ¶ 51.

354 See also Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

355 See, e.g., Chahal v. United Kingdom, Application no. 22414/93 (1996); Saadi v. Italy, Application no. 37201/06 (2008); Y.P and L.P. v. France Application No. 32476/06 (2010).

As indicated in the Amkrane case, pecuniary remedies can be awarded to applicants. Current practice of the ECtHR provides pecuniary awards for violations that have already been committed, as in the Amkrane case, as well as for lawyers' fees and other expenses. In the Soering case mentioned above, the Court awarded damages for lawyers' fees and other costs,[356] which is a standard practice of the Court. The Court did not, however, award compensatory damages, or "just satisfaction" to Soering, as his rights had not been violated.

Pecuniary awards for actual violations are provided for in Article 41 of the ECHR, which states, in pertinent part, that:

> If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party.

In order to make an Article 41 claim, the applicant must obviously succeed in his/her claim of an actual violation for some other provision of the Convention. Further, the ECtHR has adopted language suggesting that pecuniary awards are only given in those situations in which the applicant suffers "non-pecuniary damage which cannot be compensated solely by the finding of violations."[357]

For example, in Iskandarov v. Russia, the Court found a violation of Articles 3 and 5 when Iskandarov was extradited from Russia to Tajikistan.[358] Iskandarov was a critic of the Tajik regime and leader of an opposition party. Due to his activism, Iskandarov took refuge in Russia and was subsequently charged by Tajik prosecutors with terrorism and other offenses in his homeland, prompting an extradition request to the Russian government. Iskandarov successfully challenged the extradition request in court, but was subsequently kidnapped by Russian security forces and illegally rendered to Tajik officials, who returned him to Tajikistan to face trial.[359] Upon his return to Tajikistan, Iskandarov was tortured and forced to confess to various crimes on the basis of which he was convicted and sentenced to twenty-three years imprisonment, where he remains despite international condemnation. Iskandarov's representatives filed suit in Russia, which was then pursued before the European Court, which found the violation and awarded just satisfaction for the violation.

> The Court has found violations of Articles 3 and 5 of the Convention on account of the applicant's unlawful extradition to Tajikistan and his unlawful detention by State agents. It accepts that the applicant must have sustained non-pecuniary damage which cannot be compensated for solely by the findings of violations. It finds it appropriate to award him EUR 30,000 in respect of non-pecuniary damage.[360]

It should be noted, however, that Iskandarov is still imprisoned and that his only remedy has been the 30,000 euro award. The award is, in any case, only one-tenth of the 300,000 euros Iskandarov requested.

In other cases, however, the finding of the violation was itself deemed to constitute just satisfaction. This was the case, for instance, in Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia,[361] where the Court found a violation of Articles 3, 5, and 13. The case arose out of an incident in which a number of armed individuals crossed into Georgia from Russia and were apprehended there. The 356 Soering v. United Kingdom, European Court of Human Rights, Application No. 14038/88 (1989), ¶ 125.

---

357 Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, Application No. 36378/02 (2005), ¶ 525.

358 Iskandarov v. Russia, Application No. 17185/05 (2010).

359 Id. at ¶¶ 25–32.

360 Id. at ¶¶ 156–157.

361 Shamayev and Others v. Georgia and Russia, Application No. 36378/02 (2005).

individuals were subsequently taken from their cells and surrendered to Russia, where they feared that they would be exposed to the death penalty. As with Iskandarov, the Court awarded damages, but the maximum granted was 8,000 euros in light of the more limited violation of the applicants' rights by the government of Georgia.[362] In one instance, where the applicant was subsequently released, the Court found that although "the applicant must have suffered non-pecuniary damage…the Court's finding affords him sufficient compensation in that respect."[363]

8. United States Remedies for Abduction Abroad

8.1. Remedies Available to U.S. Citizens for Physical Violence Abroad

Physical violence abroad committed against U.S. citizens by a U.S. agent or at the behest of the U.S. government gives rise to remedies in tort and under 28 U.S.C. § 1983.[364] If a private citizen of the United States, such as a bounty hunter or bail bondsman, commits physical violence against another citizen of the United States, the victim may seek redress in tort in any jurisdiction in which the defendant may be located, as torts are transitory and "follow" the defendant.[365]

If the violence is done abroad by a foreign agent and the victim is a U.S. citizen, the TVPA[366] provides a cause of action for victims of torture and the legal representatives of the victims of extrajudicial killing. This liability arises where "an individual, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of a foreign nation, subjects an individual to torture or extra-judicial killing," A cause of action under the Act is allowed regardless of the victim's citizenship.[367]

8.2. Remedies Available to Aliens for Physical Violence Abroad

If physical violence is done against an alien abroad by a U.S. agent, a private citizen of the United States, or a foreign agent, the alien may sue in U.S. district court under the ATCA.[368] The Act makes a suit for damages available to any plaintiff who is an alien and has been injured by a tort committed in violation of international law or a treaty of the United States, regardless of where the violence occurred.[369]

In 1980, the Second Circuit found torture to be a violation of international law in Filartiga v. Pena-Irala.[370] In that case, Dr. Joel Filartiga and his daughter Dolly, citizens of Paraguay, sued

---

362 Id. at ¶ 525.

363 Id. at ¶ 526.

364 See also Elwood Earl Sanders, Jr., In Search of an Alternative Remedy for Violations of Extradition Treaties, 34 Sw. U. L. Rev. 1 (2004).

365 See Pratt v. Kelly, 585 F.2d 692, 695 (4th Cir. 1978) (stating "[a]ctions for personal injury or death are transitory and may be brought in any court having jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter of the case").

366 Pub. L. 102-256, Mar. 12, 1992, 106 Stat. 73,

367 Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, Pub. L. 102-256, Mar. 12, 1992, 106 Stat. 73

368 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1994). See, e.g., Kenneth C. Randall, Federal Jurisdiction over International Law Claims: Inquiries into the Alien Tort Statute, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 1 (1985); Kenneth C. Randall, Further Inquiries into the Alien Tort Statute and a Recommendation, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 473 (1986).

369 The ATCA provides "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (2000).

370 Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980); accord Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina, No. CV 82-1772-RMT (C.D. Cal. 1984).

Americo Peña-Irala, the former police chief of Asuncion, Paraguay, for the torture-murder of Dr. Filartiga's seventeen-year-old son, Joelito, in Paraguay. The plaintiffs and the defendant were all present in the United States when the suit was filed, although Peña-Irala was deported to Paraguay before the court rendered the final decision. The court found that international law prohibited torture[371] by persons acting under color of law and awarded the Filartigas $10 million in damages.

As noted in Chapter IV, the Filartiga decision expands the jurisdiction of U.S. courts for the protection of aliens from tortious actions that violate the law of nations.[372] Aliens forcibly abducted abroad may thus seek damages from their abductors under the ATCA.

Subsequent to the discovery that Dr. Alvarez-Machain was not the person intended by the United States to be kidnapped from Mexico, in that he had nothing to do with the torture and death of Agent Camarena, Alvarez-Machain filed suit under the ATCA.[373] The Ninth Circuit upheld the claimant's position, but the Supreme Court reversed, holding that neither the ATCA or the Federal Tort Claims Act provided a remedy for the alien despite the fact that the government controlled the abduction of the alien and had custody of him in the United States. The Supreme Court concluded that the alleged harm, namely the abduction, occurred in Mexico irrespective of whether the United States was the proximate cause of the harm. Subsequently the district court dismissed Alvarez-Machain's claim for damages under the Federal Tort Claims Act.

More recently, in Mohamed v. Jeppesen Dataplan, Inc., claims have been brought against corporations under the ATCA for conspiring or aiding and abetting the U.S. government in the forced disappearance and torture of the named plaintiffs.[374] The plaintiffs, all of Middle Eastern or African origin and some with dual citizenship, were transported to various countries, including Morocco, Egypt, and Afghanistan, where they were tortured or otherwise subjected to brutal treatment. The plaintiffs alleged that Jeppesen provided the U.S. government with "direct and substantial services . . . thereby 'enabling the clandestine and forcible transportation of terrorism suspects to secret overseas detention facilities,' " particularly by providing flight planning and logistical support services related to the flights transporting the plaintiffs to their final destinations.[375] The U.S. government intervened before Jeppesen answered the complaint, claiming that the state secrets privilege applied to prevent this suit from proceeding, as it would necessitate an inquiry into covert U.S. military and CIA operations abroad.[376] Although the district court declined to consider the evidentiary questions raised as it determined " 'the very subject matter of this case is a state secret,' " the Court of Appeals reversed the district court's grant of the government's motion to dismiss.[377] The Court of Appeals remanded the case to the district court for the discovery process to begin and the government to subsequently invoke the state secrets privilege once actual discovery is pending to determine whether the complaint 371 The Second Circuit did not provide a precise definition of torture. However, courts faced with similar cases in the future may use the definition in the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, U.N.G.A. Res. 39/46, Dec. 10, 1984. See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, The Crime of Torture, in 2 International Criminal Law 705 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 2d ed.) (1999); Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture under the Bush Administration, supra note 85.

372 See Ch. IV (discussing Alien Tort Claims Act decisions subsequent to Filartiga).

373 Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 331 F.3d 604 (9th Cir. 2003), 542 U.S. 692 (2004), vacated & remanded en banc, 374 F.3d 1384 (2004).

374 See Mohamed v. Jeppesen Dataplan Inc., 579 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2009), cert denied, 131 S. Ct. 2442 (2011).

375 Id. at 951.

376 Id.

377 Id. at 952.

should be dismissed under the state secrets privilege.[378] After considering two bodies of state secrets privilege jurisprudence, one requiring dismissal on the pleadings of a suit where the " 'very subject matter' " of the suit is secret[379] and the other preventing the discovery of secret evidence when disclosure would threaten national security while not requiring dismissal of the entire suit,[380] the court reasoned that the Totten bar did not apply to third-party plaintiffs seeking compensation from a party to a clandestine contract involving torture, and that plaintiff's case did not depend on the existence of such clandestine contract.[381] The court reasoned that the better approach in this case was to adopt the Reynolds reasoning, which required a balancing of " 'the circumstances of the case' and the plaintiff's 'showing of necessity' for the evidence against the 'danger that compulsion of evidence will expose matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged.' "[382]

This reasoning takes into account the policy concerns regarding separation of powers and national security while preventing the executive's effective immunization of questionable practices through declaring them "state secrets." It remains to be seen how other U.S. district courts and circuit courts of appeals will respond to similar suits. The Second Circuit, which had been at the forefront of allowing plaintiffs to pursue ATCA claims, has rejected the application of domestic concepts of corporate liability in regards to ATCA actions, and has shifted to analyzing corporate liability on the basis of international law principles.[383] This interpretation regarding determining the potential actors who may be held liable under the Alien Tort Claims Act appears to be an attempt by some courts to limit the number of Alien Tort Claims Act cases in the federal courts as part of the "vigilant doorkeeping" suggested by the Supreme Court in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain.[384] However, the Supreme Court in Sosa indicated that international law was to govern the determination of the types of torts for which the ATCA can be used as a jurisdictional mechanism, and left open the question of whether international law should similarly apply to the determination of the scope of liability of the actor involved.[385] In Kiobel,[386] the Second Circuit continued this shift, holding that corporations are effectively immune from being sued under the ATCA, because hard international law relative to corporate entities remains in development with little legally enforceable regulation of corporate actors, and no international tribunal has yet imposed liability on a corporation.[387] The Second Circuit's decision in Kiobel has persuaded other jurisdictions in two cases to dismiss actions brought against corporations under the Act.[388]

---

378 Id. at 961–962.

379 Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1875); Mohamed, 579 F.3d at 952–953.

380 United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953); Mohamed, 579 F.3d at 952–953.

381 Mohamed, 579 F.3d at 954–955.

382 Id. at 955.

383 Mara Theophila, "Moral Monsters" under the Bed: Holding Corporations Accountable for Violations of the Alien Tort Statute after Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 79 Fordham L. Rev. 2859, 2862 (2011).

384 Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 724 (2004).

385 Theophila, supra note 382, at 2874 (discussing Sosa).

386 The Kiobel case was brought by indigenous environmental activists from the Niger Delta who claim that Royal Dutch Shell assisted the Nigerian government in repressing the indigenous people of the Delta.

387 The Second Circuit in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 621 F.3d 111, 131–145 (2d Cir. 2010) conducted a review of cases, treaties, and submissions of publicists in reaching the conclusion that there is no customary international norm of imposing liability on corporations. But see Brief of Amici Curiae International Law Scholars in Support of Petitioners, Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., No. 10-1491 (S. Ct. Dec. 21, 2011), available at: http://harvardhumanrights.files.wordpress.com/2012/01/10-1491-tsac-international-law-scholars.pdf

388 Viera v. Eli Lilly & Co., 2010 WL 3893791 (S.D. Ind. 2010); Flomo v. Firestone Natural Rubber Co., 744 F. Supp. 2d 810 (S.D. Ind. 2010).

It is also important to note that although the court allowed the Mohamed suit to go forward, there is no indication yet as to the likelihood of success or the government's ability to exclude evidence on state secrets grounds. It is conceivable that, upon plaintiff's request for discovery in this case, the government will raise a state secrets privilege, which could be granted and defeat the action by excluding essential evidence to prove the case. However, this decision remains significant in that it indicates a willingness on the part of the judiciary to refuse docile acquiescence in the face of potential abuses by the executive. Furthermore, this case has strained relations between the United States and the United Kingdom, as one of the plaintiffs was a UK citizen.[389]

In another case, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals considered extending a Bivens action to the context of extraordinary rendition.[390] Arar was the subject of USCIS[391] removal proceedings and was ordered removed to Syria after being found to be a member of a terrorist organization, based on his association with a suspected terrorist and other classified information.[392] The court summarized Arar's treatment in Syria as follows:

> Arar was in Syria for a year, the first ten months in an underground cell six feet by three, and seven feet high. He was interrogated for twelve days on his arrival in Syria, and in that period was beaten on his palms, hips, and lower back with a two-inch thick electric cable and with bare hands. Arar alleges that United States officials conspired to send him to Syria for the purpose of interrogation under torture, and directed the interrogations from abroad by providing Syria with Arar's dossier, dictating questions for the Syrians to ask him, and receiving intelligence learned from the interview.[393]

Arar's TVPA claim failed as the court held the conspiracy allegation did not "establish that the defendants were in some way clothed with the authority of Syrian law or that their conduct may otherwise be fairly attributable to Syria."[394] The court turned to consider whether Arar could claim damages under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics.[395] The plaintiff in Bivens was allowed to pursue money damages for an unlawful search in violation of the Fourth Amendment.[396] Bivens, in which damages are payable by the offending officers, has the goal of deterring individual federal officers from engaging in constitutional violations, and has been rarely extended beyond the original context.[397] The majority reasoned that extraordinary rendition was a new "context" as "extraordinary rendition" was a potentially recurring scenario with similar legal and factual components.[398] The court then proceeded to 389 Johannes van Aggelan, The Bush Administration's War on Terror: The Consequences of Unlawful Preemption and the Legal Duty to Protect the Human Rights of its Victims, 42 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 21, 73–75 (2009). When the UK High Court of Justice considered restoring certain redacted paragraphs in its judgment regarding reports made by the United States to the United Kingdom related to the detention and treatment of the claimant, the United Statea threatened to re-evaluate its intelligence sharing with the United Kingdom. The UK High Court of Justice left those paragraphs unrestored and redacted. Id. at 74–75.

390 Arar v. Ashcroft, 585 F.3d 559 (2d. Cir. 2009).

391 In March 2003 the Immigration and Naturalization Service was renamed the United States Customs and Immigration Service and brought under the umbrella of the Department of Homeland Security. For more information, see Ch. III, Sec. 5.

392 Ashcroft, 585 F.3d at 565–566. The required CAT finding was made, and a "Final Notice of Inadmissibility" was signed by Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which stated that Arar's removal to Syria would be consistent with the CAT. Id. at 566.

393 Id. at 566.

394 Id. at 568.

395 Id. at 571.

396 Id. at 571.

397 Id.

398 Id. at 572.

apply the Supreme Court's two-part inquiry into whether a Bivens action should be extended to a new context: whether there is an alternative remedial scheme, and whether "special factors counsel [] hesitation" to create the remedy.[399] The majority noted that it was difficult to establish whether the INA provided an alternative remedial scheme, but there were sufficient "special factors" that counseled against extension of Bivens to this context; these special factors included diplomacy, foreign policy, and national security.[400] The majority expressed concern over reviewing and exposing executive policy in the conduct of foreign affairs, and also its concern that reliance on redacted materials, which would result from the confidential nature of the sensitive evidence that would be introduced regarding extraordinary rendition, would defeat the "Anglo-American legal tradition for open court proceedings."[401] Although each of the various dissents eloquently and in depth analyzed the flaws within the majority's opinion, perhaps the most obvious criticism comes in Justice Sack's dissent regarding the alleged "new context," which notes "it should not be forgotten that the full name of the Bivens case itself is Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics."[402]

United States courts have continued to eliminate civil remedies available to the victims of torture. Starting with its finding in Sosa and continuing with Mohamed, the Supreme Court has radically limited jurisdiction in TVPA suits to natural persons. More recently in Kiobel the Second Circuit affirmed the shift in jurisprudence when it held that ATCA suits cannot be brought against corporations.

The U.S. Supreme Court did not address corporations in the Kiobel judgement it handed down in Spring 2013, but did address jurisdictional questions, which limits possible civil remedies to individuals—the Kiobel judgment does not affect criminal matters. In Kiobel the Supreme Court determined that the ATS, also known as the ATCA, only applied to cases in the United States or on the high seas.[403] The Court's judgment makes clear that territoriality is not only the general rule, but the presumption of U.S. laws. That presumption can of course be rebutted by a showing that Congress intended the law in question to have extraterritorial effect. This would apply in such cases where statutory language is not clear and unambiguous about the jurisdictional scope and application of the said law. Thus, extraterritorial application of U.S. laws in terms of the merits is not excluded by Kiobel. Extraterritorial jurisdiction is also not excluded provided there is a legislative basis for the cause of action.

In Kiobel, the Supreme Court emphasized the historic context of the adoption of the Judiciary Act of 1789, more particularly on what would constitute a violation of international law at the time, relying on Blackstone's identification of what international law meant by universal jurisdiction. The Court stated

> We explained in Sosa that when Congress passed the ATS, "three principal offenses against the law of nations" had been identified by Blackstone: violation of safe conducts, infringement of

399 Id.

400 Id. at 573–576.

401 Id. at 577.

402 Id. at 591.

403 In Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. et al., 2013 WL 162893, the Supreme Court held that Congress alone may decide whether U.S. legislation is to be applied extraterritorially. Although the case did not address the powers of the president, it would logically follow that the executive branch, acting within the proper scope of its constitutional authority, may also engage in extraterritorial conduct that could be justiciable. The Court in Kiobel also distinguished between a cause of action that has extraterritorial effect and the statutory merit basis for the exercise of jurisdiction. The Kiobel case addressed the Judiciary Act of 1789 and reviewed its evolution, particularly focusing on Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 124 S. Ct. 2739 (2004). The Court in Sosa recognized that the ATS is a jurisdictional statute that provides for U.S. jurisdiction by recognizing private claims under federal common law for violations arising under international law. Sosa, however, emphasized that such violations should be "specific, the rights of ambassadors, and piracy. 542 U.S., at 723, 724; see 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 68 (1769). The first two offenses have no necessary extraterritorial application. Indeed, Blackstone—in describing them—did so in terms of conduct occurring within the forum nation. See ibid. (describing the right of safe conducts for those "who are here"); 1 id., at 251 (1765) (explaining that safe conducts grant a member of one society "a right to intrude into another"); id., at 245–248 (recognizing the king's power to "receiv[e] ambassadors at home" and detailing their rights in the state "wherein they are appointed to reside"); see also E. De Vattel, Law of Nations 465 (J. Chitty et al. transl. and ed. 1883) ("[O]n his entering the country to which he is sent, and making himself known, [the ambassador] is under the protection of the law of nations . . . ").

Two notorious episodes involving violations of the law of nations occurred in the United States shortly before passage of the ATS. Each concerned the rights of ambassadors, and each involved conduct within the Union. In 1784, a French adventurer verbally and physically assaulted Francis Barbe Marbois—the Secretary of the French Legion—in Philadelphia. The assault led the French Minister Plenipotentiary to lodge a formal protest with the Continental Congress and threaten to leave the country unless an adequate remedy were provided. Respublica v. De Longschamps, 1 Dall. 111, 1 L.Ed. 59 (O.T. Phila.1784); Sosa, supra, at 716–717, and n. 11. And in 1787, a New York constable entered the Dutch Ambassador's house and arrested one of his domestic servants. See Casto, The Federal Courts' Protective Jurisdiction over Torts Committed in Violation of the Law of Nations, 18 Conn. L.Rev. 467, 494 (1986). At the request of Secretary of Foreign Affairs John Jay, the Mayor of New York City arrested the constable in turn, but cautioned that because " 'neither Congress nor our [State] Legislature have yet passed any act respecting a breach of the privileges of Ambassadors,' " the extent of any available relief would depend on the common law. See Bradley, The Alien Tort Statute and Article III, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. 587, 641–642 (2002) (quoting 3 Dept. of State, The Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States of America 447 (1837)). The two cases in which the ATS was invoked shortly after its passage also concerned conduct within the territory of the United States. See Bolchos, 3 F. Cas. 810 (wrongful seizure of slaves from a vessel while in port in the United States); Moxon, 17 F. Cas. 942 (wrongful seizure in United States territorial waters).

These prominent contemporary examples—immediately before and after passage of the ATS—provide no support for the proposition that Congress expected causes of action to be brought under the statute for violations of the law of nations occurring abroad.

. . .

Piracy typically occurs on the high seas, beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the United States or any other country. See 4 Blackstone, supra, at 72 ("The offence of piracy, by common law, consists of committing those acts of robbery and depredation upon the high seas, which, if committed upon land, would have amounted to felony there"). This Court has generally treated the high seas the same as foreign soil for purposes of the presumption against extraterritorial application. See, e.g., Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155, 173–174, 113 S.Ct. 2549, 125 L.Ed.2d 128 (1993) (declining to apply a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act to conduct occurring on the high seas); Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 440, 109 S.Ct. 683, 102 L.Ed.2d 818 (1989) (declining to apply a provision of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 to the high seas). Petitioners contend that because Congress surely intended the ATS to provide jurisdiction for actions against pirates, it necessarily anticipated the statute would apply to conduct occurring abroad.

---

universal, and obligatory"; id. at 732. The Supreme Court in Kiobel also addressed the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, 28 U.S.C. §1350, and also the Genocide Accountability Act of 2007, 18 U.S.C. § 1090(e), which provides jurisdiction in the United States for the offense of genocide, irrespective of where the offense was committed if the alleged offender is present in the United States. The Kiobel judgment, in a very clear manner, reaffirms the principle of territoriality of U.S. laws.

> Applying U.S. law to pirates, however, does not typically impose the sovereign will of the United States onto conduct occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of another sovereign, and therefore carries less direct foreign policy consequences. Pirates were fair game wherever found, by any nation, because they generally did not operate within any jurisdiction. See 4 Blackstone, supra, at 71. We do not think that the existence of a cause of action against them is a sufficient basis for concluding that other causes of action under the ATS reach conduct that does occur within the territory of another sovereign; pirates may well be a category unto themselves. See Morrison, 561 U.S., at —— (slip op., at 16) ("[W]hen a statute provides for some extraterritorial application, the presumption against extra-territoriality operates to limit that provision to its terms"); see also Microsoft Corp., 550 U.S., at 455–456.[404]

The Kiobel decision, however, leaves open a number of significant questions that relate not only to the Alien Tort Statute (ATS, also known as the ATCA), but also to the TVPA, as well as the evolving meaning of "international law." As stated by Justice Breyer in his concurrence

> The majority nonetheless tries to find a distinction between piracy at sea and similar cases on land. It writes, "Applying U.S. law to pirates . . . does not typically impose the sovereign will of the United States onto conduct occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of another sovereign and therefore carries less direct foreign policy consequences." Ante, at 10 (emphasis added). But, as I have just pointed out, "[a]pplying U.S. law to pirates" does typically involve applying our law to acts taking place within the jurisdiction of another sovereign. Nor can the majority's words "territorial jurisdiction" sensibly distinguish land from sea for purposes of isolating adverse foreign policy risks, as the Barbary Pirates, the War of 1812, the sinking of the Lusitania, and the Lockerbie bombing make all too clear.
>
> The majority also writes, "Pirates were fair game wherever found, by any nation, because they generally did not operate within any jurisdiction." Ibid. I very much agree that pirates were fair game "wherever found." Indeed, that is the point. That is why we asked, in Sosa, who are today's pirates? Certainly today's pirates include torturers and perpetrators of genocide. And today, like the pirates of old, they are "fair game" where they are found. Like those pirates, they are "common enemies of all mankind and all nations have an equal interest in their apprehension and punishment." 1 Restatement § 404 Reporters' Note 1, p. 256 (quoting In re Demjanjuk, 612 F.Supp. 544, 556 (N.D. Ohio 1985) (internal quotation marks omitted)). See Sosa, supra, at 732. And just as a nation that harbored pirates provoked the concern of other nations in past centuries, see infra, at 8, so harboring "common enemies of all mankind" provokes similar concerns today.
>
> Thus the Court's reasoning, as applied to the narrow class of cases that Sosa described, fails to provide significant support for the use of any presumption against extraterritoriality; rather, it suggests the contrary. See also ante, at 10 (conceding and citing cases showing that this Court has "generally treated the high seas the same as foreign soil for purposes of the presumption against extraterritorial application").[405]

In the opinion of this writer, nothing in this decision should be interpreted as constituting a jurisdictional limitation to a party having a claim arising under international law, particularly when such a claim is also based on treaties ratified by the United States, which provide for extraterritorial jurisdiction, as stated in the concurring opinion. That said, all cases involving "extraordinary rendition" against the United States and U.S. public officials have been dismissed or denied by U.S. courts.[406]

---

404 Kiobel, 2013 WL 162893 at *11–12.

405 Id.

406 See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009); El-Masri v. United States, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2007). "The ECtHR, however, found several violations of the European Convention of Human Rights, including the prohibitions on torture, arbitrary detention, the duty to investigate, the right to the truth, and the right to an effective remedy." El-Masri v. The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

9. Policy Considerations

There are many unnecessary difficulties in the extradition process that stand in the way of obtaining legitimate results through affirmative and efficient legal techniques. The alternatives to the legitimate extradition process are appealing to state decision-makers entrusted with public safety and security issues because of the failure of states to recognize the binding legal nature of the principle aut dedere aut judicare in extradition processes.[407] Thus, they are confronted with a choice between two processes, one, which is means-oriented and the other which is result-oriented. The choice between these divergent processes depends on the value-oriented goals of the system of justice as administered in the particular state.

The preservation of minimum world order requires making a distinction between irregular situations that result from the cooperative undertakings of interested states and situations where one state resorts to a method that violates the territorial integrity, sovereignty, or legal processes of another state. In both types of instances, the main deterrent to the state's use of such methods would be the recognition of a principle of legality of process that would disallow the application of mala captus bene detentus, and establish the primacy of a formal legal process over any irregular processes by declaring any resort thereto as unlawful under international law. Such, however, is still not the case, even though the writings of publicists continue to decry violations of international due process of law. In the case where one state acts without the cooperation or consent of another, threats to a minimum world order include:

1. Violations of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and domestic legal processes of the state of refuge.

2. Violations of the individual's right to freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention, and to international due process and fairness, and to protection against torture and extrajudicial execution.

3. Violations of the integrity of the international Rule of Law.

Insofar as instances of mutual cooperation and consent between agents of both interested states are concerned, threats to a minimum world order include:

1. Violations of the individual's right to freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention and to international due process and fairness, and protection against torture and extrajudicial execution.

2. Violations of the integrity of the international Rule of Law.

States should weigh the negative consequences of these outcomes in contrast to the benefits of the occasional securing of the custody of a wanted person who may be unreachable though the lawful process of extradition. States should also take into consideration the loss of moral authority by resorting to unlawful means of apprehending persons they seek for investigation, trial, or punishment arising out of a valid legal judgment. Last, states should also take into account the risks of inter-state conflict when their actions, as described above, result in another state's reactions to violations of its sovereignty and dignity. The combination of all of the above weighs in favor of making lawful extradition processes work against unlawful alternatives.

These world order considerations supplement considerations relative to the respect for internationally protected human rights, and to the integrity of national judicial processes.

App. No. 39630/09 Eur. Ct. H.R. (2012) For an overview, see Open Societies Institute, El-Masri v. Macedonia, available at: http://www.soros.org/initiatives/justice/litigation/macedonia (last visited Aug. 4, 2013).

407 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.

The conclusion is that alternative devices to extradition should not be allowed; instead, extradition needs to be made more effective. The practice reveals that this subsystem of alternative extradition devices developed mainly because the practical considerations stated above subverted the formal process. If this is permitted to continue, it may well render the formal extradition process obsolete and useless. The best policy against abduction and other forms of unlawful seizures is the universal recognition of the duty to prosecute or extradite as discussed in Chapter I.

Chapter VI

Theories of Jurisdiction and Their Application

Contents

1. Introduction

Extradition, whether by treaty, reciprocity, comity, or on the basis of national legislation, is premised on the assumption that the interests of a state have been affected by the criminal conduct of a person who is not within that state's jurisdiction, but is within the jurisdiction of another state. The requesting state has subject-matter jurisdiction, while the requested state has in personam jurisdiction. Through extradition, the requesting state obtains in personam jurisdiction by means of the requested person's surrender from the requested state.

Jurisdictional issues are foundational for active and passive extradition (meaning for the requesting and requested state). Nevertheless, few, if any, treaties refer to applicable jurisdictional bases, or to their ranking in cases of jurisdictional conflicts and for purposes of priority in extradition.

Most treaties use terms such as "within the jurisdiction of the requesting state" without further clarification. United States legislation and bilateral extradition treaties allow for any jurisdictional basis that the requesting state may rely upon under its laws, even if the particular basis is not one that is practiced under U.S. law. This system presupposes that: (1) the interests of the requesting state have been affected in such a manner that it seeks to subject the individual in question to its criminal jurisdiction; and, (2) the state wherein the individual is located does not have a greater interest in the person than the requesting state, and will therefore not deny the request. This balancing of interests theory bears upon the granting or denying of extradition, and also on the outcome of competing jurisdictional claims between the requesting and requested states or between two different requesting states.

The term "jurisdiction" in international law refers to two aspects of the authoritative decision-making process: the first is rule-making, and the second is rule-enforcing. Both of these aspects are present in extradition, because initiating the process presupposes that the requesting state has a legal basis to exercise its authoritative control over the requested individual, because: (1) it has jurisdiction over the subject matter or a given interest that has been or is being affected by the conduct of the person sought (ratione materiae); and (2) once surrendered, that state would have in personam jurisdiction over that person (ratione personae). Consequently, the requesting state seeks from the requested state, which has actual jurisdictional control over the individual, to formally surrender that individual and relinquish jurisdiction over him/her. Prior to this the requesting state must satisfy to the requested state that it has jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the crime for which the individual is sought for prosecution or punishment thereof.

It is universally recognized that every state has the power to regulate conduct within its territory, and beyond it if such conduct affects its legitimate national interests, which includes regulating its own citizens' conduct abroad and protecting them abroad from harm.[1] The power

1 Extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction is a complex question because it implies that one state can exercise its jurisdiction over what may be the territorial jurisdiction of another state. Extraterritorial jurisdiction extension may violate the sovereignty of other states. It also overlaps with the national criminal jurisdiction of other states, and conflicts with those laws and policies. Consequently, it creates potential for conflicts between states. See George Lewis, Foreign Jurisdiction and the Extradition of Criminals 30 (1859); Christopher L. Blakesley, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, in 2 International Criminal Law 85 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d ed. 2008) [hereinafter Bassiouni, ICL]; Christopher L. Blakesley, A Conceptual Framework for Extradition and Jurisdiction Over Extraterritorial Crimes, 4 Utah L. Rev. 685 (1984); William Empson, The Application of Criminal Law to Acts Committed Outside the Jurisdiction, 6 Am. Crim. L. Q. 32, 32–33 (1967); S.Z. Feller, Concurrent Criminal Jurisdiction in the International Sphere, 16 Israel L. Rev. 40, 43 n.4 (1981); S.Z. Feller, Jurisdiction Over Offenses with a Foreign Element, in A Treatise on International Criminal Law (M. Cherif Bassiouni & Ved P. Nanda eds., 2 vols. 1973) [hereinafter Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise]; B. James George, Jr., Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure (Ved of a state to proscribe conduct within its territory or conduct that affects its interests is concomitant to the principle of sovereignty.[2] Thus, the interrelationship between sovereignty and jurisdiction delineates the extent and limits of a state's power to proscribe conduct in relationship to what other states may exercise. However, as conduct performed by individuals (or legal entities in some systems) may be committed within and without the territory of a state and can affect one or more interests of one or more states, the power to proscribe conduct may rest on several theories and, consequently, may result in conflicts of jurisdictional assertion between states. These jurisdictional conflicts necessarily assume an international character. Guidelines are, therefore, needed for the resolution of such conflicting claims.

Five theories of jurisdiction are recognized in international law as giving rise to rule-making and rule-enforcing power by national authoritative decision-making processes.[3] These theories enjoy varying degrees of recognition with respect to rule-making and rule-enforcing power

---

P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987); B. James George, Jr., Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 25 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1987); B. James George, Jr., Jurisdictional Bases for Criminal Legislation and Its Enforcement, 1983 Mich. Y.B. Int'l Legal Stud. 3; B. James George, Jr., Extraterritorial Application of Penal Legislation, 64 Mich. L. Rev. 609, 612 (1965–66); Roland Perkins, The Territorial Principle in Criminal Law, 22 Hastings L. J. 1155 (1971); Lotika Sarkar, The Proper Law of Crime in International Law, in International Criminal Law 60, 60–76 (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., 1965).

2 One scholar states:

> The most important right—and duty—of a state is jurisdiction. It is solidly established in jurisprudence . . . From the viewpoint of sovereignty, jurisdiction means internal sovereignty, exclusive control over all persons and things within its territory. There are, of course, restrictions, even upon the internal administration of a state, set by international law and they are constantly increasing in number as the needs of the community rise above the claims of the state. "The extent of both the right and the duty of a State to do justice within its own domain, as well as elsewhere, is also fixed by international law." The jurisdiction of a state is simply the amount of control left to that state by the community of nations; or, if the statement be preferred, the powers reserved to the states after they have delegated to the community the exercise of certain powers. In practice, vast powers are left to the states, and the community interferes very little with their internal administration. It should be noted that the state not only administers its own affairs, but acts also as the agent of the community of nations to enforce international law within its territory.

Clyde Eagleton, International Government 87–88 (3d ed. 1957). See also Oppenheim's International Law 462–488 (Robert Jennings & Arthur Watts eds., 9th ed. 1992); 1 Lassa Oppenheim, International Law: A Treatise 263 (Hersch Lauterpacht ed., 8th ed. 1955). Another authority concludes:

> [A]ll states have certain sovereign powers which they can exercise without transgressing the rights of other states under international law. If they fail to exercise these powers, it is because either they have voluntarily placed a disability on that exercise, perhaps in the form of a domestic constitutional limitation or they have not considered it necessary, as a practical matter, to exercise their powers.

See George, Extraterritorial Application, supra note 1.

Article 2 of the Draft Declaration on Rights and Duties of States, prepared in 1949 by the International Law Commission of the United Nations, states:

> Every State has the right to exercise jurisdiction over its territory and over all persons and things therein, subject to the immunities recognized by international law.

Report of the International Law Commission, 1st Sess., June 24, 1949, at 7–8, reprinted in 1949 Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 287 (1949).

3 The theories of jurisdiction discussed herein are representative of the position of the United States, except maybe for universal jurisdiction, discussed infra Sec. 7, about which the United States is ambiguous in law and practice. See Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 402 (1987) [hereinafter Restatement (Third)]. See also Harvard Research in International Law: Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 443 (Supp. 1935) [hereinafter Harvard Research Project] (discussing jurisdiction with respect to crime).

and include: (1) Territorial (infra Section 2), based on the place of commission of the offense; (2) Active Personality or Nationality (infra Section 3), based on the nationality of the accused; (3) Passive Personality (infra Section 4), based on the nationality of the victim; (4) Protective (infra Section 5), based on the national interest affected (and as such related to the passive personality); and (5) Universality (infra Section 7), based on the international character of the offense.

It must be noted that whenever the term "jurisdiction" is used, it is inclusive of any one or all of these theories, or jurisdictional bases. However, if a specific term such as "territory" is used in a treaty or national legislation, it refers more narrowly to the territorial theory of jurisdiction,[4] with its potential extensions under the national legislation of the requesting state.[5]

Presumably all parts of the world are either subject to the sovereignty of a given state or are part of special status territories, namely militarily occupied territories and areas over which there is a treaty or agreement that regulates jurisdiction, such as status of forces agreements.[6] In the case of the former, it is both conventional and customary law of armed conflicts that apply. There are also what this writer refers to as "special environments"[7] such as the high seas and Antarctica, space and outer space, which are regulated by international treaties and also by customary international law. What distinguishes these "special environments" is essentially the fact that they are not under the sovereignty of exclusive jurisdiction of any one state. They are environments open to all states, subject to certain limitations as to their use, such as the non-utilization of the ocean's bottom for weapons, as well as the peaceful use of Antarctica, outer space, and celestial bodies. States can exercise limited exclusive jurisdiction on their vessels, submarines, aircraft, spacecrafts, satellites, and exploratory equipment on celestial bodies, as well as the persons therein. By extension of territorial jurisdiction,[8] since 2001 the U.S. government has attempted to artificially create an in limbo jurisdictional theory in connection with its detention facility in territories leased from Cuba in Guantanamo Bay. But leased territories are part of the state's territorial jurisdiction; consequently, there is not such thing as in limbo jurisdictional territory.[9]

2. Territorial Jurisdiction and Its Extensions

The theory of territorial jurisdiction, often referred to as the territorial principle because of its recognition by all states, is the basis on which a state proscribes and enforces rules of conduct within its legal boundaries.[10] The territorial principle, more than any other, is concomitant with sovereignty, and, therefore, all states adhere to it.

Every state exercises jurisdiction over all persons, whether they are nationals, resident or non-resident aliens, legal entities, or objects tangible or intangible within its physical boundaries,

4 See infra Sec. 2.

5 Id.

6 See infra Sec. 2.1.

7 See infra Sec. 2.4.

8 See infra Sec. 2.

9 This was argued in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 126 S. Ct. 2749 (2006), where the Supreme Court held that the treaty obligations of the United States, contained in the Geneva Convention, were applicable. See generally M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Institutionalization of Torture by the Bush Administration: Is Anyone Responsible? (2010).

10 For various treaty provisions discussing the effect of whether the offense was committed outside the territory of the requesting state, see Extradition Agreement with Malta, art. 2(4), May 18, 2006, S. TREATY DOC. 109–117 ("If the offense has been committed outside the territory of the Requesting State, extradition shall be granted . . . if the laws of the Requested State provide for the punishment of an offense committed outside of its territory in similar circumstances. If the laws of the Requested State do not [so] provide . . . , the executive authority of the Requested State, at its discretion, may grant extradition . . . ."); except where a special jurisdictional immunity exists.[11] The right to proscribe and enforce rules of conduct within a state is not, however, absolute. Certain limitations exist that restrict or compete with the exclusive jurisdiction of states. These limitations may be self-imposed under national law or may be imposed by international law.[12]

Chief Justice Marshall stated the interrelationship between sovereignty and territorial jurisdiction in the case of the Schooner Exchange v. McFadden:[13]

> The jurisdiction of the nation, within its own territory, is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of its restriction, and an investment of the sovereignty, to the same extent, in that power, which could impose such restriction.[14]

This position, adopted by Chief Justice Marshall, has been carried rather consistently throughout U.S. extradition law and practice, even though it is questionable on the basis of its absoluteness. In the twentieth century international law moved away from this absolutist position, especially in the wake of the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials after WWII.

Treaties, as well as the writing of some scholars, use the terms "territory" and "jurisdiction" interchangeably. Territory and jurisdiction, however, do not have the same juridical meaning. Jurisdiction is a legal theory whereby a political entity, namely a state, claims the power to proscribe and

---

Hungarian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4), Dec. 1, 1994, S. TREATY DOC. 104–105; Extradition Treaty with the Bahamas, art. 2(4), Mar. 9, 1990, S. TREATY DOC. 102–117 ("An offense described in this Article shall be an extraditable offense whether or not the offense was committed within the territory of the Requesting State. However, if the offense was committed outside the territory of the Requesting State, extradition shall be granted if the law of the Requested State provides for punishment of an offense committed outside of its territory in similar circumstances"); Italian Extradition Treaty, art. III, Oct. 13, 1983, 35 U.S.T. 3023 ("When an offense has been committed outside the territory of the Requesting Party, the Requested Party shall have the power to grant extradition if its laws provide for the punishment of such an offense or if the person sought is a national of the Requesting Party"); Extradition Treaty with Uruguay, art. 3, ¶2, Apr. 6, 1983, 35 U.S.T. 3197 ("…When the offense for which extradition has been requested has been committed outside the territory of the requesting Party, extradition may be granted if the laws of the requested Party provide for the punishment of such an offense committed in similar circumstances"); French Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4), entered into force Apr. 23, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 105–113 ("Extradition shall be granted for an extraditable offense committed outside the territory of the Requesting State, when the laws of the requested Party authorize the prosecution or provide the punishment of that offense in similar circumstances").

11 See infra Sec. 8.

12 6 Marjorie Whiteman, Digest of International Law 889–890 (1963) [hereinafter Whiteman Digest]. As stated by Whiteman:

> While a state which has an offender against its laws in custody can prosecute him for offenses committed within its jurisdiction, as it defines that jurisdiction, difficulties may arise when it attempts to extradite an offender from a country which does not share its concept of criminal jurisdiction. Many states have, under their laws, jurisdiction to punish their nationals for offenses committed anywhere, whereas common law countries, such as the United States and Great Britain, exercise jurisdiction, generally, only over crimes committed within their territory. Accordingly, these latter countries usually apply their concept of jurisdiction and limit, either specifically or by interpretation of the extradition agreement involved, their obligation to grant extradition to cases where, were the circumstances reversed, they would have jurisdiction over the offense.

Id.

13 Schooner Exchange v. McFadden, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116 (1812). See also United States v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479, 487–488 (S.D. Cal. 1960), aff'd in part, rev'd in part Rocha v. United States, 288 F.2d 545 (9th Cir. Cal. 1961).

14 Schooner Exchange, 11 U.S. at 116.

enforce its laws, whereas territory is the physical sphere of exercise of that power to prescribe and enforce.

There are numerous cases in which a distinction has been drawn between the two legal concepts in the context of treaty interpretation. In one such instance, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council refused to surrender one Kossekechatko and others to France, which had exercised its jurisdiction over the relators and had found them guilty. England held that only Article I of the 1878 Extradition Treaty with France applied:

> [T]o crimes committed within the territory of the power . . . seeking extradition . . . In their Lordship's opinion no one of the appellants was liable to be extradited under the treaty, unless the crime of which he was convicted was, in fact, committed within the territory of the French Republic.[15]

A similar view was expressed by the Attorney General of the United States, in the case of In re Stupp, when he voiced his recommendation:

> I am quite clear that the words "committed within the jurisdiction," as used in the treaty, do not refer to the personal liability of the criminal, but to locality. The locus delicti, the place where the crime is committed, must be within the jurisdiction of the party demanding the fugitive.[16]

In the United States, jurisdiction refers equally to rule-making and rule-enforcing power. In both cases, the same condition exists: namely that the authoritative decision-making body must exercise a certain dominion and control over the territory to which it claims that such power extends. A question arises as to whether the two aspects of jurisdiction, rule-making and rule-enforcing, must exist concurrently within the same territorial sphere over which dominion and control is exercised by a given state.

There is probably no more illustrative case than In re Lo Dolce.[17] During WWII, Major William Holohan and Sergeant Carl Lo Dolce of the U.S. Army were assigned to a mission behind enemy lines in German-occupied Italy. Major Holohan was reported killed on the mission. After the war ended, it was alleged that the sergeant had killed him. Lo Dolce, who returned to live in New York, could not be charged under the Uniform Code of Military Justice because he was no longer subject to its jurisdiction.[18] Moreover, he could not be tried in the United States because the alleged crime had not been committed within its territorial jurisdiction. The United States did not at that time rely on the application of any doctrine or theory of jurisdiction except the territorial principle, and hence Lo Dolce could only be tried where the alleged crime took place. The Italian authorities, therefore, requested the extradition of Lo Dolce in 1952, pursuant to the Treaty of 1869

---

15 John B. Moore, A Treatise on Extradition and Interstate Rendition 135 (1891) [hereinafter Moore Extradition].

16 In re Stupp, 23 F. Cas. 281 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1873) (No. 13,562).

17 In re Lo Dolce, 106 F. Supp. 455 (W.D.N.Y. 1952). See also In re Martin, [1925–1926] Ann. Dig. 303–304 (No. 229) (Royal Hung. Crim. Ct. of Budapest, Hung.). Czechoslovakia requested the extradition from Hungary of one Martin M., who was accused of having committed larceny in January and February 1921, at a location formerly within Hungarian territory, but which was ceded to Czechoslovakia by the Treaty of Trianon, which came into force on July 21, 1921. Extradition was requested as an act of comity, there being no extradition treaty between the two countries. The Hungarian Court held that extradition could not be granted as the crime had been committed in Hungarian territory. See United States v. Icardi, 140 F. Supp. 383 (D. D.C. 1956).

The Department of State's position with respect to the United States' jurisdiction to prosecute fugitives on the basis of the victim's U.S. citizenship is that "the United States under its law may prosecute for offenses committed outside the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States as defined in § 7 of Title 18 of the United States Code." Extradition: Double Criminality, 1975 Digest § 5, at 177.

18 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes 573–583 (1969).

then in force between Italy and the United States. The U.S. district court recognized the criminality of the acts charged and that they fell under the treaty provisions. However, the court felt that Italy had no jurisdiction, because the territory wherein the alleged crime took place had been under the control of the German forces that had then occupied it. Accordingly, Italy exercised no dominion and control at that time over the territory, and thus had no jurisdiction over that territory when the alleged crime was committed. Consequently, Italy could not be granted the surrender of Lo Dolce, as he had not been amenable to Italian jurisdiction when he allegedly committed the crime. Accordingly, had Germany attempted to extradite Lo Dolce, it would have probably failed, as it would have been argued, inter alia, that Germany had no present jurisdiction to enforce any laws, which it might have had at the time and place of the alleged crime. It is also doubtful that German laws would have made the killing of an enemy officer a crime. Barring that argument, however, Germany could have prosecuted Lo Dolce. The question of dominion and control as a basis for territorial jurisdiction was also in part relied upon in the earlier denial of the surrender of Andriju Artukovic to Yugoslavia for alleged crimes committed in that country during WWII.[19]

A unique factual situation illustrating the interplay of territorial jurisdiction and extradition arose in the case of Munaf v. Geren.[20] In the context of the 2003 war in Iraq, a multinational coalition force, the Multinational Force-Iraq (MNF-I) was established in accordance with UN Security Council Resolutions with the purpose of detaining pending investigation and prosecution by Iraqi courts under Iraqi law individuals alleged to have committed hostile or warlike acts in Iraq.[21] The MNF-I, at the request of the Iraqi government, operated under the unified command of U.S. military officers.[22] During its operations, the MNF-I detained two individuals with dual citizenship (Iraqi and United States). One individual, Shawqi Omar, was accused of providing assistance to Musab al-Zarqawi and of planning the kidnappings of foreigners.[23] He was labeled an "enemy combatant" in the "war on terror" and taken into the custody of the MNF-I in 2004 as he was considered a security threat to Iraq.[24] The other, Mohammad Munaf, was detained on the belief that he had been responsible for orchestrating the kidnapping of a group of Romanian journalists with whom he had traveled to Iraq as a translator and guide.[25] Although Munaf had initially confessed to facilitating the kidnapping, he later withdrew his confession, which, in part, caused the Iraqi Court of Cassation to vacate his conviction and remand his case to the Central Criminal Court in Iraq for further proceedings.[26] Both Omar

---

19 United States ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, 170 F. Supp. 383 (S.D. Cal. 1959). Subsequently, when the political climate changed, Artukovic's extradition to Yugoslavia to answer charges of murder was decided. In re Extradition of Artukovic, 628 F. Supp. 1370 (C.D. Cal. 1986); Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986), subsequently overruled by, Lopez-Smithy v. Hood, 121 F. 3d 1322 (9th Cir. 1997).

20 Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674 (2008). This was a complex decision discussing the availability of a habeas corpus action to obtain judicial review of a decision to transfer an American citizen to a foreign state (Ch. XI, Sec. 1.2), the proper review of claims that an individual may be subjected to torture for compliance with Article 3 of the U.N. Convention against Torture (Ch. VII, Sec. 7.3), and whether extradition proceedings were even applicable under the circumstances (Ch. II, Sec. 4.8). These issues are discussed in the respective chapters.

21 Munaf, 553 U.S. at 679. U.N. Doc. S/Res/1546, ¶ 10 (June 8, 2004); U.N. Doc. S/Res/1637 (Nov. 11, 2005); U.N. Doc. S/Res/1723 (Nov. 28, 2006).

22 Munaf, 553 U.S. at 679.

23 Id. at 681.

24 Id. at 681–682.

25 Id. at 683.

26 Id. at 684.

and Munaf, through next-friend petitions, challenged their continued detentions in habeas corpus proceedings in Washington, DC.[27] In both cases, the federal district court and court of appeals refused to issue injunctions effectively preventing the petitioners' release to Iraq, reasoning along different channels that the Iraqi government had the right to try individuals captured in Iraqi territory.[28]

In Munaf v. Geren, there was no issue as to whether the relators were within the government's custody, as the MNF-I, under whose control the relators were, was itself under the control of the president of the United States, bringing the jurisdictional inquiry before the Court to an end.[29] It is significant that even though the habeas petitioners in Munaf were physically in Iraq, nowhere near the physical custody of the District of Columbia, both the D.C. Circuit Court and the Supreme Court found jurisdiction to review the habeas petition, and the U.S. Supreme Court even went to the merits of the petition before it.

Regarding the merits, the Supreme Court framed the question in terms of a state's sovereignty within its own territory, namely "whether United States district courts may exercise their habeas jurisdiction to enjoin our Armed Forces from transferring individuals detained within another sovereign's territory to that sovereign's government for criminal prosecution."[30] The petitioners sought release without transfer to Iraqi custody, a result that would have interfered with Iraq's sovereign right to punish offenses against its law committed within its borders.[31] The Supreme Court relied heavily on the theory that a nation enjoys "exclusive and absolute" jurisdiction within its own territory, which includes the right of foreign nations to try American citizens for crimes against that nation's laws committed within that nation's territory.[32] This principle of territorial jurisdiction carried such weight with the Supreme Court that it rejected the argument that extradition prevailed over the simple handing over of these two dual-nationals to Iraq without going through the extradition process, even though an extradition treaty was in effect between the two countries.[33] The court held:

> this is not an extradition case, but one involving the transfer to a sovereign's authority of an individual captured and already detained in that sovereign's territory. In the extradition context, when a " 'fugitive criminal' " is found within the United States, " 'there is no authority vested in any department of the government to seize [him] and surrender him to a foreign power,' " in the absence of a pertinent constitutional or legislative provision. Ibid. But Omar and Munaf voluntarily traveled to Iraq and are being held there. They are therefore subject to the territorial jurisdiction of that sovereign, not of the United States. Moreover, as we have explained, petitioners are being held by the United States, acting as part of the MNF-I, at the request of and on behalf of the Iraqi Government. It would be more than odd if the Government had no authority to transfer them to the very sovereign on whose behalf, and within whose territory, they are being detained.[34]

It is surprising that the Supreme Court failed to appreciate the significance of the fact that petitioners were held by U.S. forces on U.S. military bases in Iraq, and that U.S. forces applied the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) to U.S. personnel on its bases to the exclusion

27 Id. at 682, 684–685.

28 Id. at 682–685.

29 Id. at 685–686.

30 Id. at 689.

31 Id. at 692.

32 Id. at 694–695.

33 Extradition Treaty Between the Kingdom of Iraq and the Republic of the United States, U.S.–Iraq, June 7, 1934, 49 Stat. 3380.

34 Munaf, 553 U.S. at 704.

of Iraqi law. At the time the United States and Iraq had not entered into an agreement on jurisdiction over U.S. bases and U.S. personnel.[35] Extradition applies to situations where an individual is detained by one state pending transfer to another state for continued detention. The requirement of legal justification for executive action in surrendering an individual to a foreign government is expressed in Valentine v. United States ex. rel. Neidecker,[36] and as argued by this writer and other scholars, is wholly applicable to a situation where U.S. citizens are in the custody of the United States from whom another state seeks their surrender.[37] The Valentine decision also concerns separation-of-powers principles and the need for a check by the judiciary on eExecutive discretion in actions deemed arbitrary or in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, as discussed in Chapter II.[38]

As Amici for Omar and Munaf argued:

> This is perhaps best illustrated by posing this question: If Romania gave credence to the allegations against Mr. Munaf—to wit, that he participated in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists with whom he traveled from Romania to Iraq—how would Romania go about securing his extradition to Romania? The State of Iraq lacks effective control and custody of Mr. Munaf, and thus could not extradite him to Romania. If Romania wanted to seek the extradition of Mr. Munaf, it could only do so by making an extradition request to the U.S., under the Extradition Treaty between Romania and the U.S., 44 Stat. 2020 (made July 23, 1924, entered into force April 7, 1925), supplemented by 50 Stat. 1349 (made Nov. 10, 1936, entered into force July 27, 1937). That is because only the U.S. would have the ability to grant extradition, and, in fact, transfer custody of Mr. Munaf to Romania (assuming all applicable treaty and statutory standards were met).[39]

Thus, although Iraq may have had a jurisdictional basis upon which to base its extradition request for Omar and Munaf, it would still have had to request such extradition. One cannot help but wonder why the Department of Defense, Department of State, and Department of Justice did not ask the government of Iraq to file an extradition request pursuant to the existing treaty[40] and pursuant thereto grant extradition. It surely would have been less cumbersome than having to go through judicial proceedings and then have the Supreme Court perform mental contortions to reach a legally questionable result when the alternative would have been a valid, legal result.

---

35 Agreement Between the United States of America and the Republic of Iraq on the Withdrawal of United States Forces from Iraq and the Organization of Their Activities during Their Temporary Presence in Iraq, U.S.–Iraq, Nov. 17, 2008. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Status of U.S. Forces in Iraq from 2003–2008, 11 Chi. J. Int'l L. 1 (2010).

36 Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5, 9 (1936).

37 Brief of Amici Curiae M. Cherif Bassiouni and Other International Law Professors Listed Herein in Support of Omar et al. and Munaf et al. as Amici Curiae supporting Respondents, Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674 (2008) (Nos. 07-394, 06-1666), 2008 WL 543036 [hereinafter "Munaf Amicus"].

38 Munaf Amicus at *9.

39 Munaf Amicus at *19–20 (footnotes omitted). Romania is currently seeking the extradition of Munaf to serve a ten-year prison sentence entered against him in Romania. See Nine O'Clock, Munaf Acquitted of Kidnapping Charges in Iraq: The Iraqi-American Is Still Sought by Interpol to Serve a 10-Year Prison Term in Romania, for His Involvement in the Abduction of Three Journalists in 2005, Mar. 18, 2011, available at http://www.nineoclock.ro/munaf-acquitted-of-kidnapping-charges-in-iraq/ (last visited Oct. 1, 2011). Munaf filed a communication with the U.N. Human Rights Committee against Romania, for alleged violations of the ICCPR by Romania with regard to Munaf's detention and trial in Iraq. See Human Rights Committee, Special Rapporteur's Rule 92/97 Decision regarding Communication No. 1539/2006, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/96/D/1539/2006 UNCHR (Aug. 21, 2006) (finding no violation of the ICCPR by Romania under the circumstances).

40 Extradition Treaty Between the Kingdom of Iraq and the Republic of the United States, U.S.–Iraq, June 7, 1934, 49 Stat. 3380.

The territorial theory has several extensions and applications, which are discussed below.

2.1. Special Status Territories

The term "territory" is often a dependable variable of the notion of jurisdiction; that is, the power to exercise dominion and control over a determined physical area. Consequently, the power to exercise jurisdiction may extend to certain territories whose legal status may vary. Such is the case of certain territories that, by reason of exceptional circumstances or special conditions, are called "Special Status Territories." A factor common to all cases of "Special Status Territories" is that the area over which the jurisdictional control of one state extends is usually excepted from that of another state's control, either in whole or in part for a certain period of time, usually determined by treaty. This usually occurs from the existence of peculiar circumstances, such as military occupation, treaties, or other arrangements. The term "Special Status Territories," therefore, does not include "Special Environments."[41]

Section 3185 of Title 18 of the United States Code provides for the return from the United States to "any foreign country or territory or any part thereof"[42] occupied by or under the control of the United States of any person found in the United States who is charged with committing any of certain enumerated offenses in violation of the criminal laws in force in such foreign country or territory. Such return is made upon the written requisition of "the military governor or other chief executive officer in control of such foreign country or territory."[43] Provisions are made for proceedings "before a judge of the courts of the United States only, who shall hold such person on evidence establishing probable cause that he is guilty of the offense charged,"[44] and that the person so held shall be returned "on the order of the Secretary of State of the United States."[45]

The application of this authority extends to military occupied zones. In the case of In re Kraussman,[46] dealing with the United States' occupied zone of Germany, the district court stated:

> The question which presents itself here is whether or not this right of the courts to continue to function in the heart of a foreign nation whose sovereignty has been restored, is occupation or control of part of that country by the United States within the intent and purpose of the extradition statute, Section 3185. I do not think so. The occupation and control mentioned in the statute refers to full governmental authority based upon a dominating police or military force which makes the authority effective. . . . The United States High Commissioner is not now in the words of the statute the "chief executive officer in control of such foreign country."
>
> Although the treaty excludes Berlin and Germany as a whole, the fair implication to be drawn from this exclusion is that the retention of powers by the signatories is principally for the purpose of dealing with the Soviet Republics relative to the reunification of Germany and a peace treaty, and that, in so far as it is practically possible, local governmental authority will be turned over to the Federal Republic of Germany as soon as and to the extent that it is feasible. The Government has offered no proof that the situation in the American Sector of Berlin is factually different from this. Therefore, in the face of a retention of joint overall power de jure and a policy de facto to turn over to the Federal Republic of Germany as much of the administration of local government as possible, it cannot be said that the situation is one which comes within Section 3185.[47]

Whenever there is jurisdiction over a military base or territory in a host country, the guest state having such legal authority can prosecute the violator within that physical area under its control or send him to the guest country for trial, or seek his extradition if he escapes to another 41 See infra Sec. 2.4 (discussing Special Environments).

42 18 U.S.C. § 3185 (2000).

43 Id.

44 Id.

45 Id.

46 In re Kraussman, 130 F. Supp. 926 (D. Conn. 1955).

47 Id. at 928–929.

state.[48] In addition to military occupation, territories may be leased by agreement, whether for military or nonmilitary purposes, and such an agreement may have an extraterritorial clause or a special jurisdictional clause permitting the lessee-state to exercise jurisdiction over the leased territory, completely, partially, concurrently, or with respect to its nationals only. An example of a leased territory is the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo, Cuba. Article IV of the Lease Agreement, signed on July 2, 1903, by the United States and Cuba, under which the United States was granted the right to establish and maintain a naval station at Guantanamo, provides:

> Fugitives from justice charged with crimes or misdemeanors amenable to Cuban law, taking refuge within said areas, shall be delivered up by the United States authorities on demand by duly authorized Cuban authorities.
>
> On the other hand the Republic of Cuba agrees that fugitives from justice charged with crimes or misdemeanors amenable to United States law, committed within said areas, taking refuge in Cuban territory, shall on demand, be delivered up to duly authorized United States authorities.[49]

The same basis for jurisdiction, established by a treaty, existed between the United States and the Philippines in the Military Bases Agreement of 1947. This treaty contained provisions regarding jurisdiction over offenses and the delivery of fugitives to the authorities having jurisdiction over the particular offenses. Article XIII, paragraph 7 of the Military Bases Agreement of 1947 between the United States and the Philippines provides that:

> The United States agrees that it will not grant asylum in any of the bases to any person fleeing from the lawful jurisdiction of the Philippines. Should any such person be found in any base, he will be surrendered on demand to the competent authorities of the Philippines.[50]

Even though a state enjoying special status rights over a given territory can exercise its jurisdiction within the framework of the agreement between respective states, it does not have to exercise it. Conversely, in the case of Wilson v. Girard,[51] the Supreme Court recognized the right of the United States acting through its agents to waive jurisdiction over an American citizen and to relinquish him to Japan, even though the territory wherein the crime was committed was a U.S. military installation, which by treaty was exempted from Japan's territorial jurisdiction. The district court had held that because Girard's act was committed in the performance of his official duty, he was, under U.S. law, "accountable only to United States Federal jurisdiction,"[52] and his delivery to the Japanese authorities would be "illegal and in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States."[53] The district court decision was reversed by the Supreme Court, which held that "[a] sovereign nation has exclusive jurisdiction to punish

---

48 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 12 at 740–748.

49 Lease of Certain Areas for Naval and Coaling Stations, July 2, 1903, art. IV, T.S. No. 426; 6 Bevans 1120, 1121; S. Doc. No. 357, 61st Cong., 2d Sess. 360, 361 (1910). Another example is the Panama Canal Zone under the United States–Panama Canal Treaty, 193 Stat. 4521, 33 U.S.T. 39, T.I.A.S. No. 10,030 (entered into force Oct. 1, 1979).

50 61 Stat. 2019, 4026, 43 U.N.T.S. 271, 288. In Williams v. Rogers, 449 F.2d 513 (8th Cir. 1971), the court of appeals held that article XIII of the 1947 Agreement, amended in 1965, provides the specific jurisdictional and procedural basis for arrest, trial, and custody of U.S. military personnel accused of committing offenses in the Philippines. Relying on Valentine v. United States ex rel. Neidecker, 299 U.S. 5 (1936), the court held that this treaty also provides the basis for transferring military personnel to the Philippines for prosecution by Philippines judicial authority without the need for an extradition treaty or the need to pursue extradition procedures. The court, in fact, held that the agreement could serve as a substitute for an extradition treaty. Also, military transfers of personnel from the United States to the Philippines for prosecution under the terms of the agreement were found not to require compliance with the extradition procedures that would be applicable to nonmilitary personnel in the United States. This is a novel approach that appears to be unprecedented in the annals of U.S. extradition practice.

51 Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957).

52 Girard v. Wilson, 152 F. Supp. 21, 26 (D. D.C. 1957).

53 Id. at 27.

offenses against its laws committed within its borders, unless it expressly or impliedly consents to surrender its jurisdiction."[54] The Court also held that:

> The issue of our decision is therefore narrowed to the question whether, upon the record before us, the Constitution or legislation subsequent to the Security Treaty prohibited the carrying out of this provision authorized by the Treaty for waiver of the qualified jurisdiction granted by Japan. We find no constitutional or statutory barrier to the provision as applied here. In the absence of such encroachments, the wisdom of the arrangement is exclusively for the determination of the Executive and Legislative Branches.[55]

The Girard case arose under a special agreement with Japan, namely the Security Treaty of 1952.[56] However, the problems raised in that case are no different from those of Status of Forces Agreements (SOFA), the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), or other bilateral agreements.

As to NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty of April 4, 1949, specifically states "that the forces of one Party may be sent, by arrangement, to serve in the territory of another Party."[57] The parties agreed in Article VII of the SOFA of June 19, 1951, inter alia, that:

> 5. (a) The authorities of the receiving and sending States shall assist each other in the arrest of members of a force or civilian component or their dependents in the territory of the receiving State and in handing them over to the authority which is to exercise jurisdiction in accordance with the above provisions.[58]

Under the George W. Bush administration, the United States departed from its established practice of negotiating SOFAs with countries where it has stationed troops. Such practice is consonant with international custom. This has been the case since 2001 in Afghanistan and since 2003 in Iraq. In both of these countries, the United States stationed a significant number of troops, in the former estimated at peak at 100,000 and in the latter at 140,000, in addition to an undetermined number of civilian contractors working parallel to the military, for military purposes, or for civilian reconstruction projects. United States military personnel are subject to the UCMJ, which applies to all military personnel wherever they may be, but not to civilian contractors. As there is no SOFA between the United States and either Iraq or Afghanistan, the criminal conduct of any U.S. national there is subject to these countries' respective territorial jurisdiction.

2.2. Subjective–Objective Territorial Theory

United States law and practice is strongly based on the theory of territorial jurisdiction[59] with respect to both nationals and aliens who have violated federal or state law, even when part of

---

54 Wilson, 354 U.S. at 529.

55 Id. at 530.

56 Security Treaty between the United States and Japan, Sept. 8, 1951, 3 U.S.T. 3329, T.I.A.S. No. 2491.

57 North Atlantic Treaty, Apr. 4, 1949, 63 Stat. 2241, T.I.A.S. No. 1964. See also Williams v. Rogers, 449 F.2d 513 (8th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 926 (1972); Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211 (D. D.C.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 869 (1972).

58 North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Status of Forces, June 19, 1951, 4 U.S.T. 1792, 1800, T.I.A.S. No. 2846. See also Richard R. Baxter, Criminal Jurisdiction in the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, 7 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 72 (1958). Most states claim jurisdiction over members of their armed forces, both nationals and non-nationals, regardless of their current location. See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 422, Reporters' Note 5. Because conflicts of jurisdiction can result from the presence in one state of members of the military of another state, SOFAs are usually concluded between the two countries. See also James R. Coker, The Status of Visiting Military Forces in Europe: NATO and SOFA, A Comparison, in Bassiouni & Nanda Treatise, supra note 1, at 115.

59 See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at §§ 402, 415, 431.

the acts constituting the crime were committed outside its territory,[60] provided, however, that its effects were within the territory.

The fact that a crime was not entirely committed within the state's territory, or that the preparation for the crime occurred in another state, does not prevent the states in which some of the acts or results occurred from asserting their respective jurisdiction.[61] These extensions of the territorial principle have been such that it is often difficult to distinguish between cases relying on this theory and other theories, such as the protective or nationality theories. Indeed, U.S. courts in many cases have freely extended the territorial theory to situations where it would have appeared that another theory would have been more appropriate. Among such cases are those in which U.S. citizens have committed violations of U.S. law outside of U.S. territory, but that had some effect within the United States. These cases involved acts detrimental to U.S. national security[62] or economic interests,[63] as well as other categories of violative conduct.[64] The fact remains that in these cases the more appropriate theories are nationality[65] or protected interest, and not territoriality by extension.

---

60 Strassheim v. Daily, 221 U.S. 280 (1911); United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945); cf. Am. Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U.S. 347 (1909). See also United States v. Baker, 136 F. Supp. 546 (S.D.N.Y. 1955), wherein the court distinguished the earlier case of United States ex rel. Majka v. Palmer, 67 F.2d 146 (7th Cir. 1933), and ordered an alien deported for having made false statements under oath to an American consul abroad while applying for a passport. The court noted that deporting an alien for perjury is far different from indicting and trying him for a crime committed abroad." Baker, 136 F. Supp. at 548. In 1968, on the same issue, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals held in United States v. Pizzarusso, 388 F.2d 8 (2d Cir. 1968), that a perjured statement before a U.S. consul abroad subjected such a person to prosecution in the United States. For acts of aliens committed wholly abroad, but with effect in the United States, see Rocha v. United States, 288 F.2d 545 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 366 U.S. 948 (1961), and for a conspiracy in Canada having effect in the United States, see Rivard v. United States, 375 F.2d 882 (5th Cir. 1967). In Rivard, the defendants were extradited from Canada to the United States for conspiring in Canada to smuggle heroin into the United States. See also United States v. Wright-Barker, 784 F.2d 161 (3d Cir. 1986), in which the Third Circuit upheld the jurisdiction of the United States to try persons arrested on the high seas for conspiracy to import narcotics. The court, noting that the United States traditionally could assert jurisdiction over crimes having an effect within the territory of the United States, recognized a growing extension of that doctrine by scholars of international law to include jurisdiction over conduct intended to have an effect in the territory of the United States. But see United States v. Martinez-Hidalgo, 993 F.2d 1052, 1055 (3d Cir. 1993) (holding that the effects requirement of Wright-Barker has been superseded by 46 U.S.C. app. § 1903(d)).

61 See art. 3, in Harvard Research Project,supra note 3; Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402; Blakesley, Conceptual Framework for Extradition, supra note 1, at 694.

62 See, e.g., Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717 (1952), reh'g denied, 344 U.S. 850 (1952); Gillars v. United States, 182 F.2d 962 (D.C. Cir. 1950); Chandler v. United States, 171 F.2d 921 (1st Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 336 U.S. 918 (1949).

63 In United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U.S. 268 (1927), a federal court enjoined the defendant American corporations from conducting various activities in Yucatan designed to control the exportation of sisal to the United States from Mexico and to monopolize the market both inside and outside the United States in violation of provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. In Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U.S. 280 (1952), a federal district court in Texas was held to have jurisdiction over a suit by an American watch company to enjoin a U.S. citizen from using the company's trademark, registered under U.S. law, in Mexico on watches made in Mexico. See Stewart E. Rauner, Note,Antitrust Law: Extraterritoriality—Mannington Mills, Inc. v. Congoleum Corp., 595 F.2d 1287 (3d Cir. 1979), 20 Harv. Int'l L. J. 667 (1979).

64 In Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421 (1932), a U.S. citizen was convicted upon his return to the United States for contempt of court for failure to obey a subpoena directing him to return home from France to act as a witness for the U.S. government in a criminal trial. In Sachs v. Government of the Canal Zone, 176 F.2d 292 (5th Cir. 1949), a U.S. citizen was tried and convicted for criminal libel that he had composed in the Republic of Panama, a sovereign state, for publication and circulation in the Canal Zone.

65 See Geoffrey R. Watson, Offenders Abroad: The Case for Nationality-Based Criminal Jurisdiction, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 41 (1992).

Where aliens have been involved, U.S. courts have expanded the traditional application of the territoriality theory, generally through the use of what may be referred to as the subjective–objective territorial theory. This theory is better described as an extension of the territorial theory rather than as a separate one. Under it, aliens acting outside territorial boundaries are considered as having committed crimes within the state if the offense has a certain impact within the territory of the state. When considering the application of the subjective–objective territorial theory, the important factor is that the effect of the crime occurred within the territory of the rule-enforcing state. The state where the consequences or impact of the crime occurred has objective territorial jurisdiction. The state in which or from which certain acts were committed has subjective territorial jurisdiction.

This theory has been recognized, although not under this particular nomenclature, by the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States,[66] and has been relied upon in early cases, such as those involving violations of prohibition laws.[67] English and other Commonwealth courts have extended its application to cases involving national security[68] and other matters.[69]

Whenever states are faced with the problem of acts committed outside their territory but having effects within it, courts deem the perpetrator constructively present in the state where

---

66 See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402. Section 402 reads, in part, as follows:

> A state has jurisdiction to prescribe law with respect to
>
> (1) (a) conduct that, wholly or in substantial part, takes place within its territory;
>
> (b) the status of persons, or interests in things, present within its territory;
>
> (c) conduct outside its territory that has or is intended to have substantial effect within its territory;
>
> (2) the activities, interests, status, or relations of its nationals outside as well as within its territory; and
>
> (3) certain conduct outside its territory by persons not its nationals that is directed against the security of the state or against a limited class of other state interests.

Id.

67 See, e.g., Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593 (1927). The defendants, British subjects who had been on a British ship on the high seas about twenty-five miles west of San Francisco at the time it was seized by U.S. authorities, were convicted of conspiracy to violate U.S. liquor laws, pursuant to a treaty between the United States and England authorizing the United States to seize any British vessels and persons on such vessels suspected of such offenses.

68 In Joyce v. Director of Public Prosecution, [1946] 1 All E.R. 186 (Eng. H.L.), the defendant, who had acted as a propagandist radio announcer for Nazi Germany (known also as "Lord Haw-Haw"), was convicted of treason and hanged, even though he was a U.S. national and therefore an alien to English courts. Joyce had obtained a British passport fraudulently in July 1933, and held it until it expired on July 1, 1940, after he had begun to broadcast for Germany. The court found that the possession of even this illegally obtained passport gave Joyce certain rights under British law and imposed upon him a corresponding duty of allegiance, which he violated. In a South African case, Rex v. Neuman, 8 S. Afr. L.R. 1248 (1949) (S. Afr.), the defendant was a German national domiciled in the Union of South Africa who had applied for naturalization there, but who had also retained his German nationality. While in Germany, he had committed acts against the national security of South Africa and was subsequently captured. At the time of his trial, he was not a national of South Africa. The court found, however, that because he had resided in South Africa and had enjoyed its protection, he "owed allegiance to that State, breach whereof renders him liable to the penalties of high treason." Id. at 1256.

69 See Rex v. Godfrey, [1923] 1 K.B. 24 (Eng.) (ordering a man in England to be extradited to Switzerland to stand trial for having procured his confederate, who was in Switzerland, to obtain goods by false pretenses, even though the first man had never been in Switzerland).

the effects of the conduct took place and which requests that actor's delivery. The case that appears to be relied upon most frequently in the United States is Strassheim v. Daily,[70] wherein the Supreme Court held that "acts done outside a jurisdiction, but intended to produce and producing detrimental effects within it justified a State in punishing the offender if the State should succeed in getting him within its power."[71]

As early as 1798, the Attorney General indicated that a person charged with piracy on the high seas should be tried in the United States and not extradited to England.[72] A different rationale was relied upon in Sternaman v. Peck,[73] which involved the extradition of a woman who had poisoned her husband in New York. The ensuing death occurred in Canada. On rehearing, the argument was raised that if a crime had been committed, it was not within the territory of Canada, but the court rejected it by citing cases where the jurisdiction had been upheld although the crime had been commenced in another district.[74] No attempt was made to determine whether the crime had been perpetrated solely within the territory of Canada. In fact, the court seems to have relied upon the existence of concurrent jurisdiction in the United States and Canada.[75]

Two other cases from the Ninth Circuit, Ex parte Davis[76] and In re Hammond,[77] permitted extradition on a non-territorial jurisdiction theory. In the first case, the requesting state had jurisdiction based on the subjective territorial principle, while the requested state had objective territorial jurisdiction. The court rested its decision in both instances on the grounds that the necessary elements to complete the offense were consummated in the requesting state. The first of these cases, Ex parte Davis, was for the murder of an individual who had been fatally wounded in Mexico but died in California. The argument was made that the offense was not complete until the death of the victim occurred, which was in California. The reasoning of the court in dismissing this contention centered on the language of the treaty requiring that the crime be committed within the jurisdiction of Mexico. As the petitioner had done all the acts necessary for the commission of the offense within Mexico, the treaty requirement was satisfied and extradition could be granted.[78] This factual situation and the jurisdictional theory of the requesting state is the opposite of that found in Sternaman: the United States had "subjective" territorial jurisdiction in Sternaman and "objective" territorial jurisdiction in Davis. Despite the difference in jurisdictional bases, the Davis court failed to distinguish between the cases and employed reasoning in support of its decision that conceivably would require an opposite result in Sternaman. In Sternaman, the jurisdiction of Canada was determined by reference to 70 Strassheim v. Daily, 21 U.S. 280 (1911). See Melia v. United States, 667 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1981) (citing Strassheim v. Daily, for the proposition that a single telephone call from the United States to Canada constituted an act within Canada sufficient for jurisdictional basis under U.S. law).

---

71 Strassheim, 21 U.S. at 289.

72 1 Op. Att'y Gen. 88 (1852). A similar position was expressed in In re Stupp, 23 F. Cas. 281 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1873) (dictum). In an unreported case, extradition was refused where the victim was shot on a U.S. vessel in Canadian waters, but later died in the United States. Edward Clarke, A Treatise on International Criminal Law 71–72 (4th ed. 1903) [hereinafter Clarke Treatise]; cf. Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289 (1902) (defining extradition).

73 Sternaman v. Peck, 83 F. 690 (2d Cir. 1897).

74 Id. at 691.

75 The same conclusion was reached in Commonwealth v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 1 (1869), and Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 320 (1860). The Tyler analysis, however, could lead to the conclusion that the place where a victim died would have sole jurisdiction over the prosecution for murder.

76 Ex parte Davis, 54 F.2d 723 (9th Cir. 1931).

77 In re Hammond, 59 F.2d 683 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 287 U.S. 640 (1932).

78 Davis, 54 F.2d at 727.

U.S. and Canadian principles of jurisdiction,[79] whereas in Davis, the court looked exclusively to the language of the treaty.[80]

In the second of these cases, In re Hammond,[81] the accused forged a check drawn on a Canadian bank, which was deposited in his account in California. The court determined jurisdiction by looking to where the crime was completed and concluded that Canada had exclusive jurisdiction, despite the fact that the opinion relied to some extent on authorities enunciating the broad application of the "objective" principle.

The court of appeals in that case relied on a decision of the Supreme Court to the effect that one outside of a state who willfully puts in motion factors to take effect in that state is answerable at the place where the harm is done, and that this principle is recognized in the criminal jurisprudence of all countries. The court of appeals stated:

> [T]he Supreme Court in the decision from which we have quoted (Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593) shows the desirability of surrendering a person for trial who puts in motion forces which operate to consummate a crime within the territory of the demanding nation . . . and there is no reason to suppose that the treaty was intended to exclude such a class of offenders . . .[82]

These difficulties arise whenever a given conduct deemed criminal produces its effects at a place other than where the original conduct took place, and also whenever the offense is deemed by its nature or effect to be continuous. The various decisions considered in this area seem to be searching for some definitive criteria of application for the maxim lex loci delicti.[83] Unlike cases involving civil responsibility, which may depend upon public policy considerations, conflicts of jurisdiction in criminal cases are less susceptible to flexible rules based on alternative policy considerations. Nonetheless, it seems clear that judicial decisions are guided by the interest displayed by prosecuting authorities, and the courts reject the claims of defendants whenever the state having concurrent or alternative jurisdiction does not challenge the jurisdiction of the requesting state.

In United States ex rel. Eatessami v. Marasco,[84] an Israeli citizen obtained a loan in New York from a bank in Switzerland on the basis of forged securities given as collateral. The court, in holding that a crime had been committed within the territorial jurisdiction of Switzerland, interpreted the relevant treaty to allow extradition "whenever the extraditee is shown prima facie to have intended the harm and caused the harm to the demanding state substantially as claimed by the latter."[85] This rule focuses entirely on the competence of the requesting nation and allows extradition whenever those jurisdictional requirements have been met. The court

---

79 Sternaman v. Peck, 83 F. 690 (2d Cir. 1897).

80 Davis, 54 F.2d 723.

81 Hammond, 59 F.2d 683. See also United States ex rel. Hatfield v. Guay, 11 F. Supp. 806 (D. N.H. 1935).

82 Hammond, 59 F.2d 683 at 686. However, in 1940, the same court rejected the contention of Alexander Strakosch that he should not be extradited to Great Britain on charges of fraudulent conversion and obtaining money by false pretenses on the grounds that even if the evidence could be said to show his presence in London and his participation there in the activities of certain other accused individuals, there was no evidence to show that he was there at the time of the actual commission of the acts constituting the offenses, or any evidence of his direct participation in those acts. The court stated:

> Moreover from the facts stated in the depositions, it is reasonably inferable—and, we think, obvious—that Spiro and his associates, including appellee [Strakosch], were engaged in a conspiracy, and that the crimes in question were committed in furtherance thereof. It therefore makes no difference whether appellee was present or absent at the commission of the acts constituting the crimes, or whether he did or did not directly participate in their commission.

Cleugh v. Strakosch, 109 F.2d 330, 335 (9th Cir. 1940).

83 The law of the place where the crime took place. Black's Law Dictionary 820 (5th ed. 1979).

84 United States ex rel. Eatessami v. Marasco, 275 F. Supp. 492 (S.D.N.Y. 1967).

85 Id. at 496.

examined the qualifying words of the treaty with Switzerland, which requires that the offense be "committed in the territory of one of the contracting States [and that the offender] be found in the territory of the other State . . . ."[86] The limitation that the crime take place within the territory of the requesting state is found in a few U.S. treaties.[87] Usually the words used are "jurisdiction" or, as in recent conventions, "territorial jurisdiction."[88]

The Italian Supreme Court held in a 1934 case entitled In re Amper that

> In view of the principles of international cooperation for the suppression of crime, the sole duty of the Court of the requested State is to determine the subjective and objective existence of the crime charged and to see whether it is extraditable according to the principles which rule the relations between the two States in the matter of extradition. It cannot raise questions of territorial jurisdiction if its own jurisdiction is not involved.[89]

In Rex v. Godfrey,[90] an individual was held to be a fugitive in England when Switzerland sought to have him extradited, although he had not been in Switzerland when the offense was committed. The same result applied to fugitives who had escaped to England but were sought by Germany for fraud committed by them in Holland against persons defrauded in Germany.[91]

In 1954, the French Cour de Cassation held that a certain stateless person residing in France should be extradited to Belgium to face prosecution for participation in a fraudulent scheme attempted to be carried out in Belgium by an accomplice with the aid of forged documents, even though the person remained in France. The court took the view that although his acts were committed in France, they were part of an ensemble of acts over which Belgian courts had jurisdiction.[92]

Decisions in the United States and in other countries do not attempt to ascertain jurisdiction under any particular theory, but rather limit their analyses to the location of the primary effect of the alleged criminal acts.

The theory of subjective–objective territoriality contains an inherent conflict in that it recognizes jurisdiction in more than one state without ranking priorities, an issue dealt with in Section 11 below. The attitude of the judiciary, particularly in the United States, has been to ignore the issue of conflicting concurrent jurisdictions and to pursue a pragmatic course. Under this approach, the state that has physical custody has de facto priority.

One of the more recent causes célèbres is the case against General Manuel Noriega, the former president of Panama.[93] United States military forces seized General Noriega in Panama in the 86 Treaty with Switzerland for the Extradition of Criminals, May 14, 1900, art. I, 31 Stat. 1928 (1901), T.S. No. 354. A new treaty has been in force since 1977. See Treaty Between the Swiss Confederation and the United States of America on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, Jan. 23, 1977, 27 U.S.T. 2019, T.I.A.S. No. 8302.

---

87 Other treaties allowing extradition for crimes committed within the demanded state's territory are with: Uruguay, Mar. 11, 1905, art. I, 35 Stat. 2028 (1909), T.S. No. 501; Supplemental Treaty with Uruguay, Apr. 11, 1984, art. I, T.I.A.S. No. 10,850; Argentina, Sept. 26, 1896, art. I, 31 Stat. 1883 (1901), T.S. No. 6; Supplemental Treaty with Argentina, Jan. 21, 1972, art. I, 23 U.S.T. 3501; and, Colombia, May 7, 1888, art. I, 26 Stat. 1534 (1891), T.S. No. 53; Supplemental Treaty with Colombia, Mar. 4, 1982, T.I.A.S. Kavass 334.

88 See Treaty of Extradition with South Africa, Dec. 18, 1947, 2 U.S.T. 884, T.I.A.S. No. 2243.

89 F. Ann. Dig. 353 (Italy Cass. 1934).

90 [1923] 1 K.B. 24 (Eng.).

91 Rex v. Jacobi and Hiller, 46 L.T.R. 595 (1881) (Eng.).

92 Malinowski, 1954 Bull. Crim. No. 165 (Fr.).

93 See generally Douglas Kesh, Note, The Capture of Manuel Antonio Noriega: A Legal Analysis, 4 Touro J. Transnat'l L. 251 (1993).

course of an armed conflict and brought him to the United States to answer charges of criminal conspiracy to import illegal drugs into the United States. In seizing and prosecuting Noriega, the United States expansively exercised extraterritorial jurisdiction premised upon the objective–subjective extraterritorial theory.[94] The court said that:

> [I]nternational law principles have expanded to permit jurisdiction upon a mere showing in intent to produce effects in this country, without requiring proof of an overt act or effect within the United States.. .
>
> In the drug smuggling context, the "intent doctrine" has resulted in jurisdiction over persons who attempted to import narcotics into the United States but never actually succeeded in entering the United States or delivering drugs within its borders. The fact that no act was committed and no repercussions were felt within the United States did not preclude jurisdiction over conduct that was clearly directed at the United States.
>
> These principles unequivocally support jurisdiction in this case.[95]

There is very little support, if any, in international law for the proposition that criminal jurisdiction can be exercised extraterritorially on the sole factor of "intent," as claimed by the court. If a person, however, sets up a drug trafficking operation whose base is one state, with distribution aimed at other states, and in fact the drugs in question are smuggled into other states, each state in which the drugs are smuggled has jurisdiction under the objective territorial theory. The state from which the operation is conducted or directed therefore has territorial jurisdiction.

Theories of jurisdiction should be ranked in order to provide the basis for resolving conflicts of competing jurisdictional claims and priorities in extradition requests. But the jurisprudence of almost all states has recognized the territorial theory as ranking over all other theories, and is thus given priority in extradition requests. Within the territorial theory, the state that has custody of the accused has priority, but this does not bar the state having subjective territoriality from prosecuting the accused at a later time. The only restriction would be that of ne bis in idem or double jeopardy, where recognized.[96]

2.3. Floating and Aerial Territoriality: The Law of the Flag

2.3.1. Historical Basis

The high seas have historically been considered outside the exercise of states' national sovereignty and jurisdiction.[97] Indeed, for approximately 200 years now, freedom of the seas has been the dominant rule of the international law of the sea,[98] with all that it comports as consequences on jurisdiction. The origin of the concept of the freedom of the high seas in Western legal literature is attributed to Hugo Grotius's publication Mare Liberum.[99] Grotius, however, 94 United States v. Noriega, 746 F. Supp. 1506 (S.D. Fla. 1990); United States v. Noriega, 683 F. Supp. 1373 (S.D. Fla. 1988).

---

95 Noriega, 746 F. Supp. at 1513 (citations omitted).

96 The principle that a person cannot be twice judged for the same crime has yet to be fully recognized in international law. See Ch. VIII, Sec. 4.3.

97 See Barry E. Carter & Phillip R. Trimble, International Law 924 (1991) (noting that Grotius regarded the notion of mare clausum (closed sea) as an impermissible extension of a state's sovereignty).

98 R P. Anand, Origin and Development of the Law of the Sea 225 (1983). See also Robin Rolf Churchill & Alan Vaughan Lowe, The Law of the Sea 165 (1983) (noting that the principle of the freedom of high seas "is a cornerstone of international law").

99 Hugo Grotius, Mare Liberum (R. Magoffin trans., 1916); Hugo Grotius, Mare Liberum Sive de Jure, Quod Batabis Competittit ad Indicana Commercia (1609). But one scholar posits that "there was the jurist for the Dutch West India Company, which had an interest in freedom of the high seas for its commerce. But England did not entirely share the Dutch view. For many years Selden's Mare Clausum,[100] written for the British Crown and serving British interests, was the authoritative English work on maritime law.[101] But once the concept of the closed sea became detrimental to England and Europe's commercial interests, Mare Clausum[102] was rejected in favor of Grotius's Mare Liberum, or free sea.[103]

The principle of the freedom of the high seas is now well established. It is part of conventional and customary international law. As an expression of international custom, freedom of the seas is included in the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States.[104] Similarly, the concept of Mare Liberum is codified in Article 2 of the 1958 Convention on the High Seas[105] and article 87 of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention. Article 87(1) specifically provides:

> The high seas are open to all States, whether coastal or land-locked. Freedom of the high seas is exercised under the conditions laid down by this Convention and by other rules of international law. It comprises, inter alia, both for coastal and land-locked States:
>
> (a) freedom of navigation;
>
> (b) freedom of overflight;
>
> (c) freedom to lay submarine cables and pipelines . . . ;
>
> (d) freedom to construct artificial islands . . . ;

---

is no doubt that the freedom of the seas in the form of unobstructed freedom of navigation and commercial shipping was accepted by all the countries in the Indian Ocean and other Asian seas for centuries before history was ever recorded." Anand, supra note 98, at 226.

100 J.Selden, Mare Clausum (M. Nedham trans., 1972); J. Selden, Mare Clausum Seu de Domino Maris (London, 1635).

101 Professor Anand observed that mare clausum for some time superseded mare liberum, not necessarily due to its academic superiority, but thanks to "the 'louder voice' of the British Navy." Anand, supra note 98, at 229.

102 Professor Anand observed that the genius of Grotius's work "lies in observing and presenting the maritime customs of Asian countries in the form of a doctrine, supported by logical arguments, Christian theology and the authority of venerable Roman law. . . ." Anand, supra note 98, at 228.

103 Id.

104 Section 521 of the Restatement (Third), supra note 3, provides:

> (1) The high seas are open and free to all states, whether coastal or land-locked.
>
> (2) Freedom of the high seas comprises, inter alia:
>
> (a) freedom of navigation;
>
> (b) freedom of overflight;
>
> (c) freedom of fishing;
>
> (d) freedom to lay submarine cables and pipelines;
>
> (e) freedom to construct artificial islands, installations, and structures; and
>
> (f) freedom of scientific research.
>
> (3) These freedoms must be exercises by all states with reasonable regard to the interests of other states in their exercise of freedom of the high seas.

105 Convention on the High Seas, done at Geneva, Apr. 29, 1958, 2 U.S.T. 2312, T.I.A.S. No. 5200, 450 U.N.T.S. 82 [hereinafter High Seas Convention]. Article 2 of the 1958 Convention recognizes non-exhaustively the following freedoms on the high seas: (1) freedom of navigation, (2) freedom of fishing, (3) freedom to lay submarine cables and pipelines, and (4) freedom of overflight. Also, for the jurisdictional provision of the High Seas Convention, see Article 97.

(e) freedom of fishing… ;

(f) freedom of scientific research…[106]

The principle of the free seas is supported by the absence of territorial sovereignty on the high seas.[107] In recognition of this corollary, Article 89 of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention, entitled "Invalidity of Claims of Sovereignty," prohibits any state from subjecting any part of the high seas to its sovereignty.[108] In short, the freedom of the high seas is based on the recognition that no state may exercise territorial sovereignty on the high seas.

A consequence of the principle of the freedom of the high seas, and the prohibition on the exercise of territorial jurisdiction on the high seas, is that ships on the high seas are, as a general rule, subject only to the jurisdiction of the state under whose flag they sail.[109] The Permanent Court of International Justice in the Lotus case in 1927 recognized this principle, and stated that "vessels on the high seas are subject to no authority except that of the State whose flag they fly."[110] The court added: "In virtue of the principle of the freedom of the seas, that is to say, the absence of any territorial sovereignty upon the high seas, no State may exercise any kind of jurisdiction over foreign vessels upon them."[111]

The U.S. Supreme Court recognizes the customary "law of the flag," as the principle is termed. In 1952, in Lauritzen v. Larsen, the Court called the law of the flag "perhaps the most venerable and universal rule of maritime law…"[112] In Lauritzen, the Court recalled an earlier decision where it said "that the law of the flag supersedes the territorial principle, even for purposes of criminal jurisdiction…"[113] The 1982 Law of the Sea Convention, which became effective on November 16, 1994, has yet to be ratified by the United States.[114] The Convention provides at article 92(1) that "[s]hips shall sail under the flag of one state only and, save in exceptional cases expressly provided for in international treaties…, shall be subject to its exclusive jurisdiction on the high seas…."[115] These provisions of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention have become part of customary international law, and thus binding on the United States despite the fact that the United States has only signed, but not ratified, the treaty.

Conventional international law, however, permits, in certain limited situations, warships of one state to approach and search vessels sailing under the flag of another state on the high seas. Under the 1958 Convention on the High Seas and the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention, warships may proceed to verify a vessel's right to fly its flag. This represents a codification of the customary right of reconnaissance: the right of a public ship of a state to approach a vessel on the high seas and ascertain her identity and nationality.[116] Both conventions, however, provide 106 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, Dec. 10, 1982, U. N. Doc. A/CONF. 62/122, 21 I.L.M. 1261 (1982) art.87(1) [hereinafter LOS Convention].

107 Momtaz Djamchid, The High Seas, in 1 Handbook on the New Law of the Sea 385 (René-Jean Dupuy & Daniel Vignes eds., 1991) [hereinafter Dupuy & Vignes Handbook].

108 Article 89 specifically provides: "No States may validly purport to subject any part of the high seas to its sovereignty." LOS Convention, supra note 106.

109 Robert C. F. Reuland, Note, Interference with Non-National Ships on the High Seas: Peacetime Exceptions to the Exclusivity Rule of Flag-State Jurisdiction, 22 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1161, 1164 (1989).

110 Case of the S.S. Lotus (Fr. v. Turk.), 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 9, at 25.

111 Id.

112 Lauritzen v. Larsen, 345 U.S. 571 (1952).

113 Id. (citing United States v. Flores, 289 U.S. 137 (1933)).

114 Although the United States is not a party to the Convention, it endorses all portions of the Convention except those regarding seabeds. Christina E. Sorensen, Comment, Drug Trafficking on the High Seas: A Move toward Universal Jurisdiction under International Law, 4 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 207, 207 n.1 (1990) (citing 83 U.S. Dep't of State 13. No. 2075 at 70 (1983)).

115 LOS Convention, supra note 106.

116 Reuland, supra note 109, at 1169.

that the warship is not justified in approaching another vessel to verify its right to fly its flag unless certain grounds exist.[117] Article 22 of the 1958 Convention on the High Seas proscribes such verification unless there are reasonable grounds for suspecting:

> (a) that the ship is engaged in piracy; or
>
> (b) that the ship is engaged in slave trade; or
>
> (c) that, though flying a foreign flag or refusing to show its flag, the ship is, in reality, of the same nationality as the warship.[118]

The 1982 Law of the Seas Convention, at article 110, contains the same list of special circumstances allowing verification of a vessel's right to fly and adds to it circumstances of unauthorized broadcasting and ships without nationality.[119] The Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States recognizes the principle of noninterference with vessels within the jurisdiction of another state and provides that, in general, ships > are not subject to interference on the high seas [except] if [such interference is] authorized by the flag state, or if there is reason to suspect that the ship (a) engaged in piracy, slave trade, or unauthorized broadcasting; (b) is without nationality; or (c) though flying a foreign flag . . . , is in fact of the same nationality as the . . . law enforcement ship.[120]

It is thus quite clear in conventional and customary international law that, on the high seas, a state may lawfully exercise jurisdiction over vessels of another generally,[121] only where an international crime (e.g., piracy or slave trade) is involved. A vessel involved in an international crime is, therefore, under no state's protection, and is subject to any state's stop, search, and seizure.[122] Presumably, the state disregarding the law of the flag and exercising its jurisdiction over a vessel involved in an international crime does so under the universal jurisdiction theory.[123]

The universal theory of jurisdiction grants any state jurisdiction over crimes deemed to be of concern to the entire community of nations.[124] Some scholars argue that where the crime involved is not recognized as an international crime, "an exhibition of the States's criminal authority extraterritorially, that is, on the high seas, can only be justified in international law on theories of personal jurisdiction over nationals or of protective jurisdiction."[125] The protective theory of jurisdiction, discussed below, allows a state to prosecute certain offenses committed extraterritorially, provided such offenses threaten national security.[126] Offenses subject to jurisdiction under the protective theory include espionage, drug trafficking, and conspiracy to violate immigration or customs laws.[127] The nationality theory of jurisdiction gives a state jurisdiction over its nationals whether inside or outside of its territory.[128]

---

117 See Article 22 of the 1958 High Seas Convention, supra note 105; Article 110 of the 1982 LOS Convention, supra note 106.

118 High Seas Convention, supra note 105.

119 LOS Convention, supra note 106 at art. 110(1)(c), (d).

120 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 522.

121 Note that consent of the flag state may give jurisdiction over one of its vessels to another state for the purposes consented to. For a more detailed discussion, see text below.

122 Reuland, supra note 109, at 1179.

123 See generally Feller, Jurisdiction Over Offenses, supra note 1, at 32–34.

124 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 404. See also Blakesley, Traditional Bases of Jurisdiction, supra note 1, at 31–33. See also infra Sec. 7.

125 Daniel Patrick O'Connell, The International Law of the Sea 935 (Ivan A. Shearer ed., 1984).

126 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. f. See also Blakesley, Traditional Bases of Jurisdiction, supra note 1, at 19–22 (discussing the protection theory of jurisdiction).

127 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. f.

128 Id. § 402(2). See also Blakesley, Traditional Bases of Jurisdiction, supra note 1, at 22–27 (discussing the nationality principle of jurisdiction).

Because the exercise of jurisdiction on the high seas is generally limited by the law of the flag, stateless vessels sailing under no flag are in a peculiar position. Stateless vessels are customarily subject to jurisdiction of any state wishing to exercise its jurisdiction over them.[129] United States courts recognize that stateless vessels do not enjoy the protection of the flag of any state and are thus not afforded the right of undisturbed navigation on the high seas.[130]

One other situation that presents a deviation from the exclusiveness of flag-state jurisdiction arises when the flag state consents to another state's exercise of jurisdiction, however limited, over one of the vessels sailing under its flag. Because a state enjoys jurisdiction over vessels that sail under its flag in its exercise of sovereignty, a state may consent to jurisdiction of another state over one of the vessels flying its flag. Consequently, a ship on the high seas may come under the legitimate jurisdiction of a state other than its flag state. For example, in 1981, the United States entered into a bilateral agreement with the United Kingdom[131] that allows U.S. authorities to board private British-flagged vessels suspected of trafficking in drugs on the high seas in the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea, and on the Eastern seaboard. In addition to formal agreements, a state may get jurisdiction to search and seize a foreign-flagged vessel on the high seas by obtaining an individual consent from the flag state.[132]

2.3.2. The Law of the Flag as a Jurisdictional Basis

It is well established that vessels, aircraft, and spacecrafts bearing the flag of a given state are an extension of the state's territory, particularly on the high seas, in international air space, and in outer space. Therefore, the territoriality theory applies to them by extension. This approach can be argued, if for no other reason than the fact that the object of the extension, whether a vessel, aircraft, or spacecraft, owes its existence to technology that permitted such objects to utilize special environments other than land. To that extent, the theory is predicated on a fiction.

Although there are obvious technological differences among ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts, there are, subject to the limitations discussed below, four factors that are common to all of them and thus permit their joint treatment in the context of theories of jurisdiction and extradition. These similarities are: (1) ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts operate in spaces that, with the exception of territorial airspace, territorial sea, and internal waters, are legally beyond the territorial claims of any single state; (2) ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts enable humans to travel with great mobility and speed through these spaces; (3) ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts are sources of power for states; and (4) ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts are potential arenas for criminal activities.

The high seas, although available for use by all states, are not subject to the sovereign claims of any state.[133] The airspace above the high seas is similarly for use by all states and is not subject

---

129 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 522. See Reuland, supra note 109, at 1196–1206 (discussing the stateless vessel exception to the prohibition against exercise of sovereignty on the high seas over vessels other than those sailing under the sovereign's flag).

130 E.g., United States v. Rubies, 612 F.2d 397, 402 (9th Cir. 1979) (stating that "[u]nder international law, foreign flag vessels are generally accorded the right of undisturbed navigation on the high seas.... An unregistered or 'stateless' vessel, however, does not have these rights and protections.").

131 Agreement to Facilitate the Interdiction by the United States of Vessels of the United Kingdom Suspected of Trafficking in Drugs, Nov. 13, 1981, U.K.-U.S., T.I.A.S. No. 10,296.

132 See Sorensen, supra note 114, at 223. See generally George K. Walker, The Interface of Criminal Jurisdiction and Actions under the United Nations Charter with Admiralty Law, 20 Tulane Mar. L. J. 217 (1996).

133 Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, art. 1, Apr. 29, 1958, 15 U.S.T. 1606, T.I.A.S. No. 5639, 516 U.N.T.S. 205 [hereinafter the Territorial Sea Convention]; LOS Convention, supra note 106, at arts. 87–110. Article 89 prohibits any state from subjecting any part of the high seas to its sovereignty. It specifically provides: "No State may validly purport to subject any part of the high seas to its sovereignty." Although the Territorial Sea Treaty does not specify how wide the territorial sea may be, it is generally believed that it may be no wider than twelve miles. See James Brierly, The Law of to national appropriation or claims of sovereignty.[134] In addition to claiming sovereignty over its internal waters (which all states may do), a coastal state may claim a territorial sea, extending no more than twelve miles (with some exceptions) from its coastline, over which it may claim complete sovereignty, subject only to the right of innocent passage of the ships of other states.[135]

The airspace above the territorial sea is also subject to the sovereign claims of the coastal state,[136] but there is no corresponding right of innocent passage for aircraft. This difference in legal status is rooted in the technological fact that aircraft, usually being smaller, faster, and more maneuverable than ships, are a greater potential threat to the security of states.[137] The airspace superjacent to a state's land territory and internal waters, of course, is also subject to Nations: An Introduction to the International Law of Peace 202–211 (1955). If a state claims a territorial sea of less than twelve miles from the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured, it may exercise jurisdiction over this area in order to prevent and punish infringement of fiscal, customs, immigration, and sanitary regulations. Territorial Sea Convention, art. 24, supra. See also United States v. Peña-Jessie, 763 F.2d 618 (4th Cir. 1985); United States v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063 (5th Cir. 1980); United States v. Monroy, 614 F.2d 61 (5th Cir 1980); United States v. Dominguez, 604 F.2d 304 (4th Cir. 1979); Dupuy & Vignes Handbook, supra note 107; Elizabeth P. DeVine, Note, The Long Arm of Federal Courts: Domestic Jurisdiction on the High Seas, 37 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 269 (1980). See generally Anand, supra note 98, at 225 ("For nearly 200 years, freedom of the seas has been the dominating rule of international law of the sea and has expressed its essence."); Churchill & Lowe, supra note 98, at 165 (noting that the principle of the freedom of high seas "is a cornerstone of international law.").

---

134 But see United States v. Georgescu, 723 F. Supp. 912 (E.D.N.Y. 1989) (holding that the United States may constitutionally assert jurisdiction over crimes occurring on aircraft flying over the Atlantic Ocean).

135 See Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133, arts. 14–23; LOS Convention, supra note 106. In The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116 (1812), the Supreme Court held that a warship of a foreign state, at peace with the United States, is exempt from U.S. jurisdiction while in U.S. territorial waters. The rationale was sovereign immunity and jurisdictional exemption of consent from the host state. Such consent is implied unless there is an express statement to the contrary. Consequently, the territorial state will not exercise jurisdiction even in criminal matters over such vessels, or the persons and property on board it. In The Wildenhus's Case, 120 U.S. 1 (1887), the Supreme Court held that when a private vessel—a merchant ship as opposed to a warship—enters a port, it is subject to domestic law unless exempted by treaty. The territorial state will exercise its jurisdiction for crimes committed on board the vessel, even when the victim and aggressor are both foreigners. The positions expressed in these two cases are still valid in the United States. See United States v. Marino-Garcia, 679 F.2d 1373 (11th Cir. 1982), involving the jurisdiction of the United States beyond territorial seas of any foreign nation under 21 U.S.C. §§ 955a, 955b(d), wherein the court found that U.S. jurisdiction can be exercised over a foreign vessel on the high seas that is part of a conspiracy to be consummated in the United States when the vessel is "stateless," and also under the protective principle theory and the passive personality theory. See also Haitian Refugee Center, Inc. v. Gracey, 809 F.2d 794 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (holding president has authority to order interdiction on high seas of vessels carrying illegal aliens bound for the United States).

136 See the Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133; LOS Convention, supra note 106; the Convention on International Civil Aviation, Dec. 7, 1944, 61 Stat. 1180, T.I.A.S. No. 5191, 15 U.N.T.S. 295 [hereinafter Chicago Convention].

137 Chicago Convention, supra note 136, art. 1. The concept of innocent passage for aircraft in a foreign state's territorial airspace was discussed at the meeting of the Institute of International Law held in Brussels in 1902, but it was never adopted as a rule of law. The effectiveness of aircraft as weapons of war, demonstrated over the fields of Europe from 1914 to 1918, no doubt contributed greatly to the early scuttling of the concept. See 4 Green Haywood Hackworth, Digest of International Law 357–358 (1944). See also United States v. Louisiana, 394 U.S. 11 (1969); United States v. Baker, 609 F.2d 134 (5th Cir. 1980). The court in Baker relied on Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Church v. Hubbard, 6 U.S. 187 (1804), which states that a nation's power to secure itself from injury may certainly be exercised beyond the limits of its territory. Id.

the complete and exclusive sovereignty of the subjacent state.[138] As with airspace over the territorial sea, there is no right of innocent passage. Any such right of passage must be acquired by agreement between states. These are the basic rules of international law governing the legal status of the high seas and atmosphere of the planet Earth.

The legal status of outer space is not subject to any claims of sovereignty. This rule, first developed out of UN resolutions, is a part of conventional and customary international law.[139] As of yet, there has been no agreement or decision on the separation of national airspace from outer space, although there are some indications as to where such a dividing line should be delineated.[140]

The use of the term "floating territory" to describe ships, aircraft and spacecrafts is, of course, an unnecessary fiction,[141] as many difficulties arise when the territorial principle is extended to justify jurisdiction over anything other than land. The four factors listed above are preferable to the floating territory concept for use in analysis because they expressly recognize, without the use of fictions, the uniqueness of these power bases and consequently their importance to the states. Another term employed to describe this theory is the "law of the flag," which considers ships, aircraft, and spacecrafts as territory proper because of their capability of acquiring nationality, which is manifested by appropriately identifying colors, insignia, or flag.

As a result of the carrier's nationality, states have competence to proscribe and enforce rules of conduct governing all persons aboard ships and aircraft of their nationalities, even when the ships or aircraft are within areas subject to other territorial states.[142] This competence, however, is not exclusive, except when a ship is on the high seas.[143] In Skiriotes v. Florida,[144] the U.S. Supreme Court said that:

> [T]he United States is not debarred by any rule of international law from governing the conduct of its own citizens upon the high seas or even in foreign countries when the rights of other nations or their nationals are not infringed. With respect to such an exercise of authority there is no question of international law, but solely of the purport of the municipal law which establishes the duty of the citizen in relation to his own government.[145]

---

138 Chicago Convention, supra note 136, arts. 3(c), 6. Although Article 5 gives to states that are parties to the Chicago Convention a right of passage for nonscheduled flights into and across the territory of another state, the right is very limited and cannot be compared with the right of innocent passage for ships in the territorial sea, as the territorial state may legally require the aircraft to land.

139 See Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, Including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies, articles I & II, Jan. 27, 1967, 3 U.S.T. 2410, 610 U.N.T.S. 205 [hereinafter 1967 Space Treaty]; G.A. Res. 1962, U.N. GAOR, 18th Sess., Supp. 15, at 15, U.N. Doc. A/5515 (1963); G.A. Res. 1721, U.N. GAOR, 16th Sess., Supp. 17, at 6, U.N. Doc. A/5100 (1961). See also Brierly, supra note 133, at 220; Myres McDougal et al., Law and Public Order in Space 217 (1963); Stephen Gorove, Interpreting Article II of the Outer Space Treaty, 37 Fordham L. Rev. 349, 351 (1969).

140 See John A. Vosburgh, Where Does Outer Space Begin?, 56 A.B.A. J. 134 (1970).

141 See William E. Hall, A Treatise on International Law 244–249 (8th ed. 1924).

142 See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at §§ 402, 502.

143 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, recognizes the principle of noninterference with vessels within the jurisdiction of another state and provides that, in general, ships "are not subject to interference on the high seas [except] if [such interference is] authorized by the flag state, or if there is reason to suspect that the ship is (a) engaged in piracy, slave trade, or unauthorized broadcasting; (b) is without nationality; or (c) though flying a flag . . . , is in fact of the same nationality as the . . . law enforcement ship." Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 522.

144 Skiriotes v. Florida, 313 U.S. 69 (1941).

145 Id. at 73. See also Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421 (1932); United States v. Bowman, 260 U.S. 94 (1922).

An example of such exercise of jurisdiction is the case of United States v. Flores,[146] where a U.S. citizen was indicted for the murder of another U.S. citizen aboard an American vessel. At the time of the offense, the vessel was anchored in the Port of Matadi in the Belgian Congo, which was then subject to the sovereignty of the Kingdom of Belgium, about 250 miles inland from the mouth of the Congo River. The U.S. Supreme Court overruled the lower court's decision that the place where the offense was committed was not within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, stating:

> It is true that the criminal jurisdiction of the United States is in general based upon the territorial principle, and criminal statutes of the United States are not by implication given an extraterritorial effect. United States v. Bowman, 260 U.S. 94, 98; compare, Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421. But that principle has never been thought to be applicable to a merchant vessel which, for purposes of the jurisdiction of the courts of the sovereignty whose flag it flies to punish crimes committed upon it, is deemed to be a part of the territory of that sovereignty, and not to lose that character when in navigable waters within the territorial limits of another sovereignty. . . . Subject to the right of the territorial sovereignty to assert jurisdiction over offenses disturbing the peace of the port, it has been supported by writers on international law, and had been recognized by France, Belgium, and other continental countries as well as by England and the United States.[147]

The United States has jurisdiction over its flag vessels anywhere on the high seas, and can board and search "manifests and other documents" and public areas of such vessels without any "probable cause" or limitations under the Fourth Amendment.[148] United States agents may search "for safety, documentation, and obvious customs and narcotics violations."[149] The First Circuit Court of Appeals spoke representatively in United States v. Hilton when it said "[w]e believe the limited intrusion represented by a document and safety inspection on the high seas, even in the absence of a search warrant or suspicion of wrongdoing, is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment."[150] There is extensive case law showing that authorized U.S. agents need no probable cause or even reasonable suspicion to board U.S. vessels on the high seas.[151]

---

146 United States v. Flores, 289 U.S. 137 (1933).

147 Id. at 155–157. See United States v. Del Sol, 679 F.2d 216 (11th Cir. 1982). In passing § 995a of 21 U.S.C., Congress intended to reach extraterritorial acts of possession on board American ships under "law of the flag" theory of jurisdiction. For a discussion of implied extraterritoriality of a statute, and a review of all circuits discussing United States v. Bowman, see Christopher L. Blakesley & Dan E. Stigall, The Myopia of U.S. v. Martinelli: Extraterritorial Jurisdiction in the 21st Century, 39 Geo. Wash. Int'l L. Rev. 1 (2007).

148 United States v. Villamontes-Marques, 462 U.S. 579 (1983).

149 United States v. Thompson, 710 F.2d 1500, 1504 (11th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1050 (1984); United States v. Watson, 678 F.2d 765 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1038 (1983).

150 United States v. Hilton, 619 F.2d 127, 131 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 887 (1980).

151 The following cases are still controlling as there have been no newer cases on the same points of law. E.g., United States v. Thompson, 928 F.2d 1060 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 270 (1991); United States v. Peterson, 812 F.2d 486 (9th Cir. 1987); United States v. Troise, 796 F.2d 310 (9th Cir. 1986); United States v. Humphrey, 759 F.2d 743 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 917 (1985); United States v. Ciley, 785 F.2d 651 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Burke, 716 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1983); United States v. Dillon, 701 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1983); United States v. Luis-Gonzales, 719 F.2d 1539 (11th Cir. 1983); United States v. Bent, 707 F.2d 1190 (11th Cir. 1983); United States v. Ceballos, 706 F.2d 1198 (11th Cir. 1983); United States v. Green, 671 F.2d 46 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 457 U.S. 1135 (1982); United States v. Watson, 678 F.2d 765 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 451 (1982); United States v. Hayes, 653 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1981); United States v. Freeman, 660 F.2d 1030 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 823 (1982); United States v. Clark, 664 F.2d 1174 (11th Cir. 1981); United States v. Hilton, 619 F.2d 127 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 887 (1980); United States v. Arra, 630 F.2d 836 (1st Cir. 1980); United States v. Mazyak, 650 F.2d 788 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 922

Although constrained by the law of the flag, the United States has been extending its jurisdiction over foreign vessels on the high seas. Recent case law suggests that U.S. agents have the authority to act against foreign vessels on the high seas under domestic statutes, namely 14 U.S.C. § 89(a) and 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a).[152]

Excluding international custom,[153] the 1958 Convention on the High Seas[154] states the basic right of states, both coastal and noncoastal, to operate ships under their respective flags on the high seas.[155] The Convention provides that:

> [S]hips have the nationality of the State whose flag they are entitled to fly. [But] [t]here must exist a genuine link between the State and the ship; in particular, the State must effectively exercise its jurisdiction and control in administrative, technical and social matters over ships flying its flag.[156]

Article 6 of the Convention states that ships can be under the flag of only one state and may not change flags during a voyage or while in a port of call, unless there is a real transfer of ownership or change of registry. Except as expressly provided for in the High Seas Convention or other international treaties, the flag state has exclusive jurisdiction over the ship.[157] The flag state, however, may consent to another state's exercise of jurisdiction over one of its vessels. Recent cases show that even when the United States does not secure the consent of the flag state to exercise jurisdiction over one of its vessels and exercises jurisdiction nonetheless, U.S. courts reject individual defendants' objections to lack of jurisdiction. The First Circuit Court of Appeals on this point said: "[t]he purposes of international law's 'consent' requirement is to protect nations, not individuals; and if the nation does not care, the individual cannot raise 'lack of consent' as a ground for suppression."[158] Warships and ships used only in governmental noncommercial service have "complete immunity from the jurisdiction of any State other than the flag State."[159]

When a ship is within a foreign state's territorial sea or inland waters, the competence of the flag state to proscribe and enforce rules of conduct on board is less complete than when the (1982); United States v. De Weese, 632 F.2d 1267 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 878 (1981); United States v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063 (5th Cir. 1980); United States v. Zurovsky, 614 F.2d 779 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 967 (1980); United States v. Erwin, 602 F.2d 1183 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1071 (1980); United States v. Warren, 578 F.2d 1058 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956 (1980); United States v. One (1), 43 Foot Sailing Vessel, 538 F.2d 694 (5th Cir. 1976).

---

152 E.g., United States v. Pearson, 791 F.2d 867 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 991 (1986); United States v. Wright-Barker, 784 F.2d 161 (3d Cir. 1986); United States v. Marsh, 747 F.2d 7 (1st Cir. 1984); United States v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956 (1980).

153 See Brierly, supra note 133, at 304–307.

154 High Seas Convention, supra note 105.

155 Id. at art. 4.

156 Id. at art. 5. The Convention does not define what a "genuine link" is or what happens if such a link did not exist between a state and a ship ostensibly sailing under its flag. See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 501 cmt. b; § 501, Reporters' Note 2.

157 High Seas Convention, supra note 105, art. 6; LOS Convention, supra note 106, art. 94. Examples of situations in which the rule of exclusive flag state jurisdiction is modified are piracy and slave trading, discussed later under the universality principle, and hot pursuit. In the latter, a ship or aircraft of the coastal state may undertake uninterrupted pursuit on the high seas of a foreign vessel that is suspected of having violated the laws and regulations of the coastal state, if the pursuit begins while the foreign vessel or one of its boats is still within the internal waters or territorial sea of the pursuing state. Id. art. 23. See also Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593 (1927); Brierly, supra note 133 at 307, 311.

158 United States v. Hensel, 699 F.2d 18, 29 (1st Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 958 (1983); accord, United States v. Pringle, 751 F.2d 419 (1st Cir. 1984); United States v. Kincaid, 712 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983); United States v. Cadena, 585 F.2d 1252 (5th Cir. 1978).

159 High Seas Convention, supra note 105, arts. 8(1), 9; LOS Convention, supra note 106, art. 96.

ship is on the high seas. The flag state, instead of having exclusive jurisdiction, usually has concurrent jurisdiction with the coastal (territorial) state.

Regarding merchant ships and governmental ships operated for commercial purposes, the Territorial Sea Convention provides that:

> [T]he criminal jurisdiction of the coastal State should not be exercised on board a foreign ship passing through the territorial sea to arrest any person or to conduct any investigation in connection with any crime committed on board the ship during its passage, save only in the following cases:
>
> (a) If the consequences of the crime extend to the coastal State; or
>
> (b) If the crime is of a kind to disturb the peace of the country or the good order of the territorial sea; or
>
> (c) If the assistance of the local authorities has been requested by the captain of the ship or by the consul of the country whose flag the ship flies; or
>
> (d) If it is necessary for the suppression of illicit traffic in narcotic drugs.[160]

It has not been established, however, whether international law prohibits a coastal state from exercising its jurisdiction over situations not provided for in Article 19(1)(a)–(d) of the Territorial Sea Convention, as this provision dictates only that a coastal state should not exercise its jurisdiction over merchant ships and governmental ships operated for commercial purposes.

Generally, however, the coastal state may exercise criminal jurisdiction in matters that affect the "peace of the port,"[161] an imprecise term that should be adequately provided for by Article 19(1)(a)–(d), but which may be extended further.

An example of the type of situation that may fall under the "peace of the port" doctrine is the Wildenhus's Case,[162] where a Belgian national killed another Belgian national below the deck of a Belgian vessel on which they were both crew members. At the time of the offense, the ship was moored to a dock in Jersey City. Wildenhus was arrested by local police authorities and appropriately charged. The Belgian consul applied for a writ of habeas corpus based upon a treaty between Belgium and the United States, which provided in particular regard to disorders aboard merchant vessels:

> [T]he local authorities shall not interfere, except when the disorder that has arisen is of such a nature as to disturb tranquility and public order on shore, or in the port, or when a person of the country or not belonging to the crew, shall be concerned therein.[163]

After discussing cases that had been heard before French tribunals under a previous treaty between the United States and France, the Supreme Court held that the local court properly exercised jurisdiction over the case:

> Disorders which disturb only the peace of the ship or those on board are to be dealt with exclusively by the sovereign of the home of the ship, but those which disturb the public peace may be suppressed, and, if need be, the offenders punished by the proper authorities of the local jurisdiction. It may not be easy at all times to determine to which of the two jurisdictions a particular act of disorder belongs. Much will undoubtedly depend on the attending circumstances of the particular case, but all must concede that felonious homicide is a subject for the local jurisdiction and that 160 Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133, arts. 19(1), 21.

161 Id.

162 Wildenhus's Case, 120 U.S. 1 (1886).

163 Id. at 5. See also United States v. Perez-Herrera, 221 U.S. 280 (1911); United States v. Mann, 615 F.2d 668 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 994 (1981); United States v. Rubies, 612 F.2d 397 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 940 (1980); In re Chan Kam-Shu, 477 F.2d 333 (5th Cir. 1973) (regarding seizure of a person on board a vessel).

> if the proper authorities are proceeding with the case in a regular way, the consul has no right to interfere to prevent it.[164]

In determining whether a crime committed on board a ship disturbs the "peace of the port" of the coastal state, Wildenhus's case[165] quotes from a French case, which established its jurisdiction:

> Considering that every state is interested in the repression of crimes and offences that may be committed in the ports of its territory, not only by the men of the ship's company of a foreign merchant vessel towards men not forming part of that company, but even by men of the ship's company among themselves, whenever the act is of a nature to compromise the tranquility of the port or the intervention of the local authority is invoked or the act constitutes a crime by common law [droit commun, the law common to all civilized nations] the gravity of which does not permit any nation to leave it unpunished, without impugning its rights of jurisdictional and territorial sovereignty, because the crime is in itself the most manifest as well as the most flagrant violation of the laws which it is the duty of every nation to cause to be respected in all parts of its territory.[166]

The above provisions do not affect the right of a coastal state "to take any steps authorized by its laws" for the purpose of conducting an arrest or an investigation on board a foreign ship passing through the coastal state's territorial sea after leaving its internal waters.[167] In this way, the coastal state retains complete jurisdiction, not subject to the suggested general rule of Article 19(1), to proscribe and enforce rules governing events taking place either on board the foreign ship or on land while the ship was in the coastal state's internal waters. If the alleged crime or offense took place on board the foreign ship before it entered the coastal state's territorial sea, however, the coastal state is prohibited from taking any steps on board the ship to arrest any person or conduct any investigation if the ship is only passing through the territorial sea without entering internal waters.[168] This distinction between the interest of a state with regard to its territorial sea on the one hand, and its internal waters on the other, is no doubt a realization of the fact that when a foreign ship is in the internal waters of a coastal state, it will probably dock at some time during the duration of the visit. Upon docking, the crew, and perhaps the passengers of the ship, may go ashore and come in contact with the nationals of that state. If any of these interactions are criminal or tortious in nature, the coastal state may exercise jurisdiction, even though the ship has left the port and is passing through the territorial sea on its way to the high seas.

Courts in extradition matters rely on the convenient fiction that a vessel is an extension of the physical territory of a state and, therefore, within the scope of all national legal provisions applicable to its territory. Nonetheless, the relationship between territory and jurisdiction is often at issue in extradition cases involving vessels because of the conflicts that arise between coastal states and flag states.

In R. v. Governor of H. M. Prison, Brixton, ex parte Minervini,[169] Norway requested the extradition from Great Britain of Onafrio Minervini, an Italian citizen charged with the murder of a fellow seaman on board a Norwegian flag vessel. No specific evidence as to the geographic 164 Wildenhus's Case, 120 U.S. at 18.

---

165 Id.

166 Id.

167 Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133, art. 19(2). Indeed, U.S. courts have held that U.S. agents may board foreign vessels in U.S. territorial waters without reasonable suspicion of criminal activity for the purposes of document and safety inspections. United States' jurisdiction attaches to foreign vessels in U.S. territorial waters by virtue of their presence. Cunard Steamship Co. v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 100, 124 (1923). The principal case addressing the authority of U.S. agents to stop and search foreign vessels in U.S. waters is United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579 (1983).

168 Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133, art. 19(5); LOS Convention, supra note 106, art. 27.

169 R. v. Governor of H. M. Prison, Brixton, ex parte Minervini, [1958] 3 All E.R. 318 (Eng.).

position of the vessel at the time of the alleged murder was submitted to the court, although it appeared that the vessel had been located some six days steaming distance from the port. After his commitment for surrender by the British extradition magistrate, Minervini applied for a writ of habeas corpus alleging, inter alia, that the case did not come within the provisions of the Extradition Treaty of 1873 between Great Britain and Norway,as the offense was not, in the words of Article I of the Treaty, "committed in the territory" of the requesting state. The Queen's Bench Division rejected this contention and held that the petition should be denied, stating:

> This treaty is not treating "territory" in its strict sense but in a sense which is equivalent to jurisdiction, and it is only in that way that one can make sense of the treaty. Indeed, it is to be observed, though it may be said to be an argument the other way, that in many of these treaties reference is made not to territory but to jurisdiction, [sic] but in my view in this treaty territory is equivalent to jurisdiction. . . .
>
> The second way in which he [the applicant] puts the case is this: Assuming that he is wrong and that "territory" must be given more than its ordinary meaning, yet it is impossible to say that it covers a ship at sea when it is within the territorial waters of a third Power because he says that would be a gross breach of international comity; it would not only be legislating in respect of foreign territory, but also would be assuming something which was within that territory to be the territory of another foreign country. In my view, it is quite unnecessary here to consider what is the true position of a ship, whether the country whose flag is flown merely has jurisdiction over the ship and those on board or whether it is to be treated for certain purposes as the territory of that Power; because if I am right in saying that "territory" in Art. 1 of the treaty is equivalent to "jurisdiction," then assuming that the ship was at the time of the alleged murder within the territory of a foreign Power, it would be only a matter of competing jurisdiction and no one suggests that it is wrong to legislate to provide for competing or concurrent jurisdiction. Accordingly, it seems to me that it matters not in this case whether the ship was in the middle of the North Sea, in the territorial waters of Norway, in the territorial waters of this country or in the territorial waters of any other Power; the Norwegian government had jurisdiction and that is sufficient to enable these proceedings to be brought. Accordingly, it was unnecessary for any evidence to be tendered before the chief magistrate to show the position of the vessel and he had jurisdiction to make the order which he did . . . .[170]

The Lord Chief Justice in the Minervini case dismissed the application and held that the word "territory" in the Extradition Treaty was synonymous with "jurisdiction." The treaty was held not to be connected with territory in its strict sense, but in a sense that was equivalent to jurisdiction, as the list of crimes in the treaty included "assaults on board a ship on the high seas" and other offenses occurring on the high seas.[171]

The same question was at issue in Wilheim Wolthusen v. Starl,[172] brought before the Supreme Court of Argentina in 1926. The United States requested the extradition from Argentina of an individual charged with having committed larceny on board an American merchant vessel while the vessel was moored in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro.

The Extradition Convention of 1896 between the United States and Argentina provides for the extradition of persons accused of crimes "committed in the territory of one of the high contracting parties."[173] The accused contended that the United States had no jurisdiction, the act having been committed in the territorial waters of Brazil. The Supreme Court of Argentina

---

170 Id. at 320–321.

171 Id.

172 Wolthusen v. Starl, 3 Ann. Dig. 305 (Sup. Ct. 1926) (Arg.).

173 Convention on Extradition, U.S.–Arg., Sept. 26, 1896, 31 Stat. 1883, T.S. No. 6. The current U.S.–Artg. Extradition Treaty, S. Doc 105–118, June 15, 2000, states extradition shall be granted for offenses committed in whole or in part within the Requesting State's territory, which, for the purposes of this Article, includes all places subject to that State's criminal jurisdiction.

held that extradition should be granted. The Court noted that although the crime took place in the jurisdictional waters of Brazil, the crime injured only the rights and interests secured by the laws of the United States. The Court found that according to the principles of international law, "territory" meant not only the area within the limits of a state but also all other places subject to the sovereignty and jurisdiction of that state. With reference to the Treaty of 1896, "territory" was also found to include merchant or war vessels under the flag of the state as well as the house of a diplomatic agent of that state. The Supreme Court of Argentina held:

> [T]hat the term territory in the clause of the treaty in question includes, for the purpose of extradition, crimes committed on the high seas on board merchant or war vessels carrying the Argentina or United States flag; crimes committed on war vessels of both nations and in the house of a diplomatic agent of either of the countries.[174]

2.3.3. United States Vessels on the High Seas

United States courts consider that with respect to U.S. vessels on the high seas, the United States can exercise jurisdiction under the "objective territorial principle" of extraterritorial jurisdiction, discussed supra Sec. 2.2. This theory requires that the act over which a state asserts jurisdiction has an actual or intended effect within the territory of that state.[175] United States courts have followed this position in cases involving vessels on the high seas that have been involved in drug smuggling, presumably into the United States.[176]

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has specifically stated that "Congress may assert extraterritorial jurisdiction over violations of United States law occurring on the high seas, so long as such jurisdiction does not abridge constitutional provisions or this nation's international agreements."[177] Note that in addition to 14 U.S.C. § 89(a), which explicitly provides the U.S. Coast Guard with the authority to make inspections, searches, and seizures of any vessel over which the United States has jurisdiction, including those on the high seas,[178] 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a) authorizes U.S. Customs officers to board, inspect, and search any vessel present inter alia "at any . . . authorized place."[179] An "authorized place" under § 1581(a) may extend beyond the territorial waters of the United States to the high seas.[180]

Courts have found broad authority of the Coast Guard under § 89(a) on the high seas when U.S. vessels are involved.[181] For example, the First Circuit Court of Appeals has said that under the provisions of § 89(a), "the Coast Guard may stop and board any American flag vessels on the high seas without a warrant and without any particularized suspicion of wrongdoing."[182] Furthermore, courts do not require any showing of probable cause or reasonable suspicion to justify Coast Guard action on the high seas under § 89(a). The First Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Hilton held: "We believe the limited intrusion represented by a document and safety inspection on the high seas, even in the absence of a warrant or suspicion

---

174 Wolthusen, 3 Ann. Dig. 305.

175 See Blakesley, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, supra note 1 at 14–19 (discussing the objective principle of extraterritorial jurisdiction).

176 United States v. Wright-Barker, 784 F.2d 161 (3d Cir. 1986).

177 Id. at 166 (emphasis added).

178 14 U.S.C. § 89(a) (2000).

179 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a) (2000).

180 See United States v. Cariballo-Tamayo, 865 F.2d 1179 (11th Cir. 1989) (regarding 19 U.S.C. § 1587(a) authorizing boarding of "hovering vessels" on the high seas).

181 United States v. Purvis, 768 F.2d 1237, 1238 (11th Cir. 1985) (stating Coast Guard officers may "stop and board an American flag vessel anywhere on the high seas in the complete absence of suspicion of criminal activity").

182 United States v. Hilton, 619 F.2d 127, 131 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 887 (1980).

of wrongdoing is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment."[183] There is extensive case law showing that authorized U.S. agents need no probable cause or even reasonable suspicion to board U.S. vessels on the high seas.[184]

2.3.4. Non–United States' Vessels on the High Seas

United States jurisdiction over foreign vessels on the high seas is, as stated above in Section 2.3.3, constrained by the law of the flag and the requirement of international law that, on the high seas a state can exercise jurisdiction only over vessels sailing under its flag except for cases in which vessels engage in or are the scene of international crimes permitting the exercise of universal jurisdiction, discussed below in Section 7. A state whose flag vessel is involved may, however, waive its protection and consent to another state's jurisdiction over the vessel.

Whenever the United States secures the consent of another state to exercise jurisdiction over its vessel, U.S. agents may exercise their authority under relevant statutes[185] that apply to U.S. vessels on the high seas, namely 14 U.S.C. § 89(a) and 19 U.S.C. § 1581 (a).

It is important to note, however, that even when the United States does not secure the consent of the flag state to exercise jurisdiction over one of its vessels, and exercises jurisdiction nonetheless, U.S. courts have rejected an individual defendant's objections to the lack of jurisdiction. The First Circuit Court of Appeals presents a very questionable position on this point by stating that "[t]he purpose of international law's 'consent' requirement is to protect nations, not individuals; and if the nation does not care, the individual cannot raise 'lack of consent' as a ground for suppression."[186] However, it is clear from this holding that if there is a protest from the flag state, then the issue of unlawful search and seizure can be raised. For a parallel position on standing to raise the issue of violation of the rule of specialty, see Chapter VII, Sec. 6.6.

The U.S. case law addressing search and seizure of foreign vessels on the high seas began with The Antelope case decided by the Supreme Court.[187] The Antelope grew out of a seizure of a

183 Id. at 131.

184 See supra note 151.

185 United States v. Davis, 905 F.2d 245, 250 (9th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 753 (1991) (holding verbal consent by flag state sufficient to bring vessel within U.S. jurisdiction); United States v. Quemener, 789 F.2d 145, 153–154 (2d Cir.) (regarding agreement with Great Britain allowing U.S. agents to board a British ship within 150 miles of United States' coast), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 829 (1986); United States v. Wright-Barker, 784 F.2d 161, 176 (3d Cir. 1986) (concerning consent of Panamanian government allowing Coast Guard to seize drugs from a Panamanian freighter on the high seas); United States v. Peña-Jessie, 763 F.2d 618, 621 (4th Cir. 1985) (regarding consent of Panamanian government allowing U.S. agents to board); United States v. Marsh, 747 F.2d 7, 9 (1st Cir. 1984) (concerning agreement with Denmark allowing customs officials to board and seize Danish vessel on high seas).

186 United States v. Hensel, 699 F.2d 18, 29 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 2431 (1983). See also United States v. Kincaid, 712 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) (holding consent of flag state not required for a valid search under the Fourth Amendment); accord United States v. Pringle, 751 F.2d 419, 425 (1st Cir. 1984) (stating individual defendants have "no standing to invoke the protections on international law"); United States v. Cadena, 585 F.2d 1252, 1261 (5th Cir. 1978) (holding that of the possible remedies, nothing requires "the granting of immunity from criminal prosecution"); United States v. Bellaizac-Hurtado, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22271 at *7–*8 (S.D. Fla. 2011) (stating "standing to claim noncompliance with international law is thus denied to individuals, like Defendants here, absent state intervention. It does not necessarily follow that the MDLEA was enacted without regard to principles of international law. Instead, this statutory limitation on standing is fully consistent with a traditional understanding of the 'Law of Nations.' "). See Ch. VII, Sec. 6 on standing in connection with speciality.

187 The Antelope, 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 66 (1825).

Spanish slave vessel on the high seas by the Revenue Cutter Service, the predecessor of the Coast Guard.[188] The Court held that the stop and seizure of the slave ship was illegal.[189] The Court said: "If it be neither repugnant to the law of nations, or privacy, it is almost superfluous to say in this Court, that the right of bringing in for adjudication in time of peace, even where the vessel belongs to a nation which has prohibited the trade, cannot exist."[190] The case law that has developed since The Antelope clearly suggests that U.S. agents have authority to act under domestic statute against foreign vessels on the high seas, provided the agents have at least a reasonable suspicion that the vessel is subject to U.S. jurisdiction by virtue of its violation of U.S. criminal law.[191]

2.3.5. Stateless Vessels

Stateless vessels are, in international law, subject to the jurisdiction of any state wishing to exercise jurisdiction over them.[192] United States courts are in agreement with this position,[193] and have consistently held that U.S. agents are authorized to approach and board any apparently stateless vessel[194] to determine its nationality[195] and whether it is engaging in illicit activities.

188 Id. at 68.

189 Id. at 122.

190 Id.

191 United States v. Vilches-Navarrete, 523 F.3d 1, 14 (1st Cir. 2008) (noting that "the USCG's 'authority under 14 U.S.C. § 89(a) to stop and board a vessel on the high seas is quite broad.' ") (citations omitted); United States v. Aguilar, 286 Fed. Appx. 716 (11th Cir. 2008) (unpublished opinion); United States v. Williams, 617 F.2d 1063, 1076 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956 (1980). See also United States v. Wright-Barker, 784 F.2d 161, 176 (3d Cir. 1986) (adopting a reasonable suspicion standard for high seas boardings); United States v. Pearson, 791 F.2d 867, 870 (11th Cir.) (applying reasonable suspicion standard), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 991 (1986); United States v. Marsh, 747 F.2d 7, 10 (1st Cir. 1984) (requiring reasonable suspicion where vessel's appearance and movements unusual).

192 See supra note 129. See also Reuland, supra note 109, at 1196–1206, and accompanying text (discussing the status of stateless vessels in international law).

193 E.g., United States v. Rubies, 612 F.2d 397 (9th Cir. 1979) (stating that stateless vessels do not enjoy the protection of the law of the flag and thus are not accorded the right to undisturbed navigation).

194 United States v. Matos-Luchi, 627 F.3d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 2010) (stating "vessel may be deemed 'stateless,' and subject to the enforcement jurisdiction of any nation on the scene, if it fails to display or carry insignia of nationality and seeks to avoid national identification"); United States v. Tinoco, 304 F.3d 1088 (11th Cir. 2002). This decision was superseded by statute regarding the requirement that a court consider the secretary of state's certification as conclusive proof of statelessness, as noted in United States v. Brant-Epigmelio, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124918 (M.D. Fla. 2009); Moreno v. United States, 510 F. Supp. 2d 780, 782 (M.D. Fla. 2007) (stating vessel was without nationality and subject to U.S. jurisdiction where none of the crew members claimed or admitted to being the captain or master of the vessel when U.S. Coast Guard boarded the vessel); United States v. Piedrahita-Santiago, 931 F.2d 127, 129–130 (1st Cir. 1991) (stating vessel considered stateless when not flying a flag); United States v. Passos-Paternina, 918 F.2d 979, 980–983 (1st Cir. 1990) (holding vessel considered stateless when captain made conflicting claims of nationality and had flags of two states present on board); United States v. Fuentes, 877 F.2d 895, 900 (11th Cir. 1989) (stating vessel considered stateless when flying no flag, had no home port markings on the hull, had no registration documents, and captain made conflicting claims of nationality).

195 United States v. Cuevas-Esquivel, 905 F.2d 510, 513 (1st Cir.) (boarding apparently stateless vessel valid because as such it is subject to U.S. jurisdiction, at least for purposes of determining nationality), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 208 (1990); United States v. Cortes, 588 F.2d 106, 110–111 (5th Cir. 1979) (boarding an apparently stateless vessel valid to ascertain her nationality); United States v. Rubies, 612 F.2d 397, 403 (9th Cir. 1979) (boarding an apparently stateless vessel valid as such is subject to U.S. jurisdiction, at least for the purposes of establishing her nationality), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 940 (1980).

Where there are claims to multiple nationality of a vessel, a U.S. court has held that such a vessel is properly considered stateless and thus subject to U.S. jurisdiction.[196]

2.3.6. Searches and Seizures on the High Seas

The traditional notion that international crimes on the high seas, like piracy, are subject to universal jurisdiction[197] was extended first to the control of the slave trade,[198] and then to drug trafficking. The 1958 Convention on the High Seas and the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention both provide for broad rights of inspection, boarding, and seizure for these crimes. This provides the conventional basis for a state's exercise of national jurisdiction. The evolution of these concepts, which with respect to piracy go as far back as the mid-1600s, also provide a jurisdictional basis under customary international law. The United States has also relied on its national jurisdiction to seize persons suspected of engaging in acts of terrorism.[199] The consequences of such searches and seizures include the right of the boarding state to prosecute and eventually to extradite such persons it may have legally seized. The flag state of the vessel has priority in jurisdiction, unless the boarding state can show that the vessel was engaged in the violation as opposed to some of its crew members and passengers. The flag state can protest the boarding and the seizure, and insist on the return of persons seized for trial under the law of the flag state. This is still an area fraught with legal uncertainties because of the absence of clearly enunciated international law norms. For further discussion on this question, see infra Sections 2.3.7 and 7.

Another problem arises with respect to seizure on the high seas of someone sought by the United States in connection with an indictment or a conviction in the United States. This problem arose in connection with the seizure of Fawaz Yunis. On September 13, 1987, after luring Fawaz Yunis onto a yacht in the eastern Mediterranean Sea with promises of a drug deal, FBI agents waited until the yacht sailed into international waters, and then handcuffed, shackled, and arrested him on charges of conspiracy, hostage taking, aircraft damage, and air piracy.[200] Thereafter, Yunis was transferred onto a Navy vessel in which he was reported to have suffered severe sea sickness, and later developed swollen and bruised wrists from the use of handcuffs. Yunis, however, maintained that he was tortured by FBI agents who were on board the naval vessel. However, neither the district court nor the court of appeals paid much attention to these facts. The court of appeals in United States v. Yunis, citing the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, upheld the legality of Yunis's abduction and stated: "the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a 'forcible abduction.' "[201] The Court of Appeals refused to apply the Toscanino[202] exception, stating that "[such a] rule has, moreover, been limited to cases of torture, brutality, and similar outrageous conduct."[203] Even though the circumstances surrounding Yunis's arrest 196 See United States v. Tam Fuk Yuk, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7941 at *5–*6 (M.D. Fla. 2009) motion for new trial denied, United States v. Chun Hei Lam, 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 12185 (11th Cir. 2011).

197 See infra Sec. 7.

198 See, e.g., M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement as an International Crime, 23 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 445 (1991).

199 See United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991); United States v. Yunis, 867 F.2d 617 (D.C. Cir. 1989); United States v. Yunis, 705 F. Supp. 33 (D. D.C. 1989); United States v. Yunis, 859 F.2d 953 (D.C. Cir. 1988); United States v. Yunis, 681 F. Supp. 909 (D. D.C. 1988); United States v. Yunis, 681 F. Supp. 896 (D. D.C. 1988).

200 United States v. Yunis, 859 F.2d 953 (D.C. Cir. 1988)

201 United States v. Yunis, 924 F.2d 1086, 1092–1093 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

202 See United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974).

203 Yunis, 924 F.2d at 1093 (quoting United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62, 65 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001, 95 S. Ct. 2400, 44 L. Ed. 2d 668 (1975)).

were not "a model for law enforcement behavior," the Court of Appeals refused to extend the Toscanino exception to the "discomfort and surprise" experienced by Yunis.[204]

It is important to note that because this case differs from other abduction cases in that the seizure occurred on the high seas, and thus did not violate any state's sovereignty, it can be argued that the seizure was not in the nature of an abduction because the arrest was lawful. As to luring Yunis out on the high seas, it is hard to argue that the greedy expectation of a drug deal, even though false, can be deemed a sufficient breach to undermine the validity of the arrest. The only serious question that arises, in this writer's mind, is the allegation of torture of Yunis, or at least of his physical mistreatment. Those who are accused of having committed such acts should have been investigated by the FBI's Office of Professional Standards.

In United States v. Best,[205] the Third Circuit found that the United States could exercise jurisdiction in connection with alien smuggling in a situation involving the seizure of a vessel, as well as the persons on board it, outside the territorial waters of the United States, but in the contiguous zone as defined under Article 24 of the Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone.[206] However, the court in this case adopted the position of male captus bene detentus, first expressed in Ker v. Illinois[207] and Frisbie v. Collins,[208] and confirmed in Alvarez-Machain.[209]

2.3.7. The 1988 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation

On October 7, 1985, the Italian-flagged vessel Achille Lauro was seized on the high seas off the Egyptian Coast by a group of persons believed to belong to the Palestine Liberation Front (PLO).[210] The Achille Lauro subsequently entered the territorial waters of Egypt and was seized by Egyptian authorities. One of the perpetrators killed a U.S. citizen, Leon Klinghoffer, who was disabled and in a wheelchair, and threw him overboard after the group held control of the vessel and seized all of its passengers and crew. The act was not piracy under U.S. law,[211] or under the 1958 Geneva Convention[212] or the Law of the Sea Convention.[213]

The case was novel in that it had elements of what was covered under the 1970 Hague Convention[214] and the 1971 Montreal Convention[215] for the prohibition of crimes aboard aircraft. These conventions were inspired from the customary and conventional international law crime of piracy, but the provisions on piracy, slavery, and slave-trafficking and drug-trafficking on the 204 Yunis, 924 F.2d at 1093.

205 United States v. Best, 304 F.3d 308 (3d Cir. 2002).

206 Territorial Sea Convention, supra note 133.

207 Kerr, 119 U.S. 436 (1886).

208 Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952).

209 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 331 F.3d 604 (9th Cir. 2003), 542 U.S. 692 (2004), vacated & remanded en banc, 374 F.3d 1384. See also Ch. V.

210 See, e.g., Gerald P. McGinley, The Achille Lauro Case: A Case Study in Crisis Law, Policy and Management, in Legal Responses to International Terrorism: U.S. Procedural Aspects 323 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 1988).

211 See The Cutting Case, in 2 John B. Moore, Digest of International Law 228–242 (1901) [hereinafter Moore Digest].

212 High Seas Convention, supra note 105, art. 15.

213 See LOS Convention, supra note 106.

214 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, Dec. 16, 1970, 22 U.S.T. 1641, T.I.A.S. No. 7162 [hereinafter the Hague Convention].

215 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, Sept. 23, 1971, 24 U.S.T. 564, 974 U.N.T.S. 177 [hereinafter the Montreal Convention].

high seas contained in the 1958 High Seas Convention and the 1982 Law of the Seas Convention had not been extended to cover other crimes committed on the high seas. Thus, jurisdiction would vest in the state where the vessel was flagged, as an extension of the territoriality principle. But the vessel was seized in Egyptian territorial waters, and the victims were from a number of different countries, chief among them the U.S. victim, who was the only casualty.[216] All of these facts raised different jurisdictional claims and potential claims that could not be answered on the basis of clear-cut established international law. It became evident that a need existed for a new convention on the subject of such claims arising from act committed on board ships on the high seas.

The International Maritime Organization developed a convention entitled the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation.[217] The textual language, which is the product of negotiations, is not the best that could have been obtained, but it provides some guidance as to priority, which will help national courts in deciding such conflict questions.

2.3.8. The Law of the Flag for Aircraft

Conventional and customary international law recognize the jurisdiction of a state to proscribe and enforce rules of conduct for all persons aboard aircraft having its nationality, whether the aircraft is over the high seas or within the airspace of another state. This principle is found in almost all national laws.[218]

---

216 See Klinghoffer v. S.N.C. Achille Lauro, 739 F. Supp. 854 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (concerning admiralty jurisdiction in 28 U.S.C. § 1333), vacated, 937 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1991). See also United States v. Palestine Liberation Org., 695 F. Supp. 1456 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (concerning Anti-Terrorism Act of 22 U.S.C. §§ 5201–5203, Agreement between United Nations and United States, § 1 et seq., 22 U.S.C. § 287).

217 Mar. 10, 1988, 27 I.L.M. 668 (1988), which provided the following jurisdictional provision, article 6:

> 1. Each State party shall take such measure as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in Article 3 when the offence is committed:
>
> (a) against or on board a ship flying the flag of the State at the time the offence is committed; or
>
> (b) in the territory of that State, including its territorial sea; or
>
> (c) by a national of that State.
>
> 2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such offence when:
>
> (a) it is committed by a stateless person whose habitual residence is in that State; or
>
> (b) during its commission a national of that State is seized, threatened, injured or killed; or
>
> (c) it is committed in an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act.
>
> 3. Any State Party which has established jurisdiction mentioned in paragraph 2 shall notify the Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organization (hereinafter referred to as "the Secretary-General"). If such State Party subsequently rescinds that jurisdiction, it shall notify the Secretary-General.
>
> 4. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 3 in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him to any of the State Parties which have established their jurisdiction in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article.
>
> 5. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.

See also Melvina Halberstam, Terrorism on the High Seas: The Achille Lauro Piracy and the I.M.O. Convention on Maritime Safety, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 262 (1988).

218 For the United States, see Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. h; id. at § 402, Reporters' Note 4; Harvard Research Project,supra note 3. But there exists specific legislation in various titles of the United States Code pertaining to the regulation of aircraft and more particularly to jurisdiction on board aircrafts with respect to criminal conduct. See infra Sec. 7.

Unlike ships that have the right of innocent passage through territorial waters, there is no right of innocent passage for aircraft through the airspace above a state's territory, internal waters, or territorial sea. The actual practices of states with respect to crimes and other offenses committed on board aircraft of their own nationalities outside their territorial borders indicate, at least insofar as states dedicated to a strict interpretation of the territorial principle are concerned, a reluctance to exercise jurisdiction in the absence of express and specific legislative authorization.

In United States v. Cordova,[219] the defendant, Cordova, a Puerto Rican passenger on an American aircraft that at the time was over the high seas somewhere between San Juan, Puerto Rico and New York, assaulted another passenger and members of the crew. Cordova was arrested when the plane arrived at New York, and brought to trial. The court found him guilty, but refused to convict him, due to the absence of federal jurisdiction, holding that the statutes under which jurisdiction was claimed were applicable only to vessels within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States or to certain crimes committed on the high seas. The court did not consider an airplane a vessel within the meaning of the statute or the airspace over the high seas as a part of the high seas.

In response to this decision Congress passed the Crimes in Flight Over the High Seas Act[220] in 1952, to include within the "special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States" the following:

> Any aircraft belonging in whole or in part to the United States, or any citizen thereof, or to any corporation created by or under the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, while such aircraft is in flight over the high seas, or over any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State.[221]

The English position is well expressed in Regina v. Martin,[222] wherein the defendants were British nationals charged in 1966 with unlawful possession of raw opium while aboard a British aircraft en route to Singapore from Bahrain. No violation of the law of either state was alleged. Jurisdiction was claimed under the British Civil Aviation Act, which provided, in part, that:

> [A]ny offense whatever committed on a British aircraft shall, for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction, be deemed to have been committed in any place where the offender may for the time being be.[223]

The court stated that it did not have jurisdiction over the defendants because they were not in the United Kingdom at the time the offense was committed, and the law under which they were indicted did not apply to acts done on British aircraft outside of the United Kingdom. Section 62 did not create any offenses, but only provided the place where an act that was already an offense, if committed on a British aircraft outside of the United Kingdom (which was not the case here), might be tried.

It should be noted, however, that the court did draw a distinction between "universal" offenses, such as murder and theft, which "are not thought of as having territorial limits," and offenses defined as such "only in relation to a particular place." An example of the latter category would 219 United States v. Cordova, 89 F. Supp. 298 (E.D.N.Y. 1950).

---

220 Act of July 12, 1952, Pub. L. No. 514, ch. 695, 66 Stat. 695 (codified at 18 U.S.C. § 7(5) (1988)).

221 Id. The term "State" has been defined to mean a state of the United States, and not a foreign country. Wynne v. United States, 217 U.S. 234 (1910). For a detailed discussion of United States' practice regarding aircraft crimes, see Elizabeth G. Brown, Jurisdiction of United States Courts over Crimes in Aircraft, 15 Stan. L. Rev. 45 (1962).

222 [1956] 2 Q.B. 272 (Eng.).

223 British Civil Aviation Act, 12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, Ch. 67, at 62 (1949).

be the British law in question prohibiting the possession of certain drugs, which was applicable only in the United Kingdom. In construing the British statute, the court said:

> It is most unsatisfactory if there is to be complete lawlessness on British aircraft, but on the other hand, it can hardly be satisfactory if a foreigner traveling from one place to another, thousands of miles from England, is to be held liable for infringing regulations about which he cannot possibly have any knowledge at all.[224]

The possibility of concurrent jurisdictional claims, including but not limited to the conflicting principles discussed above,[225] caused in part the search for an effective and appropriate convention to clarify the subject.

In 1963, the Convention on Offenses and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft,[226] also known at the Tokyo Convention, was adopted. The Convention applies to:

> [O]ffenses against penal law [and other] acts which, whether or not they are offenses, may or do jeopardize the safety of the aircraft or of persons or property therein or which jeopardize good order and discipline on board.[227]

In general, the Convention applies to offenses or other acts done by a person on board any aircraft registered in a state party to the treaty "while the aircraft is in flight or on the surface of the high seas or of any area outside the territory of any State."[228] For purposes of the Convention, "an aircraft is considered to be in flight from the moment when the landing run ends."[229] The Convention does not apply to aircrafts used in military, customs, or police services.[230]

---

224 Regina v. Martin, [1956] 2 Q.B. 272, 284 (Eng.).

225 The 1958 Draft Convention on Aviation Crimes, prepared by the Air Law Committee of the International Law Association, provided in Article 3 a list of preferences as to what law should apply in the case of a crime committed aboard an aircraft:

> 3.01 The criminal law to be applied to the case shall, in the discretion of the court acquiring jurisdiction according to Article 2, be selected from the following laws in the order of preference stated:
>
> 3.01(1) First preference: the law of the State of the flag of the aircraft, if such State has an appropriate law;
>
> 3.01(2) Second preference: the law of the State of the place where the accused person first touches earth after the commission of the crime;
>
> 3.01(3) Third preference: the law of the State and of the place where the aircraft first touches down after the commission of the crime. (This may be an emergency landing place or a scheduled landing place).
>
> 3.01(4) Fourth preference: the law of the State and of the place where the aircraft was first scheduled to touch down or where a first landing had been planned when the flight commenced as the normal end of the flight during which the crime was committed. (This will not be an emergency landing place.).. .
>
> 3.01(5) Fifth preference: the law of the place where the aircraft has ascended into flight prior to commission of the crime.

International Law Association, Air Law, Crimes in Aircraft 301, 303 (New York University Conference 1958).

226 Convention on Offenses and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, Sept. 14, 1963, 120 U.S.T. 2942, T.I.A.S. No. 6768 [hereinafter the Tokyo Convention].

227 Id. at art. 1(1).

228 Id. at art. 1(2). But see Ch. III of the Tokyo Convention, supra note 226, which makes special provision for the powers of the aircraft commander.

229 Id. at art. 1(3).

230 Id. at art. 1(4).

The jurisdiction of states that are parties to the Convention is set out in Articles 3 and 4. Article 3 reaffirms the law-of-the-flag principle but does not make it exclusive. It provides:

> 1. The State of registration of the aircraft is competent to exercise jurisdiction over offenses and acts committed on board.
>
> 2. Each Contracting State shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction as the State of registration over offenses committed on board aircraft registered in such State.
>
> 3. This convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.[231]

Article 4 provides certain limitations upon the exercise of concurrent jurisdiction based on other principles, at least insofar as aircraft in flight are concerned. It reads:

> A Contracting State which is not the State of registration may not interfere with an aircraft in flight in order to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over an offense committed on board except in the following cases:
>
> (a) the offense has effect on the territory of such State;
>
> (b) the offense has been committed by or against a national or permanent resident of such State;
>
> (c) the offense is against the security of such State;
>
> (d) the offense consists of a breach of any rules or regulations relating to the flight or maneuver of aircraft in force in such State;
>
> (e) the exercise of jurisdiction is necessary to ensure the observance of any obligation of such State under a multilateral international agreement.[232]

The Tokyo Convention, therefore, allows states considerable latitude for asserting jurisdiction. Other provisions deal with powers of the aircraft commander, unlawful seizure of aircraft and various powers and duties of states under the Convention.[233] Conspicuous by their absence from the Convention are any provisions dealing with (1) the development of a system of priorities governing the order in which the several possible principles of criminal jurisdiction, including the law of the flag, can be exercised; (2) the prevention of double jeopardy; and (3) the question of which state has jurisdiction over an in-flight crime that occurs aboard an aircraft chartered under a "barehull" charter to one who is a national of a state other than the state of registry.[234]

On December 16, 1970, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft was signed at The Hague.[235] The Hague Convention is mainly addressed to the crime of air piracy, rather than to other common crimes, which need not be acts of air piracy though committed on board aircraft.[236]

Notwithstanding the numerous instances of aircraft hijacking, there has been no case known to this writer where extradition under the terms of the 1963 Tokyo or 1970 Hague

---

231 Id. at art. 3.

232 Id. at art. 4.

233 Id. at art. 3. For an analysis and appraisal of the Tokyo Convention, see Robert P. Boyle & Roy Pulsifer, The Tokyo Convention on Offenses and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, 30 J. Air L. & Com. 305, 328–354 (1964).

234 Id. at 329–330. See also Chumney v. Nixon, 615 F.2d 389 (6th Cir. 1980).

235 See Hague Convention, supra note 214, at §§ 5, 6.

236 For jurisdiction relating to unlawful acts on aircrafts and at airports, see the Montreal Convention, supra note 215. Article 5 states:

Convention was the basis upon which such an offender was surrendered to the United States for prosecution.[237] In all cases, the hijacker either was returned or surrendered through one of the alternative devices of rendition or returned to the United States voluntarily. In several hijacking cases not involving the United States, the offenders were tried by the territorial state, and extradition was denied.[238] Even though the universality theory applies,[239] no state other than the flag state or the landing state has ever sought or prosecuted a hijacker under this theory. The greater concern of the drafters of the 1970 Hague Convention was that the political offense exception should not be a bar to the extradition of hijackers. However, this concern did not materialize. The United States, for example, did not request extradition of hijackers from Cuba until 1973, although, despite the absence of diplomatic relations, a valid treaty existed.[240] In other cases, the offender or offenders have either (1) been prosecuted by the state wherein they landed; (2) left the landing state voluntarily and returned to the flag state; or (3) been immediately granted asylum formally or welcomed in such a manner that the flag state did not bother to make any extradition request. The 1970 Hague Convention was followed by two other international instruments, the 1971 Montreal Convention[241] and the 1988 Montreal Protocol.[242]

Article 5.

1. Each Contracting State shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences in the following cases:

a) when the offence is committed in the territory of that State;

b) when the offence is committed against or on board an aircraft registered in that State;

c) when the aircraft on board which the offence is committed lands in its territory with the alleged offender still on board;

d) when the offence is committed against or on board an aircraft leased without crew to a lessee who has his principal place of business or, if the lessee has no such place of business, his permanent residence, in that State.

2. Each Contracting State shall likewise take measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences mentioned in Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), (b) and (c), and in Article 1, paragraph 2, in so far as that paragraph relates to those offences, in the case where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him pursuant to Article 8 to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1 of this Article.

3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction in accordance with national law.

Id.

See also the Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation [Montreal Protocol], Feb. 24, 1988, 27 I.L.M. 627 (1988). Article 3 states:

In Article 5 of the Convention, the following shall be added as paragraph 2 bis:

2 bis. Each Contracting state shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences mentioned in Article 1, paragraph 1 bis and in Article 1, paragraph 2, in so far as that paragraph relates and it does not extradite him pursuant to Article 8 to the State mentioned in paragraph 1(a) of this Article.

237 Arthur I. Hirsch & David O. Fuller, Aircraft Piracy and Extradition, 16 N.Y.L.F. 392, 406–415 (1970).

238 Three such cases are reported in M. Cherif Bassiouni, Ideologically Motivated Offenses and the Political Offense Exception in Extradition—A Proposed Juridical Standard for an Unruly Problem, 19 DePaul L. Rev. 217, 219 n.5 (1970).

239 See infra Sec. 7 (discussing the universality theory of jurisdiction).

240 See Alona E. Evans, Aircraft Hijacking: Its Cause and Cure, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 695 (1969).

241 For the jurisdictional provision for the 1971 Montreal Convention, see supra note 215.

242 For the jurisdictional provision of the 1988 Montreal Protocol, see supra note 236.

Pursuant to the 1971 Montreal Convention,[243] the Security Council ordered Libya, in Resolution 731 (1992), to surrender two accused Libyans who were charged in the United States and in Scotland (United Kingdom) for sabotage of Pan Am Flight 103, which exploded in air over Lockerbie, Scotland. Scotland found that it had jurisdiction because the aircraft exploded over its territory, and that the crime had been committed in its air space. The United States held that it had jurisdiction because the offense was against a United States–flagged aircraft, and the crime was directed against U.S. citizens.[244] Special antiterrorist legislation enables the United States to extend extraterritorial jurisdiction to protect its citizens abroad.[245] Libya brought an action against the United States and the United Kingdom before the International Court of Justice (ICJ)[246] to have the Security Council Resolution ordering it to extradite the two accused nationals invalidated. One of the grounds is that the 1971 Montreal Convention gives precedence to prosecution over extradition as evidenced in the sequence of words used, namely "prosecute" and then "extradite." Libya suggested that its duty to prosecute under the 1971 treaty could not be overridden by the Security Council's order to extradite (surrender) the individuals. But the Court held that the Security Council determined its own competence. The issue of jurisdiction and treaty obligations has not, however, been substantively decided as of yet.

2.4. Special Environments

This section encompasses the Arctic, the Antarctic, and outer space. Although there are many different and contrasting environments on Earth, only the Arctic and the Antarctic are unique in terms of their use by people, so that they require special jurisdictional treatment. Outer space is sui generis as well, as it is the most challenging of all environments known to mankind.

2.4.1. The Arctic

Analysis of the legal status of the Arctic depends upon an understanding of the basic physical characteristics of the area. The ice covering the Arctic Ocean is not an unbroken extension of the surrounding continents, nor is it attached to any continent. Rather, it exists independently in permanent form. It could conceivably be regarded as falling under the territorial principle if a state could legally claim sovereignty over it under international law. Some early legal publicists who wrote about the Arctic expressed the opinion that it could be territorially claimed.[247] Scientific explorations, however, have proved that most of the ice is neither permanent nor uniform, and that it is actually mobile.[248] Therefore, the Arctic is primarily of a marine character. The Arctic Ocean has been opened to underwater navigation by the advent of the nuclear submarine, which,

243 See supra note 215.

244 For Passive Personality, see infra Sec. 4.

245 See infra Sec. 6.

246 Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Lib. v. U.S.), 1992 I.C.J. 234 (Feb. 27); Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Lib. v. U.K.), 1992 I.C.J. 231 (Feb. 27).

247 Donat Pharand, Freedom of the Seas in the Arctic Ocean, 19 U. Toronto L.J. 210, 212 (1969).

248 Id. at 218–219. There are many floating ice islands in the Arctic Ocean capable of human habitation, if only to a limited degree. An example is Fletcher's Ice Island, occupied as a research station by the United States Air Force between 1952 and 1978. It drifted for some time after, except for a year and a half when it was grounded north of Alaska but later drifted south and melted. First spotted in 1947, it was inhabited by some forty scientists and technicians by 1967. Another such research station, Arlis II, was operated continuously by the Air Force for four years, but had to be abandoned when it drifted into the Greenland Sea after covering more than 4,300 nautical miles during its drift across the Arctic Ocean. Id. at 221.

unlike its predecessors, does not have to surface periodically to recharge its batteries. In addition, icebreakers and other ships have demonstrated that the Arctic Ocean is capable of being navigated. Due to ever quickening climate change sea traffic in the Arctic is increasingly rapidly, and commercial vehicles are now able to traverse it even in the deepest winter, something that was unimaginable previously.[249]

The riparian Arctic states have indicated that they consider the Arctic Ocean free for use by all states and not subject to the sovereign claims of any state.[250] This is evidenced by the navigation by both Arctic and other states on and below the surface of the Arctic Ocean, by aircraft flying over the area, and by the establishment of research stations on drifting ice islands. Thus, international freedom of use of the Arctic Ocean has attained the status of international custom as evidenced by a general practice.[251] However, as the Arctic ice caps are melting rapidly due to climate change, as indicated above, the natural resources of energy and fish will become more accessible and likely lead to competing claims among the riparian Arctic states regarding their right to exploit these resources. To this end, in 2001 Russia submitted a claim to the UN Commission on the Limits of the Continental Shelf requesting an extension beyond the existing 200-mile outer limit, but the Commission has not, as yet, ruled on the request,[252] and in 2007 Russia "planted" a flag on the Arctic sea bed, arguing that it was an extension of its continental shelf, ostensibly to claim control over half of the Arctic Ocean and the natural resources found therein.[253] Although the 2011 Agreement on Cooperation on Aeronautical and Maritime Search and Rescue in the Arctic[254] divided up the Artic for purposes of conducting search and rescue operations, there has been no formal division of the Arctic, and to the knowledge of this writer, the matter has not come up before the Artic Council or any other body.[255] Whether a new treaty will be concluded to deal with these claims, similar to the Antarctic Treaty discussed below, remains to be seen.[256]

At present, as the Arctic is considered part of the high seas, the territorial principle does not apply, except as it might relate to certain parts of the ice cap that are permanent and are attached to land areas, or to those areas of the Arctic Ocean claimed by Arctic states as part of their territorial sea. Other principles of international criminal jurisdiction would have to be relied upon in order to assert jurisdiction over a particular criminal act performed or having effects thereon.[257] Due to the 249 Matt McGrath, Gas Tanker Ob River Attempts First Winter Arctic Crossing, BBC, Nov.26, 2012, available at http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/science-environment-20454757.

250 Id. at 227–231. The Arctic states include the United States, Russia, Canada, Norway, and Denmark. The U.S. government has long held the view that the Arctic is not subject to a sovereign claim. In 1909, it refused to accept Admiral Perry's "annexation" of the region. 2 Whiteman Digest, supra note 12, at 1266.

251 U.N. Charter art. 38(1)(b).

252 For more information, see http://www.un.org/Depts/los/clcs_new/submissions_files/submission_rus.htm.

253 C.J. Chivers, Russians Plant Flag on the Arctic Seabed, N.Y. Times, Aug. 3, 2007, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2007/08/03/world/europe/03arctic.html?_r=0.

254 Agreement on Cooperation on Aeronautical and Maritime Search and Rescue in the Arctic, May 12, 2011.

255 See Nuuk Declaration, May 12, 2011; Tromsø Declaration, Apr. 29, 2009; Salekhard Declaration, Oct. 26, 2006; Reykjavik Declaration, Nov. 24, 2004; Inari Declaration, Oct. 10, 2002; Barrow Declaration, Oct. 13, 2000; Iqaluit Declaration, Sept. 17–18, 1998.

256 See generally, Molly Watson, Comment, An Arctic Treaty: A Solution to the International Dispute Over the Polar Region, 14 Ocean & Coastal L. J. 307 (2009); Mary Beth West, Mounting Tension and Melting Ice: Exploring the Legal and Political Future of the Arctic: Arctic Warming: Environmental, Human, and Security Implications, 42 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1081 (2009).

257 In 1970 an American technician working on Fletcher's Ice Island was indicted in the United States (Federal District Court, E.D. Va.) for the killing of another technician on the ice island. Under international law, the island, floating 300 miles from the North Pole, was considered part of the Arctic Ocean. The fact that most human activities taking place in the Arctic environment are likely to occur aboard a submarine, surface ship, or aircraft, the jurisdictional principle most likely to be relied upon is the law of the flag. Activities of a criminal or even tortious nature taking place outside of these power bases can be handled by other principles.[258] As discussed above, the United States is assertive when exercising jurisdiction using other forms of jurisdiction, namely territorial, active personality, passive personality, and the protective principle.[259]

2.4.2. The Antarctic

The Antarctic mainland was discovered by Captain Nathaniel Palmer in 1829, but its existence as a continent was only established later. Although systematic and extensive scientific exploration of the Antarctic did not begin until the 1930s, the main thrust of activities in the area began with the International Geophysical Year from July 1957 to December 1958.[260]

Because the Antarctic is a continent, the territorial principle could apply as a basis for international criminal jurisdiction, subject to states making proper legal claims of territorial sovereignty under international law. The 1959 Antarctic Treaty[261] and the 1991 Additional Protocol on Environmental Protection of the Antarctic[262] are the basic legal documents governing the activities of states in Antarctica. The Antarctic Treaty provides that:

> [N]o acts or activities taking place while the present treaty is in force shall constitute a basis for asserting, supporting or denying a claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica or create any rights of sovereignty in Antarctica. No new claim or enlargement of an existing claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica shall be asserted while the present treaty is in force.[263]

Department of Justice, rather than prosecute the alleged offender under active personality or protected interest theories, considered the island as a "vessel on the high seas." See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extraterritorial Criminal Jurisdiction, The Globe (Illinois State Bar Assoc. Newsletter), Vol. 6.1, at 1 (1970).

258 An example of a special jurisdictional situation is Canada's recent claim of competence to enforce pollution regulations up to one hundred miles from its coastline. See Richard B. Bilder, The Canadian Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act: New Stresses on the Law of the Sea, 69 Mich. L. Rev. 1 (1970).

259 See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Practice, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. 81 (2002).

260 See Richard B. Bilder, Control of Criminal Conduct in Antarctica, 52 Va. L. Rev. 231, 233–237 (1966) (citing sources on the history and physical characteristics of Antarctica).

261 The Antarctic Treaty, Dec. 1, 1959, 12 U.S.T. 794, T.I.A.S. No. 4780, 402 U.N.T.S. 71 [hereinafter the Antarctic Treaty]. The United Nations Treaty Series lists nineteen state-parties as of September 28, 2012: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, German Democratic Republic, Japan, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Romania, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and United States of America. The Secretariat of the Antarctic Treaty has a more expansive list of state-parties, identifying as of September 2012, 2012 the following states: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belarus, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czech Republic, Denmark, Ecuador, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Hungary, India, Italy, Japan, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Republic of Korea, Malaysia, Monaco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russian Federation, Slovak Republic, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, and Venezuela. See, e.g., W.M. Bush, Antarctica and International Law: A Collection of Inter-State and National Documents (1988); Steven J. Burton, New Stresses on the Antarctica Treaty: Toward International Legal Institutions Governing Antarctica Resources, 65 Va. L. Rev. 421 (1979).

262 Additional Protocol on Environmental Protection to the Antarctic, Apr. 20, 1991, 30 I.L.M. 1455, Sen. Treaty Doc. 102–122.

263 Antarctic Treaty, supra note 261, at art. IV (2).

Article IV (1) of the treaty provides that:

> [N]othing contained in the present treaty shall be interpreted as:
>
> (a) a renunciation by any Contracting Party of previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica.
>
> (b) a renunciation or diminution by any Contracting Party of any basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica which it may have whether as a result of its activities or those of its nationals in Antarctica or otherwise;
>
> (c) prejudicing the position of any Contracting Party as regards its recognition or nonrecognition of any other State's right of or claim or basis of claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica.[264]

Thus, although states may retain any claims acquired prior to the treaty, they may not make any new claims while the treaty is in force.[265] Therefore, the territorial principle would not be applicable to the unclaimed parts of the Antarctic continent. Other principles of jurisdiction would have to be utilized for the control of criminal conduct.

As the high seas within the area south of sixty degrees south latitude are not affected by the provisions of the Antarctic Treaty,[266] criminal jurisdiction for acts committed on board ships or aircraft on or over the high seas would be within the ambit of the law of the flag theory.[267] Jurisdiction over criminal acts committed on the continent of the permanent ice shelves attached to it is still problematic, because the treaty deliberately omits discussion of this aspect. However, observers who are carrying on inspections under the treaty as designated by Article VII (1) and scientific personnel exchanged under Article III (1)(b), as well as staff members accompanying such persons, are:

> [S]ubject only to the jurisdiction of the Contracting Party of which they are nationals in respect of all acts or omissions occurring while they are in Antarctica for the purpose of exercising their function.[268]

Thus, the active personality principle is given exclusive application in specified cases.

With regard to other foreign nationals, the Treaty only provides that the Contracting Parties concerned in any dispute over the exercise of jurisdiction in Antarctica shall immediately consult each other with a view to reaching a mutually acceptable solution.[269] In addition, the twelve states who are the original Contracting Parties shall meet periodically to discuss and formulate measures regarding "questions relating to the exercise of jurisdiction in Antarctica."[270]

It can be assumed, therefore, in the absence of any further guidelines drawn up pursuant to the Antarctic Treaty, that states are free to utilize any of the various principles of criminal jurisdiction, with the exception of the territorial principle, unless the act is committed in a previously claimed area.[271] States whose international criminal jurisdiction, as defined by their own municipal law, is based primarily on the territorial principle may have difficulty in

---

264 Id. at art. IV (1).

265 The Treaty is in force for at least thirty years after its date of entry into force. See Antarctic Treaty, supra note 261, at art. XII (2)(a).

266 Id. at art. VI.

267 Aircraft flying over the continent of Antarctica would no doubt also be under the exclusive competence of the flag state, as no state could claim sovereignty over any Antarctic airspace as long as claims of sovereignty are prohibited over the continent itself, and the 1959 Treaty is in force.

268 See Antarctic Treaty, supra note 261, at art. VIII (1).

269 Id. at art. VIII (2).

270 Id. at art. IX (1)(e).

271 Seven states claim territory in Antarctica. See Bilder, Control of Criminal Conduct in Antarctica, supra note 258, at 260.

finding jurisdiction in some cases.[272] The most applicable principle is probably that of active personality, although it certainly is not to be considered exclusive in application, except where the Treaty so provides.[273]

2.4.3. Outer Space

The examination of jurisdictional problems of outer space has been placed under the category of special environments because outer space, like the Earth's polar regions, is alien and hostile to human existence. The analogy, however, should not be carried too far, for although an examination of jurisdictional problems in the Arctic and the Antarctic may be helpful to an understanding of those problems in outer space, the vast differences among these environments make any extrapolation of the analogy detrimental to the development of the law of outer space.

Outer space is similar to the polar regions in that there can be human activity outside of the power bases, such as on spacecraft or ships. However, this applies more so in outer space than in the area outside of ships on the high seas or aircraft flying through the atmosphere. People can function in spacesuits outside of their space vehicles and, eventually, will be able to do so upon the surfaces of other celestial bodies, just as they can function outside of shelters in the Arctic and the Antarctic if properly clothed.

As outer space, like the high seas or the airspace over the high seas, is not subject to claim of sovereignty, no state should be able to claim jurisdiction under the territorial principle.[274] Also, because the very nature of outer space confines most human activities to the interior of spacecraft, it can be expected that the dominant jurisdictional principle in outer space, at least for the near future, will be the law of the flag.

Article VIII of the 1967 Space Treaty provides that:

> A State Party to the Treaty on whose registry an object launched into outer space is carried shall retain jurisdiction and control over such object, and over any personnel thereof, while in outer space or on a celestial body. Ownership of objects launched into outer space, including objects landed or constructed on a celestial body, and of their component parts, is not affected by their presence in outer space or on a celestial body or by their return to the Earth. . . .[275]

This provision gives states of registry, otherwise considered as the flag states, authority to prescribe and enforce rules of conduct governing both criminal and non-criminal matters on board spacecrafts of all types while in outer space, whether a spacecraft is traveling through outer space, orbiting a celestial body, or resting upon a celestial body. The same competence 272 See id. at 244–259 (discussing the application of U.S. law in Antarctica).

---

273 See id. at 260–265 (reviewing relevant foreign law applicable to Antarctica).

274 Probably the greatest difference between Earth's polar regions and outer space is that the former are finite in size, whereas the latter, to the extent of human knowledge, is infinite. Therefore, the use of "territory" in relation to outer space is not appropriate. Also, on Earth, both territorial seas and territorial airspace are as much a part of a state's sovereign "territory" as are its actual land areas. Also, in the absence of the "no sovereignty" rule currently in force in both customary and conventional international law, the surfaces of some planets would be capable of appropriation as sovereign territory, just as islands in the high seas can be so appropriated. It should also be noted at this point that although the United States prescribes rules of law for islands over which it claims sovereignty, it also prescribes rules of law for certain Trust Territories over which it does not claim sovereignty, but does exercise jurisdiction. See S. Houston Lay, The Law Relating to Activities of Man in Space 201–202 (1970).

275 1967 Space Treaty, supra note 139, at art. VIII. The remainder of art. VIII states that:

> Such objects of component parts found beyond the limits of the State Party to the Treaty on whose registry they are carried shall be returned to that State Party, which shall, upon request, furnish identifying data prior to their return.

Id.

appears to extend to activities outside a spacecraft, whether in outer space or on or under the surface of a celestial body, as the article states that jurisdiction and control applies to the object and "any personnel thereof"[276] without requiring that the personnel actually be inside the spacecraft.[277] Activities inside research stations or other dwellings of a permanent or semipermanent nature, which rest on or beneath the surfaces of celestial bodies and are not capable of either landing or taking off themselves, and which may be constructed with components brought to the celestial body by spacecraft, would also be included within Article VIII, because the ownership of objects "landed or constructed on a celestial body, and of their component parts, is not affected by their presence in outer space or on a celestial body . . . "[278]

Although there is no recorded case or instance of extradition for a crime committed in any one of these special environments, crimes have been committed as between nationals, and prosecution of such offenses has invariably been on one of the several other theories discussed in this chapter. The United States, in its dogged insistence on the territoriality theory when it suits its interest, applied the flag or floating territoriality theory to the only case reported, which took place near the Arctic Circle.[279]

The international law of outer space is growing very rapidly with the use of space stations, communication satellites, and other ventures in the exploration and exploitation of space and celestial bodies. There are already a number of conventions regulating these acts, but with the presence of more persons in this new medium, jurisdictional questions are bound to arise. Where there are people, there are likely to be actions that may cause harm and injury to others as well as to property. Thus, what law will apply is one question. The answer is likely to be the law of the flag by analogy to maritime and air law. However, if an individual outside a spacecraft or object carrying the flag commits a harmful act upon another person or object, then clearly the law of the flag cannot apply. In these cases countries will apply either the law of the nationality of the alleged perpetrator or the law of the nationality of the victim. As of yet, there is no international convention that addresses these issues.

The rights and duties of states with regard to the rescue and return of astronauts and the return of objects that are launched into outer space but come down unexpectedly in a foreign state, on the high seas, or in a place not subject to the jurisdiction of any state, have been clarified and elaborated by the Agreement of the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Astronauts, and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space, done at Washington, London, and Moscow, April 22, 1968. 19 U.S.T. 7570, T.I.A.S. No. 6599. See also J.E.S. Fawcett, Outer Space: New Challenges to Law and Policy (1984); Stephen Gorove, Studies in Space Law: Its Challenges and Prospects (1977); Stephen Gorove, International Protection of Astronauts and Space Objects, 20 DePaul L. Rev. 597 (1970); Lawrence D. Roberts, Addressing the Problem of Orbital Space Debris: Combining International Regulatory and Liability Regimes, 15 B.C. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 51 (1992); George P. Sloup, Peaceful Resolution of Outer Space Conflicts through the International Court of Justice: "The Line of Least Resistance," 20 DePaul L. Rev. 618 (1970); Krystyna Wiewiorowska, Some Problems of State Responsibility in Outer Space Law, 7 J. Space L. 23 (1979); James R. Wilson, Note, Regulation of the Outer Space Environment through International Accord: The 1979 Moon Treaty, 2 Fordham Envtl. L. J. 173 (1991); Major Ronald L. Spencer, Jr., State Supervision of Space Activity, 63 A.F. L. Rev. 75 (2009).

276 1967 Space Treaty, supra note 139.

277 This is apparently a greater competence than was provided by U.N. General Assembly Resolution 1962 (XVIII) of Dec. 13, 1963, G.A. Res. 1962, 18 U.N. GAOR, Supp. 15, at 15, U.N. Doc. A/5515 (1963), which provided, in part, the following statement of jurisdiction: "The State on whose registry an object launched into outer space is carried shall retain jurisdiction and control over such object and any personnel thereon, while in outer space . . . "

278 See 1967 Space Treaty, supra note 139, at art. VIII.

279 See supra notes 248 and 251.

3. The Active Personality or Nationality Theory

The active personality theory, like the territorial theory, is based upon state sovereignty and provides, in part, that nationals of a state are entitled to the state's protection even when they are outside its territorial boundaries. This is the premise for the passive personality theory discussed in Section 4.[280] Along with a right to state protection, a national has a corresponding duty to obey those municipal laws that are recognized as having an extraterritorial effect.[281] Such laws usually pertain to the duty of allegiance.[282]

The active personality theory is rarely relied on by U.S. courts.[283] The Harvard Research Project reviewed the various legislative enactments of states implementing this principle and classified them into five basic types according to the offenses proscribed, namely:

1. those statutes which made all offenses punishable;

2. those statutes which made only those offenses punishable which were also punishable by the lex loci delicti;

3. those statutes which made all offenses of a certain degree punishable;

4. those statutes which made only those offenses committed against co-nationals punishable; and

5. those statutes which made only certain enumerated offenses punishable.[284]

Some states have given the theory even more extensive application, such as to prosecute those individuals who were not nationals at the time the offense was committed, but who later became nationals.[285] In this manner, these penal laws are retroactive and, in the opinion of this writer, in violation of the principles of legality embodied in the prohibition against ex post facto prosecution.[286] Such an application of the active personality theory can result in an injustice to the defendant, particularly with regard to double jeopardy. International law, however, does not clearly prohibit such an exercise of jurisdictional authority, as there is no principle of international law forbidding a state the right to the reasonable exercise of jurisdiction over its nationals even when abroad.[287] Thus, a state may enforce its penal laws against its nationals even when the conduct charged as criminal was committed in a foreign jurisdiction. There appears to be no human rights protection against this other than the rule of ne bis in idem, which has yet to be sufficiently evidenced in the customary practice of states.

---

280 Oppenheim's International Law, supra note 2, at 457; 1 Oppenheim, supra note 2, at 686–689. See also Lauritzen v. Larson, 345 U.S. 571 (1953) (stating U.S. citizen or U.S. legal entity entitled to protection of U.S. law). The U.S. Supreme Court recognized the nationality theory in Skiriotes v. United States, 313 U.S. 70 (1941). See also United States v. Reeh, 780 F.2d 1541 (11th Cir. 1986); United States v. Danizewski, 380 F. Supp. 113 (E.D.N.Y. 1974); United States v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479 (S.D. Cal. 1960). See g*enerally* Blakesley, Conceptual Framework for Extradition, supra note 1, at 706–713; Watson, supra note 65 (both discussing the nationality theory of jurisdiction).

281 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402, Reporters' Note 1.

282 See Joyce v. Director of Public Prosecution, [1946] 1 All E.R. 196 (Eng. H.L.) (involving treason).

283 See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402(2) and Reporters' Note 1 (noting wide acceptance of nationality jurisdiction but its rare application in the United States); Watson, supra note 65, at 42 (stating "the United States is one of the least aggressive proponents of one of the most widely accepted forms of extraterritorial jurisdiction, or criminal jurisdiction based on the nationality of the offender.").

284 See Harvard Research Project, supra note 3, at 523.

285 See, e.g., Strafgesetzbuch [StGB] § 4 (C.H. Beck 1963) (F.R.G.).

286 Nonetheless, the Harvard Research Project would allow such an extension of jurisdiction.

287 For an opinion that the active personality principle "is without any justification," see Patrick J. Fitzgerald, The Territorial Principle in Penal Law: An Attempted Justification, 1 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 29, 43 (1970).

The question of whether such a theory will be given recognition by a state other than the state of nationality that is seeking to enforce its penal laws extraterritorially arises when an extradition request is presented. The requested state then has to decide whether the requesting state has subject matter jurisdiction over a crime allegedly committed in a foreign state. That foreign state could well be the requested state, in which case it will have to decide whether it wishes to waive its in personam jurisdiction over the relator. If it does not waive its jurisdiction, then the requested state will have precedence for asserting its own jurisdiction. In the event the alleged offense was committed in a state other than the requested state, an issue would arise whenever that state would also request the extradition of that same person. In this case, priority is likely to be given to the state claiming territorial jurisdiction. The problems of enforcing penal laws extraterritorially on the basis of the nationality of the offender are essentially conflicts-of- law problems. This theory places a burden on every national of a state having such legislation who when abroad falls under the sway of two penal legislations.

Most penal laws that extend extraterritorially fall into three categories: (1) laws pertaining to allegiance, national duties, and obligations arising out of the bond of nationality (such as treason);[288] (2) common crimes that even if committed abroad have an effect upon internal public order (such as fraudulent schemes);[289] and (3) common crimes committed abroad that have a bearing upon the nationality state's outlook upon the individual (such as violation of probation or parole).[290] A different situation exists in states that prohibit extradition of their nationals. Then, the prosecution of individuals from such states for crimes committed abroad and that violate the penal laws of both states proceeds in the courts of the nationality state.[291]

The first category has received recognition in extradition law as a valid basis for a request, but its application is limited by reason of the political offense exception.[292] The second category can also fall in the subjective territorial theory, and as such presents no difficulties other than in cases of multiple requests and the need to establish priority in granting extradition. The third category is applied without difficulty, because the extradition request is based on a penal judgment concerning another factual situation, but wherein the offender was conditionally released. The offense committed abroad, which the nationality state is taking cognizance of, is only relied upon by that state to revoke the conditional release. Considerations of such revocation are not within the examining prerogative of the requested state, and, therefore, this instance would present no conflict-of-laws problems. The final situation described above is the appropriate measure to be taken by a state that prohibits extradition of its nationals. It is the proper application of the maxim aut dedere aut judicare.[293] Such a measure avoids the problems of non-prosecution of offenders because of their nationality, and thus, promotes the preservation of a minimum world order.[294] In this category, the state of nationality, which becomes the prosecuting state, may require that the offense be prosecutable not only under the laws of the state wherein it was committed, but also under its own laws.[295] This requirement of double

---

288 See Joyce v. Director of Public Prosecution, [1946] 1 All E.R. 196 (Eng. H.L.).

289 In re Roquain, 26 I.L.R. 209 (Cass. 1958) (Belg.). This case involved the commission of the crime of adultery in France. Such an offense affected the family status in Belgium and was committed between Belgian nationals. See also Public Prosecutor v. Van H., 19 I.L.R. 227 (Sup. Ct. 1952) (Neth.).

290 Schneeberger v. Public Prosecutor of the Canton of Lucerne, 21 I.L.R. 125 (Cass. 1954) (Switz.).

291 In re Gutierrez, 24 I.L.R. 265 (Sup. Ct. 1957) (Mex.).

292 See Ch. VIII, Sec. 2.1.

293 This term is utilized to convey the duty that a state must either prosecute or extradite. See M. Cherif Bassiouni & Edward M. Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare: The Duty to Prosecute or Extradite in International Law (1995) [hereinafter Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare].

294 See Ch. VIII and Ch. X.

295 X v. Public Prosecutor, 19 I.L.R. 226 (Ct. App. 1957) (Neth.).

criminality[296] is one of the conditions for granting extradition, and it is, therefore, important that it be applied to a procedure that is intended to be a substitute for extradition.

Other than cases where a national has violated abroad a duty of citizenship, such as treason, the active personality theory is embodied in the laws of a growing number of countries from Brazil to Sweden. Under these laws, the state of nationality can prosecute its nationals for a common crime committed abroad without any connection with the state of nationality, exclusively on the basis of the perpetrator's nationality.[297]

4. The Passive Personality Theory

The passive personality theory complements the active personality theory. Whereas the exercise of the active personality theory ensures that the nationals of a given state who have committed offenses abroad will be brought to justice, the passive personality theory ensures that a state's interest in the well-being of its nationals abroad will also be protected. Because the ultimate well-being of the state itself depends upon the welfare of its nationals, it can be argued that a state has a legitimate interest in the prosecution of those who commit crimes against its nationals abroad.

As indicated above, the passive personality theory is the counterpart of the active personality theory. Both indeed rely on nationality as a criterion. In passive personality, it is that of the victim that is relevant, while in the active personality, it is that of the offender. Under both theories, the state seeking to exert its jurisdiction claims the power to regulate conduct outside its territory by imposing certain limitations on individuals.

The passive personality theory can also be viewed as part of the protected interest theory discussed in the following section. It is distinguishable, however, in that the object of its protection is the person who is a national of the state, regardless of where he/she may be, whereas the protected interest theory refers to the protection of the state's interests from harmful acts committed outside the state's jurisdiction that have an effect within the state.

The most famous application of the passive personality theory is undoubtedly the case of the S.S. Lotus,[298] although the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) was based 297 See In re Assarsson, 635 F.2d 1237 (7th Cir. 1980) (where Sweden sought the extradition of a Swedish national who was a permanent resident of the United States for a crime committed in Denmark by someone acting on his behalf), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 938 (1980). See also Lindstrom v. Gilkey, 1999 WL 342320 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 1999); United States v. Hill, 279 F.3d 731, 740 (9th Cir. 2002); United States v. Walczak, 783 F.2d 852, 854 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that jurisdiction over a U.S. citizen who violated a federal statute while in Canada was proper under nationality principle); McKell v. Islamic Rep. of Iran¸ 722 F.2d 582, 588 (9th Cir. 1983); United States v. King, 552 F.2d 833, 851 (9th Cir. 1976); Abraham Abramovsky & Jonathan I. Edelstein, The Post-Sheinbeign Israeli Extradition Law: Has It Solved the Extradition Problems between Israel and the United States or Has It Merely Shifted the Battleground?, 35 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 1 (Jan. 2002).

296 See Ch. VII, Sec. 2.

298 S.S. Lotus, 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 9; 2 Manley O. Hudson, World Court Reports 20 (1935); Manley O. Hudson, The Sixth Year of the Permanent Court of International Justice, 22 Am. J. Int'l L. 1, 10 (1929). The case involved a collision on the high seas between a French ship, the Lotus, and a Turkish vessel, the Boz-Kourt, near Turkish territorial waters. When the French ship put into port at Constantinople, the French watch officer who was in charge of the Lotus at the time of the collision was arrested on shore. France claimed that Turkey had no jurisdiction to try the French officer, while Turkey claimed that it was not prohibited from doing so by international law. Both states agreed to submit the case to the Permanent Court. Turkey claimed jurisdiction under Article 6 of the Turkish Penal Code, which provided that any foreigner who committed an offense abroad to the prejudice of Turkey or of a Turkish subject would be punished in accordance with the Turkish Penal Code. See also United States v. Felix-Gutierrez, 940 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that passive personality and other on other grounds.[299] There has been much confusion over the years about the significance of the S.S. Lotus (France v. Turkey) case, which was decided by the PCIJ in 1927,[300] and its application to the passive personality theory. In that case, a collision between a French and Turkish vessel resulted in the death and injury of several Turkish nationals, and as a result, a French officer was prosecuted in Turkey for causing the accident. The PCIJ held that Turkey could prosecute the French officer under its penal laws because the injury had occurred on the Turkish vessel (floating territoriality), and the victims were Turkish nationals (passive personality). The court indicated that the combination of these two jurisdictional theories created an adequate basis under prevailing international law. Some states, such as Germany, have enacted statutes based upon this theory.[301] The theory, however, has been criticized by scholars.[302]

In addition, the Brussels Convention,[303] the Geneva High Seas Convention of 1958,[304] and the Law of the Sea Convention[305] have prohibited states that are parties thereto from relying on this theory to assert their jurisdictional authority. The Harvard Research Project, although listing the passive personality theory as one of the five general theories of penal jurisdiction recognized in international law, does not include it in the text of the Draft Convention.[306] jurisdictional principles "cumulatively" justified prosecution of a foreign national for a crime against a DEA agent); United States v. Benitez, 741 F.2d 1312 (11th Cir. 1984) (arguing protective and passive personality principles supported prosecution of a foreign national for a crime against a DEA agent); Blakesley, Conceptual Framework for Extradition, supra note 1, at 713–716; Geoffrey R. Watson, The Passive Personality Principle, 28 Tex. Int'l L.J. 1 (1993).

---

299 Although the wording of Article 6 of the Turkish Penal Code would support both the passive personality and protected interest principles, the majority of the Permanent Court based its decision upon the fact that the Turkish vessel was assimilated to Turkish territory, and that because the effects of the crime were felt on the Turkish vessel, they were felt in Turkey itself. See Hudson, The Sixth Year of the Permanent Court of International Justice, supra note 298, at 11. This is, in effect, a recognition of the subjective–objective territorial principle. Brierly, supra note 133, at 308.

300 S.S. Lotus, 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 9.

301 See, e.g., Strafgesetzbuch [StGB] art. 4(2) (C. H. Beck) (F.R.G.). See also Whiteman Digest, supra note 12, at 104 (discussing the Cutting case).

302 See, e.g., Richard R. Baxter, Extraterritorial Application of Domestic Law, 1 U.B.C. L. Rev. 333 (1960); Brierly, supra note 133, at 302; Watson, supra note 298, at 3 (arguing that states should be allowed to exercise passive personality jurisdiction, but only in cases when "the defendant is not prosecuted either by the state in which the crime was committed or by the defendant's home state"). A case applying the passive personality doctrine without reference to it occurred in 1866, when Mr. Hale, U.S. consul at Alexandria, arrested and sent to the United States on an American man-of-war, with the assent of the Egyptian authorities, John H. Suratt, an American citizen who was charged with complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln. Moore Digest, supra note 211. See also Moore Extradition, supra note 15, at 104.

303 International Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to Penal Jurisdiction in Matters of Collisions and Other Incidents of Navigation, signed at Brussels, May 10, 1952, 1960 Gr. Brit. T.S. No. 47 (Cmnd. 1128), at 14 (effective Nov. 20, 1955).

304 High Seas Convention, supra note 105, art. 11. Article 11(1) of the Treaty provides that:

> In the event of a collision or any other incident of navigation concerning a ship on the high seas, involving the penal or other disciplinary responsibility of the master or of any other person in the service of the ship, no penal or disciplinary proceedings may be instituted against such persons except before the judicial or administrative authorities either of the flag State or of the State of which such person is a national.

Id.

305 LOS Convention, supra note 106.

306 According to the Harvard Research Project: "The [passive personality principle] is admittedly auxiliary in character and is probably not essential for any State if the ends served are adequately provided for on other principles." Harvard Research Project,supra note 3, at 589. The Harvard Research Project also

As with the active personality theory, the passive personality theory may lead to situations where the accused is exposed to double jeopardy. Nevertheless, the theory is relied upon by a number of states and must continue to be considered applicable in any situation in which its use is not prohibited by international law. The three following conditions must be met for the passive personality theory to be invoked:

1. the victim must be a national of the forum state (the state which either has the defendant in custody or is demanding that the state which does have custody extradite the defendant to stand trial);

2. the defendant may not be a national of the forum state; and

3. the offense must not have been committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the forum state (except when explicitly waived).

Israel relied on this theory in part in the prosecution of Adolf Eichmann under Israeli law,[307] even though there was also sufficient reliance on the universality theory to avoid any legal challenges to Israeli subject matter jurisdiction in that case. In Eichmann's case, however, extradition was not the mode of securing custody over the accused, as Israeli agents kidnapped Eichmann from Argentina.[308]

An example of legislation incorporating the passive personality theory is an Israeli law of March 21, 1972, amending Israeli penal law with respect to jurisdiction. Under this law, conduct that affects the state (protected interest theory) and its economic interests (extended protected interest theory), and is designed to harm its nationals (passive personality theory), subjects any such actor to the jurisdiction of Israeli courts.[309]

In recent years, a number of new legislative enactments in the United States have invoked the passive personality theory. For example, upon signing the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents[310] in 1973, the United States promulgated laws penalizing crimes against U.S. officials and diplomats abroad.[311] Subsequently, the United States signed the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages[312] and passed the Hostage Taking Act authorizing prosecution of terrorist crimes by or against U.S. nationals abroad.[313] concluded that the principle has been opposed by writers in both common and civil law countries and that "[o]f all principles of jurisdiction having some substantial support in contemporary national legislation, it is the most difficult to justify in theory." Id. at 579. While excluding the general or unrestricted use of the passive personality principle, however, the Harvard Draft reserves its limited use for situations where no other principle will apply, although the principle is used in the context of the universality theory. Id. at art. 10(c) at 589.

---

307 See Pierre A. Papadatos, The Eichmann Trial (1964); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Unlawful Seizures and Irregular Rendition Devices as Alternatives to Extradition, 7 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 25, 28–33 (1973) (discussing the extradition effects of the trial). See also Ch. V.

308 See Ch. V.

309 The Jerusalem Post Weekly, Aug. 14, 1973, at 4 (discussing the first application of this law to a Turkish national unlawfully seized in Lebanon by Israeli commandos, who was prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment by a military court relying on this statute.). See also Time, Aug. 20, 1973, at 31.

310 Dec. 14, 1973, 28 U.S.T. 1975, 1035 U.N.T.S. 167. See also George, Federal Anti-Terrorist Legislation, supra note 1.

311 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1114, 1117 (2000).

312 Dec. 17, 1979, 18 I.L.M. 1456 (1979).

313 18 U.S.C. § 1203 (2000).

The Restatement (Third) notes wide acceptance of passive personality-based jurisdiction in prosecuting terrorists.[314] Professor Watson notes, however, that "[o]utside of terrorism . . . the United States still seems reluctant to embrace passive personality jurisdiction."[315] Consequently, the few judicial decisions that utilize the passive personality theory of jurisdiction are in cases involving crimes against governmental agents.[316] For a discussion of the expansion of this theory in U.S. law, see infra Section 8. The passive personality doctrine is less relied upon than the active personality doctrine. This explains why Article 5 of the CAT[317] contains a limiting provision for passive personality jurisdiction, allowing it "if that State considers it appropriate," which does not appear in connection with the other jurisdictional provisions of Article 5:

> 1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences referred to in article 4 in the following cases:
>
> (a) When the offences are committed in any territory under its jurisdiction or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;
>
> (b) When the alleged offender is a national of that State;
>
> (c) When the victim is a national of that State if that State considers it appropriate.
>
> 2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over such offences in cases where the alleged offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction and it does not extradite him pursuant to article 8 to any of the States mentioned in paragraph I of this article.
>
> 3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law.[318]

Since then, however, a number of states have enacted laws permitting states in "terrorism" cases to base their criminal jurisdiction on passive personality.[319]

5. The Protected Interest or Protective Theory

This is a much broader theory than the passive personality theory, because it extends the sphere of protection afforded to state interests. It is, in effect, a "long arm" jurisdictional theory that allows a state to reach beyond its physical boundaries to protect its national interests from harmful effects

---

314 See Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. g. Watson argues that:

> [T]he Constitution permits the Congress to establish jurisdiction over terrorist and serious non-terrorist crimes by foreigners against Americans abroad. Although regulation of terrorism against Americans may be more clearly related to the foreign affairs power than regulation of common crimes against Americans, both serve to protect United States nationals from harm abroad—a central mission of foreign policy, and therefore an acceptable application of the congressional power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations may provide an additional justification for establishing jurisdiction over terrorists.

Watson, supra note 298, at 34.

315 Id. at 11.

316 See, e.g., United States v. Felix-Gutierrez, 940 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir. 1991); United States v. Benitez, 741 F.2d 1312 (11th Cir. 1984) (holding that passive personality together with other jurisdictional theories justified prosecution of a foreign national for a crime against a DEA agent); Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1989) (noting that in an extradition case the requesting state based its jurisdiction on protective and passive personality theories). See also In re Extradition of Sandhu, 1996 WL 469290 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 1996); Sidali v. INS, 107 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 1997).

317 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. Res. 39/46, U.N. GAOR 39th Sess., Supp. No. 51, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984), entered into force June 26, 1987, draft reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1985) [hereinafter Torture Convention] (emphasis added).

318 Torture Convention, supra note 317, at art. 5 (emphasis added).

319 18 U.S.C. § 2331 et seq.

arising from conduct abroad. The protected interest theory allows a state to assert jurisdiction over a citizen or an alien, whether an individual or a legal entity, acting outside the state's territorial boundaries in a manner that threatens interests of the state.

Both the Harvard Research Project[320] and the Restatement (Third)[321] recognize the protective theory. Both emphasize the potential application of this theory to cases involving counterfeiting of state documents by expressly stating in separate provisions that it applies to such cases,[322] and to cases involving national security. Each includes, however, a limiting provision: (1) The Harvard Research Project requires that the alien's act "not [be] committed in exercise of a liberty guaranteed the alien by the law of the place where it was committed,"[323] and (2) the Restatement (Third) requires that it be "generally recognized as [a crime] by reasonably developed legal systems."[324]

The Harvard Research Project and the Restatement (Third) are reflections of the customary practice of the United States, even though the actual practice differs at times. The protected interest principle is likely to be applied by states to any act committed by an alien that poses either an actual or potential harm to any vital interest of that state. The United States has not been reluctant to rely on the protected interest theory, although it usually does so under the guise of an exception to the territorial principle, rather than considering it a separate theory.[325] The exceptions to the territorial theory, as discussed above, may produce the same outcome as the protected interest theory. The latter, however, has a much broader potential application, as it allows a state wider latitude in the exercise of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. The courts of the United States have relied on the protected interest theory in antitrust cases,[326] and also in the 320 Harvard Research Project, supra note 3, at arts. 7, 8.

---

321 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 (3) and cmt. f.

322 Harvard Research Project, supra note 3, at art. 8; Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. f. See, e.g., United States v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479, 489–490 (S.D. Cal. 1960).

323 Harvard Research Project, supra note 3, at art. 7.

324 Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 402 cmt. f.

325 See, e.g., United States v. Archer, 51 F. Supp. 708 (S.D. Cal. 1943). In Archer, an alien who had sworn falsely before a vice consul of the United States of an American Consulate in Mexico was prosecuted under a U.S. statute making such false swearing a crime. The court stated that "any person who takes false oath before a consul commits an offense, not against the country where the consul is, but against the sovereignty of the United States." Id. at 711. See also United States v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479 (S.D. Cal. 1960). In Rodriguez, the defendants, who had made false statements to U.S. officials outside of U.S. territory in order to obtain status as non-quota immigrants, were prosecuted. The court stated that "Congress may pick and choose whatever recognized principle of international jurisdiction is necessary to accomplish the purpose sought by . . . [its] legislation." Id. at 491; accord Rocha v. United States, 288 F.2d 545 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 366 U.S. 948 (1961). The Rocha case involved aliens who had conspired to enter the United States illegally as preferred status immigrants. The court, citing the Rodriguez case, stated that "the powers of the government and the Congress in regard to sovereignty are broader than the powers possessed in relation to internal matters." Id. at 549. See also United States v. Romero-Galue, 757 F.2d 1147 (11th Cir. 1985); United States v. Hensel, 711 F.2d 1000 (11th Cir. 1983) (upholding conviction under constitutional statute that required no showing that criminal activity would have effect within United States territory); United States v. Pizzarusso, 388 F.2d 8 (2d Cir. 1968); United States v. Egan, 501 F. Supp. 1252 (S.D.N.Y. 1980); United States v. Keller, 451 F. Supp. 631 (D. P.R. 1978).

326 See United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945) (otherwise known as the "Alcoa" case, in which the defendant Canadian corporation was charged with certain violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act relating to attempts to restrain and monopolize interstate and foreign commerce of the United States). See also United States v. Imperial Chem, Indus., 100 F. Supp. 504 (S.D.N.Y. 1951). But see Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of Am, Nat'l Trust & Savings Ass'n, 749 F.2d 1378 (9th Cir. 1984) (dismissing plaintiff's claim for lack of subject matter jurisdiction after court weighed potential conflict with Honduran law that might result from enforcement of U.S. antitrust laws), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1032 (1985). See 6 Whiteman Digest, supra note 12, at 126–127 (explaining Timberlane enforcement of certain provisions of the Securities Exchange Act that relate to regulated securities transactions taking place outside the United States.[327] However, such extensions have met with criticism, particularly when the jurisdictional extension is represented as an extrapolation of the territoriality principle.[328]

There is, however, no general rule of international law that prohibits the use of this theory on a limited basis.[329] The potential for using this theory in extradition is vast. Indeed, if the authoritative decision-making process of a given participant is without restriction as to what constitutes conduct performed outside its boundaries, but having an internal effect on its interest that it deems itself competent to protect, then almost every act by any person that affects the political and economic interest of a state could subject such person to the jurisdiction of that state. This is exemplified by the case of the Israeli law of March 21, 1972, which purports to grant jurisdiction to its courts to enforce Israeli law over acts, wherever committed, that affect or are destined to affect the security of the state or its interests. The requested state in such a situation would be confronted with a value judgment made by the requesting state, and there would be no basis to challenge the request or to question its merits without challenging that very judgment. Therefore, to avoid creating conflict situations, a "long arm" jurisdictional theory must take into account its potential threat to world public order, and it must have well-defined limitations. This explains why the United States has historically relied on an extrapolation of the territorial principle, even though this was at times strained. This position has changed as the United States has relied more and more on the protective theory to obtain extraterritorial jurisdiction in economic matters.[330] An example of this is United States

Lumber); 6 Whiteman Digest,supra note 12, at 118–160 (discussing in general the United States' practices with respect to jurisdiction over antitrust cases).

327 It must be shown that the transaction had an effect upon U.S. interests, and that the stock in question was registered and listed on a U.S. stock exchange. Schoenbaum v. Firstbrook, 405 F.2d 200 (2d Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 906 (1969); SEC v. Briggs, 234 F. Supp. 618 (N.D. Ohio 1964).

328 See, e.g., Eric Stein & Peter Hay, Law and Institutions in the Atlantic Area 684 (1968); R.Y. Jennings, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and the United States Antitrust Laws, 1957 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 146, 175. As the American federal system is based upon the theoretical premise that the federal government, and Congress in particular, can act only when the power to do so is specifically delegated to it in the Constitution, and that the non-delegated sovereign powers remain with the states and the people as required by the Tenth Amendment, a special problem is raised within the context of American constitutional law, which is outside the scope of this discussion. See George, Extraterritorial Application, supra note 1, at 614–617. See also Sarkar, The Proper Law of Crime, supra note 1, at 463–464.

329 The Permanent Court of International Justice in the Lotus case affirmed the territorial principle, but did not exclude other theories, including universality, which is discussed below in Sec. 7. As stated by the Court:

> No argument has come to the knowledge of the Court from which it could be deduced that States recognize themselves to be under an obligation towards each other only to have regard to the place where the author of the offense happens to be at the time of the offense.

S.S. Lotus, 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 9, at 23.

Article 11 of the High Seas Convention, however, would prohibit use of the protective principle in the situations specified therein. High Seas Convention, supra note 105, art. 11. The protective principle was recently used by France to obtain the extradition of a Haitian gang leader charged with murdering France's honorary consul. Although this drew criticism from the Haitian media, such serious charges involve clear national interests. See Bruce Zagaris, Dominican Government Extradites Haitian Gang Leader for Murder of Consul, 26 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 87–88 (Mar. 2010). It was also invoked by Spain in requesting the extradition of Rwandan president Paul Kagame and forty officers based on information that the individuals were involved in the murder of nine Spanish citizens. See Bruce Zagaris, Rwanda Urges Governments and Interpol to Ignore Spanish Arrest Warrants, 24 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 133–134 (Apr. 2008).

330 See infra Sec. 9.

v. Hijazi, where the United States sought to prosecute a Kuwaiti citizen for inflating the price of a subcontract to Kellogg, Brown and Root. At the time of the alleged fraud, Hijazi was neither in the United States, nor a citizen or resident, thus negating the traditional bases for jurisdiction. Rather, the government sought his prosecution for violating a protected interest of the United States. In denying Hijazi's motion to dismiss, the district court held that a government has a right to "protect itself." The court reasoned that:

> The character of the activity to be regulated is of profound importance. The United States has a strong interest in protecting itself from fraud. This is not a case in which the United States is attempting to prosecute a foreign national for an act taken against a U.S. citizen, or even a U.S. corporation, it is attempting to prosecute Hijazi for actions that were taken against the United States itself. Thus, the concepts of international law that a national has the right to protect itself from crimes against it surely support jurisdiction here.[331]

6. Expanded Extraterritorial Criminal Jurisdiction

In the last two decades, the United States, as well as many states, has expanded its extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction in reliance upon an expanded view of the traditional theories discussed above, namely territoriality, active personality, passive personality, and protected interest.[332] This extension is due to new manifestations of transnational criminality such as terrorism, sex tourism, and cybercrime,[333] to name only those that have attracted the most attention, as well as to international crimes such as genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. International treaties, as well as national legislation in different countries, have expanded their extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction for these crimes.

At the outset, it is important to note that there exists a legal presumption in U.S. statutory interpretation that, absent a clear indication, Congress ordinarily intends federal statutes to only have domestic application.[334] It is equally well-established in the United States that in interpreting a statute that applies extraterritorially, it is presumed that Congress does not intend to violate international law.[335]

The United States has adopted several legislative provisions for the extraterritorial application of its criminal law with respect to terrorism.[336] Antiterrorism legislation having extraterritorial

---

331 United States v. Ali Hijazi, 2011 U.S. Dist LEXIS 7734, at *22–*23 (C.D. Ill. 2011) (internal citations omitted) (emphasis added).

332 For examples of treaties providing for jurisdiction regardless of where the offense was committed, see Peruvian Extradition Treaty, art. II(3)(c), entered into force Mar. 25, 2003, S. TREATY DOC. 107–106 ("For the purposes of this Article, an offense shall be an extraditable offense, regardless of . . . (c) where the offense was committed"); Bolivian Extradition Treaty, art. II(3)(b), entered into force Nov. 21, 1996, S. TREATY DOC. 104–122 ("To determine . . . whether an offense is punishable under the laws in the Requested State, it shall be irrelevant . . . where the act or acts constituting the offense were committed"); Jordanian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4), entered into force July 29, 1995, S. TREATY DOC. 104–103 ("An offense described in this Article shall be an extraditable offense regardless of where the act or acts constituting the offense were committed"); Austrian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(6), entered into force Jan. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105–150, TIAS 12916; Indian Extradition Treaty, art. 2(4), entered into force July 21, 1999, S. TREATY DOC. 105–130, TIAS 12873; Extradition Treaty with Luxembourg, art. 2(4), entered into force Feb. 1, 2002, S. TREATY DOC. 105–110, TIAS 12804.

333 See generally United States v. Clark, 435 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2006).

334 See Small v. United States. 544 U.S. 385 (2005).

335 McColluch v. Scoiedad Nacional de Marioneros de Honduras, 327 U.S. 10, 21–22 (1963). See also United States. v. Neil, 312 F.3d 419, 421 (9th Cir. 2002).

336 Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135; USA PATRIOT ACT, 18 U.S.C. § 2331, Pub. Law No. 107-56 (2001) (amended 2006); Exec. Order No. 13,224, 3 C.F.R. 13,224 (Sept. 23, 2001); U.S. Anti-Terrorism & Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA), 8 U.S.C.

effect does pose a problem as these laws conflict with territorial criminal legislation as well as with the legislation of other states, which are predicated on the same theories.[337] Thus, it would not be uncommon, in a case involving terror violence, that the victims have different nationalities, that the perpetrators have different nationalities, and that the crime is committed on the territory of a state other than that of the victims or the perpetrators. In these complex cases with jurisdictional conflicts, the courts of the requested state will be confronted with the difficult issue of which of the multiple requesting states will be given priority. Regrettably, there is very little international law to resolve such jurisdictional conflicts, and that basically leads states interested in prosecuting such perpetrators to seek to obtain in personam jurisdiction by other means, such as kidnapping.[338]

---

§1189 (2000); Airport and Transportation Security Act of 2001, S. 1447 (Nov. 19, 2001); Authorization for the Use of Military Force (Congressional Joint Resolution, September 14, 2001); Legal Aspects of the Use of Military Force; Congressional Research Service, September 13, 2001; 49 U.S.C. §§ 44901–44910 (Air Commerce & Safety); 18 U.S.C. §§32–37 (Aircraft & Motor Vehicle Crimes); 18 U.S.C. §§ 175–178 (Biological Weapons); 18 U.S.C. §§ 229 (Chemical Weapons); 18 U.S.C. §231–233 (Civil Disorders); 50 U.S.C. §§2302–2353 (Defense Against Weapons of Mass Destruction); 42 U.S.C. §§5122–5196 (Disaster Relief); 50 U.S.C. §§1801–1862 (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance); 50 U.S.C. §§1701–1707 (International Emergency Economic Powers); 50 U.S.C. §§1601–1651(National Emergencies); 42 U.S.C. §§64-271 (Quarantine and Inspection); 18 U.S.C. §§3071–3077 (Rewards for Information Concerning Terrorist Acts and Espionage); 18 U.S.C. §§2151–2156 (Sabotage); 18 U.S.C. §§2701–2711 (Stored Wire & Electronic Communications & Transactional Records Access); 18 U.S.C. §2331–2339 (Terrorism); 50 U.S.C. (War and National Defense); 50 U.S.C. §§1341–1548 (War Powers Resolution); 18 U.S.C. §§2510–2522 (Wire & Electronic Communications Interception & interception of Oral Communications); Military Order on Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism (George W. Bush, Nov. 13, 2001); Executive Order on Citizen Preparedness in War on Terrorism (George W. Bush, Nov. 9, 2001); Homeland Security Presidential Directive 2: Combating Terrorism through Immigration Policies (George W. Bush, Oct. 29, 2001); Homeland Security Presidential Directive 1: Organization and Operation of the Homeland Security Council (George W. Bush, Oct. 29, 2001); Executive Order Establishing Office of Homeland Security (George W. Bush, October 8, 2001); Executive Order Blocking Property and Prohibiting Transactions with Persons Who Commit, Threaten to Commit, or Support Terrorism (George W. Bush, Sept. 23, 2001); Executive Order Calling Reserves of Armed Forces to Active Duty (George W. Bush, Sept. 14, 2001); Declaration of National Emergency (George W. Bush, Sept. 14, 2001); National Emergency Powers (Congressional Research Service background paper, Sept. 18, 2001); National Security Presidential Directive 1—Organization of the National Security Council (George W. Bush, Feb. 13, 2001); Continued Detention of Aliens Subject to Final Orders of Removal [Immigration and Naturalization Service; interim rule, Nov. 14, 2001—adds new provisions to govern determinations by the Immigration and Naturalization Service as to whether there is a significant likelihood that an alien will be removed from the United States in the reasonably foreseeable future, and whether there are special circumstances—including terrorist activity—justifying the continued detention of certain aliens]; National Security; Prevention of Acts of Violence and Terrorism [Department of Justice, Bureau of Prisons; interim rule, Oct. 31, 2001—permits monitoring of communications with attorneys to deter acts of terrorism]; Aircraft Security under General Operating and Flight Rules [Department of Transportation, Federal Aviation Administration; final rule, Oct. 4, 2001—requires certain aircraft operators to search prior to departure aircraft and screen passengers, crew members, and other persons, and their accessible property].

337 Customary international law needs to be evidenced by opinio juris and the consistent practice of states, both of which are very weak, except in demonstrating a historic preference for the theory of territorial jurisdiction, as discussed in Sec. 1 of this chapter. The writings of scholars are also very limited on this subject. For an identification of general principles of law as a means of deriving guidelines for jurisdictional conflict resolution, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, General Principles of International Law, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 768 (1990).

338 See Ch. V.

7. Universal Jurisdiction[339]

7.1. Introduction

Universal jurisdiction has become the preferred legal technique of those seeking to prevent impunity for international crimes.[340] Although there is no doubt that it is a useful and, at times, necessary technique, it has negative aspects. The exercise of universal jurisdiction is generally reserved for the most serious international crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture.[341] There may be other international crimes for which an applicable treaty provides for such a jurisdictional basis, as in the case of terrorism.[342]

The foremost issue in the legal analysis of universal jurisdiction is its rationale. In the exercise of universal jurisdiction, a state acts on behalf of the international community in a manner equivalent to the Roman concept of actio popularis. The exercising state acts on behalf of the international community because it has an interest in the preservation of world order as a member of that community. Although the state may also have its own interest in exercising universal jurisdiction, if those interests are jurisdictionally based the state would be exercising its own criminal jurisdiction on the basis of a theory of jurisdiction other than universality, viz., extended territoriality, active personality, passive personality, or a protected economic interest.

As an actio popularis, universal jurisdiction may be exercised by a state without any jurisdictional connection or link between the place of commission, the perpetrator's nationality, the victim's nationality, and the enforcing state. The basis is, therefore, exclusively the nature of the crime, and the purpose is exclusively to enhance world order by ensuring accountability for the perpetration of certain crimes. Precisely because a state exercising universal jurisdiction 339 Based in part on an article in the Virginia Journal of International Law from M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Practices, 42 Va. J. Int'l L. 81 (2001); reprinted with permission. See Marc Henzelin, Le Principe de L'Universalité en Droit Pénal International (2000).

340 The Pinochet Precedent: How Victims Can Pursue Human Rights Criminals Abroad, Human Rights Watch Update (Human Rights Watch), Sept. 2000 [hereinafter Human Rights Watch]; Universal Jurisdiction: 14 Principles on the Effective Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction (Amnesty International) [hereinafter Universal Jurisdiction: 14 Principles]; Universal Jurisdiction in Europe: Criminal Prosecutions in Europe since 1990 for War Crimes, Crimes against Humanity, Torture and Genocide (Redress), June 1999 [hereinafter Universal Jurisdiction in Europe].

341 For a comprehensive review, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application 279–294 (2011). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law 78–89 (2d. ed. 2012). For a review of national prosecutions for international crimes, see Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at ch. IX. See also William Schabas, Genocide in International Law: The Crime of Crimes (2009).

342 1 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Terrorism: Multilateral Conventions (1937–2001) (2001); 1–2 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N. Documents 1972–2001 (2002); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: Applications to "Terrorism," in Crime, Procedure and Evidence in a Comparative and International Context: Essays in Honour of Mirjan Damaška 201 (Jon Jackson, Maximo Langer & Peter Tillers eds., 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, "Terrorism": Reflections on Legitimacy and Policy Considerations, in Values & Violence: Intangible Aspects of Terrorism 216 (Wayne McCormack ed., 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, An Assessment of International Legal Modalities to Control International Terrorism, 31 Arab J. Legal & Judicial Scis. 17 (2005); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Terrorism: The Persistent Dilemma of Legitimacy, 36 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 299 (2004); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Legal Control of International Terrorism: A Policy-Oriented Perspective, 43 Harv. Int'l L.J. 83 (2002).

does so on behalf of the international community, it must place the overall interests of the international community above its own.

Universal jurisdiction is not without its difficulties, however. Unbridled universal jurisdiction can cause disruptions in world order and deprivation of individual human rights when used in a politically motivated manner or for vexatious purposes. Even with the best of intentions, universal jurisdiction can be used imprudently to create unnecessary frictions between states, to abuse legal processes, and to harass individuals.

Given these problems, universal jurisdiction must be used cautiously in order to both prevent certain negative consequences and achieve its useful purpose. There is some evidence, however, to suggest that the exercise of universal jurisdiction by domestic jurisdictions is dominated by realpolitik considerations of executives across the globe, and that these political considerations, as a practical matter, limit the excessive claims of both the supporters and detractors of the theory.[343]

Ultimately, universal jurisdiction must be harmonized with other jurisdictional theories. In this context, it should be noted that private international law has yet to develop rules or criteria of sufficient clarity to consider priorities in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction whenever more than one state claims jurisdiction.

The theories of jurisdiction contained in treaties and evidenced in the customary practice of states are essentially territorial or based on the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim. Consequently, jurisdictional conflicts between states have been few. Nevertheless, as evidenced by the Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. United Kingdom/United States) [hereinafter Lockerbie] and Questions Relating To The Obligation To Prosecute Or Extradite (Belgium V. Senegal) [hereinafter Habré] decisions of the ICJ,[344] lack of clarity in treaty obligations concerning the precedence of the duty to prosecute over the duty to extradite have led to tensions between interested states. In the Lockerbie case this tension led to a jurisdictional stalemate that lasted for almost ten years until a negotiated solution was reached in which the accused were tried in the Netherlands under Scottish law.[345] In the Habré case, Belgium and Senegal wrangled for a decade over jurisdiction over the former Chadian president Hissene Habré, eventually involving the African Union, before the ICJ ruled that Senegal had judicial precedence despite ongoing concerns over its ability to adequately prosecute Habré.[346] 343 Máximo Langer, The Diplomacy of Universal Jurisdiction: The Role of Political Branches in the Transnational Prosecution of International Crimes, 105 Am. J. Int'l L. 1, 4–5 (2011).

---

344 See Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.K.) (Feb. 27, 1998); Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.S.) (Feb. 27, 1998), 37 I.L.M. 587 (1998); Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.K.), 1992 I.C.J. 3 (Apr. 14); Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.S.), 1992 I.C.J. 114 (Apr. 14); Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), 2012 I.C.J. (July 20). For a discussion of these cases, see Ch. I, Sec. 3.4. See also Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 81–87.

345 See Michael P. Scharf, Terrorism on Trial: The Lockerbie Criminal Proceedings, 6 ILSA J. Int'l & Comp. L. 355 (2000); Omer Y. Elagab, The Hague as the Seat of the Lockerbie Trial: Some Constraints, 34 Int'l Law 289 (2000).

346 The ICJ in the Habré case also did not taken up the question of the unwillingness or inability of a state to effectively and sincerely prosecute an individual, as Senegal's record in the case was not altogether reassuring. This question also arose in the Lockerbie case, where the ICJ ruled on a textual analysis of the Montreal Convention without considering whether Libya's unwillingness to launch a good faith

It should also be noted that universal jurisdiction is not as well-established in conventional and customary international law as its ardent proponents profess it to be.[347] These proponents and their organizations have listed countries[348] as relying on universal jurisdiction when, in fact, the legal provisions they cite do not stand for that proposition, or at least not as unequivocally as represented. As it stands today, only eighteen countries have universal jurisdiction provisions for crimes under international law.[349] A 2011 study by Professor Máximo Langer determined that there have been thirty-two trials before national courts under the universal jurisdiction principle, which targeted overwhelmingly individuals accused of crimes in the former Yugoslavia or Rwanda, and those by Nazis.[350] In the eight trials for crimes allegedly committed in other locations, five proceeded with the support of the accused's state of nationality, and the remaining three were tried in absentia.[351] While more than one thousand proceedings have been initiated on universal jurisdiction grounds—again largely against individuals accused of crimes in the former Yugoslavia or Rwanda, or those by Nazis—the majority never reached trial.[352]

The study also concluded that the subjects of universal jurisdiction proceedings are overwhelmingly lower-level individuals whose prosecution does not alter the political hierarchy of states that have undergone internal conflicts. It also does not disrupt the operations of the international system, which is traditionally less concerned with low-level perpetrators. They are, in fact, the ones frequently offered in place of more senior executives and decision-makers. Where there is potential disruption, as with the attempted prosecution of Habré or Abdoulaye Yerodia Ndombasi—Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belgium) [hereinafter the Arrest Warrant case]—the former acting Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Congo, the ICJ has ruled against universal jurisdiction. This suggests that neither the benefits nor the drawbacks of universal jurisdiction have been realized, and that as with many other facets of international law its use will be dictated by realpolitik first and foremost.[353]

Because universal jurisdiction has been infrequently relied upon in national judicial decisions, its relationship with other theories of jurisdiction has yet to be clarified. With respect to certain international crimes, the substantive defense of immunity has been eliminated since the Nuremberg Charter and the IMT's judgments,[354] and reinforced by the case law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), and Article 27 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC). The removal of substantive immunity means that a defendant cannot rely investigation and possible prosecution had any bearing on the venue for the trial. As this writer suggested in Chapter I, the question of capacity and willingness is absolutely relevant to the question of jurisdictional priorities in universal jurisdiction cases.

---

347 See supra note 340.

348 Id.

349 Michael Scharf, Universal Jurisdiction and the Crime of Aggression, 53 Harv. Int'l L.J. 357, 359 (2010).

350 Langer, supra note 343, at 9.

351 Id.

352 Id. at 8.

353 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Perennial Conflict between International Criminal Justice and Realpolitik, 22 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 541 (2006); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Justice and Peace: The Importance of Choosing Accountability over Realpolitik, 35 Case W. Res. J. Int'l L. 191 (2003); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Searching for Justice in the World of Realpolitik, 12 Pace Int'l L. Rev. 213 (2000); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Combating Impunity for International Crimes, 71 U. Colo. L. Rev. 409 (2000). See also Máximo Langer, The Diplomacy of Universal Jurisdiction: The Role of Political Branches in the Transnational Prosecution of International Crimes, 105 Am. J. Int'l L. 1, 4–5 (2011).

354 The International Military Tribunal (IMT) at Nuremberg and the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (IMTFE) removed substantive immunity for crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Aug. 8, 1945, art. 7, 8 U.N.T.S. 279, 59 Stat. 1544 [hereinafter IMT Charter]; Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, on his/her status as a head of state, senior government official, or diplomat to interpose that position as a substantive defense negating criminal responsibility for these crimes, but only before these judicial institutions established by treaty. Otherwise, as decided by the ICJ in the Arrest Warrant case, temporal immunity has been recognized as alive and well under customary international law.

The use of the theory of universal jurisdiction by national jurisdictions has not, as yet, been directed against foreign heads of state and foreign senior officials, save for a few cases, most notably for Belgium's charges in the Habré case.[355] It must be noted that the Belgium charge is primarily based on the CAT, which provides a conventional basis for universal jurisdiction.[356] The Habré case is a complex one that took more than a decade to resolve after legal proceedings in Senegal, Belgium, and at the ICJ. After his ouster in 1990, Habré moved to Senegal, where he lived quietly for nearly a decade until January 2000 when a group of victims filed a formal complaint in Dakar. In February a Senegalese judge formally indicted Habré for torture and crimes against humanity,[357] but the indictment was dismissed by the Cour de Cassation in July 2000 on jurisdictional grounds.[358] This decision led to the filing of a complaint in Belgium that resulted in a four-year investigation and the issuing of an indictment in 2005 for torture, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Belgium sought his extradition, which Senegal refused. After more than three years of delays, which included consultations with the African Union (AU) and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) over the creation of a special tribunal and other jurisdictional matters, Belgium applied to the ICJ in order to force Senegal to either prosecute or extradite Habré.[359] In July 2012 the ICJ issued its judgment, declaring that Senegal had a duty under the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) to prosecute Habré or, failing to do so, extradite him to Belgium to face trial there.[360] As of April 2013 Senegal is in the process of creating a special "Extraordinary African Chambers" composed of Senegalese and other African judges and staff to try the case.[361]

Jan. 19, 1946, T.I.A.S. No. 1589 at 3, 4 Bevans 20, amended Apr. 26, 1946, art. 6., T.I.A.S. No. 1589 at 11, 4 Bevans 27 [hereinafter IMTFE Amended Charter]. The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) removed substantive immunity for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, art. 7(2), S.C. Res. 808, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/808 (1993), annexed to Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of U.N. Security Council Resolution 808, U.N. Doc. S/2-5704 & Add. 1 (1993) [hereinafter ICTY Statute]; Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, art. 6(2), S.C. Res. 955, U.N. SCOR, 49th Sess., 3453d mtg., Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994) [hereinafter ICTR Statute].

355 See Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 79–89 (2d ed. 2012) for a detailed review of the Habré case in Senegal and before the ICJ.

356 Convention against Torture, supra note 317, at art. 5.

357 Plainte avec Constitution de Partie Civile (Feb. 3, 2000), http://www.hrw.org/legacy/french/themes/habre-plainte.html. See also Frederic L. Kirgis, The Indictment in Senegal of the Former Chad Head of State, ASIL Insights (Feb. 2000), http://www.asil.org/insigh41.cfm.

358 Aff. Habré, Decision Number 14 of 20.03.2001, Cour du Cassation, available at http://www.asser.nl/upload/documents/20121105T123352-Habre,%20Cassation%20Court,%20Senegal,%2020%20March%202001.pdf.

359 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Application, p. 15, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/144/15054.pdf.

360 Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), 2012 I.C.J. (July 20).

361 Human Rights Watch, Q&A: The Case of Hissène Habré before the Extraordinary African Chambers in Senegal (Sept. 12, 2012), http://www.hrw.org/news/2012/09/11/qa-case-hiss-ne-habr-extraordinary-african-chambers-senegal.

7.2. The Theoretical Foundation of Universal Jurisdiction

The theory of universal jurisdiction[362] is extraneous to the concept of national sovereignty, which is the historical basis for national criminal jurisdiction. Universal jurisdiction transcends national sovereignty. In addition, the exercise of universal jurisdiction displaces the right of the accused to be tried by the "natural judge," a hallmark of the traditional exercise of territorial jurisdiction.[363] The rationale behind the exercise of such jurisdiction is that:

1. No other state can exercise jurisdiction on the basis of the traditional doctrines;
2. No other state has a direct interest; and
3. There is an interest of the international community requiring enforcement.

Thus, states exercise universal jurisdiction not only as national jurisdiction, but also as a surrogate for the international community. In other words, a state exercising universal jurisdiction carries out an actio popularis against persons who are hostis humani generis.[364]

Two positions can be identified as the basis for transcending the concept of sovereignty. The first is the universalist position that stems from an idealistic Weltanschauung. This idealistic universalist position recognizes certain core values and the existence of overriding international interests as being commonly shared and accepted by the international community, and thus transcending the singularity of national interests. The second position is a pragmatic policy-oriented one that recognizes that occasionally certain commonly shared interests of the international community require an enforcement mechanism that transcends the interests of the singular sovereignty.

These two positions share common elements, namely: (1) the existence of commonly shared values and/or interests by the international community; (2) the need to expand enforcement mechanisms to counter more serious transgressions of these values/interests; and (3) the assumption that an expanded jurisdictional enforcement network will produce deterrence, prevention, and retribution that ultimately will enhance world order, justice, and peace. Under both positions, the result is to give each and all sovereignties, as well as international organs, the power to individually or collectively enforce certain international proscriptions. This theory applies when the proscription originates in international criminal law and not in the national 362 See Hays Butler, Universal Jurisdiction: A Compilation of Documents (3 vols. 2000). See also, e.g., Jordan J. Paust, M. Cherif Bassiouni & Michael Scharf et al., International Criminal Law: Cases and Materials (2d ed. 2000); Steven Ratner & Jason Abrams, Accountability for Human Rights Atrocities in International Law: Beyond the Nuremberg Legacy (2d ed. 2001); Final Report on the Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction in Respect of Gross Human Rights Offenses (Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice, International Law Association), 20–21 (2000) [hereinafter Universal Jurisdiction in Respect of Gross Human Rights Offenses] (concluding that states are entitled to exercise universal jurisdiction with respect to genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture, but recommending that "[g]ross human rights offenders should be brought to justice in the state in which they committed their offences"); Human Rights Watch, supra note 340. Surveys and listings of national legislation purporting to authorize the use of universal jurisdiction can be found in Universal Jurisdiction in Europe, supra note 340, at 16–47; Universal Jurisdiction: 14 Principles, supra note 340, at 5; http://www.icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf.

363 See, e.g., European Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 4, 1950, art. 13, Europ. T.S. No. 5, 213 U.N.T.S. 221; American Convention on Human Rights, November 22, 1969, art. 25, O.A.S.T.S. No. 36; 1144 U.N.T.S. 123.

364 For a discussion of the circumstances under which a state may proceed actio popularis as a result of a breach of obligatio erga omnes, see Roman Boed, The Effect of a Domestic Amnesty on the Ability of Foreign States to Prosecute Alleged Perpetrators of Serious Human Rights Violations, 33 Cornell Int'l L.J. 297, 299–301 (2000). See also Maurizio Ragazzi, The Concept of International Obligations Erga Omnes (1997); Andre de Hoogh, Obligations Erga Omnes and International Crimes (1996); cf. Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Co., Ltd. (Belg. v. Spain), 1970 I.C.J. 3, 32 (Feb. 5).

law of a given state. In other words, crimes exclusively under national law cannot give rise to universal jurisdiction.

The universalist and the policy-oriented positions differ as to: (1) the nature and sources of the values/interests that give rise to an international or supranational prescription; (2) the composition of the international community and its membership; and (3) the nature and extent of the legal rights and obligations incumbent upon states.[365]

The universalist position can be traced to metaphysical and philosophical conceptions arising in different cultures and at different times, but converging in some aspects. For example, in the three monotheistic faiths of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, full sovereignty rests with the Creator, and transgressions of the Creator's norms confer on the religious community the power to enforce them, irrespective of any limitations in space or time.[366]

Starting in the fifteenth century Western jurists and philosophers, in part based on Christian concepts of natural law, developed an idealist universalist position. But contrary to some contemporary authors who refer to them, these early jurists and philosophers did not extend their universalist views of certain universal wrongs to universal criminal jurisdiction to be exercised by any and all states.[367] Cesare Beccaria in his 1764 pamphlet Dei Delitti e Delle Pene[368] expressed an idealist universalist view that there exists a community of nations sharing common values that all members of the international community are commonly bound to enforce, collectively and singularly. But he did not extend it to universal jurisdiction. He expressed his views as follows:

> There are also those who think that an act of cruelty committed, for example, at Constantinople may be punished at Paris for this abstract reason, that he who offends humanity should have enemies in all mankind, and be the object of universal execration, as if judges were to be the knights errant of human nature in general, rather than guardians of particular conventions between men.[369]

---

365 These issues are discussed in Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 293, at 3–69. The case for an international civitas maxima supporting the duty to prosecute or extradite is valid; it is doubtful, however, that it includes universal jurisdiction other than as a subsidiary jurisdictional basis to enforce the attainment of these goals. In fact, aut dedere aut judicare may well be argued as the substitute for a theory of universal jurisdiction. In this writer's opinion, universal jurisdiction complements aut dedere aut judicare in that whenever a state does not extradite and proceeds to prosecute, it may need to rely on universality.

366 This is why the Ayatollah Khomeni in 1989 issued an edict of death for blasphemy against author Salman Rushdie for his book The Satanic Verses (1988). The majority of the world's states reacted negatively to the extraterritorial reach, as did many scholars. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Speech, Religious Discrimination, and Blasphemy, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 432–435 (1989); Hurst Hannum, Speech, Religious Discrimination, and Blasphemy, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 427–428 (1989); Virginia Leary, Speech, Religious Discrimination, and Blasphemy, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 428–430 (1989); Ved Nanda, Speech, Religious Discrimination, and Blasphemy, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 430–431 (1989). This is an example of why universal jurisdiction should be carefully circumscribed. There have nevertheless been many contrary positions expressed by Muslim writers in the West, as well as in the Muslim world, which have taken a position in support of the Ayatollah's fatwa, thus in fact advocating universal jurisdiction.

367 For a synopsis of the views on this point, including those of Grotius, Heineccius Burlamaqi, de Vattel, Rutherford, Kent, and others, see Henry Wheaton, Elements of International Law 181 (R.M. Dana ed., 8th ed. Boston, Little-Brown 1866).

368 Cesare Beccaria-Bonesana, An Essay on Crimes and Punishment (Academic Reprints ed. 1953) (1819).

369 Id. at 135. See also Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 293, at 27.

Later Hugo Grotius, in his two volumes De Jure Belli Ac Pacis (first published in 1625), argued from the same philosophical premise but relied on a pragmatic policy-oriented approach of pursuing hostis humani generis on the high seas. Grotius's premise was the notion of mare liberum, which was not necessarily a new doctrine, but under which he posited the right of freedom of navigation on the high seas. Because the right of freedom of navigation on the high seas was applicable universally, it followed that an infringement upon that right by pirates would be universally punished. It is that doctrine that became the foundation of the modern theory of universal jurisdiction for certain international crimes.

For the naturalist, a concept of universal wrongs can be identified with reference to natural law,[370] while for the legal positivist they cannot.[371] Thus, the evolution of legal concepts such as nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege[372] flew in the face of the abstract notion of universal wrongs identified by reference to natural law.[373] These concepts originated in the writings of Montesquieu,[374] but they were later reflected in the positivism of criminal law of the 1800s European criminal codifications.[375] These codifications embodied the principles of legality in criminal law and made it difficult for the continued recognition of the universalist position expressed by a few earlier jurists and philosophers.

Many legal scholars since the nineteenth century have advocated the theory of universal jurisdiction without necessarily clarifying the philosophical foundation of that theory or its legal elements. Instead they argue, much like the early universalists, that certain international crimes imply that all states, irrespective of any existing national legislation, and even contrary to national legislation, have the power to prosecute, irrespective of any territorial connection to the crime, or any connection to the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim. Perhaps the most articulate expression of the question was made in 1922 by Donnedieu de Vabres, who stated:

> Dans sa notion élémentaire et son expression absolue, le système de la répression universelle, ou del'universalité du droit de punir est celui qui attribue vocation aux tribunaux répressifs de tous les Etats pour connaître d'un crime commis par un individu quelconque, en quelque pays que ce soit.
>
> L'Etat qui, se prévalant de cette doctrine, exerce sa compétence unverselle, ne revendique nullement un droit de souveraineté qui lui serait propre, soit à l'égard de lacte qu'il réprime, soit vis-à-vis de son auteur. Il n'agit pas pour la défense de ses intérêts. Il intervient, a défaut de tout autre Etat, pour éviter, dans un intérêt humain, une impunité scandaleuse. Il suit de là que son intervention a un caractère très subsidiaire. Elle ne se manifeste que si l'Etat qui juge a le délinquant en sa possession.

---

370 For different expressions of natural law, see The Natural Law Reader (Brendan F. Brown ed., 1960) (expressing natural law on the basis of Catholicism); Lloyd L. Weinreb, Natural Law and Justice (1987). See also Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 1996 I.C.J. 226, 551 (Advisory Op.) (July 8) (Weeramantry, J., dissenting); Saul Mendlovitz & Merav Datan, Judge Weeramantry's Grotian Quest, 7 Transnat'l L. & Contemp. Probs. 401 (1997).

371 For these different philosophies of law, see Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341, at 89–122.

372 Id. at 123–167.

373 Id.

374 2 Charles de Secondat Montesquieu, De L'Esprit des Lois, Oeuvres Complétes (Roger Caillois ed., 1951). The maxim derives from Roman law.

375 Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341, at 123–167. The modern European origin for the "principles of legality" is attributed to Paul Anselm von Feuerbach, who first explicated them in his Lehrbuch des Gemeinen in Deutschland Gültigen Peinlichen Rechts (1801). See also Giuliano Vassalli, Nullum Crimen Sine Lege, Appendice del Nuouisomo Digesto Italiano 292 (1984).

> Tel qu'on vient de le définir, le système de l'universalité du droit de punir a sa modeste origine dans un texte du Code de Justinien, C. III, 15, Ubi de criminibus agi oportet, 1, qui, déterminant le ressort, en matière pénale, des gouverneurs de l'Empire, donne à la fois compétence au tribunal du lieu de commission du délit, et à celui du lieu d'arrestation du coupable (judex deprehensionis). L'interprétation tendancieuse des glossateurs substitua au judex deprehensionis le judex domicilli.
>
> Néanmoins, il fut admis pendant tout le moyen âge, dans la doctrine italienne, et dans le droit qui gouvernait les rapport des villes lombardes, qu'à l'égard de certaines catégories de malfaiteurs dangereux-banniti, vagabundi, assassini,-la simple présence, sur le territoire, du criminel impuni, étant une cause de trouble, donnait vocation à la cité pour connaître de son crime. Au XVI siècle, Doneau rétablit la véritable signification du texte fondamental, C. III. 15. 1, favorable au forum deprehensionis. Ayrault écrit, à la même époque: "Il semble que, franchement et volontairement, nous nous rendions sujets aux lois de la patrie dont nous corrompons le repos." Au XVII siècle, cette idée se fait jour dans les écrits du Hollandais Paul Voët, au XVIII siècle, dans ceux de l'Allemand Henricus de Cocceji. Elle pénètre jusqu'à notre époque, où elle est fréquemment reproduite. Il en résulte que la commission de certains crimes, d'une exceptionnelle gravité, est une source de compétence universelle.
>
> Il appartint à Grotius qui fut, à l'aube du XVII siècle, le grand vulgarisateur, sinon le fondateur du droit international, d'attacher à la théorie de la compétence universelle toute sa valeur philosophique. A l'heure où les grandes unités politiques, de constitution récente, se dressaient les unes contre les autres, il formula, comme un précurseur, la loi de la solidarité humaine. Il existe, dit-il, une société universelle des hommes, societas generis humani. Le crime, envisagé comme une violation du droit naturel qui la régit, droit non écrit, mais gravé dans la conscience individuelle, est une offense à l'humanité tout entière. L'obligation de punir qu'il engendre est universelle. Elle se traduit, pour l'Etat dans le pouvoir duquel le criminel est tombé, par l'alternative fameuse d'extrader ou de punir: aut dedere, aut punier. L'influence de Grotius peut s'observer dans la doctrine de ses successeurs hollandais, scandinaves ou allemands. On la rencontre au XVIII siècle, et dans la période revolutionnaire, où la pure tendance individualiste et humanitaire résiste au socialisme, à l'étatisme issus du Contrat social. On la retrouve, au cours du XIX siècle, dans les écrits de nombreux théoriciens, et dans quelques législations positives.[376]

This doctrinal view, which is essentially a policy-oriented one despite being grounded in natural law philosophy, has received increasing support among legal scholars in the twentieth century,[377] but it has not been supported by the practice of states. In fact, there are only a few reported cases known to scholars in which such an unfettered universal jurisdiction doctrine has been applied without the existence of a link to the sovereignty or territoriality of the enforcing state.[378]

A 1990 Report of the Council of Europe aptly summarized the contemporary situation of the law and practice of states:[379]

> There are considerable differences of opinion among member states concerning the purpose of the principle of universality, according to which criminal jurisdiction is exercised over offences

376 Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Introduction a l'Etude du Droit Pénal International 135–136 (1922) (footnotes omitted). See also Henri Donnedieu de Vabres, Les Principles Modernes du Droit Pénal International (1928).

377 See Butler, supra note 362.

378 Most of them relating to piracy. See Alfred Rubin, The Law of Piracy (2d ed. 1998). Some cases reported by scholars refer to post-WWII prosecutions, but could not be found by this writer. See Schabas, supra note 341, at 360–368. For a discussion of contemporary state practice, see Secs. 7.4 and 7.5.

379 Report of the European Committee on Crime Prevention, Council of Europe (1990). The report was prepared by the Select Committee of Experts on Extraterritorial Jurisdiction (PC-R-EJ), set on by the European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC) in 1984.

committed abroad, without the requirements underlying the previously mentioned principles of jurisdiction necessarily being present.

Some states are only prepared to apply the principles to certain offences if they are authorised or obliged to do so under international law. Some conventions authorise the assertion of universal jurisdiction, others require such jurisdictional action so as not to leave certain offences unpunished. The majority of states have felt at liberty to introduce the principle in their national legislation without any such authorisation or obligation. Nevertheless, many of the latter group have evidently tried to keep in line with existing international agreements when establishing universal jurisdiction. However, there are also a number of states that have reserved a considerable degree of universal jurisdiction over offences not covered by any agreement. They assume that any conflict of competence with other states, which may arise from their extensive claims, can be avoided in practice by a broad application of the principle of discretionary jurisdiction, or by imposing conditions for prosecution, such as the requirement to authorisation from a central body or for the presence of the suspect. The latter requirement is, for that matter, imposed by all states on the exercise of jurisdiction based on this principle, at least in practice.

Some conventions would seem to permit the assertion of universal jurisdiction in relation to offences covered therein. The Red Cross Conventions of 1949 would be examples, though not all states party to these conventions have asserted universal jurisdiction under these instruments. The 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs and the amending Protocol of 1972, and the 1971 Convention of Psychotropic Substances are also examples. Some states have established jurisdiction based on universality in respect of offences covered by these treaties.

Other conventions clearly envisage or require the taking of universal jurisdiction: treaties on counterfeiting, piracy, hijacking and actions endangering the safety of civil aviation afford examples. Virtually all states have established universal jurisdiction over such offences. Comparable conventions envisaging the taking of universal jurisdiction are those relating to the combat against terrorism, the prevention of torture, the protection of diplomatic staff, the physical protection of nuclear material and the taking of hostages.

The maxim aut dedere aut judicare is reflected in an increasing number of conventions, although the way it is translated into national legislation and its effect differ from state to state and even from category to category of offence within a single country.

There is sometimes no clear distinction between the principle of universality and other principles on which extraterritorial jurisdiction is based, such as the "representation" principle or the principle of protection. There are often differences of opinion as to which principle should form the basis of a particular term of extraterritorial jurisdiction. It has also been shown that, under special circumstances, forms of jurisdiction have been established which cannot be classified under any of the traditional principles of jurisdiction described above. These can be found, for example, in military law, in certain emergency laws and in legislation regarding taxes and customs duties.

The difficulty of categorising these different forms of extraterritorial legislative criminal jurisdiction can perhaps be explained by the fact that they do not always have a sound theoretical basis. The committee considered it its task to study the theoretical basis for such jurisdiction and, where possible, to describe it or develop it further.[380]

Universal jurisdiction has indeed been frequently confused with other theories of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. But, as discussed below, with few exceptions, the legislation and practice of states overwhelmingly evidences a connection between the crime and the enforcing state based on the crime's territorial impact or because of the nationality of the perpetrator or the nationality of the victim. As discussed below, explicit or implicit recognition of the theory of universal jurisdiction in conventional international law has been limited to certain international crimes. Nevertheless, the application of universal jurisdiction for certain international crimes does not necessarily mean that it should be devoid of any connection to the enforcing state, or that it has precedence over other theories of jurisdiction. Instead, universal jurisdiction for certain international crimes is a theory of jurisdiction that is predicated on the policy of enhancing international criminal accountability, whereby the enforcing state acts on behalf of the international community in fulfillment of its international obligations, and also in pursuit of its own national interest. But that does not mean that this enforcing exercise supplants the enforcing interests of other states, or for that matter, of international organs such as the ICTY, ICTR, and ICC. That is why a balancing test must be applied in the exercise of universal jurisdiction.

380 Id. at 14–16.

Scholars, including this writer, support the proposition that an independent theory of universal jurisdiction exists with respect to jus cogens international crimes. The premises for such a theory are both the historic idealistic universalist position and the pragmatic policy position mentioned above.[381] In order to support such a theory, however, it is necessary to have an understanding of the historical evolution of that theory and its contemporary content and application. Furthermore, it is indispensable to have guidelines for the application of this theory in order to avoid jurisdictional conflicts, disruptions of world order, and abuse and denial of justice, and to enhance predictability of jurisdictional priorities and consistency in jurisdictional disputes and outcomes.

7.3. Universal Jurisdiction in International Criminal Law

The primary sources of substantive international criminal law are conventions and customs that resort to general principles of law and the writings of scholars essentially as a means to interpret conventions and customs.[382] Conventional international law is the better source of substantive international criminal law insofar as it is more apt to satisfy the principle of legality, nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege.[383] But that does not exclude customary international law or general principles of law as sources of substantive international criminal law, provided they meet the standard of specificity equivalent to that of conventional international law. The inquiry into universal criminal jurisdiction and its application[384] must be made by reference to: (1) national legislation to determine whether it exists in most national legal systems representing the families of the world's major criminal justice systems,[385] and (2) in conventional international criminal law to determine the existence of international legal norms that provide for the application of universal jurisdiction by national criminal justice systems and by internationally established adjudicating bodies.[386]

The research of scholars as to national legislation evidences that very few states have provisions allowing their legal systems to exercise universal jurisdiction over anyone who has committed

---

381 See supra note 364 and accompanying text.

382 M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Sources and Content of International Criminal Law: A Theoretical Framework, in 1 International Criminal Law 3 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 1999) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Sources].

383 For a discussion of the process of establishing customary international law, see Sec. 7.5.1.

384 "In its classic statement, however, the universality theory encompasses acts committed beyond any country's territorial jurisdiction, the paradigm offense being piracy on the high seas." Rena Hozore Reiss, The Extradition of John Demjanjuk: War Crimes, Universality Jurisdiction, and the Political Offense Doctrine, 20 Cornell Int'l L.J. 281, 303 (1987). See id. at 303 n.161 ("The justification for the universality principle lies in the fact that without such jurisdiction, no country could prosecute the offender.").

385 Bassiouni, General Principles of International Law, supra note 337. See also Révé David, Les Grands Systèmes de Droit Contemporaries 22–32 (5th ed. 1973).

386 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Criminal Law Conventions and Their Penal Provisions (1997) [hereinafter Bassiouni, ICL Conventions]. For a discussion of contemporary state practice with respect to universal jurisdiction, see Sec. 7.5.1.

a jus cogens international crime, irrespective of the time and place of the crime's occurrence, its impact upon the territory of the enforcing state, its commission by one of the state's nationals, or its commission against one of the state's nationals. The judicial practice of states is also limited. To the knowledge of this writer, no state practice presently exists whereby states have resorted to universal jurisdiction without the existence of national legislation, even when international treaties provide for such a jurisdictional basis.

The collective practice of states in establishing international judicial organs since the end of WWI, which includes five international investigating commissions and four international ad hoc criminal tribunals, evidences that none of them has been based on the theory of universal jurisdiction.[387] The Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) also does not establish universal jurisdiction for "situations" referred to it by states, but only a universal scope as to the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court.[388] These crimes are: genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, which are jus cogens international crimes.[389] As "referrals"[390] to the ICC are made by a state party[391] or by a nonstate party,[392] it is difficult to argue that the ICC's jurisdiction flows from the theory of universal jurisdiction. However, "referrals" by the Security Council for the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court constitute universal jurisdiction, because they can transcend the territoriality of a state-party.[393] That provision could be interpreted as allowing the Security Council to refer a "situation" to the ICC, even when it applies to crimes occurring outside the territory of a state-party and involving the responsibility of nationals from nonparties.

International criminal law evidences the existence of 27 categories of crimes.[394] These 27 categories are evidenced by 281 conventions concluded since 1815.[395] Some of these conventions include penal provisions that distinguish them from other conventional international law. These international categories are: aggression; genocide; crimes against humanity; war crimes; unlawful possession, use, emplacement, stockpiling and trade of weapons, including nuclear weapons; nuclear terrorism; apartheid; slavery, slave-related practices, and trafficking in human beings; torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment; unlawful human experimentation; enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions; mercenarism; piracy and unlawful acts against the safety of maritime navigation and the safety of platforms on the high seas; aircraft hijacking and unlawful acts against international air safety; threat and use of 387 M. Cherif Bassiouni, From Versailles to Rwanda in Seventy-Five Years: The Need to Establish a Permanent International Criminal Court, 10 Harv. Hum. Rts. J. 11 (1997).

388 See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, art. 14, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/9 [hereinafter ICC Statute], reprinted in 37 I.L.M. 999 (1998). See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (1998).

389 ICC Statute, supra note 388, at arts. 6, 7 & 8. Following the first review conference held in Kampala, Uganda in 2010, the ICC Statute was amended to include the Crime of Aggression. For a detailed discussion of this key event, see Claus Kreb & Leonie von Holtzendorf, The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression, 8 J. Int'l Crim. Justice 1179 (2010); Astrid Reisinger Coracini, The International Criminal Court's Exercise of Jurisdiction Over the Crime of Aggression—at Last… in Reach… Over Some, 2 Goettingen J. Int'l L. 745 (2010); Hans-Peter Kaul, Speech, From Nuremberg to Kampala—Reflections on the Crime of Aggression (Aug. 30, 2010), http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/6A8372F3-B7DE-42D2-949F-28B6AEC2A4F2/282450/03092010_IHLDialogs_Chautauqua_Speech1.pdf.

390 ICC Statute, supra note 388, at art. 14.

391 Id. Germany, New Zealand, and Canada are examples of countries that have recently passed national implementing legislation.

392 Id. at art. 12(3).

393 Id. at art. 13(b).

394 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, ch. III, sec. 4.

395 Id.

force against internationally protected persons and United Nations personnel; taking of civilian hostages; use of explosives; unlawful use of the mail; financing of terrorism; unlawful traffic in drugs and related drug offenses; organized crime and related specific crimes; destruction and/or theft of national treasures; unlawful acts against certain internationally protected elements of the environment; international traffic in obscene materials; falsification and counterfeiting; unlawful interference with international submarine cables; and corruption and bribery of foreign public officials.[396] Among the penal provisions contained in these 281 conventions there are provisions on criminal jurisdiction. Of these, 101 contain a reference to a jurisdictional theory,[397] and among them only a few, discussed below, can be construed explicitly or implicitly as reflecting universal jurisdiction. Conversely, 74 provisions reflect the obligation to prosecute or extradite, evidencing the legislative choice of this enforcement technique over that of conferring universal jurisdiction to any and all states.[398]

Because conventional and customary international criminal law overlap with respect to certain crimes, it is useful to examine whether universal jurisdiction vis-à-vis jus cogens international crimes arises under any of the sources of international criminal law. What follows is an assessment of the evolution of universal jurisdiction with respect to jus cogens international crimes based on conventional and customary international law sources. These jus cogens international crimes are: piracy, slavery and slave-related practices, war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide, apartheid, and torture.[399]

It is noteworthy that several international criminal law conventions that apply to crimes that have not risen to jus cogens contain a provision on universal jurisdiction. This evidences the recognition and application given to this theory.

7.3.1. Piracy

Piracy is deemed the basis of universal criminal jurisdiction for jus cogens international crimes, but that was not always the case. The term "piracy" has its origins in Greek literature as peiretes and is reported in Homer's Iliad[400] and The Odyssey,[401] as well as in Thucydides' History of the Peloponnesian War.[402] It then appeared in Roman literature, notably in the writings of Cicero, who referred to pirates as pirata and praedones, or land-based predators who were later referred to as brigands and bandits.[403] Cicero is also credited with the notion that pirata and praedones are hostis humani generis.[404] Grotius, relying on Aristotle and Cicero, elaborated on the theory of hostis humani generis and its application in time of war, which was the context in which piracy was viewed at that time.[405]

396 Id. at 144–145

397 Id at 145.

398 Id. Although aut dedere aut judicare is advocated as a civitas maxima, it should be noted that the formula is more prevalent in conventions dealing with drugs and terrorism.

399 M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Crimes: Jus Cogens and Obligatio Erga Omnes, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 9 (1996).

400 Homer, The Iliad (A.T. Murray trans., 1971).

401 Homer, The Odyssey (A.T. Murray trans., 1960).

402 Thucydides, The Peleponnesian War (C.M. Smith trans., 1969).

403 Cicero, Contra Verres II (L.H.G. Greenwood trans., 1953). See also Cicero, De Officii (L.H.G. Greenwood trans., 1953); Cicero, De Re Publica (C.W. Keyes trans., 1928).

404 Coleman Philippson retraces that historical evolution, both as to its substantive meaning and as to exercise of jurisdiction in Greece and Rome. 2 Coleman Philippson, The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece & Rome (1911).

405 Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis (Francis W. Kelsey trans., 1925) (1625). Grotius also relied on the Old and New Testaments and on Aristotle and Cicero for a universal perspective. See Cicero, De Re Publica, supra note 403, at 211 (bk. III, XII):

The early history of defining piracy was not, however, linked to universal jurisdiction as it was in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Professor Alfred Rubin has documented this history up to contemporary times in his authoritative review of the subject.[406] Alberigo Gentili[407] and Balthasar de Ayala[408] adopted the universalist view of piracy and its universal punishment by all states because it was dictated by ius gentium. But their application of piracy was essentially in the context of war as the phenomenon was then seen. Grotius, however, whose approach was more pragmatic, saw the problem of dealing with pirates as part of his view of a certain order on the high seas. From a jurisdictional perspective, Grotius, an advocate of the openness of the high seas or mare liberum, posited the principle that ships on the high seas were an extension of the flag state's territoriality. Thus, the flag state could exercise its jurisdiction over non-national ships and persons for acts of piracy. It was not, therefore, an application of universal jurisdiction whereby any and all states could exercise their jurisdiction over any and all pirates. Instead, it could be said that it was the recognition of the universal application of the flag state's jurisdiction in its right to defend against pirates and eventually to pursue them as both a preventive and punitive measure.

The early law of piracy and its jurisdictional applications developed in the national laws and practices of the major seafaring nations between the 1600s and 1800s. Though they developed along separate legal concepts and legal techniques, they were parallel as to their outcomes. The reason is probably their commonality of interests in securing themselves from the perils of piracy. These developments were based on the recognition of the flag state's power to seize and punish pirates who committed that crime as it was defined by national law. This was particularly the case with England and in the early years of the United States of America.[409] As Rubin posits the evolution of the jurisprudence, statutory enactments and the writings of scholars were based on a misunderstanding of the term "piracy."[410] Nevertheless, universal jurisdiction

---

> True law is right reason in agreement with nature; it is of universal application, unchanging and everlasting; it summons to duty by its commands, and averts from wrongdoing by its prohibitions. And it does not lay its commands or prohibitions upon good men in vain, though neither have any effect on the wicked. It is a sin to try to alter this law, nor is it allowable to attempt to repeal any part of it, and it is impossible to abolish it entirely. We cannot be freed from its obligations by senate or people, and we need not look outside ourselves for an expounder or interpreter of it. And there will not be different laws at Rome and at Athens, or different laws now and in the future, but one eternal and unchangeable law will be valid for all nations and all times, and there will be one master and ruler, that is, God, over us all, for he is the author of this law, its promulgator, and its enforcing judge. Whoever is disobedient is fleeing from himself and denying his human nature, and by reason of this very fact he will suffer the worst penalties, even if he escapes what is commonly considered punishment.

Id. See also Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341, at 108 n.71.

406 Rubin, supra note 378.

407 Gentili, De Ivre Bellicis Libri Tres (J.C. Rolfe trans., 1933) (1612). See, e.g., Gentili's work De Jure Belli (1612), reprinted in Classics of International Law (1933); Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, supra note 405. For a brief assessment of these works, see Peter Haggenmacher, Grotius and Gentili: A Reassessment of Thomas E. Holland's Inaugural Lecture, in Hugo Grotius and International Relations ch. 4 (1992) [hereinafter Grotius and International Relations]; G.I.A.D. Draper, Grotius' Place in the Development of Legal Ideas about War, in Grotius and International Relations.

408 Balthazar Ayala, De Ivre et Officiis Bellicis et Disciplina Militari (J.P. Bote trans., 1912) (1581). See Balthazar Ayala, Three Books, on the Law of War, and on the Duties Connected with War, and on Military Discipline 88 (John Pawley Bate trans., 1912) (1597).

409 See Rubin, supra note 378.

410 Id. at 124. He includes in that category Sir William Blackstone, whose Commentaries on the Laws of England (vol. 4, 1769) influenced American law and jurisprudence. The Constitution in Article 1, Section 8, Clause 10 refers to "Piracies," and the Judicature Act of September 24, 1789, An Act to Establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, ch. 20, § 9, 1 Stat. 73, 76–77, gives each of the thirteen original to prevent and suppress piracy has been widely recognized in customary international law as the international crime par excellence to which universality applies.

Positive international law in the twentieth century has clearly established universal jurisdiction for piracy.[411] The 1958 Geneva Convention on the Law of the High Seas[412] includes two provisions on jurisdiction over piracy. Article 18 states:

> A ship or aircraft may retain its nationality, although it has become a pirate ship or aircraft. The retention or loss of nationality is determined by the law of the state from which such nationality was derived.

"district courts" exclusive jurisdiction for such crimes. The first time, however, that piracy was deemed a crime of universal jurisdiction arose under Jay's Treaty of 1794, signed at London November 19, 1794, art. 21, 8 Stat. 116, 12 Bevans 13, 27. Joseph Story, however, did not embrace the universalist view of piracy and slavery in his seminal work, Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws (1834); instead, he argued for the same result from a positivistic perspective. Chief Justice John Marshall, also a positivist, recognized the universal reach of U.S. law whenever the acts of piracy were against a U.S. vessel and U.S. nationals. See United States v. Palmer, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 610 (1818). In United States v. Klintock, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 144 (1820), Chief Justice Marshall wrote:

> [T]he Court is satisfied, that general piracy, or murder, or robbery, committed in the places described in the eighth section [of the act of 1790], by persons on board of a vessel not at the time belonging to the subjects of any foreign power, but in possession of a crew acting in defiance of all law, and acknowledging obedience to no government whatsoever, is within the meaning of this act, and is punishable in the Courts of the United States. Persons of this description are proper objects for the penal code of all nations; and we think that the general words of the Act of Congress applying to all persons whatsoever, though they ought to not be so construed as to extend to persons under the acknowledged authority of a foreign state, ought to be so construed as to comprehend those who acknowledge the authority of no state. Those general terms ought not to be applied to offences committed against the particular sovereignty of a foreign power; but we think they ought to be applied to offences committed against all nations, including the United States, by persons who by common consent are equally amenable to the laws of all nations.

Id. at 152 (emphasis added). The certificate issued by the Supreme Court concludes: "That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, does extend to all persons on board all vessels which throw off their national character by cruising piratically and committing piracy on other vessels." Id. at 153 (emphasis added). The Congress, however, rejected Chief Justice Marshall's interpretation of the Act of 1790 requiring a nexus to the United States, and in 1819 passed a new act explicitly extending jurisdiction to all international acts, irrespective of their link to the United States. See United States v. Hasan, 2010 LEXIS 115746, at *39 (E.D. Va. 2010), cited in Anthony Colangelo, A Unified Approach to Extraterritoriality, 97 Va. L. Rev. 1019, 1063 n 201 (2011). In 1820 the Supreme Court affirmed that the definition of piracy in the Act of 1819 was based on "the law of nations," and effectively removed the requirement of a nexus to the United States. In Smith the court declared that "piracy as an offence, not against its own municipal code, but as an offence against the law of nations, (which is part of the common law) as an offence against the universal law of society, a pirate being deemed an enemy of the human race." United States v. Smith, 18 U.S. 153, 161 (1820). For an overview of the early piracy cases, see Colangelo, supra. In practice, however, all other U.S. cases involving piracy had a "contact" with U.S. law, either because the acts of piracy were committed against a U.S. vessel or against U.S. nationals.

411 This may be due to the fact that piracy has for all practical purposes disappeared as of the nineteenth century, and during the twentieth century there is only one instance that occurred in the Western world. Thus, the international community found it more readily acceptable to recognize universal jurisdiction for piracy. See Thomas Franck, To Define and Punish Piracies; The Lessons of the Santa Maria: A Comment, 36 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 839 (1961). Conversely, there have been many manifestations of piracy in Southeast Asia. See Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Freida Adler, Outlaws of the Ocean (1985).

412 April 25, 1958, 450 U.N.T.S. 82, 1 U.S.T. 2312, T.I.A.S. No. 5200.

Article 19 states:

> On the high seas, or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any state, every state may seize a pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship taken by piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. The courts of the state which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the property, subject to the rights of third states acting in good faith.

This Article clearly establishes universal jurisdiction.

The 1982 Montego Bay Convention on the Law of the Sea[413] reiterated Article 19 of the 1958 Geneva Convention, providing the same text in Article 150, namely:

> On the high seas, or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any State, every State may seize a pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship or aircraft taken by piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the person and seize the property on board. The courts of the State which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed, and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the ships, aircraft or property, subject to the rights of third parties acting in good faith.

Thus, universal jurisdiction for the crime of piracy is firmly established in positive international law.[414]

The question of piracy has increasingly entered discussions at the United Nations and in particular the Security Council. Most notably, in November 2012 the Security Council invoked its Chapter VII powers—which allows it to make a finding of a threat to international peace and security, and therefore impose certain remedies[415]—and adopted a Resolution that, inter alia, "Calls upon all States to criminalize piracy under their domestic law and to favourably consider the prosecution of suspected, and imprisonment of convicted, pirates apprehended off the coast of Somalia, and their facilitators and financiers ashore, consistent with applicable international law including international human rights law."[416] The Security Council also > Reiterates its decision to continue its consideration, as a matter of urgency, of the establishment of specialized anti-piracy courts in Somalia and other States in the region with substantial international participation and/or support, as set forth in resolution 2015 (2011), and the importance of such courts having jurisdiction over not only suspects captured at sea, but also anyone who incites or intentionally facilitates piracy operations, including key figures of criminal networks involved in piracy who illicitly plan, organize, facilitate, or finance and profit from such attacks, and emphasizes the need for strengthened cooperation of States, regional, and international organizations in holding such individuals accountable, and encourages the CGPCS to continue its discussions in this regard."[417]

---

413 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea ("Montego Bay Convention"), October 7, 1982, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.62/122.

414 See also Jacob W.F. Sunderberg, The Crime of Piracy, in 1 International Criminal Law 799 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d ed. 2008).

415 Article 39 of the U.N. Charter provides:

> The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Article 42 of the Charter provides:

> Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

416 S.C. Res 2077, ¶18, U.N. Doc. S/RES/2077 (2012).

417 Id. at 19.

Finally, the Council "Urges States and international organizations to share evidence and information for anti-piracy law enforcement purposes with a view to ensuring effective prosecution of suspected, and imprisonment of convicted, pirates."[418]

Universal jurisdiction for piracy has also been increasingly recognized in domestic Court rulings, especially since the significant growth in piracy off the Horn of Africa.[419] A good example is the 2012 decision in Attorney General v. Mohamud Mohammed Hashi & 8 Others before the Court of Appeal for Kenya, in which the court held that > the offence of piracy on the coast of Somalia, which we are dealing with in this appeal, is of great concern to the international community as it has affected the economic activities and thus the economic well being of many countries including Kenya. All States, not necessarily those affected by it, have therefore a right to exercise universal jurisdiction to punish the offence.[420]

The norm, however, has been for states to avoid prosecutions under the principle of universal jurisdiction. One study found that between 1998 and 2009 there were "1158 cases of pirate attacks cognizable under universal jurisdiction,"[421] with the overall numbers of incidents rising from 210 in 1998 to 406 in 2009.[422] During that span, only China, India, Kenya, and Yemen exercised universal jurisdiction to prosecute individuals accused of piracy,[423] which resulted in seventeen prosecutions, or less than 1.5 percent of the total number of incidents.[424] Even where other states (including France, Germany, Italy, Russia, Spain, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the United States) apprehended individuals suspected of piracy they were transferred to the custody Kenya and Yemen for prosecution,[425] despite the presumptive applicability of universal jurisdiction.

There have been three notable convictions for Somali piracy in U.S. courts, all of which involved attacks on ships flying the U.S. flag.[426] Accordingly, although extraterritorial jurisdiction was exerted over the individuals in these cases, the fact that there was a nexus to the United States eliminates their basis in universal jurisdiction. Nonetheless, the United States has historically shown a willingness to prosecute aggressively for crimes committed against U.S. citizens and U.S. interests abroad.

---

418 Id. at 25.

419 Piracy off the Horn of Africa, especially by Somalis, was prompted by the destruction of fishery stocks by "factory fishing" or "fishing piracy" that forced subsistence fishers into piratical acts, and the effects of the disintegration of the Somali state. See Tullio Treves, Piracy, Law of the Sea, and Use of Force: Developments off the Coast of Somalia, 20 Eur. J. Int. Law 399 (2009); J. Ashley Roach, Countering Piracy off Somalia: International Law and International Institutions, 104 Am. J. Int'l L. 397 (2010); Leticia Diaz & Barry Dubner, Foreign Fishing Piracy vs. Somalia Piracy—Does Wrong Equal Wrong?, 14 Barry L. Rev. 73 (2010); Leticia Diaz & Barry Dubner, On the Evolution of the Law of Sea Piracy: How Property Trumped Human Rights, The Environment and the Sovereign Right of States in the Areas of the Creation and Enforcement of Jurisdiction, 13 Barry L. Rev. 175 (2009).

420 Attorney General v. Mohamud Mohammed Hashi & 8 Others, (2012) E.K.L.R. ¶ 38, H.C. Miscellaneous Appl. No. 434 Of 2009.

421 Eugene Kontorovich & Steven Art, An Empirical Examination of Universal Jurisdiction for Piracy, 104 Am. J. Int'l L. 436, 437 (2010).

422 Id. at 439.

423 Id. at 437.

424 Id. at 444.

425 Id. at 445.

426 See United States v. Said, 680 F.3d 374 (4th Cir. 2012); United States v. Salad, 2012 WL 6097444 (E.D.Va. 2012) (involving an attack on a sailboat flying the U.S. flag); United States v. Hasan, 47 F.Supp.2d 599 (E.D. Va. 2010) (involving an attack on a U.S. naval ship mistaken for a civilian vessel).

The first modern U.S. piracy case based on universal jurisdiction is United States v. Ali Mohamed Ali, which involves several Somalis who are accused of capturing a Bahamian ship and holding it and its Estonian, Georgian, and Russian crew ransom.[427] In that case, which is ongoing, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia relied upon the language of 18 U.S.C. § 1651, which provides that "Whoever, on the high seas, commits the crime of piracy as defined by the law of nations, and is afterwards brought into or found in the United States, shall be imprisoned for life."[428] Accordingly, the Court concluded that > Because there is no nexus between the United States and the conduct charged in the indictment, only the universality theory of extraterritorial jurisdiction is applicable here. And universal jurisdiction prosecutions accord with international law only if the charged conduct falls within the international law definition of the universal jurisdiction crime. Dire, 680 F.3d at 454–55. Therefore, the Court must decide how the law of nations defines piracy.[429]

On that basis, the court held that under international law there was no universal jurisdiction for conspiracy, but that there was for aiding and abetting, thus dismissing the former count while allowing the second to proceed. With regard to the third count, hostage taking, the court determined that it had jurisdiction based not on the alleged act's status as an international crime to which universal jurisdiction applies, but because 18 U.S.C. § 1203 specifically provides for it. In the end, the district court concluded that > the task of adapting eighteenth-century laws to combat the contemporary practice of piracy belongs neither to the Judiciary nor to the Executive. Congress has clearly, and constitutionally, authorized prosecutions for "piracy as defined by the law of nations," 18 U.S.C. § 1651 (emphasis added), and hostage taking, id. § 1203, even when there is no nexus to the United States. Congress has not, however, authorized prosecutions for piracy on the basis of universal jurisdiction that depart from the international law definition of the crime.[430]

The Ali ruling thus confirms the limited applicability of universal jurisdiction for privacy outside of a unique set of charges and facts, although under the ruling the dispositive question is the international law definition of the crime, which may well change especially in light of ongoing definitional changes, including by the Security Council, which has called for the criminalization of the "illicitly plan[ning], organiz[ing], facilitat[ing], or financ[ing] and profit[ing] from such attacks."

7.3.2. Slavery

Slavery has been associated with piracy since 1815, when the Declaration of the Congress of Vienna equated traffic in slavery to piracy. Since then, there has been a gradual development in the positive international law of slavery and slave-related practices based on the same type of universal condemnation that existed with respect to piracy. Nevertheless, universal condemnation, which is evident in twenty-seven conventions on the subject of slavery and slave-related practices from 1815 to 1982, did not, as discussed below, always produce the resulting universality of jurisdiction.[431] There are also forty-seven other conventions elaborated between 1874 and 1996 applicable to this category of crime,[432] which, like piracy, is deemed part of jus cogens.[433]

---

427 United States v. Ali, 2012 WL 2870263 (D.D.C.2012).

428 18 U.S.C. § 1651

429 Id. at *13–14.

430 Ali, 2012 WL 2870263 at *41 (emphasis added).

431 Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 386, at 637–734.

432 Id.

433 Bassiouni, Enslavement as an International Crime, supra note 198.

An analysis of the treaty provisions contained in these conventions reveals that only a few establish universal jurisdiction or allow a state to exercise it.[434] Conventions concerning the suppression of the traffic in women and children, and "white slave traffic"[435] and other slave-related practices do not contain specific provisions on universal jurisdiction, nor does the Forced Labor Convention.[436]

It may be significant that with respect to traffic in slavery on the high seas, universal jurisdiction is more evident in treaty provisions insofar as that traffic has been equated to piracy. In this situation, universal jurisdiction is necessitated by the medium used by traffickers, namely, the high seas, as it is the most effective way to combat such traffic. However, with respect to sexual exploitation of persons, it seems that the conventions have left it to the states to decide what jurisdictional theories they would rely upon. This may be explained in part by the fact that these practices are conducted by means of transiting through the territory of states and that the ultimate stage of such trafficking is exploitation on the territory of a state. As a result, a state could exercise territorial criminal jurisdiction to combat this international crime without the need for universal jurisdiction. This neutral position on universal jurisdiction is expressed in the 1950 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others,[437] which in Article 11 states "nothing in the present Convention shall be interpreted as determining the attitude of a Party towards the general question of the limits of criminal jurisdiction under international law."

---

434 See Treaty for the Suppression of the African Slave Trade, signed at London December 20, 1841, arts. VI, VII, X, and Annex B, pt. 5, 2 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 1) 392. The Convention Relative to the Slave Trade and Importation into Africa of Firearms, Ammunition, and Spiritous Liquors (General Act of Brussels), July 2, 1890, art. 5, 27 Stat. 886, 17 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2) 345, states in Article V:

> The contracting powers pledge themselves, unless this has already been provided for by laws in accordance with the spirit of the present article, to enact or propose to their respective legislative bodies, in the course of one year at the latest from the date of the signing of the present general act, a law rendering applicable, on the one hand, the provisions of their penal laws concerning grave offenses against the person, to the organizers and abettors of slave-hunting, to those guilty of mutilating male adults and children, and to all persons taking part in the capture of slaves by violence; and, on the other hand, the provisions relating to offenses against individual liberty, to carriers and transporters of, and to dealers in, slaves.
>
> Guilty persons who may have escaped from the jurisdiction of the authorities of the country where the crimes or offenses have been committed shall be arrested either on communication of the incriminating evidence by the authorities who have ascertained the violation of the law, or on production of any other proof of guilt by the power in whose territory they may have been discovered, and shall be kept, without other formality, at the disposal of the tribunals competent to try them.

Id. art. 5. See Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, opened for signature at Lake Success, New York, March 21, 1950, art. 11, 96 U.N.T.S. 271 ("Nothing in this Convention shall be interpreted as determining the attitude of a Party towards the general question of the limits of criminal jurisdiction under international law.").

435 International Agreement for the Suppression of the "White Slave Traffic," May 18, 1904, 1 L.N.T.S. 83, 35 Stat. 1979; International Convention for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, May 4, 1910; International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, September 30, 1921, 9 L.N.T.S. 415.

436 Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour (Forced Labour Convention, 1930) June 28, 1930, 39 L.N.T.S. 55; Convention (No. 105) Concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour, June 5, 1957, 320 U.N.T.S. 291.

437 96 U.N.T.S. 271.

Whenever slavery and slave-related practices are committed within the context of an armed conflict, they are subject to international humanitarian law and become a war crime. But in such cases, even though the crime is international and is part of jus cogens, the jurisdictional theory relied upon is usually territoriality.[438]

The provisions contained in all the treaties relevant to slavery and slave-related practices characteristically require the signatory states to take effective measures to prevent and suppress slavery, and also provide specific obligations as to criminalization and punishment, extradition, and mutual legal assistance. All of these provisions can best be characterized as reflecting the concept of aut dedere aut judicare. This is even true with respect to the more recent treaty provisions that link slavery to piracy. For example, the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Law of the High Seas[439] provides in Article 13 that:

> [E]very state shall adopt effective measures to prevent and punish the transport of slaves in ships authorized to fly its flag, and to prevent the unlawful use of its flag for that purpose. Any slave taking refuge on board any ship, whatever its flag, shall ipso facto be free.

The 1982 Montego Bay Convention on the Law of the Sea adopted the identical provision in Article 99.[440]

With respect to slavery as a jus cogens international crime, it is essentially the writings of scholars that have driven the notion that universal criminal jurisdiction extends to all manifestations of this category of international crime.[441]

It should be noted, however, that slavery has not disappeared in the twenty-first century, at least not in the common chattel slavery embodied in the trans-Atlantic slave trade, even though they have been universally condemned for centuries. Modern day slavery or "human trafficking," as it is often referred to, is increasingly common as population flows from the global South to Europe and North America increase, mainly in the forms of refugees seeking sanctuary, economic migrants, and abducted individuals.[442]

The primary characteristics of modern day slavery has been the trafficking of domestic, agricultural, and day laborers from the global South to Europe and North America, as well as the increase in the traffic of women and children for sexual exploitation. As defined by Article 3 of the 2000 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children[443]

---

438 See supra Sec. 7.3.

439 High Seas Convention, supra note 105.

440 Montego Bay Convention, supra note 413.

441 See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement: Slavery, Slave-Related Practices, and Trafficking in Persons for Sexual Exploitation, in 1 International Criminal Law 535 (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 3d. ed. 2008); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enslavement as an International Crime, 23 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L & Pol. 445 (1991).

442 See Kevin Bales, Modern Slavery: The Secret World of 27 Million People (2009); Trafficking in Humans: Social, Cultural and Political Dimensions (Sally Cameron & Edward Newman eds., 2008); E. Benjamin Skinner, A Crime so Monstrous: Face-to-Face with Modern-Day Slavery (2008); Anthony M. DeStefano, The War on Human Trafficking: U.S. Policy Assessed (2007); Enslaved: True Stories of Modern Day Slavery (Jesse Sage & Liora Kasten eds. 2006). See also Niklas Jakobsson & Andreas Kotsadam, The Law and Economics of International Sex Slavery: Prostitution Laws and Trafficking for Sexual Exploitation, 35 Europ. J.L & Econ. 87 (2013); Donna Hughes, Combating Sex Trafficking: A Perpetrator-Focused Approach, 6 U. St. Thomas L.J. 28 (2008–2009); Mark Kappelhoff, Federal Prosecutions of Human Trafficking Cases: Striking a Blow against Modern Day Slavery, 6 U. St. Thomas L.J. 9 (2008–2009); Melanie Wallace, Voiceless Victims: Sex Slavery and Trafficking of African Women in Western Europe, 30 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 569 (2001–2002).

443 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, Nov. 15. 2000, 2273 U.N.T.S. 319, U.N. Doc. A/55/383. See Jakobsson & Kotsadam, supra note 442; Hughes, supra note 442; Wallace, supra note 442.

> "Trafficking in persons" shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.

The problem of human trafficking and modern-day slavery is vast. According to the International Labour Organization (ILO)

> 20.9 million people are victims of forced labour globally, trapped in jobs into which they were coerced or deceived and which they cannot leave. Human trafficking can also be regarded as forced labour, and so this estimate captures the full realm of human trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation, or what some call "modern-day slavery." The data from which the estimate derives cover the study reference period of 2002–2011. The estimate therefore means that some 20.9 million people, or around three out of every 1,000 persons worldwide, were in forced labour at any given point in time over this ten-year period.[444]

The ILO's estimate of 20.9 million victims of forced labor is a conservative one. Of these 20.9 million victims of forced labor

> 18.7 million (90%) are exploited in the private economy, by individuals or enterprises. Out of these, 4.5 million (22% total) are victims of forced sexual exploitation, and 14.2 million (68%) are victims of forced labour exploitation, in economic activities such as agriculture, construction, domestic work and manufacturing. The remaining 2.2 million (10%) are in state-imposed forms of forced labour, for example in prison under conditions which contravene ILO standards on the subject, or in work imposed by the state military or by rebel armed forces.[445]

Although customary international law and the writings of scholars recognize slavery and slave-related practices as a jus cogens international crime, the practice of states has not evidenced the fact that universal criminal jurisdiction has been applied to all forms and manifestations of slavery and slave-related practices.[446] The 2000 Convention on Organized Crime and its two Protocols on human trafficking and human smuggling, as described below, allows for 444 International Labour Organization, ILO Global Estimate of Forced Labour 13 (2012) (internal citations omitted).

---

445 Id.

446 International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women of Full Age, October 11, 1933, 150 L.N.T.S. 431; Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, concluded at Geneva on September 30, 1921, and the Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women of Full Age, concluded at Geneva on October 11, 1933, 53 U.N.T.S. 13; Annex to the Protocol to Amend the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, concluded at Geneva on September 30, 1921, and the Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Women of Full Age, concluded at Geneva on October 11, 1933; International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, concluded at Geneva on September 30, 1921, amended by the Protocol Signed at Lake Success, New York, on November 12, 1947, 53 U.N.T.S. 39; International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women of Full Age concluded at Geneva on October 11, 1933, amended by the Protocol, signed at Lake Success, New York, on November 12, 1947, 53 U.N.T.S. 49; Annex to the Protocol Amending the Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic signed at Paris on May 18, 1904, and the International Convention for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, signed at Paris on May 4, 1910; International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, signed at Paris on May 18, 1904, amended by the Protocol, signed at Lake Success, New York, on May 4, 1949, 92 U.N.T.S. 19, 2 U.S.T. 1997; International Convention for the Suppression of White Slave Traffic, signed at Paris on May 4, 1910, and amended by the Protocol, signed at Lake Success, New York, May 4, 1949, 98 U.N.T.S. 101; Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, March 21, 1950, 96 U.N.T.S. 271; Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institution and Practices the application of universal jurisdiction, but essentially provides for the continuation of existing modes of jurisdiction to combat the practice.

A 2009 report by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) concludes that 79 percent of human trafficking is for sexual purposes, while 18 percent is for forced labor.[447] In that study, the UNODC studied the human trafficking legislation and enforcement in 155 states, and concluded that, as of 2008, 63 percent had passed anti-trafficking laws "addressing the main forms of trafficking"; 16 percent had passed laws covering some aspects of the 2000 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children; and 54 percent had specialized police units on trafficking. According to the UNODC study, of the 155 countries sampled, 91 had prosecuted an individual for human trafficking, 73 had secured a conviction, 47 reported at least 10 convictions a year, with 15 of those countries securing at least 50 convictions a year.[448]

In 2000 two Protocols to the Convention against Transnational Organized Crime were adopted that specifically address human trafficking.[449] The first is the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children,[450] which specifically addresses the above-mentioned issues, and the second is the Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air,[451] which deals specifically with the transport of individuals.

Article 2 of the former Protocol on trafficking describes its purpose as being > (a) To prevent and combat trafficking in persons, paying particular attention to women and children;

>
> (b) To protect and assist the victims of such trafficking, with full respect for their human rights; and
>
> (c) To promote cooperation among States Parties in order to meet those objectives.

The second is intended to "to prevent and combat the smuggling of migrants," although in many cases smuggled migrants and trafficked persons overlap in practice.

It should be noted, however, that the two Protocols do not explicitly require the implementation of universal jurisdiction provisions in the domestic criminal codes of the state-parties. For instance, the Protocol on trafficking provides that:

Similar to Slavery, September 7, 1956, 266 U.N.T.S. 3, 18 U.S.T. 3201. See Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 386.

447 United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, Global Reports on Trafficking in Persons (2009).

448 Id.

449 United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, Nov. 15, 2000, U.N. Doc. A/55/383.

450 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, Nov. 15. 2000, 2273 U.N.T.S. 319, U.N. Doc. A/55/383. See Jakobsson & Kotsadam, supra note 442; Hughes, supra note 442; Wallace, supra note 442.

451 Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, Nov. 15, 2000, 2241 U.N.T.S. 507, U.N. Doc. A/55/383. See Trafficking in Humans, supra note 442; DeStefano, supra note 442. See also Kappelhoff, supra note 442.

Article 6

Criminalization

1. Each State Party shall adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences, when committed intentionally and in order to obtain, directly or indirectly, a financial or other material benefit:

(a) The smuggling of migrants;

(b) When committed for the purpose of enabling the smuggling of migrants:

(i) Producing a fraudulent travel or identity document;

(ii) Procuring, providing, or possessing such a document;

(c) Enabling a person who is not a national or a permanent resident to remain in the State concerned without complying with the necessary requirements for legally remaining in the State by the means mentioned in subparagraph (b) of this paragraph or any other illegal means.

2. Each State Party shall also adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences:

(a) Subject to the basic concepts of its legal system, attempting to commit an offence established in accordance with paragraph 1 of this article;

(b) Participating as an accomplice in an offence established in accordance with paragraph 1 (a), (b) (i) or (c) of this article and, subject to the basic concepts of its legal system, participating as an accomplice in an offence established in accordance with paragraph 1 (b) (ii) of this article;

(c) Organizing or directing other persons to commit an offence established in accordance with paragraph 1 of this article.

3. Each State Party shall adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as aggravating circumstances to the offences established in accordance with paragraph 1 (a), (b) (i) and (c) of this article and, subject to the basic concepts of its legal system, to the offences established in accordance with paragraph 2 (b) and (c) of this article, circumstances:

(a) That endanger, or are likely to endanger, the lives or safety of the migrants concerned; or

(b) That entail inhuman or degrading treatment, including for exploitation, of such migrants.

4. Nothing in this Protocol shall prevent a State Party from taking measures against a person whose conduct constitutes an offence under its domestic law.

Therefore, the Protocol effectively leaves it to states to implement laws based on their existing jurisdictional framework. As is the case with most states, this entails forms of jurisdiction other than universal jurisdiction.

7.3.3. War Crimes

Of all international crimes, the war crimes category has the largest number of instruments that include a wide range of prohibitions and regulations.[452] Many of these instruments specifically embody, codify, or evidence customary international law. The four Geneva Conventions of 1949[453] and their two Additional Protocols[454] are the most comprehensive codifications of prohibitions and regulations, and their provisions include the most specific and wide-ranging penal norms.[455] The so-called "Law of Geneva" overlaps with the so-called "Law of the Hague,"[456] much of the latter having been incorporated into the former. The "Law of Geneva" has become part of the customary law of armed conflicts.[457] The violations of the Geneva Conventions and the so-called "Laws and Customs of War" constitute war crimes and are jus cogens international crimes.

452 Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 386, at 285. See also Yoram Dinstein, The Universality Principle and War Crimes, in The Law of Armed Conflict: Into the Next Millennium 17–37 (Michael N. Schmitt & Leslie C. Green eds., 1998); Willard B. Cowles, Universal Jurisdiction over War Crimes, 33 Cal. L. Rev. 177 (1945).

With respect to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949, the "grave breaches" are contained in Articles 50, 51, 130, and 147, respectively.[458] With respect to Protocol I, "grave breaches" are contained in Article 85.[459]

There are, however, no provisions in these Conventions that specifically refer to universal jurisdiction. One can assume that the penal duty to enforce includes implicitly the right of the state-parties to exercise universal jurisdiction under their national laws. This arises out of the obligation to prevent and repress "grave breaches" and also out of the provisions of Articles 1 and 2, which are common to the four Geneva Conventions, to wit:

> Article 1: The High Contracting Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the present Convention in all circumstances.
>
> Article 2: In addition to the provisions which shall be implemented in peacetime, the present Convention shall apply to all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict which may arise between two or more of the High Contracting Parties, even if the state of war is not recognized by one of them.
>
> The Convention shall also apply to all cases of partial or total occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance.
>
> Although one of the Powers in conflict may not be a party to the present Convention, the Powers who are parties thereto shall remain bound by it in their mutual relations. They shall 453 Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, signed at Geneva August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 31, 6 U.S.T. 3114, T.I.A.S. 3362 [hereinafter First Geneva Convention]; Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, signed at Geneva August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 85, 6 U.S.T. 3217, T.I.A.S. 3363 [hereinafter Second Geneva Convention]; Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, signed at Geneva August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 135, 6 U.S.T. 3316, T.I.A.S. No. 3364 [hereinafter Third Geneva Convention]; Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, signed at Geneva August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 287, 6 U.S.T. 3516, T.I.A.S. No. 3365 [hereinafter Fourth Geneva Convention].

454 Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, opened for signature at Berne December 12, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144, Annex I [hereinafter Protocol I]; Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, opened for signature at Berne December 12, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144, Annex II.

455 Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 386, at 416–445, 457–494.

456 Convention with Respect to the Laws and Customs of War on Land (First Hague, II), signed at The Hague July 29, 1899, 32 Stat. 1803, 26 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2) 949. See A Manual on International Humanitarian Law and Arms Control Agreements (M. Cherif Bassiouni ed., 2000) [hereinafter Bassiouni, Manual on International Humanitarian Law].

457 Bassiouni, ICL Conventions, supra note 386, at 286.

458 First Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 50; Second Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 51; Third Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 130; Fourth Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 147. See in particular Bassiouni, Manual on International Humanitarian Law, supra note 456.

459 Protocol I, supra note 454, art. 85. See also Commentary on the Additional Protocols of June 8, 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949 (Yves Sandoz et al. eds., 1987).

> furthermore be bound by the Convention in relation to the said Power, if the latter accepts and applies the provisions thereof.[460]

Although no convention dealing with the law of armed conflict contains a specific provision on universal jurisdiction, it is nevertheless valid to assume that the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Protocol I provide a sufficient basis for states to apply universality of jurisdiction to prevent and repress the "grave breaches" of the Conventions. But none of the other conventions dealing with the law of armed conflict contain a provision on universal jurisdiction.

Customary international law as reflected in the practice of states does not, so far, in the judgment of this writer, warrant the conclusion that universal jurisdiction has been applied in national prosecutions.[461]

There are a few cases in the practice of states that are relied upon by some scholars to assert the opposite, but such cases are so few and far between that it would be incorrect to conclude that they constitute practice. Nevertheless, it can be argued that customary international law can exist irrespective of state practice if there is strong evidence of opinio juris, which is the case with respect to war crimes.

The recognition of universal jurisdiction for war crimes is essentially driven by academics' and experts' writings, which extend the universal reach of war crimes to the universality of jurisdiction over such crimes. The 1949 Geneva Conventions require state-parties to "respect and ensure respect," while the "grave breaches" provisions of the Conventions and Protocol 1 require enforcement. This has been interpreted by some not only as giving parties the right to adopt national legislation with universal jurisdiction, but also as creating an obligation to do so. Nonetheless, there is some confusion arising out of collective enforcement mechanisms, such as the IMT, IMTFE, ICTY, and ICTR. The IMT and the IMTFE were collective actions based on the inherent powers of the involved states as participants in the respective armed conflicts, and also on the basis of territoriality. The ICTY and the ICTR are forms of collective enforcement derived from the power of the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, but these tribunals' jurisdiction is territorial. In all of these situations criminal jurisdiction is based on territoriality, and with respect to the IMT and IMTFE, it could be said to have also relied on "passive personality." As stated above, the ICC does not have universal jurisdiction though its reach is universal, except insofar as "referrals" from the Security Council to the ICC are based on the theory of universality.[462]

Notwithstanding the above, there is nothing in the Law of Armed Conflict that prohibits national criminal jurisdiction from applying the theory of universality with respect to war crimes. It can even be argued that the general obligations to enforce, which include the specific

---

460 For particular provisions regarding the enacting of legislation by contracting parties for the repression of grave breaches, see First Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 49; Second Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 50; Third Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 129; Fourth Geneva Convention, supra note 453, art. 146.

461 For a discussion of contemporary state practice with respect to war crimes, see infra notes 498–505 and accompanying text.

462 Following WWII, Allied military tribunals referred to the exercise of universality with respect to war crimes and crimes against humanity. See Boed, supra note 364, at 307–308 n.51 (citing Kenneth Randall, Universal Jurisdiction under International Law, 66 Tex. L. Rev. 785, 807–810 (1988) (discussing In re List, 11 Trials War Crim. 757) (U.S. Mil. Trib., Nuremberg 1948); Almelo Trial 1 L. Rep. Trials War Crim. 35 (Brit. Mil. Ct., Almelo 1945); Zyklon B Case, 1 L. Rep. Trials War Crim. 93 (Brit. Mil. Ct., Hamburg 1946); Hadamar Trial, 1 L. Rep. Trials War Crim. 46 (U.S. Mil. Comm'n, Wiesbaden 1945); In re Eisentrager, 14 L. Rep. Trials War Crim. 8 (U.S. Mil. Comm'n, Shanghai 1947)). See also Willard B. Cowles, Trials of War Criminals (Non-Nuremberg), 42 Am. J. Int'l L. 299, 309–313 (1948). But these cases were prosecuted pursuant to Control Council Law No. 10, which gave the four major Allies "sovereignty" over their respective zones of occupation. Thus, the tribunals exercised national jurisdiction.

obligations to prevent and repress "grave breaches" of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Protocol I, allow states to expand their jurisdiction to include the theory of universality.

7.3.4. Crimes against Humanity

The origin of crimes against humanity can be drawn back to the First Hague Convention of 1899 on the Laws and Customs of War and the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907 on the Laws and Customs of War on Land, which make reference to the "laws of humanity" and evidence a nascent concern for human values.[463] Crimes against humanity were first defined in positive international criminal law in Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter as:

> murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war; or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated.[464]

Similarly, Article 5(c) of the IMTFE Charter[465] and Article 2(c) of Control Council Law No. 10[466] provided for the prosecution of crimes against humanity. In prosecutions under all three instruments, however, jurisdiction was territorial in nature, though it can also be argued that it extended to passive personality. Jurisdiction over crimes against humanity as provided for in Article 5 of the ICTY,[467] Article 3 of the ICTR,[468] and Article 7 of the ICC is likewise territorial except with respect to "referrals" to the ICC by the Security Council, in which case the jurisdiction is universal.[469] It should be noted that, as of August 2013, 122 states have ratified the Rome Statute of the ICC, which gives the court territorial jurisdiction over nearly two-thirds of the states of the world for crimes against humanity.

It is also important to note that there is no specialized convention for crimes against humanity.[470] As a result, one cannot say that there is conventional law providing for universal jurisdiction for crimes against humanity.[471] The writing of scholars essentially drives that proposition. To date, fifty-five states have adopted national legislation allowing domestic prosecution of crimes against humanity and, in some cases even when committed outside the state's territory and even when committed by or against non-nationals.[472] But these states have also added some additional jurisdictional links as prerequisites for the exercise of such jurisdiction, as discussed below. As a jus cogens international 463 For a historical overview, see Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341, at ch. 3. See also Proposed International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Humanity (August 2010), http://law.wustl.edu/harris/cah/docs/EnglishTreatyFinal.pdf (last visited Sept. 28, 2012); Forging a Convention for Crimes against Humanity (Leila Nadya Sadat ed., 2011); M. Cherif Bassiouni, "Crimes against Humanity:" The Need for a Specialized Convention, 31 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 457 (1994).

---

464 IMT Charter, supra note 354, art. 6(c).

465 IMTFE Amended Charter, supra note 354, art. 5(c).

466 Allied Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes against Peace and against Humanity, December 20, 1945, Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany, No. 3, Berlin, January 31, 1946, art. 2(c), reprinted in Benjamin B. Ferencz, An International Criminal Court: A Step toward World Peace 488 (1980).

467 ICTY Statute, supra note 354, art. 5.

468 Id., art. 3.

469 See supra notes 436 and 443 and accompanying text.

470 See Bassiouni, "Crimes against Humanity," supra note 437.

471 For a discussion of contemporary state practice with respect to crimes against humanity, see infra notes 498–503 and accompanying text.

472 Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Application and Contemporary Application, supra note 341, at 660–664.

crime, crimes against humanity are presumed to carry the obligation to prosecute or extradite, and to allow states to rely on universality for prosecution, punishment, and extradition.

7.3.5. Genocide

The jus cogens crime of genocide did not exist before the 1948 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.[473] In fact, genocide was assumed to be the successor of crimes against humanity, but its scope is in effect narrower. Article VI of the Convention states:

> Persons charged with genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction.[474]

It is clear from the plain meaning and language of this provision that jurisdiction is territorial, and that only if an "international penal tribunal" is established and only if state parties to the Genocide Convention are also state-parties to the convention establishing an "international penal tribunal" can the latter court have universal jurisdiction.[475] However, such universal jurisdiction will be dependent upon the statute of that "international penal tribunal," if or when established.

Since the adoption of the Genocide Convention, two international ad hoc criminal tribunals were established, namely the ICTY[476] and the ICTR,[477] in 1993 and 1994, respectively. In 1998, the Rome Statute for the ICC was opened for signature.[478] All three statutes contain a provision making genocide a crime within the jurisdiction of the court. But that, in itself, does not give these tribunals universal jurisdiction.

Article IV of the ICTY,[479] and Article II of the ICTR define genocide in much the same way as Articles II and III of the Genocide Convention.[480] The jurisdiction of both tribunals is territorial. Their competence extends only to crimes committed within the territory of the former Republic of Yugoslavia and Rwanda, respectively. As for the ICC, Article 6 defines "genocide" in almost the same terms as Article II of the Genocide Convention.[481] The jurisdiction of the ICC, as stated above, is essentially territorial as to the parties, though the parties can refer cases to the ICC for crimes that did not occur on their territory, and are obligated to surrender persons within their territory, whether nationals or non-nationals. Thus, while the reach of the ICC is universal as to "referral" by state-parties under Article 14 and non–state-parties under Article 12(3), "referrals" by the Security Council have a universal scope and also represent a theory of universal jurisdiction.

Notwithstanding the fact that Article VI of the Genocide Convention hardly justifies the contention that it reflects the theory of the universality of jurisdiction,[482] commentators argue 473 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, December 9, 1948, 78 U.N.T.S. 277 [hereinafter Genocide Convention] (emphasis added).

---

474 Id. at art. 6 (emphasis added).

475 Cf. John F. Murphy, International Crimes, in 2 United Nations Legal Order 993, 1010 (Oscar Schachter & Christopher C. Joyner eds., 1995) ("[T]he Convention does not create a system of universal jurisdiction.").

476 See ICTY Statute, supra note 354.

477 See id.

478 See ICC Statute, supra note 388. The Statute of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia also contains a provision for the prosecution of Genocide.

479 See ICTY Statute, supra note 354, at art. 4.

480 Id. at art. 2.

481 ICC Statute, supra note 388, at art 6.

482 See Schabas, supra note 341, at 353–378. See also Matthew Lippman, Genocide, in Bassiouni, 1 ICL 403, supra note 1.

consistently that customary international law has recognized universality of jurisdiction for genocide even though there is no state practice to support that argument. As Professor Meron states, "[I]t is increasingly recognized by leading commentators that the crime of genocide (despite the absence of a provision on universal jurisdiction in the Genocide Convention) may also be cause for prosecution by any state."[483]

Notwithstanding the absence of support in conventional international law and in the practice of states[484] for the unqualified assertion that genocide ipso facto allows universal jurisdiction, the ICTY's Appeals Chamber in the Tadić case, in connection with genocide, stated that "universal jurisdiction [is] nowadays acknowledged in the case of international crimes."[485] Similarly, the ICTR held in the case of Prosecutor v. Ntuyahaga that universal jurisdiction exists for the crime of genocide.[486]

7.3.6. Apartheid

The crime of apartheid did not come into existence until 1973 when the United Nations adopted the Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid.[487] The Convention provides in Article IV, in pertinent part, as follows:

The States Parties to the present Convention undertake:

> (b) To adopt legislative, judicial and administrative measures to prosecute, bring to trial and punish in accordance with their jurisdiction persons responsible for, or accused of, the acts defined in article II of the present Convention, whether or not such persons reside in the territory of the State in which the acts are committed or are nationals of that State or of some other State or are stateless persons.[488]

Article V of the Convention states:

> Persons charged with the acts enumerated in article II of the present Convention may be tried by a competent tribunal of any State Party to the Convention which may acquire jurisdiction over the person of the accused or by an international penal tribunal having jurisdiction with respect to those State Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction.[489]

---

483 Theodor Meron, International Criminalization of Internal Atrocities, 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 554, 570 (1995). But see Christopher C. Joyner, Arresting Impunity: The Case for Universal Jurisdiction in Bringing War Criminals to Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 153, 159–160 (1996); Jordan J. Paust, Congress and Genocide: They're Not Going to Get Away with It, 11 Mich. J. Int'l L. 90, 91–92 (1989); Randall, supra note 462, at 837. These and other authors, including this writer, have consistently asserted that universal jurisdiction applies to genocide as a jus cogens international crime. See Bassiouni, International Crimes: Jus Cogens and Obligatio Erga Omnes, supra note 399. It is because of scholars' influence that the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States explains: "Universal jurisdiction to punish genocide is widely accepted as a principle of customary law." Restatement (Third), supra note 3, at § 403, Reporters' Note 1.

484 For a discussion of contemporary state practice with respect to genocide, see Sec. 7.3.5.

485 Prosecutor v. Tadic, Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, par. 62 (Oct. 2, 1995).

486 Prosecutor v. Ntuyahaga, Case No. ICTR-90-40-T, Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to Withdraw the Indictment (Mar. 18, 1999).

487 G.A. Res. 3068 (XXVIII), U.N. GAOR, 28th Sess., Supp. No. 30, at 75, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1973) [hereinafter Apartheid Convention]. See Roger S. Clark, Apartheid, in Bassiouni, 1 ICL 599,supra note 1. A draft statute was prepared by this author in 1979.

488 Apartheid Convention, supra note 487, at art. 4.

489 Id. art. 5.

There is clearly a departure in the text of these two articles from the jurisdictional provision contained in the Genocide Convention,[490] as Articles IV and V of the Apartheid Convention provide unambiguously for universal jurisdiction.[491] However, it seems that after the demise of the apartheid regime in South Africa, and the lack of prosecutions for apartheid under this convention by the new regime, the Convention may have fallen into desuetude. For the Convention to have any future validity, it should be amended to apply to apartheid-like practices.

7.3.7. Torture

Torture was established as an offense in conventional international law in 1984 in the CAT.[492] Article 5 of the Convention provides:

> 1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences referred to in article 4 in the following cases:
>
> (a) When the offences are committed in any territory under its jurisdiction or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;
>
> (b) When the alleged offender is a national of that State;
>
> (c) When the victim is a national of that State if that State considers it appropriate.
>
> 2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over such offences in cases where the alleged offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction and it does not extradite him pursuant to article 8 to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1 of this article.
>
> 3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law.[493]

The premise of the enforcement scheme in this Convention is the concept aut dedere aut judicare.[494] Throughout the Convention there are several references to the jurisdiction of the enforcing state, and Article 7.1 of the Convention states:

> The State Party in the territory under whose jurisdiction a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is found shall in the cases contemplated in article 5, if it does not extradite him, submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution.[495]

---

490 See supra note 464 and accompanying text.

491 It should also be noted that 108 states have ratified the Apartheid Convention, which is significantly less than the 193 member states of the United Nations. See Study on Ways and Means of Insuring the Implementation of International Instruments such as the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, Including the Establishment of the International Jurisdiction Envisaged by the Convention, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1426 (1981); M. Cherif Bassiouni & Daniel Derby, Final Report on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court for the Implementation of the Apartheid Convention and Other Relevant International Instruments, 9 Hofstra L. Rev. 523 (1981).

492 Convention against Torture, supra note 317. See Daniel H. Derby, The International Prohibition of Torture, in Bassiouni, 1 ICL 621, supra note 1; J. Herman Burgers & Hans Danelius, The United Nations Convention against Torture: A Handbook on the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1988).

493 Convention against Torture, supra note 317, at art. 5.

494 See Bassiouni & Wise, Aut Dedere Aut Judicare, supra note 286.

495 Convention against Torture, supra note 317, at art. 7.1.

But Article 7.1 is more a reflection of aut dedere aut judicare than it is of universal jurisdiction.[496] It establishes the duty to extradite, and only in the event that a person is not extradited is a state obligated to prosecute, by implication, in reliance on universal jurisdiction.

In the cause célèbre case In re Pinochet, which reached the House of Lords, there was indeed reference to genocide and other international crimes. In the rehearing there was also a reference to universal jurisdiction as a concomitant to international crimes:

> That international law crimes should be tried before international tribunals or in the perpetrator's own state is one thing; that they should be impleaded without regard to a long-established customary international law rule in the Courts of other states is another. It is significant that in respect of serious breaches of "intransgressible principles of international customary law" when tribunals have been set up it is with carefully defined powers and jurisdiction as accorded by the states involved; that the Genocide convention provides only for jurisdiction before an international tribunal of the Courts of the state where the crime is committed, that the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court lays down jurisdiction for crimes in very specific terms but limits its jurisdiction to future acts.[497]

Notwithstanding this dicta, the issue was whether the courts of the United Kingdom were competent to decide on the extradition request of Spain for the criminal charge of torture, and whether extradition should be granted in accordance with the treaty obligation of the United Kingdom toward Spain and in accordance with U.K. law. The United Kingdom is bound by the CAT and is obligated thereunder to prosecute or extradite. Spain, also a state party to the CAT, sought extradition for torture, relying on its passive personality jurisdiction because its nationals were the victims of the alleged crimes of torture. Thus the Pinochet case, in the opinion of this writer, does not stand for the proposition of universal jurisdiction, nor for that matter is the extradition request from Spain for torture based on universal jurisdiction. The Torture Convention, however, does implicitly allow for universal jurisdiction.

In 2002 the General Assembly approved the text of an Optional Protocol to the CAT to establish a mechanism for "regular visits undertaken by independent international and national bodies to places where people are deprived of their liberty." The Optional Protocol is monitored by a Sub-Committee on Prevention. In addition, state-parties are required to establish domestic mechanisms to ensure the prevention of torture of those held in detention.[498]

7.3.8. Other International Crimes to Which Universal Jurisdiction Applies

There are several international crimes that have not yet risen to the level of jus cogens but whose founding instruments explicitly or implicitly provide for universal jurisdiction. The 1963 Hijacking Convention provides in Article III(3): "This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law."[499] It therefore implicitly allows 496 See Rosalyn Higgins, Problems and Process: International Law and How We Use It 64–65 (1994).

---

497 R. v. Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate and others, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte, [1998] 4 All ER 897, [1998] 3 W.L.R. 1456 (H.L.). See Reed Brody & Michael Ratner, The Pinochet Papers: The Case of Augusto Pinochet in Spain and Britain; Human Rights Watch, supra note 340; When Tyrants Tremble: The Pinochet Case (Human Rights Watch). See also The Prosecution of Hissène Habré-An "African Pinochet," in Human Rights Watch, supra note 340, at 11–12.

498 Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, G.A. res. A/RES/57/199, adopted Dec. 18, 2002.

499 Convention on Offences and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft (Tokyo Hijacking Convention), signed at Tokyo September 14, 1963, art. 3(3), 704 U.N.T.S. 219, 20 U.S.T. 2941.

national legislation to provide for universal jurisdiction. Similarly, the 1970 Hague Hijacking Convention states in Article IV(3): "This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law."[500] Article VII further provides:

> The Contracting State in the territory of which the alleged offender is found shall, if it does not extradite him, be obliged, without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence was committed in its territory, to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. Those authorities shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State.[501]

The 1971 Montreal Hijacking Convention states in Article V(3): "This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law."[502] In addition, the 1988 Montreal Convention on Hijacking provides in Article III:

In Article 5 of the Convention, the following shall be added as paragraph 2 bis:

> 2 bis. Each Contracting State shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences mentioned in Article 1, paragraph 1 bis, and in Article 1, paragraph 2, in so far as that paragraph relates to those offences, in the case where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him pursuant to Article 8 to the State mentioned in paragraph 1(a) of this Article.[503]

All the treaty provisions mentioned above implicitly allow for universal jurisdiction if national legislation provides for it. The following treaty provisions make it more explicit.

The 1988 Convention on the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation states in Article 7(4, 5):

> 4. The rights referred to in paragraph 3 shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and regulations of the State in the territory of which the offender or the alleged offender is present, subject to the proviso that the said laws and regulations must enable full effect to be given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under paragraph 3 are intended.
>
> 5. When a State Party, pursuant to this article, has taken a person into custody, it shall immediately notify the States which have established jurisdiction in accordance with article 6, paragraph 1 and, if it considers it advisable, any other interested States, of the fact that such person is in custody and of the circumstances which warrant his detention. The State which makes the preliminary enquiry contemplated in paragraph 2 of this article shall promptly report its findings to the said States and shall indicate whether it intends to exercise jurisdiction.[504]

Article X(1) of this Convention further provides as follows:

> 1. The State Party in the territory of which the offender or the alleged offender is found shall, in cases to which article 6 applies, if it does not extradite him be obliged, without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence was committed in its territory, to submit the case without delay to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, through proceedings

---

500 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft (Hague Hijacking Convention), signed at The Hague December 16, 1970, art. 4(3), 860 U.N.T.S. 105, 22 U.S.T. 1641.

501 Id. at art. 7.

502 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation (Montreal Hijacking Convention), signed at Montreal September 23, 1971, art. 5(3), 974 U.N.T.S. 177, 24 U.S.T. 564.

503 Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation, done at Montreal, adopted by the International Civil Aviation Organization, February 24, 1988, art. 3, 27 I.L.M. 627.

504 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, done at Rome March 10, 1988, art. 7(4, 5), 27 I.L.M. 668.

in accordance with the laws of that State. Those authorities shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any other offence of a grave nature under the law of that State.[505]

The 1988 Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf provides in Article III:

1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 2 when the offence is committed:

(a) against or on board a fixed platform while it is located on the continental shelf of that State; or

(b) by a national of that State.

2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such offence when:

(a) it is committed by a stateless person whose habitual residence is in that State;

(b) during its commission a national of that State is seized, threatened, injured or killed; or

(c) it is committed in an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act.

3. Any State Party which has established jurisdiction mentioned in paragraph 2 shall notify the Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organization (hereinafter referred to as "the Secretary-General"). If such State Party subsequently rescinds that jurisdiction, it shall notify the Secretary-General.

4. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 2 in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him to any of the States Parties which have established their jurisdiction in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article.

5. This Protocol does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.[506]

The 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents states in Article III:

1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the crimes set forth in article 2 in the following cases:

(a) when the crime is committed in the territory of that State or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;

(b) when the alleged offender is a national of that State;

(c) when the crime is committed against an internationally protected person as defined in article 1 who enjoys his status as such by virtue of functions which he exercises on behalf of that State.

2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over these crimes in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him pursuant to article 8 to any of the states mentioned in paragraph 1 of this article.

3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law.[507]

505 Id. at art. 10(1).

506 Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf, done at Rome March 10, 1988, art. 3, 27 I.L.M. 685.

507 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents (New York Convention), opened for signature at New York December 14, 1973, art. 3, 1035 U.N.T.S. 167, 28 U.S.T. 1975.

The 1979 Convention Against the Taking of Hostages states in Article V:

> 1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over any of the offences set forth in article 1 which are committed:
>
> (a) in its territory or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;
>
> (b) by any of its nationals or, if that State considers it appropriate, by those stateless persons who have their habitual residence in its territory;
>
> (c) in order to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act; or
>
> (d) with respect to a hostage who is a national of that State, if that State considers it appropriate.
>
> 2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 1 in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1 of this article.
>
> 3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law.[508]

The 1994 Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel takes the same jurisdictional approach of the Convention on Internationally Protected Persons. Article X of the United Nations Personnel Convention states:

> 1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the crimes set out in article 9 in the following cases:
>
> (a) When the crime is committed in the territory of that State or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;
>
> (b) When the alleged offender is a national of that State.
>
> 2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such crime when it is committed:
>
> (a) By a stateless person whose habitual residence is in that State;
>
> (b) With respect to a national of that State; or
>
> (c) In an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act.
>
> 3. Any State Party which has established jurisdiction as mentioned in paragraph 2 shall notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations. If such State Party subsequently rescinds that jurisdiction, it shall notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations.
>
> 4. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the crimes set out in article 9 in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite such person pursuant to article 15 to any of the States Parties which have established their jurisdiction in accordance with paragraph 1 or 2.
>
> 5. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.[509]

The 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs provides in Article 36(4) that "[n]othing contained in this article shall affect the principle that the offences to which it refers shall be defined, prosecuted and punished in conformity with the domestic law of a Party."[510] Article 508 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, concluded at New York December 17, 1979, art. 5, 18 I.L.M. 1456.

---

509 Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, opened for signature at New York December 15, 1994, art. 10, U.N. Doc. A/49/742 (1994).

510 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs (Single Convention), signed at New York March 30, 1961, art. 36(4), 18 U.S.T. 1407, referenced in 14 I.L.M. 302. For an amendment to Article 36, see Article 14 of

22(5) of the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances employs identical language to the 1961 Single Convention.[511] The 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property explicitly provides for universality in Article 28: "The High Contracting Parties undertake to take, within the framework of their ordinary criminal jurisdiction, all necessary steps to prosecute and impose penal or disciplinary sanctions upon those persons, of whatever nationality, who commit or order to be committed a breach of the present Convention."[512] The 1970 UNESCO Cultural Convention states in Article 12: "The States Parties to this Convention shall respect the cultural heritage within the territories for the international relations of which they are responsible and shall take all appropriate measures to prohibit and prevent the illicit import, export and transfer of ownership of cultural property in such territories."[513]

The 1923 Convention on Obscene Materials provides in Article II:

> Persons who have committed an offence falling under Article 1 shall be amenable to the Courts of the Contracting Party in whose territories the offence, or any of the constitutive elements of the offence, was committed. They shall also be amenable, when the laws of the country shall permit it, to the Courts of the Contracting Party whose nationals they are, if they are found in its territories, even if the constitutive elements of the offence were committed outside such territories.
>
> Each Contracting Party shall, however, have the right to apply the maxim non bis in idem in accordance with the rules laid down in its legislation.[514]

The 1929 Convention on the Suppression of Counterfeiting states in Article 17: "The participation of a High Contracting Party in the present Convention shall not be interpreted as affecting that Party's attitude on the general question of criminal jurisdiction as a question of international law."[515]

The 1884 Submarine Cables Convention provides in Articles 1, 8, and 9 as follows:

> Article 1: The present Convention shall be applicable, outside of the territorial waters, to all legally established submarine cables landed in the territories, colonies or possessions of one or more of the High Contracting Parties.
>
> Article 8: The court competent to take cognizance of infractions of this Convention shall be those of the country to which the vessel on board of which the infraction has been committed belongs. It is, moreover, understood that, in cases in which the provision contained in the foregoing paragraph cannot be carried out, the repression of violations of this Convention shall take place, in each of the contracting States, in the case of its subjects or citizens, in accordance the Protocol Amending the Single Convention on Narcotics Drugs, 1961, signed at Geneva March 25, 1972, 976 U.N.T.S. 3, 26 U.S.T. 1430.

---

511 Convention on Psychotropic Substances (Psychotropic Convention), signed at Vienna February 21, 1971, art. 22(5), 1019 U.N.T.S. 175, T.I.A.S. No. 9725. See also id. at art. 27 (regarding territorial application).

512 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict, signed at the Hague May 14, 1954, art. 28, 249 U.N.T.S. 240.

513 Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property (UNESCO Cultural Convention), signed at Paris November 14, 1970, art. 12, 823 U.N.T.S. 231.

514 International Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of and Traffic in Obscene Publications, opened for signature at Geneva September 12, 1923, art. 2, 27 L.N.T.S. 213, 7 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 3) 266. See also International Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of and Traffic in Obscene Publications, signed at Geneva September 12, 1923, amended by the Protocol, signed at Lake Success, New York November 12, 1947, art. 2, 46 U.N.T.S. 169.

515 International Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, signed at Geneva April 20, 1929, art. 17, 112 L.N.T.S. 371.

with the general rules of penal competence established by the special laws of those States, or by international treaties.

Article 9: Prosecutions on account of the infractions contemplated in articles 2, 5 and 6 of this Convention, shall be instituted by the State or in its name.[516]

The Mercenaries Convention states in Article 9(2, 3):

2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in articles 2, 3, and 4 of the present Convention in cases where the alleged offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1 of this article.

3. The present Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.[517]

The Inter-American Convention of Forced Disappearance of Persons sets forth the doctrine of aut dedere aut judicare in Article 4, while Article 6 provides for qualified universal jurisdiction by implication:

When a State Party does not grant the extradition, the case shall be submitted to its competent authorities as if the offense had been committed within its jurisdiction, for the purposes of investigation and when appropriate, for criminal action, in accordance with its national law. Any decision adopted by these authorities shall be communicated to the state that has requested the extradition.[518]

Article 6.1 of the Draft International Convention on the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance states:

1. Forced disappearance and the other acts referred to in article 2 of this Convention shall be considered as offences in every State Party. Consequently, each State Party shall take the necessary measures to establish jurisdiction in the following instances: (a) When the offence of forced disappearance was committed within any territory under its jurisdiction; (b) When the alleged perpetrator or the other alleged participants in the offence of forced disappearance or the other acts referred to in article 2 of this Convention are in the territory of the State Party, irrespective of the nationality of the alleged perpetrator or the other alleged participants, or of the nationality of the disappeared person, or of the place or territory where the offence took place unless the State extradites them or transfers them to an international criminal tribunal.[519]

The International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism states in Article 7:

1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 2 when:

(a) The offence is committed in the territory of that State;

(b) The offence is committed on board a vessel flying the flag of that State or an aircraft registered under the laws of that State at the time the offence is committed;

(c) The offence is committed by a national of that State.

---

516 Convention for the Protection of Submarine Cables, signed at Paris March 14, 1884, arts. 1, 8, 9, 24 Stat. 989, 11 Martens Nouveau Recueil (ser. 2) 281.

517 International Convention Against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries, adopted at New York December 4, 1989, art. 9(2, 3), 29 I.L.M. 89.

518 Inter-American Convention of Forced Disappearance of Persons, adopted at Belem Do Para, Brazil June 9, 1994, art. 6, available at http://oas.org/juridico/english/Sigs/a-60.html.

519 Draft International Convention on the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance, August 19, 1998, art. 6.1, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1998/19, Annex.

2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such offence when:

(a) The offence was directed towards or resulted in the carrying out of an offence referred to in article 2, paragraph 1, subparagraph (a) or (b), in the territory of or against a national of that State;

(b) The offence was directed towards or resulted in the carrying out of an offence referred to in article 2, paragraph 1, subparagraph (a) or (b), against a State or government facility of that State abroad, including diplomatic or consular premises of that State;

(c) The offence was directed towards or resulted in an offence referred to in article 2, paragraph 1, subparagraph (a) or (b), committed in an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act;

(d) The offence is committed by a stateless person who has his or her habitual residence in the territory of that State;

(e) The offence is committed on board an aircraft which is operated by the Government of that State.[520]

The International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism similarly states in Article 9 that:

1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 2 when:

(a) The offence is committed in the territory of that State; or

(b) The offence is committed on board a vessel flying the flag of that State or an aircraft which is registered under the laws of that State at the time the offence is committed; or

(c) The offence is committed by a national of that State.

2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such offence when:

(a) The offence is committed against a national of that State; or

(b) The offence is committed against a State or government facility of that State abroad, including an embassy or other diplomatic or consular premises of that State; or

(c) The offence is committed by a stateless person who has his or her habitual residence in the territory of that State; or

(d) The offence is committed in an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act; or

(e) The offence is committed on board an aircraft which is operated by the Government of that State.[521]

The Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material provides in Article 8 that:

1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 7 in the following cases;

a. when the offence is committed in the territory of that State or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State;

b. when the alleged offender is a national of that State.

520 International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism, art. 7, Dec. 9, 1999, U.N. Doc A/54/49.

521 International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, art 9, April 13, 2005, 2445 U.N.T.S. 89.

> 2. Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over these offences in cases where the alleged offender is presented in its territory and it does not extradite him pursuant to article 11 to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1.
>
> 3. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.
>
> 4. In addition to the States Parties mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2, each State Party may, consistent with international law, establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in article 7 when it is involved in international nuclear transport as the exporting or importing State.[522]

The European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism provides in Article 6 that:

> 1. Each Contracting State shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over an offence mentioned in Article 1 in the case where the suspected offender is present in its territory and it does not extradite him after receiving a request for extradition from a Contracting State whose jurisdiction is based on a rule of jurisdiction existing equally in the law of the requested State.
>
> 2. This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law.[523]

The International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings states in Article 6 that:

> 1. Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences set forth in Article 2 when:
>
> (a) The offence is committed in the territory of that State; or
>
> (b) The offence is committed on board a vessel flying the flag of that State or an aircraft which is registered under the laws of that State at the time the offence is committed; or
>
> (c) The offence is committed by a national of that State.
>
> 2. A State Party may also establish its jurisdiction over any such offence when:
>
> (a) The offence is committed against a national of that State; or
>
> (b) The offence is committed against a State or government facility of that State abroad, including an embassy or other diplomatic or consular premises of that State; or
>
> (c) The offence is committed by a stateless person who has his or her habitual residence in the territory of that State; or
>
> (d) The offence is committed in an attempt to compel that State to do or abstain from doing any act; or
>
> (e) The offence is committed on board an aircraft which is operated by the Government of that State.[524]

The Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism provides in Article 10 for the transfer of persons in custody, stating that:

> 1. A person who is being detained or is serving a sentence in the territory of one state party and whose presence in another state party is requested for purposes of identification, testimony, or otherwise providing assistance in obtaining evidence for the investigation or prosecution of

---

522 Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, March 3, 1980, Art. 8, 1456 UNTS 24631.

523 European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Jan. 27, 1977, Art. 6, 1137 U.N.T.S. 17828.

524 International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, Art. 6, Dec. 15, 1997, 2149 U.N.T.S 256.

offenses established in the international instruments listed in Article 2 may be transferred if the following conditions are met:

a. The person freely gives his or her informed consent; and

b. Both states agree, subject to such conditions as those states may deem appropriate.[525]

The Convention on the High Seas provides in Article 19 that:

On the high seas, or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any State, every State may seize a pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship taken by piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. The courts of the State which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed, and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the ships, aircraft or property, subject to the rights of third parties acting in good faith.[526]

The Regional Convention on Suppression of Terrorism (Inter-Asian) provides in Articles 4 and 5:

Article IV

A contracting State in whose territory a person suspected of having committed an offence referred to in Article I or agreed to in terms of Article II is found and which has received a request for extradition from another Contracting State, shall, if it does not extradite that person, submit the case without exception and without delay, to its competent authorities shall take their decisions in the same manner as in the case of any offence of a serious nature under the law of the State.

Article V

For the purpose of Article IV, each Contracting State may take such measures as it deems appropriate, consistent with its national laws, subject to reciprocity, to exercise its jurisdiction in the case of an offence under Article I or agreed to in terms of Article II.[527]

Most of the conventions cited above relate to what is commonly termed "terrorism" and international drug trafficking, which are usually crimes committed by individuals and small groups, and are not usually state-sponsored. Consequently, it is easier for states to recognize and apply the theory of universality and other enforcement modalities to these types of actors than to do so with respect to those who carry out state policy. This explains why, notwithstanding the extensive harm caused by genocide and crimes against humanity, states have been reluctant to have the same enforcement obligations apply as they have provided, for example, with respect to "terrorism" and international drug trafficking. It is this writer's contention that for obvious, self-serving political reasons, international criminal law conventions whose subjects are those persons engaging in state action or carrying out state policy contain less effective enforcement mechanisms than other similar international conventions.[528]

7.4. Contemporary Practice before International Criminal Tribunals

International criminal tribunals do not necessarily exercise universal jurisdiction despite their international character. In most cases their jurisdiction is limited to more conventional jurisdictional theories, primarily based on the territoriality and nationality principles. For instance, the ICTY and ICTR have jurisdiction only over crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, respectively, although the authority conferred by the Security Council grants

525 Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism, Art. 10, June 3, 2002, OAS Treaty A-66, 42 I.L.M. 19.

526 Convention on the High Seas, Art. 19, April 29, 1958, 450 U.N.T.S. 11.

527 Regional Convention on Suppression of Terrorism, arts. 4 and 5, Nov. 4, 1987.

528 See Bassiouni, Sources, supra note 382, at 27–31.

certain universal characteristics to their practice, for instance concerning the issuing of arrest warrants.[529] The Mixed-Model tribunals, such as the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon are domestic tribunals exercising territorial jurisdiction but with an internationalized subject matter, and do not exercise universal jurisdiction.

The ICC, which after the expected closure of the ICTY and ICTR in December 2014 will be the only international tribunal, exercises universal jurisdiction in particular situations, namely when the Security Council refers a matter to the Court on the basis of Article 13(b). The Court does not exercise universal jurisdiction when acting pursuant to Articles 14 and 15, concerning state referrals and the prosecutor's propio mutu jurisdiction, respectively.[530] This issue was described by this writer in The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court as follows:

> Jurisdiction of the ICC is based on the principles of territoriality and nationality with respect to states parties and non-states parties, and on the theory of universality with respect to the SC. The reach of the Court's jurisdiction is universal, because it extends to states parties and to non-states parties, irrespective of where the crimes was committed.
>
> Before the Court can exercise jurisdiction in connection with a crime, the alleged crime must have been committed on the territory of state party, or by one of its nationals on any other territory [Article 12(2)]. In addition, the ICC may exercise its jurisdiction when a non-state party consents to the Court's jurisdiction, and the crimes has been committed on that state's territory, or the accused is one of its nationals [Article 12(3)]. The Court can also exercise its jurisdiction over a national of a non-state party if the latter committed a crime on the territory of a state party, or against ne of its citizens provided it is on the territory of a state party, and the state party refers the condition to the ICC.
>
> It is clearly established in international criminal law that whenever a crimes is committed on the territory of a given state, that state can prosecute or extradite the perpetrator, even when that person is a non-national. Because of that principle, a state may extradite a non-national to another state for prosecution. Thus, every state has the right, in accordance with its constitutional and other legal norms, to transfer jurisdiction to another state that has jurisdiction over an accused, or to international adjudicating body. Such international transfer is an entirely valid exercise of national sovereignty, but it must be done in accordance with international human rights norms. Thus, the ICC does not provide for anything more than already exists in customary practice of states with respect to the prosecution of a non-state party national who commits a crime on the territory of a state party.
>
> Since the ICC is complementary to national criminal jurisdiction, a state party's surrender of an individual to the ICC's jurisdiction pursuant to the Treaty does not detract from its national sovereignty or infringe upon the national sovereignty of another state, such as the state of nationality of the perpetrator or the victim. It also does not violate the rights of the individual whose

529 See Ch. I.

530 Therefore, the cases against al-Bashir and Qadhafi qualify as universal jurisdiction cases, whereas the case against Laurent Gbagbo, the former president of Côte d'Ivoire, does not as the successor government of Alassane Ouattara referred the matter to the Court, triggering jurisdiction under Article 14.

Other high profile cases the Mixed-Model tribunals have prosecuted involve former heads of state, namely Khieu Samphan, the nominal head of state of Democratic Kampuchea, who now stands trial before the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, and Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president who was convicted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone in 2012. These Mixed-Model Tribunals do not formally apply universal jurisdiction, as they are legally national courts that have a formal arrangement with the United Nations. As such, they are employing territorial jurisdiction for the crimes, even though the United Nations in involved.

> prosecution is transferred to a competent criminal jurisdiction in accordance with international human rights law norms. The same rationale applies to non-state parties who refer a situation to the Court pursuant to Article 12(3).[531]

In addition to the concept of territoriality, the ICC can also exercise its jurisdiction on a universal basis whenever the Security Council refers a situation to it. However, Article 98 of the Statute raises another jurisdictional issue pertaining to priority based on obligations arising out of other treaty obligations by the state-parties. The provision raises the question as to whether a state-party can or should defer jurisdiction to another state instead of the ICC.

Article 98, which is mentioned in the excerpt above, provides that

> 1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.
>
> 2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender.[532]

Presumably, this language applies to Status of Forces Agreements and to diplomats covered by the Vienna Conventions on Diplomatic Relations and Consular Relations.[533]

Thus, pursuant to Article 98, a head of state, diplomat, or other official covered by immunity under a treaty or pursuant to customary international law could invoke procedural immunity and prevent his/her surrender to the ICC.[534] Article 98, although not intended as such, has become a mechanism for states to avoid their responsibilities by effectively creating an international obligation that triggers the provisions of Article 98. The United States, for instance, has concluded numerous "Article 98 agreements" since the signing of the Rome Statute with the express purpose of preventing the surrender of U.S. forces to the court. These bilateral agreements require the consent of the signatories before any citizen of that state may be extradited to the ICC, or in some cases to any international criminal tribunal.[535] Given the hostility of the United States toward the ICC it seems certain that it would not consent to any such surrender. These Article 98 agreements thus manipulate the jurisdiction of the Court by creating loopholes that were not intended by the statute itself.

---

531 M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis, and Integrated Text of the Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (2005) (internal citations omitted).

532 ICC Statute, supra note 388, art. 98.

533 For an overview of the nature of Status of Forces Agreements, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Law and Practice of the United States, in Bassiouni, 2 ICL 269, supra note 1.

534 It is noteworthy that the ICTY did indict Slobodan Milosevic while a head of state in office and sought his extradition, which the Republic of Serbia conceded on June 28, 2001. See Prosecutor v. Milosevic (Indictment) (May 24, 1999), available at http://www.un.org/icty/indictment/english/mil-ii990524e.htm. See also Prosecutor v. Milosevic (Decision on Review of Indictment and Application for Consequential Orders) (May 24, 1999), available at http://www.un.org/icty/milosevic/decision-e/052499rev.htm. The first trial of a head of state for genocide and crimes against humanity was Prosecutor v. Kambanda, case no. ICTR-97-23-S, September 4, 1998; Prosecutor v. Kambanda, case no. ICTR-97-23-I, October 19, 2000. Jean Kambanda was former prime minister of Rwanda, and acting president at the time of the Hutu slaughter of the Tutsis.

535 See Ch. II, Sec. 4.4, and Appendix V.

7.4.1. Jurisdictional Immunities before International Criminal Tribunals

Universal jurisdiction can be relied upon by a state in its power to proscribe. But when it relies upon it for its power to enforce, a state is necessarily subject to certain international legal obligations that may limit its authority. Historically these limitations included the absolute immunity of heads of state, senior officials, and accredited diplomats in their posts. Today, customary international law no longer recognizes an absolute immunity for these officials. It does, however provide temporal immunity for sitting heads of state and senior government officials, as well as absolute immunity for accredited diplomats in their posts, subject to the duty of the sending state to prosecute under its laws.[536] These developments are based both in treaty and customary law.

The absolute immunity of heads of state and senior government officials was first removed after WWII.[537] Historically the most significant development in international criminal law with regards to immunities was Article 7 of the IMT Charter, which provided that

> The official position of defendants, whether as Heads of State or responsible officials in Government Departments, shall not be considered as freeing them from responsibility or mitigating punishment.

Under the provisions of the IMT Charter several high-ranking Nazi officials were tried, including Karl Dönitz, the second president of the Third Reich after Hitler's death, and Herman Göring, the president of the Reichstag.

Article 6 of the IMTFE Charter similarly provided that > the official position, at any time, of an accused . . . shall [not], of itself, be sufficient to free such accused from responsibility for any crime with which he is charged.. .

The IMTFE prosecuted four Japanese prime ministers, three foreign ministers, and numerous other senior government ministers and ambassadors.[538]

The Genocide Convention, which was adopted in December 1948, provided that "Persons committing genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be punished, whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals." The International Law Commission's Nuremberg Principles, which sought to codify the Nuremberg trials, concluded that "The fact that a person who committed an act which constitutes a crime under international law acted as Head of State or responsible Government official does not relieve him from responsibility under international law."[539]

Forty years later, when international criminal law re-emerged to deal with the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, the tribunals responsible for the conflicts were given 536 See Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.) (Dec. 8, 2000). See Ch. I, Sec. 3.4. See also Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 81–87. See also Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, Art. 31, 500 UNTS 95; Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Apr. 24, 1963, Art. 43, 596 UNTS 261. See Eileen Denza, Diplomatic Law: A Commentary on the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (2d ed. 1998); Linda S. Frey & Marsha L. Frey, The History of Diplomatic Immunity (1999).

---

537 Article 227 of the Versailles Treaty did provide for the prosecution of Kaiser Willhelm, although he had gone into exile in the Netherlands and prosecution was avoided by all sides through the clever creation of a clearly non-extraditable offense. See Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 542–547.

538 For political reasons the Japanese emperor Hirohito was not indicted by the IMTFE. See Bassiouni, From Versailles to Rwanda in Seventy-Five Years, supra note 387.

539 International Law Commission, 2 Yearbook of the International Law Commission 374 (1950) jurisdiction over heads of state and senior ministers. Article 7(2) of the Statute of the ICTY statute[540] and Article 6(2) of the ICTR Statute[541] remove head of state immunity. The two statutes, using the same language, provide that:

> The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

It was under this provision that the ICTR indicted former Rwandan prime minister Jean Kambanda in October 1997; thus he became the first former head of state to be indicted by an international tribunal since Dönitz. A year and a half later, in May 1999, Slobodan Milošević was indicted by the ICTY, becoming the first sitting head of state to be indicted by an international tribunal, although he was no longer in office when he appeared before the Tribunal.[542] Beyond Kambanda and Milošević, the ICTY has indicted and tried several high-ranking officials from the former Yugoslavia, including Radovan Karadžić and Biljana Plavšić, the former presidents of the Republika Srpska, and Momčilo Krajišnik, the former co-president of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The ICTR also indicted and tried Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, the former Minister for Family and Women's Affairs.

Article 27 of the Rome Statute of the ICC,[543] similarly removes head of state immunity, providing:

> 1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.

As mentioned above, the ICC has indicted a number of heads of state and senior government officials, including al-Bashir of the Sudan and al-Qadhafi of Libya on the basis of universal jurisdiction through the SC referral.[544]

From the above it is clear that absolute immunity for heads of state and senior government officials has been abolished under customary international law. Temporal immunity persists,

---

540 ICTY Statute, supra note 354, at art. 7(2).

541 ICTR Statute, supra note 354, at art. 6(2).

542 Prosecutor v. Milosevic, Case No. IT-02-54, Indictment (May 24, 1999).

543 The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) removed substantive immunity for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and, eventually, aggression, when defined and adopted by the assembly of state parties. ICC Statute, supra note 388, at art. 27. It should be noted that Article 27 is in Part III, which has the heading "General Principles of Law"; however, although Part IX contains no reference to immunity, Article 98 seems to allow for immunities. See id. art. 98. For a discussion of this issue, see Sec. 7.5.1. Thus, one can conclude that substantive immunity has been removed for some crimes and by certain legal instruments. A progressive development position can justifiably be that the removal of such immunity for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes is part of customary international law. Opponents of the progressive view will argue that its removal is connected to certain legal instruments and legal processes that do not reflect the customary practice of states.

544 In addition, the ICC has exercised territorial jurisdiction over Laurent Gbagbo, the former president of Côte d'Ivoire, as well as over a number of high level Kenyan government officials for their involvement in electoral violence in 2007, including Uhuru Kenyatta, the Deputy Prime Minister, Henry Kosgey, the Minister of Industrialisation, Francis Muthaura, the former Cabinet Secretary, and William Ruto, the Minister for Higher Education. However, Gbagbo and the Kenyan ministers were subject to ICC jurisdiction after a state referral in the case of the former, and Kenya's ratification of the Rome Statute in the case of the latter. Neither was therefore, properly speaking, an exercise in universal jurisdiction based on a Security Council referral.

however, meaning that sitting heads of state, senior government officials, and accredited diplomats in their posts are still immune from suit under customary international law. The applicability of this long-standing principle was emphatically underscored by the ICJ in the Arrest Warrant case, where the court ruled that a Belgian attempt to prosecute the sitting Congolese foreign minister violated the customary international law prohibition on prosecuting sitting heads of state or senior government officials.[545]

The Arrest Warrant case arose out of Belgium's April 2000 indictment of Abdoulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, the Democratic Republic of Congo's acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, for incitement to genocide in the Congo.[546] The indictment was issued under Belgium's universal jurisdiction provisions: at no point was the accused a citizen or resident of Belgium, and the indictment was issued while he was in the Congo.[547] On October 17, 2000, Congo filed an Application with the ICJ requesting that the Court annul Belgium's arrest warrant. Congo challenged Belgium's assertion of extraterritorial jurisdiction, as well as the propriety of Article 5 of the Belgian law, which negates an official immunity. The ICJ eventually issued a ruling based on customary international law and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations,[548] concluding that Yerodia enjoyed temporal immunity and reaffirming the principle that the prosecution of a sitting government minister would infringe upon that person's ability to effectively carry out his/her duties, thus harming the diplomatic and political activities of a state.[549]

It should be noted, however, that the Arrest Warrant and the subsequent Habré rulings do not apply to indictments issued by the ICC because the ICJ applied customary and conventional international law on immunities, whereas the ICC applies the law of its statute to its state parties. But its statute, namely Article 27, also applies to non–state-parties under Article 12(3) with the consent of the non–state-parties, and also to non-state parties in situations referred to the ICC by the Security Council pursuant to Article 13(b). In these instances the ICC statutory provisions override customary international law. Article 27(2) of the Rome Statute of the ICC provides that

> 2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.[550]

As of April 2013, 122 states have ratified the Rome Statute.[551]

The question of immunities also came up in a domestic court when Spain sought the extradition of the former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet. Although the issue was decided in a

---

545 See Ch. I, Sec. 3.4. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 81–87.

546 See Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.) (Order) (Dec. 8, 2000).

547 As there were no links to Belgium, the case was distinguishable from that of four Rwandans who were charged under the same law and convicted for crimes committed in Rwanda, as the group of four were all domiciled in Belgium and physically present on Belgian territory at the time of their arrest. See infra Sec. 7.5.

548 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, 500 U.N.T.S. 95. Article 29 of the Vienna Convention provides that "The person of a diplomatic agent shall be inviolable. He shall not be liable to any form of arrest or detention. The receiving State shall treat him with due respect and shall take all appropriate steps to prevent any attack on his person, freedom or dignity."

549 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.), 2002 I.C.J. 121 (Feb. 14, 2002).

550 Id. at art. 27.

551 The States Parties to the Rome Statute, available at http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/states%20parties/Pages/the%20states%20parties%20to%20the%20rome%20statute.aspx (last visited Aug. 7, 2013).

domestic court, the Law Lords considered international law as the basis for Pinochet's extradition to another country, and thus the case is considered here and not in Section 7.5

In Pinochet I,[552] an Appellate Committee of the House of Lords held by a margin of three to two that Pinochet was not immune with respect to crimes under international law.[553] In Pinochet III,[554] an expanded panel of the House of Lords, in construing the scope of § 134 of the Criminal Justice Act of 1988, ruled that a head of state cannot claim immunity for torture, as torture by its very nature cannot constitute an official act.[555] The Law Lords, however, held that Senator Pinochet was protected by immunity for the charges of murder and conspiracy to murder.[556] Despite the Law Lords' ruling, Home Secretary Jack Straw determined that he was unfit to stand trial and Pinochet was not extradited to Spain.[557]

Another impediment to the exercise of universal jurisdiction is the application of national statutes of limitations, even though such limitations have been removed with respect to war crimes and crimes against humanity.[558] Unfortunately, the 1968 UN Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity has only been ratified by fifty-four states.[559] The more recent European Convention on Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes (Inter-European) has just seven ratifications and one additional signature.[560] Under the circumstances, it is valid to ask whether the existence of these two conventions (and other manifestations of international opinio juris) constitutes an expression of customary international law, or whether the limited number of ratifications reveals the insufficiency of national support.

7.5. Contemporary Practice before National Courts

National courts have in recent years exercised universal jurisdiction over certain crimes, namely genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture. Unlike the ICC, however, there are no conventions regulating the application of universal jurisdiction in a domestic context, especially with regards to jurisdictional conflicts and immunities. Universal jurisdiction is therefore guided by customary law on the domestic level with only limited guidance from the ICJ, as in the Habré and Lockerbie cases.[561]

---

552 R. v. Bow St. Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate and Others, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 1), [1998] 3 WLR 1456.

553 Christine M. Chinkin, International Decision, Regina v. Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 3), 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 703, 704 (1999).

554 R. v. Bow St. Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 3), [1999] 2 WLR 827 (citing International Extradition in U.S. Law and Practice (3d rev. ed. 1996)).

555 Chinkin, supra note 553, at 708.

556 Id.

557 In doing so, Shaw exercised executive discretion, which is recognized in international law. See Ch. XI for a detailed discussion of executive discretion in extradition matters.

558 Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341.

559 Nov. 26, 1968, 754 U.N.T.S. 73 [hereinafter U.N. Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutes of Limitations]. As of October 2012 there are fifty-four state-parties to the Convention, namely: Afghanistan, Albania, Argentina, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cuba, Czech Republic, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Estonia, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Honduras, Hungary, India, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Latvia, Liberia, Libya, Lithuania, Mexico, Mongolia, Montenegro, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Moldova, Romania, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Tunisia, Ukraine, Uruguay, Viet Nam, and Yemen.

560 Europ. T.S. No. 82 [hereinafter European Convention on Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations]. Belgium Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, Netherlands, Romania, Serbia, and Ukraine have ratified the European Convention. France has signed but not ratified the European Convention.

561 See Sec. 7.5.1.

A number of states have adopted national legislation criminalizing genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture, pursuant to either conventional or customary international law proscribing these international crimes.[562] Pursuant to their national jurisdictional laws, they can exercise jurisdiction over persons charged with the commission of these crimes even when the crime in question was committed outside the territory of the enforcing state. However, most of these jurisdictional laws require a nexus with the enforcing state, such as the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim. Thus, these types of laws are not properly in the category of universal jurisdiction, but rather in that of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

One study concludes that eighteen countries have enacted criminal legislation with a universal jurisdiction provision.[563] The application of national legislation has been primarily with respect to situations in which the accused was in the custody of the enforcing state. Thus, state law and judicial practice have usually required at least the presence of the accused in the territory of the enforcing state, or whenever the victim or perpetrator is a national of the enforcing state, although this was not true in the Arrest Warrant case. Several states have enacted national legislation in connection with "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, while others have provided for universal jurisdiction in connection with other international conventions, mostly dealing with genocide and terrorism. Some states have expanded upon the "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions by including other violations of the laws and customs of war. Some states have also provided for universal jurisdiction in the case of crimes against humanity, based on their national legislation.[564]

Professor Máximo Langer has conducted the most extensive study of domestic prosecutions based on universal jurisdiction known to this writer. His study found that there have been only thirty-two domestic trials under the theory of universal jurisdiction, primarily for Nazi crimes and for crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.[565] In particular, he found that Australia has tried one Nazi; Austria has tried one former Yugoslav; Belgium has tried eight Rwandans; Canada has tried one Nazi and one Rwandan; Denmark has tried one former Yugoslav; France has tried one Tunisian and one Mauritanian; Germany has tried four former Yugoslavs; Israel has tried two Nazis; the Netherlands has tried three Afghans, one Congolese, and one Rwandan; Norway has tried one former Yugoslav; Spain has tried one Argentinian; Switzerland has tried one former Yugoslav and one Rwandan; and the United Kingdom has tried one Afghan and one Nazi.[566]

As indicated above, eighteen countries have adopted universal jurisdiction legislation for certain crimes. Some of these are described below.

The French Penal Code is an example of national legislation that provides for universal jurisdiction if required by treaty and if domestic implementing legislation is in place, but none has been adopted except for the ICC treaty whose statute, as discussed above, allows for universal jurisdiction when a situation is referred to it by the Security Council. France's Criminal Code

---

562 See Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application, supra note 341, at 279–294 (2011). Some states have enacted modified versions of universals for war crimes, including Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, and the United Kingdom. Id. at 287. Belgium extended its universal jurisdiction provision more broadly to incorporate a broader range of crimes. Id. at 289.

563 See Scharf, supra note 345. Note, however, that in some cases a nexus requirement does exist for these provisions to take effect. See also Langer, The Diplomacy of Universal Jurisdiction, supra note 343 for a review of specific national legislation.

564 See Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application, supra note 341, at 279–294.

565 Langer, The Diplomacy of Universal Jurisdiction, supra note 343.

566 Id. at 42.

defines genocide and crimes against humanity, but does not specifically provide for universal jurisdiction, though by implication it is possible for French law to provide for it.[567] France's criminal jurisdiction has extraterritorial reach based on territorial impact, national security, protection of currency against counterfeiting, and nationality of victim or perpetrator. For "active personality," the condition of "double criminality" is required. Article 113-8 of the French Penal Code[568] prohibits the exercise of jurisdiction in cases of prior conviction or acquittal. The public prosecutor acting pursuant to a victim's complaint must commence all criminal actions.[569] Article 113-11 (20) extends jurisdiction for crimes on board of, or against, aircraft, whenever the aircraft lands in French territory. Thus, other than the presence of the aircraft in its territory, its jurisdiction is universal. Article 113-12 extends jurisdiction on the high seas, without any connection to territory or nationality link or protected interest impact, whenever international conventions and French law provide for it. That, too, can be viewed as a form of universality of jurisdiction. No specific provision in the jurisdiction article refers to jus cogens international crimes whose definitions are contained in Book II of the Code Pénal.

Book II of the Code Pénal deals with crimes against persons. It starts with Article 211-1, Du Genocide, and includes Article 212-1, Des Autres Crimes Contre l'Humanité. These articles define the two crimes respectively, but do not include any reference to jurisdiction. In the Code's structure, jurisdiction is covered in Article 113, as referred to above. But there is no legislative provision that established universal jurisdiction for these crimes. Frédéric Desportes and Francis Le Gunehec state > 194.-Les insuffisances du dispositif législatif. Les crimes contre l'humanité relevant des règles ordinaires de compétence et de procédure. Si, effectivement, le particularisme ne se justifie pas en la matière, il est possible en revanche de regretter en d'autres domaines quelques insuffisances dans le dispositif législatif.

>
> Ainsi, il n'a été prévu aucune disposition particulière concernant l'application de la loi française et la compétence des juridictions françaises pour le jugement des crimes commis à l'étranger. En pareil cas, la répression n'est possible, selon les règles générales, que si les crimes ont été commis par un français ou sur la personne d'un français. Cette limitation s'accorde assez mal avec la nature des crimes contre l'humanité. Il aurait été convenable et conforme au droit international 567 Code Pénal art. 212-1 (Dalloz ed. 2000). For a discussion of France's three major prosecutions of Barbie, Touvier, and Papon, see Leila Sadat Wexler, The French Experience, in Bassiouni, 3 ICL 329, supra note 1. See also Brigitte Stern, International Decision, Universal Jurisdiction over Crimes against Humanity under French Law, 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 525 (1999); Leila Sadat Wexler, Prosecutions for Crimes against Humanity in French Municipal Law: International Implications, in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law 270–276 (1997); Leila Sadat Wexler, Reflections on the Trial of Vichy Collaborator Paul Touvier for Crimes against Humanity in France, 20 J.L. & Soc. Inquiry 191 (1995); Leila Sadat Wexler, The Interpretation of the Nuremberg Principles by the French Court of Cassation: From Touvier to Barbie and Back Again, 32 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 289 (1994). The French Cour de Cassation, in a 1998 judgment (Cass. crim., Jan. 6, 1998, Bull. crim., no. 2, Rép pén. Dalloz 2000), considered that universal jurisdiction was applicable in the case of genocide in accordance with Article 689-2 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure. The question was also raised as to whether torture should be subject to universal jurisdiction. Commentators also take the position that there would be universal jurisdiction as part of France's obligations to implement Security Council Resolution 827, which established the ICTY, and Resolution 955, which established the ICTR. Based on this reasoning, it could also be assumed that France's implementation of the ICC Statute would justify its exercise of universal jurisdiction.

568 Yves Mayaud, Code Pènal: Nouveau Code Pénal, Ancien Code Pénal (87th ed. Dalloz 2000).

569 See Art. 113-12.

> de conférer en la matière, comme en bien d'autres, une compétence universelle aux juridictions françaises;
>
> On peut se demander toutefois si les dispositions des Conventions de Genève du 12 août 1949 ne leur ont pas donné directement une telle compétence pour un certain nombre "d'actes graves." En effet, ces conventions comportent une disposition ainsi rédigée "chaque partie contractante aura l'obligation de rechercher les personnes prévenues d'avoir commis, ou d'avoir ordonné de commettre, l'une ou l'autre de ces infractions graves et elle devra les déférer à ses propres tribunaux, quelle que soit leur nationalité. Elle pourra aussi, si elle le préfère (…) les remettre pour jugement à une autre Partie contractante." La chambre d'accusation de Paris, saisie par des ressortissants bosniaques rescapés des camps de détention serbes, n'a pas consacré cette interprétation, estimant que les Conventions de Genève étaient dépourvues d'effet en droit interne et qu'elles ne pouvaient des lors recevoir application en l'absence de texte portant adaptation de la législation française à leurs dispositions (Ch. Acc. Paris, 24nov. 1994, Javar et autres, inédit). Il serait cependant possible, pour retenir la compétence des juridicitons françaises, de se fonder sur la Convention contre la torture de New York du 10 décembre 1984, à condition toutefois que l'auteur soit "truvé en France" (et sur l'ensemble, Cl. Lombois, De la compètence territoriale, R.S.C., 1995, p. 399.[570]

Thus, France does not provide for universal jurisdiction for genocide and crimes against humanity, which also appears to be the case under French Military Law for War Crimes.[571]

Legislation that provides for universal jurisdiction only if there is a territorial connection can be seen in the domestic enactments of Canada and Germany. For instance, Canada's 1985 law[572] allows for retrospective jurisdiction over the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, providing that at the time of the crime the conduct constituted a crime under international law as well as under Canadian law, the defendant was within the territorial jurisdiction of Canada, Canada was at war with the country when the crime occurred, and the crime occurred in the territory of that country or was committed by one of its citizens. All of this points to a territorial or a sovereignty connection that does not exactly make Canada's jurisdiction truly universal. As the Canadian Supreme Court noted in Regina v. Finta:

> Canadian courts have jurisdiction to try individuals living in Canada for crimes which they allegedly committed on foreign soil only when the conditions specified in s. 7(3.71) are satisfied. The most important of those requirements, for the purposes of the present case, is that the alleged crime must constitute a war crime or a crime against humanity. It is thus the nature of the act committed that is of crucial importance in the determination of jurisdiction. Canadian courts may not prosecute an ordinary offence that has occurred in a foreign jurisdiction. The only reason Canadian courts can prosecute individuals such as Imre Finta is because the acts he is alleged to have committed are viewed as being war crimes or crimes against humanity. As Cherif Bassiouni has very properly observed, a war crime or a crime against humanity is not the same as a domestic offence.[573]

---

570 Frédéric Desportes & Francis Le Gunehec, Le Nouveau Droit Pénal: Droit Pénal General (4th ed. 1997).

571 See however Gilbert Azibert, Code de Procèdure Pénal 2000, 459 et seq. (12th ed. LITEC 2000), where he comments on extraterritorial jurisdiction, but does not refer to universal jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the Code permits universal jurisdiction if it is included in an international convention that France has ratified, provided that the crime in question is also a crime under French law. This is provided for in Articles 689-2 to 689-7 of the Code de Procèdure Pénal. Azibert, supra at 313–314. See also R. Koering-Joulin, "Jurisclasseur de Procèdure Pénale" fasc. 20, No. 91. See, e.g., Claude Lombois, Le Droit Pénal International (1979); André Huet & Renée Koering-Joulin, Le Droit Pénal International (1994).

572 Criminal Code § 7(3.71) (Can.).

573 Regina v. Finta, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 701, 811 (Cory, J.) (emphasis added) (citation omitted).

Section 6 of the German Criminal Code has frequently been cited as providing for universal jurisdiction.[574] It states that

> German criminal law shall further apply, regardless of the law of the place of their commission, to the following acts committed abroad: (1) genocide . . . ."[575]

In 1999, however, the German Federal Supreme Court required a "legitimizing connection" before jurisdiction in Germany would attach.[576] This connection could take the form of a familial link or former domicile. The German judiciary introduced this requirement based upon concerns that the exercise of such jurisdiction would interfere with the sovereignty of other states. In addition, Section 6(9) of the German Criminal Code allows for the application of German criminal jurisdiction for acts covered by "an international agreement binding on the Federal Republic of Germany . . . if they are committed abroad."[577]

---

574 Section 6, which is entitled "Acts Abroad Against Internationally Protected Legal Interests," provides as follows:

> German criminal law shall further apply, regardless of the law of the place of their commission, to the following acts committed abroad:
>
> genocide (Section 220a);
>
> serious criminal offenses involving nuclear energy, explosives and radiation in cases under Sections 307 and 308 subsections (1) to (4), Section 309 subsection (2) and Section 310;
>
> assaults against air and sea traffic (Section 316c); > trafficking in human beings (Section 180b) and serious trafficking in human beings (Section 181); > unauthorized distribution of narcotics;
>
>
>
> dissemination of pornographic writings in cases under Section 184 subsection (3) and (4); > counterfeiting of money and securities (Sections 146, 151 and 152), payment cards and blank Eurochecks (Section 152a subsections (1) to (4)), as well as their preparation (Sections 149, 151, 152 and 152a subsection (5)); > subsidy fraud (section 264);
>
>
>
> acts which, on the basis of an international agreement binding on the Federal Republic of Germany, shall also be prosecuted if they are committed abroad.

Strafgesetzbuch (StGB) § 6.

575 Id. at § 6 (1).

576 German Bundesgerichtshof, Urteil vom. 30, Apr. 1999, 3StR 215/98. See Article 211 for genocide and Article 212 for crimes against humanity. France's 1996 criminal code has a similar provision. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, in Bassiouni, 1 ICL 437, supra note 1.

577 StGB, § 6(9). See also StGB § 7. Section 7, which is entitled "Applicability to Acts Abroad in Other Cases," states:

> German criminal law shall apply to acts, which were committed abroad against a German, if the act is punishable at the place of its commission or the place of its commission is subject to no criminal law enforcement. German criminal law shall apply to other acts, which were committed abroad if the act is punishable at the place of its commission or the place of its commission is subject to no criminal law enforcement and if the perpetrator:
>
> was a German at the time of the act or became one after the act; or
>
> was a foreigner at the time of the act, was found to be in Germany and, although the Extradition Act would permit extradition for such an act, is not extradited, because a request for extradition is not made, is rejected, or the extradition is not practicable.

StGB § 7. On February 12, 2001, the Constitutional Court of Germany affirmed a judgment convicting a Bosnian Serb for genocide in Bosnia in accordance with § 200a StGB, the German Penal Code.

Italy's criminal code, Article 7, also provides for extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction, but requires a nationality or territorial connection.[578]

Switzerland adopted legislation extending universal jurisdiction over the three crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.[579] Switzerland's Code Pénal Militaire, enacted by the Federal law of June 13, 1927 and amended up to February 29, 2000, contains a jurisdictional basis for universal jurisdiction in Article 9, which states in paragraph 1: "Le présent code est applicable aux infractions commises en Suisse et à celles qui ont été commises à l'étranger." Chapter 6, Articles 108-109 are also a basis for universal jurisdiction for "infractions commises contre le droit des gens en cas de conflit armé." But more conclusive is Article 6 bis of the Code Pénal, which states:

> 1. Le présent code est applicable à quiconque aura commis à l'étranger un crime ou un délit que la Confédération, en vertu d'un traité international, s'est engagée à poursuivere, si l'acte est réprimé aussi dans l'Etat où il a été commis et si l'auteur se trouve en Suisse et n'est pas extradé à l'étranger. La loi étrangère sera toutefois applicable si ell est plus favorable à l'inculpé.
>
> 2. L'auteur ne pourra plus être puni en Suisse: s'il a été acquitté dans l'Etat où l'acte a été commis, pour le même acte par un jugement passé en force; s'il a subi la peine prononcée contre lui à l'étranger, si cette peine lui a été remise ou si elle est prescrite.

On the basis of that law, Switzerland prosecuted and convicted a former Rwandan mayor for war crimes.[580]

Australia has two statutes, the Geneva Conventions Act (1957), whose sections 6 and 7 provide for universal jurisdiction for "grave breaches," and the War Crimes Act (1945) (Cth), No. 48, which also permits universal jurisdiction, and resulted in the case of Polyukhovich v. Commonwealth of Australia and Another (1991).

Austria's Penal Code, Article 64 (as well as 65.1.2) provides for universal jurisdiction for aut dedere aut judicare. In Republic of Austria v. Cvjetkovic (1994) it applied its jurisdiction in the case of a crime committed in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, where the accused was present in Austria. Denmark's Penal Code Art. 8(5) is similar to that of Austria's, and has been applied in a similar case, Prosecution v. Saric (1994).

Belgium had the most far-reaching universal jurisdiction legislation.[581] Human Rights Watch described the country's provision as follows:

> Belgium probably provides for the most extensive exercise of universal jurisdiction over human rights crimes of any country. Belgian courts can try cases of war crimes (internal or international), crimes against humanity and genocide committed by non-Belgians outside of Belgium against non-Belgians, without even the presence of the accused in Belgium. As a practical matter, however, courts are not likely to pursue an investigation unless Belgium has a real connection to the case.[582]

---

578 See 3 Codice Penale: Annotato con la Giurisprudenza 103–114, arts. 7, 8, 9 (and commentary) (S. Beltrani, F. Caringella & R. Marino eds., Oct. 1996).

579 See Christian Favre, Marc Pellet & Patrick Stoudmann, Code Penal Annote (1997). Cf. Didier Pfirter, The Position of Switzerland with Respect to the ICC Statute and in Particular the Elements of Crimes, 32 Cornell Int'l L.J. 499 (1999).

580 See Coupable de crimes de guerre et d'assassinat, le maire rwandais est condamné à la perpétuit, Le Temps, May 1, 1999.

581 Act Concerning the Punishment of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law § 7 (Belgium). For an overview, see M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259; Malvina Halberstam, Belgium's Universal Jurisdiction Law: Vindication of International Justice or Pursuit of Politics, 25 Cardozo L. Rev. 247 (2003–2004); Steven R. Ratner, The American Journal of International Law, 97 Am. J. Int'l L. 888 (2003).

582 Human Rights Watch, supra note 341, at 8.

The first application of this new law came before the Court of Assises in 2001. The accused in the landmark case were two Benedictine sisters, a former professor at the National University of Rwanda (since then at the Catholic University of Louvain), and a former businessman and Minister (husband of the daughter of the personal doctor of President Juvénal Habyarimana) of crimes committed during the Rwandan genocide in 1994. The four were convicted in June 2001 on the basis of Belgium's universal jurisdiction provisions, but all four were physically present in Belgium at the time they were charged with these crimes.[583]

The two most well-known examples of the application of universal jurisdiction in Belgium were against the acting Congolese Foreign Minister, Abdoulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, and against the former Chadian dictator Hissène Habré, who was in exile in Senegal at the time of the issuing of the indictment. As discussed above, both cases were appealed to the ICJ, and in the Arrest Warrant case concerning Yerodia, the ICJ ruled that Belgium universal jurisdiction law violated the customary international law protections of heads of state and senior government officials, even for jus cogens crimes, and accordingly the indictment was dismissed. In the Habré case the ICJ ruled that Senegal had jurisdictional priority over Belgium. It is should be noted that it is unclear from the ICJ's ruling in the Habré case whether the jurisdictional preference applies under customary law to jus cogens crimes as the ruling was based on the text of the CAT.

In summary, no other country has before or since allowed for the exercise of such an expansive version of universal jurisdiction as did Belgium.[584] The far-reaching nature of its universal jurisdiction provisions was criticized in many circles, however, and under mounting pressure the law was amended in 2003 to limit its application. New cases initiated after 2003 require a nexus to Belgium, either on account of the perpetrator's presence in Belgium or on of it being the country of his/her primary residence, or if the victim is a Belgian citizen or lived in Belgium

583 Marlise Simons, Belgian Jury Convicts 4 of 1994 War Crimes in Rwanda, N.Y. Times, June 9, 2001, available at: http://www.nytimes.com/2001/06/09/world/09RWAN.html

584 Cf. Human Rights Watch, supra note 341, at 9–10.

> Following the genocides in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, a number of European countries brought perpetrators to trial on the basis of universal jurisdiction. In Belgium, a Rwandan, Vincent Ntezimana, was arrested and charged with genocide. In Germany, the Bavarian High Court sentenced a Bosnian Serb, Novislav Djajic, to five years imprisonment in 1997 under the Geneva Conventions for aiding and abetting the killing of fourteen Muslim men in Bosnia in 1992. A former leader of a paramilitary Serb group, Nikola Jorgic, was convicted on eleven counts of genocide and thirty counts of murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment by the Düsseldorf High Court. A third case is pending against a Bosnian Serb charged with genocide before the Düsseldorf High Court. In Denmark, Bosnian Muslim Refik Saric is currently serving an eight-year sentence for war crimes, charged under the Geneva Conventions with torturing detainees in a Croat-run prison in Bosnia in 1993. In April 1999, a Swiss military court convicted a Rwandan national of war crimes[,] but held it had no jurisdiction over genocide and crimes against humanity. A Bosnian Serb was indicted but acquitted of war crimes. The Netherlands is prosecuting a Bosnian Serb for war crimes before a military court. France is currently prosecuting a Rwandan priest, Wenceslas Munyeshyaka, for genocide, crimes against humanity, and torture. In addition, in July 1999, French police arrested a Mauritanian colonel, Ely Ould Dah, who was studying at a French military school, on the basis of the U.N. Convention against Torture, when two Mauritanian exiles came forward and identified him as their torturer. Ould Dah, free on bail, slipped out of France in March 2000, however. In February 2000, a Senegalese court indicted the exiled dictator of Chad, Hissène Habré, on torture charges. In 1997, the United Kingdom arrested a Sudanese doctor residing in Scotland for alleged torture in Sudan, but later dropped the charges, apparently for lack of evidence. In August 2000, Mexico arrested Ricardo Miguel Cavallo, a former Argentine military official. Judge Garzón of Spain has filed an extradition request for Cavallo based on the torture and "disappearance" of over 400 people.
>
> Id. See Universal Jurisdiction in Respect of Gross Human Rights Offenses, supra note 362, at 22–29; Universal Jurisdiction in Europe, supra note 340, at 16–47.

for three years prior to the commission of the crimes. The amended law also allows for universal jurisdiction in cases where Belgium is obligated to exert jurisdiction on the basis of a treaty.[585]

7.5.1. The Customary International Law Status of Universal Jurisdiction

Bearing in mind that there are 193 member states of the United Nations and a number more states that are not members, it is necessary to assess whether the relatively recent enactments of a few states are sufficient to establish a rule of customary international law of universal jurisdiction over genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture. There is consensus among advocates of universal jurisdiction that it obtains for the four crimes listed above on the basis of their jus cogens and erga omnes qualities. This writer suggests that, in addition to those four, the following be included as subject to universal jurisdiction: piracy, slavery and slave-related practices, human trafficking, apartheid, and contemporary practices such as violent attacks upon civilians and civilian installations covered by international conventions.[586]

Two criteria are necessary to establish customary international law, viz., the existence of a sufficient state practice and opinio juris sive necessitates.[587] As stated by the ICJ: "It is of course axiomatic that the material of customary international law is to be looked for primarily in the actual practice and opinio juris of States, even though multilateral conventions may have an important role to play in recording and defining rules deriving from custom, or indeed in developing them."[588]

Sufficient state practice is established when the principle at issue has duration, uniformity, consistency, and generality.[589] State practice consists of: (1) specific legislation enacting the provisions for universal jurisdiction; (2) legislative enactments that authorize the application of universal jurisdiction; and (3) state judicial practice, whether based on national legislation or international conventions. In the Military and Paramilitary Activities case, the International Court of Justice noted that:

> [T]he mere fact that States declare their recognition of certain rules is not sufficient for the Court to consider these as being part of customary international law, and as applicable as such to those States. Bound as it is by Article 38 of its Statute to apply, inter alia, international custom "as evidence of a general practice accepted as law," the Court may not disregard the essential role played by general practice. Where two States agree to incorporate a particular rule in a treaty, their agreement suffices to make that rule a legal one, binding upon them; but in the field of customary international law, the shared view of the Parties as to the content of what they regard as the rule is not enough. The Court must satisfy itself that the existence of the rule in the opinio juris of States is confirmed by practice.[590]

Opinio juris is the external acceptance by states that a practice is recognized as being obligatory.[591] To establish opinio juris, states must behave in such a manner that their conduct is "evidence of a belief that this practice is rendered obligatory by the existence of a rule of law requiring it. The need for such a belief, i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implicit in 585 Belgium: Universal Jurisdiction Law Repealed, Human Rights Watch (Aug. 2, 2003), http://www.hrw.org/news/2003/08/01/belgium-universal-jurisdiction-law-repealed.

586 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at ch. III.

587 Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law 4–9 (5th ed. 1998); 1 George Schwarzenberger, International Law 41 (3d ed. 1957); 1 Lassa Oppenheim, supra note 2 at 25–27.

588 Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta), 1985 I.C.J. 13, 29–30 (June 3).

589 David H. Ott, Public International Law in the Modern World 13–16 (1987).

590 Military and Paramilitary Activities (Nicar. v. U.S.), 1986 I.C.J. 14, 97–98 (June 27).

591 Ott, supra note 589, at 15.

the very notion of the opinio juris sive necessitatis."[592] The conduct of states, however, need not be "in absolutely rigorous conformity" with the rule:

> In order to deduce the existence of customary rules, the Court deems it sufficient that the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with such rules, and that instances of State conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule, not as indications of the recognition of a new rule. If a State acts in a way prima facie incompatible with a recognized rule, but defends its conduct by appealing to exceptions or justifications contained within the rule itself, then whether or not the State's conduct is in fact justifiable on that basis, the significance of that attitude is to confirm rather than to weaken the rule.[593]

This writer is doubtful that the few national enactments and prosecutions that exist as of 2013 are sufficient to satisfy the elements of consistent state practice necessary to constitute customary international law.[594] Professor Langer likewise concludes that > universal jurisdiction will not establish a minimum international rule of law in the sense of either holding a substantial share of the perpetrators of international crimes accountable, or being applied equally across defendants. Since the political branches' expected costs quickly surpass the expected benefits in this type of case, the analysis herein suggests that it is not a coincidence or the result of too premature a judgment that, in the last twenty-five years, only twenty-six people around the world have been criminally convicted on the basis of universal jurisdiction despite the end of the Cold War, the unprecedented position of human rights on the agenda of many societies, and the passing of universal jurisdiction statutes by many states. Rather, a limited potential to convict international criminals seems to be a structural feature of the universal jurisdiction enforcement regime. In addition, given that high- and most mid-cost defendants can impose more costs than any potential prosecuting state is willing to pay, those defendants are in effect beyond the reach of this enforcement regime.[595]

However, although national legislation and national judicial practice is presently insufficient to establish an international customary practice with respect to universal jurisdiction, that limited practice, combined with the large number of states that have extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction that also reaches persons accused of international crimes, may constitute a sufficient legal basis to conclude that at least there exists a duty to prosecute or extradite, and where appropriate to punish persons accused, charged, or convicted of international crimes. If that proposition is accepted, then it follows that when available jurisdictional means are ineffective, universal jurisdiction should apply.

It must be remembered that a number of conventions provide, implicitly or explicitly, for universal jurisdiction with respect to certain international crimes, some of which are deemed part of jus cogens. With respect to the latter category, there exists a legal obligation embodied in the maxim aut dedere aut judicare to prosecute or extradite, and where appropriate to punish those accused, charged, or convicted of jus cogens crimes. This is a non-derogable obligation incumbent upon all states as a consequence of the jus cogens character of these crimes. Thus, it is an obligation erga omnes that is binding even upon states who refuse to recognize such an obligation. It may appear tautological to add that such an obligation exists because it also arises under customary international law, but it is not, because it is customary international law that 592 North Sea Continental Shelf (F.R.G./Den.; F.R.G./Neth.), 1969 I.C.J. 3, 44 (Feb. 20).

---

593 Military and Paramilitary Activities, 1986 I.C.J. at 98.

594 Some states have universal jurisdiction for specific crimes such as genocide. Others may have near universal jurisdiction for crimes against humanity and war crimes. Still other states, such as Germany, have universal jurisdiction plus a linking connection. No country has universal jurisdiction for all these crimes. It is therefore difficult to say anything more than universal jurisdiction exists sparsely in the practice of states and is prosecuted in only a limited way.

595 Langer, The Diplomacy of Universal Jurisdiction, supra note 343, at 45 (internal citations omitted).

provides the basis for the elevation of certain international crimes to the level of jus cogens. In addition, "general principles of law" also provide the basis for the elevation of certain international crimes to the level of jus cogens. Furthermore, the "writings of the most distinguished publicists" also support the proposition that jus cogens crimes require the application of universal jurisdiction when other means of carrying out the obligations deriving from aut dedere aut judicare have proven ineffective. In fact, it could be argued that the establishment of international investigative and judicial organs since WWII, such as the IMT, IMTFE, ICTY, ICTR, and ICC embody the very essence of aut dedere aut judicare with respect to jus cogens crimes.

There is no doubt that each one of these sources of international law is by itself insufficient to establish the proposition that universal jurisdiction applies to jus cogens crimes, but it is the cumulative effect of these sources that does. This proposition may run contrary to a purist theory of international law that requires each one of the sources of law referred to rise to a certain level of legal sufficiency in order to achieve the status of binding international law. But if the proposed theory of cumulating sources of international law that have not, each in their own right, achieved the level of legal sufficiency is accepted, then it can be concluded that universal jurisdiction is at the least recognized with respect to jus cogens crimes, if not required.

The other category that needs to be assessed is that of national law, and it includes national legislation and judicial practice. Both of these, however, reveal that only a few states have universal jurisdiction, and among them only two ever provided for this theory of jurisdiction without a territorial nexus, but even then without a mechanism to enforce the provision. Beyond that only judicial decisions have been rendered that support universal jurisdiction, whether with or without means to the enforcing state. On the other hand, many states have extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction that reaches those who commit international crimes, whether jus cogens or not, and this represents in practice the maxim aut dedere aut judicare. Here again, the international law purist can challenge this proposition by arguing that the existence of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction does not necessarily evidence the opino juris of states in respect of the maxim. The answer to that may be reminiscent of a sophist's argument, namely: if not that, then what? But a more prosaic argument is this: if states extend their national criminal jurisdiction extraterritorially to prosecute more persons charged with international crimes, is that not in itself evidence of their intentions to enforce international criminal law? Granted, most of these national laws are aimed at prosecuting nationals who commit crimes abroad, or non-nationals who commit crimes abroad against the nationals of the state having such legislation, or at nationals and non-nationals who while abroad commit acts that have a national impact or effect deemed to be criminal under national legislation. But does that change the impact of extraterritorial national legislation that also reaches these very same persons when they also commit international crimes?

Last, it would be a valid argument to propose that the cumulative weight of international law sources, national legislation, and judicial practices can be deemed sufficient to find the existence of universal jurisdiction for jus cogens and even other international crimes.

If there is such a thing as a sophisticated argument that is not sophistry, I propose what international law's progressive thinkers would call a policy argument. Simply put, the argument is that in the era of globalization, international compensation is necessary to combat crime, whether international or domestic, and the only way by which this is achievable is through the obligation to prosecute or extradite, and where appropriate, to punish persons accused, charged, or convicted of a criminal offense, whether it be international or domestic. To implement such a policy requires the closing of certain jurisdictional gaps consistent with the preservation of the international legal order, and respect for and observance of international human rights law. The closing of such gaps is through universal jurisdiction. Thus, one way of reaching the recognition of universal jurisdiction is through the obligation of aut dedere aut judicare. This does not, however, diminish the recognition of universal jurisdiction as actio popularis or on any other legal or policy bases.

7.6. Misconceptions about National State Law and Practice

A number of states have enacted laws with extraterritorial jurisdictional reach. Most of these laws however extend national legislative reach to situations involving their nationals, or whenever their nationals are the victims of certain crimes. Some extend their extraterritorial reach to crimes committed abroad but whose impact affects the interests of the enforcing state. Among these national laws are those that provide universal jurisdiction based on national law whenever it is permissible or required by an international treaty. In all of these cases, except for a brief period in Belgium and Spain,[596] which is discussed below, national legislation as applied requires that the accused be present on the territory of the enforcing state. Scholars, however, do not give sufficient weight to these distinctions and surmise that the possible application of universal jurisdiction without regard to the need for a nexus to the enforcing state is sufficient to conclude that there is sufficient state practice to warrant the conclusion that universal jurisdiction is part of customary international law. There is no doubt that the existence of such national legislation evidences some recognition of the existence of universal jurisdiction. But whether it is sufficient in and of itself to rise to the level of customary international law is questionable. In addition, there are various national judicial decisions that apply universal jurisdiction or refer to it in dicta. Here again, scholars tend to construe these cases as evidencing the application of universal jurisdiction in national judicial decisions. But, as discussed below, there have only been two cases known to this writer, namely Belgium and Spain, in which universal jurisdiction was applied without any nexus to the enforcing state, and even those extensive provisions were eventually scaled back to require a nexus to the country, in 2003 and 2009, respectively.

Two cases are illustrative of this misconception.

In Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann,[597] the Israeli district court referred to universal jurisdiction in dictum, but relied on Israel's national legislation conferring upon its courts jurisdiction over "crimes against the Jewish people," based on a law it passed in 1950 that includes genocide and crimes against humanity whenever committed against the "Jewish people" wherever they may be.[598] Israel's jurisdictional reach is, under its law, universal,[599] but it is based on a nationality connection to the victim that properly places this jurisdictional basis under the "passive personality" theory. Admittedly, that law purports to apply to acts that took place before the establishment of the sovereign state of Israel in 1948, but that does not alter the basis of the theory relied upon. Furthermore, there is no historical legal precedent for such a retroactive application of criminal jurisdiction based on nationality, but that goes to the issue 596 Ley Del Poder Judicial, Article 65 (1985), and Ley Organica, Article 23 (1985), which was applied in connection with Spain's extradition request to England for Augusto Pinochet. Naomi Roht-Arriza The Pinochet Precedent and Universal Jurisdiction, 35 New England L. Rev., 311 (2001). This was also applied in connection with Spain's request to Mexico for the extradition of Ricardo Miguel Cavallo, an Argentine citizen, sought for prosecution in Spain for crimes committed in Argentina during the "dirty war" of the 1970s. See Juan E. Mendez and Salvador Tinajero-Esquivel, the Cavalo Case: A New Test for Universal Jurisdiction in 8(3) Human Rights Brief 8 (American University, Washington College of Law, Spring 2001).

597 36 I.L.R. 5, 5–57 (Israel D.C., Jerusalem, December 12, 1961).

598 See Nazi and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment) Law, August 1, 1950, 4 L.S.I. No. 64, at 154. For a discussion of the unique characteristics of this law, see Honigman v. Attorney General, 18 I.L.R. 542, 543 (Isr. S. Ct. 1953).

599 Cf. D.W. Bowett, Jurisdiction: Changing Patterns of Authority over Activities and Resources, 1982 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 1, 12 (opining that "the exercise of jurisdiction by Israel in the Eichmann case stands out as highly unusual, and probably unfounded").

of the law's international validity and the jurisdictional theory relied upon rather than its jurisdictional basis.[600] In its judgment, the district court stated:

> All this applies to the crime of genocide (including the "crime against the Jewish people") which, although committed by the killing of individuals, was intended to exterminate the national as a group . . . The State of Israel, the sovereign State of the Jewish people, performs through its legislation the task of carrying into effect the right of the Jewish people to punish the criminals who killed its sons with intent to put an end to the survival of this people. We are convinced that this power conforms to the subsisting principles of nations.[601]

In affirming the district court's judgment, the Supreme Court of Israel, while noting full agreement on the protective principle of jurisdiction, insisted upon the universal jurisdiction argument, as this applied not only to Jews in whose name Israel claimed to exercise protective jurisdiction, but also to Poles, Slovenes, Czechs, and gypsies.[602] The Supreme Court further stated: "The State of Israel . . . was entitled, pursuant to the principle of universal jurisdiction and in the capacity of a guardian of international law and an agent for its enforcement, to try the appellant."[603]

In Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky,[604] the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit referred to universal jurisdiction over crimes of genocide and crimes against humanity, but relied on the same Israeli law that was based on the theory of passive personality. The Sixth Circuit noted that "Israel is seeking to enforce its criminal law for the punishment of Nazis and Nazi collaborators for crimes universally recognized and condemned by the community of nations. The fact that Demjanjuk is charged with committing these acts in Poland does not deprive Israel of authority to bring him to trial."[605]

7.7. Conclusion

The historical evolution of jus cogens international crimes, from their recognition as being offensive to certain values to their universal condemnation and finally to their universal proscription, developed in different ways. But the distinctive historical evolution of each of these jus cogen*s* international crimes is no different than that of other international crimes.[606] The emergence, growth, and inclusion in positive international criminal law of international crimes went through different stages and gestational periods.[607] Piracy, slavery, and war crimes evolved over centuries through declarative prescriptions and later in enforcement proscriptions,[608] while some crimes such as genocide, apartheid, and torture did not. They became international crimes by virtue of their separate embodiment, each in a single convention adopted in 1948, 1973, and 1984, respectively, without prior gestation in other stages of evolution. Crimes

---

600 See Robert K. Woetzel, The Eichmann Case in International Law, in International Criminal Law 354 (Gerhard O.W. Mueller & Edward M. Wise eds., 1965); Telford Taylor, Large Questions in the Eichmann Case, N.Y. Times, Jan. 22, 1961, § 6 (Magazine), at 11.

601 Eichmann, 36 I.L.R. at 57 (para. 38).

602 Attorney Gen. of Israel v. Eichmann, 36 I.L.R. 277, 304 (para. 12) (Israel S. Ct., May 29, 1962).

603 Id.

604 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985).

605 Id. at 582. See Yoram Sheftel, Defending Ivan the Terrible: The Conspiracy to Convict John Demjanjuk (1996).

606 See Bassiouni, Sources, supra note 382, at 46–100.

607 M. Cherif Bassiouni, Enforcing Human Rights through International Criminal Law and through an International Criminal Tribunal, in Human Rights: An Agenda for the Next Century 347 (Louis Henkin & Lawrence Hargrove eds., 1994).

608 The category of war crimes continues to be augmented to reflect different practices and more detailed regulations; slave-related practices have not, as mentioned above, been included.

against humanity, however, had a short gestational period between 1919, when the crime was first proposed and almost accepted, and 1945, when it was embodied in positive international criminal law in the Nuremberg Charter.[609] Since then it has been included in the statutes of the ICTY, ICTR, and ICC, but there is still no specialized convention on that category of crimes as there is with war crimes, genocide, apartheid, and torture.[610] But the conventions relative to those crimes do not all have clear provisions, and in some cases, no provisions at all on universal jurisdiction. It is their status as jus cogens crimes that implies that universal jurisdiction exists.

Universal jurisdiction, as discussed above, resembles a checkerboard. Some conventions recognize it, and some national practices of states demonstrate its existence, but the practice is uneven and inconsistent. Most of all, the practice of states does not evidence a widespread application.

The confusion about universality is that it has at least five meanings:

1. The universality of condemnation for certain crimes;

2. The universal reach of national jurisdiction, which could be for the international crime for which there is universal condemnation, as well as others;

3. The extraterritorial reach of national jurisdiction, which may also merge with universal reach of national legislation;

4. The universal reach of international adjudicative bodies that may or may not rely on the theory of universal jurisdiction; and

5. The universal jurisdiction of national legal systems without any connection to the enforcing state other than the presence of the accused.

The diverse meanings attributed to universal jurisdiction have probably been among the reasons confusion has surrounded its legal significance. Similarly, the diverse theories of extraterritorial jurisdiction that were applied by international and national judicial bodies have also contributed to this confusion. But the writings of scholars added to the confusion when they expressed in lex lata terms what may have been de lege ferenda or only expected desiderata.

What truly advanced the recognition and application of universal jurisdiction has been the acceptance of the maxim aut dedere aut judicare as an international civitas maxima. The duty to prosecute or extradite and, where appropriate, to punish persons accused of or convicted of international crimes, particularly jus cogens crimes because of their heinous nature and disruptive impact on peace and security, necessarily leads to the recognition of universal jurisdiction as a means of achieving the goals of aut dedere aut judicare.

The writings of scholars have driven the recognition of the theory of universal jurisdiction, particularly for jus cogens international crimes. These writings reflect idealistic universalistic views, as well as pragmatic policy perspectives. The combination of international and national sources of law has produced a cumulative effect sufficient to warrant the recognition of universal jurisdiction for jus cogens crimes. Universal jurisdiction is the most effective method of deterring and preventing international crimes, by increasing the likelihood of prosecution and punishment of its perpetrators. This approach to international criminal accountability is also believed to be a factor in reducing impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes.[611] 609 For that historical evolution, see Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, supra note 341.

---

610 The only logical method of dealing with the problems of uneven development of international criminal law is to codify it, but it regrettably appears that governments do not support this proposition; consequently international criminal law will continue to suffer from a number of legislative and other deficiencies. See, e.g., M. Cherif Bassiouni, A Draft International Criminal Code and a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal (1987).

611 See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Searching for Peace and Achieving Justice: The Need for Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 9 (1996); Madeline H. Morris, International Guidelines against Impunity: Facilitating

A dynamic interaction exists between: (1) international and national norms of international criminal law, (2) international and national processes for the enforcement of international criminal law, and (3) state and nonstate actors' cooperation in the development of norms and processes and in their implementation. This dynamic interaction is breaking down traditional compartmentalization between international and national law.[612] As a result, hybrid norms and processes have developed that include both international and national characteristics and incorporate the combined supportive roles of state and nonstate actors in the development of norms and processes, as well as in their implementation. This dialectical relationship, which some call "complementarity," is, however, even more complex. It is an amorphous and changing process that is difficult to define, predict, or assess, other than to recognize that it is both growing and evolving. The fact that it is, in part, the product of contingent circumstantial and occasional factors does not diminish its continued growth.

The policy-based assumptions and goals of universal jurisdiction are that such a jurisdictional mechanism, when relied upon by a large number of states, can prevent, deter, punish, provide accountability, and reduce impunity for some international crimes, and that it can enhance the prospects of justice and peace. Irrespective of the checkered nature of the recognition and application of universal jurisdiction in international and national law and practice, the policy arguments advanced in its favor, particularly in light of the historic record of impunity that has benefited so many of the perpetrators of these crimes for so long, support its application. But universal jurisdiction must not be allowed to become a wildfire, uncontrolled in its application and destructive of international legal processes.[613] If that were the case, it would produce conflicts of jurisdiction between states, which have the potential to threaten world order, subject individuals to abuses of judicial processes, prompt human rights violations, cause politically motivated harassment, and result in the denial of justice. In addition, there is the danger that

---

Accountability, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 29 (1996); Michael Scharf, The Letter of the Law: The Scope of the International Legal Obligation to Prosecute Human Rights Crimes, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 41 (1996); Bassiouni, International Crimes: Jus Cogens and Obligatio Erga Omnes, supra note 399; W. Michael Reisman, Legal Responses to Genocide and Other Massive Violations of Human Rights, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 75 (1996); Stephan Landsman, Alternative Responses to Serious Human Rights Abuses: Of Prosecution and Truth Commissions, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 81 (1996); Naomi Roht-Arriaza, Combating Impunity: Some Thoughts on the Way Forward, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 93 (1996); Jennifer L. Balint, The Place of Law in Addressing International Regime Conflicts, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 103 (1996); Neil J. Kritz, Coming to Terms with Atrocities: A Review of Accountability Mechanisms for Mass Violations of Human Rights, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 127 (1996); Joyner, supra note 475; Priscilla B. Hayner, International Guidelines for the Creation and Operation of Truth Commissions: A Preliminary Proposal, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 173 (1996); Mark S. Ellis, Purging the Past: The Current State of Lustration Laws in the Former Communist Bloc, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 181 (1996); Douglass Cassel, Lessons from the Americas: Guidelines for International Response to Amnesties for Atrocities, 59 Law & Contemp. Probs. 197 (1996). See also Reining in Impunity for International Crimes and Serious Violations of Fundamental Human Rights: Proceedings of the Siracusa Conference, September 17–21, 1998, in 14 Nouvelles Études Pénales (1998); Diane F. Orentlicher, Settling Accounts: The Duty to Prosecute Human Rights Violations of a Prior Regime, 100 Yale L. J. 2537 (1991).

612 See Thomas M. Franck, Legitimacy in the International System, 82 Am. J. Int'l L. 705, 707 (1988).

> The international system of states is fundamentally different from any national community of persons and of corporate entities. It is not helpful to ignore those differences or to cling to the reifying notion that states are "persons" analogous to the citizens of a nation. Some of the differences are of great potential interest. In a nation, Machiavelli noted, "there cannot be good laws where there are not good arms." In the international community, however, there are ample signs that rules unenforced by good arms are yet capable of obligating states and quite often even achieve habitual compliance.

Id. (footnote omitted).

613 This highlights a significant reason universal jurisdiction should not be exercised over all international crimes.

universal jurisdiction may be perceived as hegemonic jurisdiction exercised mainly by some Western powers against persons from developing nations. The actual practice of universal jurisdiction is far more prosaic, however. Universal jurisdiction by states has focused overwhelmingly on low-level offenders whose prosecution, if the arguments of the theory's advocates are to be believed, will have little deterrent value, and similarly avoids the concerns of the theory's opponents because low-level prosecutions are unlikely to disrupt the global order.

To avoid these and other negative outcomes, while enhancing the positive outcomes of an orderly and effective application of universal jurisdiction, it is indispensable to arrive at norms regulating the resort by states and international adjudicating bodies to the application of this theory.[614] At first, guidelines should be developed that in time may garner consensus among scholars and, ultimately, among governments. At that stage, an international convention should be elaborated so that these guidelines can become positive international law.

The history of contemporary international law is replete with examples of scholarly and NGO initiatives that have set in motion a process that ripened into conventional international law. The Princeton Project on Universal Jurisdiction will hopefully result in an international convention on universal jurisdiction for jus cogens and other international crimes that includes jurisdictional priorities; provides rules for resolving conflicts of jurisdiction; and minimizes the exposure of individuals to multiple prosecutions, abuses of process, and denial of justice.[615]

As the French philosopher Pascal once said, "Every custom has its origin in a single act," and in this case, there is ample evidence of many such acts. However, it is their cumulative effect that gives weight to the proposition that universal jurisdiction is part of customary international law. Nevertheless, the fact that there is a customary international law recognition of universal

---

614 The series of Restatements of certain aspects of U.S. law is an interesting model. However, as there is no Restatement on criminal law, the closest analogy is the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws, which, in Section 6, includes a policy-oriented approach to choice of law. It states:

> (1) A court, subject to constitutional restrictions, will follow a statutory directive of its own state on choice of law.
>
> (2) When there is no such directive, the factors relevant to the choice of the applicable rule of law include:
>
> (a) the needs of the interstate and international systems,
>
> (b) the relevant policies of the forum,
>
> (c) the relevant policies of other interested states and the relative interests of those states in the determination of the particular issue,
>
> (d) the protection of justified expectations,
>
> (e) the basic policies underlying the particular field of law,
>
> (f) certainty, predictability and uniformity of result, and
>
> (g) ease in the determination and application of the law to be applied.

Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws, § 6, at 10 (1971). Although such a choice-of-law approach can work in a federal system linked by a Constitution that contains a "full-faith and credit" clause, U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1, it may not work effectively at the international law level. Consequently, a more hard-fast normative approach may be more appropriate in the international context.

615 Although this writer strongly supports this outcome, it must be noted that a similar effort undertaken in 1967 by the International Association of Penal Law resulted in the adoption of the 1968 U.N. Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutes of Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity. See U.N. Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutes of Limitations, supra note 559. Fifty-four states ratified it. See also 37 Revue Internationale de Droit Pénal (1966). It can thus be assumed that at most the same number of states would support a Convention on universal jurisdiction. The more recent European Convention on Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes (Inter-European) has only a disappointing two ratifications. See European Convention on Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations, supra note 560.

jurisdiction does not imply that it can be exercised with respect to all international crimes or that it can be exercised by all states without limitations. What the crimes are for which universal jurisdiction applies is still an unsettled question, though there is a more generalized agreement that they include piracy, slavery and slave-related practices, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide, and by convention, torture and some international terrorism crimes. In addition, customary international law does not so far settle the issue of whether there needs to be a nexus to the enforcing state, such as the presence of the accused on its territory. There are also other issues that remain unresolved, such as the temporal immunity of heads of states and diplomats, and a number of issues pertaining to the rights of the individual to prevent vexatious and multiple prosecutions, as well as how to ensure due process and fairness in the course of proceedings based on universal jurisdiction. Consequently, it can be said that the recognition of universal jurisdiction in customary international law is in its first stage of evolution, and that it has to be followed by other stages needed to clarify the rights and obligations of states in the exercise of this form of extraterritorial jurisdiction in order to maximize the benefits of universal jurisdiction and eliminate its potential for abuses.

8. International Immunities

International immunities apply through conventional and customary international law to three categories of persons: heads of state and family members,[616] diplomats on mission or accredited high-level government personnel on mission (officials representing the state),[617] and personnel of international organizations such as the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations benefiting from existing "treaties and immunities agreements" between them and their member states or a particular host country. These types of immunities are called personal immunities.[618] They are to be distinguished from substantive immunities under the doctrine of jure imperii, or "acts of state," under customary international law.[619] This doctrine is reflected in U.S. legislation.[620]

With respect to personal immunities, there is a distinction applicable both in international law, as well as domestic law, with respect to temporal immunity and substantive, or subject matter, immunity. The former merely limits the period of the immunity to that of the officeholder's tenure, while the latter provides blanket immunity for the person by reason of that person's status. Since the IMT and the IMTFE after WWII, there has been a gradual development in international law limiting immunities with respect to certain international crimes. In some cases, these limitations have been construed to also apply to temporal immunity.

Article 27 of the ICC statute eliminates all forms of international immunities, including for heads of state.[621]

> 1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or 616 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at ch. II, sec. 4.

617 Vienna Convention on the Law of Diplomatic Immunity, Apr. 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227, 500 U.N.T.S. 95; Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Apr. 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77, 596 U.N.T.S. 261. See also U.N. Convention on Special mission, Dec. 16, 1969, 1035 U.N.T.S., arts. 21, 29, 31, 34, and 42 (entered into force June 21, 1985).

618 See Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at ch. II, sec. 4.

619 See Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398 (1964).

620 See 1976 Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, as amended in 1988, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1602–1611; Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 72.

621 M.Cherif Bassiouni, 2 The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis, and Integrated Text 208–210 (2005); ICC Statute, supra note 388.

parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility of sentence.

2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.[622]

But it should be recalled that customary international law still recognizes temporal immunity.[623]

8.1. Head of State Immunity

Traditionally heads of state have been immune from the national criminal jurisdiction of another state other than their own, arising out of the Westphalian notion of international relations, which is based on the absolute sovereignty of states.[624] After WWI, the absolute immunity that had been given to heads of state gave way to a qualified immunity, removing the substantive immunities for certain crimes, but retaining the temporal immunity.[625] The first attempt to prosecute a head of state came after the conclusion of WWI when the victorious allies charged Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.[626] Wilhelm sought refuge in the Netherlands, which refused to extradite him because the crime with which he was charged, "the supreme offense against the sanctity of international treaties," was deemed by the Netherlands to be a political crime.[627] However, since the establishment of the IMT at Nuremberg in 1945[628] there is no immunity for heads of state for international crimes such as the crime against peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and since 1948, genocide.[629] In a 1946 resolution, the UN General Assembly affirmed the non-applicability of substantive immunity of heads of state with respect to international crimes.[630] Several treaties have subsequently codified in positive law the G.A. Resolution, including the 1948 Genocide Convention in Article 4, the 1973 Apartheid Convention in Article 3, and the 1984 Convention against Torture, which in Articles 4 and 12 removed head of state and other substantive immunities from criminal prosecution.[631]

There is frequently a question as to the immunity of foreign heads of state, particularly as to acts they claim were pursuant to their prerogatives in acting on behalf of their state. But their claims have been rejected where the acts were deemed outside the legitimate scope of a head of

622 Bassiouni, 2 The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, Id.]

623 See infra Sec. 8.2.

624 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341.

625 Id. at 72–73.

626 Id. at 72.

627 Treaty of Peace Between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, June 28, 1919, art. 227. See also M. Cherif Bassiouni, World War I: The War to End All Wars, and the Birth of a Handicapped International Criminal Justice System, 33 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 255 (2002).

628 IMT Charter, supra note 354. Article 7 specifically states that "[t]he official position of defendants, whether as Heads of State or responsible officials in Government Departments, shall not be considered as freeing them from responsibility or mitigating punishment." Id. See also Annex to Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis (London Agreement), Aug. 8, 1945, 82 U.N.T.S. 279, 59 Stat. 1544, E.A.S. No. 472, reprinted in 3 Bevans 1239.

629 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted at New York, Dec. 9, 1948, 78 U.N.T.S. 277 (entered into force Jan. 12, 1951). Article IV states: "Persons committing genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be punished, whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals."

630 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 74.

631 Id.

state's lawful conduct.[632] Foreign heads of state have occasionally fared better when the criminal charge or civil efforts against them were to seize assets that could not have been derived but from the position they occupied.

Among the beneficiaries of this leniency are Haiti's former dictator Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier and the Philippines' now deceased President Ferdinand Marcos. Both had substantial assets in Switzerland that they were able to keep. But they surely are not the only ones. The late Shah of Iran was also able to keep his fortune abroad.

The customary practice of states has shown the willingness to prosecute former heads of state for international crimes. The U.K. House of Lords found Augusto Pinochet, the former head of Chile, extraditable under the 1984 Convention against Torture, even though it recognized head of state immunity, on the grounds that torture is never a lawful act.[633] Recently, heads of state have been unable to escape prosecution because of the existence of the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR.[634] The Statutes for both Tribunals, as well as the ICC, proscribe the granting of immunity to heads of state. Article 7(2) of the Statute of the ICTY states: "The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment."[635] Article 6(2) of the Statute for the ICTR mirrors the language used in Article 7(2) of the ICTY Statute.[636]

As a result of the aforementioned proscriptions, Jean Kambanda, a former prime minister of Rwanda, was indicted and pleaded guilty to all counts of the indictment, which included: (1) genocide, (2) conspiracy to commit genocide, (3) direct and public incitement to commit genocide, (4) complicity in genocide, (5) crimes against humanity (murder), and (6) crimes against humanity (extermination). Similarly, Slobodan Milosevic, as a head of state of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, was indicted for war crimes and human rights violations against Kosovo's ethnic Albanian population.[637] At the ICC, Sudanese president Omar al-Bashir was indicted for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes in the Darfur; Muammar al-Qadhafi for war crimes committed during the Libyan civil war; and Laurent Gbagbo for crimes against humanity committed during the Ivorian civil war.

---

632 See In re Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litig., 978 F.2d 493 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2960 (1993); Jimenez v. Aristiguieta, 311 F.2d 547 (5th Cir.); cert. denied, 373 U.S. 914, reh'g denied, 374 U.S. 858 (1963); United States v. Noriega, 746 F. Supp. 1506 (S.D. Fla. 1990); United States v. Noriega, 683 F. Supp. 1373 (S.D. Fla. 1988); New York Land Co. v. Republic of Philippines, 634 F. Supp. 279 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (also in reference to Ferdinand Marcos).

633 Bassiouni, Introduction to International Criminal Law, supra note 341, at 76.

634 See generally Marc Henzelin, L'Immunité pénale des chefs d'Etat en Matiére Financiére: Vers Une Exception pour les actes de pillage de resources et de corruption?, in 12 Revue Suisse De Droit international et de Droit Européen 179 (2002); Mary Margaret Penrose, It's Good to Be the King!: Prosecuting Heads of States and Former Heads of States under International Law, 39 Colum. J. Transnat'l L. 193–200 (2000); Jill M. Sears, Confronting the "Culture of Impunity:" Immunity of Heads of State from Nuremberg to Ex Parte Pinochet, 32 German Ybk. Int'l L. 125 (1999); A. Biannchi, Immunity versus Human Rights: The Pinochet Case, 10 Eur. J. Int'l L. 249 (1999); Ved P. Nanda, Human Rights and Sovereign and Individual Immunity (Sovereign Immunity, Act of State Immunity and Diplomatic Immunity): Some Reflections, ILSA J. Int'l & Comp. L. 467 (1999); Arthur Watts, The Legal Position in International Law of Heads of States, Heads of Government and Foreign Ministers, 247 Receuil de Courts de l'Académie de la Haye 9 (1994).

635 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, art. 7(2), S.C. Res. 808, U.N. SCOR, 48th Sess., 3217th mtg., U.N. Doc. S/RES/808 (1993).

636 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, art. 6(2), S.C. Res. 955, U.N. SCOR, 49th Sess., 3453d mtg., Annex, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994).

637 See Prosecutor v. Milosevic (Indictment) (May 24, 1999), available at http://www.un.org/icty/indictment/english/mil-ii990524e.htm.

Additionally, Spain has arrested Isabel Peron on an Argentine extradition warrant for crimes against humanity regarding her alleged role in the abduction and murder of left-wing activists opposing her rule in Argentina, although a court in Spain ultimately rejected the extradition request, reasoning that the charges did not constitute crimes against humanity and that the statute of limitations had expired.[638] Peru sought the extradition from Japan of its former head of state, Alberto Fujimori, whose trial began December 2007 in Peru, and who was convicted and sentenced in 2009 to a twenty-five–year prison term, which he is currently serving.[639]

One of the most prominent examples of the prosecution of a head of state is the attempted prosecution of Hissène Habré, the former head of Chad. Since 1999 Belgium has attempted to prosecute Habré in what has become a cause célèbre of head of state prosecution and universal jurisdiction.[640] The criminal complaint was initially filed by Chadians living in Belgium accusing Habré of, inter alia, murder and torture in Chad during his brutal rule.[641] Eventually a Belgian Juge d'Instruction issued an indictment in Belgium pursuant to Belgium's national law of 1993, as amended in 1999,[642] which gives it universal jurisdiction over certain international crimes, namely, genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.[643] The matter was complicated by Habré's ouster, which saw him seek refuge in Senegal, where he remains to this day and which is the requested state for Habré's extradition to Belgium. Senegal, as a state party to the CAT, is faced with its obligation to prosecute or extradite[644] but has refused to extradite 638 See Bruce Zagaris, Spain Arrests Isabel Perón on Argentine Extradition Warrant for Crimes against Humanity, 23 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 87–88 (Mar. 2007); BBC News, Spain Rejects Peron Extradition, April 28, 2008, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/7372056.stm (last visited Sept. 15, 2011).

639 On May 29, 2002 the Supreme Court of Japan approved Peru's extradition request. The Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs had been expected to approve the request, but did not. See Court Advances Extradition of Fujimori, Chi. Trib., May 31, 2002, at sec. 1, p. 6. In 2005, Fujimori left Japan for Chile where he was arrested. The Supreme Court of Chile approved Peru's extradition request on September 21, 2007. See Simone Romero, Chileans Order Peru's Ex-Chief Home for Trial, N.Y. Times, Sept. 22, 2007, at A1. Fujimori arrived in Peru on September 22, 2007 and his trial began December 10, 2007. There have been many other cases in which states have indicted and/or prosecuted their former heads of states. They include: Ethiopia and Iran's indictments of, respectively, Emperor Haile Selassie in 1974 and King Reza Pahlevi in 1979; Romania's indictment of its former president Ceausescu in 1987; and Pakistan's indictment of its former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto in 1990. Fujimori 25 Year Sentence Upheld by Peru Supreme Court, BBC, Jan. 3, 2010, available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/8438237.stm.

640 Documents on the Habré case can be found at http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre.

641 Id.

642 Act Concerning the Punishment of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law § 7 (Belgium). Belgian Law of June 16, 1993, as amended by the Law of February 10, 1999. As a consequence of the ICJ's decision in Congo v. Belgium the Cour de Cassation held that international immunities apply on a temporal basis. Consequently, the Belgian courts must suspend proceedings against such persons. As a result, an amendment to the 1993 law was introduced before the Belgium Senate, and the Conseil d'Etat expressed its position on the proposed law, which provides that in cases where there is no "link" to Belgium, the investigatory authority must defer the case to the ICJ or to a state seeking to exercise its jurisdiction. Belgium thus remains the jurisdiction of last resort, but subject to certain limitations. See amendments to the law of June 16, 1993, April 5, 2003, Sénat de Belgique, 2-1256/14. See also A. Andries, C. Van den Wyngaert, E. David, & J. Verhaegen, Commentaire de la loi du 16 juin 1993 relative à la repression des violations graves de droit international humanitaire, Revue de Droit Pénal et de Criminologie 1133 (1994); Damien Vandermeersch, Compètence universelle et immunités en droit international humanitaire la situation belge, in Le Droit Pènal a l'epreuve de l'internationalisation 227 (Marc Henzelin & Robert Roth eds.,2002).

643 Vandermeersch, supra note 642.

644 Convention against Torture, supra note 317, arts. 5(2), 7(1) (establishing the duty to prosecute or extradite).

Habré and has attempted to prosecute him domestically. After an initial finding by the Senegalese Judge of Instruction that the former head of state was subject to the criminal jurisdiction of Senegal, the decision was reversed by the Senegalese Cour de Cassation. Nevertheless, in 2002, that decision was reconsidered.[645] Since then, Senegalese courts have wrestled with the means by which to try Habré, and the African Union became involved in the matter as well in order to establish an African tribunal for his prosecution. Senegal abruptly withdrew from these talks in mid-2011, drawing criticism from the African Union.[646] After long delays, Belgium brought the issue of Senegal's duty to extradite or prosecute before the ICJ in 2009. The matter was heard by the ICJ, which ruled that Senegal has jurisdictional priority under the aut dedere aut judicare provision of the CAT.[647]

Senegal has also suspended Habré's repatriation to Chad, where he was sentenced to death in absentia in 2008 for "financial, material and moral support to the rebels" attempting to overthrow the current government.[648] Human rights groups have consistently opposed Habré's extradition to Chad and prefer to see him tried in Senegal,[649] including the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Navi Pillay.[650] However, Pillay stressed that although Habré cannot be returned to Chad, he must be prosecuted or extradited to face charges against him in Belgium.[651]

More recently, the "Arab Spring" uprisings led to the domestic prosecution of former heads of state in Egypt and Tunisia. In Tunisia, former president Zine El Abidine Ben Ali was convicted in absentia in 2011 for financial crimes and in 2012 for the killing of protestors.[652] In June 2012 former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak was convicted for failing to prevent the killing of protestors in Tahrir Square by police in early 2011, resulting in a life sentence.

As mentioned above, the ICC, under Article 27 of the Rome Statute, has issued indictments against a number of heads of state, including Laurent Gbagbo of Côte d'Ivoire, Omar al-Bashir of the Sudan, and Muammar al-Qadhafi of Libya. As of April 2013, al-Bashir remains in office in the Sudan, but Gbagbo is in The Hague awaiting trial, and Qadhafi was killed after having been taken into the custody of National Transitional Council forces in October 2011.

From January 1990 to May 2008, sixty-seven heads of state or government, spanning Latin America, Africa, Europe, Asia, and the Middle East, were formally charged or indicted with serious criminal offenses involving human rights and corruption for the most part.[653] Only half of the cases went to trial: half of the trials resulted in convictions, and half of the convictions resulted in some form of sentence.[654] This weak and ambivalent prosecution pattern is tied to

---

645 Id.

646 African Union: Press Senegal to Extradite Habré, Human Rights Watch, available at: http://www.hrw.org/en/news/2011/06/28/african-union-press-senegal-extradite-habr.

647 International Court of Justice Unofficial Press Release, No. 2009/26, July 17, 2009, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/144/15343.pdf; African Union: Press Senegal to Extradite Habré, Human Rights Watch.

648 Chad Confirms Former President Habre's Conviction, Agence France Presse, Aug. 19, 2008, available at http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5jRB8NAgF4CYAzlVwngJZzPdkgKFw.

649 Moumine Ngarmbassa, Habre Death Sentence Won't Alter Senegal Case—Chad, Reuters Africa, Aug. 19, 2008, available at http://africa.reuters.com/wire/news/usnLJ487890.html.

650 Id.

651 AFP, Former Chad Dictator Habre "Must Face Prosecution," July 12, 2011, available at http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iQjSs_ZIiY5fv8P8Ls-i-GvHvIVA?docId=CNG.b2ceadbac94f53ed52774bcb398e39c0.4b1.

652 Former Tunisian President Ben Ali on Trial, United Press International, Jan. 3, 2012.

653 Prosecuting Heads of State, 12 (Ellen L. Lutz & Catilin Reiger eds., 2009). For a categorical separation and discussion of these prosecutions by region with disposition, see id. at 295–304.

654 Id. at 14.

the political climate surrounding the prosecutions.[655] Thus, increased political resolve among states in the international community to bring human rights violators to justice is necessary if heads of state are to be deterred from further commission of atrocities, as otherwise they will assume that there is insufficient political will to bring them to account.

8.2. Diplomatic Immunity

The Vienna Convention on the law of diplomatic immunity and the Vienna Convention on the law of consular immunity both provide for complete immunity of accredited diplomats, their spouses, and members of their families and household personnel.[656] Under the provision of the two conventions, a host country to which a diplomat is formally accredited can neither prosecute nor extradite that person, irrespective of how minor or how serious a crime he/she may have committed. The only option for a host country is to consider that diplomat a persona non grata and request the diplomat to leave the country within a specified period of time. There is an implied obligation for the sending country to prosecute the diplomat, but that depends on whether its national law permits it to do so if the act is committed outside its territorial jurisdiction, or if the act is committed pursuant to an order from a superior of the diplomat in question.

If a diplomat commits a crime in a given country to which he/she was accredited and was either expelled or left voluntarily, and then returned to that country without being diplomatically accredited, he/she may then be subject to prosecution, because diplomatic immunity attaches to the function and not the person. Therefore, if that person is in a country other than one in which he/she committed the act deemed to be a crime and he/she is not an accredited diplomat to that country, he/she may be prosecuted or sought for extradition from that country and prosecuted.

United Nations personnel and personnel of international organizations are also covered by similar immunity from prosecution if the international organization has an agreement to that effect with the host country.[657]

Embassies and consular offices are also immune from the exercise of national jurisdiction by the host country under both the Vienna Convention of Diplomatic Immunity and the Vienna Convention on Consular Immunity.[658] The law of the state of the embassy applies within it.

On April 11, 2000, the diplomatic immunity of the Democratic Republic of Congo's (DRC) acting minister of foreign affairs, Yerodia Abdoulaye Ndombasi, was challenged when a 655 Id. at 19, 37. One example of political pressure influencing the pursuit of justice is how Belgium's expansive legislation permitting its exercise of universal jurisdiction was repealed in 2003 after the United States, facing criminal complaints filed by Iraqi families arising from U.S. actions during the first Gulf War, threatened to pull NATO headquarters out of Brussels unless the law was changed.

656 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and Optional Protocol on Disputes, Apr. 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227, T.I.A.S. No. 7502, 500 U.N.T.S. 95; Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and Optional Protocol on Disputes, Apr. 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77, T.I.A.S. No. 6820, 596 U.N.T.S. 261. See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Protection of Diplomats under Islamic Law, 74 Am. J. Int'l L. 609 (1980); B.J. George, Jr., Diplomatic and Consular Immunity, in International Criminal Law: A Guide to U.S. Practice and Procedure 395 (Ved P. Nanda & M. Cherif Bassiouni eds., 1987) [hereinafter Nanda & Bassiouni U.S. Guide].

657 See generally, Geert-Jan Alexander Knoops, Prosecution and Defense of Peacekeepers under International Criminal Law (2004).

658 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, supra note 536.

Belgium judge issued an international arrest warrant against him for "crimes against humanity" and genocide. Following the issuance of the arrest warrant, the DRC filed proceedings with the ICJ on October 17, 2000, against Belgium, for, in pertinent part, the "violation of the diplomatic immunity of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of a sovereign state, as recognized by the jurisprudence of the Court and following from Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of 18 April 1961 on Diplomatic Relations."[659] The DRC also submitted a request for the indication of a provisional measure,[660] which specifically asked for the immediate cancellation of the Belgium arrest warrant.

In order for the ICJ to grant the Democratic Republic of Congo's request for provisional measures, the DRC had to prove: (1) the preservation of its rights was urgent, and (2) the existence of irreparable prejudice.[661] The DRC argued that the need for provisional measures was urgent because the arrest warrant made it impossible for the minister of foreign affairs to perform his duties; for example, he was prohibited from traveling to other states because he was in fear that an arrest warrant would be served upon him.[662] In fact, at the proceedings on November 20, 2000, counsel for the DRC stated: "A State whose Minister for Foreign Affairs is obliged to remain on the territory of that State is, as it were, decapitated."[663] He further argued that because the Minister for Foreign Affairs was unable to travel outside of his state, the DRC was excluded from the international arena, thereby causing irreparable harm.[664] In response, Belgium argued that because, at the time of the proceedings, Yerodia was no longer the acting minister of foreign affairs of the DRC, but instead the minister of education, a provisional measure was not warranted.[665]

The ICJ, assuming compulsory jurisdiction over the case, determined that because Yerodia had assumed a new position as minister of education, which required less travel, and that because the DRC had failed to prove that the preservation of DRC's rights were urgent and might cause irreparable harm in the future, the indication of provisional measures was unnecessary. The

---

659 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (DRC v. Belgium), 2000 I.C.J. 121 (Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures Order of Dec. 8). See also Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of April 18, 1961, which codified diplomatic relations by stating:

> All official business with the receiving State entrusted to the mission by the sending State shall be conducted with or through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the receiving State or such other Ministry as may be agreed.

Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, supra note 536, at art. 41.

660 The issuance of provisional measures is largely intended to "preserve the respective rights of the parties pending the decision of the Court." Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (DRC v. Belgium), 2000 I.C.J. 121 (Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures Order of Dec. 8). See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited: The International Court of Justice Decision in Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), 12 Palestine Yearbook of In'tl Law 27–48 (2002–2003); M. Cherif Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259.

661 See citations, supra note 660.

662 Id.

663 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (DRC v. Belgium), 2000 I.C.J. 121 (Proceedings on November 20, 2000); Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 27–48; Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259, at 81.

664 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (DRC v. Belgium), 2000 I.C.J. 121 (Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures Order of Dec. 8); Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 27–48; Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259, at 81.

665 See citations, supra note 664.

merits essentially hinged upon whether a state can exercise universal jurisdiction irrespective of any links to its territory, such as the presence of the accused.[666]

The ICJ drew several conclusions regarding international immunities.[667] First, international immunities are binding on states, which must give recognition to temporal diplomatic and head of state immunity. However, international law does not recognize substantive immunity with respect to international crimes.[668] International tribunals, such as the ICTY, ICTR, and ICC, can derogate temporal immunity, and therefore customary international law can be changed by the Security Council, as well as states through the use of treaties.[669]

Although it ordered Belgium to cancel the international effect of its arrest warrant, the ICJ avoided making a decision on the issue of universal jurisdiction, as the ICC statute does not provide for it, unless referred to by the Security Council.[670] The case implies that an unregulated application of universal jurisdiction would negatively impact world order.[671] The Court did not make a decision on the conflict between international law, which requires prosecution for international crimes, and other international immunities.[672] But, the Court left a future possibility of allowing Belgium, or another state, to exercise universal jurisdiction for serious international crimes, once the temporal immunity has expired.[673]

The ICJ in its opinion also did not address which individuals are entitled to temporal immunity, although the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations applied to Yerodia, the incumbent minister of foreign affairs, in this case.[674] Thus, international uncertainty remains as to whether a head of state or cabinet officer on diplomatic missions, who do not fall under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, are entitled to temporal immunity. The Court concluded in its final judgment, which is binding on Congo and Belgium, that > the issue against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi or the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000, and its international circulation, constituted violations of legal obligation of the Kingdom of Belgium towards the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in that they failed to respect the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability which the incumbent Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo enjoyed under international law.[675]

After rejecting all of Belgium's jurisdictional and admissibility objections, the Court held that it had to address the question of immunity from criminal jurisdiction of an incumbent minister of foreign affairs under customary international law.[676] The Court reasoned that an

---

666 The Princeton Principles on Universal Jurisdiction, in Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction (2001); Universal Jurisdiction, National Courts and the Prosecution of Serious Crimes under International Law (Steve Macedo ed., 2003); Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 27–48; Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction for International Crimes, supra note 259, at 81. This case remains under consideration on the merits by the ICJ.

667 Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of April 11, 2000 (Congo v. Belg.), 2002 I.C.J. 121 (Feb. 14, 2002), reprinted in 41 I.L.M. 536; Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 35–44.

668 Id.

669 Id. See also supra Sec. 7.4.1.

670 Id.

671 Id.

672 Id.

673 Id.

674 Id.

675 Id. See also ICJ Press Release 2002/04, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/index.php?pr=552&code=cobe&p1=3&p2=3&p3=6&...

676 Bassiouni, Universal Jurisdiction Unrevisited, supra note 660, at 37–38.

